A perfection of style, a notable sense of humour, and a poignant realisation of emotional heights and depths have gone to the making of that modern epic, "Conrad in Quest of his Youth." It is an old tale, newly and exquisitely told, of the man who, finding himself possessed, after long years, of the means to attain his secret ideals, discovers he has outgrown them. His pilgrimage in search of his boyhood's friends, his anxious attempts to revivify his old attachments, are inimitably portrayed. The scene at the hotel in the Riviera, where he at last discovers the idol of his youth, is comedy at the highest. She has grown a little stouter, and her smile is not so swift, nor her laugh so infectious. In the old days he was able at times to forget that she was married. Now, alas, it is impossible to overlook the fact! No author has ever painted the sensations of suspense so perfectly as Mr. Merrick; but though Conrad waits with carefully nurtured excitement for the visit of his old love, we realise it is not the real thing, and are prepared for the denouement when, tired out with anticipation, he falls asleep. Disillusioned, unable to blow the ashes of dead romance into living flame, he gives up the quest of the past and launches into an unexplored country—stage-land.

To accompany the author behind the scenes is to smell the grease-paint, catch the flare of the footlights, listen and wait for the ready laughter that bubbles from the lips of the chorus girls. Beside the art of Leonard Merrick the majority of theatrical novels are tawdry imitations of the real thing. His landladies are inimitable. Who can forget the lady who, in the days of her youth, was a gymnastic expert in that exquisite idyll, "A Call from the Past"? Who can forget the lodgings where the girls cooked their supper—when they had any—and laughed when they had none in "Peggy Harper"? They are so human, these men and women of Bohemia; their sorrows grip one, their laughter, brave and confident, brings a smile to your lips, a smile and a sigh. Poverty Corner, with its tale of failure, its story of hunger and disappointment, seems very near. We remember the miserable day when we stood without a penny in our pockets in the dreary rain, the wet soaking through our boots and nothing before us but a long tramp home; until—and in Bohemia it so often happens—one chances on a friend—a light-hearted companion, who once journeyed with us on the road—and the scene shifts! We find ourselves in Soho—nobody paints its cosy little restaurants like Mr. Merrick—and forget our sorrows over an eighteenpenny table d'hôte, with a bottle of wine thrown in!

Always one finds the spirit of adventure, the high courage that will not be cast down, the will that does not accept defeat. One emerges from the novel with a purpose, with a sense of desolation heavy on one's shoulders. There is, we feel, no escape, that the sins of the fathers are inevitably visited upon the grandchildren, and that a grim determinism bars the road. But Mr. Merrick, with his cleansing humour, his poignant emotion, gives us courage, sweeps away morbidity, throws open to every one of us the gates of Romance.

His women are drawn with a strength and delicacy difficult to equal. The feminine point of view is perfectly expressed in "When Love Flies Out of the Window." The husband, an unsuccessful dramatist, reluctantly consents to his wife's return to the stage. She makes a hit in musical comedy, and is flushed and happy at her triumph. The husband, viewing her performance from a seat in the gallery—he will not accept a stall—writhes in agony that his wife should be the target for alien, if admiring, eyes. He could have borne it had she played the lead in Grand Opera. Great music thrilled him like great literature. But to win the cheap enthusiasm of the uncultured by her singing of an inane ditty and her exhibition of dainty and elaborate clothing galls him beyond expression. She returns to their lodgings in Guilford Street, eager for his praise. The poor soul had ordered a dainty supper, with champagne, and tentatively suggests a week-end trip to Brighton. The disappointed dramatist will have none of it, and the wife is reduced to tears. She knows—she knows full well—his talents are greater than hers, his character stronger, but to the very quick she feels he might have let her enjoy her triumph, "her little tinpot triumph," as she says.

One realises the masculine standpoint, the inability of the man to share the earnings of his wife; one realises also—and herein lies the fidelity of Mr. Merrick's methods—the disappointment of the woman, her burning sense of injustice. He paints the scene, simply but with deadly effect. The very quietness of the treatment moves more deeply than excess of emotion. It is in the same book one meets the matchless poet who has achieved a wide reputation and a large income by the writing of librettos for comic opera. Advancing years and increased girth does not depress him or modify the exuberance of his genius. He merely alters the figure of his hero and increases the age—to match his own.

Allied to Mr. Merrick's humour is a sense of tragedy—tragedy of temperament, the most irremediable of all. The sketch of the negro in "Quaint Companions," who has only to sing to obliterate all thought of his colour from the audience, is a remarkable one. He loves a white woman, who marries him for money. He knows it, and the knowledge embitters his life. We forget the egregious vanity, the colossal conceit, of the black man, and in the end we feel that the white woman is the despicable party to the deal. And yet, with a sureness of touch, Mr. Merrick paints the other side, and shows us the abyss of misery the wife suffers from her marriage.

But, fine as is this characterisation, Bohemia is the author's true country. Here he is Prince, and his subjects laugh and cry, strive and work, live and love at his bidding. Mr. Merrick has found the secret of Romance, captured the lantern of Adventure.

JUPITER CARLYLE

By NORMAN MACLEAN.

I.

THERE are some books which tell us about things, and other books which make us see things. To that last order belongs the autobiography of Alexander Carlyle of Inveresk, in whose pages the social, ecclesiastical, and literary life of Scotland and England in the eighteenth century lives for us again. It is an amazing book, written as it was by an old man, for he depicts the vanished days of his youth with a vividness which makes us feel as if we were eye-witnesses of the rout at Prestonpans, or sharers with David Hume and John Home and Principal Robertson in the feasting and revelling of a vanished generation. Carlyle writes of great days and of great men. Scotland was awakening from the torpid condition in which it lay for a century; the dreary Puritanic creed which had held the people under a cloud for a century was releasing its hold, and the stirring of a new intellectual life was everywhere audible. The educated classes in Edinburgh were emerging from their provincialism, and were beginning to speak English and not broad Scotch; and they did it after the manner in which the Duke of Wellington spoke French—with a great deal of courage! The debt which we owe to Carlyle is that he makes us see the birth of a new era in the national life, and the men and women who brought the nation to the birth. He writes of the things he knows, for in them he himself had a great share.

II.

The weirdest figures in his pages are undoubtedly those of Lord Grange and his wife. I remember standing in the desolate burying-ground of Trumpan in Watermish, Skye, waiting for a shallow grave being dug among a forest of nettles, when an old man led me to a corner of the desolate place and said, "That is where Lady Grange was buried." I did not then know the strangest story in Scottish history, and when I learned the facts of her abduction I was filled with amazement how such a thing could have happened in Scotland in the eighteenth century. The actors in that tragic episode are all in these pages. In the parish of Prestonpans, of which Carlyle's father was minister, Lord Grange was the leading man. He had been Lord Justice's Clerk, but was removed from that office. His wife was a jealous woman of ungovernable temper. As a boy, Carlyle used to go to this house to play with the children, and at the door of the room where they played "we always kept alternate watch lest my lady should come upon us." One day the boy had wandered far from home, and Lady Grange, passing in her carriage, seized him and brought him back. "She was gorgeously dressed; her face was like the moon, and patched all over. For these eighty years that I have been wandering in this wilderness I have seen nothing like her but General Dickson of Kilbucho." Lord Grange, who alternated between great religious devotion and unrestrained debauchery, was a sanctified scoundrel.

III.

Carlyle gives it as his opinion that he and his associates were not insincere in their profession of religion. "I have frequently seen them drowned in tears during the whole of a sacramental day, when, so far as my observation reached, they would have no rational object in acting a part." Those men were the victims of their nerves; and when we remember how men were deeply devout when they made a countryside desolate by evictions, or with prayer on their lips engaged in the horrors of the slave trade, we can the better understand degenerates like Lord Grange. Terrified lest his wife should, in one of her jealous fits, disclose his Jacobite plotting to the Government, he conceived the diabolical plot of having her seized and carried away to the fastnesses of the North. With the help of Lord Lovat and Macleod of Macleod, she was carried away to St. Kilda. At a much later date, Macleod tried to improve the condition of the inhabitants of St. Kilda by ordering that all dunghills be removed from before their doors. A St. Kilda man boasted how he circumvented that order by making the dunghill inside his house! No fate could have been more awful than this—that the lady of the patches and the gorgeous chariot should have been transported to a "dug-out" in lone St. Kilda, to live on a dunghill with the cattle. There she could tell no secrets—for nobody on the island could speak any language but Gaelic.

IV.

This happened in 1732, and when the plotters feared her place of exile might be discovered she was removed to Watermish, where she died in 1745. Carlyle says she died in Harris, which is an excusable mistake, for Harris and Watermish both belonged to Macleod. For thirteen years Lady Grange was consigned to a living hell, and nobody was ever punished for it. Such was the law and order in Scotland in the eighteenth century. In 1741 Carlyle dined with Lord Grange and Lord Lovat, the two leading actors in the weird drama. Lovat was then seventy-five, tall and stately, with a very flat nose. "As soon as we were set Lovat asked me to send him a whiting from a dish of fish that was next me. As they were all haddocks, I considered that they were not whiting. . . . Upon this his Lordship stormed and swore more than fifty dragoons; he was sure they must be whittings, as he had bespoke them. I retracted, saying that I had but little skill. . . . Upon this he calmed, and I sent him one, which he was greatly pleased with, saying again that he never could eat a haddock in his life." While Lord Grange and Lord Lovat thus feasted, Lady Grange was eating her heart out on a dunghill in St. Kilda! It was a strange world in which such things could have happened.

V.

But the old order was rapidly running to its end, and the day of Lovat was nearly past. Four years after Lord Lovat ate the haddock, swearing it was a whiting, Prince Charles came and ushered in the new day in Scotland. Carlyle makes us see the alarm and panic that seized Edinburgh when the wild Highlanders approached. He joined the corps of students, which was armed to assist in the defence of the city. It is his pen which makes us see Professor McLaren busy making the walls defensible and erecting cannon near to Potterrow; the spectators in tears as the volunteers marched out, and the loud lamentations that so affected one of the valiant corps that he said to his companion, "Does not this remind you of a passage in Livy when the Gens Fabii marched out of Rome to prevent the Gauls entering the city, and the whole matrons and virgins of Rome were wringing their hands and loudly lamenting? . . ." "Hold your tongue," says his companion. "You must recollect the end, Mr. Hew, omnes ad unum periere"; the inglorious retreat of the dragoons galloping along the lang dykes; the battle at Prestonpans, when, in the space of fifteen minutes, Prince Charlie and his half-armed host became masters of Scotland.

(To be continued.)

THE TYRANNY OF THE NOVEL * * BY CANON BARRY

I.

TELL me, British man or woman, why do you read novels? What is the secret of this unexampled craving for fiction which has transmuted literature into mere saga, romantic or sentimental or brutal, but always in demand? Is it that you have grown to a greatness of imagination beyond all previous ages? On the contrary, your power of creating splendid or touching pictures for the mind's eye seems nearly worn out. You cannot equal the fairy-tales which enchanted your fathers of old. Taken in the mass, you neither invent fresh dramas yourselves nor discriminate on the boards of your theatres any subtleties in character. But you read novels by the million. Do you open your Bible as often as fifty years ago was the custom? I am sure that you do not. The very words of it are fading out of your remembrance; allusions to them bewilder you save when they re-appear disguised under a modern name. I have seen a sublime passage in the Book of Job corrected from Mr. Kipling's "Recessional"; and printers, I find, will query a verse of the Psalms, as if new to them. The English Bible is losing its hold on the English people. But the story, long or short, pours out from the press and overflows our publishers' lists, one wave leaping on another. Why the novel and not the Bible? It is a question worth asking.

II.

I will answer it in a sentence. You have taken to the human story because you no longer believe in a divine one. Your religion is not even a myth to you; it is gone, and its place knows it no more. Says that mad German, the superman: "I saw a great sadness coming over mankind. The best became weary of their works. A doctrine ran out, a belief went with it, 'All is empty, all is equal, all hath been.'" Here is the disillusion that seized on the educated, on nobles and rulers, first; from them passing down to the middle class, the crowd, the Board School. The long twilight of the gods set in; and now in mixed but fading gleams of a sun below the horizon cast upward on the clouds men stumble and dream. These dreams, my misguided friends, are well named fiction—"making" and make-believe, but they are all that is left of your old Bible, with pages tacked on at a venture. Rusty keys, again, many such fictions prove, "opening the doors of the castles of death"—Gospels travestied, "caricatures of the angels of life"; sorrows of Satan over which tears may be shed by the heterodox-pious; Christians from the music-hall; heavenly twins; and "rosaries" thrown into popular cadence, with words of Holy Writ applied to emotions which they never contemplated. New fortune-tellers we may call our late and latest prose-poets, as did Zarathustra. For, in the universal eclipse of faith, what can be done except to guess at things possible and impossible in the darkness? We must somehow make to ourselves prophets and prophetesses, if the old have turned out a deception. Let any, the veriest charlatan, approach us declaring that he has insight and foresight, we will endow him with wealth from the Rand, his wife shall flaunt De Beers' diamonds, or if he prefers not to adorn a wife in this fashion, well, he thereby proclaims an era of unlimited free choice, which will give him matter and form when he conceives a fresh novel. At any cost Utopias we demand; behold, Utopias are forthcoming!

III.

It is not hard to devise them. Break one of the Ten Commandments in theory as well as in practice. Then, with such fragments, build. "Thou shalt not kill" gives us at once anarchy in the boldest form; in a milder, it will suggest firing a theatre amid some crowded neighbourhood. "Thou shalt not steal" foreshadows and provokes the ingenious drawings of a Socialism where the State plunders the people, or All-men filch by law from Everyman. "Thou shalt not commit adultery" may be translated into promiscuous, intermittent, or terminable-at-will marriage, unless it be kept as a precept to enhance the gratification of trampling it in the mire. As we manufacture paradox cheap by inserting a negative in first principles, so the advanced and popular novelist bears always in mind a Christian axiom or institution, and then assails it with a parable of revolt and freedom. So we are invited to plunge into new hells, with guides like Maxim Gor'ky, to skim over more than one new heaven on earth, when Mr. H. G. Wells soars into the blue on his aeroplane. Some ancient power has always given in its resignation, some god has been retired, with or without a pension. The formula of revolution is simplicity itself. "As you were not," cries the magician, and Utopia rises to the light.

IV.

When religion as a firmly held view of existence was above all, men glanced at novels for amusement, women were a very small part of the reading public, and no one thought of taking the story-teller seriously. Now we move on a different tack. The sermon is preached to an array of empty benches; it is the story-book that draws and sells. Advantages it has which the pulpit cannot rival. We may read it anywhere, as long as we like, in what mood we choose, and it binds us to nothing. It caresses the sense of solitude, in which the Ego is dominant and supreme. It makes the reader lord or lady of a castle in Spain—that house entirely to our liking, fitted up to suit our wildest fantasies, and for which (as we are persuaded) we pay no rent. It has taken as its own the beauty and the wonder of life; and this it terms romance; but likewise the pain, terror, misery, crime, madness, that lurk in things; and this, it will have, is realism. Starting from no centre, it streams out in the most opposite directions; it is the chaos of thought, for its whole being is founded on impression, phantasms of the dead and the living, experiences feigned, fancy let loose. How tremendous are the possibilities for good or evil, in dreams large as the world; but how little do the victims of this hypnotic trance consider them? We none of us realise the vast modern machinery in which we are caught up. The novel is a machine second to no other, ubiquitous and almost irresistible. But, like an eyeless monster, it is purely indifferent to results; for it is a mill, not a soul; and it will deliver any message. "Art for art" signifies that it has no message of its own.

V.

To say of a religion that its oracles are dumb is to sign its death-warrant. How shall we do when oracles on every side of us give out contradictory answers? That is our unhappy condition. The Bible remaining a sealed book, when we betake ourselves to these scattered leaves and try to piece them together, few coherent syllables emerge; certainly no pages of any fresh Gospel, except the pure negative or reversal of ancient beliefs and sacred customs. Perhaps deliverance lies in this fact. Inspiration cannot be negative. The question we put to our novels and novelists requires a positive answer. We ask, "How ought we to live? By what must we live?" To reply that we "ought to love if we would live" is perfectly true and equally futile. Love? Of course, we shall love. Our problem concerns right love, that which makes for true humanity, for progress towards the light, for a happiness worthy of our best nature. What, then, do we mean by the better and the worse? No sooner do we put upon novel reading a test such as this than we perceive at least one saving truth. I will term it the indifference of art. Form is nothing but form. However beautiful, it does not guarantee that its content shall furnish us with reality. Art is a dream which may be true or false. The novel is well adapted to illustrate the Gospel in Christian hands. But for the Gospel it never can be a substitute. Imagination should be the servant of life. The tyranny of the novel betokens that faith has given way to feeling, and that feeling is debauched by excitement following on the loss of long-cherished ideals.

AN APPEAL

HOP O' MY THUMB, Hop o' my Thumb,
He'll never be rich till "kingdom come,"
Except in what makes of life an art,
The joy of the poor little beggar's heart!
With one shoe off and another on,
And half a shirt and his jacket gone,
He's lent to his sister his other slipper;
For shoes are "shared" by this tiny "Kipper."
Your kiddies would make fine hullabaloo
If any one borrowed their boot or slipper,
But that is a different pair of shoes—
No shoes are owned by this tiny nipper:

No shoes are owned, they are only shared—
It's many a day since the two went paired.
But that is nothing if only at last,
When the buffeting day is over and past,
And he's run the line of the laughing street
With at least one shoe on his hurrying feet,
He can win his way to the final glory—
The dance, the game, and the fairy-story—
Can win his way to the warmth and light,
To the playroom toys and the playroom glory!
Your kiddies don't run through the streets at night,
But that is a very different story.

Perhaps as they play by the nursery fire,
With toys and games to their hearts' desire,
They will think of the children out in the gloom,
And give some pennies to build a room
Where hundreds of children can dance and play
Who are crowded out now and turned away,
Not born to be lucky like little Jack Horner,
But dodging a "cop" round some dark street corner.
Will you give to these poorest poor a plum,
And make them as happy as little Jack Horner—
A new play-centre for Hop o' my Thumb,
To which all the banished children may come
Who used to rush round the dark street corner?

ANNIE MATHESON.

'TWIXT LAND AND SEA*

MR. CONRAD'S latest book contains three stories, "A Smile of Fortune," "The Secret Sharer," and "Freya of the Seven Isles." In subject and technique they are a reversion to his earlier and richer manner. They remind one more of "Youth" than of "A Set of Six." They glow with the rich fancy, with the exuberant touch of these wonderful first stories of the East, but they retain also the finish of his later period.

"A Smile of Fortune" is a tale about Mauritius, the tale of a captain who brought his ship there, and fell straightway into the web of a curious and sinister drama. It contains one of Conrad's greatest creations in Jacobus, the inscrutable, self-sacrificing, and sordid ships' dealer, whose one apparent motive is avarice, but of whom we half get a secret impression of something quite different. The figure of his passionate and wild daughter suggests an underworld of emotions, whose shadow lies menacingly across the pages. This girl, so tragic and so futile, throws powerfully the gloom of her incoherent sorrow into the very sunlight of the Tropics.

"The Secret Sharer" is the story of how a captain, anchored in his ship at the head of the Gulf of Siam, rescued a murderer from the water and hid him in his cabin and enabled him to escape. It has the excitement of a moving and perilous adventure, and it is told with such an air of probability, such an exactitude of detail, and, above all, in such a thrilling, whispered manner (for the conversation between the two is carried on invariably in a low voice, and this comes to pervade the whole story like a kind of mysterious twilight), that it reads very like a real reminiscence.

The third tale in the book is a tragic love story of the Malay Archipelago. It concerns four people, Captain Jasper Allen, of the brig Bonito, Freya Nielsen and her father, and the Dutch Lieutenant Heemskirk. Perhaps it is the most painful story that Conrad has ever written. The extraordinary sense of fatality hovering over the lives of Freya and Jasper deepens from page to page, until it grows at last into concrete and appalling disaster. Their love for one another has the silent intensity of strong and faithful natures, and the final shattering of their cherished hopes means simply the shattering of their lives. Heemskirk is the devil of the piece. His jealousy evolves a plan by which the Bonito is wrecked, and, with it, all Jasper's chances of worldly success. There is something profoundly melancholy in this drama set amidst the treacherous splendour of Eastern seas—something profoundly melancholy and at the same time profoundly beautiful; for the nobility of such characters as Freya and Jasper transfigures the whole story. Freya especially is a rare and touching conception, worthy to take her place beside the Mrs. Gould of "Nostromo," and the Winnie Verloc of "The Secret Agent."

The style of these three stories is, of course, extremely distinguished, and the psychology is subtle without being over-exaggerated. They are told with the impressive originality and force that mark all Conrad's work. For he is an artist, and his desire is not to preach but to convince. His language is the choice medium of a master, whose early prodigality of expression has been toned down into a mellow but still musical use of words.

In short, "Twixt Land and Sea" is not only a remarkable book, but a book far beyond the capacity of anyone but a man of genius.

R. C.

* "Twixt Land and Sea." By Joseph Conrad. 6s. (J. M. Dent and Sons, Ltd.)

THE GOLDFINCHES OF GALILEE * * BY RENÉ BAZIN

WHENEVER the Lord Jesus passed along the roads His coming gladdened the birds. As soon as they saw His white robe, they came in flocks; some perched on the twigs in the hedges, making them look as if they were in blossom; others hopped along in the dust that His feet had trod; others hovered in the air and made a shade over Him. Those that knew how to sing took care to do so, while those who had no voice could at least show Him their feathers.

All were saying in their own way: "Our thanks, Lord, for raiment, voice, colour, food, for the leaves that shelter us; thanks for life and thanks for our wings." He smiled and blessed them, and they went on their way. Even the brooding mothers did not fear to leave their nests, guessing that for this once the eggs would not suffer thereby—they came to Him silently and went quickly away again.

One day, however, on one of the Galilean slopes, two birds lingered, sad among their gay companions. It was the season when the blackthorn is in flower and the may-tree is still green. Jesus felt the presence of grief and stopped. He understood what birds cannot express: "Master, we built our nest, in all trust, low down in a tree—there were already two eggs in it—the floods came and carried away our home." He raised His hand and said, in a voice so gentle that it sounded pitying rather than commanding: "Begin again, little ones."

The goldfinches built a new nest right at the top of an oak, for fear of the floods. It took a long time: all the horse-hair, wool, and feathers which go to make goldfinches' nests had been used to the last scrap by the first builders—those happy folk who were heard singing all around. Yet lo! at the very moment when the home was being finished, round, open to the sky, and rocked by the wind, a storm broke, so violent and so laden with hail that everything was overturned.

The pair of goldfinches set out to look for the Master. They were not like us, who are always engaged in self-pity. They only wanted to know if there was any hope left of having a family to bring up that year, and why two broods had been failures.

It was late in the season; the young birds, already fledged, were able to flutter, and were beginning to look as grown-up as their parents, while the sun at noon burned like a farmhouse oven. Besides this, the Lord had gone on His way, preaching to the people, and by now He must be far off.

For a long time they sought Him, having no knowledge of where He was, and no way of asking for it. Only when in a village they found a weeping woman, a sick child, a blind man, or a sorrowful face, they said to themselves: "The Lord Jesus is not here," and went on their way. This happened to them often; but at last, towards the end of summer, they came into a town where all was excitement.

The children were carrying branches, and the men were reasoning among themselves and saying: "Yet it is true that He raised Jairus's daughter—we have seen her walking about full of life." Young girls were weeping with joy as they put off their mourning garments.

The two goldfinches waited for Jesus on an overhanging bough on the outskirts of the village, and, just as night was approaching, He passed by and recognised them. "Nothing is lost, little ones," He said. "Begin once again; you must build the nest in the middle of the tree, neither too low, for fear of the floods, nor too high, because you are not strong enough to brave the storm. Go in peace." Around Him were several groups of men, and one, hearing Him speak, began to say: "Thou art telling these birds to build, Master, and winter is at hand!" "Before the materials are collected," said another "the leaves will be off the trees!" "The frost will kill the mother-bird on her eggs," said a third, "and, even if they managed to grow up, the nestlings would find no food on the frozen earth."

But He who seemed a prince among them gazed sadly at the men, then smiled to the birds and said: "Spring is obedient to Me. Go in faith."

Then the pair of goldfinches flew away into the night; without a halt, and yet unwearied, they went back in one steady flight to the country where their two broods had already perished. The mares had been put out to grass all the summer, so they found horse-hair in abundance; the sheep had caught their fleeces in the thorns, so there was no lack of wool; many fallen feathers lay lightly on the surface of the pools, so they chose the downiest. The nest was soon built, and the mother-bird laid six eggs and began to sit.

Then it was that a wondrous thing was seen: while all the trees were getting bare, the one in which the nest was, as well as its neighbours for a fair-sized field away, kept its leaves. The sky stayed blue over this blest spot, the clouds whirled round it, leaving a great blue rent through which light and heat fell on the motionless mother-bird, while the wind became milder when it crossed the boundary marked out by God. This lasted for the needful space of time. Six young goldfinches came out of the six shells. Like all others of their kind, when their eyes first opened they saw that the earth was beautiful, grew their first feathers and tried to fly. It was only when their wings were fully grown that the leaves turned yellow, and that the young ones saw that, a hundred yards away from their nest, winter had long since laid bare the ground.

"You see, children," added our good old Perrette, "that if the Lord Jesus made a new spring for the goldfinches whose brood was late, He would do much more for you, if you asked Him. But nothing would have happened if the father and mother had not begun their nest again three times over—and that is what we have got to learn." —Translated by Miss Honey.

Love forgives nothing unless it forgives everything.
—The Chouans.

When we love, is it not because we recognise beauty that we have dreamed of, the beauty that has existed in idea for us, is realised?—The Country Doctor.

A power that can be defied with impunity is drawing to its end. This axiom is as deeply engraved on the heart of woman as in the mind of kings.—The Wild Ass's Skin.

Young men are not indulgent, because they do not know life and its difficulties. An old critic is kind and mild, a young critic is merciless, for he knows nothing; the other knows all.—The Lily of the Valley.

—SELECTIONS FROM BALZAC.

HYDE PARK—THE PEOPLE'S FORUM

IT is unique as the one place in all the world where a man may find an audience or an argument waiting for him at almost any hour of the day on almost any subject. From early morning till far into the evening calm—in fact, till midnight and the policeman turn out the eager disputants—you may discover little groups of philosophers congregated near the Marble Arch, intent upon some knotty problem of politics, science or morals. There is scarcely a single phase of modern thought that they do not pull to pieces with strong, if somewhat unskilful hands. Land Nationalisation, Tariff Reform, Modernism, the New Theology, and the Marxian Theory of Surplus Value—all these, and many another cure for the ills that flesh is heir to, are expounded by earnest orators to the jaded crowd, who listen impartially to all and turn from each with the listlessness of epicures, suffering from intellectual ennui.

One finds alike in the crowds and in their instructors the strangest, most arresting contrasts. Look, for instance, a moment at that fashionably dressed, erect, soldierly figure, whose owner looks for all the world like a cavalry officer, which, in fact, he is. With iron-grey moustache, and clothes cut in Savile Row, you may find his type any day in any club in Pall Mall; but in Hyde Park of all places in the world—who on earth would have dreamt of finding him speaking here? Yet he attends day by day to explain to a lukewarm crowd the judicial injustice of which he is the victim, a certain lawsuit having gone against him. His speech over, he sells pamphlets dealing in detail with the case, and, with Anglo-Saxon tenacity, comes back the next day, and the next, as he has done for the past three years. Then turn from him, with his halting but obviously sincere speech, to the fluent foreign gentleman with a large map of Peru, who speaks with almost torrential eloquence on the industrial possibilities and the freedom—Putumayo notwithstanding—of his country. The crowd, who have listened to the wrongs of the cavalryman, hear his wonderful stories with the same stoical unconcern, and pass on to the excited Anglo-Israelite, who proclaims aloud that we are the lost tribes of Israel, and that our flag should be, "not the Union Jack, but the Union Jacob"—a deliverance that moves even the Hyde Park frequenters to hilarity.

These are men remarkable rather for their eccentricities than for their personalities or power of speech. Others, however, are really interesting because of themselves and a certain originality of thought that long debating practice has given them. There are working men, for instance, astonishingly well up in physical science, able to floor theologians flat on occasions with sudden, awkward interrogatories. "Politics and religion," said John Stuart Mill, "will always interest mankind," and in the Park they prove of compelling interest. One notes that the level of religious or metaphysical discussions are infinitely higher, showing alike originality of thought and penetration, than the political combats, which tend to degenerate into mere party squabbles. Sometimes, indeed, they are redeemed by a certain naïveté, as, for instance, when I heard a Socialist assert that "It's all very well for the political parties to call us brigands, but what are they doing? Why, pinching our programme piecemeal." Strange and numerous are the creeds and philosophies advocated. Humanitarian Deism, Egoism, the teaching of Tolstoy, the suggestions of Nietzsche—all are thrown into the melting-pot. I have even heard Buddha most carefully interpreted by a young workman who knew his subject thoroughly from A to Z. One gets a little shock, so undemocratic are the very best of us, when we find a workman, who has obviously come straight from the workshop, quoting Huxley and Spencer at length and holding his own against an Oxford Graduate. Variety is the spice of life, however, and social differences count for little when two men get at grips in argument. Most of the discussions are friendly, and I can recall only one in all the years I have known them that ended in violence. That was when a Theosophist smote a Platonist—with, I regret to say, tragic results.

As a rule, the disputants dispense with introductions in these informal encounters, but they soon become known, curiously enough, by the name of the particular philosophy they profess. There used to be a convinced Determinist, for instance, who came to be called "Necessity," and was known to all the frequenters of the Forum by that appellation. Another propagandist was called the "Aramaic Greek," and yet a third was known as "Bacon." But no one, so far as I know, was called after an imaginative writer.

You will find little literary appreciation, even among the pick and flower of the Parkites. You will be astonished at the interest, enthusiasm even, touching economic, or scientific, or metaphysical questions. But literature is rarely mentioned. The fact is that the description of the intellectual workman given thirty years ago in one of Gissing's novels still holds good. He has read Darwin and Marx, but does not know a line of Shakespeare, and has never laughed over Dickens. Perhaps, however, opportunities of a wider culture are now opening before him, but Hyde Park remains forensic, disputatious, didactic—anything but literary.

As a rule, the arguments are conducted, if not with eloquence, with a certain rough-and-ready wit, a forensic capacity for using the right word at the psychological moment, that many a trained debater might envy. Sometimes, however, an earnest but illiterate speaker holds the field, and on occasions his audience interrupt and endeavour to correct him.

"Why do you use such bad grammar?" asked a prosperous middle-class man of a fiery but illiterate orator. "Grammar!" retorted the speaker. "That's one of the things you've taken from the poor. Why should you have grammar and not me?"

"There were two schools of elocution in London," said G. B. S., "when I came to town—the Lyceum and Hyde Park. The former was not available, so I had to graduate in the other." Perhaps, after all, it was the better school—certainly it was the more sincere. Its denizens have a thousand limitations—they are crude, unpolished, some of them uninformed. But they have nearly all of them the ready wit that distinguishes the masses from the classes; they have an impatience of shams, a real generosity of feeling. Above all, they are tolerant even of the social reformer, who tells them in the same speech that he wants the State abolished, the railways nationalised!

CORRESPONDENCE

CONSTANTINOPLE FOR CHRISTENDOM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Your correspondent, "J. G. W.," exhibits, like a great many people who use the word Catholicism in connection with the Roman Church, a peculiar disregard of the evidential value of historical fact.

Referring in his letter to St. Sofia, he says that "this great building would become a Greek Church; it would not, therefore, return to its original owners, the Roman Catholics."

This inaccuracy is so peculiar that I append a short history of the most perfect specimen of Byzantine art for his edification. The building was begun in 328 in Byzantium, which was then a small episcopal see, subject to the Metropolitan of Heraclea. It was completed and dedicated by Constantine in 360. The present building was begun by the Emperor Justinian immediately after the second fire in 532, on the same site as the primitive building (the first fire occurring in 404). Various additions and alterations were made through the centuries, till the Church of Holy Wisdom became beautiful as any dream of heaven.

In 1201 the Crusaders occupied Constantinople, and in the scenes of disgraceful looting that occurred many of the glorious riches were stripped from the building.

The Roman Liturgy was forcibly substituted for the Greek, and the Western Church held supremacy in Constantinople till 1261 (when the Greek service was restored) by a system of arbitrary tyranny.

In 1453 the city fell to the sword of Islam, and since then St. Sofia, denuded of its remaining glory, with its glorious mosaics hidden under whitewash, became a mosque.

Thus it will be seen that for only sixty years was St. Sofia used for the Roman Liturgy, a period in which it could scarcely be described as Roman Catholic property, unless, of course, "J. G. W." considers all Pre-schismatic worship as Roman Catholic.

With best wishes for the success of EVERYMAN, I am, sir, etc.,

CYRIL WAY.

Middlesex Hospital, W.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The last paragraph of "J. G. W.'s" letter rather surprised me.

May I ask when the Church of St. Sofia belonged to the Roman Church? Also his authority for such a statement, as the only period during which the services of the West were used therein was when Constantinople was occupied by the Crusaders, from 1203 to 1261.

I am surprised to hear that Ferdinand, King of Bulgaria, abjured his faith when he entered the "Holy Eastern Orthodox Catholic Church," as His Holiness Pope Pius X., Patriarch of the Roman Catholic Church, would scarcely agree to this statement.

I am sure all Christians, of whatever denomination, would rejoice to hear that St. Sofia's was again restored to Christian worship.

There is no comparison between our government of Moslems in India and Turkish rule (or misrule) of Eastern Christians. Let "J. G. W." read the history of Armenia, and see how many times the Armenians have appealed to the Pope for protection.

May I take this opportunity, sir, of thanking you for such an interesting paper as EVERYMAN?

With all good wishes, I am, sir, etc.,

P. G. C. E.

Walthamstow, Essex, December 14th, 1912.

THE ETHICAL FOUNDATIONS OF PATRIOTISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—In his recent article on "The Ethical Foundations of Patriotism," Dr. Sarolea does good service towards the attainment of a higher ideal of what patriotism means. He sees that there must be unity in the economic fundamentals of civilisation, but that each nation must be allowed to retain its own individuality.

I do not think, however, that he recognises sufficiently the fact that national individuality can be efficiently retained and developed without the different nations necessarily remaining, as at present, disconnected units. The nations of our own Empire, for example, are each developing rapidly an individuality of their own, and the community of political ideals among them is rapidly diminishing; yet, at the same time, an increasingly large degree of economic co-operation exists between them. Why cannot such agreement exist also between European nations?

There is at present no tie between them so strong as the blood relationship between the peoples of the British Empire, but the increasing emphasis upon the need for economy in industrial production will soon provide a very strong bond of union. Identity of national interest does already exist to a large extent, and common aims are sooner reached by partners than by competitors.

A European empire is, as Dr. Sarolea says, quite undesirable. But why not aim for an international representative board, composed, perhaps, of the Cabinets of each country, which, while leaving the countries to their own methods of government, should have power to legislate to prevent waste in methods of production or competition, and to further the progress toward the common ideals of the nations? Or, if the time is not ripe for a body with such powers, a responsible and permanent international advisory committee could be constituted, and could execute much work of a very valuable kind. Obvious objections can be raised to such a scheme on the score of impracticability, but that does not diminish its value as an ideal to be striven for; and surely the highest patriotism is in thus seeking the highest good for all.

"Art, Science, and Religion have become international." Why stop with these things?—I am, sir, etc.,

ROBERT G. LUNNON.

London, N., December 14th, 1912.

THE COLLAPSE OF SOCIALISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I venture to suggest that Shaw's brilliant defence of Socialism has got a vital defect, although it is a complete and irresistible reply to G. K. C.? It is not a defence of Socialism, but of the Single-Tax. So also the other two essays to which he refers us are clear and unmistakable expositions of the philosophy of Henry George.

Of course, Shaw may call the Single-Tax by the name of "Socialism," as indeed he appears to do; but surely that is rather misleading when nineteen Socialists out of twenty mean by "Socialism" something which certainly is not the Single-Tax. It is also unfortunate that, after demolishing G. K. C.'s ideal of the Peasant State, he should so calmly assume that his opponent has no alternative left him but Socialism. There is another—the Single-Tax.

Can anyone discover in these articles of Shaw's any argument in favour of nationalising all the means of production and distribution, any argument for nationalising all the human beings in this country, any argument for the employment of all the population in Government industry under the supervision of Government officials, any argument for the abolition of exchange and the consequent disappearance of value (for he does not believe in the crude labour theories of value)? Is he not defending the thing which we Single-Taxers want—the absorption by the State of those economic functions which are essentially monopolistic, of which the first and foremost is the collection of rent?

It is very strange how many people assume that there are only two possible stable forms of Society—Anarchism and Socialism, no-Government and all-Government. Why do our philosophers not set themselves to find out what are the functions of Government, and to advocate that the State perform neither more nor less than them?—I am, sir, etc.,

FRANCIS C. R. DOUGLAS.

Glasgow, December 13th, 1912.

SCOTLAND'S DEBT TO PROTESTANTISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—It was evidently the intention of your contributor, Mr. Hector Macpherson, to prove in his article on "Scotland's Debt to Protestantism" that, "politically, socially, and intellectually, as well as religiously," Scotland owes something to Protestantism. The universality of the proposition and the little space at the writer's disposal may, perhaps, account for the fact that it is a little difficult for the reader to see from the article what the debt particularly consists of, and this obscurity in the main point no doubt accounts for the proof being anything but obvious.

Leaving aside Mr. Macpherson's string of disconnected assertions, which, even if there were anything in them, would still be quite beside the subject of the article, a study of the three authorities given does not throw much light upon the matter. Froude merely alleges, in the passage quoted, that the Scottish working classes left those who had been their leaders and placed themselves under Knox and his fellow-preachers, and that the organisation thus formed ultimately became the ruling body in the country. Macaulay's dictum, which, I take it, refers to the increase in wealth of the Protestant countries (a point, by the way, which now no longer holds good, for in no countries is the poverty amongst the working classes greater than it is in what are known as the Protestant nations), could not, even if it did hold good, be rightly put forward as evidence of the intellectual and religious benefits which Protestantism is alleged to have given to Scotland, for, if it could, then it would be reasonable to maintain that the wealth of a certain man was in itself proof of his intellectuality and godliness; and, lastly, as the subject at issue is concerned with the benefits conferred by Protestantism, Adam Smith's opinion of the defects of Roman Catholicism is, of course, quite out of the question.

I suppose Mr. Macpherson really meant to prove that Protestantism made Scotland an independent nation, and that Protestantism was thus the cause of the untold benefits which we are given to understand came to Scotland; but he himself, in the course of the article, effectually disproves that Protestantism did make Scotland an independent nation. It is obvious that none but an independent nation could engage in the game of playing England and France against each other, and, if Mr. Macpherson is correct in saying that Scotland was, at the time of Mary Queen of Scots, in a position to do this, it is pretty clear that Scotland was indeed at the time independent; and, again, as Scotland is no longer an independent nation, if the fall of Catholicism signified the Protestant capture of the Scottish Government, it must have been the Protestants who were responsible for the break-up of Scottish independence.

In conclusion, if I have got hold of the point of Mr. Macpherson's article, and if to deprive a nation of its independence is to injure it socially, politically, and intellectually, as well as religiously, then it is obvious that Scotland's debt to Protestantism must be a devilish one.—I am, sir, etc.,

F. JOSEPH.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I, too, should like to congratulate you most heartily on your impartiality, so strikingly illustrated by the simultaneous protests which you were able to publish from a Protestant and Roman Catholic. Nothing, surely, is more calculated to make for Christian reunion—passionately desired by so many—than a fuller knowledge of the point of view of typical thinkers in each Christian communion.

It will be good for our Protestant friends to realise the depth of feeling of his Roman Catholic countrymen, and to learn about their personal piety and devotion. It will be good for our Roman Catholic countrymen to know why, in this country, some of his theology and a good deal of the politics of his religion repels.

By the articles in your paper we shall get to know the marked and growing distinction which thoughtful Roman Catholics in England are now making between the Catholic faith as a religious life and experience, as distinct from sympathy with, and assent to, the growing and intolerable claims—religious and political—of the Vatican. In other words, we shall see how, in their writings, they are insisting more and more on the joys of religious life and experience rather than on the wisdom or efficacy of modern Papal claims and decrees which, when promulgated, serve only to irritate, distress, and embarrass.

In this most desirable development Roman Catholics will inevitably get nearer to our own national Church, wherein, if they are permitted to study it, they will find the Catholic faith, as a religious life and experience, freed from those embarrassing Vatican relationships which, directly or indirectly, have alienated more than half of Christendom—wantonly and unnecessarily. Roman Catholics would also learn of the wonderful progress which has been made by the English Church towards closer relationships with the 80,000,000 Christians of the Eastern Church.

Monsignor Benson—who might perhaps pay a little more respect to the Church of his early training—does excellently well to point out the libels and misrepresentations of Protestant writers and historians, but he does violence to truth and Christian charity when he attributes the sins of England to her overthrow of Papal claims—claims abundantly proved to be unscriptural, unhistorical, and described by the greater of the Popes as profane.

EVERYMAN, by its fearless policy of publishing diverse views, will earn the lasting gratitude of all Catholics who seek the truth, and, in fact, of all Christians who desire, above all things, reunion.—I am, sir, etc.,

X.

Birmingham, December 1st, 1912.

"THE SERVILE STATE."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is really amazing and almost incredible that a man of Mr. Belloc's perspicacity and encyclopædic culture should so misunderstand the trend of modern industrial development as to entertain such a fantasy as "The Servile State." His proposition, "that the kind of legislation to which we are growing accustomed in this country, under the name of 'Social Reform,' is making for the re-establishing of compulsory labour," needs but calm examination to reveal its inherent fallaciousness. Surely it is obvious to every clear and rational thinker that the effect of these Social Reforms (e.g., minimum wage, invalidity, insurance, etc., etc.) is to disestablish capitalistic wage-slavery.

Every "betterment" of the wage-earner's condition, such as the reduction of hours and increase of money wages, increases his economic potentiality, and thereby cripples the power of capitalism and reduces the power to exploit. In other words, the servility of the wage-earner to the capitalist is lessened.

Mr. Belloc is really unintelligible when he talks of "positive law compelling one man to labour for the advantage of others."

What legislative enactment compels John Smith to labour for the advantage of Messrs. Brown, Jones and Co.?

The instance of the Insurance Act does not hold. The degree of compulsion enforced under that statute is only conditional, and is in the interest of the wage-earner. The logic of Mr. Belloc's argument is that the Insurance Act is designed to assist the capitalist to exploit the worker!

Mr. Belloc is equally wrong in his conception of the Socialist method. Apart from the intrinsic justice of "confiscation" (the term is inaccurate), there is the far more business-like and equitable method of purchase, the practicability of which is now amply proven.

The temerity of Mr. Belloc is almost pathetic. I well remember his debate with Mr. Ramsay Macdonald in London last year, and how signally he failed to substantiate the thesis he now propounds to the public.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. W. COOPER.

Kirkintilloch, December 2nd, 1912.

CHILDREN'S WELFARE.

THE Children's Welfare Exhibition, which has been organised by the Daily News and Leader, is the first attempt to exhibit collectively and exclusively all the interests that appeal specially to those concerned with any aspect of child-life. It represents the latest developments of science and progress in the feeding, clothing, housing, education, and amusement of children. Its interests range from model nurseries and play-rooms to Morris dances and a fairy pageant; from the latest hygienic furniture to the most fascinating hobbies and handicrafts. There is a long and interesting list of lectures on educational subjects, which will be delivered by experts in the course of the Exhibition. And over and above this, the Exhibition will be a regular fairyland to the children themselves, just at that period of the Christmas holidays when new attractions are specially valuable. With a large-scale model railway and a yacht-pond, toys and books and games and handicrafts, and last, but not least, "the largest Christmas tree that ever was" waiting for their inspection at Olympia, no child need be bored or unhappy this Christmas—at any rate, during the time (December 31st—January 11th) that the Children's Welfare Exhibition is open.

EVERYMAN & EVERYWOMAN who read Ethel M. Dell's splendid romance, "The Way of an Eagle," the novel with an ugly hero (now in its 13th Edition), will want to read the absorbing new novel by the same author.

PLEASE NOTE THE DATE - - JAN. 1st, 1913.

The Knave of Diamonds

By ETHEL M. DELL. 6/-

Author of "THE WAY OF AN EAGLE."

Obtainable at all Booksellers on Jan. 1st, 1913.

IMPORTANT.—Ask your Bookseller or Librarian to reserve you a copy of "The Knave of Diamonds." The popularity of the author's first story, "The Way of an Eagle," was an outstanding event of 1912, and already three large editions have been ordered of "The Knave of Diamonds."

T. FISHER UNWIN.

A BOOK WHICH EVERY WOMAN—YOUNG OR OLD—MARRIED OR SINGLE —OUGHT TO POSSESS.

Woman & Marriage.

A Handbook. By MARGARET STEPHENS

With a Preface by Dr. Mary Scharlieb.

Third Impression, cloth, 3/6 net; post free, 3/10.

THE SPECTATOR says: "Woman and Marriage" is an outspoken book which should be carefully read by those for whom it is written. It is not a book for boys and girls; it is a physiological handbook, thoroughly well written, orderly, wholesome and practical. . . . We commend this work to all who want a full account in simple words of the physical facts of married life. All the difficulties of the subject are handled fearlessly, gravely and reverently in this book, and as it must be kept out of the reach of mere curiosity, so it deserves thoughtful study by those of us whose lives it touches."

At all Booksellers.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

AN ARTHURIAN ROMANCE *

IN his illuminating preface, which traces the history of the Arthurian legends from Geoffrey of Monmouth down to Tennyson's Idylls, Mr. Kirtlin says that critics through the ages have held "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight" in the highest estimation. Gaston Paris pronounced it "the jewel of English mediæval literature," and it deserves his praise. The vigorous, vivid narrative, the idea of which was taken by the anonymous author from the Conte del Graal of Christien de Troy, shines out, indeed, with a jewel-like lustre from its archaic setting. The style is terse and pictorial. The story moves rapidly, and never fails to grip the reader's interest. In it the character of Sir Gawain, which both Mallory and Tennyson have so strangely misrepresented and maligned, is triumphantly vindicated. He stands forth here as a very perfect knight, "sans peur et sans reproche," the mirror of chivalry and pink of courtesy.

Nothing could be more fascinatingly told than the adventures of Sir Gawain as a guest at the Christmas revels in the castle of his headless enemy, the Green Knight, in disguise. It is a picture of life and manners in those far-off days of priceless value.

Mr. Kirtlin has not only reproduced, as he modestly hopes, some of the "perfume" of the original alliterative poem, but he has done a great deal more. His version teems with gorgeous colour, like the margin of a richly wrought mediæval manuscript, and there are rare descriptive passages, which one is tempted to quote, such as this of Sir Gawain's helmet:—

"It was high on his head, and hasped behind with a light Kerchief of pleasure over the visor, and embroidered and bound with the best of gems on broad silken borders, and with birds on the borders, such as painted parrots at their feeding, and with turtles and true love-knots intertwined thickly, and it was as if many a maiden had been making it seven winters."

And the following, how quaint it is:—

"The seasons succeeded each after the other. After Christmas came the crabbed Lenten season, when the folk eat fish and simple food. Then the weather of the world doth fight with winter. The cold doth vanish, and the clouds uplift, and the rain falls upon fair fields in warm showers, and the flowers appear on the ground."

At this "dear season of the year," as the unknown author of "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight" calls Yuletide, when so-called seasonable publications flood the market, it is refreshing to alight on this genuine classic Christmas story of an old temptation that is ever new being gallantly fought and overcome in the days of chivalry.

VALSERINE †

MR. RAPHAEL has undertaken to introduce the works of Marguerite Audoux to those who cannot read French. Those who have cared for Marie Claire will welcome this small volume; it has all the characteristics that one would expect, including an extreme simplicity which almost seems like a very elaborate art. It consists of short stories—some, in fact, are mere incidents. "Valserine," the most complete, is, we are told, merely the sketch for a long story; but it gives enough to bring very vividly before us the character of Valserine and her friends. Valserine cannot quite explain, even to herself, the reasons of her actions, and her likes and dislikes, nor does the world and her friends quite know why they treat her so kindly; and yet it all seems absolutely natural.

* "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight." With an Introduction on the Arthur and Gawain Sagas in early English literature. By Rev. Ernest J. B. Kirtlin.

† "Valserine, and Other Stories." (English and French Versions.) By Marguerite Audoux. English Translation by John N. Raphael. (Chapman and Hall.)

"Mother and Daughter," just an incident in two lives, is the most moving thing in the book; it would spoil it to tell the story, but no one will read it without being moved. All the stories are interesting, but we are not quite sure they are worth reprinting. The volume contains the original French version of every story, and therefore has a double interest. In these days, when so much has been made of a decadent and elaborate art, it is a very healthy sign that literature so healthy and sane has a public of its own.

BEE, THE PRINCESS OF THE DWARFS *

IT is no light task to retell worthily a story told by such a master of the literary art as Anatole France. Much more is required than a mere knowledge of the English equivalents of the French words. There must be something of spiritual affinity, of real insight into the master's genius. It is high praise, but not too high, to say that Mr. Wright's retelling of "Bee, the Princess of the Dwarfs" is the fruit of such insight. He has seized, and holds captive, with wonderful success, much of M. France's delicate and elusive charm. One must have the magic ring of King Loc to enter that enchanted world, and to read the lesson of its profound simplicities. "Bee" is a story for children that grown-ups will ponder, and a story for men and women that children will delight in. It appeals both to the sense of wonder and to the wisdom of experience. The child will read it for the entrancing adventures of Bee and George of the White Moor; the man will ask himself many questions regarding the symbolism of the Dwarfs and the Sylphs. And he will give many answers, and many of them will be right. Perhaps he will come nearest to the complete answer if he remember well the words of King Loc e'er he sent Bee and George back to Clarides: "Children, it is not enough to love much; you must love well. Great love is good, undoubtedly; wise love is better. May yours be as mild as it is strong; may it want nothing, not even indulgence, and may some pity be mingled with it. You are young, beautiful and good; but you are human, and, for that very reason, subject to many miseries. This is why, if some pity does not form part of the feelings you have for each other, these feelings will not be adapted to the circumstances of your common life; they will be like holiday clothes, which are no protection against the wind and the rain. You only love those securely whom you love even in their weaknesses and meannesses. Mercy, forgiveness, consolation—that is love and all its science."

It should be added that some exquisite illustrations enhance the value of the book. In Mr. Charles Robinson we have one whose interpretative gift is an open sesame to Anatole France's world. Indeed, translator, artist and publisher seem to have entered into a loyal compact to make this volume attractive.

PLAYS BY SUDERMANN †

STUDENTS of the modern drama who cannot read German must certainly possess these volumes. The translations in each case read smoothly, though they

* Bee, the Princess of the Dwarfs." By Anatole France, Retold in English by Peter Wright, and illustrated by Charles Robinson. (London: J. M. Dent and Sons. 1912.)

† "Roses." Four One-Act Plays. "Morituri." Three One-Act Plays. By Herman Sudermann. Translated by Grace, Frank, and A. Alexander. 2s. net each volume. (Duckworth.)

(Continued on page 346.)

IS BALZAC A CLASSIC?

A COMPLETE AND UNEXPURGATED EDITION.

It will be good news to those who are only just beginning to realise the merits of the great French Author, Balzac, that the Caxton Publishing Company is offering a complete and unexpurgated edition on remarkable terms.

For this is the first opportunity that the British public has had of reading Balzac as he meant to be read, and without his work being subjected to a quite unnecessary and gratuitous expurgation.

The Napoleon of Literature.

For Balzac was to literature what Napoleon was to arms—a man of giant brain who saw all life, all character, and all events as material to be turned into stories, and who did not believe that there were any events that could not be told with advantage—and so his novels make their appeal to all.

And all those who realise this will hasten to take advantage of the offer of his Best Novels in 14 volumes, specially selected by that famous Balzacian, Mr. Clement Shorter, editor of the Sphere.

Clement Shorter's Choice.

- | | |
|------------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| "Cousine Bette." | "The Lily of the Valley." |
| "Cousine Pons." | "The Illustrious Gaudissart." |
| "La Duchesse de Langeais." | "The Village Curé." |
| "The House of the Cat and Racket." | "The Country Doctor." |
| "Gobseck." | "The Magic Skin." |
| "Old Boriot." | "The Unknown Masterpiece." |
| | "Eugenie Grandet." |

What CLEMENT SHORTER says—

"Something has been said of the fact that the publishers advertise that their Balzac is 'unexpurgated.' This is of the utmost importance. The charge that a translator 'betrays' is justified where there is a prurient attempt to modify and alter phrases in the interest of Mrs. Grundy. Nothing can justify that. When face to face with a great classic we want the book as near as possible as the author presented it.

"Altogether it would be impossible to speak too highly of the excellence of translation of this edition of Balzac's novels. There are those who say that Balzac should be read in the original, as only thus can you secure his peculiar charm. It is possible to lay too much stress on this point. At least half of Balzac's work relies not so much upon quality of style as upon strength of intellect, and that intellectual power can be captured in a translation, particularly in a translation so good as this."

But as some of these selected stories of Balzac are but short stories, or comparatively short stories, and as, moreover, their charm and interest are greatly accentuated when they are read in conjunction with other stories—the designs of which have direct reference to them—the publishers, while they have kept this series a small and compact one, have not confined it strictly to the above list.

Magnificent Illustrations.

These fourteen volumes are beautifully illustrated by great French artists, who have embodied the very spirit of the author. The frontispieces are etchings printed from the copper-plates.

"The Best Novels of Balzac" are issued on the same advantageous terms which the Caxton Publishing Company has already made so deservedly popular. This is to say, the set of fourteen volumes is delivered for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by a few small monthly payments.

A FREE BOOKLET.

We have prepared a charming detailed prospectus containing interesting information about Balzac, his life, and his work, which will be sent post free to those who apply for it. And it will tell you how the fourteen volumes are delivered for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by a few small monthly payments.

TO THE CAXTON PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge, and without any obligation on my part, detailed prospectus of "Balzac's Best Novels," with terms of easy payments.

NAME

(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS

DO YOU POSSESS AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA?

A REMARKABLE OFFER.

FIRST PAYMENT 2/6 ONLY.

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vambery, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Watts Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, I.L.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

The "Illustrated Chambers's" (Latest Edition) is a treasury of compact information and a reliable guide on subjects Literary, Political, Historical, Theological, Scientific, Musical, Artistic, Philosophical, and General. It is international in character. It consists of Ten Handsome Half-Leather Volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced, and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

Let the Children Use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

Two Opinions.

LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON writes—

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

HILAIRE BELLOC, Esq., writes—

"Chambers's Encyclopædia has been my principal book of reference for the last fifteen years. I have found it much the most accurate of such works, more trustworthy than others, and more comprehensive. . . . I have never found it to fail."

A FREE BOOK.

TO THE CAXTON PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, Post Free, and without any obligation on my part, Illustrated Booklet describing "The Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia," and full particulars of your offer to deliver the complete work for a first payment of 2s. 6d.

NAME

(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS

"The finest Review in the English language."

—Arnold Bennett.

The ENGLISH Review 1/-

JANUARY, 1913

1913	FREDERIC HARRISON
The Blue Bottle	HENRI FABRE
Wild Wings	W. H. HUDSON
The Hill	R. ELLIS ROBERTS
On the Theatre	GORDON CRAIG
The Love Children	B. MACDONALD HASTINGS
Modern Minstrelsy	NORMAN DOUGLAS
The Sublime Audacity of the Church	The Rev. S. C. CARPENTER
The Chinese Pale of Settlement	Dr. E. J. DILLON
Democracy and Public Honours	"ANON"
What is Ours is not Ours	AUSTIN HARRISON
Poetry	W. W. GIBSON

PLAY AND BOOKS OF THE MONTH.

The ENGLISH Review 1/-

Six Convincing Facts for ADVERTISERS.

- I. One advertiser with a half-page advertisement secured no less than 3,000 enquiries.
- II. A Mail Order advertiser had two quarter-pages, and then increased to half-page, each insertion depending upon the results of the previous advertisement.
- III. Another Mail Order advertiser had a quarter-page on the back page, and then increased to half-page.
- IV. Another advertiser ON THE BACK PAGE secured over 450 enquiries—Mail Order again.
- V. A Publisher who had, prior to the advent of "EVERYMAN," found one of the leading Daily Papers the best on his list for results, now finds "EVERYMAN" on the top.
- VI. A high-class furniture house received over 500 enquiries from two separate column advertisements.

More cases, similarly striking, could be cited, but these are sufficient to prove conclusively that EVERYMAN is in the forefront of present-day successful advertising media.

Fuller particulars of the above and other cases can be had at any time, should you desire them.

Address—

The ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER.

ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Telephone: 2452 Central.

Telegrams: "Templarlan, London."

are without distinction. The four one-act plays, with the general title "Roses," are all incidents of ill-regulated love. Roses in each case play the part of a symbolic and psychological chorus. "Streaks of Light" is the most impressive and the most simple; the story is clear and elemental, the crude savage tragedy seems the fitting end. "Margot" is the least interesting in the volume; the story is more sophisticated and modern, but the end remains somewhat indistinct and confused. "The Last Visit" is the tragedy of a secret life; the secret is revealed by the death of the hero; two women loved him; he married one; the wife forgives all and will treasure his memory in her heart. The volume ends with a comedy, "The Far Away Princess," which has a pleasant, lightly cynical touch. A poor student imagines himself in love with a Princess; a Princess fancies she would like the simple life with a true lover; they meet and find they have been merely playing; the Princess will not stoop, and the student is not brave enough to climb.

The three one-act plays, with the general title "Morituri," belong to a higher and nobler realm of art. "Teja" is a story of past times, when War and Death are twin rulers of the world, when men have no time for love, and women willingly give their husbands to fight and die for their country. This is a somewhat familiar theme of tragedy, but it is here treated in the grand manner, and the play takes rank amongst the great tragedies. "Fritzchen" is quite a modern play—the hero loved a maiden who was in every way his fitting mate, but his father wishes him before he settles down to go into the world, and, as he puts it, to see life; the hero goes forth, lives wildly, loses his courage and self-respect, and has to redeem both by going forth to death.

"The Eternal Masculine" is almost a comedy; it does not give one the same pleasure as "The Far Away Princess"—it is more serious, more elaborate, and more cynical. The heroine, the queen, is determined to make all men her lovers, particularly two rivals, a painter and a marshal; they neither of them quite yield; ultimately they become allies, and the queen is defeated.

TWEEDLEDUM AND TWEEDLEDEE*

"HIC IBAT SIMOIS!" Full oft in his wanderings on the ocean of romance must the tempest-buffed, problem-haunted reader recall the gracious lineaments of "Q.'s" Troy. To-day he may visit her again, as a passenger in the barquentine Hannah Hoo, Caius Hocken master, and, in the company of that worthy seaman, he can "go round about her, tell the towers thereof, mark well her bulwarks, consider her palaces," till the hour strikes for the appearance of that other master-mariner, 'Bias Hunken.

The master hand of Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch was never better employed than in the delineation of these two delightful sea-captains, so alike and yet so different, "the same but not the same," as it stands written, both in a poem he has parodied and in his parody. And of their twin courses through the fields of love, life, and laughter, who else could have shown so well

"The variance now, the eventual unity"?

Captains Hocken and Hunken were of those who "shunned the fair sex in all its branches," as Cai said of 'Bias. It was Cai who first came under the guns of the enemy, the widowed, but merry, Mrs. Bosenna, and whose unhappy explanation, "I ought to warn

* "Hocken and Hunken." By "Q." 6s. (Blackwood.)

you that 'Bias isn't easily caught,' with its merited repartee, "God defend me! Who wants to catch him?" ensured the common destruction of the pair. Their subsequent adventures in the tented field, the stroke by which the widow contrived to divide their forces and crush them in detail, the bitter rivalries, the final reconciliation—all these things will be found in this book, told with inimitable charm and humour. If we must carp, we will say that "Q.'s" children are here, as elsewhere, just a little uncomfortable and unconvincing, though little Fancy Tabb's "These grown-ups are so helpless" is worthy of Puck. Among innumerable delightful touches we can only quote the case of the Regatta Treasurer, who "had, as a rule, imbibed so much beer in the course of the forenoon that any one argument appeared to him as cogent as any other."

BENJAMIN WAUGH*

FEW men have lived more as if they acted in the spirit of Aubrey de Vere's line, "A child's useless tear is a blot on the earth," than did Benjamin Waugh, the Founder of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, whose "Life," by his daughter, Rosa Waugh, with an introduction by Lord Alverstone (T. Fisher Unwin), demands the sympathetic attention of all interested in philanthropic work. Miss Waugh tells the tale of her father's strenuous life and unceasing labours in an admirable manner. The biography is adequate, the account of his life's work comprehensive, and both are written without the fulsome flattery which has been too obvious in some recent memoirs. It is a record of high endeavour, and a brave battle with the many difficulties and obstacles which ever beset the path of the pioneer. As Lord Alverstone truly says, Benjamin Waugh was "a man of indomitable courage, energy, and perseverance. He knew that he was right, and at great personal sacrifices and with invincible perseverance he met this opposition and gradually completely overcame it." If Lord Shaftesbury was "The Children's Earl," Benjamin Waugh was "The Children's Man"; and the society he founded, and "The Children's Charter," which he did so much to place on the Statute Book, will ever be memorials of his kind heart, his clear head, and his monumental labours.

VICTOR HUGO†

A PATHETIC interest attaches itself to the "Life of Victor Hugo" by the late Mr. A. E. Davidson, as it is the last and posthumous production of its gifted author. The task of editing it has been self-entrusted to the competent care of Mr. Francis Gribble. Mr. Gribble's task has been a light one, for the book was left practically complete. As it stands it fully deserves the high praise given to it by Mr. Gribble of being the most complete as it is the most impartial of all the books written on the French poet.

Only those who, like the present reviewer, have had themselves to write on Victor Hugo, can realise the extraordinary difficulty and delicacy of the task undertaken by Mr. Davidson. Not only is it the life of a man whose career has been identified with every prominent event in recent French history for the past sixty years, but it is the life of a man in whom a marvellous genius was marred by lamentable weaknesses. The historian is continually distracted

* "Life of Benjamin Waugh." By Rosa Waugh. (Fisher Unwin.)

† "Victor Hugo: His Life and Work." By A. E. Davidson. (Eveleigh Nash.)

100 Copies in 10 Minutes
of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the
PLEX DUPLICATOR.
Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX duplicates all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.
Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete.
Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free.
A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

BOOKS WANTED. All in 3 vols., First Editions, 25/- each offered. Lorna Doone, 1869; Wild Wales, 1862; Jane Eyre, 1847; Desperate Remedies, 1871; Romola, 1863; Adam Bede, 1859; Workers in the Dawn, 1880; Men of Character, 1838; Harry Richmond, 1871; Richard Feverel, 1859; Rhoda Fleming, 1865; Emilia in England, 1864. 100,000 Books in Stock. State Wants—Baker's Great Book Shop, 14 & 16, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES. New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogue No. 614, and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices—W. & G. FOYLE, 121, 3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 5180.)

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount; price from Hunter & Longhurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. New Catalogue, just ready, sent post free.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS."

All subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE.
A natural gift.

Senior Physician in large Hospital writes—"A most valuable thesis."

Senior Medical Inspector—"I cannot dispute a single point."

Headmaster and Examiner—"All I have heard and seen of your new system fortifies my belief in it."

Master in Elementary School—"The nation that adopts this first will be on the top."

Doctor—"In your medical and scientific facts, I can find no flaw."

A London Teacher and Lecturer—"I consider the instruction of great value to parents, teachers, professional men—in fact, to all who realize the importance of memory, will, and clear thinking as the basis of successful achievement."

A Teacher—"Its great simplicity makes it the more wonderful."

Musicians, Teachers, Students, Engineers, Speakers, Business Men, and all who need memory, should write GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhall College). Address—Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

NOVELS, etc., placed with 178 publishers and periodicals, at highest prices. £3 3s. per thousand words just obtained for unknown author's short story. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

SHORTHAND (PITMAN'S); Postal Instruction. Syllabus on application.—A. H. CLOUGH, 16, Victoria Street, Moldgreen, Huddersfield.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

TWO GOOD THINGS. The "Ideal" Divisible MS. Book. No rings, posts, staples. All work in one book, rearranged afterwards. Specimen 1s. 6d.—The Transfer Duplicator, produces 100 good copies once writing, your own pen. Quarto 6/8, Foolscap 8/3, post free.—W. HUNT, 18, Broad St., Oxford.

Essentially the Foods for Brain Workers: maximum of nutriment, minimum of trouble.

A Sample of "Nutter" and full list of Foods, Free. &c., sent post free. Mention EVERYMAN.

MAPLETON'S, Garston, LIVERPOOL.

between what he owes to one of the greatest personalities in world literature, and what he owes to the inexorable exigencies of historical truth. The difficulty is still further increased by the fact that Victor Hugo has forestalled his critics, that he had taken care to arrange his own biography for the benefit of posterity, and that, therefore, at every stage the writer is placed in the painful position of having to reveal the deliberate misrepresentations of the past.

Mr. Davidson's biography appears at the opportune moment when the publication of the complete works of Victor Hugo, in fifty volumes, has revealed the persistent vitality of Hugo's influence and his universal popularity not only in France but in the whole of Europe. The new biography may not detract from the number of Hugo's admirers, but it will certainly put their admiration to a severe test. For the critic exposes to view the darker side of the poet's life and character—his boundless vanity, his insincerity, his vindictiveness, his political inconsistency, that again and again burned on the morrow the ideals which he had previously worshipped, his sensuality, his harsh treatment of a devoted wife, his continuous self-glorification, his senile amours which led him, at seventy-seven years of age, into an intrigue with a servant girl.

After reading this lamentable examination of a glorious career of sixty years of uninterrupted poetic activity, one feels a secret misgiving, and one wonders whether, after all, Mr. Davidson has given us the secret of Victor Hugo's personality, and whether the Victor Hugo whom he reveals to us is indeed the real Victor Hugo. It is a fact that Victor Hugo was fond of money, and that he had many of the meannesses of the typical French bourgeois. But it is no less a fact that he has preached the gospel of charity and social pity as no other poet has ever done, and that for the last twenty-five years of his life, his genius has ever been in the service of the toilers and the shipwrecked of human society. It is a fact that Victor Hugo was as fickle a lover as Burns, Goethe, and Byron. But it is no less a fact that he has given us the purest love scenes of the French language. It is a fact that he was a self-seeking politician. But it is no less a fact that no poet has glorified more eloquently and more persistently than any modern poet the highest ideals of democracy.

I am, therefore, convinced that Mr. Davidson's biography, however valuable, is misleading. A poet cannot be judged by the same standards as the ordinary mortal. We may regret that Goethe or Victor Hugo fell too often a prey to their passions and to their imagination, but it is certain that without that imagination and without those passions they could not have been the poets they were. The only way to do justice to Hugo is to recognise in him, as in most poets, the presence of a double personality and of a double life: the humdrum everyday life, with its vagaries and vulgarities, and the ideal life of the Fantasy, which moves and soars in a higher world of its own creation. And, after all, it is that ideal life of the Fantasy, of poetic rapture and inspiration, which posterity will ultimately consider as the real life. It is that life of the imagination which alone gives us the secret of the poet's activity. In the Latin language the beautiful word pietas means both "piety" and "pity." Does this double meaning not convey to us a reminder that the pious cult which we owe to genius must necessarily demand on our part a large meed of reverent pity and indulgent sympathy for the frailties and weaknesses which are almost invariably the Nemesis and price of supreme poetic greatness?

A HISTORY OF THE BRITISH NATION*

A HISTORY of the British nation (by a writer of repute), extending to a thousand pages, with 400 illustrations, and issued at 3s. 6d., is surely the last word in cheap publishing. Nevertheless, we think that the publishers would have been well advised had they brought out the work in two half-crown volumes. The price would have been increased, but, it seems to us, there would have been gain in the long run, for we should have had a really excellent work in a convenient form, whereas, as things are, it is impossible to hold the book, owing to its enormous bulk, for any length of time.

Our criticism, however, is limited to the form of the book. For its contents we have nothing but praise. There was room certainly for a popular and attractively written work exhibiting briefly and clearly the outstanding characteristics of our nation's growth, and Mr. Innes was well qualified to write it. In the preface a tribute is paid to Green's "Short History of the English People," but Mr. Innes does not attempt to emulate that work, except as regards length. Not only are his method and treatment different, but his picture is painted on a much larger canvas, for he aims at presenting "a live history of the mighty nation whose children we are," and not merely a history of the English people.

The work is well proportioned, admirably written, judicial in tone, and wonderfully accurate, as indeed we should expect from a historian like Mr. Innes. The epoch-making events are retold with freshness, point, and animation, and at every turn the reader is made to feel that he is in the hands of a writer who understands thoroughly the art of making British history interesting. The narrative is brought down to the present year, so that the book is quite up to date. It is well furnished with maps and genealogical tables, while to the illustrations historical notes are appended.

SWEETHEARTS AT HOME†

THIS is a pretty story, intended presumably for children, but in these days the genres have become so entangled that it might very well prove to be a treasure for the elderly. Grown people often like their books to be about children, and we know plenty of children who have a marked preference for books that wholly exclude their own kind. Mr. Crockett seems to have laid aside the glory of his ancient weapons—the "Red Axe" and so forth. Like all the Kail-yarders, in or past their prime, he aims nowadays chiefly at the lump in our throats. Often he reaches the mark, not so successfully perhaps as Mr. Barrie or the earlier Mr. Ian Maclaren, but still with moderate success. But threatened men live long, doubtless because they are on their guard, and bestow especial care on their weak spot. Humour, a gift akin to that of pathos, Mr. Crockett has in abundance. The governess, Miss Principia Crow, who "did not know much arithmetic—just enough to cheat at tennis"—is yet a very suitable instructor for her mendacious pupil—"Miss Crow pretended to teach, and Polly pretended to learn." As juvenile psychology we do not quite believe in the small boy who amuses himself with and translates passages from "Obermann."

(Continued on page 350.)

* "A History of the British Nation." By A. D. Innes. 3s. 6d. net. (Jack.)

† "Sweethearts at Home." By S. R. Crockett. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

PITMAN'S SCHOOL

THE SALTERS' COMPANY TRAVELLING SCHOLARSHIP FOR MODERN LANGUAGES—VALUE £25.

Awarded by the London Chamber of Commerce.

Pitman's Leading Examination Successes in 1912 also include:

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT PRIZE

THE SILVER MEDAL, ADVANCED GRADE
Also FIRST PRIZE Junior Grade.

THE SPANISH GOVERNMENT PRIZE

THE BRONZE MEDAL, ADVANCED GRADE
Highest Possible Award for Spanish.

ALL THE PRIZES FOR GERMAN (4)

ADVANCED AND JUNIOR GRADES
London Chamber of Commerce Exams.

EIGHT MEDALS FOR SHORTHAND

INCLUDING THE HIGHEST AWARD
Royal Society of Arts' Exams.

TWO FIRST PRIZES for TYPEWRITING

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF ARTS and London Chamber of Commerce.

FOUR FIRST PRIZES FOR FRENCH

R. Soc. of Arts (2) and HIGHEST MEDAL
L. Ch. of Commerce and National U. of Teachers.

In addition to the above, Pitman's School has gained in 1912 many hundreds of Medals, Prizes, Distinction and Double Distinction Diplomas.

PITMAN'S 70,000 PRACTICAL SUCCESSES

OVER 70,000 STUDENTS OF THE SCHOOL HAVE BEEN PLACED IN GOOD SALARIED POSITIONS.

Pitman's School has at its disposal, for its students, a daily succession of banking, shipping, insurance and other business openings for boys, secretarial positions for girls, and senior posts at home and abroad.

ALL SITUATIONS FOUND FREE.

Write for Pitman's Prospectus, The Guide to Successful Training for Business, Secretarial and Civil Service Positions, Gratis and Post Free.

Address (mentioning No. 58), The Secretary,

PITMAN'S SCHOOL, SOUTHAMPTON ROW, W.C.

BRANCH SCHOOL: 65, BRIXTON HILL, S.W.

AN XMAS GIFT

YOUR FRIENDS WILL VALUE

is a copy of the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration—the finest system of all-around Mental Training in existence. The late Mr. W. T. STEAD said: "I do not remember ever having seen treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, and wish it every success." If you have a friend who lacks the power to concentrate, whose Memory is poor, Will-power, Self-reliance and Self-confidence weak, he will welcome your gift of the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration, which is now being practised in every part of the civilised world. Send a P.C. for full particulars to the CONCENTRO CO., 36, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE. See the splendid testimony of "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "John Bull," and "Great Thoughts."

The British Review

with which is incorporated

THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE REVIEW.

All the finest features associated with Reviews published at several times the price will be found in this important monthly, and the most prominent writers of the day will be among the contributors to what should prove a notable development in periodical literature.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

THE SECRETS OF THE BULGARIAN VICTORIES.
PHILIP GIBBS.
MY VIEWS REGARDING TRUE AND FALSE SCIENCE.
LEO TOLSTOY.
HUXLEY AND THE CATHOLIC FAITH.
CECIL CHESTERTON.
NAPOLEON. RT. HON. F. E. SMITH, K.C., M.P.
GEORGE TYRRELL IN HIS LIFE AND IN HIS "LIFE."
GERALD MAUDE.
THE LESSON OF BRISTOL UNIVERSITY.
F. M. ATKINSON
POETRY. KATHARINE TYNAN; G. K. CHESTERTON;
HILAIRE BELLOC; J. C. SQUIRE.
"IF EVERY FACE WERE FRIENDLY."
SIR ARTHUR QUILLER-COUGH.
MORE MEDIÆVAL BYWAYS: I.—MEMORIES.
L. F. SATZMANN.
FALSTAFF: THE ENGLISH COMIC GIANT.
W. L. GEORGE.
A TUSCAN VILLA. WILLIAM CAINE.
OBITER DICTA. THE EDITOR.

ETC., ETC., ETC.

NUMBER ONE READY AT END OF THE MONTH.
Royal 8vo. 192 pages. 1/- net.

LONDON: WILLIAMS AND NORGATE

JUST PUBLISHED.

Scotland's Debt to Protestantism.

By HECTOR MACPHERSON. Price 1/- net.

The Marshall Case.

Third Edition. Price 6d.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
45, George Street, EDINBURGH.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS IN THE STUDY OF ASTROLOGY. By ALAN LEO. Full particulars of these unique lessons on application to Secretary, Lessons Department, "Modern Astrology" Office, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, London.

STORIES AND PICTURES OF JAPAN*

THERE is a good deal of Lafcadio Hearn in this dainty volume. That is no great harm in a modern book on Japan, and, even if it were a blemish, we do not see how it could be avoided. Hearn is the ancestor of all Europeans who have fallen under the spell of the island kingdom, and "piety" is a virtue in Japan no less than it was in ancient Rome. But besides Hearn there are a great many other ingredients, among which we will rank very high the present author's own discoveries—not, of course, inventions—and his manner of presenting them. There are also the delicious Anglo-Japanese pictures of Miss Evelyn Paul.

Mr. Hadland Davis has aimed at being comprehensive rather than complete. He has strung together a very considerable number of stories and legends, interspersed with discussions of special subjects that serve to classify legends or observances. He has chapters, for instance, on bells, trees, gardens, mirrors, tea, and fans; he has an admirable section on Japanese poetry; he also has a fairly solid chapter—not too solid nor too long—on the Japanese theogony, supplemented by a useful appendix. The plan of the book is, we are glad to observe, not allowed to be too tyrannical. Mr. Davis is a story-teller, and he always returns to story-telling, but he likes an opening or a good excuse, and some of the stories are all the better for being dowered with a context. At the beginning of the book we found ourselves a little offended by Mr. Davis's running comment and occasionally incongruous colloquialisms; but as we went on, he it his doing or ours, we found the narrative much better, indeed excellent.

Many of the stories are good in themselves—we mean they would rank as good stories as they stand, and without any regard to their source; others demand some degree of curiosity about the nature and habits of the Japanese. We doubt if many people were ever gulled by the "Mikado" of Gilbert and Sullivan. That was a joke, understood alike of the perpetrators and the listeners, at a time when Japan was coincident with Utopia, and could serve as a peg for any invention, however improbable. Possibly a few were deceived by "Madame Chrysanthème." But, in spite of the opening lines of his introduction, we do not believe that Mr. Davis really thinks us as callous as all that. He is, of course, excusing his book, but his book needs no excuse. Nor do we believe that Japan is aiming, through adaptation of her national virtues and through skilful imitation, at a reproduction of European civilisation. Rather we believe, with Lafcadio Hearn, that she is forging, more or less consciously, a weapon wherewith to defend her spiritual autonomy. There is no need to insist on the continuance of the old samurai spirit, with the example of General Nogi still fresh in our thoughts.

Japan has a civilisation, not merely a culture. Civilisation is a system of word-saving conventions, culture admits of explanations. Thus—a bad example, but we cannot for the moment find a better—we learn that at Japanese wedding feasts branches of the male and female pines of Takasago are arranged so that the former is a little above the latter, and that many delicate social and political questions are thus tacitly answered in advance. The language seems to carry this characteristic to extremes; at any rate, it is difficult to reconcile the terse "Ho-jo-ki" with its translation, "Notes from a Ten-foot-square Hut."

We should find it difficult to infer from Mr. Davis's book that the Japanese character is as unintelligible as he and others would have us believe. The close union of art and life, the love of nature, explain a good many things, even the granting of souls to dolls and some apparent symbolical exaggerations about trees and gardens. And in England, where we have a troy and avoirdupois system of weights, even the fact that, "in measuring metal and soft goods, the feet on the yard-stick are not alike," will not strike us as so very unusual. The passion for children is universal in human nature, and some Japanese stories and customs are merely beautiful idealisations of this passion. If there is one thing in Japanese religion more intelligible than another to us Europeans, while remaining strikingly characteristic of Japan, it is the god of children, Jizo. Possibly the trait that strikes Occidentals the most is what we will call the "micromasia" of the Japanese. "Westerners have been inclined to describe the dwarf Japanese tree as unnatural. It is no more unnatural than the Japanese smile, and reveals that the nation, like the Greeks of old, is still closely in touch with Nature."

* "Myths and Legends of Japan." By F. Hadland Davis. With 32 full-page illustrations. By Evelyn Paul. 7s. 6d. net. (George G. Harrap and Co.)

The stories are of every kind. That of "Yuki-Onna, the Lady of the Snow," causes the shudder down the back. The legend of the "White Butterfly" is of an exquisite pathos. The story of the "Jellyfish and the Monkey" is delightful comedy, while in the account of the fearsome hobgoblin, the "Kappa," who is so courteous that, if saluted, he returns the obeisance with such vehemence that "the strength-giving liquid runs out from the hollow in his cranium," and he is easily vanquished, we touch pure farce. We will conclude with a Japanese proverb that passes rather harsh judgment on cats: "Feed a dog for three days and he will remember your kindness for three years; feed a cat for three years and she will forget your kindness in three days."

THE INFERNO*

THIS is the third of the four autobiographical volumes which August Strindberg has written. It is the sort of book which is just now very much in the fashion, and will no doubt find a public. But we feel very strongly that Strindberg was better employed in writing his plays, some of which belong to the ranks of permanent literature, than in his long-drawn-out endeavour to present his soul-naked to the public gaze. Every play or novel which can claim to be significant reveals human nature in a truer perspective than any autobiography can succeed in doing. If the autobiographer is sincere he makes himself out both worse and better than he really is, and the actual life of an artist is not, after all, the most important thing, either for himself or the public. No artist can adjust the balance between the greater and the less of his achievements. The most perfect creation in his own eyes may fall short of the critic's standard.

Strindberg sums up the meaning of his life thus: "Such, then, is my life; a sign, an example to serve for the betterment of others; a proverb to set forth the nothingness of fame and celebrity; a proverb to show the younger generation how they should not live."

The book has powerful, pathetic, and moving passages; but one can be more profitably employed, and even come to a truer understanding of the author, by reading his plays and putting resolutely aside his four autobiographical works.

* "The Inferno." By August Strindberg. Translated by Claud Field. 2s. 6d. net. (Rider.)

The Stamp of Superiority is on Every Garment.

The MAJOR ("London Opiolea") Ellis Dress Suits and Overcoats.

"YOU will see many different kinds of Overcoats and Dress Suits if you go to a tailor who moves with the fashions and the times. One such I have in my mind is Mr. Ellis, of 201, Strand, W.C. By buying in large quantities and paying cash for his cloths, he is able to make an Overcoat or Dress Suit of the finest material for much less than many a tailor in the West End will charge for exactly the same thing. Mr. Ellis also scores by having his clothes made in his own workshops, and by giving his personal attention to each customer."

SPECIALITIES.

Dress Suit . . 5 gs.
(Silk Lined throughout.)

Double Breasted
Belted Overcoat, 63/-

Guaranteed to fit you and perfectly tailored, otherwise we shall not allow you to keep the garments.

J. & H. ELLIS, Coat Specialists,
201, Strand, London, W.C. (Facing Law Courts).

PLAYER'S Navy Mixture

Out of the sweetest and ripest leaves of the tobacco plant "pipe perfect" Player's Navy Mixture is made.

Player's Navy Mixture is everything that a tobacco can be.

It is cool and even burning, with a bouquet as distinct and delicate as that of some rare vintage wine.

Then fill your pipe with this best of Mixtures and know all the joy that a perfect tobacco can bring.

IN THREE STRENGTHS:

Mild 5^{D.} per oz. Medium 5^{D.} per oz.

White Label 4¹/₂ D. per oz.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MR. DION CLAYTON CALTHROP is always fresh in style and stimulating as to thought. He has a clear and definite point of view of life, and this he demonstrates in his own whimsical and inimitable fashion. The opening sentence of St. QUIN (Alston Rivers, 6s.) grips and holds the interest from the first. A complete picture is conjured up. You have the setting of the story outlined—the author gets home in a stroke. There is none of the aimless peddling with words that marks the effort of the average novelist. The artist knows the image he wants to create, and with a stroke of his brush—a few words of his pen—gives us a definite impression. Edmond, born to prosperity, with a stake in the county and a prosperous future awaiting him, like the hero of the old fairy stories, received a gift at his christening. "And this odd and entirely unexpected gift was the cause of many anxious family gatherings." One gets a hint of the nature of the gift early in the story. "Once Barbara, his sister, gave him one of her books. It was called 'Grimm's Fairy Tales.' It was, had he known it, the key to the first door leading on to another world." At first the boy is not impressed with the book. Barbara argues with him at length and with insistence as to the existence of elves and goblins—the country that is owned by the "little people." "She told him how they came out at night, and drank out of acorn cups. And she told him how they danced, and how they sat under toadstools, and swung on the fronds of bracken." The conclusion of the chapter rings down on a sentence as significant as its opening statement. "Edmond was very late for dinner—almost a criminal offence. He had been all day alone . . . in the woods, looking for something it took him twelve years to find." The story of his quest is told with the same perfection of phrasing, the same swift, unexpected touches that show men and things at an unlooked-for angle. We follow Edmond to school, in his travels, and enjoy his adventures "with a little French girl" he met in Italy. In conclusion, Edmond comes into his inheritance, justifies the gift of his fairy godmother, and very thoroughly falls in love. On which, Bridgewater, the discreet family servant, prayed "that the new play might have a life-long run."

Stories of previous incarnations, wonderful adventures in the realms of magic, do not, as a rule, allure the average reader, surfeited with a diet of revived mummies and statues suddenly imbued with life, after—a very long way after—the immortal myth of Pygmalion and Galatea. IN THE WEIRD OF THE WANDERER (William Rider and Sons, 6s.), the author, under the pseudonym of Prospero Caliban, tells of one Nicholas Crabbe, who in a previous age was King Balthazar of Moxoene, and attained to an unlawful knowledge of magic arts and spells. He does not appear to have done anything very amusing or sensational with his sorcery, and the style in which the book is written does not aid the readers of the story. One could as readily believe in the events of over two thousand years ago told in nervous English, as written in a dull, somewhat prosy style, heavy and indigestible.

Scotch stories are either very good or very bad. Miss Jane Findlater, in SEVEN SCOT STORIES (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.), has given us some delightful studies. The characterisation is clever, and of a simplicity at once striking and complete. Stories of domestic life, of simple peasant folk, young lasses and old people, the most striking number of the seven is "Charlie over the Water." "Of all the children that she had brought forth, there now remained to the Widow MacKay only one, her son Charlie, and he was over the water." The widow would sit by the door of the cottage, and count on her fingers the tale of her grief, how and when she had lost her sons, and her one daughter, till at last Charlie alone was left. Now that all the bairns had left the home, the one tie to old days was Hector, her grandson, the child of her daughter Jessie. The picture of the old woman is finely drawn, with an intimate knowledge of the elemental things of life, a knowledge that, touched with the fine sympathy and understanding, makes the author's work remarkable. Hector, the grandson, wearied of life in the barren Scottish islands, and conscious also that the old woman is grieving sore for the sight of her remaining son, invents an imaginary postscript to Charlie's letter, inviting his mother to come over the water to America. The widow snatches eagerly at the chance, and after innumerable difficulties, duly overcome, the two set forth. The story of the voyage, the old lady's reception by her son, her first delights at the reunion, her subsequent heartaches for her own home, the discovery that Charlie's wife does not want her—these are all told with an exquisite pathos and simplicity. The story is a gem, and marks a high standard of achievement in a book remarkable alike for perfection of style and poignancy of emotion.

Shakespeare's tragedy of ROMEO AND JULIET has seldom been presented to the public in more comely form than in the beautifully finished reprint which Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton are issuing at 10s. 6d. net, the volume being exquisitely illustrated by Mr. W. Hatherell. All the world loves a lover, and that perhaps is why the play remains the most popular of all Shakespeare's tragedies, the only one perhaps which the common people follow throughout with unflagging enthusiasm. It keeps perennially the charm of youth, and we suppose there is not a romantic actor worth his salt who has not longed to essay the part of the young hero, and not a few have made their reputation in it. Those who love its scenes of pageantry and passion, who have wept with Juliet and sighed with Romeo, can make no more charming gift than this sumptuous reproduction of this old love romance.

LORNA DOONE (Sampson Low, Marston and Co.), one of the most gracious of modern romances, makes her appearance this season in a beautiful garb, exquisitely bound and illustrated. Blackmore's great work is presented in a most attractive guise. The strength and sympathy of the story grows with time; the characterisation, at once tender and compelling, leaves on the imagination a series of pictures that the years cannot efface. The great Jan Reid, with his vast thews and sinews, his native simplicity and great heart, stands unequalled in contemporary fiction. The style lends itself peculiarly to the story; the scenery of Exmoor, never more perfectly portrayed than in the romance, gains by the restraint of the author. The hills and dales, the soft, balmy air, with the hint of the salt in its taste, grows on one as do the lineaments of old and valued friends, until language and scenery become indissolubly united, forming a picture never to be forgotten. It is interesting to note the author's preface—first to the sixth, then to the twentieth edition—the unaffected delight of the man at the

(Continued on page 354.)

Take the Children to the
CHILDREN'S WELFARE EXHIBITION

Organised by the

Daily News & Leader

which is open at Olympia on Tuesday, December 31st, and every week-day till January 11th.

It is a regular Christmas feast of delights for all the little ones—boys and girls alike.

There is a Model Railway on a large scale to delight young engineers, and a Model Yacht Pond for the budding yachtsman.

Expert craftsmen demonstrate the proper methods of pursuing all sorts of fascinating Home Handicrafts and Hobbies.

There are Old English Dances, a Fairy Pageant, and a Magic City; there is such a show of Dolls and Toys and Books and Games; there are Camps of Boy Scouts and Girl Guides; and right in the middle of everything is

The Biggest Christmas Tree That Ever Was.

The grown-ups will find a great deal to interest them too, in the exhibition of all the latest developments connected with the Feeding, Clothing, Education, and Amusement of Children.

Admission 1/= Children under fifteen, 6d.

Go to Olympia by No. 9 'Bus, or by Train to Addison Road Station (it's next door).

popularity of his favourite child, the simple pleasure he took in his success, above all, the emotion he experienced that the sons of Exmoor should recognise and appreciate their own beloved land in the pages of "Lorna Doone," and grow once more familiar with the legends that they had listened to in childhood. The story is a beautiful one, and must ever remain dear to the lovers of romance. Messrs. Sampson and Son have earned the gratitude of the reading public by the issue of this delightful edition.

* * *

This is pre-eminently the season for the publication of books on Charles Dickens, and Messrs. Foulis are to be congratulated on their issue of THE DICKENS ORIGINALS (6s. net). Mr. Edwin Pugh's interesting theories make good reading: Human curiosity is eternally voracious in regard to the literary idols of their adoption, and the methods of the master novelist invite unending speculation. Mr. Pugh's theories are ingenious and convincing. He suggests that Dickens did not reproduce his characters from life, but that he seized on the chief characteristics of men and women, and from these created a new being. "He looked at people as children do, with ever fresh, frank interest, and he saw how they were, all of them, really very funny or very pathetic, or very good or very bad. He seized on their salient peculiarities, and by a sort of sublime logic deduced the whole man from the cast and texture of his face, the colour of his hair or eyes, the cut of his clothes, his idiosyncrasies of manner or speech, and the general effect of his personality." One of the most arresting chapters is that on criminal prototypes. M. Hortense, lady's maid to Lady Dedlock, was founded on the notorious Mrs. Manning, who, with her husband, was hanged at Horsemonger Lane Gaol in 1849. Ikey Solomons, a criminal as well known and as infamous as Charles Peace to a later generation, suggested Fagin, while Julius Slinkton was sketched in part from Wainwright, the artist and the poisoner.

That Dickens, in his supreme art as creator, forgot the man or woman who suggested the conception no one who has read his books will admit. How far Leigh Hunt was his model for Harold Skimpole will always be a debatable point, and whether or no Dora was the child of his fancy, or owed some of her charm to dainty Maria Beadnell, Dickens's first love, is always open to dispute. The author solves some of the points at issue, and suggests helpful explanations on the more knotty problems. Written with pungency and wit, the book—beautifully illustrated—is a welcome addition to Dickensian literature.

* * *

The child of the story-book is seldom convincing as heroine. It is when she plays the part of madcap and tomboy that she charms and arrests. ANGELIQUE (Duckworth, 6s.) is refreshingly mischievous, and Miss Constance Elizabeth Maud is to be congratulated on the series of vivacious sketches she has given us of LE PETIT CHOU, the fascinating little French girl, who is the idol and despair of all her family and friends. This book should be a favourite with all young people.

* * *

BOYS OF THE BORDER (Blackie and Son, 3s. 6d.) is written with a dash and spirit that should suit the average schoolboy completely. The heroes of the story have plenty of fighting and many adventures. The story takes place in the reign of Henry the Second, and the atmosphere of the times is well suggested and artistically carried out.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Allen, J. Gordon. "The Cheap Cottage and the Small House." (Garden City Press, 1s. 6d.)
- Bazin, Rene. "Six Contes." Edited by G. H. Clarke, M.A. (Frowde, 2s.)
- "Blue Book, The." An Oxford Review. (Crosby Lockwood, 1s.)
- Buckley, R. R. "St. Francis." (Nutt, 1s.)
- Crosland, T. W. H. "Sonnets." (Richmond.)
- Cureau, Dr. "Les Sociétés Primitives de l'Afrique Equatoriale." (Armand Colin, 6 francs.)
- Gorebooth, Eva. "The Agate Lamp." (Longmans, Green, 2s. 6d.)
- Green, F. E. "The Cottage Farm." (Daniel, 1s.)
- Hamon, A. "The Technique of Bernard Shaw's Plays." (Daniel, 2s.)
- Hawkeswood, C. E. M. "The Last Century in Europe." (Arnold.)
- Hardenburg, W. E. "The Putumayo." (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d.)
- Houghton, Stanley. "The Younger Generation." (Sidgwick and Jackson, 1s. 6d.)
- Hutton, Edward. "Highways and Byways in Somerset." (Macmillan, 5s.)
- "India." (Dean, 6d.)
- Jenks, Edward. "A Short History of English Law." (Methuen, 10s. 6d.)
- Keen, E. H. "Songs, Sonnets, and Verses." (Edinburgh University Press.)
- Lawrence, Margery. "Songs of Childhood, and other Verses." (Grant Richards, 1s. 6d.)
- Lucas, E. V. "A Little of Everything." (Methuen, 1s.)
- MacGregor, J. Herrick. "The Wisdom of Waloopee." 4s.
- Mann, Tom. "Debate on Syndicalism between Frank Rose and Tom Mann." (2d.)
- Mann, Tom. "Forging his Weapon." (1d.)
- Mann, Tom. "Symposium on Syndicalism." (1d.)
- Mann, Tom. "The Railway Men." (1d.)
- Montegazza, Vico. "L'Albania." (Bontempelli, Invernizzi, Rome.)
- Montegazza, Vico. "La Guerra Balcanica." (Bontempelli, Invernizzi, Rome.)
- "The Bedtime Book." (Dean, 6d.)
- "The Dreamland Book." (Dean, 6d.)
- "The Foundation of Freedom." (Bagot, 4d.)
- Towers, Walter. "Fifty New Songs." (Nicol.)
- "Tried Favourites." (Cookery Book.) (Fairgrieve and Marshall, 1s.)
- Vandervelde, E. "La Co-operation Neutre et la Co-operation Socialiste." (Librairie Felix Alcan, 3.50 f.)
- Wadna, A. S. "The Message of Zoroaster." (Dent, 5s.)
- Walters, A. "Physical Phenomena." (The Liverpool Booksellers' Co., 6d.)
- Walters, A. "The Truth at Last." (Philip.)
- Watson, E. J. "Giosue Carducci. To the Sources of the Clitumnus." (Arrowsmith.)
- Yarros, Victor. "Free Political Institutions." (Daniel, 1s.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

J. M. DENT
NEW YEAR'S

& SONS, Ltd.
GIFT BOOKS.

THE COTTAGES AND VILLAGE LIFE OF RURAL ENGLAND.

By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A. With 52 Coloured Pictures and numerous Line Drawings by A. R. QUINTON. Boxed with Coloured Illustrated Top. Demy 4to. 21s. net.

"Everyone who has the least appreciation of country life must be aware of the sentiment and charm which English cottages and villages and old farm-houses lend to English scenery. We have never been in a country which would vie with our own in these most simple of all architectural effects. The author possesses the necessary solid, scientific knowledge of the subject he is dealing with, so that, on that foundation, the more picturesque and poetical descriptions have that air of reality which mere descriptive writing is so apt to lack."—Morning Post.

ASPECTS OF ALGERIA: HISTORICAL—PICTORIAL—COLONIAL.

By ROY DEVEREUX. With Illustrations. Square demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"This is not a tourist's book. Mr. Devereux deals suggestively with the various problems connected with the French occupation of Northern Africa. . . . The exorbitant cost of French colonial government is due to the multiplicity of functionaries, who simply overrun Algeria, and who are in the main unsuited to the needs of an infant colony."—The Standard.

RENAISSANCE LIBRARY: Edited by EDWARD HUTTON.

LE POESIE DI LORENZO DE' MEDICI: 2 volumes. Edited by JANET ROSS and EDWARD HUTTON. 4-morocco, vellum sides, 21s. net; full vellum, 25s. net.

The first complete edition of Lorenzo's poetry that has ever been printed. These books are printed with a special type designed by Mr. J. M. Dent, after the famous XVth Century Jenson type. The first volume published in the series was: "Hero and Leander," by Christopher Marlowe, from the rare edition of 1598 in the British Museum. Only a few copies remain of this.

"The books are a pleasure to handle as well as to read. The two beautiful volumes contain, with the exception of two poems, all the verse of Lorenzo in the common tongue, and they form the most complete collection of the great Medici's Italian compositions yet brought together."—The Standard.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS.

OXFORD AND ITS STORY AND THE COMPANION VOLUME CAMBRIDGE AND ITS STORY.

Each has 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by HERBERT RAILTON.
Size, imperial 8vo, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net each.

By CECIL HEADLAM and the (late) Rt. Rev. C. W. STUBBS, BISHOP OF TRURO, respectively.

FRANCIS HORATIO AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS.

By HILLEL SAMSON. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

THE TIMES:—"A book of unusual beauty and freshness. It is the product of a mind in tune with nature and the spiritual side of art, and yet alive to the problems and needs and anxieties of the workaday world. . . . There is nothing mawkish about Mr. Samson's writing; . . . it is a joy to be with so inspiring a companion."

6/-

JOSEPH CONRAD'S NEW BOOK 'TWIXT LAND AND SEA

2nd Large Edition Nearly Exhausted.

One of the most widely reviewed books of the year.

6/-

BEE: The Princess of the Dwarfs.

By ANATOLE FRANCE. Translated by PETER WRIGHT.

Numerous pictures in colour by CHARLES ROBINSON. 7s. 6d. net.

"The full measure of appreciation can be given to Mr. Robinson's drawings."—Westminster Gazette.

"'Bee' makes a beautiful gift-book."—Evening Standard.

JOLLY CALLE, and other Swedish Fairy Tales.

Text by HELENA NYBLOM. Numerous coloured illustrations by CHARLES FOLKARD. 5s. net.

"'Jolly Calle' is full of laughter, and relates things which (though new to our own nurseries) should be added to the literature which loves the thought of the great fighters of the past."—The Standard.

Uniform with "A CHILD'S BOOK OF SAINTS."

A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS.

Written by WILLIAM CANTON. With illustrations in colour by HERBERT COLE. 5s. net.

"'A Child's Book of Warriors' is a good example of that school of which Mr. Kipling is the master, whose writers make a history a pleasure to their readers. . . . Mr. Cole's illustrations are very good."—Spectator.

WE SHALL GLADLY SEND YOU A CATALOGUE, OR PROSPECTUS, ON RECEIPT OF A POSTCARD.
137d, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Make them a feature of your New Year Gifts

"KOH-I-NOOR"
PROPELLING PENCILS

Just time to buy

"Koh-i-noor" Propelling Pencils are produced in so many styles that all tastes can be suited. You can get a "Koh-i-noor" with refills at the end, or with a sharpener at the end. You can get one in plain silver at 2/6, in chased silver at 3/6, in rolled gold at 5/6, or in plain 9-ct. gold at 15/6, fitted with the inimitable "Koh-i-noor" lead, of course. Your stationer or jeweller will gladly show you the series.

From 9d. each

List free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London, W.C. (Paris, Vienna, Milan, Dresden, Brussels, Barcelona, Zurich, New York.)

Be sure it's

Velma

chocolate REG.

—the result of years of study in blend and make. Side by side with Velma other chocolates taste flat. Velma is delicious, true chocolate, as true as it is fine, as fine as it is true—the greatest achievement in chocolate yet.

See the gold corner on the red packet

3d. 6d. 1s.

SOLE MAKER

Suchard

"Thank you, dear. It is just what I wanted for the Office."

An inexpensive but most useful gift—useful all the year round—either at home, at the office, or when travelling, is a

"NUGGET" BOOT POLISHING OUTFIT

BLACK OR BROWN. PRICE 1/-

A "NUGGET" Outfit contains:—
1 TIN of "NUGGET" Polish.
1 SPECIAL BRUSH (pure bristles).
1 POLISHING PAD ("Selvyt").

It is the finest value on the Market.

Of all Bootmakers and Stores, or direct from The Nugget Polish Co., Ltd., London, S.E., on receipt of 1/- (or in metal case, 1/3).

3/9

The New Year Gift

with a purpose.

Instead of the pretty trifle, give a fountain pen this New Year and let your gift carry with it real lasting pleasure. It costs no more.

THE W.H.S. PEN

is the original, low priced, self-filling Fountain Pen. It writes as well as any pen. Is certain in action—never fails, never spurts, never blots. Further, it is self-filling. You can fill it in 5 seconds, without a filler, without soiling your fingers.

Every Pen is guaranteed for two years, and any style of nib can be matched from stock. The nib is of 14-carat gold, tipped with hardest iridium. Buy the W.H.S. Pen and give Useful Gifts this year. See the new model.

Of all Good Stationers

Refuse Substitutes. Insist on the Pen with the on the barrel

W. H. SMITH & SON

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 12. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 3, 1913.

One Penny.

History in the Making— Notes of the Week	PAGE 357
Arbitration as a Substitute for War New Year Message of "Everyman"— By the Editor	358 359
Great Countries of the World. An Attempt in Human Geography—I. Russia—By Charles Sarolea	360
The Wood—By Reginald Peirson	361
"Everyman's" Referendum on Land Reform	362
Christmas, 1912—By Riccardo Stephens Silhouettes	363 363
Robert Hugh Benson—As I Know Him —By Raymond Blathwayt	364
Portrait of Monsignor Robert Hugh Benson	365
Jupiter Carlyle—Part II.—By Norman Maclean	366

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

MGR. BENSON

JANE BARLOW

HOWARD SPALDING

CHARLES SAROLEA

Literary Notes	PAGE 367
The Spiritual Interpretation of Nature —By Hector Macpherson	369
The Montessori Method	369
Swedenborg; The Savant and the Seer —Part II.—By J. Howard Spalding	370
Mr. Norman Angell on the Balkan Crisis—By H. H. O'Farrell	371
Chrissy at the Lodge—By Jane Barlow	372
An Eton Education—Part II.—Religion —By Mgr. R. H. Benson	374
Correspondence	377
Reviews— King Edward in his True Colours	381
Cambridge	382
Sir Frederick Treves in Palestine	383
Books of the Week	384

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OWING to the dilatory methods of Turkey, business at the Peace Conference resolves itself into a series of adjournments. When, after considerable delay, the Turkish delegates tabled their counter-proposals they were so sweeping as to be wholly unacceptable to the Allies. The Turkish conditions included the retention of Adrianople, the conversion of Macedonia and Albania into autonomous principalities under Turkish suzerainty, and the retention of the islands by Turkey, with the exception of Crete, the disposal of which was to be settled by the Great Powers. The statement of terms amazed the Balkan delegates, and the Conference was adjourned to allow Turkey to bring forward proposals in accordance with the actual situation. At the next meeting, which took place on Monday, the Turkish delegates intimated that they had not received full instructions from Constantinople with regard to the drafting of the new counter-proposals, and another adjournment took place. These delays have greatly annoyed the Balkan delegates, and there is talk of an ultimatum if Turkey persists in her policy of procrastination.

Meanwhile, the Bulgarians appear to be taking steps for establishing an effective occupation of the conquered territories. The Turkish troops at Chatalja are reported to be nearly free from cholera, but their sanitary conditions are deplorable, while the health conditions of the Bulgarians outside the lines are said to be satisfactory.

The influence of the British Medical Association over the doctors with regard to the medical working of the Insurance Act seems to be weakening. From all parts of the country come reports that the doctors, on the whole, are willing to give the Act a trial, and the Government are confident that at the appointed time an adequate medical service will be forthcoming. The Scottish Insurance Commissioners have issued an intimation to insured persons that they have received from every area in the country assurances from Insurance Committees and medical men that panels will, with one or two exceptions, be formed. At a conference of delegates of the Scottish Trade Union Congress in Glasgow a resolution was passed in favour of a State medical service.

A statement has been issued by the National Insurance Practitioners' Association to the profession, in which attention is drawn to the recent announcement of the Commissioners that no insured person can make private arrangements with a doctor, directly or through his approved society, except with the sanction of the Insurance Committee and Commissioners. This statement has been issued because the Association believes that many doctors are being induced to refrain from taking service on the panels by misleading statements that it will be possible for them to make these private arrangements.

Friction on the North-Eastern Railway has not yet ceased. A Conference of delegates, representing the various unions, has been held at York, when a resolution was passed declaring that the fines imposed upon the strikers were absolutely unjust, and calling for further action. A new difficulty has arisen in connection with Knox, the engine-driver, whose case was the cause of the original trouble. Knox is said to be suspended for contravention of a regulation regarding signals. The matter, however, is not expected to lead to serious results.

The sub-committee of the Mansion House Fund Committee in connection with the Titanic disaster have issued a report showing the amount of relief work up till December 20th. The Claims Committee have dealt with 911 cases, of which 683 are British and 228 foreign.

The Postmaster announces that the reduction in charges for deferred telegrams and cable letters to Canada, Newfoundland, the United States, Australia, New Zealand, the South African Union, Rhodesia, and British Central Africa will take effect from January 1st.

Lord Hardinge, the Viceroy of India, continues to make satisfactory progress, and is now considered to be out of danger. His injuries were more serious than were at first stated.

The death is announced of Herr von Kiderlen-Waechter, German Imperial Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in his sixtieth year. He was appointed Foreign Secretary in 1910. He belonged to the Bismarck school of statesmen.

Of the 40 Labour Union officials charged at Indianapolis, U.S., with being concerned in a dynamite conspiracy 38 have been found guilty. Upon Ryan, President of the Union, sentence of seven years' penal servitude was passed. Several other leaders were each sentenced to six years' penal servitude. The majority received short terms of imprisonment.

In connection with the prevention of tropical diseases an important discovery is announced. For some time Dr. R. T. Leiper, interim Wandsworth Scholar of the London School of Tropical Medicine, and a graduate of Glasgow University, has been making investigations into the life history of blood-worms in man and animals. He has been successful in tracing the life history of the bloodworm which causes the disease known as the "Calabar swelling." The fact that large numbers of Europeans become infected with this worm makes the discovery of great importance. The discovery will enable science to determine the conditions in which the infection takes place, and it is expected that preventive measures will be able to be taken.

In a letter to the Times Lord MacDonnell returns to the question of Home Rule finance. He declares that if the onerous and inadequate financial provisions of the measure are enforced against Ireland she will not cease to be a source of weakness and anxiety to the Empire. It is disheartening, continues Lord MacDonnell, that after so many centuries of guardianship England should send her sister forth maimed and impoverished.

The Women's Social and Political Union, in a statement which they have issued, deny all knowledge of the recent case of tampering with railway signals. They have no reason to suppose that any suffragist was connected with the incident, which is not in accordance with Mrs. Pankhurst's injunction to respect human life.

Wednesday, February 12th, has been appointed by the Welsh Bishops to be observed in every church in their dioceses as a day of humble prayer and intercession against the disestablishment and disendowment of the four Welsh dioceses.

A scheme for the reform of the government of London has been adopted by the London Liberal Federation, and will form one of the chief planks in the Progressive platform at the County Council elections in March. The idea seems to be that the whole of the present administrative county, together with the City, should be governed by a central authority, composed of 200 Councillors, the elected Chairman being the Lord Mayor of London.

ARBITRATION AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR WAR

PERHAPS the greatest obstacle to the speedy adoption of Arbitration in the international sphere is the belief in the inevitableness of war. War has been well styled the Great Illusion. Around the military profession poets have woven a halo of romance, and even thinkers of whom better things might have been expected have been captivated by the glamour and glitter of military glory. How can the average man be imbued with peace sentiments when writers like Ruskin are found investing with the glow of genius the military profession? Wordsworth goes further when he declares "Carnage to be God's Daughter." Peace advocates have also to contend against the combative element in human nature, and when this is allied with the politico-economic theory that national supremacy in trade and national prestige can best be secured through war, the task of peace advocates is rendered very difficult. Out of these erroneous views grows the belief that, taking man as he is, he is a being ruled more by his passions than by his interests, and that, therefore, appeals to reason in the matter of war are futile. Those who talk in this strain seem justified by history, for it is a notorious fact that, caught in the whirlwind of passion, nations have waged wars which stand condemned at the bar of common sense. It is not true that men and nations, in the long run, are more dominated by passion than by reason. Does not progress in civilisation consist in the fact that more and more the empire of reason is encroaching upon the empire of passion. In regard to war this, indeed, is one of the cheering signs of the times. A few facts justify this assertion. During the first fifty years of the last century little was heard of Arbitration. During the first ten years of the present century ninety-six Arbitration treaties have been signed. All previous centuries have witnessed ten wars to one Arbitration treaty. The first ten years of the present century has witnessed fifty treaties to one war. In an industrial era, when the whole world is linked in an ever-increasing complexity, nations think twice before they plunge into the horrors of war: passion is giving way to interest. The people are beginning to inquire into the utility of war. Democracy is specially interested in social reform, in securing the foundations for the erection of a rational existence, and is applying to romantic reasons for war utilitarian standards. The people are tired of singing hymns to the god of war. They are more likely to be influenced by a calculation of what might be done for individual and national well-being by the huge sums which are wasted in Dreadnoughts and armies. An American writer, Mr. Frederick Lynch, in a remarkable little book, "The Peace Problem," sets before his readers a few startling facts as to the waste of war which merit consideration. With the money spent by Britain in the South African war there could have been erected 1,000 Old People's Homes, 1,000 Public Playgrounds, 1,000 Public Libraries, 1,000 Trades Schools, 500 Hospitals, 3,000 Public Schools, and 150,000 Working Men's Houses. Facts like these are working mightily on the side of peace.

A great Frenchman, Victor Hugo, made a prediction which is slowly, but surely, reaching fulfilment. He predicted a time when the United States of America and the United States of Europe will work harmoniously in furthering the arts of peace, "when a cannon ball will be exhibited in public museums, just as an instrument of torture is now, and people will be amazed that such a thing could ever have been."

NEW YEAR MESSAGE OF "EVERYMAN" BY THE EDITOR

I.

THE passing of the Old Year and the coming of the New affords a welcome opportunity of extending our most cordial good wishes to the readers of EVERYMAN. We are proud of the fact that in so brief a space we have succeeded in establishing those confidential relations which are generally only established between friends of old standing. The splendid response which EVERYMAN has received is conclusive evidence that the paper is filling a long-felt public need; and it is the consciousness of meeting such a need, and the loyal support of the public, which has enabled us to overcome the difficulties incidental to so novel a venture as EVERYMAN may claim to be.

We have not only received countless messages of sympathy and encouragement and numberless suggestions which have been almost invariably helpful—we have also been favoured with candid criticisms which have been no less helpful. Nor is our appreciation of those criticisms diminished by the fact that some of them are irrelevant and contradictory, and that we are, not unfrequently, blamed where no blame is deserved. In view of such criticisms, it will not be altogether unnecessary if we explain somewhat more fully the policy and purpose of our journal.

II.

Roman Catholic readers have blamed us for publishing anti-Catholic letters and articles—for instance, articles depreciatory of Cardinal Newman and of the present Pope. Protestants and Congregational readers have blamed us for allowing Roman Catholic contributors to state their own case. Anglicans and Conservatives have expressed their regret that their views have not received sufficient emphasis. Working men have blamed us for not giving sufficient prominence to the discussion of labour questions. It is obvious that those criticisms cannot all be true, as the one contradicts the other. Our Protestant and Roman Catholic friends seem both to forget that their position cannot be so desperately weak that if the truth were fully stated by their opponents, their own case would be in deadly peril. On the other hand, our Anglican and Conservative friends seem to forget that EVERYMAN cannot be held responsible if their leaders do not respond to our invitation, and refuse to accept the free hospitality of our columns.

III.

We persist, therefore, in claiming that absolute fairness is one of the distinctive features of EVERYMAN. We adhere to our policy of impartiality. We refuse to pledge ourselves to any partisan or sectarian scheme when we discuss the land problem. We shall try to do equal justice to the proposals of Lloyd George, to the older proposals of Henry George, and to the still older institution of Peasant Proprietorship. When we discuss Socialism, we shall give prominence to the gospel according to St. Marx, but we shall not allow our contributors to ignore the much older gospel according to St. Mark. Surely there already exists a sufficient number of party organs to justify the existence of at least one organ which keeps aloof from and above both sect and party. The ordinary newspaper is too much inclined to treat its readers as if they were totally incapable of judging for themselves on the merits of an argument; as if they were destined to stumble and to err if they were not charitably assisted at every step. We do not believe that the reader is in perpetual need of intellectual crutches to walk straight, and to think right. We do believe that the greatest service that we can render him is not to assist his thought, but to stimulate it. What is required for the solution of most of the burning questions of to-day is, not that we should teach or preach one particular system of thought, but that we should get the reader to think for himself, that we should convince him of the essential dignity of thought. Truth is not a monopoly, and it cannot be imposed upon the mind from outside: it can only be reached by persuasion—that is to say, by discussion: that is to say, by contradiction. In the etymological sense, and also in the deeper sense of the word, a conviction is a victory which we achieve over prejudice and ignorance.

IV.

It is for the very same reason that EVERYMAN will continue to invite the collaboration of eminent men of Letters from all parts of Europe. A few critics have expressed their regret that we should include so many foreigners. The Editor makes bold to think that the danger does not lie in listening too much to the voices of the wide world, but in listening too little. The danger does not lie in too much universality, but in excessive insularity. Surely the time has come when Everyman ought to realise that in things of the spirit there are no frontiers and there are no foreigners.

EVERYMAN, therefore, does not intend to become more parochial in the future; rather will it aim at becoming even more generous in its aspirations, wider in its intellectual horizon. So far do we regret having given too much attention to the outside world, that in this very number we are beginning a systematic survey of all the civilised countries of the globe.

V.

In one other direction EVERYMAN hopes considerably to extend its activity and increase its usefulness. One of the new features of EVERYMAN will be a series of papers discussing once a week a representative masterpiece of world literature. We shall do this, not in the somewhat abstract and academic method of the schools, but in a more concrete, direct, and definite way. Each literary masterpiece presents a succession of problems and raises in the mind of the reader a certain number of definite questions. We shall raise those questions, and try to answer them. And we shall invite our readers to discuss and to dispute our answers. Lack of space will, of course, prevent us from printing every communication received; but we can promise that every communication will be carefully considered, and will ultimately be embodied in a fuller appreciation of any literary masterpiece under consideration. The reader, therefore, will have no right in future to complain that our literary criticism is too dogmatic. It will be for him to challenge our dogmatism, to criticise our criticisms. Let him bear in mind that in the study of literature, as in the study of public questions, tangible results can only be achieved by a combination of hard, individual, and solitary thinking, and of social and collective collaboration. We fully realise that such collective collaboration assumes the continued interest of our reading public and its generous support. But that support has been so ungrudgingly given in the past that we may confidently look forward to it in the future.

GREAT COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD

AN ATTEMPT IN HUMAN GEOGRAPHY. BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.—RUSSIA

[EVERYMAN is starting to-day the first of a series of brief and comprehensive surveys of the leading countries and peoples of the globe. The Editor will endeavour to put in a nutshell those vital facts and factors of human geography which the conventional text-books so often fail to give. Having visited every country of Europe, as well as many parts of Asia, Africa, and America, he will be able to speak not only from statistical data, but from direct and personal observation. Each survey will be appropriately illustrated by a special map by Dr. Bartholomew.]

I.

RUSSIA is not a country, but a continent, extending for thousands of miles in one uninterrupted expanse (except for the break of the Ural Mountains) from Central Europe to the Far East, and from the ice-bound wastes of the White Sea to the sub-tropical shores of the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea. Russia is not a nation, but a bewildering conglomerate of nations, speaking every language—Polish, Finnish, Roumanian, Swedish, German—professing every form of religion—Pagan, Buddhist, Mahometan, Greek Orthodox, Roman Catholic—with every degree of civilisation, from the nomadic semi-savage tribes of the Steppes to the progressive Finns, with their Parliament of women and their universal popular education.

II.

The first and most important fact to remember about the Russians is that they are the most prolific people of the earth. Add the aggregate population of Great Britain, France, Italy, Spain, Belgium, Holland, Sweden, and Norway, and you will not reach the hundred and seventy teeming millions of the Russian Empire. And that population, notwithstanding an awful death-rate, notwithstanding plague and famine, increases automatically by three millions a year. Every year three-quarters of the entire population of Scotland is being added to Russia. In twenty-five years Russia will number two hundred and fifty millions! When we consider that those two hundred and fifty millions will by that time be fully equipped with every instrument of modern civilisation, we realise that Russia will be one of the most formidable world-forces, for good or evil, before the first half of this century has run its course. We realise that the future belongs, not to England, or to France, or to Germany, but to Russia. After generations of suffering, the Slav is at last coming into his inheritance.

III.

The vast plains of Russia, the most extensive in the planet, include three parallel zones—in the north the forest zone, in the centre the agricultural zone, with the "black earth," of wondrous fertility, and in the south the waving prairie inhabited by the Cossacks. If we add to those three zones the vineyards of the Crimea and of the Caucasus, we find that the soil of Russia produces every form of agricultural wealth. And the mineral resources of the country are no less varied and no less inexhaustible. We need only refer to the coal-fields of the Donetz, to the oil-fields of Baku, to the gold and silver mines of the Ural Mountains and of Siberia. If to-day Russia is one of the granaries of the world, to-morrow she will be one of its greatest industrial areas.

For the transport of her agricultural and industrial produce Russia possesses not only sixty thousand miles of railroad, but what is vastly more important—the most magnificent waterways of Europe. The Russian complains that he has no outlet on the ocean, that all his seas are inland lakes: the Baltic, the Black Sea, the Caspian, and Lake Baikal. But he forgets that he possesses the Don, the Dnieper, and the most glorious river of the world—the Volga! Let the tourist take his passage at Tver, on one of the floating hotels of the Kavkaz and Mercur—Tver is only eight hours' railway journey from St. Petersburg—and let him drift in an eight-days' journey on the Mother Volga down to the Caspian Sea, and he will then realise the unrivalled possibilities of Russian inland commerce.

IV.

It is true that a large proportion of the Russian Empire has not yet been assimilated. The alien races—the Catholic Pole, the Protestant, even the Germans and Finns, the Jews and Armenians—have not yet been won over by the conqueror. Still, the Russian element forms the enormous majority of the population. When the Government gives up its stupid methods of compulsion it is probable that the process of Russification will proceed at a very rapid pace. For let us not be deceived by superficial appearances: The Russian-race possess many of the characteristics of a superior and imperial people. They have survived a struggle for life of ruthless severity. They have resisted the continued pressure of hunger, war, plague, of a cruel climate, and a more cruel Government. The Russians have got a splendid physique, they have a capacity of endurance which is surpassed by no other race. And although they emerged only yesterday from barbarism, they have already produced giants in every department of Art, of Literature, and Philosophy—scientists like Mendeleieff, philosophers like Solovioff, musicians like Tschaiowsky, painters like Verestchagin, men of letters like Tolstoy and Dostoeffsky.

V.

European Russia is surrounded by an industrial belt in the west, in the south, and in the east. But in the meantime Russia remains pre-eminently a nation of peasants. The moujik is still the backbone of the Empire. He is a splendid worker when he is given a chance, and in Siberia and Central Asia he proves an ideal colonist. It is true that technically he is still a bad agriculturist. He is ignorant. He has no capital. He scratches the earth with his primitive plough, as in the days of Abraham. But enormous progress is being made, and great changes are impending. The Russian Government is instituting gigantic experiments in land reform, which our own land reformers would do well to follow very closely. Hitherto the communal system of property seems to have proved an insurmountable obstacle to agricul-heroic rising of 1905 the Russian people have received representative institutions; but the Duma is only a beginning. No reforms can be fruitful unless they are attended by a large measure of Home Rule in Finland, in Poland, in Trans-Caucasia, in Little Russia, and unless they are attended by an even larger measure of local self-government, and last, not least, unless they are attended by a concession of religious liberty—ever the foundation of political liberty.

VII.

Unfortunately for the prospects of reform at present, the ideals and the activity of the Government are still being diverted, by the delusion of imperialism, from the pressing home-problems. What the Russian people really want are better roads, more railways, better housing, better sanitation, better schools, a more liberal Church, a more liberal administration. But instead of the activities of the Government being turned in that direction, the huge revenue of the Empire is being spent on increasing an already huge and unwieldy army, and the political energy of the ruling classes is being devoted to the ambitious and perilous schemes of conquest in Persia, Mongolia, and Manchuria. Only six years ago the jingo policy brought humiliating disaster to the Russian arms. The Government has already forgotten the awful lesson, and is returning to the evil of its ways. They are "strangling" Persia. They are preparing to annex Mongolia and part of Manchuria. There lies the danger in the immediate future. A false and obsolete political philosophy, the imperialism of the governing class and the spiritual despotism of the Orthodox Church, are the two greatest obstacles in the way of the moral and intellectual enfranchisement of the Russian people.

tural progress. That form of collective primitive agriculture has now broken down. The ancient institution of the "mir," or village community, is being disintegrated. Communism is giving way to peasant proprietorship and social co-operation.

VI.

But it is obvious that no reform of any kind will be carried through successfully until the methods of government in Russia have undergone drastic changes. Those hundred and seventy millions are still abominably ruled. In the first place, they are misgoverned by their spiritual rulers. The Greek Orthodox Church, with her parish priests, who are compelled to marry, with her hierarchy of monks and bishops, who are forbidden to marry, remains grossly ignorant and slothful, and maintains the people in sloth and ignorance. She is out of touch with modern life, and continues in abject mental submission to a despotic State.

Nor do the Russian people fare any better with their temporal rulers. The Tsar is the nominal head of the Empire. But the reality of power is vested in an irresponsible bureaucracy, corrupt by tradition, and, what is worse, corrupt by necessity, because despotism must needs breed corruption, and because the huge distances from St. Petersburg make supervision and responsibility impossible. It is true that since the

THE WOOD'

THIS is a sombre Wood!
No Ghost need walk, for every tree's a Ghoul.
Ugly and black they stand, gaunt limbs out-spread,
Grim, silent, weeping Watchers o'er the Dead.

Gnarled Trunk uplifts distorted arm
(An awesome threat!),
And with a grisly finger points
Derisively at gawky joints,
Dismal and wet.

Tall boughs awry,
Blown windward, sigh.
Dim, crystal raindrops, trembling, hang.
Beneath each crabbed and crumpled twig,
They dance a short, defiant jig;
Then slowly, with a sullen splash,
Tears, dreary tears, drip sadly down.

Yet, here yon tree-tops caught the After-glow
When fickle Moths were flitting to and fro;
And here stray Moonbeams flashed a silver light
On Summer Mists, soft stealing through the Night;
Here, rustling foliage draped each heaving bough,
Whispering a slumb'rous Evensong.

And now,
Misshapen Monsters wave repulsive arms,
And creak and crack, and thrill with wild alarms!

This is a sombre Wood!

REGINALD PEIRSON.

"EVERYMAN'S" REFERENDUM ON LAND REFORM

I.

LAND Reform is the order of the day. It is increasingly felt that the Land Question is at the root of every social problem: the housing of the poor, the congestion of our cities, the desolation of our countryside. It is announced that Mr. Lloyd George intends to submit, almost immediately, far-reaching proposals for the solution of the problem. In view of this fact, it is highly desirable that all the aspects of the question shall be fully discussed. It is now generally admitted, even by those who are in favour of the Insurance Act, that it was forced upon Parliament before it had been adequately and maturely considered. Now the Land Question is far more complex, and involves much bigger issues than the Insurance Act, and for that reason a careful and painstaking discussion on Land Reform is of vital moment.

II.

With that object, EVERYMAN is opening to-day something in the nature of a referendum on Land Reform. We extend to every reader a cordial invitation to contribute to the discussion, and we have no doubt that a large number of them will assist in clearing up a problem, on the solution of which the future of the country so largely depends. But a popular referendum will only help us if we proceed on methodical and systematic lines. Three conditions, at least, have to be fulfilled if our discussion is to lead to tangible results. In the first place we have to keep a firm grasp of principles. In the second place we have to consider all the facts of the case, and in the third place we must carefully distinguish between the different solutions which are before us.

III.

In the first place we must keep a firm grasp of our principles, and we must be consistent in our principles. We must first know what is to be done before we discuss how it is to be done. It is clearly impossible to get at a satisfactory remedy, if we do not agree as to the evils which have to be remedied. It is clearly impossible to get at a definite conclusion, if we do not start from definite premises. For instance, the Conservative party seem to be in favour of Small Holdings. We are naturally driven to ask how they can also be in favour of Big Estates. They are in favour of Three Acres and a Cow. We are naturally driven to ask how they can also be in favour of a Million Acres and Deer and Grouse. The Conservative party believe in the sacred principle of Private Property. We naturally ask how they also believe in Land Monopoly, which is the negation of Private Property.

IV.

But we must not only be clear-minded and consistent about our first principles, we must also keep fully informed about the facts. In some of the last issues of EVERYMAN we had a discussion on Peasant Proprietorship between Mr. Chesterton and Mr. Shaw. I am sure the vast majority of our readers were keenly interested in that dialectical tournament, and which editor would not be grateful to such doughty champions for having chosen his paper for an arena? Yet with all deference and gratitude to those two men of genius, that brilliant discussion on Peasant Proprietorship was eminently unsatisfactory. For neither Mr. Chesterton nor Mr. Shaw troubled much about giving us the facts of the case. Mr. Chesterton's plea was that peasant proprietorship is a desirable ideal, but he did not tell us under what conditions that ideal was realised. On the other hand, Mr. Bernard Shaw told us that peasant proprietorship had ceased to exist, and that even if it could exist, under modern conditions, it would not be desirable. But neither of the two champions thought it worth their while to enlighten us on the working of peasant proprietorship in Servia, Bulgaria, Belgium, France, Southern Germany. Neither Mr. Shaw nor Mr. Chesterton informed us that at this very moment the Russian Government are instituting a colossal experiment in peasant proprietorship, and that millions of acres held by Village Communities are being transferred to peasant proprietors.

Now it is obvious that in an eminently practical question, like the Land Question, it is not sufficient to uphold certain principles. We must also take into consideration all the facts of the case. For that reason we would suggest that those readers who are disposed to take part in our discussion should at least take the trouble to study some of the leading authorities on the Land Question. A vast literature has accumulated on the subject, and is daily being added to. I can, therefore, only suggest a few standard works, such as John Stuart Mill's classical chapters in his "Political Economy"; Henry George's "Progress and Poverty" and "Social Problems"; Alfred Russel Wallace's "Land Nationalisation"; Prince Kropotkin's "Fields, Factories and Workshops"; and last, but not least, two excellent recent books dealing with various aspects of the Land Question: Mr. Rowntree's searching study on "Life and Labour in Belgium" (Macmillan, 5s.) and Mr. Green's stimulating book on the "Awakening of England" (Nelson, 2s.).

V.

After stating our guiding principles, after considering all the facts of the case, it will be no less important to keep distinct and separate the different solutions which are advocated. Each solution ought to be examined on its own merits and independently of the others. For the sake of convenience, we would propose to restrict our discussion to the following five solutions of the Land Question.

There is, in the first place, the old solution of peasant proprietorship through the operation of the Testamentary Law of the "Code Napoleon." That solution is often called "The French Solution." But such an appellation is obviously a misnomer, considering that the "French" solution has been adopted by half the civilised countries of the European Continent without expense, injustice, or violence.

A second solution is the Conservative solution of Small Holdings, and Land Purchase by the State, and the artificial creation of a new class of peasant proprietors by a system of State Credit and Purchase Annuities.

A third solution is the taxation of Land Values inaugurated by the Radical party, and which will probably be developed on a much larger scale by Mr. Lloyd George.

Last, and not least, there are the two solutions of the Single Tax and Land Nationalisation. The two solutions are often identified. A recent controversy in the Christian Commonwealth between Mr. Fels and Mr. Philip Snowden showed how confused popular opinions still are about land reform, and it also revealed how radically different are the policy of the Single Tax and the policy of Land Nationalisation. According to Mr. Snowden, not only does the Single Tax policy not lead to the Nationalisation of land, but the one idea is the negation of the other. The Single Tax policy is essentially individualistic. Land Nationalisation is essentially Socialistic.

VI.

We firmly hope that on the lines suggested we shall have a searching and impartial discussion, and that we shall succeed in laying the foundation of a definite policy. It is highly probable that we shall not be able to publish all the answers submitted to us, and that we shall have to make a selection. But in order to enable us to print as large a number of contributions as possible, we would urge our readers carefully to keep in mind our limitations of space, and to restrict themselves to a concise and precise statement of the pros and cons of each particular solution of the Land Problem which the reader is prepared to advocate.

CHRISTMAS, 1912

LAST night a great Voice cried, "Arise!
 "And come with me to Paradise,
 "To see, and tell His people all,
 "How the Lord Christ keeps festival,
 "At this, the time for peace and mirth,
 "On all God's earth!"

Then I, though sure that sin and doubt,
 Blinding mine eyes, would keep me out,
 Followed that Voice o'er windy ways,
 Through all the firmament, ablaze,
 And, entering unquestioned, trod
 The streets of God.

And lo! I stood before a throne
 On which One sat and wept, alone,
 In clouds that hid the Mercy Seat,
 A broken sceptre at His feet,
 While, from beneath His thorny crown,
 Fresh blood dripped down.

Then, clearer than the Christmas bells,
 Came cries, as from a thousand hells,
 Chantings, and hymns of victory,
 With women's shrieks in agony,
 And children's wails, that made Him moan,
 And shook His throne.

Now to high heaven I cried aloud,
 Before a writhing, hurrying crowd,
 Old men and maidens, hacked and torn,
 Dead babes by raving mothers borne.
 Lo! ev'n God's angels, rank on rank,
 Shuddered and sank!

And now I saw each shining street,
 Puddled and soiled, by bleeding feet.
 I saw the gardens of the Lord,
 All the white blossoms, all green sward,
 All the pure lilies—every bud,
 Dabbled with blood.

And one shrieked, "Son of Galilee!
 "Dwellers in outer darkness, we!
 "Vile Pagans—sent to Paradise,
 "As Christians' Christmas sacrifice!"
 —Then Jesus rent His robe, and cried,
 "For this I died!"

RICCARDO STEPHENS.

SILHOUETTES

From the gallery of memory, mutascopic and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

THE curtain had gone down on the first Act of the Pantomime. There was a fifteen minutes' wait before the Fairies and the Goblins, the white Rabbits and pink Lamp-shades were wanted, and the girls in the dressing-room commenced to talk. Somebody said the show had gone very well that night. The theatre was crammed from floor to ceiling.

"I do like to play to full houses," said a little Dresden Shepherdess, settling her white wig.

Somebody remarked that it made very little difference anyway, and that when you'd been playing in pantomime for ten years you didn't feel enthusiastic.

"Ten years!" The Dresden Shepherdess opened her blue eyes.

"And you're still in the chorus, dear?" she asked. "You're different from me."

"Some people can push, some can't," said a graceful Water-melon; "you haven't all the brains and looks, my dear. . . . There's Flo."

The Water-melon, in pale green skirts and a golden wig, pointed to a Fairy Prince, gorgeous in blue and silver. "She's taking thirty shillings a week, girls, and she was offered four pounds to go to Glasgow. But"—with a tragic shake of the head—"she wouldn't leave London."

Somebody remarked, with profound gloom, that Flo didn't know which side her bread was buttered.

"Wild horses wouldn't keep me in town," said the Water-melon.

"Four pounds! Why, she refused five last week," said a fussy little woman, dressed as a golliwog. There was a murmur of astonishment, quenched with surprise, by the abrupt remark of Flo. "Well, and what should I gain if I earnt fifty pounds, anyway?" she asked.

A shrill chorus answered, "All the dresses she wanted, a motor-car, diamonds—"

"I've something more precious than diamonds or motor-cars," she said.

The Shepherdess murmured that Flo was a fool, and the Water-melon did not contradict her.

The gas-jets on the walls flared on their faces, lit up the quaint costumes. Along the corridors, up the stairs, came the voice of the call-boy, summoning the beginners for the second act.

In a flash the room was empty; the bright dresses flitted down the stairs. . . . In the wings the Dresden Shepherdess felt a hand upon her arm. She was waiting with a crowd of water-melons, rabbits, golliwogs, and lamp-shades for their call.

"Look," said Somebody, "there's Flo!"

The Shepherdess glanced up. The Fairy Prince had taken a bundle in a woollen shawl from an old woman, and was kissing the small white face of a little cripple.

"The child would never stand the journey to the North," murmured the Water-melon, and shook her head.

"All the same," said the Shepherdess, "five pounds is a lot of money. Is it worth while?"

The Fairy Prince caught the baby closer. "More than diamonds, precious," she said softly; and Somebody led the Shepherdess away.

ROBERT HUGH BENSON

AS I KNOW HIM * * * BY RAYMOND BLATHWAYT

[In the fourth number of EVERYMAN we published a Protestant appreciation of Monsignor Robert Hugh Benson, one of the most picturesque, one of the most aggressive, and one of the most influential personalities in the Roman Catholic world. We are now giving an appreciation from the other side, and from the inside. It is unnecessary to add that we must leave the writer the entire responsibility of his opinions.—THE EDITOR.]

STARTING his career from the usual standpoint of an Eton and Trinity youth, Robert Hugh Benson (born 1871), the youngest son of an Archbishop of Canterbury, rapidly developed a personality, sympathetic, keenly reverential, artistic, and humorous, with a vision of life a thousand miles away from and beyond the very ordinary English type with which he had been so perilously threatened in earlier years. Even as an Anglican curate young Benson early found himself confronting the average placid life of the English parson with a troublesomely original outlook on life, and a mind and soul that would not be lulled into that condition of soporific comfort.

Hugh Benson would think; his originality of mind, his intense earnestness and conscientiousness, his logical outlook, and, perhaps more than anything else, his keen sense of humour, gave him an angle of vision so different from the ordinary bovine English point of view, if one may be permitted so contradictory and paradoxical an expression, that his revolt from the early family and national traditions, especially where religious matters were concerned, was almost inevitable.

One realised that fact very early in his career. Very highly cultivated, with a supreme realisation of the mystical as opposed to the actual in their influences on mind and soul, and, indeed, on life generally, with an acute historical appreciation of the value of tradition, and with an intellect almost Oriental in its subtlety, what wonder that the young curate soon found his feet set in far other paths than those habitually travelled by the average Anglican cleric? Cricket, football, mothers' meetings, and the ordinary sentimentality of the parochial young woman appalled the vehemently spiritual, and withal exceedingly acute, soul of this outwardly placid and sweet-natured, but inwardly turbulent, young priest chafing against the restraints of the English pulpit. For in an extraordinary manner the Church of Laud, Ken, Andrewes, George Herbert, Wesley, Charles Kingsley, and Charles Lowder possesses a formative influence not less powerful than that of Rome itself. Only it must be exercised upon, and bear fruit in the person rightly adapted for it. With the wrong person, and especially in these days of daring thought and revolt, it is hopeless. It never gained any real hold upon Hugh Benson, and I fancy his life and experiences in Canon Gore's Brotherhood of the Resurrection at Mirfield but strengthened him in his desire to be incorporated in and to form a part, however small, of the real thing which finds its consummation in the papal throne of Rome. And thus, in quitting the Church of his fathers, he found rest unto his soul.

His conversion resulted in an astonishing, a surprising, and a wholly unexpected realisation of freedom, a wonderful joyousness in the largeness of the new land wherein his feet were to wander whither they would for the future. Escaping from the narrow, meticulous—to use an odious literary phrase—somewhat sentimental and extraordinarily restricted modes of thought and life, as expressed and permitted by Anglicanism, he felt very much like a man coming out of a close, warmly curtained, highly scented little sitting-room, who suddenly would find himself on the top of a great hill, with the strong winds of heaven blowing all about him, a sky across which clamber great cumuli of white clouds, and a widely spreading campaign of country, hills and valleys and the King's highway all around him. And there came to him a wonderful appreciation of the intense reality of the genuine thing. It was so human, it was so much in accord with nature—his own nature and the nature of the great wide world, peopled with men and women, and alive with the lowing of cattle and the songs of birds and the rustling of the leaves—the humanity of the world.

For the first time he realised not only the splendour of Catholicism, but the splendour of the life religious. And so Hugh Benson found himself. One understands this when one hears him preaching at the top of his speed in the great Byzantine church at Westminster; when one listens to one of his deeply thoughtful Lenten conferences in the Carmelite Church in Kensington. Always the priest, always the Englishman, but, above everything else, always intensely human in all his sympathies. It is for this reason, perhaps, that mysticism—not the horrible incantational mysticism of San Francisco, Chicago, or West Kensington, revolting in its vulgarity, but the mysticism rather of St. Francis of Assisi, St. Catherine of Siena, St. Thomas à Kempis—possesses such a fascination for that tender, subtle soul.

It is always with a sense of this mysticism that his sermons and his novels are so delicately saturated, a delightful odour, as it were, giving one a vision of other worldliness, which has not been equalled since "John Inglesant" first burst upon a delighted and an admiring world. A mysticism with a mission to humanity, its own appointed part in the scheme of things, a mysticism that is a whole life in itself.

It is all these influences, I think, that have gone to the spiritual and mental formation of that slight boyish figure which flits so swiftly past one on its way to the pulpit in Westminster Cathedral. I do not wish to leave upon my readers' minds the vision or the idea of cowed monk or shaven priest. Hugh Benson, with all his love of the past and his artistic appreciation of mediævalism, is very much of to-day; he is alive to his finger tips. Indeed, for ought I know, he may be more at home in a Mayfair drawing-room or a West End literary club than ever he could be in the cells of the monks of the Thebaid. He will discuss aeroplanes, or General Booth, or the latest scientific discovery with the best; he can be the life and soul of the smoking-room, for he is pre-eminently a humorist, and he is ever delightfully interested in affairs of the moment, pulsating and vibrating as he is with ebullient humanity; but behind and beneath it all he is ever the priest and the mystic.

MONSIGNOR ROBERT HUGH BENSON, NATUS 1871

JUPITER CARLYLE * * BY NORMAN MACLEAN

PART II.

I.

The impression that is most abiding is that of the conviviality which marked the years which succeeded Culloden. All the classes, even of Churchmen, were united in the devotion to claret. There is a certain grimness in the phrases with which Carlyle depicts the men of his day. Dr. Alexander Webster, the leader of the Evangelical party in the Church, took a part in the prosecution of Carlyle for attending the theatre, but Carlyle has his revenge. "Best known as Dr. Bonum Magnum, . . . in this case he was only acting his natural part, which was that of running down all indecencies in clergymen but those of the table, and doing mischief, like a monkey, for its own satisfaction." This sentence is typical of what is weakest in Carlyle—his bitterness against those who oppose him, a bitterness which clouds his judgment. "He was held to be excellent company," says Carlyle of Webster, "even by those of dissolute manners; while, being a five-bottle man, he could lay them all under the table." Being met by an acquaintance on his way home in the early morning with traces of conviviality upon him, "Ah! Doctor," was the question put to him, "what would the auld wives of the Tolbooth say if they saw ye noo?" "Tut, man," was the retort, "they wouldna believe their een." All through his pages we meet a strange life.

II.

It was a life charitable to excess. Here is a surprising statement: "After Lord Drummore became a widower, he attached himself to a mistress. . . . This was all that could be laid to his charge, which, however, did not abate the universal concern of the city and the country when he was dying." Carlyle meets some of the English clergy at Harrogate, and he says of them: "Though inconceivably ignorant and sometimes indecent in their morals, they were 'unassuming, and had no other affectation than that of behaving like gentlemen.'" The minister of London quarrels with a clerical bed-fellow at an inn, fights him, and turns him out. Carlyle has recorded many stories of others, but one is told of himself. Dr. Lindsay Alexander used to tell of a servant at Pinkieburn who followed him with admiring eye as he left for his home. "There he gaed, dacent man, as steady as a wall, after his ain share o' five bottles o' port." There has truly been a reformation of social customs in Scotland since the days of Jupiter Carlyle.

III.

Of the many great men who act their part on Carlyle's stage, none appears in more charming guise than David Hume. To the pious of those days Hume was an atheist to be abhorred. But he remained on the friendliest terms with the ministers. Dr. Jardine and Hume often discussed revealed religion, and one night, descending the turnpike stair from his friend's house in the darkness, Hume fell. Jardine rushed for a candle, and, as he lifted the bulky body of his guest, slyly said, "Davie, I have often tell't ye that 'natural licht' is no sufficient." Robert Adam was forbidden to bring Hume to his mother's house, but when he brings him without saying who he is, she declares that "the large, jolly man who sat next me is the most agreeable of them all." "This was the very atheist," she says, "ing, a'ne, 'mother, that you were so afraid of." "Well," she says, "you may bring him as much as you please, for he's the most innocent, agreeable, facetious man I ever saw."

IV.

One wonders how many of the people of Edinburgh who walk along Princes Street and turn up St. David Street know how that last street got its name! Very few; for the people in our day love the refuse of the Press, and have no time for books such as this—books which make the past live for them. As the new town of Edinburgh was proceeding westward, Hume built himself a house in the south-west corner of St. Andrew Square, and, in the spirit of plaisanterie, Hume, with the aid of Miss Nancy Ord, "got the workmen to paint on the corner-stone of David's house 'St. David's Street,' where it remains to this day." When his housekeeper noticed it, taking it as an insult to her master, she rushed to his room exclaiming, "What d'ye think the ne'er-de-weels hae gane an' painted on oor house front?" When she had explained matters, Hume quietly replied, "Tut, Jenny! is that all? Many a better man than me has been called a saint." At another time, at the "Poker Club," when everybody wondered why a clerk ran away with £900: "I know that very well," says John Hume to David, "for when he was taken there was found in his pocket your 'Philosophical Works' and Boston's 'Fourfold State of Man.'"

V.

When one remembers the bitterness of bygone ecclesiastical controversies in Scotland, it is pleasant to think of these men agreeing to differ in the greatest good humour. Dr. Alexander Carlyle well deserved the title of the "preserver of the Church from fanaticism." Before his day a clergyman in Scotland was thought "profane who affected the manners of gentlemen, or was seen much in their company." He sought to demonstrate that a minister could be a good Christian and yet mingle in all sorts of society. "The greatest demi-god I ever saw," said Sir Walter Scott, "was Dr. Carlyle, minister of Musselburgh, commonly called Jupiter. Carlyle, from having sat more than once for the king of gods and men to Gavin Hamilton." When he went on a mission to London, his portly figure, his long silver locks, the freshness of the colour on his face made a prodigious impression on the courtiers. "It was the soundness of his sense, his honourable principles, and his social qualities, unmixed with anything that detracted from the character of a clergyman, that gave him his place among the worthies." In his own parish he was greatly beloved, cared for the poor, and his ministry was so successful that a new church was built. The reader of the autobiography may not receive the impression that its writer was a pious man, but the fact was so. When his wife died, in 1804, this was how he recorded the event in his diary: "She composed her features into the most placid appearance, gave me her last kiss, and then, gently going out, like a taper in the socket, at seven breathed her last. No finer spirit ever took flight from a clay tabernacle to be united with the Father of all and the spirits of the just." It is a great loss that Carlyle did not live to finish his Autobiography,* but what he wrote will ever be valued as a mirror of that generation who seem to us already as those who had lived in another planet.

* A beautiful edition of the Autobiography is published by T. N. Foulis, with 32 portraits and notes, for 6s.

LITERARY NOTES

THOSE who affirm that cheap publishing has reached a climax are quite mistaken. For proof of this assertion I should point to the "Everyman Encyclopædia" which Messrs. Dent are bringing out, under the editorship of Mr. Andrew Boyle. We have had many surprises of late regarding cheap and handy works of reference, but the particulars of this latest venture fairly takes one's breath away. For twelve shillings it will be possible to obtain twelve neat and clearly printed volumes, containing concise, up-to-date, and reliable information on almost every conceivable subject.

I have just seen the first volume of the "Everyman Encyclopædia," and what strikes me most of all is its marvellous compactness. I have handled critically not a few works of reference, but cannot recall one which fulfilled better my ideas of condensation. It is claimed for this new work that it will include more articles than the largest encyclopædia so far published in English. That may seem pretentious, but if succeeding volumes are as good as the first, the claim will be made good. Space is being economised, not only by condensation and the elimination of all unimportant matter, but by the exclusion of maps and the use of illustrations only in the case of subjects calling specially for pictorial or diagrammatic treatment. Altogether, the new encyclopædia promises to be a most useful adjunct to "Everyman's Library," and I shall be surprised if it has not an enormous sale.

The small army of newspaper correspondents have now returned from the Balkans, and are busily engaged in writing up their experiences in fulfilment of publishers' commissions. Indeed, the first contribution to the literature of the Balkan War has already been published by Messrs. Methuen, under the title of "Adventures of War with Cross and Crescent." This amazing feat of bookmaking has been accomplished by Mr. Philip Gibbs, of the Graphic, and Mr. Bernard Grant, of the Daily Mirror. The former was with the Bulgarian forces and the latter with the Turkish. The book therefore furnishes something like a conspectus of the war in the Balkans, and not merely impressions of one corner of the field of operations.

But the book which will interest me most is that by Mr. Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett, of the Daily Telegraph. It will be published by Mr. Heinemann. Of all the accounts of the war which appeared in the London dailies, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's, was the most vivid and illuminating. This, of course, was largely due to the fact that circumstances enabled him to witness more of the war than probably any other British correspondent. Among the numerous books now being turned out with astonishing rapidity, to gratify an omniverous reading public, I should say Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's has most chance of attaining permanent value.

Dantesque literature has grown so enormously of recent years that there must be few openings for fresh books. I doubt if there is a single aspect of the Florentine poet's life and writings which has not been treated more than once. Scartazzini's bibliography—one of the best, but by no means the most recent—covers many pages. Be that as it may, Dante scholars of the standing of Mr. Edmund G. Gardner and Mr. Philip H. Wicksteed are always welcome; and it is interesting to learn that both are publishing new works through Messrs. Dent. From Mr. Gardner, whom most Dante students gratefully remember as the author of a brilliant exposition of the "Paradiso," we are to have an illustrated study of "Dante and the Mystics."

Mr. Wicksteed, on the other hand, entitles his book "Dante and Aquinas." Its object is to provide a connected idea of the general theological and philosophical background of the "Commedia." This is a subject well suited to Mr. Wicksteed's powers, for in his book of popular sermons on Dante he has shown how wide is his knowledge and how deep his insight in regard to the great poem. But Mr. Wicksteed's most notable service to Dantesque literature consists in having rendered accessible to English readers the essays of Dr. Karl Witte, who did more for the revival of interest in Dante during last century than any other scholar. In translating and editing this work he was assisted by Mr. C. M. Lawrence. Mr. Wicksteed has also collaborated with Mr. E. G. Gardner in translating Dante's writings.

Possessing the libraries of the late Dr. Furnivall and the late Professor Skeat, the School of English Language and Literature should lack nothing philologically. It is only a few months since Dr. Furnivall's library was presented to the College, and now comes the announcement that Dr. Skeat's collection will also find a permanent home there. Dr. Skeat was an indefatigable collector as well as an indefatigable author; and at the time of his death his was probably the largest and finest private library of its kind in the country. It was particularly rich in works on Middle English and English philology generally, of which subjects Professor Skeat had an unrivalled knowledge.

Reading the other day a review of the literary output of 1912, I came across the statement that the year had been strongest in the domain of biography. The writer is correct, but I should say we had quantity rather than quality. Many well-written and extremely readable biographies appeared, but, with the possible exception of Mr. W. F. Monypenny's second instalment of "The Life of Disraeli," no biography of the first rank. On the whole, I should be inclined to assign the place of honour for 1912 to Mr. Wilfrid Ward's "Life of Newman." While lacking literary distinction, it presents a skilfully drawn portrait, not of the ideal but of the actual Newman. As has been well said, its "obvious truthfulness" entitles it to rank as a notable biographical achievement.

Hardly less noteworthy is the record of another Churchman—Father Tyrrell, the martyred Modernist whose "Autobiography and Life," arranged, with supplements, by Miss Petre, has been described, and not extravagantly, as one of the "most intimate and merciless confessions of a soul that have ever been written." Among other important biographies of the year 1912, I should name Mr. Herbert Jenkins' "Life of Borrow," which covers and completes Dr. Knapp's account; the official "Life" of G. F. Watts, by his wife; Mr. A. B. Paine's "Life of Mark Twain," a wordy but deeply interesting work; and last, but not least, Sir Sidney Lee's article on Edward VII., contributed to the new Supplement of the "Dictionary of National Biography." I hope Messrs. Smith, Elder will issue this illuminating record of our late King in book form, as they did in the case of Sir Sidney Lee's article on Queen Victoria. X. Y. Z.

THE SPIRITUAL INTERPRETATION OF NATURE * * * BY HECTOR MACPHERSON

I.

WITHIN the last forty years the attitude of leading scientists towards Nature has undergone a great change. At the time when Tyndall delivered his famous Belfast address, the mechanical theory of Nature was much in vogue. Science, with its ether, atoms, and molecules, was supposed to have reached the fundamental material from which, by a gradual process of increasing complexity, the entire Cosmos had been evolved. Upon this conception Spencer based his "First Principles," in which he set himself to trace the transformations of matter and energy from gaseous nebulae to the highest forms of civilisation, or, as Grant Allen once put it, from star to soul. On the same lines was Huxley's memorable lecture on Protoplasm. Vigorous protests against the attempt to interpret Nature by means of mechanical analogies were made by British representatives of the Hegelian philosophy, notably by Hutchison, Stirling, Green, the two Cairds, and Professor Pringle Pattison. From a somewhat different standpoint, Mr. Balfour, in his "Defence of Philosophic Doubt," carried the war into the camp of the enemy, with the result that in the writings of the present generation of scientists materialism is at a discount.

In his later years Spencer felt the inadequacy of the mechanical theory when made to do duty as philosophy. I remember how, in conversation with me, he was anxious to emphasise the view that the philosophic preliminary to "First Principles" had no real organic connection with his theory of Evolution, which rested purely on a scientific basis, and for its acceptance was independent of metaphysical interpretations. In the later editions of his "First Principles" and "Principles of Biology," we find Spencer departing from the mechanical and leaning decidedly to the dynamic theory.

II.

The substitution of the dynamic for the mechanical theory of the Cosmos was foreshadowed by Spencer when he made energy, not matter, the basal factor in Evolution, thereby paving the way for the spiritual interpretation of Nature. The changed tone from the Mid-Victorian School of Science is reflected in such books as Professor Arthur Thomson's "The Bible of Nature" and "The Spiritual Interpretation of Nature," by Professor J. Y. Simpson. In this suggestive volume Professor Simpson seeks to press biology into the service of religion.

When Spencer described the world of phenomena as the manifestation of an Infinite and Eternal Energy, he was on the road to Theism, had he not allowed himself to be hampered by the Agnosticism of the Hamiltonian philosophy. The supreme question is this, Is the Universe essentially unknowable? Can nothing whatever be predicated of the Infinite and Eternal Energy? In the Universal Scheme of things, can there be traced no all-pervading purpose? Is the life of humanity a thing of sound and fury signifying nothing, a chaotic procession in which tragedy and comedy mingle in bewildering confusion? Or does the truth lie with poets and theologians when they tell us that through the ages an increasing purpose runs, that death does not end all, that the high aspirations of the soul are not delusive by-products of material energy, but rather prophetic hints of a life that will bloom and blossom elsewhere?

III.

Professor Simpson, treating these high themes from the standpoint of Science, is in full agreement with the poet and theologian. In dealing with inorganic Nature, a plausible case can be made out for the mechanical theory. Given matter and energy, and the laws of mechanics, and the attempt may be made to explain phenomena along purely material lines, but the case is altered when we come to deal with life. There are those who think that some time in the dim past life may have been evolved from non-living matter. Spencer at one time evidently held some such opinion, but his mature thought led him to the view that "life in essence cannot be conceived in physico-chemical terms." This declaration finds justification in the final chapter of Professor Simpson's book, dealing with life in which as the outcome of biological study he comes to the following conclusion: "Life acts as a directive channel along which energy can flow to accomplish specific work. Life is unceasing, directive and selective control of energy; like some invisible charioteer it stands athwart a complex of moving forces, constraining and controlling them."

The materialist theory breaks down when the attempt is made to account for Consciousness. We are long since past the dogmatism of James Mill when he set himself to make the human mind as plain and intelligible as Fleet Street. J. S. Mill laboured hard, by means of the association-of-ideas formula, to explain Consciousness. From the standpoint of materialism no intelligible explanation of Consciousness is possible. Neither Mill, with his association-of-ideas, nor Spencer, with his theory of mental evolution, gives an answer to the supreme question—How can Consciousness at one and the same time be the product and the interpreter of experience? Spencer, after struggling hard to interpret mind in terms of matter and energy, comes at last to the conclusion that what we know as Consciousness cannot be identified with waves of molecular motion; "a unit of feeling has nothing in common with a unit of motion." To Professor Simpson's book we must refer the reader for a comprehensive treatment of Consciousness in its biological aspect—treatment which greatly strengthens the plea for a spiritual interpretation of Nature.

IV.

What is the nature of the spiritual principle which modern scientific thinkers find in the Universe? Is it unknowable, as Spencer says? If not, how is knowledge of it possible? If we approach the problem from the point of view of materialism, we are apt to think it is solved when we reduce the complex phenomena of Nature to atoms, molecules, and ether, but scientific, as well as philosophic, method demands that we must seek the meaning of Nature in its highest, not its lowest, manifestations. No amount of study of the acorn will enable us to understand the oak; neither will knowledge of atoms, molecules, and ether help us to understand life in its highest development in the mind of man. In mind we have the key to the Cosmos. The fact that we understand Nature shows that between it and the mind there is a rational and intelligible connection, that in a word they are both manifestations of one fundamental principle. In the words of the late Professor Pfeiderer, "the two have their root in a divine thinking, in a creative Reason, which manifests itself partly in the real world, and partly in the thinking of our understanding, as it copies that order." And so in the end we come back to the truth which inspires the poetry of Goethe, and our own Wordsworth, that Nature and the mind find their unity in an all-embracing Spiritual Being, who is the inner soul of all things. In his highest poetic mood Wordsworth anticipates the latest conclusion of religion, philosophy, and science, with regard to the Cosmos. As Wordsworth expresses it:—

"To every form of being is assigned
An active principle: Howe'er removed
From sense and observation, it subsists
In all things, in all natures. . . .
No chasm, no solitude; from link to link
It circulates, the Soul of all the Worlds."

V.

How does man stand related to the "Soul of all the Worlds"? In the material universe, according to science, there is no such thing as isolated phenomena; all forms of existence are dynamically related. In that case between the "Soul of all the Worlds" and the mind of man there must be affinity. Here, too, Wordsworth anticipates modern religious and scientific thought when he declares that the external world is in correspondence with the mind, which, moreover, responds to the great fundamental facts of life, truth, goodness, beauty, love, faith, and hope. According to Wordsworth, we are not condemned to worship, as Huxley has it, at the altar of the unknowable; "we live by Admiration, Hope, and Love, and even as these are well and wisely fixed in dignity of being we ascend." In Goethe's poems, too, we find vivid expression of the conception of the oneness of Nature. What is the science of to-day but a confirmation of the sublime utterance of Goethe, with its piercing insight into the unity of things?

"As all Nature's thousand changes
But one changeless God proclaims,
So in Art's wide Kingdom ranges
One sole meaning still the same;
This is Truth, Eternal Reason,
Which from Beauty takes its dress;
And serene through time and season,
Stand for aye in loveliness."

THE MONTESSORI METHOD

I.

THE publication of an English version of Dr. Maria Montessori's exposition of the "Montessori Method" is an event of no little moment to all English-speaking people interested in pedagogy and parental responsibilities. To few has fallen the distinction of attaching their name to a new departure in pedagogical method, and, as Professor Henry W. Holmes, of Harvard, remarks in a thoughtful Introduction to Dr. Montessori's work, "We have no other example of an educational system—original at least in its systematic wholeness and in its practical application—worked out and inaugurated by the feminine mind and hand." In the English edition ("The Montessori Method," translated from the Italian by Anne E. George. Wm. Heinemann) Dr. Montessori has revised and supplemented in the light of further experience her volume, "Il Metodo della Pedagogia Scientifica applicato all' Educazione infantile nelle Case dei Bambini"—a book which no reader can study without conceiving the highest admiration for both the woman and her work.

II.

Maria Montessori is an Italian lady, a Doctor of Medicine, an earnest student of psychology, pedagogy and anthropology, an experienced teacher, and, above all, a sympathetic and understanding friend of children. Her method is the product of womanly insight, combined with untiring research and intelligent experiment. Her preparatory course was deliberate and thorough. Fifteen years ago, as assistant doctor at the Psychiatric Clinic of the University of Rome, she began to take a deep interest in the idiot children at the asylums she had occasion to visit. A study of children's diseases involved a study of "pedagogical treatment" for defective children, and the works, in particular, of Edward Séguin (published 1846 and 1866) inspired Dr. Montessori to devise a scientific system of education for feeble-minded children. Under the Italian Education Department Dr. Montessori was for some years engaged in teaching deficient children and training others to do the same. After devouring the literature of her subject, travelling in Europe to observe modern methods, and registering as a student of philosophy at the University to acquire a knowledge of normal pedagogy, Dr. Montessori proceeded to make researches in pedagogic anthropology in Rome. At length, in 1906, she was invited to organise infant schools in the model tenements established in Rome by Signor Edoardo Talamo. Hence arose the Casa dei Bambini ("the Children's House"), where Dr. Montessori's methods have been applied and developed in the education of children of from three to seven years of age.

III.

Under Dr. Montessori's training, defective children had succeeded in passing the same examinations as ordinary children—an achievement which encouraged their teacher to apply the same methods to normal children under school-going age. The results recorded are amazing. "Children of four years, after they have been in school for two months and a half, can write any word from dictation, and can pass to writing with ink in a note-book." "Some of our children have begun to write at the age of 3½." "Almost all of the normal children treated with our method begin to write at four years, and at five know how to read and write at least as well as children who have finished the first elementary." Nor is this all. The children have all their senses trained and perfected; they learn how to work in house and garden; their physical development is cared for and encouraged; they learn to move gracefully and properly, and to understand the reason for such deportment; they learn self-discipline from their tenderest years. And, be it added, the children with whom Dr. Montessori has had to deal are mostly the offspring of poor parents, whose mothers leave them during the day and go out to work.

IV.

How is it done? For a complete answer the reader must turn for himself to Dr. Montessori's fascinating book. Here we can only mention a few of her guiding principles and methods. Spontaneity is the keynote of the Montessori method. She expels the teacher from the schoolroom and instals a "directress" in her place. The function of the directress is to interfere as little as possible and observe as much as possible. She must be something of an experimental psychologist. The child must be allowed and enabled to educate himself. Dr. Montessori reproduces in her book a letter written in ink in well-nigh copperplate writing, the work of a child of five! How far the Montessori method is capable of general application in our school system must be left for educationists to determine, but all who have the interests of children at heart—and who hasn't?—must welcome a system of auto-education so enlightened, so pleasing, and so fruitful.

SWEDENBORG: THE SAVANT AND THE SEER

* * *

BY J. HOWARD SPALDING

PART II.

DURING the three years which elapsed between the opening of Swedenborg's spiritual senses and his beginning to write the "Arcana Coelestia," his ideas on spiritual, and even natural, subjects underwent a complete revolution. Everyone who accepts his teaching has, unless he has been instructed in it from childhood, to undergo a similar change; and it is usually a long, and sometimes a painful, process, for we love our mental children, and part from them with reluctance.

Swedenborg believed that he had himself been divinely instructed in the truths he was commissioned to proclaim. He never speaks in the dubious tone of one who has formed conclusions which he believes to be well founded, but which he recognises as being merely his own opinions. He speaks as one who knows. Yet he never asks us to accept his teaching on his mere dictum. The whole aim of the unique experiences to which he was subjected was that spiritual truths, even the most profound, might be rationally understood and, consequently, rationally obeyed.

It is impossible within the limits of this article to give even an imperfect sketch of the new outlook on the universe involved in Swedenborg's teaching, except in the form of bare statements more dogmatic in appearance than Swedenborg's own.

Love is the most real and substantial thing in the universe. It is, indeed, the Ultimate Reality,* because it is the very substance of God. But love, even Divine Love, would be powerless unless it were united with wisdom, just as man's will would be totally inoperative unless it manifested itself in some mode of thought, and was thus directed to definite ends. God is infinite Love and Wisdom, and therefore He is divinely Human, for love and wisdom do not exist as abstractions, but in some substantial, organic form, as all sensations do, and that form is the human. The more of genuine, unselfish love and the more of true wisdom a man possesses, the more he is a man, because the more he is like God.

But love and wisdom united would be futile imaginations did they not ultimate themselves in uses, by which they fulfil and complete themselves in beneficent action. Infinite Love, Wisdom, and Power, expressed in the production of unending and everlasting uses, are one aspect of that Divine Tri-unity which creates everything that exists into a trinal form. Finite man becomes an image and likeness of the Divine Man just so far as he is an embodiment of love, wisdom, and use. But his humanity is derivative; the Divine Human is eternal and self-existent.

God created the universe because He is infinite Love, Wisdom, and Use. For love desires to give whatever it possesses to others, and the divine Love can only be communicated to beings who are capable of receiving it consciously and willingly. It is impossible for any finite being on earth or in heaven to generate love and wisdom from himself. If he could, he would be able to create, which is an attribute of Deity. All love and wisdom, and therefore all life, flow into him through various channels from the one Divine Source; but this inflowing Life is manifested in each finite thing, whether animate or inanimate, according to its own nature or interior form, just as the light and heat which radiate from the sun of our world produce all the varieties of colour, growth, and other phenomena displayed by the animal and vegetable kingdoms.

* An able discussion of this subject by Prof. Hite, of Cambridge, Mass., will be found in the Transactions of the Swedenborg Congress, 1910, published by the Swedenborg Society.

The universe is maintained in being by a perpetual act of creative power as real as that which first called it into existence. The order of nature is nothing but a constant expression of the will of God.

The sole purpose of creation is that by means of the physical universe men may be brought into existence, and, after their brief sojourn on earth, pass into the spiritual world, where they live for ever—not in virtue of any power inherent in themselves, but because that Divine Love which called them into existence and sustained them every moment will never cease to sustain them, for it is inexhaustible and unchangeable. There are no inhabitants of the spiritual world who have not been born on this or some other planet.

The spiritual world consists of three great divisions, Heaven, Hell, and the World of Spirits—the latter a place or state intermediate between the other two, where influences from both the others meet. It is in this intermediate state that man lives as a spiritual being, though unconsciously, during his life on earth. All the influences for good which affect him come from Heaven, and all the impulses to evil from Hell. These influences are constantly equilibrated by Divine Providence in order that he may be left in freedom to comply with the one solicitation or the other, as he chooses, and may be led to choose rightly. The Divine Providence, in all its ordering of man's life, has regard to eternal ends, and not to the gratification of his natural desires. The measure in which this control accomplishes the intended end depends on the man himself, that is, on the exercise of his own free choice. He stands in the midst of the influences which act upon him, and is arbiter of his fate.

Religion, as conceived by Swedenborg, is not merely an indispensable adjunct to the life of man, but its very soul. It should govern all his desires, thoughts, and actions. Not that it is necessary or wise to be always thinking about religious subjects, for this may easily lead to morbid states of mind. True religion requires that a man should engage in the affairs of the world, and thus lead a life of active usefulness. His daily occupations, in his business and in his home, are the great field not only for the exercise but for the acquirement of true religion. "All religion," he says, "is a matter of life"; which means that a man has as much religion as he shows in his life, and no more.

The criterion which decides a man's final destiny in the eternal world is whether he possesses a genuine conscience or not. If he does, he, at last, after the necessary preparation which is provided in the world of spirits, enters Heaven. If he has not conscience, he cannot enter Heaven, for conscience is the very plane into which the Lord operates, and by which He guides man in perfect freedom. A conscienceless man necessarily goes to Hell, which is a provision of the Divine mercy for those to whom Heaven would be unendurable. Its inhabitants are kept from outrages against each other by such self-regarding motives as can influence them; by severe and protracted punishments when these are necessary for the maintenance of order. For order reigns even in Hell. It would be a place and state of incomparably greater suffering than it is were it otherwise. But there is no purposeless suffering there; no punishment, even, inflicted for misdeeds committed during life on earth, but only for misdeeds done there.

A genuine conscience, which means a confirmed preference for good rather than evil, truth rather than falsity, the welfare of others rather than the satisfaction of one's own selfish desires, can be acquired only by shunning evils as sins against God. Men may and do shun evils from many other motives, but this alone forms conscience in man, because it attacks evils in their very seat, the man's own affections. The final value of conscience is that it renders it possible for the Lord to keep the natural evils of the man who possesses it in subjection, in the other life, without infringing his freedom. The angels are no more free from hereditary and acquired tendencies to evil than men on earth are; but "it is heaven to them," Swedenborg says, "to be withheld from the influence of their selfhood," which is the source of all evil.

Anyone who knows that there are evils which his religion condemns, and who shuns them for that reason, acquires conscience, even though his conceptions of right and wrong are very imperfect, or even erroneous; for he thus acquires a love of truth for its own sake which enables him to assimilate easily the instruction which is provided in the other life for all who are willing to receive it. Indeed, Swedenborg testifies that in his day more from the Gentile than the Christian nations were found to be fitted for life in heaven, for the former lived much more faithfully according to their religious convictions than the latter.

Swedenborg affirms all the great doctrines of Christianity, but in a form so modified that it amounts to a complete reconstruction; but into this field it is impossible to follow him here. Christianity, in his view, was not only the one true religion, but the universal religion, embracing in its ample fold all forms of sincere religion which have for their end the amendment of men's lives. For the two fundamental factors of all religion are these—thinking of God as a Divine Man, and shunning evils as sins. Everyone who thinks affirmatively about God at all thinks in this way, for he cannot think in any other. Everyone to whom religion is a reality acts in this way, to the best of his knowledge and ability, and this suffices; "for the Lord requires of no man more than that he should live according to what he knows."

Those who wish for further information about Swedenborg's life and teaching would do well to peruse an admirable sketch, "Swedenborg: the Savant and the Seer," by Prof. Sir W. F. Barrett, F.R.S. (Watkins). My acknowledgments are due to the Professor for permission to use his title as a heading for these articles. Fuller information will be found in the late Mr. Trowbridge's Life of Swedenborg (Warne). A little book of extracts, compiled by the author, and entitled "Golden Thoughts from Swedenborg" (Harrap), gives a brief view of his teaching in his own words.

MR. NORMAN ANGELL ON THE BALKAN CRISIS*

TWO things are remarkable in this reply of the author of "The Great Illusion" to his most recent critics: that it should have been necessary to say so much,

* "Peace Theories and the Balkan War." By Norman Angell.
18. (Horace Marshall.)

and yet to leave so much unsaid. Excessive space seems to have been given to the removal of obvious misconceptions: too little to frontal attacks on the militarist position, as seen in the light of recent events. Rightly regarded, the Balkan War is not the débâcle, but the triumph of the New Pacifism. This view emerges when we turn from the acts of the combatants, about which the critics say much, to the attitude of the Great Powers, of which they have said nothing. What was the accepted militarist doctrine up to the very day on which this war broke out? That any further dismemberment of the Turkish Empire, more especially a sudden and violent dismemberment, would mean Armageddon, and Europe would become a vast and bloody battlefield, on which the Great Powers would satiate their eager desire to fly at one another's throats. Dismemberment has happened, as violent, sudden, and extensive as the upholders of these precious doctrines could desire; yet Armageddon seems no nearer than before. The political sky is not yet fully serene; but the attitude of the Great Powers has throughout been steadily pacific, and we are nearer to-day than for centuries past to a united Europe. If any distinction is to be drawn, it is that those whose commerce was the greatest were the foremost to strive for peace. From the outset the only doubt was whether certain of these great nations might not be inclined to put their territorial ambitions before their commercial interests, which, though considerable, were not of the first magnitude. Yet, even in their case, the unseen economic forces prevailed; and, with the concession of autonomy to Albania and access to the Adriatic accorded to Servia, the peace of Europe, so far as it lies on the knees of the Great Powers, seems absolutely assured. Has political theory ever before met with such sudden and signal success as this derided doctrine of the New Pacifism? Yet of all this, perhaps because Mr. Angell wrote at an early period of the war, we find hardly anything in the present pamphlet. It is devoted, for the most part, to removal of misconceptions into which no one who had read the author's previous works with ordinary attention should easily have fallen. For what was their central thesis? That under modern conditions of industry and finance, commerce is the supreme of the material interests of nations, and peace the supreme interest of commerce, and that all are interconnected by strong, if sometimes invisible, threads of credit and trade, of which war is the arch-disruptionist. The doctrine does not apply where this economic nexus is non-existent, and is weakened where it is imperfect. It prevails in the case of the Great Powers, who stand breast-high in the main stream of European commerce; less fully in the case of the Balkan States, who are only on its brink. Above all—and this is the point on which Mr. Angell strenuously insists—it applies only to offensive wars. Wars of defence are wars waged to secure peace, and thus promote the interests of commerce. The recent upheaval in the Balkan States is but the latest example of the rising of oppressed peoples to end an intolerable tyranny, which, though misnamed "peace," was really lingering war, and its results will depend on the extent to which the victors carry out the principles for which the struggle has been waged. They "have now brought to an end a system of rule based on the accident of force." Whether good or ill comes of the war will depend on whether they act on pacifist principles, or simply attempt to restart the old Turkish régime under a new name. Let us hope with Mr. Angell that they will take the former and better course.

H. H. O'FARRELL, F.R.E.S.

CHRISSY AT THE LODGE * * * BY JANE BARLOW

TOWARDS noon of a blustery late-autumn day Christina Nolan, commonly called Chrissy at the Lodge, was on her way home after fetching herself a cabbage from the kitchen-garden. It was the only part of the grounds kept up at all since the Family's departure twenty years since, and it was so, merely because Peter Walsh, of Baskin Farm, had rented it to sell the fruit and vegetables. Though he made her welcome to as much cabbage as she wanted, she said bitterly: "Cock him up to be meddling in here"; and she availed herself of the permission as seldom as possible. But with just an old-age pension, and a dwelling rent free, between her and destitution, the pinch of sheer want might follow the loss of a sixpence; and this had befallen her to-day. Hence she now carried a fine, crinkled head resentfully under her fluttering shawl.

She was a frail little old woman, bent partly by rheumatism and partly by dejection, so that she looked less than her real size and more than her real age, albeit well over seventy. Pattering down the grass-grown avenue, she was full of regrets, which sprang from her root-grief, the absence of the Family. It was a poor case, she lamented, to see Connor's Court with ne'er a Connor in it, nor like to be. Much chance there was, and they out of it better than twenty year. Sure, poor Master Hugh himself, supposing he was alive yet at all, must be a very ould, feeble man by now. This was an exaggerated view, as the beginning of the score had found him a sturdy lad of fifteen.

Almost at the entrance gate, she was just turning into the path to her tumble-down lodge, when a youngish man ran in off the road, and approached, shouting: "Is this the gate of Connor's Court, ma'am?" He was a stranger, and looked "none too respectable," in Chrissy's opinion. She replied stiffly: "The back gate it is, and the back avenue."

"Oh, the back avenue," said he.

"Did you say it any better than I?" Chrissy inquired, sarcastically. Then pride and querulousness led her to continue: "But small blame to it if it looks like an ould cart-track these times, with sorra a living crathur working on it. I mind when three—"

"I suppose it's the shortest road up to the house, anyway," the stranger interrupted, without listening. He seemed flurried.

"If you had any business up there itself, you'd find nobody in it," said Chrissy, "for Hogan the caretaker's off with himself to Derryconrath fair, and won't be back to-night, drunk or sober." But the stranger was already running back to the gate, where she saw him join a man and a woman, who were waiting outside. "Quare bolting in and out of other people's places you have, me fine gentleman," Chrissy said, glowering after him, "and no fear of anybody troubling you to stop." And she went between overgrown laurel-boughs, gloomily, indoors.

Her day passed in lonesome monotony, bringing no sight of another fellow-creature. The remoteness of her residence would have discouraged callers, even if a habit of harsh thinking and plain speaking had not made Chrissy at the Lodge unpopular among her neighbours. After sunset she went out to pick up sticks in the shrubbery, more from bored restlessness than because she needed them. Rain was falling heavily, yet few drops pierced the matted evergreen roof, and she limped on quite a long way through the gathering dusk. But when she reached the junction of her path with the avenue, she stopped abruptly, startled by a voice. So deep were the shadows by this time that she could hardly descry its owner; however, she recognised it as that of the man who had questioned her in the morning. He was standing in the avenue, calling to someone whose steps splashed towards him: "Is that yourself, Jim? What kep' you till now? Sure you might have been there and back hopping on one toe. Raging they are up above."

"They may rage," was Jim's gruff answer. "Is Himself come?"

"Half an hour ago, by the front entrance. Come along with you now, and we'll get in through the house-yard. They're waiting for them contraptions you have. 'Tis uncommon handy, to be sure, that Hogan taking himself off."

While the two voices died away into the windy darkness, old Chrissy stood still, nothing short of horror-stricken. For she was instantly seized by the conviction that these intruders formed part of a gang who were about to commit a burglary up at the House. What else would bring them there at that hour? Breaking in they'd be, and plundering all before them: every stick the Family had left to their name. She remembered hearing tell that some of the painted pictures on the walls were worth a power of money. After them the miscreants would be, as sure as fate. But the worst of it was that she herself had no doubt given them valuable aid by her information about Hogan's absence. "As good as bidding them walk in it was," she confessed, "when, if I'd had the wit of a dotting owl, terrifying that villain I'd have been with talk of wicked mastiff dogs, and watchmen, and all manner. Bad luck to me gabbing tongue—as little-good-for I am as Hogan himself. . . . I declare now, if I done right, I'd step after them, and see what they're at, I would so. Then I could get out the front way unbeknownst—unless it's killing me they were—and warn the pólís. Or maybe I might frighten them off meself. I'd a right to try it, and that's what I'll do."

Nevertheless it was what she did not do while several minutes passed. The undertaking seemed indeed very formidable. She was still a long step from the House; wind and rain were furious and drenching; above all, she intensely desired to slip back down the shrubbery, and barricade herself indoors, where she could pray for protection from murdering villains and thieves of the world. Against this instinct, however, other feelings vehemently strove; as when at last she said to herself: "'Tis poor Master Hugh they'd be robbing, I believe, and he belike none too well off. A dale the Family lost one time. I always had a great wish for poor Master Hugh. . . . I'll go," she said aloud, "in the name of God."

It was easier said than done in the face of the storm which met her on the long, bleak avenue. Perhaps the physical struggle helped her on, by diverting her mind from the perils of her goal. Sometimes she propped her courage by devising ferocious threats and denunciations wherewith to overawe the house-breakers, should she encounter them. She had most confidence in telling them how "Ould Sir Denis did be walking yet about the passages, letting woeful groans. If that didn't put their hearts across, it was hard to say what would."

Under a blinding downpour she came to the wide gravel sweep before the house, and had an impression of gleams from the windows, but could not raise her head in its flapping shawl to make sure. Strong blasts nearly took her off her feet, driving her into sudden short trots, such as a successful cat allows a doomed mouse. One of them brought her to the steps of the portico, where she stumbled into the shelter of a pillar, and at that moment a wonderful thing happened. The heavy oak house-door was thrown back by a groom, who ran out, leaving it open behind him, and through it came what seemed to Chrissy an astonishing blaze of light. All about the hall lamps and candles were burning with profuse brilliancy, which drew her like a fascinated, half-drowned moth, until she stood on the threshold peering in. Two or three servants were busily astir, and in one of them she recognised, despite his livery and remarkably genteeler deportment, the man who had first roused her suspicions.

Next came the crowning marvel. For she saw crossing the hall a tall gentleman dressed in beautiful evening black and white, a grand, grown-up gentleman, yet so like the schoolboy of her cherished recollections that before she knew she had called shrilly: "Glory be to God, Master Hugh, and is it yourself?"

"And I give you me word," she used to relate, "he remembered me every iotum as well as I did him. To be sure he left me an ould woman, the way he wouldn't notice more differ, after a great while itself, than there is in a rusty gate, that's the same thing ever, only a trifle shabbier. And he come over to shake hands with me, and said he was glad to see me again."

Chrissy enjoyed only a brief interview, as wife and dinner waiting obliged him to conclude quickly with: "Well, Chrissy, I'll see you to-morrow, and somebody must get you a cup of tea." But she was entirely satisfied, not to say enraptured, and her felicity eftsoon received a finishing touch, when she became aware that a little boy had begun to jump methodically over each white square of the chessboard-patterned marble floor, exactly as she had seen Master Hugh do at the same age. "If he belongs to His Honour there, he's the living moral of his father," she said to her acquaintance, the footman, who had drawn near to observe this dripping friend of the Family.

"Aye, indeed," he said, "and in bed he ought to be."

"Are they staying here?" Chrissy enquired with anxious eyes.

"So I understand," he said. "Sir Hugh's come into a fine fortune, and is intending to carry out all sorts of renovations. They're wanted bedad. Some of us should by rights have been in it a week ago to make arrangements, but the wires went wrong, and we never got word till last night. Run off our legs, we are, trying to get the place a bit regulated."

"Och, grand it is," said Chrissy, "and good-night to you kindly."

She set off homeward on her dark and stormy way in a species of blissful trance, impervious to the roughest weather. The wind roared through the trees till their straining branches loudly creaked; but she only heard a sound of many rakes and hoes grating on the neglected avenue, which had so long grieved her as a symbol of evil days. Now they were ended, and she felt herself a whole generation younger, in a world grown at once old and new. "There'll be people driving in and out," she mused, "and coming and going, like the good times over again. And 'twill be quare if I can't contrive a griddle-cake to entice the little gentleman. Master Hugh was powerful fond of griddle-cakes; troth, he'd have one part ate while you'd be buttering him the other. 'Tis the lucky day for Connor's Court."

When she was safely indoors, and had stirred up her smouldering turf-sod to warm and dry herself, she found that her adventures had made her rather hungry; so she set about heating what remained over from her dinner of greens. As she watched them beginning to steam, another happy forecast occurred to her. "Peter Walsh will be apt to have to find somewhere else for to grow his ould pitaties and cabbages in," she reflected. "Aye, will he, himself and his impidence." And as she lifted the pot off the fire: "Cock him up!" she added with very ungrateful glee.

RUSSIA *

THE publication of this book is a grievous mistake. The first edition appeared in 1877, and gave an admirably truthful and vivid picture of the Empire of the Czars, immediately after the emancipation of the serfs—probably the greatest social revolution peacefully achieved in the modern world.

For twenty-five years, Wallace's masterpiece remained the classical treatise on the subject. It held in England the unique position which Leroy Beaulieu still holds on the Continent.

The fact that such an exhaustive account on a great contemporary people did not become obsolete after a quarter of a century, proved both the intrinsic merits of the work and the slowness of Russian advance. But since the beginning of the twentieth century autocratic Russia underwent a rapid and drastic transformation. The Russo-Japanese war, the Revolution of 1905, the establishment of representative Government, marked a new era. In the face of those revolutionary changes, there were only two courses open to the author. He might either republish the old book with a commentary and marginal notes, and such a combination of the old and the new would have made a most instructive and stimulating work. Failing such a republication, the author ought to have given us an entirely new work. Instead of following either of the above courses, Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace has followed a third course. He has partly rewritten the work of his maturity. By doing so he has taken the worst possible alternative. He has tried to pour new Russian wine into the old bottles. Not only has he spoiled a masterpiece, but in his desire to change as little as possible in the first edition, he has minimised the far-reaching changes which have been transforming the country. It is true that in the last hundred pages of the new edition he gives us an interesting summary of recent political events, but he tells us little of the social and spiritual conflicts, of the breaking up of the old land system, and of the peasant community, of the movement within the Orthodox Church, of the universal racial fermentation. It is necessary, therefore, to guard the reader against being misled by the deserved prestige of the eminent publicist, and against accepting this third and last edition of this old classic as a true account of the Russian Empire at the beginning of a new era.

* "Russia." By Sir D. Mackenzie Wallace. (Cassell.)

AN ETON EDUCATION BY

MGR. R. H. BENSON PART II.—RELIGION

I.

ACADEMIC religion can be, as every University man knows, a very beautiful thing. It is impossible for anyone who has ever been present, say, at evening prayer in the chapel of King's College, Cambridge, or of Magdalen, Oxford, ever quite to forget the experience. The glory of the buildings, the dignity of the service, the incomparable English, the amazing beauty of the music—all these things, combined together in the grave, academic atmosphere, unite to produce a very exceptional effect. This is true in a lesser degree of Eton College Chapel. None of the details, perhaps, is as perfect as in the homes of her elder sisters; nor is so much money spent upon music; the liturgy is not, usually, completely rendered; the building is not so sublime. Yet it must be allowed that every Etonian, looking back upon his school life, remembers, with a particular sense of tenderness and beauty, the Sunday evening services of the chapel; even though he may feel, as strongly as I myself do, the singular failure of Eton religion to affect his life, whether in faith or morals. Somehow or another, religion at Eton (more especially so far as the chapel is concerned) fails to do that which is one of the principal functions of faith and worship.

One reason for this failure is, no doubt, irremediable—viz.: the absence of clear, dogmatic teaching. It is a characteristic of the Church of England (some think it her glory) to refrain from official dogmatism. She permits dogmatically minded men to minister in her name; she tolerates the Ritualist on the one side and the Evangelical on the other; but, so far as her living voice is concerned, she refuses to identify herself with either party. And Eton, as a completely English institution, is devotedly representative of this attitude: she does not lend herself to the violent conversion-methods of Evangelical schools, nor to the more or less Catholic methods and doctrines of the Woodard schools. She strives to be truly impartial and comprehensive, and the inevitable result is, of course, that she does not teach dogmas dogmatically. I can vaguely remember plenty of sermons at Eton dealing generally with morals and good behaviour: I cannot remember one that elucidated a clear-cut doctrine. The result is, of course, that such definite motives as dogma alone can supply (and these are very considerable, even in the minds of children) are lacking in her religious system as promulgated in her chapel.

II.

Other religious forces at Eton are as follows:—

There are, first, besides the short morning service in chapel, prayers in each house, conducted by the master every evening; these are reverently and carefully rendered, and sometimes enlivened by a hymn. There are, next, the recently introduced services of preparation for Communion—a most excellent innovation, unknown in my day—voluntary services, conducted by some clerical master in "Lower Chapel"; and there is, thirdly, the preparation for Confirmation—a series of classes or interviews, held by nearly every tutor before the annual Confirmation takes place. Even laymen undertake these instructions in many instances; other lay tutors, either from diffidence, or from doubtfulness as to their own orthodoxy, hand over their pupils to some clerical confrère. These form, roughly speaking, the religious provisions of the school; but I suppose they are supplemented to some very small degree by individual efforts made by certain masters on behalf of certain boys. For myself, however, I never experienced anything of the kind.

III.

Now the supreme failure of Eton religion to affect life rises, I think, largely from a cause parallel to that which lies at the root of her failure to educate—viz.: an absence of individual treatment or classification. Just as a boy does not become educated merely by sitting in form and going through a prescribed routine of the kind previously described, so a boy does not become religious (I do not mean religious) by listening to a beautifully sung service, by attending prayers in his house, or even by going to voluntary services of preparation for Communion. Unless in some manner or another the particular temperament of his soul is dealt with, unless he has some confidant (again, I do not say, or mean, confessor) whom he can consult about his interior troubles when occasion arises, I do not see how religion can be to him more than a formality. In Catholic schools, and in Evangelical, his need is abundantly met. In the Catholic school the boy has his confessor, a priest learned in the science of souls, to whom he can speak naturally and freely and with utter confidence in his discretion; in many Evangelical schools a parallel system is supplied, though scarcely, I venture to think, with the same safeguards. In the Woodard schools provision is made, in the person of the school-chaplain, a cleric who has no disciplinary or scholastic duties, in a manner closely resembling that of Catholic schools. But at Eton, so far as my own experience goes, there is absolutely no provision of the sort. Of course, a boy would be kindly received, and his confidence respected, should he approach any master for such a purpose; and, no doubt, such things occasionally happen; yet the system is unrecognised as a system: and it would require considerable courage, whether of despair or hope, before the boy would do such a thing on his own responsibility. The exceptional boy, no doubt, would do so (just as in education the exceptional boy can become a brilliant scholar with the help that Eton gives him); but the average boy—the ordinary, shy, diffident, unimaginative creature, who does all things by routine and convention—would be aghast at such a thought. He would scarcely think it good form. And it is, therefore, the average boy at Eton who is apt to make such a terrible mess of his religious and moral life.

IV.

Now, it might appear that the system of preparation for Confirmation might exactly meet this need. It might, partly, for a few weeks certainly; but it does not. I remember faintly my own experience, and, from my comparison of notes with others, I gather that it is typical. About six times I attended in my tutor's room, and was talked to about my responsibilities and privileges, in a perfectly kind, authoritative and academic manner. One single personal touch was given by a sudden, embarrassing question as to whether there was any particular difficulty in my life I would like to discuss. I suppose that I really had about twenty or thirty "difficulties"—matters; that is

(Continued on page 376.)

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.

SUCCESS OF THE ALABONE TREATMENT.

DURING the last twelve months methods for the cure of consumption have been placed more prominently before the public than in any previous epoch of the world's history. More especially has this been so in the case of sanatoria, but, unfortunately, statistics which have been put forward by these institutions purposely to show their curative value have, on analysis by the most distinguished men, been declared erroneous and misleading.

There is, however, a book, the forty-eighth edition of which has just been issued, which from cover to cover is full of highly valuable information, in addition to which it offers the chance of cure to those who are unfortunately afflicted with this disease. It is entitled, "The Cure of Consumption," and written by Dr. Edwin W. Alabone, of Highbury Quadrant, London, who for more than forty years has made a speciality of consumption, and has probably had more cases pass through his hands than any other living physician. His treatment, known over the world as "The Alabone Treatment," has been instrumental in restoring to perfect health some thousands of cases, a very large percentage of which had been pronounced utterly hopeless by our leading chest specialists, whilst others had been sent home from sanatoria to die. There can be no manner of doubt as to the bona-fides of these cases, seeing that they are attested to by many well-known physicians, divines, and men of the highest standing in the world of literature and art. Moreover, a considerable number of cures reported are those of medical men themselves, who had been compelled to relinquish their practice, but who, after adopting this treatment, were enabled to resume their work, they being permanently cured. The same can be said of members of the legal and other professions. The late Bishop of Gloucester, Dr. Parker, and many others of the clergy were strong supporters of Dr. Alabone's method, and did all in their power to get it universally adopted, having seen case after case recover. Dr. Alabone himself made a most generous offer to the Brompton Hospital, which, for some unknown reason, was rejected, thousands of the poorer class of sufferers thereby being debarred the chance of cure which might have been placed at their disposal. It seems incredible, but the fact remains.

The mere recital of the testimonies of a vast number of sufferers who have been restored to perfect health does not, however, with many persons bring conviction. It may, therefore, be well to place before the public the actual and spontaneous testimony of some of these cases. In doing so, we would first mention the cases of physicians themselves, and from an immense number of such we quote the following:

"Sir,—It is my honest opinion that no treatment—open air, medicinal, dietetic, or otherwise—is comparable to the inhalation treatment adopted by Dr. Alabone for the actual cure of consumption. I speak from experience in cases coming under my observation; and, for the sake of suffering humanity, I do think it a very great pity that Dr. Alabone's method does not find its way into all our hospitals and sanatoria where consumption is made a speciality.—Yours faithfully, —, M.D., L.R.C.P., etc."

Whilst Dr. L—, M.R.C.S.Eng., states:

"It having been my good fortune to meet several patients of Dr. Alabone's, I feel bound to add my testimony as to the success of his treatment, having proved it by personal observation of the changes effected in their appearance, and their gratifying statements made by their own free will. I have seen cases pronounced 'utterly incurable' by the highest chest specialists quite recover. I therefore feel it a duty to write, expressing my gratification and surprise at their recovery."

"Sir,—I have some thirty patients in all stages of phthisis undergoing Dr. Alabone's treatment—some very bad—so that I should not be surprised if I had lost one or two, but at present I have lost none. The improvement in them is most marked and surprising. I do not think there is any doubt of the efficacy of his treatment in stopping the advancement of the disease. It has in my hands been very successful in many cases.—I am, yours faithfully, W. F—, M.D., L.R.C.P., L.M. Edin."

It is satisfactory to be able to record the fact that a considerable number of physicians have adopted this treatment with their patients, and have obtained from it the most satisfactory results—results, we venture to affirm, which have been attained by no other system known. Boards of Guardians are also discussing the advisability of introducing it into their infirmaries, many having witnessed its extraordinary success with members of their own families.

Nurses at sanatoria and hospitals who were stricken down by phthisis, and who, after undergoing open-air treatment, were pronounced incurable, have been cured, and resumed their usual avocations. One of many such writes:

"In the summer of 1902 I utterly collapsed from over-work, and a rest failed to effect any improvement in my condition. In the autumn I was pronounced to be suffering from slight tuberculosis (sputum having been examined). At the recommendation of a physician I went to a well-known sanatorium to undergo the 'open-air' treatment, and during my stay there of two months, instead of in any way ameliorating my symptoms, they became rapidly worse, till in April, 1903, I was advised to return home by the physician in attendance at the sanatorium.

"On my return my condition was found to be as follows: A large cavity in my left lung, which was seriously involved in tubercular disease from apex to base, and my right lung was also considerably affected, and there certainly seemed no hope that I should recover.

"Hearing of similar cases that had been cured by Dr. Alabone, I was taken to Highbury to see him—so weak that I was hardly able to walk up the steps of his house, and, I must admit, expecting little or nothing from his treatment; but within a week I felt that I was deriving benefit, and hope once more revived, and this alone was worth a great deal. At the end of my stay at the sanatorium I had lost about 10 lb. in weight. This I gradually regained, and with it came returning strength; and, thoroughly persevering with the treatment, and carrying out all Dr. Alabone's other directions, I found every month a most decided improvement was manifest, till I am now as strong and well as I ever felt in my life.

"I have no shortness of breath, no cough, no expectoration, can walk long distances and run upstairs without fatigue; my voice, which was only a whisper, has returned, and I can indulge in my favourite occupation of singing; in fact, thank God, I am perfectly cured, and again able to undertake my work, which is of a very arduous nature."—A Professional Nurse.

Pages could be filled with similar letters, but these must convince the most sceptical that the statements brought forward by Dr. Alabone are undeniably genuine. Those who have any interest in the matter are recommended to procure a copy of his work, "The Cure of Consumption," and, after reading it, judge for themselves as to its value. They may, however, be perfectly sure that in placing themselves under this treatment they will be adopting the best chance of cure that can at present be offered.

"The Cure of Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, and Other Diseases of the Chest," by Edwin W. Alabone, M.D. Phil., D.Sc., ex-M.R.C.S. Eng., Lynton House, Highbury Quadrant, London, N. It is illustrated by numerous cases pronounced "incurable" by the most eminent physicians. Now in its 48th edition, 168th thousand, and can be obtained for 2s. 6d. post free. Other works by the same author: "Testimonies of Patients, with Comments on the Open-Air Treatment," price 1s.; "Infamous Conduct," price 6d.; "The Cure of Consumption is Suppressed," price 1s.; and "Facts Regarding the Open-Air Treatment," price 1s.

A FEW NOTABLE PUBLICATIONS.

A LIFE OF EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

With a Popular Exposition of his Philosophical and Theological Teaching. pp. 349.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 16 Full-page Illustrations, 2/6 net.

COMPENDIUM OF SWEDENBORG'S THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS.

Compiled by REV. S. M. WARREN.

With Portrait and Biographical Introduction. 8vo, cloth, 2/6.

THE SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury Street, W.C.

POPULAR EDITIONS OF SWEDENBORG'S WORKS. 6d.

THE TRUE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

Abridged.

HEAVEN AND HELL.

GOD, CREATION, MAN.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: His Life, Teachings, and Influence.

FREDK. WARNE & CO., Bedford St., Covent Garden, W.C.

SWEDENBORG: The Savant and the Seer.

By PROFESSOR SIR WM. BARRETT, F.R.S.

6d. net.

JOHN M. WATKINS, 21, Cecil Court, Charing Cross Rd., W.C.

HEAVEN AND HELL.

Everyman's Library Edition.

A New Translation by F. BAYLEY, M.A.

Cloth, 1/- net; leather, 2/- net.

DIVINE LOVE AND WISDOM.

With an Introduction by Sir OLIVER LODGE.

Everyman's Library Edition.

A New Translation by F. BAYLEY, M.A.

Cloth, 1/- net; leather, 2/- net.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., 10-13, Bedford Street, W.C.

GOLDEN THOUGHTS FROM SWEDENBORG.

Compiled by J. HOWARD SPALDING.

Illuminated paper cover, 1/- net; leather boxed, 1/6 net.

C. J. HARRAP & CO., 9, Portsmouth St., Kingsway, W.C.

to say, dogmatic, moral, and disciplinary, on which a confidential conversation, conducted under properly safeguarded circumstances, would have been of untold benefit to my interior attitude to life. But, of course, I said that "I didn't think I had any." Now my tutor was a clergyman of the highest character and attainments; he sincerely desired to be of service to me; he has since risen to great eminence, and is supposed to have a great knowledge of boys; yet never for one instant did it occur to me, even as a possibility, that I should confide in him. Of course, he would have respected my confidence; but how was I to know that? How could I possibly be certain—since I had not even an idea of any such thing as of relations between a priest and penitent, or between a director and a "spiritual" child—that he might not think it his duty himself to use any information I might give him, or at least offer hints to my parents that I might afterwards find embarrassing? For me to give him my real confidence there would have been needed either, in myself, a knowledge of him as of a "priest" whose lips were sealed, or, in him, that very rare gift, which only a very few persons possess, of laying aside entirely his official relation to me and assuming that of spiritual counsellor. The average boy submits to be talked to, either with others (as is often the custom) or alone. In neither case, except in rare instances, where either the boy is in desperate moral straits, or the tutor has a really "priestly" spirit, is there any real individual dealing at all. The affair is a kind of extra, "private," which must be borne with resignation, since without it that kind of spiritual coming-of-age (which Confirmation more or less represents) is impossible.

V.

It appears to me, then, that hardly any boys in the world fare so hardly, exactly at that age when plain advice and confidences are most necessary, than do those educated under such a system as prevails at Eton. Day schools, where there is no attempt at religious instruction, at any rate throw the responsibility upon the parents. Anglican schools, such as those of the Woodard foundation, Evangelical schools, and Catholic schools, all seriously attempt that individual dealing with souls without which there can be no reality of religion at all. But the Eton boy is practically left to himself, under conditions of the fiercest possible temptation, without even the help of clear, comprehensible dogma to keep him straight. Neither, even, are his emotions appealed to by forcible preaching. I can remember neither the text, nor the argument, nor the substance, nor a single illustration, nor one dogmatic statement, nor one effective appeal from any of the many sermons under which I sat. And yet the futile talk goes on, of the "thousand earnest young faces" turned up to the preacher, of the "beautiful, shadowy chapel," of the "exquisitely chanted psalms," of the "young, opening lives," and all the rest of it. And there is nothing at all underneath, except where here and there is a boy of definite religious convictions, or one who has had a sensible home-training in his faith, or, perhaps for a few moments, one that is roused by the artistic beauty of the service to make an emotional resolution or two. By all means let us have all the aid that art can give, all the colour and glow of music and beautiful words and clustering column and grouped lights. But let not those things, that are at the best emotional appeals to little more than religiosity, be forced to turn the wheels which serious individual dealings alone can effectively move.

(To be continued.)

CORRESPONDENCE

THE SINGLE TAX V. SHAW, BELLOC, AND G. K. CHESTERTON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Your correspondents Shaw, Belloc, and G. K. Chesterton do not seem to recognise the fact that the private ownership of land is the evil of our social state.

Shaw quarrels with capital, Chesterton with big estates and Belloc tells us that his bête noir is registration. I confess that the last-mentioned seems to have more feasible objection, because neither capital nor big estates are in themselves bad things. They both make for efficiency, and, everything else being equal, thus lessen the burden of human labour, which is a blessing and not a curse. Mr. Belloc advances "three solutions for the present unstable . . . organisation of industry." He favours a return to a well-divided ownership, most men owning capital and land. Now, how does Mr. Belloc propose to apply his remedy? With capital I have no quarrel; but most men owning land means that some men will own no land and will therefore be dependent on those who do. This condition is no better than slavery, for it matters not to a man whether he is the property of another, or another owns the source of wealth and life. He can exist only by complying with the exactions of the owner of the land, and so can never have that equality of opportunity to which the fact of his birth entitles him. Now, sir, I wish to point out to Mr. Belloc the only remedy, and the axioms have only to be understood to be admitted. The first is the equal right of all men to the bounty of nature; and the second is, what a man makes he owns.

The air we breathe, the heat of the sun, and the land we live on are the bounty of nature, and equally necessary to life. It may be advanced that someone has bought the land; but the buyer's title can never be better than the seller's, and who could possibly have the title to sell the land? Anyone may claim to have bought the air, but no one could sell it to him. It is absurd to suppose that anyone could own it or part of it, and it is equally absurd that anyone can rightfully own the land or part of it. "The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof," and as we are equal in His sight, we have an equal title to that which was made for all. It is not necessary to "divide up" the land, but to divide the rent which comes from the land. The other axiom, "That which a man makes he owns," is equally true if we admit the right of a man to own himself. Then his powers are his, and his labour, and that which his labour produces, to sell or to bequeath. Therefore, the whole of what he makes is his, and not only a part. Why, then, should a part of what he makes be taken by the landlord for the use of that which was made for all? It is the community who make the rental value of land, urban as well as rural; therefore, give to the community that which they have made, and take all taxes off industry, capital and improvements, and give free scope to labour, and all our present social problems vanish when the land monopoly is destroyed. Capitalism cannot crush the worker when the land is free.—I am, sir, etc.,

E. F. MACCLAFFERTY.

Methil, December 20th, 1912.

MR. H. G. WELLS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—There have now, I believe, appeared in EVERYMAN two articles on Mr. H. G. Wells. These I have, of course, read with great interest, as indeed I

A First-Class Piano
for 15 Guineas.

THE "MARVEL" PIANO

is a High-grade Instrument of perfect tone and quality, of handsome appearance, and is Delivered Free in Great Britain on receipt of cash, or, if preferred, on the first monthly payment of 10/6.

IN OAK, WALNUT OR EBONISED CASE.

GUARANTEED FOR TEN YEARS.

Many other Models at equally low prices.

FILL UP THIS COUPON AND POST TO-DAY.

Please send me a Copy of your New ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE of Pianos, Organs, etc., post free, and oblige

The Sunday School Union Piano and Organ Saloon, 56E. LUDGATE HILL, LONDON, E.C.

read all articles on this subject. But neither here nor elsewhere do I find attention called to a feature of Mr. Wells's novels which impresses me more and more as I read through his various works. I refer to the similarity in quality between this author's pathos and that of Dickens. I do not remember ever to have noticed a discussion of this point in any criticism hitherto published, but surely one has only to recollect such passages as the one which closes "The History of Mr. Polly," where that worthy, on "one of those evenings, serenely luminous," sits in profound philosophic conversation with the "fat woman":—

They said no more, but sat on in the warm twilight, until at last they could scarcely distinguish each other's faces. They were not so much thinking, as lost in a smooth, still quiet of the mind.

Surely this scene—and it is, of course, quite necessary to read through the whole of it in order to enter into the genuinely "dickensianness" of its emotional atmosphere—this scene is typical of Mr. Wells's pathos, and must recall many parts of Dickens's works. None could fail to be reminded of those passages of the latter author which are so charged (many think overcharged) with that peculiar setting of sweetness and love and reconciliation, of memories of a no longer bitter past, of wonderful peacefulness and restfulness, a restfulness only appreciated when virtue, no longer oppressed, has received its reward: a setting created by Dickens's characteristic sympathy, which, perhaps too tearful and tranquil altogether to please twentieth-century tastes, is certainly something of which we are again and again reminded as we read the works of this most modern of writers.

Only one other, and very obvious, point should I like to raise in connection with Mr. Curle's article, namely, the question of realism in the works of Mr. Wells. Consider such pieces as the description of the funeral in "Mr. Polly," of the life of assistant masters in "Love and Mr. Lewisham," of the home of Marion in "Tono-Bungay." No author with whom I am acquainted possesses an equal power of impressing on the mind of his reader the meanness, the dinginess, the sordidness of a scene. Here Wells differs essentially from Zola. While all must acknowledge the latter's immense power in picturing the seamy side of things, yet, for myself, I must say that Wells makes me feel and realise the squalor of these scenes of his in a far higher degree than does Zola on similar occasions. I think this is because, in viewing Wells's picture, I am certain that its author feels even more keenly about them and is more disgusted with them than we, his readers; while, in the case of Zola, I am far from sure that he did not actually delight in picturing the grime and filth of the back streets and mean houses that he describes with such relentless detail and (might one say?) with so much sympathy.—I am, sir, etc.,

G. R. BENSON.

1, Nunthorpe Avenue, York, Dec. 23rd, 1912.

CARLYLE'S "GOSPEL OF WORK."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Side by side, in your issue of December 20th, appear a poem consisting of three of the most inspired and inspiring verses on human endeavour which it has ever been my privilege to read, and—an article on "Life at High Pressure," concluding with these words: "Carlyle's gospel of work has had its day. The time is ripe for Spencer's gospel of leisure."

Now, so far from Carlyle's gospel of work having had its day, it is but to-day that its power and truth, which so gripped his disciples of a few decades ago, is making that gospel such a momentous force in modern life—whether recognised or not. So far from the time being ripe for Spencer's gospel of leisure, the time will have nothing to say to this or any other gospel of leisure. On the other hand, the time is big with possibilities and potentialities for any man who will strive with soul, or brain, or body to assist, by never so little, in lifting humanity to a higher plane.

The writer of the article in question cries out against mammon worship. So does Carlyle. He deprecates mere materialism. So does Carlyle. He has no sympathy for aiming only "at bread-and-butter results." Nor has Carlyle. Indeed, it is difficult to see what his quarrel with Carlyle is, unless it be with the latter's doctrine that "all true work is sacred; in all true work, were it but true hand labour, there is something of divineness."

"Labour," continues Carlyle, "wide as the Earth, has its summit in Heaven. Sweat of the brow; and up from that to sweat of the brain, sweat of the heart; which includes all Kepler calculations, Newton meditations, all Sciences, all spoken Epics, all acted Heroisms, Martyrdoms—up to that 'Agony of bloody sweat' which all men have called divine!" Verily, if we are to do away with "Carlyle's gospel of work," I fear that little will be left for the "life with leisure to be devoted to intellectual and moral ends" to feed itself upon!

In the face of sham, abuses, injustice, "mammonism," Carlyle fired his blunderbuss of stormy indignation. But it was between the ribs of leisured dilettantism that he thrust the stiletto of some of his keenest satire.—I am, sir, etc.,

R. W. COMPTON.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF SOCIALISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Chesterton says Socialism is dead. Mr. Shaw says it isn't. Mr. Chesterton says it is. That is the gist of the four weeks' controversy. The rest is sheer good humour. It is a splendid glorification of "Our noble selves—claw me, and I'll claw you." Mr. Shaw frankly and joyously crows, "What clever billies we both are," and he is quite right. The delighted spectator knows not which to admire most: the extraordinary agility of the heavy-weight or the amazing slogging powers of the feather-weight champion. But we are not much "forrarder," when all's done.

The fact is that, just as Liberals and Unionists are in reality both Plutocrats, so Mr. Chesterton and Mr. Shaw are both Sentimentalists, and the working man is helped no more by the sentimentalist than by the plutocrat. Whether his propensities are Arcadian or bog-trotting, what the worker wants is a decent wage and liberty to spend it as he likes; and that he won't get till he helps himself to it. As to the peasant state—tempting though it seems—I fear that, unless you added Swift's wished-for "six hundred pounds a year," with trimmings, a cartload of pig-iron would be about as welcome a gift as the three acres and a cow—to me, at any rate; I can't milk a cow.

Now every man pretends he would like to see the workman get a decent wage. How is it, then, he can't get it? Because it is assumed to be an axiom in economics, an inexorable law of logic, that a rise in wages means a proportionate rise in the cost of production. So it is, perhaps—if the capitalist is to maintain his position as "top-dog." But Logic can and, some day, will go a step further. It will say that the capitalist must simply not be allowed to pillage the consumer; he must be stopped from robbing Peter to pay Paul. To call a penny a shilling won't alter the bottom-dog's position one whit. That merely

(Continued on page 380.)

BUILD UP YOUR FORTUNE
FROM OIL

OIL
THE COMING MARKET FOR MONEY MAKING.

A WONDERFUL CHANCE IN A NEW OIL ISSUE.

£15,000 in 5% Income Certificates } FREE BONUS
AND } to "Everyman" £7,500 CASH ALLOWANCES } Readers.

In order to place before every reader the GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY of acquiring THESE

FREE BONUS SHARES

in a Successful Oil Company, arrangements have been made by a well-known firm of Bankers to distribute the above-mentioned £15,000 IN 5 Per Cent. INCOME CERTIFICATES and £7,500 IN CASH ALLOWANCES. These Certificates and Vouchers for Cash Allowances will be issued

IN STRICT ROTATION.

It is therefore important to REPLY AT ONCE if you intend to grasp this WONDERFUL CHANCE OF ACQUIRING SOMETHING FOR NOTHING, which will help you to invest in an OIL COMPANY owning a valuable OIL OUTPUT OF HUNDREDS OF TONS A MONTH and a further large acreage of valuable Oil Lands in which the leading experts' advice prove that the SHARES WILL RISE IN VALUE

HUNDREDS PER CENT.

In order that you may increase your income and add comfort to your life TAKE THIS EXCEPTIONAL AND ABSOLUTELY GENUINE FREE OFFER.

ALL YOU HAVE TO DO is to write your name and address plainly on a postcard, put a halfpenny stamp on it, and POST AT ONCE.

THERE IS NO LIABILITY ON YOUR PART WHATEVER.

This is an offer made to the thrifty saver, and is a CHANCE OF A LIFETIME. All the Bankers wish to do is to put before 100,000 people an Illustrated Prospectus of an OPPORTUNITY THAT WILL PRODUCE A FORTUNE.

If you receive no reply, you will understand that the whole of this wonderful CASH and BONUS OFFER has been over-applied for.

SO DON'T DELAY—APPLY AT ONCE.

HATTON MORRIS & CO., Bankers
(Dept. E.V.), Carlton House, Regent Street, London, S.W.

raises the struggle from the basement to the first, second, or top storey, if you like; the bottom-dog is always on the floor. Logic will (some day) bid the workman get on his feet and pin the top-dog to the ceiling: "There, you beggar, so far you're a-top; but now fork out, or I'll squeeze the life out of you."—I am, sir, etc.,
FELIX ELDERLY.

G. K. CHESTERTON AND BERNARD SHAW.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Chesterton's humorous reply to Mr. Shaw I have read with great interest; but can he be serious when he asserts that a peasant state will always be a peasant state? He surely knows that his ancestors and the ancestors of all the people who throng now the large cities and industrial centres of the whole world developed from apes into peasants, who formed peasant states; and that there is not a single industrial country in the whole world which has not developed from that state, and which, with the progress of civilisation, does not become more and more industrial.

I believe that most people in England would not be satisfied with spending their life in growing cabbages and eating them, even if they should be successful in growing sufficient for themselves on their small share of land. Unfortunately for Mr. Chesterton, the claims of a civilised nation are different from those of the Montenegrin or even Italian and Irish peasants, whose conditions of life only prove that they are still in a state from which we have evolved long ago. That they will follow us, and become industrial states, simultaneously with getting more civilised, of that there can be no doubt.

As regards Mr. Chesterton's remark that Socialism means only passing the capital and all its power over to the State, I beg to point out that, in the Socialistic state, where there would be no trade in the present sense, no production for profit, but only to satisfy the demands and needs of the community, and where everybody could get what his heart desired—by working for it—capital would soon find a peaceful death.—I am, sir, etc.,
GERHARD ARNOLD SCHMIDT.

Stoke-on-Trent, December 21st, 1912.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—After reading Mr. Belloc on the "Servile State," and the subsequent articles by Messrs. Chesterton and Shaw, I must confess I am still in the dark regarding a solution of the economic problem. Beyond being smart and amusing, the contributions of these writers have much in common with the usual essays of pet scheme promoters; Mr. Chesterton, at the gate of his ideal peasant proprietor, never tires singing his "Salve! dimora castæ pura," while Mr. Belloc resolutely overshadows our Mephistophelian Shaw and Socialism with his sombre catholic crucifix.

But neither Mr. Chesterton nor Mr. Belloc, in their enthusiasm for the peasant state, or a revived mediævalism, present any practical scheme to the masses whereby they might move in the direction of their economic emancipation: preaching an ideal peasant state, expatiating on the "good old days," or shouting through the megaphone, "Socialism! Socialism!" may be a very interesting pastime for smart people, but, in so far as the intelligent worker is concerned, 'tis so much prating full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.

I am convinced that this land question is at the bottom of all the social evils which afflict society. The question Messrs. Shaw, Belloc, and Chesterton have still to answer is, "How do you propose to free the source of life—i.e., land—from the grip of private monopoly?"—I am, sir, etc.,

ENGINEER'S LABOURER.

PEASANT PROPRIETORSHIP AND THE TESTAMENTARY LAW.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Doubtless like many other readers of your splendid paper, I have been deeply interested in the article on "Napoleon as a Socialist." One cannot help admiring Dr. Sarolea's able and lucid exposition of the Testamentary Law, but in the enumeration of its disadvantages, I think one vital omission has been made—at least in so far as Peasant Proprietorship is applicable to Great Britain.

I refer to the question of succession.

The Peasant Proprietor, belonging, as he emphatically does, to the labouring classes, is, as a rule, the father of a numerous family, and thus, the exceedingly difficult problem of succession arises. On his decease, how is the partition of his estate to be made? In this country it is customary to sell all the effects of the deceased and to divide the money thus realised equally among his offspring—which, if the Testamentary Law obtained, means that in all ordinary cases a Peasant Estate would belong to a family for one generation only. In Peasant society it is considered a very unfair procedure, as far as the rest of the family is concerned, to will the estate to the eldest son.

How has this difficulty been solved in countries where the Testamentary Law is in force?—I am, sir, etc.,
D. B. G.

Halkirk, Caithness, Dec. 27th, 1912.

[It is quite obvious that in countries where the Code Napoleon has been adopted, and it has been adopted by half the countries of the Continent of Europe, the Succession Laws must often result in the break-up of the family estate, as well as in a minute and excessive division and parcelling of the land. Mr. Seebohm Rowntree, in his excellent book on "Life and Labour in Belgium," has shown some of the disadvantages. But every Land System has its disadvantages and difficulties. It is only claimed that the difficulties of a rural democracy are infinitely less than those of a landed aristocracy, that it would be better if the 1,358,600 acres of the Duke of Sutherland and the 460,000 of the Duke of Buccleuch were broken up, and that excessive division is preferable to excessive concentration and monopoly. Moreover, the disadvantages of extreme division are much less far-reaching, in practice, than they would appear in theory. Where the break-up of the family property is highly undesirable for practical reasons, children generally come to a mutual understanding. They either sell out their share or they work the farm in co-operation. The practice of co-operation is rapidly spreading in Continental peasant communities. Nor must we forget that children continue to work on the parental farm until they have saved enough to run a farm of their own. A few years ago I leased an old Chateau in Belgium, which gave me an insight into the working of the French system. One of my neighbours, who had started life as a "farm hand" without a penny, was now running an estate as the most important farmer of the district, and his six sons were all working with him. I may add that during all the years that I occupied the old Manor House, I was only once given a chance of seeing a beggar or a tramp, and that one tramp was a German who had crossed the frontier.—CHARLES SAROLEA.]

KING EDWARD IN HIS TRUE COLOURS*

BY SIDNEY WHITMAN.

IT is related that an Englishman used to meet the philosopher Schopenhauer in his daily walk along the promenade near the town of Frankfort immersed in thought, with his hands behind his back, and a poodle following at his heels. Unable at last to restrain his curiosity at the eccentric apparition, the Englishman one day bluntly accosted the philosopher with the words: "For goodness' sake, tell me who you are." Schopenhauer, in nowise taken back, replied: "Who am I? I only wish I knew that myself!" This quaint confession of the limitations of our self-knowledge by one of the greatest intellects of the world recurs to us in reviewing the many pretentious biographies in which the living set up in judgment over the dead, and presume to award the palm of merit or to cast the obloquy of blame; verily, in most cases, a vain undertaking. Who does not recall the Life of Napoleon by Sir Walter Scott, for which he received a large sum, and which to-day would certainly not find enough readers to pay printing expenses; and the scathing terms in which Heine pilloried the great Scotch writer for stooping to such work in order to earn money? If the difficulties are almost insuperable in dealing with the records of our public personages, there are instances in which a humbler ambition may be legitimately gratified, more particularly if it emanates from a sincere desire to do justice where a lack of fairness of judgment rises before us. Such a deed may even be commended and welcomed, and be considered a service rendered to the community at large. This, I think, is the case with the book before me, in which an English journalist, imbued with an honest and unselfish veneration for the person of the late King Edward, has gathered together a number of illuminating data concerning his character and attainments.

Those who remember the death of Edward VII. will not forget the extravagant encomiums lavished upon him by the press of the world. Nothing was too great as a politician, as a statesman, and too good as a man, to be credited to the Peacemaker of Europe; yet, after the lapse of a couple of years, scarcely a voice is raised to protest against a "belittling" of the dead Monarch, issued with almost official authority in a "National Biography," in which this very same man, the idol of yesterday, is acidly written down as one devoid of serious interests, without experience of affairs, even unable to "concentrate his mind" on the task of reading a book!

It is against this ruthless estimate—so characteristic of our age of quick, transient impressions, emotions, and insincerities—that Mr. Legge has launched a volume containing many authenticated facts and evidences of character, which go to prove that, whatever may have been the human shortcomings of the late King, in face of the extravagant idolatry of his newspaper necrologists, he most certainly was not the man portrayed to us in the "Dictionary of National Biography." Among the most valuable and hitherto unpublished testimony adduced in this work with regard to Edward VII. is that of Comte d'Haussonville, member of the Académie Française, a personal friend; and that of Professor Arminius Vambery, of Budapest University, a man who, besides possessing rare sobriety of judgment and a wide experience of mankind, from Sultans and Princes to peasants (for let

* "King Edward in his True Colours." By Edward Legge. (London: Eveleigh Nash.)

A TON OF COAL

for 2/6

*It's cost a box of Seldonite
Abundantly repays:
In every hundredweight of coal
A hundredweight it saves.*

"Seldonite" (so called after the discoverer, Prof. Frank Seldon) doubles the heating and lasting power of Coal, Slack, or Coke. It makes one scuttleful of cheap Coal go as far and give as good a heat as two scuttles of the best Coal do in the ordinary way. It can be applied to all Coal, Slack, or Coke in a few moments, and Coal which has once been "Seldonised" retains its double strength for any length of time. By using "Seldonite" you can save half or more of your coal-money, and you will ensure greater cleanliness and comfort, because your Coal will burn to fine ashes with a complete absence of soot.

"SELDONITE" is Concentrated Heat

If you use only one ton of coal per month "Seldonite" will save you about £4 in the winter. It is guaranteed to be perfectly harmless, does not smell or smoke, and gives a bright, beautiful, intensely hot fire. "Seldonite" can be used easily in the smallest household as well as in the largest factory, and its money-saving effect is equally great, whether for kitchen, grate, oven, copper or furnace.

AS A SPECIAL INDUCEMENT to encourage you to convince yourself of the marvellous efficiency of this Coal-Improver, the Sole Licensees have decided to send a full-size 4/- box (sufficient to treat one ton of Coal, Slack, or Coke) to all readers for only 2/6, provided the order and P.O. for 2/6 is received within the next few days. Beware of imitations which are useless. Write to-day, enclosing P.O. for 2/6, to the Sole Licensees—

"Seldonite" Laboratories, Dept. 73, Holborn Hall, W.C.

A FEW WELL-KNOWN USERS OF "SELDONITE."

DOWAGER COUNTESS OF GUILFORD; VISCOUNT COMBERMERE; LADY ANGLIER; LADY L. WEMYSS; LADY HARRIET WARDE; LADY BROWNLOW CRELL; SIR S. PONSONBY; HON. MRS. SIDNEY PONSONBY; HON. R. HENLEY ENES; ADMIRAL SIR JAMES BRUCE; COL. LEHR; COL. BUTLIN; CAPT. RICHMOND; CAPT. WEBBE; THE MOTHER SUPERIOR, HOUSE OF RETREAT, London; ST. EDITH HOME FOR GIRLS; REV. D. LEWIS, Llanon; REV. JOHN M. MILLER, Symington; REV. ALEX. WALKER, Millport; REV. C. WILSON, Arklow; REV. T. T. TAYLOR, Chelmsford; REV. CANON WILSON-BROWN, Bury St. Edmunds; REV. C. D. SNELL, Sevenoaks; REV. R. R. COBOLD, Ipswich; REV. DR. L. WILLIAMS, Royston; REV. BANFIELD, Hertingfordbury.

A NEW YEAR GIFT

YOUR FRIENDS WILL VALUE

is a copy of the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration—the finest system of all-round Mental-Training in existence. The late Mr. W. T. STEAD said: "I do not remember ever having seen treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, and wish it every success." If you have a friend who lacks the power to concentrate, whose Memory is poor, Will-power, Self-reliance and Self-confidence weak, he will welcome your gift of the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration, which is now being practised in every part of the civilised world. Send a P.C. for full particulars to the CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE. See the splendid testimony of "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "John Bull," and "Great Thoughts."

SCALE OF RATES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS IN

EVERYMAN.

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY. 1d. PRESS DAY—TUESDAY

	Whole Page	Half Page	1/4 Page	1/8 Page
FIRST THREE RIGHT HAND PAGES ...	£22 10 0	£11 5 0	£5 12 6	—
ORDINARY POSITIONS—Facing not less than Half a page of matter	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
BACK PAGE	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	—

PER INCH (2 columns to the Page, 3 1/2 inches wide), 2s.
Depth of Page, 10 1/2 inches.

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS, 1s. per line (Minimum 3s.)
ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
Telephone: 2452 Central. Telegrams: "Templarlan, London."

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS."

All subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE.
A natural gift.

Senior Physician in large Hospital writes—"A most valuable thesis."

Senior Medical Inspector—"I cannot dispute a single point."

Headmaster and Examiner—"All I have heard and seen of your new system fortifies my belief in it."

Master in Elementary School—"The nation that adopts this first will be on the top."

Doctor—"In your medical and scientific facts I can find no flaw."

A London Teacher and Lecturer—"I consider the instruction of great value to parents, teachers, professional men—in fact, to all who realise the importance of memory, will, and clear thinking as the basis of successful achievement."

A Rector—"I am 'digesting' the contents, and so far I am greatly impressed in its favour."

Musicians, Teachers, Students, Engineers, Speakers, Business Men, and all who need memory, should write, stating subject required for, GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhall College). Address—Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Scotland's Debt to Protestantism.

By HECTOR MACPHERSON. Price 1/- net.

The Marshall Case.

Third Edition.

By F. J. ROBERTSON. Price 6d.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
45, George Street, EDINBURGH.

BOOKS WANTED. All in 3 vols., First Editions, 25/- each offered. Lorna Doone, 1869; Wild Wales, 1862; Jane Eyre, 1847; Desperate Remedies, 1871; Romola, 1863; Adam Bede, 1859; Workers in the Dawn, 1880; Men of Character, 1838; Harry Richmond, 1871; Richard Feverel, 1859; Rhoda Fleming, 1845; Emilia in England, 1864. 100,000 Books in Stock. State Wants.—Baker's Great Book Shop, 14 & 16, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount price from Hunter & Longhurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. New Catalogue, just ready, sent post free.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

SHORTHAND (PITMAN'S): Postal Instruction. Syllabus on application.—A. H. CLOUGH, 16, Victoria Street, Moldgreen, Huddersfield.

MSS. WANTED.—Well-established publishers are open to consider MSS. in General Literature and Fiction for immediate publication on favourable terms. Book form only.—Write Box 550, Reynell's Advertisement Offices, 41, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE PROGRESS SOCIETY links up lonely men and women but, in where into a social body, affording wider intellectual and material through its various circles. No membership fee. For descriptive 'tis so m'st stamp to the Secretary, E. M., 107, Greencroft Gardens, north London.

I A GOOD THING. The "Ideal" Divisible MS. Book. No bottom costs, staples. All work in one book, rearranged afterwards. Specimen transfer Duplicator, produces 100 good copies once writing, your own question 1/8, Poolscape 8/3, post free.—WM. HUNT, 18, Broad St., Oxford. still to answer.

it not be forgotten that, in order to understand mankind, a full range of human experiences is called for), enjoyed the privilege of unrestrained personal intimacy with the King at different periods ranging over more than forty years. And what does he say?

"I cannot conceal from you the fact that it is the third time I have finished reading your book on the dear King Edward, so utterly precious are to me the details of his life furnished by you. I wish I had been cognisant of half of them; I could have kept more than one trouble from his noble heart. The deeper I enter into the contents of your book on King Edward the greater is my joy at seeing the reputation of the good King restored to its real value. He could not have been shown in more faithful colours."

CAMBRIDGE*

ONE is glad to find the late Dean Stubbs' well-known book on Cambridge—with the famous Railton illustrations—appearing in a third edition, and holding its own amid the press and competition of a Christmas season. An account of the founding, building, enlargement, and decoration of a dozen or so of colleges might easily be the dullest imaginable—an uninspiring chapter out of Baedeker. But Dean Stubbs loved his subject, and made a living book. "At least," he writes in the preface, "I have written con amore. If my words have failed in warmth, it certainly has not been because my heart is cold." Sometimes the phrase con amore means zeal without knowledge. In this volume a genuine enthusiasm for his Alma Mater goes along with the author's sound historical knowledge, with a fine sense of human values and an admirable literary gift. Cambridge is seen and exhibited in the light of the larger life of the nation, to which it contributed, and from which it received so much. As we follow its story, we are in touch with the intellectual and spiritual movements, in the light of which our present-day culture is to be understood. Cambridge men may well be proud of this book about Cambridge. Its abundant loyalty is untainted by anything grudging or sectarian. Dr. Stubbs' hospitable mind had a place for the Cambridge Platonists and for Oliver Cromwell; for the men who "made an unshrinking appeal to Reason, coupled with profound faith in the essential harmony of natural and spiritual truth," and the man who seems to some "the most human-hearted sovereign and imperial man in all English annals since the days of Alfred." Mr. Birrell once instituted what he called a "Modest Inquiry" into the question, "Why all the English poets, with a barely decent number of exceptions, have been Cambridge men?" He failed to find a satisfactory answer to the question—"I cannot for the life of me tell how it happened"—but how magnificent was his failure! What a roll of names he spread out before his audience—Spenser, Fletcher, Jonson, Marlowe, Herrick, Quarles, Milton, Dryden, Gray, Wordsworth!

"Earth shews to Heaven the names by thousands told That crown her fame."

"So may Cambridge." Something of this pride glows in the pages of Dean Stubbs' volume. Happily, it is not the pride that goes before a fall. How could it be otherwise, since the spirit of Thomas Fuller broods over the work of his disciple? "O Lord, who in our nation hast moved the hearts of Founders and Benefactors to erect and endow two famous luminaries of learning and religion, bless them with the assistance of Thy Holy Spirit. Let neither of them contest (as once Thy disciples on earth) which should be the greatest, but both contend which shall approve themselves the best in Thy presence."

* "Cambridge and its Story." By Charles William Stubbs, D.D. With Illustrations by Herbert Railton. 10s. 6d. (London: Dent, 1912.)

SIR FREDERICK TREVES IN PALESTINE*

SIR FREDERICK TREVES seems to find a welcome relief from an arduous professional career by taking a holiday in some remote corner of the world, and then writing a book about it. In 1908 we had "The Cradle of the Deep," descriptive of a tour in the West Indies. This was quickly followed by "Uganda for a Holiday," and now comes "The Land That is Desolate," in which we are presented with a singularly vivid record of a tour in Palestine.

Sir Frederick has now a dual reputation to sustain. He is not only a famous surgeon, but a brilliant writer of travel books. This opinion is fully confirmed by the volume now before us, which will speedily take its place as one of the most captivating, informative, imaginative, and gracefully written books on a subject that has inspired many brilliant pens.

"The Land That is Desolate" (the title is even suggestive) is not a mere piece of picturesque writing which any journalistic smatterer might produce at a moment's notice, but a narrative illumined by fine culture and displaying shrewd powers of observation, wide and exact knowledge, and the gift of lofty and sustained expression. As we accompany Sir Frederick in his wanderings, we are conscious that our guide has not only thought much and read widely about his subject, but is anxious that we should view the various objects of interest not from the conventional standpoint but from that of the man of education and of unbiased judgment living in the twentieth century.

One might have expected the grandiloquent note to have been struck in a description of the Holy Sepulchre, but it is the sceptical that Sir Frederick strikes. The structure, he remarks,

"is a mere cell about six feet long by six feet wide. At the end stands a Greek priest on guard. There is no suggestion of a sepulchre. The actual tomb—if tomb there be—is covered with marble, and converted into an altar. The place is made brilliant by the light of many little lamps. There is the usual display of candles and figures, while in the centre of the altar is a very tawdry vase of china containing a posy of flowers."

What moves Sir Frederick, as he obtains his first glimpse of the Holy City, is not the solemn grandeur of the scene, but the ludicrous spectacle of a dozen cabs racing from the station yard to Jerusalem, "as if they were escaping from Sodom and Gomorrah." Nor does our author become rapturous when, at the foot of Olivet, he paces the garden of gardens—the Garden of Gethsemane.

"It is an ordinary little suburban garden, precisely of such a type as may be seen, a hundred times over, in Brixton or in Clapham, or around a signalman's box by a quiet railway station."

But when a noble scene presents itself, Sir Frederick can paint it in glowing colours. Take this, for example:—

"The view of Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives is a view of great fascination. Before one stretches a compact city, a walled town, the confines of which are abruptly marked by a straight, unbroken wall. Outside the wall is the open country, severely simple, and deserted, save for a few wandering goats. Within is the complex crowd of roofs and steeples, of towers, domes, and minarets, which make up the amazing city. The

* "The Land That is Desolate." By Sir Frederick Treves. 9s. net. (Smith, Elder.)

100 copies in 10 minutes

Handwriting, Typing, Drawings, Circulars, Plans, Sketches, Specifications, Brushwork, Music, Menus, &c., in one or more colours, by any novice on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR

Outclasses all gelatines, graphs, stencils, &c. Climate proof. Highest award—Gold Medal.

Complete Outfit, foolscap size, 15/-

Carriage paid U.K. List No. 42 and Specimens free.

A. R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd.,
88, GOSWELL ROAD, LONDON.

FIGURE DRAWING

Taught in a series of Postal Lessons at a Moderate Fee by means of the Hulme-Sydney System

The method of training enables the Student to draw the Human Figure accurately, and from memory, in a comparatively short time. Send a stamp for Illustrated Booklet to The Director.

The HULME-SYDNEY CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL (Dept. A), 32 Langham Road, West Green, London, N.

L A T I N WITHOUT TEARS

Correspondence Tuition in LATIN, GREEK and MODERN LANGUAGES

by Specialists in the Art of Teaching Languages by Post.
Address: DIRECTOR, EVERSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE,
43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A.
5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

Ready on Twelfth Night, the First Number (January) of

THE POETRY REVIEW

Edited by STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

THE EDITOR ON POETIC DRAMA.
THE GODS OF THE MOUNTAIN. By LORD DUNSANY.
£115 in Premiums for Original Verse.

As this remarkable number cannot be reprinted, orders should be given to booksellers or newsagents at once. PRICE 6d. net.

THE POETRY SOCIETY, Clun House, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Brotherhood.

A Magazine of Faith, Optimism and Forward Thinking, for the Healthy Reconstruction of Souls and Bodies, and for the Peaceful Evolution of a Juster and Happier Social Order.

Edited by J. BRUCE WALLACE, M.A.

Twenty-sixth year of Publication. New Series.

Monthly, 2d. By post, 2½d. Annual Subscription 2s. 6d., payable direct to the Alpha Union, entitles also to the use of

THE ALPHA UNION'S CIRCULATING LIBRARY of more than 1,600 books on Religion, Psychology, Health and Social Problems.

ALPHA UNION OFFICE AND LIBRARY,
31, Leys Avenue, Letchworth (Garden City), Herts.

LONDON: Wholesale Agents, HEADLEY BROS.,
13, Devonshire Street, and 140, Bishopsgate, E.C.

contrast is shrewdly made, for from the foot of the wall the ground, bare as a desert, slopes down to the empty valley of the Kedron, while upon the other side is a teeming town packed with habitations and with men. The general colour of the city is a soft yellowish grey, a tint so faint, indeed, that the place looks ghostly and unreal. Once in a day, and once only, just at the time when the sun has capped the crest of Olivet, the city is golden."

For artistic restraint and impressiveness, this is a picture which is not unworthy of being placed alongside of Ruskin's famous description of the Campagna of Rome.

We wish we could quote a few more of the good things in Sir Frederick's fascinating volume, but our space is exhausted. We may add, however, that the forty-three illustrations from photographs by the author inspire one with almost as much enthusiasm as the text. There is a map and a servicable index.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE ENGLISH CHARACTER (T. M. Foulis, 5s. net), seen through the medium of Mr. S. L. Hughes, is not convincing. This collection of essays would seem to have been left out in the cold so long that they have lost flavour, and in the majority of instances strike one as hopelessly out of date. The tough old veteran who, at a public dinner, refers to the ancient argument as to whether Wellington or Blucher won the Battle of Waterloo, strikes one as a trifle rrococo, and the chestnuts in English Clubmen are of a particularly hoary variety. It is hopeless, perhaps, to expect an article on murder without references to Bill Sykes, but Wainwright, the hero of "Pen, Pencil, and Poison," is, we think, a trifle overworked these days. Why Mr. Hughes should persist in using laborious synonyms for plain English we have yet to discover. In his essay on the Clergy he suffers from an unconquerable aversion from simple Anglo-Saxon. The wife of a certain parson is made to consult her "reverend spouse" and to tackle "her lord." Never is she described as approaching her "husband." One is reminded of Barrie's inimitable journalist, who explained that a certain word denoted "scholarship, and there are six more like it."

IN THE FIRST TWELVE CENTURIES OF BRITISH STORY (Longmans, Green and Co., 12s. 6d. net), Mr. Jeudwine sketches the social and political conditions of the British people from 56 B.C. to the accession of Henry II. The value of such a survey is surely obvious, but Mr. Jeudwine is the first to attempt its discharge, for, as he reminds us, while there have been histories in plenty treating of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales as separate entities, and all coloured with bitter hostility towards this country, no one so far has sought to make us visualise the condition of these islands as a whole. The book is one of absorbing interest. Its range of information is extraordinary, and, unlike so many other historical efforts, every page bears, not only traces of scholarship and care, but is replete with curious information and illuminative facts throwing a vivid light upon the actual condition of the people themselves.

THE KNAVE OF DIAMONDS (T. Fisher Unwin, 5s.) is written with a verve that carries the reader through the book from start to finish. Miss Ethel Dell knows how to tell a story, and has the faculty of seizing on the critical moment of a situation with an unerring sense of the dramatic. The Knave is a certain Nap Erroll, an American dare-devil after the fashion of Bret Harte's gamblers, with a dash of Red Indian thrown in. He is strongly drawn, and his love-making is of the impetuous and masterful fashion of a Petruccio. Anne, Lady Carfax, is the wife of a baronet—a sullen and unpleasing person, who from the beginning arouses our dislike. Nap Erroll, attracted by Anne, decides to amuse himself with her; but the fire with which he plays scorches his fingers, and he finds himself head over ears in love with another man's wife. Anne in her heart reciprocates the feeling, and in one of the most dramatic situations of the book they discover their mutual attraction. The authoress sketches Nap, in all the insolence of his superb physique, riding roughshod over the sensibilities of others, and with a few swift touches shows the effect his feeling for Anne has on his soul. He becomes human, even gentle, forbearing to his younger brother Bert, and unafraid to show his genuine affection for Lucas, his elder brother, the head of the family, a cripple and a millionaire.

Lady Carfax loses her husband midway through the book, and at first we think a happy marriage is imminent. Nap, however, has flown off to America in search of a famous surgeon, who is to operate on Lucas. The latter consents to the operation, but pathetically tells the doctor that he lacks the will to live. He wants a motive to sustain the fight, and, with the practised hand of a clever writer, Miss Dell supplies it. Lucas falls in love with Anne, who mistakes the gentle affection he inspires for the real right thing.

The operation is successful, and largely through Nap's devotion the millionaire wins his way back to life. But ultimately the strain is too great for him. He dies in his sleep, leaving Nap to Anne's devotion.

The story ends with the marriage of the lovers, and the curtain rings down on a clever touch. Full of incident, with flashes of dramatic insight and emotional power, the book should make as big a hit as Miss Dell's first success, "The Way of an Eagle."

There is a quality of style about PROMISE OF ARDEN (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.) that marks it out from the novel of its kind. Written in a genial, leisurely fashion, the slightness of the theme furnishes opportunity for humorous touches, vivid descriptives, quick contrasts between the green country meadows, with their atmosphere of peace, and the clatter of the myriad wheels of London, the never-sleeping grind of Fleet Street. Keith Markwick is a journalist, who undertakes to keep a kindly eye on the children of his dead friend, Richard Sargesson, one time an Oxford professor. Arden is the village where the children are domiciled, and in the fragrance of the countryside, the pleasure of the children's companionship, Markwick's work gains in quality, and as his sympathies widen and his understanding increases his pen becomes more eloquent, his outlook on life more simple and more significant.

Mr. Eric Parker has painted a picture of childhood convincing and attractive. The book makes delightful reading, and contains a quiet humour infinitely refreshing.

HAPPY HOUSES (Cassell and Co., 6s.) is a brightly written book, containing many helpful hints as to the furnishing of homes and the construction of houses. Says Miss Mary Ansell, in her introduction, "I hold

(Continued on page 386.)

FIRST ANNOUNCEMENT.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.,
NEW SPRING BOOKS.

MESSRS. DENT have pleasure in announcing the following new titles:—

DANTÉ AND AQUINAS.

By Rev. P. W. WICKSTEED. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

(The book aims at giving the reader a connected idea of the general Theological and Philosophical background of the "Comedy," and, therefore, a keen appreciation of those distinctive features in which Dante's own personality more especially reveals itself.)

WINDS OF DOCTRINE: Studies in Contemporary Opinion.

By Professor G. SANTAYANA. Small Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

(A work that treats of the intellectual temper of the Age, enquires into the case of Modernism, analyses the philosophy of M. Bergson, confirms Mr. Bertrand Russell's critique of Pragmatism, comments upon the poetic value of Revolutionary Principles, and also treats of the Genteel Tradition in American Philosophy.)

CHAUCER. By EMILE LEGOUIS.

Translated by L. Lailavoix. Large Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

(This is the full-length study of Chaucer by a French Critic, and therefore a work of peculiar interest.)

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS.

By E. G. GARDNER, M.A. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

(Treats of the Mysticism of Dante, its sources and spiritual significance. Stress is laid upon the mystical aspect of the Divina Commedia, to trace the influence upon Dante of earlier mystics from St. Augustine down to the Franciscans, and the two Mechtilds; and to illustrate the mystical tendency of the sacred poem by its analogies with the writing of other masters in the same science of love.)

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A. Large Crown 8vo, 5s. net each volume.

The two following new volumes will be published very shortly, and readers who have already obtained the earlier published volumes of this series, "English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy" (by Prof. James Seth, M.A.) and "English Epic and Heroic Poetry" (by Prof. W. Macneile Dixon, M.A.), are advised to place their orders with their booksellers at once.

ENGLISH LYRIC POETRY. By ERNEST RHYS.

THE ENGLISH NOVEL. By Professor GEORGE SAINTSBURY, LL.D.

DETAILED PROSPECTUS SENT ON REQUEST.

LONDON AND ITS GOVERNMENT.

By PERCY A. HARRIS, L.C.C. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

(The purpose of this book is two-fold. Firstly, to make the Government of London intelligible, by tracing its historical development, and giving an explanation of its complex institutions; secondly, to draw attention to several much-needed reforms.)

READY SHORTLY.

TOWARDS A NEW THEATRE.

By EDWARD GORDON CRAIG. Forty Designs for Stage Scenes, accompanied with Critical Notes by the Inventor. Sq. Royal 4to, 21s. net. [Prospectus.]

A FRENCH "EVERYMAN."

Tous les chefs-d'œuvre de la Littérature Française.

THE FOLLOWING VOLUMES WILL BE PUBLISHED IN 1913.

MOLIÈRE Théâtre III.	LA ROCHEFOUCAULD Sentences et Maximes morales, etc.
MOLIÈRE Théâtre IV.	Romanciers et Conteurs du XVIIIe Siècle Morceaux choisis.
MASSILLON, FLÉCHIER, etc. Extraits.	BOSSUET Oraisons funèbres, Sermons, etc.
PASCAL Pensées.	CARDINAL DE RETZ Meilleures pages des Mémoires [Prospectus.]
LA FONTAINE Fables et Petits Poèmes.
AGRIPPA D'AUBIGNÉ Les Tragiques.

UPON RECEIPT OF A POST-CARD, A GENERAL CATALOGUE OR LIST OF ANY SERIES, OR PROSPECTUS WILL BE GLADLY SENT.

137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

with many others that in the offices of all architects there should be at least one woman, who has, or has had, much experience of the conduct of a household. No man, it seems, can ever grasp the right use or placing of a cupboard, and to this day the unthinking male has so little conception of the labours of the woman . . . that all scullery sinks are built at least nine inches too low." This practical criticism notwithstanding, the book is no mere compendium of housewifely hints. The author introduces us into all sorts and conditions of homes, from the nest of the newly married pair, who nearly quarrel over the colour of the sofa cushions, to the ornate and ugly mansion of the millionaire. We have all of us lingered outside certain houses, noting the red of the firelight's glimmer, watching with wistful eyes the flickering flames upon the walls—maybe two heads quite close together are for a moment thrown into relief! We have all of us woven fancies round the house at the corner, where the strange old lady lives or the elderly eccentric—is he a miser?—who raves at his servants in a deep voice, and threatens dreadful things; the house with the walled garden won our hearts, captured our imagination years ago. But always we have stayed outside the enchanted place; the gates have never yet rolled back for us. Now for the first time Miss Ansell takes us inside. We talk with the gruff old man, take tea with the little old lady, and view with disfavour the heavy plush and hideous gilding of the millionaire. A dainty book, with unexpected insight and real imaginative touches.

Although powerfully written, and with obvious sincerity, THE UPHOLSTERED CAGE (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), by Josephine Pitcairn Knowles, is a book the purport of which appears to us to be deplorable. It is, in effect, an embittered attack upon the home as an institution which wastes women's lives, where there is nothing for them to do that is either useful or dignified, and which has, according to the authoress, reduced her sex to a condition of something like servitude. We are even asked to despise, or pity, the daughter who devotes her days to an invalid mother, and the general impression that we gather from Miss Knowles's pages is that the final emancipation of woman is to set her free from all the finer instincts of her nature. We are asked to believe that the girl who lives at home suffers from a tyranny that has become almost intolerable. "The girl in her parents' house is never launched," we are told. "She has," the authoress goes on to complain, "to play second fiddle," a part that Miss Knowles clearly thinks should be reserved for the parents. This sort of mischievous talk was pardonable in the days of our grandmothers, when women found so many occupations barred to their entrance. To-day it is not only exaggerated; it is in total opposition to the facts. The great danger to women lies at present in the growing strength of the attacks on the family and the home, which institutions give scope and freedom to her highest qualities. The only practical suggestion that the authoress advances to deal with the problem of the surplusage of women is that of emigration to Canada. Even there, be it noted, it is for homes that women are wanted.

In their book on the AFRICAN SHORES OF THE MEDITERRANEAN (Sampson Low, Marston, and Co., Ltd., 10s. 6d. net), Messrs. Cyril Fletcher and L. Grant have given us an undeniably fascinating volume. The authors tell us that they described no place which they did not themselves visit, and no custom which they did not themselves observe, during a protracted sojourn in North Africa, where they examined at first hand the remnants of the lost civilisation of Carthage. Very vivid is their description of the great attack upon the doomed city by Scipio, when, "working night and day with a feverish energy of despair, the Carthaginians built of such materials as they had, a squadron of fifty new warships and cut an outlet through the quay from the inner harbour of Cothon to the sea. On the very day that the jetty was completed the new fleet of the enemy broke, with triumphant shouts, into the open sea, and Scipio saw his work undone. . . . In the belief that the sea was clear, the Roman ships had been half dismantled, the weapons of war had been removed to the siege works, and the crews had been landed to build the jetty. If the Carthaginians had attacked at once they might have destroyed the fleet utterly. . . . Instead of this, they contented themselves with making a noisy and harmless demonstration, and returned into harbour. . . . At last they offered battle. The engagement lasted the whole day, and ended in favour of the Carthaginians. When returning to the harbour, however, the vessels were entangled in a mass of shipping, and it was found necessary to beach them off the quays. Here they were again attacked by the Romans and completely destroyed. . . . Once more Carthage owed her deliverance to the desperate valour of her children." There followed the dreadful massacre of Hasdrubal, and it was written Delenda est Carthago. Emphatically a book to buy and to keep.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- British Ski Association. "Ski-ing." (Horace Marshall, 1s.)
 Burns, Robert. "Songs and Poems." (Foulis, 10s. 6d.)
 Crawshaw, James E. "Tales of the Oolite." (Murray and Evenden.)
 "Chanticleer." "Pickaninnies." (Murray and Evenden.)
 "Georgian Poetry, 1911-1912." (The Poetry Bookshop, 3s. 6d.)
 Gautier, Judith. "L'inde Eblouie." (Armand Colin.)
 Holden, E. M. "Cleon (A Poem)." (Fifield, 1s.)
 Heywood, Effie. "Fantasy." (Murray and Evenden, 1s.)
 Irving, Washington. "The Sketch-Book." (Oxford University Press, 1s.)
 Money, Mrs. Elliot. "Idylls, East and West." (Murray and Evenden, 1s.)
 Roget, P. M. "Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases." (Longmans, Green, 2s. 6d.)
 Taylor, J. M. "Applied Psychology." (Fowler, 5s.)
 Writers' and Artists' Year-Book. (Adam and Charles Black, 1s.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
 THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
 Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
 THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
 Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

Here's MY Barber

I don't have to wait for him
—he waits for me—always ready to give me a surpassingly smooth, comfortable shave, at any time of the day or night.

ONE OUTFIT WILL LAST A LIFETIME. THERE IS NO CONSTANT EXPENSE FOR NEW BLADES—THERE IS NO GRINDING OR HONING EXPENSE EITHER

ITS SHAVING EASE.

The CLEMAK is the simplest and most perfect shaving device known to civilisation. There is nothing to get out of order—no screwing, fixing or adjusting to waste your time. The blade is adjusted at the only right angle automatically. You simply press the knob and this fine, smooth, sure, safe, speedy, clean "barber" is ready to give you the best shave—not once but every day of the year.

THE PERFECT BLADE.

CLEMAK Blades retain their exceptionally keen shaving edges because they are manufactured from the finest quality Sheffield Razor Steel, hardened and tempered by our new secret electrical process.

The CLEMAK Stropping Machine (price 3/6, including good leather strop) compels you to strop at the correct angle and pressure and ensures a clean blade for every shave.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

EVERYBODY'S USING IT.

- CLEMAK Razor and Seven Blades 5/-
- NEW MODEL SET & Twelve Blades 7/6
- COMBINATION OUTFIT, Stropping Machine, Velvet Hide Strop, Clemak and Twelve Blades 10/6

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

OF ALL STORES, CUTLERS, etc.,

or post free from the
CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street,
LONDON.

Name

Address

POST IT NOW

Please post free your revised edition of "His First Shave," the humorous booklet illustrating in colours the most popular Clemak Outfits and useful Hints on Shaving.

POST IT NOW

Profitable Spare-Time Study for Everyman & Everywoman

You can earn Guineas with Brush Pencil Pen

The demand for sketches suitable for reproduction is greater than the supply.

Artists trained to do the work that's wanted—who know the requirements of publisher, advertiser, and printer—have always well-paid work to do.

Many grades of designs are wanted, and payment ranges from two guineas to one hundred guineas a drawing.

The essentials are a taste for drawing, an eye for colour, commonsense, and training.

The trained man or woman who makes popular reproducible sketches needs no influence to sell them.

Advertisers are glad to get drawings, for which they usually pay spot cash.

The postal system enables the student to enjoy the advantages of an expert London training at home.

The Practical Correspondence College offers individual training in Commercial Art, and absolutely guarantees thorough tuition.

The lessons are clear and easy, and illustrated by hundreds of original drawings, many in colours. They teach in progressive sections the remunerative branches of art, including posters, showcards, book plates, lettering, figure drawings, flowers, landscapes, water-colours, pastels, black and white work, lithography, and designing for all processes.

Chas. E. Dawson, the Art Director, is one of the most popular designers of pictorial publicity. His work has won for him an international Reputation, and he has helped more men and women to earn money by art than any other living man.

Any reader of EVERYMAN who sends a small sketch will receive gratis a personal criticism and Chas. E. Dawson's opinion upon the sender's chance of success in this new and well-paid field of Art. A booklet illustrating the latest and best poster work will be sent post free.

"JOHN BULL" writes: The Practical Correspondence College is all-British in its personnel and methods; no student is accepted, nor are fees received from any one, who does not give proof of his aptitude for the subject in which he seeks training. The Instructors—each a well-known exponent of his subject—are responsible to the College for the success of their students and have no interest in enrolling anyone with doubtful prospects, as the institution wisely stipulates that students shall be taught "till proficient." Any reader desirous of improving his present position should write for full particulars.

Consider the millions of money spent annually on advertising and realise the tremendous field open to the trained advertisement writer. Here, then, is an ideal opportunity of converting spare hours into guineas. I know of one young man who earned as much as £100 a year and more in his spare time by writing advertisements. I know another who gives one evening a week to advertisement writing, and receives a guinea for the evening's work. Another couple, to my knowledge, in receipt of a regular salary, augment their income to the extent of £20 or more monthly, by devoting four or five evenings per week to the work. Brains they certainly have, but in no greater degree than many a 30s. per week clerk. Their secret is training. Experience is good, but, "By experience we find a short way by a long wandering. Learning teacheth more in one year than experience in twenty," and there is no better training in advertisement writing than that afforded by the Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand. I have examined the Course, and looked through the criticisms of students' work, and am impressed with the practical and sound system of tuition. The College has gained a reputation for honest and thorough tuition, and the Principals will only accept as students those who show definite aptitude for the work.

Readers who realise the importance of increasing their earnings, and utilising their spare time in the most profitable way, will be well advised to write to the Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C., for a free copy of "Brains and Ink," and if advantage is taken of the Course, then you will have no "waste time," because you no longer have "spare time."

Success in journalism goes by merit, and the remuneration for this work makes it an attractive profession for those who feel they have some aptitude for writing. Even as an occasional occupation, it may be the means of adding substantially to one's existing income.

Mr. COULSON KERNAHAN

in a recent article, says: "The young man and the young woman with literary aspirations are told by the 'croaker' of to-day that literature is a profession in which it is impossible to earn a living. That is not my experience, nor is it the experience of many another writer whose name might be mentioned here. But I make bold to assert that at no time were critics and the public more ready to recognise and to encourage new talent."

Mr. HAROLD BEGBIE

in an article in The Author, says: "There is not an editor in London who is not anxiously searching for writers with something to say."

Whatever aptitude or talent a man or woman may possess, some practical training is absolutely indispensable. Training at the hands of a responsible journalist saves the literary aspirant much needless disappointment and failure; it shortens the road to success by giving the beginner the benefit of the guidance of experience.

Under the direction Mr. T. Sharper Knowlson, who has written a number of successful books on journalism and short story writing, personally conducts the Practical Correspondence College Courses of correspondence instruction in all branches of the journalistic profession. The most important feature of the course is the fact that Mr. Knowlson personally supervises and criticises the work of every student. Whether he enrolls for the entire course or simply for one section he receives the same careful individual attention.

'THE YOUNG MAN'

says: "Mr. T. Sharper Knowlson is undoubtedly right when he offers to aid would-be journalists and novelists in the technique of their profession."

Readers of EVERYMAN are invited to send specimen MSS. for Mr. Knowlson's inspection. All such MSS. will be returned with a candid opinion as to senders' chances of success in the literary field.

PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE

Opposite
Law Courts

COLLEGE THANET HOUSE STRAND
LONDON W.C.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 13. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 10, 1913.

One Penny.

History in the Making— Notes of the Week	PAGE 389
Industrial Unrest — By Hector Mac- pherson	390
The Cross and the Crescent—By Dr. Percy Dearmer	391
Why is Living Cheaper in France than in England?	392
Sea Spray—By A. E. Stirling	392
Great Countries of the World. An Attempt in Human Geography—II. Belgium—By Charles Sarolea	394
Our Portrait of Montaigne	396
Gibbon's Autobiography	399
Literary Notes	400

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

DR. PERCY
DEARMER
MGR. BENSON
J. A. T. LLOYD
CHARLES SAROLEA

Feodor Dostoieffsky—By J. A. T. Lloyd	PAGE 401
The Carpenter — Short Story — By William Howard	402
The First of the Mystics	402
The Cadis of London—By Margaret Hamilton	403
An Eton Education—Part III.—Morality —By Mgr. R. H. Benson	404
An Eton Education—A Reply to Mgr. Benson	406
Correspondence	408
Reviews— The Philosopher of the Superman	413
Bishop Paget	414
Santa Teresa	414
Books of the Week	415

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AS was anticipated, the Peace Conference has proved abortive. In diplomacy the Turks have reduced dilatoriness to a science, and on the present occasion they have maintained their historic reputation. After repeated adjournments, in which the patience of the Allies was severely tried, the Conference met on Monday to consider the final proposals of the Turkish delegates. Turkey absolutely refuses to cede Adrianople to the Allies, but is willing to divest herself of her rights in Crete, on condition that the other islands are left in her possession. The terms, of course, were unacceptable to the Allies, and the Conference was suspended. Turkey is still allowed a few days to come to a more reasonable frame of mind. Judging from the tone of the chief Turkish delegate, Reshid Pasha, Turkey seems in no mood for concessions. He told the Conference that Turkey had made enormous sacrifices, and that the responsibility of a rupture would fall upon the Allies. In that event, he added, "we declare null and void all the concessions we have made up to this day." Hopes of a settlement, however, have not been abandoned. It is thought probable that terms which Turkey will not accept from the Allies she may be induced to concede to the Powers, who are anxiously working for peace. The difficulties of Turkey are increased by divided counsels in Constantinople. The Government are said to be in favour of peace, but they have to reckon with the Jingo section of the army, who favour resumption of hostilities.

The feud in the Unionist party over the food taxes still continues. The opponents of the taxes are largely represented in the party press, in which the controversy is being carried on with acrimony, not to say venom. The Birmingham section, which is directly under the Chamberlain influence, strongly contend for the food taxes, and though in a minority, the fact that they control the party machinery counterbalances their numerical inferiority. The attitude of the Chamberlainites is reflected in the letter which Mr. Jesse Collings has written to the Times. He admits that at one time the food tax was unpopular, but that has given way before explanation and education. He disagrees with those who advise concentration upon the shortcomings of the Government and the relegation of Tariff Reform to the background. A constructive policy, according to Mr. Collings, is a necessity, as hesitancy and wobbling will simply ensure defeat. Mr. Bonar Law's forthcoming speeches in Edinburgh on the 24th inst. are awaited with eager expectation. Undoubtedly his position is one of extreme difficulty. If he repeats his Ashton-under-Lyne pronouncement, a split in the party may result. On the other hand, if he submits to the dictation of the anti-food taxers, his prestige as leader will be seriously lowered. In the interests of party unity supreme efforts will be made to find a via media.

In their fight with the Government over the medical service of the Insurance Act, the doctors have been worsted. As the day for final decision approached, medical men all over the country broke away from the British Medical Association. So marked was the defection that the Government were able to announce that over 10,000 doctors had definitely accepted service under the panel system. The British Medical Association have issued a statement severely criticising the methods of the Government to induce medical men to join the panels.

In consequence of the death of the Duke of Abercorn and the succession of Lord Hamilton to the dukedom, a vacancy is caused in Londonderry City. At this stage of the Home Rule controversy the election is creating exceptional interest. Owing to the smallness of the Unionist majority, the Nationalists are hopeful of capturing the constituency. Their hopes are increased by the fact that there are two Unionist candidates in the field, Colonel H. A. Parkenham, who commands the London Irish Rifles, and Mr. Marshall Tillie, D.L., of Londonderry. The Nationalist candidate, a Protestant, is Mr. Shand Leslie, a first cousin of Mr. Churchill.

In reply to a correspondent, Mr. Bonar Law writes that he is glad to see working men in Parliament, but it is a distinct disadvantage to Trade Unionism that a seat in Parliament should be regarded as the object of every one who obtains influence in Trade Unions.

A movement is on foot to erect a national monument to Field-Marshal Sir George White, to take the form of a statue in London. An influentially signed appeal for funds is made to the patriotic public.

Mr. Keir Hardie seems anxious about the fate of women's franchise in the forthcoming Reform Bill. In the event of women not being included in the Bill, he advises Labour members not only to vote against the third reading, but to do everything they can through all its stages to prevent it going forward.

The interim report of the Departmental Committee on Boats and Davits, which was appointed in August last year, has been submitted to the House of Commons. The report, which is signed by all the members of Committee, recommends that when it is necessary to carry boats not attached to davits, pontoon rafts of an approved character may be substituted, provided that such accommodation does not exceed 25 per cent. of the total number of persons a vessel is certified to carry.

An important pronouncement has been made on the Panama tolls question by President Taft. He has accepted the principle of arbitration. It appears, however, that he is not in favour of submitting the matter to the Hague Tribunal. He prefers the appointment of a special Board, composed of equal numbers of citizens of the United States and of Great Britain. In his view, at the Hague all Europe, which is interested in the tolls question, would be against the United States. The moral pressure on the Court would be enormous.

During the crisis in the Near East the Germans have been busily employed in strengthening their lines of communications, especially in the neighbourhood of frontiers. The military authorities are at present engaged in constructing, on the heights of Horimont, a new fort, which is destined to be one of the most powerful of the defensive works around Metz. The French frontier is only some six miles distant, and a number of French industrial communities are within range of the guns of the new forts.

The Supreme Court at Washington has given a decision which is interpreted as making "cornering" illegal. The decision arose out of the indictment of Messrs. James A. Patten and others, charged with running a so-called "cotton corner," in violation of the Anti-Trust Law. The Attorney-General, commenting on the case, said that if his interpretation was correct, the problem of the high cost of living may be solved, as, under the Supreme Court's ruling, the Government is empowered to break up any corner of food products which may be attempted.

INDUSTRIAL UNREST

HISTORY bears melancholy testimony to the fact that humanity in its march down the centuries has been shadowed by the gaunt portentous figure of Poverty. In our day the dread spectre is more than ever forbidding, in view of the dramatic contrasts which now exist between rich and poor. The problem is intensified by the fact that, owing to the spread of education and knowledge, the modern toiler no longer hugs his chains in dull despair, but is feverishly looking around for weapons with which to secure his freedom. By means of the political independence which has come to him through the franchise, he is now seeking to achieve his economic independence. The outcome is prolonged industrial unrest, showing itself in bitter conflicts between capital and labour. In its early days Political Economy, which posed as the science of wealth, sowed the seeds of conflict, when by means of the Ricardian theory of wages it declared that between masters and workers there is an inherent antagonism. Nothing but industrial unrest could possibly result from an economic theory which in the name of scientific method declared that high profits to the masters could only be secured through low wages to the workers. As our national supremacy depended upon our industrial supremacy, it was an accepted economic axiom that low wages were a necessary adjunct of British civilisation. Next, Malthus came along with his dreary gospel that as a result of the law of population there was no cover laid at Nature's table for the poor man. Such teaching could not but create in the breasts of the workers a spirit of fierce revolt, which manifested itself in the creation of Trade Unions, and latterly in legislative attempts to secure a more equitable distribution of the national wealth.

The latest phase of the conflict is the demand for a minimum wage fixed by Act of Parliament. The weak point in this movement is that while Parliament can fix a minimum wage, it cannot fix the price of commodities. The truth is, no legislative enactment, no politico-economic theory, can grapple effectively with industrial unrest which ignores the operation of the law of supply and demand, whose working in the economic sphere is perfectly simple. When two workers run after one master wages fall; when one master runs after two workers wages rise. The solution of the question lies in relieving the congestion of the labour market. What is the main cause of this congestion? The obvious answer is, land monopoly, which, by driving people into the towns, overstocks the labour market, with resultant low wages, unemployment, and slum conditions. In the past, Socialists have paid almost exclusive attention to capitalist monopoly, but in this they have no warrant from their leader, Karl Marx. Marx found dramatic illustration of the powerlessness of capitalist monopoly where there is free access to the land in the case of a Mr. Peel, who, in the early colonising days, took with him from England to Swan River, Western Australia, means of subsistence and production to the amount of £50,000. He also brought with him 3,000 persons of the working classes—men, women, and children. Once arrived at his destination, Mr. Peel was left without a servant to make his bed, or to fetch him water from the river. The attempt to create capitalist monopoly failed because the workers who emigrated with Mr. Peel had free access to the land, and were not driven to take whatever wages he chose to give them.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

THE CROSS AND THE CRESCENT * * BY DR. PERCY DEARMER

I.

If I ask the reader to think of the Mediterranean basin, his imagination will conjure up a sea surrounded by land—Europe, Asia, Africa—highly civilised on the European sides, in a low civilisation on the Asiatic sides, and on the African side a series of countries mostly in a semi-barbarian condition, more or less colonised now by European nations. But if he had been living fifteen centuries ago, he would have replied, without hesitation, that the Mediterranean basin was the centre of civilisation, and that round the shores of this sea were gathered the learning, wisdom, art, and commerce of the world—on all its sides, as much or more learning on the Asiatic and African as on the European side. Indeed, he would have declared, without fear of contradiction, that Africa held the greatest culture of all, and that Alexandria had for nearly a thousand years stood at the head of the intellectual world.

How comes it that the coast of Africa became a coast of desert interspersed with ruins, the ruins of a departed Roman imperialism, and that Asia Minor and Syria have for centuries gone back, while Europe has gone forward, in the path of civilisation? Look at the map, better at a map of the ancient world; and there, gathered about this sea, is almost all that has mattered in the history of the human race—Egypt, Crete, Greece, Syria, Italy, Asia Minor. What has happened that the story of human progress drifted away from two sides of the Mediterranean, drifted northward and westward to the savages of Germany, Scandinavia, England, and westward again to the New World, and northward too, and eastward in the inclement climate of the Russian Empire, leaving the blue sea, the orange groves, the vineyards, and olive trees of the fair southern lands?

II.

For the answer we have to turn to a town which lies just outside the countries of the Mediterranean basin, down across the deserts on the south-east—Mecca. This change, which so strangely reversed our history for a thousand years, began in the year 622, when took place the Hejira, or Flight of Muhamed, from Mecca to Medina. It continued for a thousand years, when the rolling back of the Moslem invasion began, and has continued, and is being continued at the present moment. The Turkish representatives at the Peace Conference are very naturally complaining at the moment when I write that before the Balkan war Powers only meant that the status quo would be maintained, and that now the Powers are not maintaining it. Do they realise that at the back of the European mind—even the mind of cynical diplomats—lies the duty of rolling back the Moslem invasion? The Powers only meant that the status quo would be maintained if the Turks won, as it was very nearly maintained when they defeated Greece in 1897. It is the destiny of Europe—or rather for that greater Europe to which we all belong, and which is the mother of us all—the Mediterranean world, to roll back the Moslem invasion; and even Disraeli could not prevent it.

And what of this wonderful phenomenon, the Moslem invasion, which proves that it is possible for a religion to spread with the sword for missionary, and even to endure thus for a long while? We often think of it nowadays as an Ottoman invasion; but that Central Asian tribe, which by an accident migrated west and founded the Turkish Empire, was a secondary and a later factor. The principal work was done by another race, which moved out of Arabia, and conquered Syria and Egypt, and moved step by step across North Africa, taking Tripoli in 648, Carthage, after a struggle of twenty-four years, in 689, and Spain in the beginning of the next century. How strange it seems! Muhamed had begun his career just when England was being converted to Christianity; and at the time when the Venerable Bede was quietly writing the story of that conversion in his monastery at Wearmouth, Abdalrahman, Caliph of Cordova, was making France a Moslem country by the usual method of the sword. The Moors advanced half through France, and actually reached the banks of the Loire. There they were met by Karl the Hammer, or Charles Martel, as he is generally called. What would have happened had they won? France would have become Moslem; England perhaps would to-day be like Macedonia, and London a Western Constantinople. Certainly the Caliph intended to conquer France, and then roll up Christendom from Germany and Italy eastward to the Bosphorus. But he was defeated by Charles Martel in the Battle of Tours—one of the decisive battles of the world.

III.

That was in 732. The Moslem invasion received its first check, and a line was drawn in Western Europe which was never passed again. Yet Spain itself remained under the Moors till the fifteenth century. Perhaps, when we speak of Spanish cruelty and the horrors of the Inquisition in the sixteenth, we ought to remember that. The other nations of Christendom have been slow enough in learning the lessons of mercy, peace, and goodwill among men; and it is not to be wondered at that Spain was slower still.

After this first great Moslem wave, which swept westward through North Africa, there was a pause of five centuries. Then a horde of nomads, some three thousand in number, driven westward by a Mongol invasion, crossed the Euphrates. In crossing, their leader was drowned; those who had not crossed, a little band of four hundred warriors (or 2,000 according to one account), were alarmed at the omen, and refused to follow. We now call them Ottoman Turks. This was in 1227, soon after Magna Charta. Liberty arose in the West, oppression in the East, within a few years of each other. In 1228 this band of Turks found a great ruler in Osman I. The conquest of Asia Minor began—Asia Minor, which people are in the habit of looking upon as the peculiar property of the Turks, and yet even to-day in the whole Ottoman Empire there are only about ten million Turks, and they have little of their original blood, so enormous has been the tribute of Christian women. In those days Asia Minor was part of the Greek Empire. The rest of the history is well known. Asiatic conquests extended the Ottoman power over what is now Turkey in Asia, over Arabia and Egypt. In 1361 the Sultan Murad began the conquest of Europe, and took Adrianople (five centuries and a half ago!). In 1389 the Servian Empire was overthrown in the famous battle of Kossovo. Step by step Turkey in Europe was made, but Constantinople held out till 1453, when the last Byzantine Emperor rode from his last communion in St. Sofia, and fell nobly in the breach the Turks had made. Then the Turkish capital was transferred from Adrianople to the mother city. We were just beginning the Wars of the Roses at the time. How strange has been the severance between East and West!

IV.

Afterwards Belgrade and Buda-Pesth fell, and the Turkish Empire reached nearly to Germany, just as Germany was beginning the Reformation. Thus, in 1529, Sulciman invested Vienna, but was so valiantly resisted that the siege was raised.

Thenceforward the zenith was passed. Internal decay seized upon the Ottoman Empire, and Europe began to press upon those Turks whose very name had once struck such terror. On the other side of the Mediterranean Africa is being drawn back to her ancient European civilisation, as we English know who have taken Egypt. The last was Tripoli, which fell in 648 to the Moslems, and was lost to them quite recently. But the lesson of all this must be left to another article.

SEA SPRAY

A voice rose out of the sea,
It was stern as the sea and salt as the sea,
Bitter and clean like the sea, insistent, changeful, and strong.

Honey fell from my lips and sugar crusted my heart,
Sweet-cloying fragrance haunted my steps and sweet melodies lulled my ear.

But the voice was rough and it drowned my songs
With its roar.

The spray was lashed from the sea,
On my cheeks in the print of kisses it rained,
It soaked my hair and my clothes clung dank,
And the perfume was killed by the breath of the brine,
By the bitter breath of the brine.

A wind blew out of the sea,
It was rude, it was wild: it tossed my hair,
And the folds of my garments flapped in response,
And my chest was expanded to meet the assault
And my foot was planted firm.

Gray, white and blue shone the sea,
No flush of warmth was there,
No rosy tints to soothe the eye,
No blush and bloom;
Cold was the sea.

With deep-drawn breath I went down to the sea,
With strong, sure step I went down to the sea,
With face set hard I went down to the sea,
The sea that was challenging me.

A plunge—and I tossed on the wild, wild sea.
I set my will 'gainst the will of the sea,
I wrestled, I fought—ineffectually
With the sea that was mastering me.

I lay on the breast of the great, great sea,
'Twas my mother's bosom heaved under me,
'Twas my mother's breath that was on my face,
And my mother's voice that filled my ear,
It was her grey eye that looked on me.
The sea was mother of me.

Strong, true, and clean did I leave the sea,
In my nostrils the breath, on my cheeks the kiss, in my ears the voice, in my veins the life
Of the master and mother of me
Of the sea.

A. E. STIRLING.

WHY IS LIVING CHEAPER IN FRANCE THAN IN ENGLAND?

I.

We always think of France as a land of luxury, as the resort of millionaires, of Russian Princes and American financiers, who from the ends of the earth flock in their thousands to Paris and Monte Carlo, to Aix les Bains and Biarritz. We too often forget that France is also the poor man's Paradise, the land of rigid economy, of cheap and comfortable living, where men of moderate incomes get more value for their money than in any other country.

II.

To a superficial observer no subject could well be more commonplace and trivial than that of the cost of living. As a matter of fact, no subject is more intimately bound up with the vital problems of national welfare. Also, to a superficial observer, the subject of the cost of living seems ideally simple. As a matter of fact, there are few questions more complicated, nay, more perplexing. Who will tell us, for instance, why, if we cross the frontier between Belgium and Holland, living suddenly becomes twice as dear? In Antwerp the monetary unit is the franc; in Rotterdam it is the florin, and the florin is double the value of the franc, and practically has only the same purchasing power.

If we were to believe Free Traders and Protectionists, whose main argument seems to be to hurl at each other lists of conflicting statistics, the cost of living is all a question of prices and wages. But when we enter into the practical details of a household budget we very soon discover that the question is vastly more intricate and vastly more interesting than is suspected by the average economist, that the cost of living is not, indeed, mainly a question of prices and wages, but a question of what are the habits of the people, and that those habits themselves are determined by the most varied factors, by politics and taxation, by religion and art, which again are often determined by climate and geographical conditions.

III.

For instance, if we compare the cost of living in England and France, there can be no doubt that climatic conditions largely explain the lower cost of living on the other side of the Channel.

The French climate is neither so cold nor so wet as the English climate. Therefore the Frenchman requires less meat. He is less of a carnivorous animal than the Englishman, and this reduces his butcher's bill. He also requires less coal, which reduces not only the bill of the coal merchant, but that of the washerwoman, and which also reduces the servants' wages bill, making it easier to keep the house tidy. He also requires less clothing, and is less liable to wear and tear, which reduces the bill of the tailor.

Again, the French climate is much more sunny, which renders the Frenchman more cheerful, less dependent on sport and amusement, thus increasing the importance of outdoor life and diminishing the importance of indoor life, which again makes the housing problem easier to solve.

And, finally, owing to the differences in climatic conditions, France is a more pleasant country to live in, which explains why the Frenchman is more of a sedentary, stay-at-home animal, so little addicted to migration that the travelling bill of the average citizen is reduced to almost nothing.

IV.

If climate and physical conditions were the principal factors in determining the cost of living, we could learn very little from our neighbours. For, after all, we cannot import into England either the French climate or the French soil. But, as a matter of fact, natural conditions are far less important than artificial conditions, than the habits and customs of the French people. The cost of living is lower in France because the French are determined to spend less, because they are a saving people. And they are a saving people because the whole of French living is based on the dowry system, because when the French girl marries, the parents are expected to contribute her share to the conjugal partnership. Ever since Julius Cæsar wrote about the dot, two thousand years ago, it has remained a Gallic institution.

There is no subject on which there exist more glaring misconceptions than on the subject of the French dowry system. Ninety-nine per cent. out of a hundred Englishmen assume that a French marriage is generally a sordid affair, in which the young people are hardly consulted, in which there is little love and a great deal of haggling between contracting parties. Now, it is quite true that the money question plays a very important part in French marriages, but, paradoxical though it may appear, the importance attributed to the money question does not in the least proceed from any mercenary spirit. On the contrary, the real motives for the institution of the dot are all of a higher and nobler nature. They are inspired by a spirit of austerity and self-sacrifice. They can be traced to a strong family feeling, which is probably more intense in France than in any other country. They can be traced to a keen sense of parental responsibility, which is careful to provide for the uncertainties of human life. They can be traced to a higher standard of living, which refuses to bring up a race of paupers. They can be traced to a feeling of independence and dignity in the French woman. She insists that she shall not be entirely dependent on the income of her husband. We may prefer the English marriage as a venture of faith. We may prefer the heroic virtue of boldness to the homely virtue of prudence. And it may be far nobler, to use the words of Nietzsche, "to live dangerously," to trust to Providence and to the future. But who will deny that the motives which we have just enumerated—parental responsibility, family feeling, the independence of woman—are noble in their origin? Indeed, so little are mercenary reasons final in the settlement of French marriages, that a Frenchman seldom marries outside his religion or below his social rank. It is very seldom that a poor Catholic girl will consent to marry a rich Protestant. It is comparatively rare for a French girl of the upper middle class to marry into trade, and to accept a "mésalliance"; the very word "mésalliance" does not exist in English, because the prejudice which it expresses does not exist in this country.

V.

But whether the French dowry system is good or bad—and this is a very interesting question on which we propose to have a symposium in EVERYMAN—the point relevant to our argument is that the dowry system does enormously influence the cost of living. For it obliges the French parent to save and to deny himself from the day his first child is born. And the constant need of saving makes him work all the harder, and in proportion as he works harder, he has less time and opportunity to spend, and thus the golden louis and napoleons accumulate in the strong box, eventually to irrigate the money market of the world.

Precisely because the Frenchman spends less and saves more, he also spends more ingeniously. Every part of the domestic life becomes a fine art, from the art of cooking to the art of dress. The form becomes as important as the substance, because beauty and taste enable the French to obtain the best results from the cheapest substance. With the flimsiest material the French woman manages to make a pretty and tasteful dress. With the plainest ingredients the French housewife cooks an excellent dish. Historians tell us that during the siege of Paris, when one million and a half people were besieged for five months by the Prussian armies, the art of cooking attained such perfection that the besieged population ceased to be aware when they were eating horse flesh or cats or rats.

VI.

It would be extremely interesting to examine the influence of religion on the cost of living. That the influence does exist seems to me certain, and it would be easy to prove that in Catholic countries the cost of living is generally lower than in Protestant countries. This may be due to the greater simplicity of life inculcated by Roman Catholicism, or it may be due to the preaching of resignation and other-worldliness, to the practice of fasting, to habits of asceticism. It may also be due to daily attendance at mass, and the consequent early rising. It may be due to the industrial sweating of the nunneries. Or it may largely be due to the example set by the priest, the nun, and the sister of mercy. In countries like France and Belgium, where the average income of a village priest is £45 a year, and the average income of a nun is £24, the people have a practical demonstration that high thinking is compatible with plain living.

VII.

Just as religious conditions assist in decreasing the cost of living, so do political. It is not that taxation is any less in France than in this country. Owing to the enormous military expenditure and to the interest payable on the National Debt, French taxes are nearly as high as in England. Nor is it that the French Government is more economical than the English Government. All Governments are in a sense extravagant. Yet the French Government tends to reduce the cost of living, because it is so much more democratic, and in a democratic country some of the most important items of domestic expenditure are necessarily reduced. For instance, in France public education is practically free among all classes. The French people have not the "caste" system which prevails in the public schools of England, and the son of a millionaire sits on the same bench with the son of the shoemaker. And because even higher education costs nothing, the liberal professions are accessible to every class. And because they are accessible, there is much keener competition. And because there is keener competition, the fees of the French lawyer and the French doctor are one-fifth, and sometimes one-tenth, of what they are in this country. A distinguished specialist and University professor, who in England would charge from one to three guineas to a consulting patient, in France and Belgium charges from 2s. 6d. to 4s.

VIII.

It is often somewhat foolishly said that if a man has an income of a thousand a year, and spends a thousand and one pounds, that man is a poor man, for he is always in debt. On the contrary, if a man has one hundred pounds a year and spends only ninety-nine, that man is a rich man, for he always has a surplus. In that unreal sense the French would be the richest people in the world, because they invariably spend less than they earn. But the French are also rich in a more real sense. They are rich in that they have solved the problem of combining the highest standard of living with the lowest cost of living. And precisely there lies the moral as well as the material interest of all those questions of domestic management which we have raised in this paper. There lies the value of the example of domestic economy which France is setting to the world. The French people remain our unrivalled teachers in the practical things of life. They are teaching us that it is not plain living, but display and luxury which are vulgar. They are teaching us that extreme simplicity can be reconciled with refinement and dignity. They are teaching us that thrift is the condition of a thriving community, and that, in the last resort, it is on the practical genius of the French housewife that the prosperity of the French State depends.

GREAT COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD

AN ATTEMPT IN HUMAN GEOGRAPHY. BY CHARLES SAROLEA.

II.—BELGIUM

I.

WE discussed last week the biggest Power of the world; we shall endeavour to describe to-day one of the smallest. It is characteristic of Belgium that the first word we have to use with regard to it is a superlative. Indeed, Belgium may best be described in superlatives, and in superlatives which are nearly all contradictory. Belgium is in mere size the most diminutive country in Europe, yet it is also the most thickly populated. It is probably the richest country of the Continent, and yet it is one, in some parts, of which the standard of living is lowest. It is one of the most free-thinking and also one of the most Catholic of countries, almost mediæval in its loyalty to the old religion. In politics it is one of the most advanced, with a formidable organised Socialist party; yet it is also one of the most Conservative, having been for twenty-eight years under a clerical Government—a fact unique in the history of Parliamentary government.

II.

The explanation of those paradoxes is a very simple one. Belgium is not a nation, but a geographical expression, an artificial creation of politics and diplomacy. There are in Belgium two countries and two races, which have little in common. The North is Flemish, the South is Walloon. The Flemish North is one uniform plain; the Walloon South-East is mountainous and picturesque. The Flemish districts are mainly agricultural; the Walloon districts are mainly industrial. The Flemish population is Catholic, as Catholic as the Irish and the French Canadians; the Walloons are agnostic. The Flemish constituencies are as Conservative as the constituencies of an English or Scottish university. The Walloons are more Socialist than the miners of Saxony.

III.

The Teutonic and the Latin races, whose opposition forms the warp and woof of modern Continental history, have had to live together in Belgium from times immemorial. But although they live together, they have never merged their differences. It is their opposition which, for centuries, has rendered common political action almost impossible, and which has rendered futile every effort at political unity. It is their opposition which explains why, in the sixteenth century, Belgium failed to assert her independence against Spain, whereas the Dutch provinces succeeded. It is their opposition which explains the whole tragic history of Belgium. The wealth of Belgium attracted the foreign invader. The racial divisions made her an easy prey.

This failure to achieve political unity, which is true even to-day, does not mean that the Belgians have no strong political life. It only means that political life expresses itself, not in the central government, but in the cities. Belgium has always manifested a highly developed municipal activity—as highly developed as in the cities of ancient Greece and mediæval Italy. Few countries can boast of such glorious civic annals. Few countries can show a greater wealth of beautiful historic cities. The British tourist who makes Brussels or Bruges his headquarters can visit in succession within an hour's railway journey cities like Ghent, Antwerp, Mechlin, Louvain, Ypres, Liège, Audenarde,

Tournay, each with her own illustrious history and her ancient traditions, with her own distinct personality, with her own accumulation of treasures of art.

IV.

As Belgium is the meeting-place of the Latin and Teutonic races, and as in Belgium they must needs compete and co-operate, it is interesting to observe which of the two races has obtained the mastery. The answer is that each excels in its own province. The Belgian Walloon is more cheerful, more enthusiastic, more eloquent, more witty, more sociable; he understands better the art of living. To live in succession in Liège and in Ghent is like living in two different worlds, and it must be admitted that life is infinitely more pleasant on the Meuse, which is mainly a French river, than on the Scheldt, which is mainly a Flemish river. On the other hand, the Fleming is more earnest, more persistent, and also more sensuous and more artistic. Out of the four great cities of Belgium three are Flemish: Antwerp, Brussels, and Ghent. If the great Belgian Parliamentary orators are generally French, the great political leaders are generally Flemish. So are the great painters from Memlinck to Rubens, from Van Dyck to Wiertz. Strangest of all, even the great French writers of Belgium are all of Flemish origin: Rodenbach, Verhaeren, and Maeterlinck.

V.

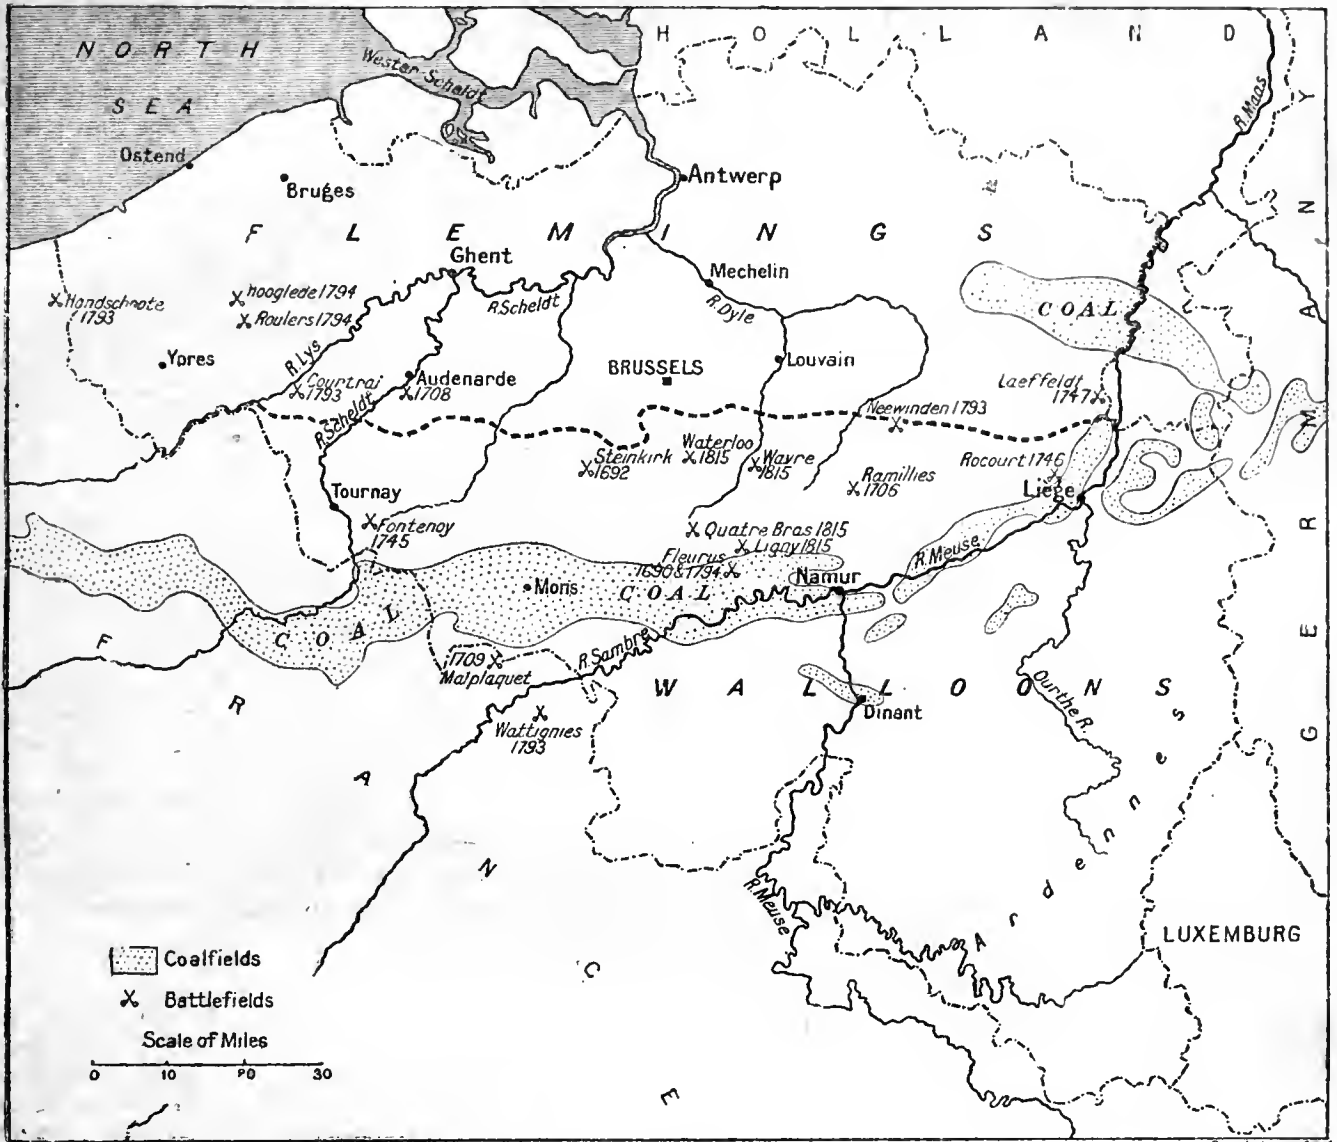

Economically, Belgium is marvellously prosperous. Owing to the natural resources of her soil, to her geographical position and her close proximity to the great markets, owing also to the industry of her inhabitants, Belgium has been from olden times one of the world's great trading centres, a very beehive of industry. In the days of Artevelde, Flanders was the chief market for English wool, and Bruges was the Venice of the North. Few countries have suffered more from religious persecution, from foreign oppression, from periodic wars. Yet all those adverse circumstances notwithstanding, few years have generally sufficed to restore the material prosperity of the country.

VI.

It may be objected that, although the prosperity is great, the standard of living is often low. That is partly true, whether it be due to the pressure of population, or to the Catholic habit of resignation and submission, or to the sweated labour of the numerous convents, which tends to reduce wages. But although wages, and especially agricultural wages, are comparatively low, the cost of living is also lower than elsewhere; and, on the whole, there is little abject poverty in Belgium. The land is largely owned by the people, Belgium having adopted the Code Napoléon. Co-operation, which is carried as far in Belgium as in Denmark, mitigates the evils of industrial competition, and the nationalisation of railways, which in Belgium has proved a magnificent success, is bringing back at once thousands of industrial workers to the rural districts.

VII.

It may be questioned whether the preponderance of material interests has not influenced unfavourably the moral characteristics of the people. The Belgians are gifted intellectually. They are even more gifted artistically. From the days of Memlinck to the present day there has been an uninterrupted succession of great painters. Musical culture is almost as intense in Belgium as in Germany. Yet it must be confessed that the Belgians are lacking in moral earnestness and enthusiasm, in idealism, in the spirit of self-sacrifice. The Belgians are still submitting to a debased form of political clericalism, which has little in common with genuine Catholicism. Whether this lack of spiritual fervour or idealism be due to a long habit of political subjection, or to exclusive absorption in commercial and industrial pursuits, the fact is unmistakable. Belgian reformers are beginning to realise it, and signs are not wanting that a new spirit is asserting itself. Already Belgian Catholics are sending out missionaries to the extreme ends of the earth. Belgian Socialists are producing leaders like Vanderelde and Anseele, who command the respect of Europe.

VIII.

To estimate Belgian culture with fairness we must not forget that until quite recently the Belgians never had a chance. Two thousand years ago Julius Cæsar said of them that they were the bravest of the Gauls. Unfortunately, notwithstanding their bravery, they were no match for the Roman conqueror; nor were they afterwards a match for their neighbours, who in turn coveted and conquered the rich country. For centuries the Belgians have been under the heel of a foreign invader. They fought heroically against the French kings and Burgundian dukes, to whom they ultimately succumbed. They fought as heroically against Philip II. and the Duke of Alva. But here again the might of the Spanish Empire was too much for the free cities of Flanders. At last, in 1830, Belgium achieved her independence, and that independence is to-day under the guarantee of the European Powers, and there is no reason to believe that this guarantee will not be maintained. Alarmists may tell us that Antwerp is becoming a German port. Pan-Germans may claim its possession as necessary to German expansion, but there exists no affinity between the Belgians and the Germans. If they have any political sympathies, they are mainly French—the culture of Belgium is largely of French origin. But, politically, Belgium is determined to be neither French nor German. Belgium wants to remain independent, and Europe is resolved to protect her independence. Certainly Great Britain will never allow Belgium to become again either the cockpit of Europe or the prize of a victorious Continental Power. For if Belgium did not exist it would have to be invented.

OUR PORTRAIT OF MONTAIGNE

I.

IN the year of our Lord 1572, the Annus Mirabilis of French history, when the massacre of the night of St. Bartholomew sent a thrill of horror throughout the civilised world, when the bells of the Church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois were sounding the death-knell of thousands of Huguenots, when his most Christian Majesty, Charles IX., and his most august mother, the Dowager Queen Catherine of Medici, were witnessing from a window of the Louvre overlooking the Seine and were directing and enjoying the holy and wholesale slaughter of their miscreant subjects, there lived in the neighbourhood of Bordeaux, at the château of Montaigne, a country nobleman of moderate fortune, of simple habits, and more noted for his learning than for those warlike qualities becoming his rank and station.

II.

He claimed to be of ancient lineage and of English descent, although, if the truth be told, his grandfather was only a fish merchant. In his youth he had been a keen man of pleasure, but in his mature age he had learned to curb the passions of a sensuous temperament, and he had come to profess a profound contempt for that fair sex of which he had been such an ardent and such a fickle admirer. He was a sorry husband, which might have been the fault of his wife. He was a bad father, which certainly was not the fault of his children. He was an indifferent citizen, and there was a public rumour that, having been made a mayor of his native city, and the great plague having broken out during his tenure of office, he fled for his life, and left his fellow-citizens to grapple with the disease. He was one of those leaders of men who consider personal safety the better part of discretion, and who think that the first duty of a leader is to follow.

III.

In his younger years the Lord of Montaigne had also shown an eager desire to push his way into politics. He professed to be a loyal son of the Church, and was never tired of cursing those wicked Huguenots. He was an enthusiastic admirer of the Guises, the leaders of the Catholic party, and when counsels of moderation for one moment prevailed over bigotry and fanaticism, the young man, although himself a sceptic and a pagan, went out of his way to protest against the policy of toleration inaugurated by the Chancellor l'Hôpital, in order to ingratiate himself with those in power. But he soon discovered that political honours were a burden and a danger, and that at best they were absolutely incompatible with ease and liberty, which he valued above all things. And therefore, having filled for a few years several distinguished legal offices, he decided to live in the seclusion of his own manor. And there, in the old tower, fitted up with a magnificent library, he would hold converse with one or two select friends, but especially with those quietest and most loyal of all friends, the silent occupants of his shelves. And there, whilst the whole of France was devastated by predatory warfare, overlooking from his turret the champignons and vineyards of Gascony, he would contemplate, with philosophic composure, the political tragedy which was being enacted.

Others, indeed, might be distressed by the awful condition of their unhappy country; others, again, might be "sicklied over with the pale cast of thought"; but the temperament of the Lord of Montaigne was so happily constituted that nothing could disturb the serene equanimity of his disposition. It has been said that to those who are content to think, life is only a comedy; whilst to those who feel, life must needs be a tragedy. The Gascon nobleman belonged pre-eminently to the thinking kind, and not to the feeling. He had never been troubled with a morbid sensibility, and, therefore, the most harrowing horrors enacted under his very eyes would only appear in the light of a tragi-comedy of surpassing interest.

IV.

And thus year after year he would pursue the equable tenor of his life, escaping, by his continuous good fortune, from all those perils which were threatening his neighbours. Once or twice, indeed, when the hurricane of civil war was surging and raging too furiously, he would think it safe for a brief moment to withdraw from the tempestuous scene, and he would prefer the stimulus and excitement of travel to the imminent dangers involved by staying at home. But as soon as the hurricane had passed over, he would repair again to his beloved castle and observatory, to his friends and to his books. And, as time went on, in the summer of his life, he would more and more give up all his days to solitude and contemplation. And, meditating on his distant travels, on the stirring events of his times, on the civil dissensions, on the discoveries and explorations of new countries, and reading those great masters of antiquity who had recently been discovered, he would write down the result of his experiences, and he would note the impressions of his readings.

And having thus garnered day by day, year after year, the rich harvest of the past, the idea naturally occurred to him that those private journals ought not to remain private, and that he ought to impart to the world the benefit of his wisdom. And encouraged thereto by the appreciation of his friends, he finally decided to publish his experiments at authorship, and those "Essays," or "attempts," as he called them, appeared in a ponderous volume in the year of grace 1580.

V.

A very strange book they were, those "Essays," desultory, rambling, and, to outward appearance, rather a collection of stories and anecdotes than a treatise with a plan and purpose. They were written in every kind of style, in turn serious and frolicsome, solemn and frivolous, pious and cynical. They embraced every problem of life and death, they dealt with theology and ethics, with literature and politics. From a chapter on cannibals we pass on to a chapter on smells and public coaches; from a chapter on treason we pass on to a chapter on prayer.

And yet this strange book, by an eccentric and egotistic baronet of Gascony, thus ushered into the world in the most troubled times of the French wars of religion, has become one of the great books of world literature. The country nobleman, so careful of living in retirement and obscurity, has become one of the master-minds of his age and of all ages; "the master of those who know."

VI.

The vicissitudes of literary reputations are one of the commonplaces of criticism. But we doubt whether

(Continued on page 398.)

W. H.
CAFFYN
From the Original Picture in the Depot des Archives du Royaume à Paris

MS. Mignot

MICHEL EYQUEM, SEIGNEUR DE MONTAIGNE, NATUS 1533, OBIIT 1592

THE CHÂTEAU OF MONTAIGNE.

there is another instance in the history of letters of a book having had such a singular fortune or an influence so deep, so far-reaching, so universal, so sudden, and yet so permanent. In the lifetime of the writer, when books were dear and readers were few, it attained a sudden popularity, and for more than three hundred years the "Essays" of Montaigne have been one of the forces that have moulded European thought and literature, in substance as well as in form. The sceptical, impious, and immoral writer has become the spiritual father and guide of the most devout moralists, of the most saintly theologians. The "litterateur" and "dilettante," who knew nothing of science, has been directly or indirectly the promoter of a great scientific revival. The recluse has become the trusted adviser of men of the world. Nor is there any sign that the popularity of the "Essays" is on the wane. Indeed, the book is like the wine of the author's own Southern vineyards; it improves and becomes more "vital" as it gets older, and it becomes more valued as we get older, as we are able to interpret its lessons of wisdom from our own life experiences.

And thus the "Essays" appear to us as one of the mountain peaks of letters, or rather as a mountain range from which mighty rivers of thought have taken their source. If, indeed, you tried to bring together all the great men that have fallen under the spell of the Gascon, what an august company and what a motley crowd would be assembled: a company that would join in unexpected association Shakespeare and Molière, Bacon and Bayle, Pascal and Rousseau, Voltaire and Frederick the Great, La Bruyere and St. Beuve.

VII.

And let us take due notice of the fact that in that illustrious company not the least illustrious names are those belonging to the history of English thought, and that the influence of Montaigne in England is not the least extraordinary feature in the miraculous fortune of Montaigne's "Essays." Here is a foreigner, a Frenchman of the French, a Gascon of the Gascons, and this alien has become to all intents and purposes an English classic, and has exerted on English literature an influence as great as that which he exerted on his own country. The work of that Frenchman, translated by the Italian Florio, has become one of the standard books of a literature which sometimes, and somewhat foolishly, boasts of its insular and splendid isolation. The greatest thinker of the Elizabethan age has been so completely steeped in Montaigne that his "Essays" would never have appeared but for the French work which served them as a model. The greatest poet of the Elizabethan age, and of all ages, has imbibed Montaigne's inmost spirit so thoroughly that he has dramatised his philosophy and plagiarised his paradoxes. Was there ever a great moralist who could claim nobler intellectual progeny than Bacon and Shakespeare, not to mention Dean Church and Emerson, Walter Pater and Fitzgerald?

Not onely each countrey, but every Citie, yea and every vocation hath his owne particular decorum. I have very carefully beene brought up in mine infancie, and have lived in verie good company, because I would not bee ignorant of the good maners of our countrey of France, and I am perswaded I might keepe a schoole of them. I love to follow them, but not so cowardly, as my life remaine thereby in subjection. They have some painfull formes in them, which if a man forget by discretion, and not by errour, hee shall no whit bee disgraced. I have often scene men prove unmanerly by too much maners, and importunate by over-much curtesie.—From Florio's Translation of "Montaigne."

GIBBON'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

I.

GIBBON'S "Autobiography" is one of the shortest in the language, a very marvel of concision and compression, and it is also, by universal consent, one of the greatest. Those hundred brief pages are as assured of immortality as the twelve volumes of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." And they are assured of immortality, not only because they are an accurate and faithful record as to how one of the monuments of English literature was gradually built up, not only because of their stately and balanced periods, which often form such a quaint contrast with the homeliness of the subject-matter, but because they are something more than the life-story of a mere individual man of letters, they are the revelation of a splendid type—the type of the ideal student and scholar. In the Autobiography Gibbon stands before us as the perfect exemplar of pure intellect, a man in whom all the faculties of mind have been kept in strict subordination to a high literary endeavour and to the exclusive and disinterested pursuit of scientific truth.

II.

For let it be kept in mind that almost from his adolescence Gibbon was never anything but a student and a scholar, and that the story of his career is essentially the story of his gigantic literary labours. It is true that for a few years he was an officer of the Militia and a Member of Parliament; but, as he tells us himself in his own phraseology, his "senatorial dignity" and his military office were only a suitable preparation and a fitting discipline for the future historian of the Roman Empire. Not only was Gibbon exclusively the student, but to his studies he gave up leisure and ease, ambitions and affections. We may smile at his description of his first love; but his aloofness and detachment is, after all, but the renunciation of the scholar, and his attitude to woman and marriage is very much the attitude of the pure thinker. Like practically every great philosopher, like Descartes and Spinoza, like Kant and Schopenhauer, Gibbon deliberately chose the single state, because of the absorbing and tyrannical claims of the intellectual life.

III.

It is therefore strictly true to say that Gibbon brought to his life-work the truly heroic temper. That heroic quality is not often associated in the public mind with the typical man of letters; it certainly has been ignored in the case of Gibbon. Critics have been unanimous in extolling the artistic and intellectual qualities revealed by the History, but they have hardly done justice to those moral qualities of the man, which went to the making of the historian. The memory of Gibbon is still suffering from the attacks which his shallow treatment of the expansion of Christianity brought upon him. He is still represented as the scoffer, as the sceptic and the cynic, as the vain egotist and epicure. But surely it is hardly fair to call him vain-glorious who almost systematically effaces himself before his inferiors, who does justice to all but himself, and to whom modesty is part of good breeding.

It is hardly fair to call him an egotist and an epicure who gave his health and his liberty to a colossal task, to a task self-appointed, and involving the most austere and most unremitting labour. It is hardly fair to call him a sceptic who at the early age of fifteen became a martyr to his religious convictions. It is hardly fair to call him an egotist who was a dutiful son, a loyal friend, and who was so grateful for past affections that at the mere recollection of the aunt who nursed his delicate childhood he felt "tears of gratitude trickling down his cheek."

IV.

Let us revise, then, our judgment of Gibbon. Let us render a belated tribute of justice to the sterling qualities and to the moral temper of one of the most heroic scholars of all times. And let us specially remember that his shortcomings and weaknesses were those of his day and generation, whereas his virtues were all his own, and his achievements the result and reward of painful and systematic effort. Few men have had to struggle against more overwhelming odds. Nothing in his surroundings seemed to promise future greatness. He was a sickly child, without special opportunities, nor was he brought up in a literary atmosphere. From the beginning he was essentially a self-made and self-trained mind. Yet he eventually produced a prodigious monument of learning. His education was entirely foreign.

At sixteen Gibbon was an exile, he was left almost entirely to his own devices, and so little was there left of the Englishman that his first book was written in indifferent French. Yet he eventually succeeded in writing a masterpiece of English style. We may object to that style, we may wish it more natural, more flexible, but we must admit that it is supremely original and individual, and that it is admirably adapted to the dignity of the subject.

V.

But the Autobiography, like the History, is not only a masterpiece of style and a revelation of a truly great man of letters, it is also an essentially practical book, full of useful suggestions—indeed, as full of useful suggestions as the Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin. Gibbon not only reveals to us what can be achieved, even under untoward circumstances, he also tells us how it can be achieved. I need only refer to Gibbon's method of cultivating his style, and to his method of training the mind. I do not think that any educationist has discovered a safer means of securing mastery in the art of writing than the system of double translation analysed by the historian. Nor has anyone invented a more invaluable method of stimulating our intellectual activities and of preserving our intellectual originality than that which was adopted and conscientiously followed by Gibbon.

VI.

There are many other practical hints and wise counsels scattered all through the Autobiography. But perhaps the value of the book lies mainly in the moral example of a noble literary life, the inspiration of thirty years of ceaseless labour in the cause of historical truth. Let it be granted that Gibbon was by nature and temperament an epicure and an egotist, that there was no original distinction in his composition. Surely if his intellectual distinction was entirely acquired and adventitious the moral lessons we may learn from his life will be all the more instructive. For his example would then prove, all the more conclusively, that a noble task systematically pursued is by itself sufficient to impart dignity and even greatness to a character which otherwise would not seem to be predestined to greatness.

LITERARY NOTES

WHILE the obituary for the past year, so far as literature is concerned, cannot be said to be unusually heavy, it contains at least one name of outstanding importance, that of Mr. Andrew Lang—"Dear Andrew with the brindled hair," as R. L. Stevenson called him. Mr. Lang was unquestionably the first bookman of his age. It is true that, from a creative standpoint, he has left nothing that will live; but I doubt if any man of his time did more to bring home to the mind of the average reader the genuine pleasure that a familiar and varied acquaintance with books affords. *

Mr. Lang's versatility and industry were extraordinary. He made additions of one kind or another to almost every department of literature; and while his knowledge was often woefully defective and his opinions irritatingly expressed, he was invariably interesting. His sprightly personality shone through everything he wrote. I wonder how many authors there are of whom it can be said that they compel us to read them in spite of ourselves? This was the case with Mr. Lang. He might be hopelessly wrong as regards matters of fact, irredeemably biassed, and altogether unpalatable; nevertheless we read Andrew Lang simply because he was Andrew Lang. *

The year 1912 also witnessed the passing of Mr. Justin McCarthy, who, by the way, was often confounded with his son, Justin Huntly, also an author of some distinction. McCarthy, who in his early years was engrossed in journalism and subsequently in politics, in which he was not a success, devoted the major portion of his long life to literature. In the seventies and eighties of last century he wrote many novels; but he will best be remembered as an historian. His "History of Our Own Times" and his "History of the Four Georges," though not brilliant works, are carefully written, and have had an immense vogue among readers who are more partial to an easy flowing narrative than to elaborate footnotes and long lists of authorities. *

Two noted scholars have also passed away in the persons of Professor Skcat (to whose philological attainments I referred last week) and Dr. Verrall, whose contributions to classical learning and criticism were widely known and highly valued. Journalism, too, has lost heavily by the death of Mr. Labouchere and Mr. W. T. Stead. The editor of Truth and the editor of The Review of Reviews had not a great deal in common, but each in his own sphere occupied a unique position and wielded deep and far-reaching influence. Mr. Stead was a born journalist, and his egotisms and his fads notwithstanding, his was a most salutary force in the newspaper world. Nor ought I to forget Mr. W. F. Monypenny, who, although best known as the biographer of Disraeli, was an able and influential journalist. *

If that grim Old Testament writer who had it in his heart to say, "Of making many books there is no end," were to come alive to-day, I wonder what he would think. From the Bookseller I learn that during 1912 the total number of publications (mostly books, but including Government papers and Blue-books) was 12,886. I am, unfortunately, unable to compare these figures with those of last year, but as they stand they are wonderfully impressive. Think of it—about 250 publications on an average are issued from the press every week. The Bookseller has attempted to classify the output for 1912, and while its conclusions cannot be regarded as absolutely correct, they give a fair idea of the distinctive features of our abnormal literary appetite. *

As was to be expected, fiction heads the list with 2,290 prints and reprints. Government publications come second with 1,050, and then follow, in close succession, religion and theology, 934; essays and belles-lettres, 895; children's books and minor fiction, 821; biography and history, 674; and poetry and drama, 674. Only 233 volumes stand to the credit of art, and philosophy sinks to 66. Now, what surprises me is that works on religion and theology should be so numerous. I have heard a publisher say that theological books were the most unprofitable commodity in the market, and the statistics of public libraries seem to bear out this view. The only explanation seems to be that a large number of these books are published at the author's risk. Certain I am that the theological public is not a large one. *

Literature is represented in the New Year Honours' list by a solitary name—that of Dr. Francis Darwin, upon whom a knighthood has been conferred. The honour is well bestowed, for besides having written many important books dealing with his own subject—botany, Dr. Darwin has produced a very readable biography of his distinguished father, the author of "The Origin of Species." At the same time I cannot but think that literature on this occasion has been somewhat shabbily treated. Eighteen knighthoods have been conferred, and surely three at least might have gone to representative men of letters. Furthermore, why should such honours not be bestowed upon the heads of the great publishing houses who have done so much towards disseminating wholesome and cheap literature? *

Mr. Stephen Coleridge's volume of reminiscences, which Mr. Lane is to publish shortly, ought to be a most readable book. Mr. Coleridge not only comes of distinguished stock (his father was the famous Lord Chief Justice), but has known many notable people in all stations of life, has travelled much, and made some mark as an author and artist. But I daresay he figures most in the public eye as a pronounced anti-vivisectionist. Indeed, he is the leading spirit of the crusade, and has presided over meetings in connection with it in various parts of the country. What Mr. Coleridge has to say regarding his anti-vivisection experiences should be full of interest. *

I am glad to note Mr. Stanley Weyman's tribute to the late Mr. J. B. Atlay in the January number of the Cornhill. Mr. Atlay was a quiet, unostentatious man, who did a very large amount of literary work of the best quality without any flourish of trumpets. Mr. Weyman mentions, what is not generally known, that during a period of years few articles appeared in the Cornhill which had not passed under Mr. Atlay's eye. A lawyer by profession, he made many important contributions to legal literature, notably his "Famous Trials of the Nineteenth Century"; but to the general public he was most favourably known by "The Victorian Chancellors," which is really a continuation of Campbell's "Lives of the Chancellors." Mr. Weyman testifies to the vast range of Mr. Atlay's knowledge and the catholicity of his tastes. For proof of this one has only to consult the "Dictionary of National Biography," to which he was a voluminous contributor. X. Y. Z.

FEODOR DOSTOIEFFSKY * * * BY J. A. T. LLOYD

I.

WHETHER Dostoieffsky is or is not the most universal of the great Russian realists of the nineteenth century, he is undoubtedly the most national of them all. It seems as if, at last, he were coming into his own in this country, and it is particularly fortunate that his genius should be communicated through the sensitive and faithful pen of the lady who has done so much to preserve in a foreign language the very essence of Turgenev's evasive charm. Mrs. Garnett's complete translation of Dostoieffsky ought most certainly to direct the attention of the great English public to the author of "Crime and Punishment."

That extraordinary book was written in 1865, perhaps the most desolate year, even in the desolate life of Dostoieffsky. His wife had died; his favourite brother had died; his best friend had died; the failure of his second journalistic venture, the Epoch, had followed the failure of his first, the Vremya. He was on the verge of being arrested for debt, and an official visited him with the intention of making him a prisoner. Dostoieffsky, however, succeeded in making friends with him, and learned from him a great many details of the law's machinery, which he made use of in "Crime and Punishment." With his brother's debts to meet, his stepson Paul to support, in addition to his brother's widow and her family, he fled from Russia to evade imprisonment. "And here I am, alone," he writes to Wrangel, "and I feel afraid. It has become terrible! My life is broken in two. On one side the past, with everything for which I had lived; on the other the unknown, without a single heart to replace the two that have left me. Literally, there is no reason left to me for continuing to live."

Scarcely was he established at Wiesbaden than his old passion for gambling mastered him, and in September he was forced to admit to Wrangel that he had lost everything. As no immediate reply came to this letter, Dostoieffsky wrote again even more urgently: "I have spent everything, I am in debt at the hotel, I have no credit here, and I am in the most pitiable situation. That has been going on up to the present, with this difference, that it is twice as bad now. Furthermore, I have to go to Russia, I have business there which permits of no delay; I can neither pay my debts, nor leave through want of money for travelling expenses, and I am in utter despair." Under these difficult circumstances, he continued to work on "Crime and Punishment," which he believed to be the best book that he had yet written, "if only they will give me time to finish it!"

II.

"Crime and Punishment" has been regarded in this country as the apotheosis of the detective story. Of course, it is really nothing of the kind. Nor is it an Ibsen-like thesis on crime in the abstract. It is not in the Russian nature to apply oneself conscientiously to a set thesis, and when the author of "Anna Karénina" consciously endeavoured to produce such work, he reverted constantly to his earlier "motif" of interpreting life from life. It is the same with his great rival in this book. Raskolnikoff defending the abstraction of murder is tedious even to himself. But Raskolnikoff, the student-dreamer, who had suffered as Dostoieffsky had suffered, who had seen the dreams of youth pale and fade—Raskolnikoff, the concrete murderer, whom his creator knew to the core, is profoundly interesting. Over and over again, in his letters, Dostoieffsky has given descriptions of himself, which tally almost verbally with Razoumikhin's portrait of Raskolnikoff. Particularly characteristic is that duality on which Dostoieffsky always laid such stress: "One might almost say that there exist in him two natures, which alternately get the upper hand."

III.

Raskolnikoff, before everything else, is the slave of an idée fixe, by which he is compelled to discover whether he is a follower of the herd or a differentiation from it. He is the criminal by curiosity, rather than by conviction, and he illustrates the old, old struggle between those opposing types of Dostoieffsky, the followers of the God-man, and the followers of the Man-god. In "War and Peace" Prince Andrei studies Kutusoff minutely, wondering whether he has or has not the right to condemn by a gesture thousands of his fellow human beings to death. Tolstoy's hero comes to the conclusion that the Russian general had this right, but Dostoieffsky's student-murderer can never really convince himself that he is beyond the pale of ordinary life. Such certitude of arrogance is foreign to Dostoieffsky, and even the hero of "Demons" is wanting in it. Raskolnikoff's punishment is contained in his own nature. For Dostoieffsky, indeed, there is no hard-and-fast differentiation at all between crime and punishment. He shows us, on the contrary, a long process of natural development growth from the first moment of the idée fixe to the final yielding of atonement. Crime and punishment, in the eyes of Dostoieffsky, are each a part of the same process, and the real message of the book is conveyed, not by Porphyrius, the representative of law and order, but by Sonia, the sombre prostitute, who exclaims: "What could I be? What should I be without God?" It is not human justice, but Marmeladoff, the despairing drunkard, who reveals the ultimate secret of both punishment and pardon.

IV.

Dostoieffsky's overstrained and fantastic vision is without the modulated artistic power of Turgenev, just as it is without the balanced moral earnestness of Tolstoy. But, in a sense, he is more universal than either the cosmopolitan of genius or the great Russian moral instructor of Europe. For Dostoieffsky speaks neither from the pulpit nor from the bench, but, if you will, from the dock. Humbly, he places himself on the level of the humblest, and pleads not for such as Marmeladoff, but as one of them. He had been born in a hospital, and for no small portion of his life he had herded with outcasts. He had known want and crime and desolation in all their naked ugliness, but he had preserved their lessons rather than their torments. A veritable confessor of the Russian soul, he shrank from no phase of human suffering, not even from the suffering of sin, which he knew so well to be the one true punishment. But he had put away from him once and for ever the arrogance of the aloof, whom he would remind, in the words of the Apocalypse, that, though they know it not, they, too, are wretched and unhappy and poor and blind and naked. The hero of "Crime and Punishment" endeavoured to stand in disdainful arrogance of life, and when he was at last humbled to the very dust, it was not by the power of imperial justice, but by the redeeming tears of Sonia, the unfortunate.

THE CARPENTER

SHORT STORY

THE May afternoon was warm, but the workshop was cool in the shade, and only a few beams of sunlight made their way through the squares of window-glass, or fell across the threshold of the door. The carpenter stood white-aproned, and with rolled-up shirt-sleeves. His eyes were clear and pleasant beneath his shaggy eyebrows, his forehead high, and above his brow lay a picturesque profusion of wavy hair, hoary and silky; and, indeed, all the snowy hair that set off his face so finely, whiskers and beard, was of the same purity of whiteness, softness of texture, and light, waving gracefulness.

He was alone, and intent upon his work, which he seemed to carry on to a rhythmic accompaniment of harmony. When he laid his knee on the plank, and drew and thrust the gleaming blade of the saw across the seasoned timber, the rhythm was regular and sustained, and the saw gave out a mellow, sonorous note; when he drove the plane with resistless directness from his shoulder along the clean board, a ringing crescendo finished the stroke, and a fair curl of shaving fell lightly revolving to the floor; even the blows of his mallet, and the sharp staccato taps of his hammer were part of the harmonious whole. Refreshing odours of pine and mahogany arose in the workshop, and drifted out on the warm air through the open doorway, beyond which ran a pleasant garden, with a trim hedge, over which drooped snowy branches of hawthorn, and tassels of laburnum hung as a golden fringe.

It was not often that the carpenter had a visitor to his workshop, but the entrance of a stranger now was not unwelcome. He paused in his work, wiped away the perspiration from his face with his apron, and, as was his habit, put a wisp of shaving between his lips.

"It is very warm," said the carpenter, addressing the stranger.

"You are working hard," he replied.

"I have to do that," returned the workman, "with the wife and the children to keep."

The visitor smiled approvingly, and watched the carpenter keenly as he proceeded with his work, bearing a helping hand now and again. With pleasure he watched the trained hand and eye moving together, the skill and accuracy with which the many tools were handled, and the constant aim at perfection and truth in all his workmanship.

"I see you know something about my kind of trade," at length observed the carpenter.

"Yes," replied the stranger, "I used to ply your trade at one time, and I know when the work is well done."

The carpenter looked up with a smile, and he and his visitor chatted together on matters of interest and delight to kindred craftsmen. Together they examined the oak upon which the carpenter had been working, and both remarked admiringly upon the beauty of the grain.

"To what use and ornament have the light of summer and the storms of winter at length-matured this wood," observed the stranger. "How strong and sound and beautiful is the heart of it; surely the character of a man's soul may become as this oak by the patient endurance of a long and faithful life, and its beauty and usefulness be brought out and developed by the skill of a cunning master-workman hereafter, as the tree when it is removed from its place."

So saying the visitor arose to go. "Have you much work in hand now?" he asked.

"No," replied the carpenter; "as you see, I have almost finished, and shall presently have to look for something more."

The stranger bade good-bye to the workman, and went his way. A voice came from the garden. It was the carpenter's wife calling him into the house to tea. He spoke of his visitor during the evening meal to his wife and children seated around the table.

"Who was he?" was the query on the lips of all, but the carpenter could give no answer.

That night the stranger called again. He had tidings of more work for the carpenter. "Come," said he, "I have many mansions to prepare, and seek skilled craftsmen to aid me." . . .

When morning came, there was no sound of hammer or of mallet, nor swish of the plane, nor rhythm of saw in the carpenter's workshop; the crisp shavings were strewn upon the floor as they had fallen, still clean and fragrant; the tools lay silent on the bench—the carpenter was busy elsewhere.

WILLIAM HOWARD.

THE FIRST OF THE MYSTICS*

A HUMBLE village shoemaker of the seventeenth century, Jacob Behmen was said by Hegel to be the founder of German philosophy. Behmen, a visionary of the calibre of Blake, as he plied his tools in his little workshop, beheld with his inward eye the heavens open above him, and was wafted into the Divine presence of God Himself.

From these aerial spiritual flights he returned, inspired, to probe the unfathomed depths of human life and wickedness. In time Behmen began to record his wonderful thoughts and visions in written language, a language so strange, intricate, and baffling that Dr. Whyte, in this able and loving appreciation of the great mystic, speaks of it as an absolutely new and unheard-of language. "Behmen's books," he says, "are written neither in German nor in English of any age or idiom, but in the most original and uncouth Behmenese." To unravel the tangle of Kant's sentences must, it would seem, be child's play compared with the labour of getting at Behmen's pearls of thought through the intricacies of his rude and homely style. Yet the task did not daunt such a master of English devotional prose as William Law, who was thrown into a "sweat" of ecstasy when he first alighted at an old bookstall upon Behmen's "The Three Principles," translated into English by a barrister of the Inner Temple. Law became greatly influenced by Behmen's works, and himself Englished "The Supersensual Life" in a prose so melodious and trenchant that Dr. Whyte places the work even higher than the famous Imitation of à Kempis, as he ranks Behmen's Holy Week next to the Psalms, and his True Repentance side by side with Bishop Andrewes' "Private Devotions." If the world is indebted to William Law in the first place for making Jacob Behmen widely known outside his native land, our hearty thanks are also due to Dr. Whyte for his pregnant and suggestive study of a remarkable seer and thinker.

* "Jacob Behmen: An Appreciation." By Alexander Whyte. (Edinburgh: Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier.)

THE CADIS OF LONDON * * BY M. HAMILTON

To the uninitiated the very words police court suggest a place of gloom and dread, charged with pains and penalties that crowd on the imagination and strike terror to the soul. You picture, perhaps, the court, bare but lofty, impressive by reason of its ceremony, awful with the tragedy of broken lives, the flotsam and jetsam that the tide of life leaves stranded at the feet of London's Cadis. The first impression you receive is one of noise and bustle. Large policemen creak to and fro from the witness-box, worried ushers shepherd the witnesses, suppress the public herded at the far end of the court. Solicitors' clerks slip in and out, intent with messages for their principals seated at a table immediately below the magistrate's clerk. And on the bench, surveying the kingdom over which he has to rule, sits a quiet and somewhat tired-looking man, with quick eyes and steady mouth. The magistrate wears no robes, bears no insignia of office; it is perhaps the most remarkable thing about the court to note the absence of all trappings. Above the bench are the King's arms, the one spot of colour on the dingy background—the spot on which the prisoner's eyes instinctively are set. The court opens at ten, the magistrate takes his seat shortly after. The solicitors and pressmen waiting rise as he enters, and the business of the day begins.

* * *

There is inevitably a long list of "disorderlies." The poor predominate in these cases: one feels that if the shabby, wretched-looking man, who stands with bent head in the dock, could only put his case, explain the circumstances that led to his arrest, he would put a different complexion upon things. For the most part, prisoners at a police court are inarticulate. Unable to formulate their explanations, frame their excuse, they stand dumb and helpless, weighed down by the sense of impotence, the intolerable burden of a dreadful silence that they cannot shake off. The result, in the majority of instances, is the same—a fine varying from 5s. to 40s., or in default a short term of imprisonment—and the prisoner, steps, dogged and dazed, from the dock. Cases of exceeding the speed limit come next, with charges of petty theft. If the prisoner is Irish, or of the gentler sex, the chances of acquittal are enormously increased. Few women are tongue-tied, and no Irishman lacks eloquence, and humour comes to the Cadi wearied with routine like a refreshing draught.

* * *

Domestic squabbles play a large part in the day's procedure. Mrs. A. has reason to complain of the attitude of Mrs. B. The latter has addressed offensive language to her, called her rude names. "I want a summons for annoyance, yer worship," an eager-faced little woman protests with volubility. The Cadi interrupts with tired severity, "Has Mrs. B. come into your room?" "No, yer worship; which it would be better for her she should not." "Then," says the magistrate, "you can't have a summons. Go home and shut your door, and don't listen to her. . . . Should I like it?"—he smiles and shrugs. "I shouldn't mind it in the least," and the applicant, puzzled and aggrieved, stands down.

* * *

Wonderful it is to note how the atmosphere of every court is changed as if by magic by the personality of the presiding magistrate. I have seen the Marlborough Street Court sitting subdued under Mr. Denman—stiff, formal, precise, constrained, and, let us hope, conscientious. The next day we reporters have found our drooping spirits revive. It is one of Mr. Plowden's mornings, and he is at his best. The court smiles, then roars, and at last rocks with laughter. Even the careworn prisoners join in the merriment. But Mr. Plowden's witticisms, good as they are, seem quite poor in type, without the ready smile, the swift reply, above all, the quick eye that pierces down to the heart of the matter at a glance. I call to mind now some of his more trenchant comments. "I have had little to eat," said a prisoner, "but, thank God, I've a contented mind." "Which," said Mr. Plowden, "you know is a continual feast. Pay five shillings." Again, a self-important instructor of the violin, prosecuting an organ-grinder, impressed us all unfavourably. "This," said Mr. Plowden, "is a case of professional jealousy. They are rival musicians. Prisoner is discharged." One more "Plowdenism." A man was charged with throwing bread and butter over a wall into Wormwood Scrubbs Prison. "I'm sure I don't know why you've been charged," Mr. Plowden told him. "I suppose that so much food frightened the governor."

* * *

But the atmosphere of the court is changed also, not only by the personality of the magistrate, but by the seriousness of the business in hand. I well remember seeing the late Mr. Biron, years ago, who, as I thought, was dozing over trivial fines and petty penalties, suddenly wake when he found brought before him a prisoner who elected to take his trial on a charge of theft before the Cadi himself, rather than go to the sessions. The prisoner had no counsel. I shall never forget the alertness and dexterity with which the old gentleman turned the witnesses inside out. Then came the really exciting moment. He asked the prisoner if had anything to say, and warned him to be careful, and those in court who understood realised that the man's danger was at its greatest. Ten to one he would make a statement that would incriminate himself. Not so, however. He was, in fact, so confused and incoherent that his remarks, like those of Edgar Poe's raven, "little meaning, little relevancy bore." But he was not on the spot when the theft took place, notwithstanding all the witnesses. Where was he? Why, going to see his "dear old muvver." And he got off.

* * *

If the magistrate ever permits himself to doze, there is at least one official in court whose upright figure never seems to stoop and whose keen eyes never tire. The gaoler stands by the corner of the dock, quietly watching the prisoners. He never speaks till the Cadi asks, "Has he ever been here before?" and the almost inevitable conviction, and the date, follow with automatic precision. For the horror of these figures in the dock is that they return again, and yet again!

* * *

One of the most welcome innovations that have crept into police-court administration is the missionary. If he be a wise, tactful and resourceful man, he is ever in request, and his opportunities of service are infinite. The young man who has gone astray, and is to have another chance, the wife who despairs of her husband, the outcast who pleads for help, the workman who has lost his job—all are referred to this quiet, tireless, unostentatious worker, who has saved many a home, healed many a heart.

AN ETON EDUCATION BY

MGR. R. H. BENSON

PART III.—MORALITY

It has been seen how small a part religion plays, amongst boys educated under the Eton system, as a motive for morality. It is true that many bring a good working religion from home, and that a very few, under exceptional circumstances, find one at school from help obtained unofficially from some zealous and sympathetic master; but, as a system, Eton supplies neither a dogmatic nor an emotional basis for a life of well-doing, since there is no official provision made for that individualisation which alone renders religion effective. The result is that morality is at a low ebb, since personal fastidiousness and individual repulsion to vice cannot, without religious sanctions, prevail long or widely against that relaxed state of public opinion which invariably follows a low religious tension.

A few years ago a well-known journal published articles and correspondence on the subject of Vice at Eton. It seemed to me that the writers were singularly ill-informed (unless, indeed, matters have radically changed since the late 'eighties), since again and again it was implied that boys were bullied into vice, and that personal religion was made difficult. Such charges as these are wholly uncharacteristic of Eton. Never in all my years there did I even hear a hint that any boy was ever driven to vice by anything resembling bullying; neither was there ever the faintest pressure brought to bear against a boy's religious views and practices. Actual prayer-meetings were held amongst boys in one house, to my personal knowledge, without any opposition beyond that of good-humoured laughter; in another house a small group recited Compline regularly every night, and the only person I ever even saw smile at it was a master; on a later occasion, when I myself as a clergyman was on a visit to Eton, I saw for myself from eighty to a hundred boys present at an early Communion one Whit-Sunday morning at the parish church, since (such is the absence of official encouragement to devotion) no early celebration was held in the school-chapel on that day. Since that time, too, I have known intimately Catholic boys that were being educated at Eton—boys who regularly and devoutly frequented the sacraments in the Catholic church at Windsor, with the cordial encouragement of their house master and the school authorities—and never have I heard of one single instance of a boy as having suffered even the mildest persecution on this account. In justice, then, it must be said that an Eton boy who desires to lead a clean and religious life need fear no sort of bullying or unfair pressure on that account. There is plenty of religion and purity and high thinking at Eton: there are fine qualities among the boys, insurpassable anywhere. Yet the lowness of the moral standard is, for all that, in one respect, deplorable. For, while no external force is ever used to lead a boy into vice, there is, generally speaking, no sort of public feeling amongst the boys against vice in itself. On the one side, no boy ever suffers at Eton because of his virtue; on the other, no boy who prefers vice loses anything whatever in public estimation on that account. I have known boys high in the school—athletes and even scholars—whose lives were simply deplorable—boys who would not shrink for one instant from the deliberate corrupting of innocence, and did not: yet they were cheered as heartily, on public occasions, and revered as adoringly as young Sir Galahads; and I have known equally popular younger boys, smart, beautifully dressed, and radiant—popular amongst their fellows and amongst the masters, the admired of mothers and aunts and cousins—who had the souls and the morals of the lowest type, yet who suffered no sort of diminution of popular respect on that account. In one instance only have I known public opinion turn against such a boy, when a peculiarly bad story came out; and in this case it was the lower boys of a rather fast house, who caught him one morning before chapel and, very properly, rubbed his face with coal dust. But his big friend remained as popular as ever.

The moral code of public schoolboys educated under such circumstances as those of Eton, is, it must be remembered, a very peculiar thing. Certain virtues are rigorously enforced. A boy who funks at football, is an outcast; a boy who is dirty in his dress or person is a "scug"; a boy who gets his friends into trouble with the authorities is simply impossible. Other more subtle virtues, too, are inculcated by public opinion: such things as proper humility, honesty, generosity, self-restraint in food, and, to some extent, truthfulness: to some extent, for while certain kinds of lies are the marks of a "cad," other kinds—for instance, clever lies, that excuse without really deceiving (such lies as a boy will tell when confronted by a master with some omission in his school work)—these are not considered faults at all. I have heard a boy—now an eminent financier—explain for the fourth Monday morning running that, "Please, sir, I shewed up my Sunday questions and put them on the table in your study; they must have blown out of the window." All that the master did was to point out that this was the fourth time that term that that particular accident had befallen that particular boy; and all that the class did was to grin and marvel at their friend's "nerve." The code, then, is peculiar; it is not in the least what the masters or parents think it to be; it does not necessarily at all correspond to Christianity or the Ten Commandments: it is a subtle and mysterious thing, into which the boy is gradually initiated by the pressure of public opinion and statements as to "good form." And, emphatically, as has been said, it pronounces no opinion at all, either way, as to that particular form of vice which is, as a certain Eton master has described it, the "nightmare" of all who have the care of youth. In that the boy is left terribly free.

It is, indeed, a nightmare. There is not a master at Eton who does not strain every nerve to combat it. One, with the best intentions, will make a point of going round his house in the winter evening hours between tea and prayers, when most of the harm is done, breaking up tactfully the little groups that form Public Opinion at such times; another, with equally good intentions, understanding that, after all, a single official is powerless, will but seldom go round his boys' rooms, but instead will do his utmost to win the sympathy and co-operation of the elder ones, since these are, after all (as he well knows), the real guardians of morality. Another will preach passionate sermons in chapel, appealing to all "right-minded boys" to stand out on the side of righteousness; and this is, perhaps, the most futile method of all. For this kind of "right-mindedness" is not that of public opinion;

(Continued on page 406.)

A Popular and Authoritative Exposition of Scientific Achievement.

THE Science History of the Universe.

IN TEN HANDY LITTLE VOLUMES.

I. ASTRONOMY.
II. GEOLOGY.
III. PHYSICS.
IV. CHEMISTRY.
V. BIOLOGY.

Presenting in simple language and in a fascinating style that accurate and authoritative knowledge of the history, records and achievements of all the Sciences which it is absolutely necessary for every intelligent person to possess to-day.

VI. ZOOLOGY.
VII. ANTHROPOLOGY.
VIII. MATHEMATICS.
IX. ART & LETTERS.
X. PHILOSOPHY.

DO YOU WANT TO KNOW—

About the three separate periods—the naturalistic, the idealistic, and the humanistic—through which Greek philosophy passed? See The History of Philosophy. Vol. I.

Or in what way does a star in a cluster differ from the earth? See Cosmogony of the Stellar Revolution. Vol. I.

How would you prove the existence of men in former geological periods? See Historical Geology. Vol. II.

Why it takes five times as much heat to change the water into steam as it did to raise its temperature from freezing to boiling point? See Heat. Vol. III.

The terms of the guarantees—for distance, secrecy, wave measurements, etc.—given by the Fessenden system for transatlantic signalling? See Wireless Telegraphy. Vol. III.

How chemistry is the pathfinder in developing new processes or in the discovery of useful products? See Applied Chemistry. Vol. IV.

That all animals with warning colours have some quality, a disagreeable odour, a sting, hairs, etc., that renders them obnoxious to other animals who might seize them for food?

Or to what category the white upturned tail of the rabbit, or the black tip of the weazel's tail belongs? See Adaptation. Vol. V.

The reason of the lightness and buoyancy that apparently remains in the bones of those who have made a protracted aerial voyage?

See Mathematical Application: Airships. Vol. VI.

What was the unique distinction of Spartan Law? Or the differences between the Athenian conception of Law, the Draconian Code, Roman Law, the Justinian Code, the Code Napoleon, etc.? And how English Law differs from that of the Continental systems?

See The History of Law. Vol. X.

The history of the development of the modern novel, and why the really great novelist of the future will most probably arise in Germany?

See The Development of the Novel. Vol. IX.

What was the effect of the Spectroscope on astronomical research work?

See The Rise of Astrophysics. Vol. I.

All about the fascinating experiment which Gruenbaum made with the serum of animals, apes and men, and what the results of that experiment may be taken to prove?

Why it is most probable that the geological evidence as to the true ancestry of man will be discovered only when Central and Eastern Asia are thoroughly searched for fossil vertebrates? See Zoology. Vol. VI.

THE KNOWLEDGE EVERY WELL-INFORMED PERSON NEEDS.

In addition to presenting the whole wide field of scientific achievement, the little "Science History of the Universe" is absolutely up to date. It gives a brilliant exposition of Marconi's triumphs under "Applied Mathematics"; "Wireless Telegraphy" comes under Physics; the art of Whistler and of Sargent under Art and Letters. The study of Psychology, which has so recently been recognised as a distinct science, fittingly ends the little volume on Philosophy. And every chapter, from those that treat of the beginnings of effort in every field from before the days of Aristotle down to our own exploitation of science in the food markets of the world to day, is written so as to attract to this delightful knowledge the young of both sexes, who will find a knowledge of scientific matters more and more necessary in every career and profession to-day. Send for the Free Book on "The Science History," which is offered post free and without any charge or obligation whatever to order the work.

THE FREE BOOK.

To the WAVERLEY BOOK CO., Ltd., 7 and 8, Old Bailey, London, E.C.

Please send me your Free Book on "The Science History of the Universe," with particulars as to your offer to deliver the ten little volumes complete for a first payment of 2s. 6d. It is understood that I am under no obligation to order the work.

NAME (Send this Form or a Postcard.)

ADDRESS

E. E. 1913.

POST this
TO-DAY

N.B. — Acceptance of this offer of the FREE Book carries with it no obligation to order the work.

it appears as a grown-up, authoritative assumption (suspiciously resembling the sentimentalism of "Eric, or Little by Little"), and does not correspond with facts: the boys look up sharply and amusedly under the storm of words, and comment afterwards on the foolish excitement of the preacher. It is of no avail that these things are done, though in this or that house perhaps the personal influence of a master may succeed for a little while; it is of no avail that expulsion (or "the sack") is the instant vengeance decreed on such crimes. Public opinion goes its way, gently and irresistibly, and habits and tastes are learned that a lifetime cannot eradicate.

Now, the main flaw in the whole system is, I believe, that which has already been indicated, viz., the complete absence of any scheme which will individualise religion. If your system is superficial, your results will be superficial; and, under the superficialities, public opinion will form itself regardless of your wishes. Boys are not made to hate vice by an artistic chapel service and the singing of hymns, nor even by general services of preparation for Communion: these things, in fact, divorced from personal dealings, may even add slightly to the harm by developing and refining that emotionalism and sentiment that inspire so much schoolboy vice. For schoolboy vice is not "coarse," in the sense of brutality or blind passion; it is usually exceedingly delicate and refined, and all the more deadly on that account: it is, in fact, a symptom of overstrained civilisation; it is not the mere result of animalism and puberty.

It can only be dealt with, then, by a delicate and refined treatment—above all, by an individualised treatment. You must meet desire by desire, refinement by refinement, passion by passion. Statistics of ruined lives will not avail, except in the case of the meanest-spirited; mere moral ideals will not, at any rate to the mind of the average schoolboy, stand unsupported in the air. In short, somehow or another, you must teach schoolboys to love God, and I am unaware of any way of accomplishing this except by dealing separately with individuals, by giving each opportunities of making confidences to a person he can wholly trust, and by supplying him both with means of beginning again when he has fallen, and with dogmas as to the character and methods of the God whom he is to learn to serve.

If chaplains were appointed whose business it was to be accessible at fixed times to all boys, who were allowed freely to visit the houses and make friends there, who were reasonable, virile, sympathetic, and unsentimental men of the world who could really preach—and not merely read a discourse—men, that is to say, chosen for these qualities with as much care, and remunerated as amply, and treated with as much respect, as masters who have merely educational duties, I think something might be done.

But it will not be done. I know that. If such a thing were seriously proposed, the howl would be too great. It would be said that such a system would savour of the Popish Confessional; that it would encourage morbid introspection and unreal devotion; that characters would be weakened; that boys would never learn to stand alone. We should be urged once more to look at Eton Chapel on Sunday evening and the "bright young faces," and to listen to the "bright young voices" singing manly hymns, and to ask ourselves whether anything could be better or more English than the system that already prevails—the system, that is to say, in which unspeakable vice finds no final condemnation from the only effective tribunal—the tribunal of Public Opinion.

AN ETON EDUCATION

A REPLY TO MGR. BENSON

THE Public Schoolmaster has much to put up with from his critics in the Press, many of whom know next to nothing about the problems of Public School Education at the present day; but when a writer of Monsignor Benson's distinction brings forward the charges which he did, in your issue of December 24, 1912, against the intellectual training provided at his old school, it may perhaps be permitted to one who is privileged to assist in teaching the youth of that much-abused institution to make some reply.

I happened to be at Eton as a boy at the same time—now some twenty-five years ago—as Monsignor Benson, and I shall certainly demur to the accuracy of some of his statements with regard to the Eton of that date. He was a clever "colleger," and I was only an average "oppidan," and therefore, no doubt, far less critical of my instructors than he was; and I personally shall not apply the epithet "dreary" to a good deal of the teaching of our schooldays. But Monsignor Benson goes on to say that he never remembers a single lesson being given him in History or English whilst at Eton. Well, I had the good fortune to be the pupil of his brother, Mr. A. C. Benson, then a master at Eton, and all I can say is that I still have a vivid recollection of his brother's teaching in those two subjects, and that, entirely owing to him, I read during my last two years at Eton a considerable amount of History.

But anyone reading Monsignor Benson's article would gather, I think, that he was alluding not only to the Eton of his day, but also to the Eton of the present time. One of his charges is that "no allowance is made for individual temperament," and that "specialisation in History, Modern Languages, Science, Mechanics, is rigidly excluded—and even in Mathematics, too, to some extent." I have had the curiosity to investigate what subjects the first hundred boys in the School were studying last term; and I found that less than half—to be accurate, forty-seven—were studying the Classics; whilst, of the remaining fifty-three, eight were "specialising" in Mathematics, twenty-three in History and German, ten in French and German, and twelve in Science.

Monsignor Benson goes on to complain that the study of the Classics "meant a minute study of certain minute details of grammarian's analyses of the Latin and Greek languages." But if this is true it is difficult to account for Eton recently securing, in five successive years, a Balliol Classical Scholarship—the best test yet devised of a "liberal" Classical education—and in obtaining the first and third Classical Scholarships at the Balliol this month.

Monsignor Benson's last charge is that "what is taught is taught drearily." I wish that critics of the long-suffering schoolmaster would sometimes remember that he is, after all, a human being, and that no human being would wish, if he could help it, to spend the best part of his life in taking "dreary" lessons.

I am the last to deny that Public Schools, like all other human institutions, are capable of amendment; and that all schoolmasters have many deficiencies, of which they are at least as sensible as people are of their own in other walks of life. But I think that Monsignor Benson has unwittingly done injustice to his old School; and, like other people, he has forgotten that Public Schools do make changes in their curriculum a good deal more often than is usually supposed, and that criticisms based on experiences going back nearly a quarter of a century are sometimes out of date.

AN ETON MASTER.

THE "RIDDLE" OF LIFE AND SUCCESS.

Why Some People "Get On" and Others Fail.

A "SELF-ACCOUNTANCY" TEST FOR YOURSELF.

Special to Readers of "Everyman."

Have you ever pulled yourself up, so to speak, with some such personal questions as these?—

"Am I making progress?"

"Am I any better off this year than I was last?"

"Do other people regard me as one who is, or is not, a stand-stiller?"

It is of the greatest value to every man and every woman to make such a periodical self-examination as this, to stand off, as it were, and to watch yourself walking past with other men and women in the unending procession of life.

It is a form of Self-Accountancy which shows you exactly where you stand in relation to others.

It shows you whether you are making that rapid upward progress in the world that you so ardently intended, when you first started out to fight your way through life.

A MAGAZINE THAT STIRS YOUR BRAIN.

It was a copy of Brain-Power that first started these thoughts in the writer's mind, the new magazine that is attracting so much attention at the present moment amongst the workers in the busy workshop of the world.

It is a brain-stirring magazine this, the most stimulating and intellect-arousing periodical that has ever been published in Britain.

To read its absorbing pages is to feel one's ambition stirring within one, to feel the glow of healthy aspiration suffusing one's whole intellectual being.

For here is set forth not only the rich rewards that await those who have learned the true master power of the mind, and how it enables you to conquer throughout life, but also you are shown exactly how you can train your mind for success, and so sharpen that splendid sword of the intellect that it will be a weapon to enable you to vanquish every opponent, and to overcome every difficulty in the battle of life.

20,000 READERS TO BENEFIT.

Should you wish to read this magazine for yourself, you may do so without incurring the slightest cost. Arrangements have now been completed by which 20,000 copies of this stimulating and brain-stirring magazine are to be placed for the next two or three days at the services of readers of this journal.

On applying to the publishers of Brain-Power at the address printed below, a complimentary copy of the January (first) number of this magazine will be forwarded you gratis and post free, together with special information which will enable you to double, treble, or even quadruple the present money-earning powers of your brain.

THE POWER OF ACHIEVING YOUR AMBITION.

On first starting out on life most people are ambitious to rise to a leader's position in the world.

But years go on, and the great majority of them find themselves still occupying subordinate positions in their firms and businesses.

For the first decade or so they make some headway—but no very rapid progress.

And then at the age of thirty, or thereabouts, they stick. They find they have reached the limit of their powers. This is because they are earning only just what their brains are worth. They can get no further because the positions above them are filled by men of greater practical ability and mental power. They cease to strive for higher things.

That is what happens at present to the vast majority of men and women. Their minds do not grow. Their powers are limited. They occupy subordinate positions. They are "little people" as far as wealth and intellectual capacity are concerned. And, so in the great "riddle" of life they are shaken through the meshes into mediocrity—while those whose minds grow and develop every year in capacity and power remain and are selected for the higher posts in business, commerce, finance, trade, art, science, literature, and the professions.

DEVELOPS ALL THESE MENTAL QUALITIES.

There are those who rapidly mount the ladder of life. They develop—as every reader can develop by following the advice given in Brain-Power—the mental qualities of:—

- | | |
|------------------------------|------------------------------|
| Initiative. | Originaliveness. |
| Concentration. | Creative Imagination. |
| Ideation. | Salesmanship. |
| Organisation. | Judgment. |
| Will-Power. | Directive Power. |
| Business Action. | Self-Confidence. |
| Never-Failing Memory. | Mental Mastery. |

By developing these qualities any man can quickly make his way up in the world, for they are qualities not too commonly combined, and he who possesses this combination of money-valuable qualities outdistances the man who has not developed and trained his mind, just as a swift motor-car outdistances the plodding pedestrian.

THE FALLACY OF "LUCK."

People who do not get on frequently attribute their failure to "bad luck," and the success of others to "good luck."

This is a complete fallacy.

Success in life is won by ability and well-directed energy—not by "luck."

Opportunity comes to everyone—over and over again. He who seizes his opportunities, and makes the most of them, is the man who succeeds.

Is there no such thing as bad luck, then?

There is, of course—but it is not a permanent condition.

A man may have a run of ill-luck, just as a card-player has a run of poor cards.

But the card-player who plays regularly every day finds that at the end of the year, taking one day with another, his cards have been quite up to the average.

The Business of Life is a game you play every day, year after year. According to the irresistible law of averages you are certain to have many good opportunities given to you.

Train your mind to make the best use of these opportunities, as you can do by means of the system of Mental Training described in Brain-Power, and you will rise rapidly to place and power, so that each year you will be able to look back and say, "I am in a much higher position to-day than I was twelve months ago."

THIS MAGAZINE AND FULL PARTICULARS FREE TO YOU.

In order to obtain a complimentary copy of Brain-Power and Mental Efficiency, and other helpful literature, you need only write your name and address on the following form and post to the Secretary, the Pelman School of the Mind, 52, Wenham House, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

By return of post you will receive a copy of this 32-page illustrated journal, Brain-Power, with interviews with Mr. A. W. Gamage, Mr. Gordon Selfridge, Sir Hiram Maxim, Mr. Keyser (manager of the Hotel Cecil) and other famous men of affairs.

The magazine and particulars will not cost you a penny, but they will enable you to rise to higher and more responsible positions in life, and to achieve success and its monetary rewards.

Here is the Application Form. By using this form to-day, or sending a postcard, you will be taking a new step upwards to greater Personal Power, Wealth, and Success.

To the Secretary,
THE PELMAN SCHOOL OF THE MIND.
 52, Wenham House, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

I should like to see a complimentary copy of the New Magazine, "Brain Power and Mental Efficiency," and also to receive full particulars showing how I can double and treble the money-earning and intellectual powers of my mind by following the system of Mental Training as supplied to H.R.H. The Prince of Wales and recommended by the world's greatest business men.

Name

Address

Occupation

FREE LESSONS IN ENGLISH

The Rev. J. C. Wilcox, M.A. (Camb.), has obtained a world-wide reputation by his "Simplified" system of teaching the supposedly difficult Hebrew language, which has gained the admiration of thousands of students and scholars. This method has now been successfully applied to the teaching of English. A thorough knowledge of this subject will be a great asset to anyone whose desire is to improve his position and take his place in the forefront of commercial, social and political life.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE.

The first four Lesson Papers, with full particulars of this scientific and simplified system of teaching English by correspondence, will be sent to you post free and without any obligation on your part.

The "WILCOX" System is Unique, Thorough and Tried.

Write now to the Secretary (Dept. 27),

THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY,
19/21, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

FREE LESSONS IN LATIN

Are you desirous of learning Latin? If so, write to the address below for particulars of "Latin Simplified," the easiest possible introduction to the Latin language. Perhaps you have little time to devote to such a subject. Then this is just the course for you. Twenty minutes daily study by the "WILCOX" System will ensure success.

To master Latin is to obtain possession of a key which will unlock the treasures of at least four European languages. A knowledge of Latin will enable you to read the English classics with ease and pleasure. It will enable you to read such writers as Macaulay without the constant use of a dictionary.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE.

The first four Lessons will be forwarded to you free and without obligation, if you will write to-day to the Secretary.

The "WILCOX" System is Simple, Scientific and Pleasant.

Write now to the Secretary (Dept. 27),

THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY,
19/21, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

FREE LESSONS IN LOGIC

Are you logical? Of course you are. Everyone thinks he is, and most people think other people are not. But have you made a study of this "Science of Sciences"? Can you always express your thoughts with logical accuracy and penetrate through rhetorical artifices? Your own common sense helps you to do these things to a degree, but without a knowledge of Logic you are liable to be at the mercy of any plausible theorist.

If you wish to train your mental faculties, if you wish to have a clearer outlook in life, you would do well to master the Wilcox "Logic Simplified" Course. Logic is useful in every sphere of life, and to the public speaker it is indispensable. It is not an easy subject, studied from the usual text-books, but the "WILCOX" System makes it simple and interesting.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE.

Do not fail to write at once for particulars of this Course of study. The first four Lesson Papers will be sent to you free and without obligation.

The "WILCOX" Logic Course is Easy, Clear and Accurate.

Write now to the Secretary (Dept. 27),

THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY,
19/21, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE SINGLE TAX.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—An intellectual giant, with wide knowledge of life, deep human sympathy, and possessing (what so many writers on the land question have not) practical experience of agricultural conditions, Tolstoy believed Henry George's Single Tax solution to be the most effective and just method of ending our present economic evils.

Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, another supreme mind, also gives enthusiastic support to Henry George's principle in his book "Land Nationalisation."

Even regarded solely as a means of abolishing land monopoly, the Single Tax principle is free from the serious drawbacks of land purchase on the "Land Nationalisation" method, which would entail the increasing of the National Debt by the issuing of National Land Stock to the value of £6,000,000,000 (£400,000,000 of which would be payable to twelve London landlords, who would continue, in addition, to draw their rents from all buildings, etc.). The payment of interest on this sum would clearly constitute a premium on monopoly, an endowment on past and existing usurpation.

But further, the Single Tax principle has one unique advantage: it can be consistently supported by all true democrats, whether individualistic or socialistic; for, although leaving the individual perfect freedom in the owning and using of land, it socialises that value of land which is made by the community, thus making monopoly hopelessly unprofitable.—I am, sir, etc.,

OTWAY M'CANNELL.

Hendon, N.W., Jan. 3rd, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Land Reform is indeed the order of the day; it is the root of every social question. If we add low wages and unemployment to housing of the poor, congestion of cities, and the desolation of our countryside, we have a really comprehensive view of what must be done to solve the social problem in its most virulent form. In my opinion, the guiding principle that will enable us to effectively solve the problem is the principle of the Single Tax. Three of the other four principles you adumbrate have been fairly tried, and have failed. The "French Solution" has been a conspicuous failure, inasmuch as the general conditions of the mass of the people on the Continent are no better, if not actually worse, than in this country. If we are going to tackle the land question, let us grapple with the problem fundamentally, let us learn from the failure of other attempts what to avoid.

Then no radical settlement of the land question can be found in the mere multiplication of landlords by the artificial creation of a new class of peasant proprietors. This will only distribute monopoly and rent into many hands, instead of, as now, into few hands; besides, no scheme of this kind can be devised for cities, towns, and villages.

As for Land Nationalisation, it seems an utterly impracticable proposal, and it is a relief to know that Mr. Asquith is opposed to any such scheme. Land Nationalisation, however one looks at it, simply means consolidation of the existing interests in land without any fundamental economic freedom in the use of land. To me it seems an utterly absurd idea that the State can administer the use of land better than the individual, provided the individual is free and gets the use of land at normal prices.

The principle of the Single Tax is a very simple one. There is no proposal to nationalise land, nor to abolish private property or private possession of land. The Single Tax is an ethical proposal to restore to all citizens their common rights in the value of the land which they create, and to do so we propose to gradually impose all taxes and rates on the value of land apart from, and exclusive of, improvements; we would simply divert an increasing share of land value into the public treasury, and in this way break down land monopoly. When land monopoly is once destroyed, land will come into use at prices which capital and labour can always afford to pay. This steady demand for labour in its two forms will steadily reduce the margin of unemployment—in other words, the basis of competition will be so altered as between employer and employee that wages will tend to steadily advance. In brief, the Single Tax will do what none of the principles tried can do: it will correct the unjust distribution of wealth which now takes place, in the most effective way. The Single Tax will gradually transfer to wages that portion of production which now flows through land monopoly to privileged persons.—I am, sir, etc.,

JAMES BUSBY.

The Liberal Club, Glasgow.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—It is difficult to understand how some of your correspondents can imagine that the Single Tax or Land Nationalisation, or any scheme for freeing the land, and the land only, from private monopoly, will prove the panacea of all our social ills. This idea springs from the illusion that "ownership" is an absolute term. Ownership, like many other things, is only relative, and the ownership of land is no exception. The landlord has not absolutely unfettered permission to do what he will with his own; the State exacts certain taxes from him. "Ownership" or "possession" is, in fact, merely the term we apply to the greatest amount of individual control the State permits.

When the ownership and tenancy of land are looked upon merely as differing degrees of control over land, it is obvious that if the land were public property, and "the rent that comes from the land" were "divided up," it would still be possible for the possessor of tenant rights in land to exploit those who had no such rights. It would be just as possible for an industrial undertaking which rented the land it used from the State to exploit its employees as for one which rented it from a private landlord. It is as unjust for a capitalist to exploit those who use and find employment by means of his capital as for a landlord to rackrent those who use and find employment by means of his land. The capitalist has no better title to the toll he exacts merely because he happens to possess the capital than the landlord merely because he happens to possess the land. As long as land, whether nominally publicly or privately owned, is left in practically irresponsible private control, we shall continue to have all the evils both of landlordism and capitalism.

Both land and capital—which latter term does not mean the same as private capitalists—are necessary to the conduct of industry, and to tax either the landlord or the private capitalist out of existence means the paralysis of industry and economic suicide, unless the money obtained by this taxation is applied to the public acquiring and carrying on of industrial undertakings. To so tax them out of existence and acquire the land and industrial capital—reduced by

Common forms of INDIGESTION

Whatever form your indigestion may take, Dr. Jenner's Absorbent Lozenges, made only by Savory and Moore, will relieve it. Here are a few instances:

Indigestion.—"Dr. Jenner's Absorbent Lozenges are the very best remedy I have been able to get. I have tried everything I have seen advertised, but nothing has done me any good. I dreaded to eat anything, but now one lozenge has the desired effect. I cannot praise them highly enough."

Flatulence.—"I am delighted to state that they are truly magical in their effect. All symptoms of Flatulence, Flushed Cheeks, etc., after meals are now at once dispersed, also the oppressive feeling of fulness."

Longstanding Dyspepsia with Distressing Heartburn.—"The Lozenges certainly gave great relief. . . . I personally will prescribe them." (Medical man.)

Flatulence at Night.—"One or two taken when required seem most useful in dispelling wind and other discomforts which interfere with proper sleep."

Hunger Pain.—"Dr. Jenner's Absorbent Lozenges are the only things I know of that take away that intense 'Hunger Pain' which is such acute suffering." (Medical man.)

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 4s. 6d., of all Chemists.

A FREE TRIAL BOX

of the lozenges will be sent to all who write, enclosing 1d. for postage, and mentioning Everyman, to Savory & Moore, Ltd., Chemists to The King, 143A, New Bond Street, London, W.

DEAF?

OH DEAR NO!

This is the happy reply made by all persons who use the

"AURIPHONE."

If you are deaf and have not yet tested the "AURIPHONE," we urge you to call at once at our offices for a free demonstration of our wonderful little "pocket telephone," which magnifies the slightest sound and simply makes the deaf hear. A new era has already dawned for hundreds of deaf people, and what our instrument has done for others—it can do for you.

The "AURIPHONE"

is a genuine British-made instrument similar in principle to the telephone, and conquers deafness just as the telephone conquers distance. It weighs only a few ounces, is perfectly comfortable; almost invisible in use, and goes neatly into the pocket when out of use. If other devices have failed, the "Auriphone" will succeed—it's different from them all. New improved model now ready.

Fuller Particulars in Booklet—post free on application. Send a card To-day for it, you will be intensely interested.

AURIPHONES, Ltd.,
42, Walter House, 418/422, Strand, London.

Light.
Incoo-sp.cunus.
Comfortab'le.

this taxation to an almost nominal price—is the remedy I advocate; it is Socialism.

In conclusion, may I express my thanks for EVERYMAN? We are flooded by journals advocating the views of each separate clique of men; now we have got one which is open to the views of every man and all men—in which every man may express his views and apply them to the test of the criticism of men of a different outlook and circle of ideas.—I am, sir, etc.,

DONALD BRUCE-WALKER.

THE SINGLE TAX AND LAND NATIONALISATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—The opposition between the Single Tax and Land Nationalisation is unnecessarily aggravated by zealous partisans. In both cases the aim is identical, namely, the transference of rent to the coffers of the State and the resultant system of occupying ownership. The State, as Dr. A. R. Wallace points out, would simply collect "rents" in the same way that it now collects taxes; in neither case is there any proposal for State management ("Land Nationalisation," Fourth Edition, pp. 207-210).

The difference seems chiefly one of method. The Single Taxer advocates a tax on land values, which is to be increased progressively until it absorbs the whole of the rent. The Land Nationaliser generally advocates some system of public purchase by the issue of State bonds redeemable by the operation of a sinking fund. In both cases the final result would be the same: rent would come to be paid to the State instead of to private individuals. This would supply a revenue which would do away with the necessity for other forms of taxation (vide "Land Nationalisation," pp. 227 and 228).

There seems to be no reason at all why both purchase and taxation methods should not proceed side by side. Already a start has been made in the taxation of land values, and now that the State valuation of land has minimised the danger of inflated prices, public purchase can proceed in safety. It is a mistake to think that there is only one simple method of attaining our objects; in a complex world like ours many ways lead to the ideal. Both Single Taxer and Land Nationaliser ought to keep this in view. Then there would not be so much useless antagonism.—I am, sir, etc.,

LOUIS WILLIAMS.

A PROGRESSIVE INCOME TAX.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—The Shaw-Chesterton controversy on the death of Socialism has brought many views to light, but it seems to me that no one has proposed any definite way of going to work. Nationalisation of the land and of the great industries? Yes, but every man knows that these enormous schemes cannot be suddenly brought about without a violent revolution, and all—even the militant Socialist—profess to abhor violence. And yet everyone continues to talk vaguely, grandiloquently, acrimoniously, or dogmatically about them, and no one suggests how to make a beginning.

With your permission, I will suggest a method that could be begun at once, without any disturbance to the community; one which would go on automatically and smoothly without disturbing anyone's  until the final result was accomplished, the result aimed at being, I assume, the approximate nationalisation of private property and the nationalisation of the land. And this method is simply the progressive graduation of the Income Tax; that is to say, a double graduation of the tax by geometrical progression.

To illustrate my meaning, I give an exaggerated example: Suppose a man with £100 a year pays an income tax of £1, and suppose for every rise of £100 in income you double the tax. You will find that an income of £800 pays a tax of £128, leaving a remainder of £672. But an income of £900 would pay a tax of £256, leaving remainder of only £664. Thus no man's effective income could rise above £672. This is, I repeat, an exaggerated illustration. But mathematicians can produce a formula that would cut off the income at any desired point. Say, for the sake of argument, at £100,000 a year. Then a second mathematical formula is brought to bear which increases the tax year by year, reducing, therefore, year by year, the highest possible income. You may, for instance, so arrange it that in 100 years the highest possible income would be £1,000.

The progress may be as slow or as rapid as you please, but it would never go by jumps; everyone would know what was coming, and have time to adjust himself to circumstances. The money taken in taxes would be devoted to buying up the land at a fixed valuation. The land owners would not be robbed, but their incomes would decrease at the same pace as those of all other capitalists. The great industries might or might not be bought up. That is a different question, but does not affect the principle. I submit that a gradual alteration like the above is the only kind that can possibly be permanent. Violent revolution always ends in renewed despotism.—I am, sir, etc.,

H. HOLBY.

Holloway.

PEASANT PROPRIETORSHIP.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I am extremely grateful to EVERYMAN for opening its columns to the free and unbiased discussion of a question of such paramount importance as Land Reform.

The only solution, it seems to me, of the admittedly great evil of rural depopulation which obtains in this country at the present time is the creation of a system of peasant proprietorship, which has worked so well on the Continent. Land purchase, as opposed to tenancy, has many advantages. The premier and all-important one is that through time the peasant will become the owner of his land instead of the perpetual tenant of the State or the community, and the stimulating sense of ownership, and its accompanying freedom of action will encourage him to devote his keenest energies to the successful cultivation of his farm. It has been truly said that ownership has all the advantages of tenancy, with none of its disadvantages.

Honestly, I cannot conceive how the Taxation of Land Values, and similar so-called reforms are going to put the people back on the land. To my mind, these schemes are only palliatives, and merely touch the fringe of the subject. We must get to the root of the evil, and we can only do this by engineering a complete, definite, and lasting reform.—I am, sir, etc.,

Edinburgh.

WILLIAM BLAIR.

PATRIOTISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I read with great interest a letter on "The Ethical Foundations of Patriotism" in your issue of December 24th.

The following incident happened last July to a per-

(Continued on page 412.)

SWEET PEA PERFECTION.

A flower garden without Eckford's Sweet Peas can only be compared to a house without furniture. Sweet Peas are requisite to the small, medium, or large garden, and if you wish to have colour, effect, prize specimens, and tall plants, then send to Eckford's for your seeds. LARGER FLOWER, LONGER STEMS, BRIGHTER COLOURS, AND A PRO-FUSION OF BLOOM WILL BE THE RESULT OF GROWING ECKFORD'S SEEDS.

In choosing your Collection remember that Eckford's Sweet Peas are all strong growers, and every plant needs to be placed at least six inches apart, so that, while you may buy more seed for the money, remember, a cheaper collection may not be more profitable. There is a great deal of rubbish being sold nowadays as Eckford's Sweet Peas, but they are not Eckford's unless direct from Wem. If you have bought Sweet Peas as Eckford's elsewhere, you have not got Eckford's. We have many thousands of Customers in every part of the globe, and they are all enthusiastic about Eckford's Seeds.

SPECIAL NOVELTIES FOR 1913.

BARONESS DE TUYLL.—This is truly the most delightful pink Sweet Pea that we have ever had the pleasure of sending out, and it is quite safe to say that nothing so entirely charming and pleasing in pinks has been sent out since the true "Countess Spencer" was first offered to the public. It is four-flowered, beautifully waved, and a very strong grower. Quite 18 in. should be left between the plants. In sealed packets, 5 seeds, 1/3; 10, 2 6.

GUSTAV HAMEL.—This is a magnificent giant and free flowering variety of a rich rose overlaid with salmon. It is beautifully waved and four-flowered, possessing a bold upright standard. In shape it is just what a waved Sweet Pea ought to be. The plant is a strong grower, needing plenty of room. In sealed packets, 5 seeds, 1/3; 10, 2 6.

CLEMATIS (Grandiflora Type).—This beautiful self is quite an advance in colour, being best described as a "Clematis Jackmanii" line. As a garden variety it is most attractive, the vines being literally clothed with lively blue flowers, which are generally borne in threes, on long, strong stems. In sealed packets, 5 seeds, 6d.; 10, 1/-.

SPECIAL COLLECTIONS FOR 1913.

EXHIBITORS' "C" COLLECTION.

24 charming Giant Waved varieties for exhibition or any purpose, 10 seeds of each, as follows:—

- | | |
|------------------------------------|--|
| Apple Blossom (Waved), pink. | Flora Norton (Waved) blue. |
| Apricot, apricot. | Lady Althorpe, white. |
| Asta Ohn, lavender. | Menia Christie, mauve. |
| Captain of the Blues (Waved), blue | Maud Holmes, crimson. |
| Cerise, cerise. | Mrs. Charles Mander, mauve. |
| Clara Curtiss, primrose. | Mrs. Hardcastle Sykes, pink. |
| Constance Oliver, creamy pink. | Mrs. Henry Bell, apricot. |
| Countess Spencer, pink. | Mrs. W. King, rose. |
| Dodwell F. Browne, crimson. | Othello (Waved), maroon. |
| Dorothy Tennant (Waved), mauve. | Paradise Ivory, ivory pink. |
| Etta Dyke, white. | Queen Victoria (Waved), pale primrose. |
| Evelyn Hemus, creamy pink. | Senator (Waved), chocolate stripe. |

Also 10 seeds each of Pink Pearl, pink; Phenomenal, blue picotee edge; Frank Dolby, lavender; and Helen Lewis, salmon. Gratis.

Price 5/6.

Post Free for Cash.

A Specially written Booklet is sent FREE with every order giving full details of Culture, so that the greatest novice may attain success.

VILLA "B" COLLECTION.

24 choice varieties, a splendid range of colour for garden effect and cutting, 50 seeds of each, as follows:—

- | | |
|---|------------------------------------|
| Agnes Eckford, pink. | Pink Pearl (slightly Waved), pink. |
| A. J. Cook (slightly Waved), lavender. | Helen Pierce, blue flake. |
| Black Knight, maroon. | Henry Eckford, coral. |
| Captain of the Blues, blue. | Horace Wright, dark blue. |
| Dorothy Eckford, white. | James Grieve, cream. |
| Frank Dolby (slightly Waved), lavender. | King Edward VII., crimson. |
| Gladys Unwin (slightly Waved), pink. | Lord Nelson, blue. |
| Helen Lewis (Waved), salmon. | Luminosa, coral. |
| Mrs. Charles Mander (Waved), mauve. | Mid Blue, blue. |
| Phenomenal (slightly Waved), blue picotee edge. | Queen Alexandra, scarlet. |
| Miss Willmott, salmon. | Queen of Spain, pink. |
| Also 10 seeds of each of Mrs. Hardcastle Sykes (Waved), pink; and Countess Spencer (Waved), pink. Gratis. | Sybil Eckford, creamy blush. |

Price 5/6, Post Free for Cash.

HALF VILLA "B" COLLECTION.

24 choice varieties. The same as the Villa "B" exactly, only 25 seeds of each variety. Also 5 seeds of each of Mrs. Hardcastle Sykes (Waved), pink; and Countess Spencer (Waved), pink. Gratis. Price 3/-. Post Free for Cash.

EXHIBITORS' "D" COLLECTION.

12 charming Giant Waved varieties, splendid for exhibition or any purpose, 10 seeds of each, as follows:—

- | | |
|---------------------------------|------------------------------|
| Asta Ohn, lavender. | Flora Norton (Waved), blue. |
| Countess Spencer, pink. | Mrs. W. King, rose. |
| Dodwell F. Browne, crimson. | Mrs. Hardcastle Sykes, pink. |
| Dorothy Tennant (Waved), mauve. | Mrs. Henry Bell, apricot. |
| Etta Dyke, white. | Othello (Waved), maroon. |
| Evelyn Hemus, creamy pink. | Paradise Ivory, ivory pink. |

Also 10 seeds of each of Cerise, cerise; and Helen Lewis, salmon. Gratis.

Price 2/9, Post Free for Cash.

VILLA "C" COLLECTION.

12 choice varieties, suitable for garden effect and cutting, 50 seeds of each, as follows:—

- | | |
|---|--|
| Agnes Eckford, pink. | Lord Nelson, blue. |
| A. J. Cook (slightly Waved), lavender. | Mrs. Collier, pale primrose. |
| Black Knight, maroon. | Phenomenal (slightly Waved), blue picotee edge. |
| Dorothy Eckford, white. | Pink Pearl (slightly Waved), pink. |
| Frank Dolby (slightly Waved), lavender. | Queen Alexandra, scarlet. |
| Helen Lewis (Waved), salmon. | Also 5 seeds of each of Countess Spencer (Waved), pink; and Mrs. Hardcastle Sykes (Waved), pink. Gratis. |

Price 2/9, Post Free for Cash.

VILLA "D" COLLECTION.

12 choice varieties. The same as the Villa "C" exactly, only 25 seeds of each. Also 5 seeds of each of Mrs. Hardcastle Sykes (Waved), pink; and Countess Spencer (Waved), pink. Gratis. Price 1/6.

ECKFORD'S FLORAL BEAUTIES IN COLLECTIONS.

Arranged liberal in quantity, and contain only varieties that have been proved excellent in my own Trial Grounds at Wem, and are the best value in the trade.

AN ECKFORD FLOWER GARDEN FOR 5/-. Post Free for Cash.

Eckford's Ideal Collection of Floral Beauties contains: 6 varieties Giant Sweet Peas, separate and named. 3 packets of Choice Asters, separate colours. 3 " Choice Double Ten-Week Stocks, separate colours. 3 " Ornamental Grasses for mixing with cut flowers. 1 packet of each of the following twelve Hardy Annuals for edging, Calliopsis, Shirley Poppy, Annual Chrysanthemum, Schizanthus, Eschscholtzia, Godetia, Miniature Sunflower, Larkspur, Mignonette, Nasturtium, and Nigella. 1 packet each Half-Hardy Annuals, as follows: Lobelia, Nicotiana, Marigold, and three Everlastings for Winter Decoration: 1 packet of each Hardy Perennials, as follows: Antirrhinum, Aquilegia, and Canterbury Bells; with 1 packet of Single Wallflowers. 5/- Post Free for Cash with order.

AN ECKFORD FLOWER GARDEN FOR 2/6. Eckford's Ideal Collection of Floral Beauties for Smaller Garden, contains:

1 packet of each of the following Choice Flower Seeds: "Matchless" Mixture of Giant Sweet Peas, Choice Mixed Asters, Choice Double Ten-Week Stocks (mixed), 1 packet Ornamental Grass, Annual Chrysanthemum (mixed), Shirley Poppy, Eschscholtzia (mixed), Larkspur, Candytuft, Lobelia, Mignonette, Schizanthus, Nicotiana, Marigold, Nasturtium (tall), and Single Wallflowers.

2/6 Post Free for Cash with order.

FREE. Send a postcard to-day for large illustrated and coloured Catalogue. It gives full particulars of all novelties in Sweet Peas for 1913, and contains full list of all flower and vegetable seeds.

HENRY ECKFORD, Sweet Pea Specialist (Dept. 74), WEM, SHROPSHIRE.

THE CURE OF EPILEPSY.

A Famous Specialist and His Great Curative Work.

QUICK to censure but slow to praise—this has always been the critical attitude of Truth, and therefore the Editor's remarks in the issue dated February 16th, 1910, concerning the scope and beneficial nature of Mr. Gilbert Dale's work, will be noted with extraordinary interest by epileptics and their friends.

As to the value of his treatment, I can only say that he has certainly been successful in many cases where orthodox practitioners have failed. But I am satisfied that he is perfectly honest and conscientious, and that no one need hesitate about trying his treatment where orthodox science is of no avail, and, unfortunately, there are many cases of Epilepsy where it is.

Mr. Gilbert Dale, undoubtedly the best known and most successful specialist in epilepsy, has the reputation of years behind him. Years of devoted ability, solely applied to the eradication and cure of that great nervous affliction—epilepsy.

MR. GILBERT DALE.

Hundreds of the worst cases have been restored through his treatment.

Mr. Gilbert Dale's methods depart altogether from the ordinary, and that his principles are true is amply borne out by the extraordinary percentage of cures he effects, often when the case has defied every previous effort to overcome it.

Indeed, so convinced is he of the efficacy of his treatment that he emphatically states that even in its most aggravated form this disease may be entirely eradicated from the system!

Not in one instance, but in many, have patients written to say: "I have never had an attack since coming under your treatment!"

Yes, cured to stay cured, for the correspondents say that after the treatment ceases they do not experience the least symptoms of return.

In regard to Mr. Gilbert Dale's treatment it should be noted that he entirely excludes Bromide of Potassium and poisons.

He is severely critical on the use of dangerous drugs, and insists that many so-called remedies are worse than the disease.

With him each case is treated according to its own distinct character. Each sufferer's constitution, temperament and peculiarities are all thoroughly considered, and the treatment is a personal matter altogether, based purely upon the most intimate knowledge of what is desirable.

Results speak for themselves. It is one thing to profess to do a thing, but a much better one to accomplish it.

Mr. Gilbert Dale accomplishes, and his success has justly earned for him his enviable reputation as the leading specialist in the treatment of epilepsy.

Another arrangement is that he is now willing to express his written opinion upon any case without imposing a fee. When fully in touch with all particulars he will then say whether it comes within his scope, and if he tells you that a cure is possible, then you may safely rely upon it that there is every hope of recovery. If a personal consultation is desired, a fee, of course, has to be charged.

Epilepsy enervates the entire system, reduces power of body and mind to a minimum, and absolutely prohibits the victim from achieving success in life or sharing in the pleasures of existence.

Mr. E. Gilbert Dale's consulting rooms are situated at 32, Brook Street, Grosvenor Square, W.; telephone: 5341 Mayfair.

Sufferers and friends of sufferers should therefore communicate with his Secretary, and with his reply he will present them with Mr. Gilbert Dale's interesting treatise on "Epilepsy, its Causes, Symptoms, and Cure." No fee is asked for the letter, and no charge is made for the book.

No matter whether the case be slight or severe, bear in mind that you are now given an opportunity to avail yourself of the services of the greatest specialist in Epilepsy.

sonal friend, whose career has been an administrative one of great importance in our Empire.

Having heard with incredulity stories of waning patriotism amongst the masses of the people, and wishing to have an opportunity of being brought in touch with the working classes, he decided to travel third class to one of the northern towns, where he was going on a visit. He settled himself with his newspaper in the corner of a third-class carriage, which speedily filled up with working men of the artisan class. After a time politics began to be discussed, and eventually the question of war with Germany was the topic. Finally, one workman expressed the opinion that he should object to have to go to war with Germany, for that, as far as the working classes were concerned, whether "George" or "William" sat on the throne of England, could not concern them. The people would equally have to be fed in either case, and this view was unanimously agreed to.

On repeating this to a German gentleman, he said such a sentiment was impossible in Germany, where the poorest man was proud of the Fatherland.—I am, yours, etc.,

H. P.

THE TYRANNY OF THE NOVEL V. BIBLE-READING.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Canon Barry complains of the decay of Bible-reading, and this strikes me as a piece of insufferable cant. With the exception of the Gospels, of what serious value is the rest of the Bible—the bulk of which is in moral conflict with the Gospels? Or what have we to gain by imbibing the superstition and savagery of the ancient Hebrews? Bible-worship is the curse of modern religion, and apologies for the Bible are the curse of modern thought. Already the teaching of Paul (good in his age) has widely supplanted the teaching of Christ Himself—because of this insane deification of the Bible. "Bible-study" is the modern dodge of the Churches, to keep the minds of young people from inquiring too closely into questions of social righteousness and economic justice. One feels that if Canon Barry were at all in earnest about the application of Christianity to life, he would not need to be told these things.

He observes that religion dies when "its oracles are dumb"; but the oracles of ecclesiasticism have been dumb for centuries, and the bulk of the Bible has been dumb for much longer than that. What kills living oracles is the same thing that crucified Jesus—to wit, ecclesiastical tradition, enforced by coercion. There is no room therein for moral inspiration, which is set at naught and suppressed. Such an act as the pardoning of the woman taken in adultery—or such a dictum as that of Jesus, when He said that "not everyone could receive" the truth as to the inviolable sanctity of marriage—is incomprehensible to the would-be moral administrator.

Let not Canon Barry suppose that modern Art is any worse than Art always was. Art, as the handmaid of ecclesiasticism, was just as guilty of cheap mendacity as is the modern novel.

We are now discovering that God is far more humane than man, and does not impose vindictive penalties for mere errors of judgment. The tendency of the time is to consider how far society can mitigate and relieve the results of sin.

Let it be put to the credit of Canon Barry that he has ventured into the open, and by the grace of God (and Editore volente) stands to receive a few home-thrusts before he can retire.—I am, sir, etc.,

Leeds.

T. H. FERRIS.

THE PHILOSOPHER OF THE SUPERMAN*

MR. CHATTERTON HILL has written a really excellent introduction to the philosophy of Nietzsche. We have one or two criticisms to offer; but, looked at broadly, the book is a sound piece of exposition and (up to a point) of criticism. We welcome it all the more readily because, as it seems to us, the most popular presentations of Nietzsche in this country have tended to be very partial. We are all acquainted with the philosopher who denounces Christianity, with the scathing critic of our morality and politics, with the creator of the Superman remorseless, inhuman, and ferocious. But Nietzsche had other qualities than those of the mere critic and sceptic. We are grateful accordingly to Mr. Hill for his complementary picture of the poet and thinker who balanced his worship of force by his conception of life as the most supreme manifestation of art, and whose ideal being is as much the servant of all that is highest in humanity as he is the tyrant over all that is most degenerate and base. For Nietzsche, indeed, is no mere anarchistic opponent of an established order of things. Form, shapeliness, beauty are to him the essentials of life. His attack upon modern religion, modern democracy, modern art, is not in the interest of anarchy at all, but because he foresees as the outcome of modern collectivist thinking a chaos far more profound than any anarchy could produce.

This aspect of his teaching Mr. Hill has emphasised with very great care, and, as we think, very wisely. It is when we come to actual criticism that we are disposed to regard him as somewhat wanting in thoroughness. In the field of philosophy itself there is little fault to find. Especially admirable is his exposition of Nietzsche's theory of knowledge and his refutation of the fallacies and contradictions it involves. But, frankly, we are not a little surprised and disappointed that he finds so little to criticise in the philosopher's uses of history. To us the Hellenism of which Nietzsche wrote so much and so enthusiastically has always seemed a purely poetic conception, the result of a series of extremely brilliant and equally unsound generalisations from very insufficient data. Suggestive as is his theory of the birth of tragedy, it bears no relation to the facts available in his own day, still less to those available at present. Again, his conviction that to the elect spirits of Hellas ethics and æsthetics were synonymous terms is only a very general approximation to truth. A careful reading of any single play of Æschylus is enough to convince one that Attic tragedy was as highly "moralised" along religious lines as the documents of the faith Nietzsche held up to scorn and reprobation. More poet than thinker, or perhaps thinking rather in the manner of the poet than of the philosopher, Nietzsche created for himself an ideal civilisation and located it in Periclean Athens. As an ideal it admirably served his purpose; it will not, however, abide the question of history.

Mr. Hill would have done well, we think, to point out the discrepancy. Omissions are never very kindly subject for criticism, but we cannot help a regret that the author did not include some treatment of Nietzsche's influence upon English thought and letters. After all, Mr. Shaw is not his only disciple in this country. The late Oscar Wilde was a heavy debtor to his teaching, and the Pragmatists of Oxford owe not a little to his criticism of metaphysics.

* "The Philosophy of Nietzsche." An Exposition and an Appreciation. By G. Chatterton Hill. (London: Ouseley, Ltd.)

AVOID DRUGS

If taken frequently drugs lose their power and doses have to be increased.

For the safe and certain relief and cure of . . .

INDIGESTION, ACIDITY, FLATULENCY, HEARTBURN, and IMPURE BREATH,

Bragg's Pure Vegetable Charcoal has never yet been equalled. It absorbs the impure gases generated in the stomach and bowels and carries them out of the system, thus removing the CAUSE of digestive disturbance and at the same time cleansing the blood.

BRAGG'S CHARCOAL

may be taken regularly with constant benefit by young or old. It is invaluable also in Diarrhoea and Fever. Doctors largely recommend it and use it in their own families.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores. Biscuits, 1/-, 2/- and 4/- per tin; Powder, 2/- per bottle; Lozenges, 1/1½ per tin; Chocolates, 1/- per tin; Capsules, 2/- per box.

FREE SAMPLES sent to anyone mentioning this Journal and enclosing 3d. stamps for postage in the British Empire and U.S.A.

J. L. BRAGG'S, Ltd., 14, WIGMORE ST., LONDON, W.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's NAVY CUT

Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets and Tins.

May be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute.

Regd. No. 154011

BISHOP PAGET*

"Do you know the phrase," wrote Bishop Paget to a friend, "'a man's conversation in his shirt sleeves?'" It is only, I think, the most cultivated, keen, delightful and kindly minds that can afford to be discovered so talking." Paget could very seldom afford to be "discovered so talking." It is not permitted to a don of a great college with aristocratic traditions, to a Canon and Dean of Christ Church, to a Bishop of Oxford to divest himself of appropriate garments. Yet Paget had something of the "shirt sleeves" quality in him, and therein lay much of his charm. He was a serious man in the best sense of the word. He did the work that came to him to the utmost of his power, and his religion was a part of him. He was never serious in the sense of being merely dull or severe. He could make a pun that Charles Lamb would have delighted in. "We would think whether anybody could be found to meet Dr. King's demand, and write a new 'Summa Theologica.' Who would do it? Perhaps Swallow, the learned Cuddesdon chaplain? 'No,' said Paget, 'not quite. It is not every Swallow that can make a Summa.'" There is a parenthesis in one of his letters—"Interdenominational! O dear, what a luggage-train of a word!"—that reveals something happy and whimsical in the man, a youthfulness that must often have afforded a retreat from the dignities that attended him. Such is the impression one gets from this admirable sketch of the Bishop's life by his brother, Mr. Stephen Paget, and his chaplain, Mr. Crum. It is the impression of a saint, but not a painful saint, rather of a saint with a genuine vein of humanism. His love of natural scenery and passion for pictures bear this out. He was in all things painstaking and scrupulous—in his work and in his dealings with men. He defined courtesy in his volume on "The Christian Character" as "sympathy with the self-respect of others." This definition speaks of a man who had thought the matter out, whose courtesy might be careful, but never formal. "He came to a man's conscience," says Mr. Stephen Paget, "as he would come into a sick room, treading softly and bringing flowers." In something of the same spirit Paget approached his work, his lectures on Hooker, his sermons. He never belittled it or took it lightly. Perhaps he was conscientious to a fault. The judicious Hooker would probably have been embarrassed to find that his Fifth Book had given rise to a whole volume of minute comment and expanded exposition, the text of the volume "riding high on a tossing sea of footnotes"—to quote a remark of Mr. Stephen Paget in another connection. Nevertheless, he would not have failed to recognise that the work was far from being that of a dryasdust. It was rather a loyal tribute to a master. So with the men who felt embarrassed when Paget approached them. A little experience taught them that it was the approach of a man who wanted to take them seriously as men, and to give them his best. The titles Paget chose for his sermons—e.g., "The Hallowing of Work," and "The Spirit of Discipline"—cast an instructive light on his character. Christianity for him was a power that enabled a man to make something worthy of his life. He was not uninterested in philosophy. But he does not seem to have passed through any acute intellectual crisis. Religion for him was experience, an experience, no doubt, that was capable of rational exposition and defence, yet never so as to banish from

* "Francis Paget, Bishop of Oxford." By Stephen Paget and J. M. C. Crum. With an Introduction by the Archbishop of Canterbury. 15s. (London: Macmillan and Co.)

it the venture of faith. "So it all comes back to the old lesson of looking up and holding on, 'till the day break and the shadows flee away.' And whenever the thought of venturing forward in the acts and ways of faith seems to grow in your mind I should believe that there are deeper, stronger, broader tides of life and growth beneath that thought than perhaps the faculty of logic tells of." The same spirit is revealed in his attitude to dogma. With all his reverence for dogma, he could speak of "the discipline of incompleteness." There are things in the life that will doubtless puzzle some readers. The adherence to the Eastward attitude, e.g., certain remarks on baptism, and the refusal to go on the platform with Nonconformists at a Bible Society meeting, because such action involved joining with Nonconformists in an act of devotion. But these things may be left out of account. Fortunately, they do not hide from us Paget's spiritual greatness, or make it impossible for men of all schools to appreciate this record of a rich and finely wrought religious experience.

SANTA TERESA*

WE owe to a wet holiday in the Engadine this admirable little book in its charming soft blue leather binding. Through spending "every rainy morning and every tired evening" during that holiday in the company of Abraham Woodhead's two black letter quartos of the Life of St. Teresa, Dr. Whyte was inspired with the happy idea of adding the saint to his attractive series of devotional booklets.

Though she lived 300 years ago, St. Teresa was essentially a modern woman. If there had been a vote in the Spain of her day, she would have fought tooth and nail for it, but, as there was none, she found a nobler object for her zeal. The spirit of rebellion against existing evils was awakened strongly within her during the years of convent school life, and she set herself the task of reforming the monasteries of Spain and purging them of the corruption and abuses of a system from which she had suffered herself in her innocent girlhood. Her unswerving purpose and indomitable energy, handicapped as she was by chronic ill-health, which, strange to say, did not affect the beauty of her person, must excite the admiration of all times and all creeds.

But what commends St. Teresa to us most, perhaps, is that she was not only that rare thing, a woman with a sense of humour, but, what is still rarer, a humorous saint. Her cell often rang with shouts of laughter, St. Teresa's witty sallies and raillery melting the austerity of the priests and nuns who conversed with her. The quality of her humour is preserved for us in the saint's "Foundations" and in her enchanting Letters.

"Quite as good as Cervantes, quite as good as Goldsmith," Dr. Whyte caught himself exclaiming as he read and "laughed till the tears ran down his cheeks"; and Froude, in his article on Teresa's writings in the Quarterly, says, "The best satire of Cervantes is not more dainty." A selection of passages from Teresa's works has been placed by Dr. Whyte at the end of his introduction and appreciation.

Surely nothing could be more perfectly adapted than this little book to send "St. Teresa's Daughters" to the fountain-head, and to create a demand at the libraries for Father Coleridge's and Mrs. Cunningham-Graham's biographies of a great saint and a remarkable woman.

* "Santa Teresa: An Appreciation." With some of the best passages of the saint's writings. Selected, adapted and arranged by Alexander Whyte, D.D. (Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier.)

GLORIOUS HEALTH!

Glorious Health and Welbank's Boilerette are synonymous terms. It will be more and more clearly demonstrated that the one is impossible without the other. By eating rice from which a fine outer coating, chiefly consisting of Silicon, has been removed by a polishing process is the cause of Beri-beri (Multiple Neuritis), a terrible disease chiefly affecting the nerves. We too suffer from many terrible complaints and diseases because we make such fools of ourselves by persisting in washing out and wasting the most valuable elements of the food we eat, the priceless life-giving Salts of Vegetables. These Salts, consisting of Potassium, Sodium, Calcium, Magnesium, Iron, Phosphorus, Sulphur, Silicon and Chlorine, are the most Precious Medicines provided for us by Nature from her Wondrous Laboratory.

Anæmia is caused by Constipation and lack of Iron and Potassium in the blood. Vegetables properly cooked will cure the one and supply the deficiency in the other. Vegetables are rich in Iron, &c., especially Lettuce, Parsnip and Spinach, chemically prepared by Nature so as to be easily digested and assimilated. Neurasthenia, i.e., Nervous Depression and Prostration, Neuritis, &c., are oft-times the result of Constipation, producing weak digestion, &c. The chief cause, as in Beri-beri, is Nerve Starvation, the lack of nutriment to the nerves and brain. Vegetables, being rich in Phosphorus, Potassium, Silicon and other Nerve and Brain Foods, will supply the deficiency, besides curing Constipation, without which a full recovery may be regarded as almost hopeless.

Rheumatism, Gout, Neuralgia, &c.—These distressing complaints are caused by an excess of Uric Acid in the blood. Vegetables, being rich in Alkaline and other Salts, such as Potassium, Sodium, Magnesium, Calcium, Sulphur, &c., will purify the blood, neutralise the acids, and expel them from the system. As Constipation is nearly always pre-existent in these cases, Vegetables will effect the cure. But bear in mind the Vegetables must be so cooked that all the Valuable Organic Salts are fully conserved. Constipation is the foul and aggravating cause of most of the complaints and diseases from which we suffer, and can only be cured by Natural Remedies.

A Chemist said to the writer: "We Chemists know that there is no medicine that will cure Constipation." (Will Doctors and Chemists please note, and contradict if they can?) This Chemist was cured by using Welbank's Boilerette, also another Chemist, a friend of his, who was a physical wreck and not expected to live.

To those who suffer and desire to be cured of any of the above complaints, also Cancer, we advise a thorough Course of Cookery in this Epoch-Making, Wonder-Working Cooker called

WELBANK'S BOILERETTE

VISIT OUR LONDON DEPOT:
105, Newgate St., E.C.

THIS WONDER-WORKING INVENTION

gets intensely hot (above 212 deg.), yet never burns the food. As it is self-acting it requires no attention, and can be left for hours to "look after itself."

"THE IDEAL COOKER."—Hospital.

Perfect for Porridge, Milk Foods, Soups, Stews, Jellies, Custards, Sauces, Jams and Marmalade, Making Potted Meats, Meat Extracts. A Speciality for Infants', Invalid and

ALL KINDS OF VEGETARIAN COOKERY.

COOKS MEAT, POULTRY, AND VEGETABLES IN OWN JUICES,

by which means all the Valuable Salts, Tonics, Natural Aperients, and life-giving properties of Meat and Vegetables, which are usually washed away, are fully conserved.

VEGETABLES COOKED IN THEIR NATURAL MOISTURE are simply delicious, and can be relied upon to put fresh life and energy into body, blood, and brain.

"CONVERTS THE OLD INTO YOUNG."

The Boilerette will make Tough Meat dainty, delicious and digestible, and Old and Cheap Fowls more tender and delicious than Young and Expensive Chickens cooked in the ordinary way.

THE COOKER THAT LOOKS AFTER ITSELF.

You simply put a complete dinner in the Boilerette, go right away and leave it to take care of itself. When you are ready to dine it will be found beautifully cooked, ready to serve.

DR. ROBERT BELL, The Eminent Cancer Specialist, advocates the Cooking of Vegetables in their own moisture, and for this purpose uses and recommends the use of Welbank's Boilerette.

DR. F. W. FORBES ROSS, late Civil Surgeon, His Majesty's Guards' Hospital, London, and Author of "Cancer: The Problem of its Genesis and Treatment," advances and seeks to prove that the chief cause of Cancer is the deficiency of Potassium in the system. Concerning Vegetables, Dr. Forbes Ross writes: "Raw fruit and vegetables contain potassium. But the idiotic process of boiling vegetables in water (instead of cooking them in their own juices with butter), the eating of fine white bread, the drinking of adulterated beer are among the causes of this huge increase of cancer. It would be less foolish to throw away the vegetables and consume the water."

In the near future we hope to publish an article upon "The Cure of Cancer."

All sizes from 1½ pints up to 12 gallons. Full particulars post free.

E. A. WELBANK, Duplex Works, near BANBURY.
LONDON DEPOT: 105, NEWGATE STREET, E.C. Tel.: 5796 City.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 8) choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, examined, with name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

THE PROGRESS SOCIETY links up lonely men and women everywhere into a social body, affording wider intellectual and material interests through its various circles. No membership fee. For descriptive booklet send stamp to the Secretary, E. M., 107, Greencroft Gardens, Hampstead, London.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

MSS. WANTED.—Well-established publishers are open to consider MSS. in General Literature and Fiction for immediate publication on favourable terms. Book form only.—Write Box 850, Reynell's Advertisement Offices, 44, Chancery Lane, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES. New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

K.O. SCHOOL OF GRECIAN WISDOM.—Founded Manchester, 1911. Neoplatonic Exposition of Lesser Mysteries. For particulars write, S. G. W., c/o EVERYMAN, Aldine House, Bedford St., W.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLIX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

FRENCH BY NATIVE (University Degree). Pronunciation and conversation carefully taught, 2s. per hour.—MR. LEON, 50, Bloomsbury Street (New Oxford Street). 1 minute from Tube.

CAN YOU SPEAK? Bright, original talk commands a guinea an hour! 2nd (Brit.) Edn. now ready: "Public Speaking for Pay and Pleasure." Month's study sufficient. 1s. post free.—MORGAN, Poulner, Ringwood.

SLOAN-DUPLOYAN SHORTHAND saves a year's study. Used by Official Parliamentary reporters. Send for free illustrated handbook with specimen lesson.—SLOAN SHORTHAND CO., Ramsgate.

LITTLE SALON SOCIAL-LITERARY CIRCLES.—For Men and Women of Culture (Speakers and Non-Speakers); include Drama, and Open Discussions of Questions of the Day. New Books, etc. Sub. Mod.—Write, M. L. B., Salon Secretary, 24, Bloomsbury Square, London, W.C.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws"; in a Nutshell, on Card. Teaches the new way to acquire Knowledge. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

THE TEMPLE SCHOOL OF SHORTHAND and Secretarial and Typewriting Offices. Expert tuition at moderate fees. Thorough and practical training off-red. Day and Evening Classes, and Postal work.—Write for Prospectus to the Secretary, 27, Chancery Lane, W.C.

SECRETARYSHIP required in January, School or Private, by Lady, fully trained in Shorthand, Typing, Bookkeeping (speeds—100, 50), 7 years' experience as teacher in Secondary Schools; especially qualified in English Language and Literature.—E. CLARKE, 35, St. George's Square, S.W.

NAVAL WAR GAME.—Geography self-taught. Dreadnoughts, cruisers, fierce sea fighting. Fascinates boys and grown-ups. 5s. 6d. post free. Ships for chart demonstrations, 1s. dozen.—LEES, Fron, Deganwy, Llandudno.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. EACH OFFERED.—Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863; Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863; Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878; Baxter's Cabinet of Paintings, 1837; Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879; Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865; Symonds' Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881; Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. 100,000 Books for Sale and Wanted. Exchanges made. Please state wants.—Baker's Great Book Shop, 14-16, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

PRINT YOUR OWN CIRCULARS, Cards, etc.—Printing Presses complete from 10s. to £5. "Printing Made Easy," 64.—Adams Bros., Daventry.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from I. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

It is an essential quality of success in a book of adventure that the story begins without preamble, and opens on a dominant note. Mr. Stuart starts THE ROCK OF THE RAVENS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) in a spirited fashion, and takes us at once to the heart of the drama. It is a story of the Highlands, centring round the war of the clans, the eternal enmity between the rival sections of the hillsmen. Told in vivid and picturesque fashion, the interest never flags.

In the LAST LEGITIMATE KING OF FRANCE (J. M. Dent and Co., 12s. 6d. net), Miss Allen gives us a work that is at once monumental and interesting. The subject dealt with is one of those perennial historical controversies that never seem to get settled, but which excite fresh interest in every successive generation. Miss Allen gives us an exhaustive statement, at any rate, of one side of the question. She has had the advantage of being able to draw upon the wealth of material collected by M. Henri Provin, and she marshals her facts with clearness and effect. Put shortly, the thesis that she starts out to prove is that the son of Louis XVI., so far from dying in the Temple, as is commonly supposed, escaped from his captors (who confined a substitute in his place) and lived on to attain man's estate as Charles Guillaume Naumdorf, a clockmaker in Berlin. It follows, of course, that this man was the legitimate King of the French, and that it is his heirs who have the claim to the Bourbon succession. His subsequent adventures, with the efforts he made to establish his position, make interesting reading. Miss Allen writes with obvious sincerity, indeed with fervour of conviction, and no circumstance is too minute for her to neglect. While the issue that she raises may have little practical significance, the volume is undeniably a fascinating one, and deserves, and will repay, careful study.

Readers of occult literature will not need to be told that Mr. Ralph Shirley, whose volume of essays, THE NEW GOD (William Rider and Son, Ltd., 2s. net), has just achieved its second edition, writes with both lucidity and humour—qualities rare, unfortunately, in the illumination of such darkened themes. In these essays he reveals himself as a thinker also, lacking neither in penetration nor courage. The best thing in the volume is his warning against the danger of what, for want of a better term, we may call latitudinarianism. "The dangers," he says, "with which we are threatened to-day are not those which confronted our fathers. They were in danger of believing in absurdities through sheer force of habit; we are in danger of believing in shadows. They were menaced by dogma; we are menaced by our own open-mindedness. Their danger lay in the strength of their convictions; ours that we have no genuine convictions at all. Nothing could penetrate the brazen cloak of their obdurate prejudices; we are receptive mediums for every passing wind of opinion. We have no original thoughts, no ideas, to give us individuality, but every suggestion that is floating in the air finds a ready harbourage in our brains. . . . It is not our forefathers who are dead, but we." No saner warning could be uttered to a generation of intellectual triflers.

In these days, when so much that is wild and whirling is published in connection with what is called the woman's movement, it is quite refreshing to chance upon such a writer as Miss Alice Corkran, of whose book, THE ROMANCE OF WOMAN'S INFLUENCE, Messrs. Blackie and Son, Ltd., have just issued a new edition. The book is a record of women who helped to make men great, and in doing so became great themselves—as “mothers, wives, sisters, and friends.” We commend (especially to those of the “shrieking sisterhood” who are for ever discrediting the avocations of wifehood and motherhood as too frivolous for serious women to follow) the excellent description of ex-President Loubet's mother, the simple peasant woman who lived laborious days to bring up her two sons with dignity, one as a doctor, one as a lawyer. “We can see her in her frugal and beautiful old age very pleased and very proud of her sons; they on their side very proud of her.” Excellent also are the sympathetic sketches of Mrs. Gladstone and Madame Curie. “In the helpful woman of the category with which I deal,” says the authoress, “there is always something of the relationship of the mother to her fretful babe in their handling of the men they aid. The babe is equally impartial in its hospitality to all trifles, and it has to learn to distinguish by deputy those that really count.” That is true of the world also, and hence we welcome this book. It is about women who “really count.”

The illustrations that accompany THE SORCERY CLUB, by Elliot O'Donnell (William Rider and Son, Limited), are of a terrifying description. We do not say this in criticism of the artist; doubtless they are intended to be so. We find depicted for us the horror of a policeman on the banks of the Serpentine in a paroxysm of fear at a lime-tree, which is being made to rock to and fro! Also, the distorted and terrified countenances of three devotees of evil, who are racked with anguish at the pranks played on them by fearsome spirits. Our own natural repulsion over, our first instinct is to laugh at these deliriums of torture, such as we can conceive no human being suffering. We turn next to the text, and we confess that much the same feeling is produced by such a story as we found energy to give it. It appears that eating of some forbidden fruit by the characters concerned gave the faculty of sorcery, which ranges from the power of divination to that of creating plagues, healing ailments, and of producing vampires and wer-wolves. The results are very entertaining. Skeletons, for instance, are found, with buried treasure, beneath the floors of public-houses. In one case “the diviner,” who “was sitting in the Pig and Whistle saloon in Corn Street, drinking a lager, felt a peculiar throbbing sensation run up his left leg into his left hand.” This clue is followed up with amazing results. Later on, women are blackmailed, hideous spells are sold, old people slaughtered, the House of Commons blown up, and Cabinet Ministers killed. It would all be dreadful if it were not so grotesque. Even so, it is a little revolting. Frankly, we don't understand why it has been published.

THE FAIREST OF THE STEWARTS (Sampson Low and Co., 6s.) is written with a certain freshness that in a tale of modern times should serve the author in good stead. In an historical novel other qualities are essential to success; the art of creating atmosphere, of painting a period, suggesting the trend of historical events is lacking in Miss Mylechreest's novel. The characters do not bear the impress of the time, neither are the situations dramatic, nor is the dialogue sparkling. We would recommend the author to turn her talents towards the writing of a tale of to-day, which would not call for bold treatment or strong

LATIN WITHOUT TEARS

Correspondence Tuition in LATIN, GREEK and MODERN LANGUAGES

by Specialists in the Art of Teaching Languages by Post.
Address: DIRECTOR, EVERSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE,
43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

WOMAN AND MARRIAGE.
A Handbook. By MARGARET STEPHENS.
Cloth, 3/6. (Post free, 3/10.)

“‘Woman and Marriage’ is an outspoken book which should be carefully read by those for whom it is written. . . . We commend this work to all who want a full account in simple words of the physical facts of married life. All the difficulties of the subject are handled fearlessly, gravely and reverently in this book.”—The Spectator.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

M. A. B. (Mainly About Books).
An Illustrated Monthly Magazine for Book-lovers.
Price 1/- per annum, post free.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

Success in Journalism.

Success in journalism goes by merit, and the remuneration for this work makes it an attractive profession for those who feel they have some aptitude for writing. Even as an occasional occupation, it may be the means of adding substantially to one's existing income.

Mr. COULSON KERNAHAN

in a recent article, says: “The young man and the young woman with literary aspirations are told by the croaker of to-day that literature is a profession in which it is impossible to earn a living. That is not my experience, nor is it the experience of many another writer whose name might be mentioned here. But I make bold to assert that at no time were critics and the public more ready to recognise and to encourage new talent.”

Mr. HAROLD BEGBIE

in an article in The Author, says: “There is not an editor in London who is not anxiously searching for writers with something to say.”

Whatever aptitude or talent a man or woman may possess, some practical training is absolutely indispensable. Training at the hands of a responsible journalist saves the literary aspirant much needless disappointment and failure; it shortens the road to success by giving the beginner the benefit of the guidance of experience.

Mr. T. Sharper Knowlson, who has written a number of successful books on journalism and short-story writing, personally conducts the Practical Correspondence College Courses of correspondence instruction in all branches of the journalistic profession! The most important feature of the course is the fact that Mr. Knowlson personally supervises and criticises the work of every student. Whether he enrolls for the entire course or simply for one section he receives the same careful individual attention.

“THE YOUNG MAN”

says: “Mr. T. Sharper Knowlson is undoubtedly right when he offers to aid would-be journalists and novelists in the technique of their profession.”

Readers of EVERYMAN are invited to send specimen MSS. for Mr. Knowlson's inspection. All such MSS. will be returned with a candid opinion as to senders' chances of success in the literary field.

The Practical Correspondence College,
77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

characterisation, but would afford opportunity for the delicacy of treatment which is one of Miss Mylechreest's most marked attributes.

Mr. Klein gives us a series of arguments under the title of SCIENCE AND THE INFINITE (Rider, 2s. 6d. net), in which he states his views on "Mysticism and Symbolism," and the various chains of thought by which we arrive at conclusions concerning them. The style is not notable for lucidity; indeed, there is more than a touch of the confusion of thought characteristic of books trending on theosophy and kindred subjects. The best written chapter is that on "Time," where the arguments are concise and the deductions feasible. While the book will not appeal to the majority of readers, it will definitely interest those people, daily increasing, who are attracted by discussions on what the author terms the "Transcendental Ego."

Messrs. Putnam are to be congratulated on the Mauve Library. The books issued under this heading are well printed, excellently got up, and eminently readable. THEIR HEARTS' DESIRE (2s. net) is the story of a small child who brought together his father and the woman he loved. It was always John's grief that he had no mother, and the hope grew in his heart that one day he might attain the coveted possession. Children have a native tact which "grown-ups" can never aspire to, and the small boy achieved what an older person could not have brought about. The child's delight when at last the incredible is accomplished and John realises that Barbara has come into his home and heart to stay is well told. The story is daintily written, and ends on a natural, genuine emotion. It is a book that will delight all young people—and those of an older generation.

It is but seldom one meets with a story of adventure and sensation written in such a pleasant, breezy manner as distinguishes Miss Marchant's YOUNGEST SISTER (Blackie and Son, 5s.). Bertha, the heroine of the story, is considered by her practical, bustling sisters incompetent and reckless, one of those "impossible funny people" who fill those of well-ordered minds and nicely regulated habits with a certain kindly tolerance tinged with contempt. The story opens well, and the author wastes no time in coming to grips with her readers. "Old Jan Saunders, with his wife and the fat German who kept the little store at the bottom of the hill, were standing in an excited group at the edge of the roadway and pointing out to the upstanding rocks called the Shark's Teeth, which showed grim and deadly a few yards out from the shore." The fat German, the tears running down his cheeks, explains that there is a man caught on the rocks, and he will be drowned. Bertha turns sick and faint at the news that there is no boat nearer than four miles, and by the time it arrives the stranger will be drowned. Her dreamy nature notwithstanding, she rises to the situation and, after a really heroic struggle, rescues the man. The story sketches the development of Bertha's character, and shows how the girl, removed from the chilling criticisms of her superior—and entirely unpleasant—sisters, develops into a charming and capable woman, with a marked literary gift. The theme of Cinderella, retold in a thousand different ways, has never been more happily sketched than in the story of Bertha Doyne.

Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald's book on his wife, MARGARET ETHEL MACDONALD (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d. net), will doubtless be of interest to those who were personally acquainted with Mrs. Macdonald, or who are united with the author in political conviction. Apart from sentimental reasons, however, the book is not attractive. It is a dull record of details relating to the ancestry, birth, and upbringing of the subject of the biography, with ample particulars as to the family faith, their traditions, domestic and otherwise, their taste in food, their preferences in literature, together with their feelings as to art and their views on propaganda generally. It is perhaps unwise to attempt a monograph on our nearest and dearest. Things which to those intimately concerned are of definite import appear to the ordinary observer quite trivial and unimportant, and when the association is as close as the tie which existed between the author and the person written of there is an unfortunate tendency to strike the note of egotism more frequently than to the reader appears necessary.

LA COTE D'EMERAUDE (A. and C. Black, 7s. 6d. net), beautifully printed and profusely illustrated, is a notable production. The Emerald Coast of France makes a peg on which to hang legends of the countryside, with vivid descriptives and side-views of historical events, together with much practical information as to routes and places of interest and association. Mr. Spencer Musson takes us from the "golden beaches and iron cliffs" round the edge of the great gulf of St. Malo, the "Corsair City," to Granville, "an old-fashioned little grey town, built on a rocky promontory that juts westward into the channel, and is almost separated from the main plateau by a great cleft known as the Tranchée des Anglais, the Monaco of the North." The chapter on Dinard contains some wonderful bits of word painting; but, indeed, the author has for La Cote d'Emeraude an intimate affection and understanding. He likens Ireland to the Emerald Coast with an effective parallel. "Not only do the last strands of the Gulf Stream bring to each the mild, moist air that makes them green, and the veiled skies and mystic horizons that steep their atmosphere in poetry, but both are lands ou les jamais sont les toujours, last refuges of the attractive race which barely hold their own as distinct folk, in the long fringe of creek and firth, island and highland, that stretches from the mouth of the Loire to the misty Hebrides." The illustrations are from the original paintings of Mr. J. Hardwicke Lewis.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., NEW SPRING BOOKS.

MESSRS. DENT have pleasure in announcing the following new titles:—

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A. Large Crown 8vo, 5s. net each volume.

The two following new volumes will be published very shortly, and readers who have already obtained the earlier published volumes of this series, "English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy" (by Prof. James Seth, M.A.) and "English Epic and Heroic Poetry" (by Prof. W. Macneile Dixon, M.A.), are advised to place their orders with their booksellers at once.

ENGLISH LYRIC POETRY. By ERNEST RHYS.

THE ENGLISH NOVEL. By Professor GEORGE SAINTSBURY, LL.D.

A FRENCH "EVERYMAN."

Tous les chefs-d'œuvre de la Litterature Française.

THE FOLLOWING VOLUMES WILL BE PUBLISHED IN 1913.

MOLIERE	Théâtre III.	LA ROCHEFOUCAULD	Sentences et Maximes morales, etc.
MOLIERE	Théâtre IV.	Romanciers et Conteurs du XVIIIe Siècle	Morceaux choisis.
MASSILLON, FLÉCHIER, etc.	Extraits.	BOSSUET	Oraisons funèbres, Sermons, etc.
PASCAL	Pensées.	CARDINAL DE RETZ	Meilleures pages des Mémoires. [Prospectus.]
LA FONTAINE	Fables et Petits Poèmes.
AGRIPPA D'AUBIGNÉ	Les Tragiques.

1s. net each volume.

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS.

By E. G. GARDNER, M.A. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

(Treats of the Mysticism of Dante, its sources and spiritual significance. Stress is laid upon the mystical aspect of the Divina Commedia, to trace the influence upon Dante of earlier mystics from St. Augustine down to the Franciscans, and the two Mechtilds; and to illustrate the mystical tendency of the sacred poem by its analogies with the writing of other masters in the same science of love.)

DANTE AND AQUINAS.

By Rev. P. W. WICKSTEED. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

(The book aims at giving the reader a connected idea of the general Theological and Philosophical background of the "Comedy," and, therefore, a keen appreciation of those distinctive features in which Dante's own personality more especially reveals itself.)

WINDS OF DOCTRINE: Studies in Contemporary Opinion.

By Professor G. SANTAYANA. Small Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

(A work that treats of the intellectual temper of the Age, enquires into the case of Modernism, analyses the philosophy of M. Bergson, confirms Mr. Bertrand Russell's critique of Pragmatism, comments upon the poetic value of Revolutionary Principles, and also treats of the Genteel Tradition in American Philosophy.)

CHAUCER. By EMILE LEGOUIS.

Translated by L. Lailavoix. Large Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

(This is the full-length study of Chaucer by a French Critic, and therefore a work of peculiar interest.)

LONDON AND ITS GOVERNMENT.

By PERCY A. HARRIS, L.C.C. Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

(The purpose of this book is two-fold. Firstly, to make the Government of London intelligible, by tracing its historical development and giving an explanation of its complex institutions; secondly, to draw attention to several much-needed reforms.)

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

OXFORD AND ITS STORY. CAMBRIDGE AND ITS STORY.

Each Volume has 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by HERBERT RAILTON.
Size, imperial 8vo, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net each.

By CECIL HEADLAM and the (late) Rt. Rev. C. W. STUBBS, Bishop of Truro, respectively.

"For the modest expenditure of a guinea, any man may now place both these beautiful and finely illustrated quartos on his shelves."—The Standard.

UPON RECEIPT OF A POST-CARD, A GENERAL CATALOGUE OR LIST OF ANY SERIES, OR PROSPECTUS WILL BE GLADLY SENT. The Prospectus of the MEDIÆVAL TOWN SERIES, for the Spring Holidays, 1913.

137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

DARN NO MORE

Holeproof Hose

Stockings and Socks That Don't Want Mending.

Wear our Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO months of purchase we will Replace them absolutely FREE

You can imagine that we should not make such an offer unless we were convinced of the extraordinary good wearing quality of our socks and stockings. No more eye-straining, costly, and unnecessary darning. You can now turn to more pleasant and congenial occupations. For every pair of hose you get a GUARANTEE TICKET, which declares that if the smallest hole appears within two months of purchase, the hose will be replaced absolutely free. So you can see the enormous saving that is realized by purchasing our Holeproof Hose. These Holeproof Socks and Stockings are of fine quality, made of the finest materials, and are comfortable, with that perfect sense of good fit that is one of the many pleasures of wearing our socks. It is probable that it gives to countless pairs of feet just as spongy may be depressed by gripping of the hand, such has no damage done to its fabric. The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business men and busy housewives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 2/10, post 2d., Two Pairs Ladies' stockings 3/10, post 2d.

COLOURED HOSE for Ladies, in Black, Navy, Mole, Champagne, Pearl Grey, Tan & Light Mole at same price. SILK HOLEPROOF. Most delightful. Specially strengthened in to sand heels with our Holeproof mixture yarn. The latest Champagne colour is stocked, also Empire Blue, Tan, Pearl Grey, and Black. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 7/8, post 2d. Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings 10/8, post 2d. On the guarantee that we will replace them free if a hole develops within Two Months of purchase, will you send your P.O.? State boot size. Write your name and address distinctly. Call or write: VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

500 HOURS' LIGHT for 1½d. "FOOL-PROOF" LAMP.

AGENTS WANTED.

We have named this the "Fool-Proof" Lamp, because even with the most careless handling it is absolutely safe. That is, there is no exposed flame to flicker or blow out when used out of doors, near bedroom windows or curtains, or draughty corners. Many people would like their dark recesses, halls or basements well lighted, but cannot manage this because of the expense. But one of these little "Fool-Proof" Lamps, placed in those eerie corners or dark staircase landings, will cost no more than 1½d. for 500 hours. You will realise this better when you know that candles give only 15 hours for the same amount and are also highly dangerous, besides looking rather poverty stricken. Now, these lamps are really artistic, the pattern is beautifully designed and well executed on a copper base, and the whole is so well finished that it has the appearance of a really expensive article. It is essentially "good" looking and is totally different to the usual run of rather cheap looking oil lamps. Burns Paraffin Oil. Turns up or down with one finger.

It can be used as a smoker's companion, and is absolutely odourless; it wears for years, and is a great boon to those who are nervous in the dark. Price 2/8. Postage and Packing, 2d. VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGHTON.

MOST WONDERFUL COAL SAVER

Important Discovery that will make 1 cwt. last nearly as long as 2 cwt.

It doubles the warming, heating, and cheering power of coal—that is the almost miraculous achievement of the scientific invention sold by an enterprising Brighton firm. It means that you will be able to light the fire at once every time, even if it be not well laid. It means that your coal bill will be cut in two, and that you will have extra leisure time of several hours a week in which to go to the theatre or have other pleasures, which can be paid for with the saved half of the coal bill. It means all of these things at a total cost to you to-day of 1/- or 1/6. That is all you pay for these privileges, except 3d. postage to bring the patent "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" to your home. Every ounce of the coal in the grate will burn and yield up its cheery influence for your benefit, because there is room for air to get round at the back. Look at the illustration. You can see there is. So the fire will burn brighter and warmer and clearer always. And yet it won't burn away the coal any faster. Why? Because you are burning a combination of half coal and half air. Coal costs money. Air costs NOTHING—it improves the fire—so burn it. You knew before you were told that air improves a fire, or why do you blow it to make it go? Just fancy, only half as much coal to be bought. You must then send your postal order now for Large Size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (5½ in. wide), 1/6; or small size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (4 in. wide), 1/- Postage on each, 3d. Go to the Post Office NOW, and start this investment of 1/- or 1/6 earning big dividends for you at once. You will get the price back at least once a month for the next ten years, an unheard-of saving. Call or write—VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

Burning half coal, half air. Result: Great Heat with V. & H. Coal Saver.

NO MORE GOLD FEET

SLIP ON A "SLIPON" AND KEEP WARM.

Cold feet, with all the attendant misery and pain, can now be a thing of the past! Doce away with for ever by the advent of our new 'Slipon' Under-Socks.

For Men, Women & Children. The new "Slipon" Under-Socks are made of beautifully warm, non-irritating woolly material.

Worn next to the skin. Your sock or stocking is worn over them. They create a glowing warmth. They also add enormously to the comfort of those who suffer from chilblains. Do not fill up the boot. Can be washed again and again. 1/- PER PAIR, post., 1d. extra. Agents Wanted.

per pair. Postage 1d. State boot size. P.O.'s only. VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGHTON.

Literature Originality and Fearless Criticism

The ENGLISH Review.

1/-

The periodical that costs but 1/- per copy, or 12 numbers post free for 12/6.

The periodical that first published Masfield's Great Poems "The Everlasting Mercy," "The Widow in the Bye Street" and "Dauber."

H. G. Wells' "Tono Bungay," "The New Machiavelli." Conrad's "Under Western Eyes," and much else of shining merit.

The periodical that allowed Conrad to speak the truth about the Titanic.

In short

The one English periodical that is alive.

ENGLISH IN NAME, BUT COSMOPOLITAN IN CHARACTER.

The February, 1913, Number will contain another great Poem by John Masfield.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW, 17-21, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, London.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 14. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17, 1913.

One Penny.

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	421
The Housing of the Poor— By Hector Macpherson	422
The Influence of Islam upon Christendom— By Dr. Percy Dearmer	423
Countries of the World— By the Editor—III.—Germany	424
Why the Turk Must Go— By a Member of the Diplomatic Service	426
The Decay of our Nation, and Imperialist Policy— By H. Mayers Hyndman	427
A Visit to Anatole France— By Mrs. John Lane	428
Portrait of Anatole France	429

CONTENTS

ARTICLES
BY HENRY MAYERS HYNDMAN
MRS. JOHN LANE
DR. PERCY
DEARMER
J. MIDDLETON
MURRY

Silhouettes	PAGE 430
Masterpiece of the Week— Balzac's "Old Goriot"—By J. Middleton Murry	431
Literary Notes	432
The Gooseberry-Fool	433
Echoes of the Week	434
Our Lady's Juggler— By Anatole France	436
The Tyranny of Facts	437
Correspondence	438
Reviews—
The Temple on the Hill	444
Folk Tales of Breffny	444
Books of the Week	446

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE war clouds in the East are decidedly darker. The situation grows more threatening hour by hour. Turkey declines to give way on the points of discussion, and refuses to resign Adrianople or cede the Ægean Isles. The Powers have urged these concessions to the uttermost, but up to the time of going to press Turkey declines to respond to pressure, and the Allies, growing impatient at the protracted delay, threaten a renewal of the war, and an outbreak of hostilities is feared. It is felt, however, that the Powers will use every effort to stave off such a calamity, and that, in the ultimate, Turkey will be forced to hear reason.

In a letter to Lord Balcarras, Mr. Bonar Law announces his decision that food taxes are to have no place in the fighting programme of the Tory party for the present. In the same letter he consents to retain the leadership of the party, and to accept the compromise set forth in the memorial presented to him, which suggested that no food taxes should be imposed until they had been submitted to the country at a General Election.

In a speech at Manchester, Lord Haldane foreshadowed an important addition to the Government's legislative programme. The Government, he said, were intending to deal in a large and comprehensive way with the whole subject of education, which is in a state of confusion, not to say chaos. The idea is to make secondary and higher education, as well as primary education, a national matter. Lord Haldane did not descend to details. The one thing made clear was that the cost would not fall directly upon the ratepayer, but would be made a national charge, in the shape of increased taxation. The religious difficulty stands in the forefront of any national scheme, but Lord Haldane is of opinion that it will not prove insurmountable. Meanwhile the Government seem determined to organise education so as to open a career for every child with brains.

On Wednesday the Insurance Act came into operation. In the hands of the National Health Insurance Committee there is now £10,000,000, in order to meet the first claims for the various benefits. On the panels there are now 15,000 doctors, and everything is said to be in readiness for the administration of the medical part of the Act.

Judgment has been given by the Railway and Canal Commissioners in connection with the claim of the National Telephone Company for the service which passed over to Government control in January, 1912. The Commissioners award a total sum of £12,515,264 to the company, who originally claimed over twenty millions, of which about seventeen millions were under the heading of plants.

The Select Committee to inquire into the Marconi contract with the Post Office recommend that steps should be at once taken, in view of the urgency of establishing an Imperial chain of wireless stations, for the purchase of sites for the stations. In this connection the Committee also suggest the immediate appointment of a highly qualified Technical Committee to advise upon the system to be adopted.

Weather of exceptional severity has been experienced over the greater part of the United Kingdom. A snowstorm of the blizzard type greatly interfered with railway travelling. Trains were snowed up, and much damage was done to shipping, and many lives were lost.

A number of influential Liberals have drawn up a memorial to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, asking him to provide in the Budget for the reduction of the present taxes on food, more particularly on sugar.

At the Conference of the Historical Association at the Imperial Institute of London papers were read bearing on the homes of the poor and domestic economy. It was pointed out that the teaching of domestic science did not in the least influence economics in the households of the poor, for the simple reason that they had not the necessary appliances to enable them to work on any particular basis. They had not facilities for storing food, and consequently had to pay higher prices in many cases for inferior articles. The existing housing of the poor was described as abominable; owing to their deplorable environment, free life was impossible. The housing of the poor, it was contended, should be taken out of the hands of speculators.

The public interest in the Dreyfus case, which created intense excitement in France some years ago, has been dramatically revived by the resignation of M. Millerand, Minister of War in the Poincaré Cabinet. Without consulting his colleagues, M. Millerand reinstated in the territorial army Colonel du Paty de Clam, who was one of the officers mainly responsible for securing the conviction of Captain Dreyfus, and was regarded as one of his bitterest enemies. He was removed from the active list after the revision of the trial. As the outcome of Cabinet meetings, M. Millerand tendered his resignation. His action in reinstating the colonel had not the approval of his colleagues. The new War Minister is M. Lebrun, who was previously Minister of the Colonies.

Trouble seems to be brewing in South Africa over the Hertzog incident. In addressing his constituents, the General made a bitter attack upon General Botha, and reiterated his previous declaration that he placed the interests of South Africa before the Imperial interest. Amongst General Botha's party the attack has provoked great resentment. It was thought possible at one time to reinstate General Hertzog, but anything of the kind is now declared to be impossible. In the course of his speech General Hertzog said that if there was anything inimical to the interests of South Africa it was the number of foreign interests vested in Johannesburg and other places.

Dr. Woodrow Wilson has been subjecting American business methods to severe criticism. Speaking at the Commercial Club, in Chicago, he said he did not care how big any business became provided it grew big in keen competition. Perfectly honest men were now at a disadvantage in America, because people generally distrust business methods. Referring to the banking system, he said it did not need to be indicted, as it was already convicted.

Important resolutions have been passed by Canadian farmers at their annual Conventions. The North-Western Grain Growers unanimously passed a resolution opposing all preferential tariff schemes giving Western grain growers higher prices at the expense of British workmen. The Western Farmers' Convention, representing 10,000 farmers, adopted a resolution advocating international peace, deploring the Canadian contribution to the Imperial Navy, which, it was declared, would promote a warlike sentiment, and condemning the Government's policy of a contribution without a referendum.

THE HOUSING OF THE POOR

It is an old and familiar saying that an Englishman's house is his castle. The ideal spot in the midst of life's din and bustle is the home, with its sacred seclusion. So far as the great mass of the people is concerned, the ideal is not within measurable distance of realisation. In these days of land depression and agricultural backwardness, there might be some excuse for the wretched housing conditions of the rural districts; but what is to be said of the deplorable housing conditions of London, say, the wealthiest city in the world? Overcrowding exists to a degree which constitutes a scandal at this stage of Christian civilisation. In a book published a few years ago, "The Citizen of To-morrow," it is stated that the average size of the rooms used for living and sleeping by the overcrowded Londoners is ten feet square. The heaviest burden falls on the women. Night and day they are condemned to soul and body destroying existence in these dens. Cooking, washing, drying, nursing the sick must be done in this ten-feet-square room. In London, at the time this book was published, there were 3,000 people living eight in a room, and over 9,000 living seven in a room. At the lowest computation there were 26,000 of the occupants of single-room dwellings living six and more in a room. We are told that thousands of these single-roomed dwellings serve not only for living and sleeping, but also for workshops. Many costermongers store their stock in their single rooms at night. Under conditions such as these, as Lord Rosebery once said, an Imperial race cannot be raised. Just consider, too, the waste of infant life which results from this deplorable state of matters. In his "Riches and Poverty," Mr. Chiozza Money gives a table showing the expectation of life for males in Hampstead and Southwark. At birth, the Hampstead infant has the expectation of 50.8 years of life; the Southwark infant 36.5. Central London has a death-rate of from 26 to 30 per 1,000, as compared with 13.5 in Surrey and Middlesex; while in the slum districts the rate goes up to 40 and 50 per 1,000.

A depressing feature of this condition of things is the exorbitant rents which the poor pay for their miserable hovels. As Mr. Haw, in his book, "No Room to Live," says: "Many a six-roomed house in a Bermondsey back lane or a Bethnal Green court is fetching 6s. a room, or £93 a year; while on the heights of Highgate, or in Dulwich lanes, the rents and rates combined of well-built, eight-roomed villa houses, fitted with baths, with gardens front and back, do not exceed £50 a year." It is not wide of the mark to say that the abodes of at least two and a half millions, or more than eight out of every hundred people in England and Wales, are incompatible with the production of healthy, law-abiding and industrious Christian citizens.

Driven off the land, men crowd into the towns, and, in desperation, compete with one another for the crumbs of bread which fall to them by the way to maintain an existence compared with which, as Huxley once said, the life of the savage is enviable. The savage at least has freedom and fresh air, while the miserable slum-dwellers are driven to live their miserable lives in places over which might well be inscribed the Dantean words, "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here." The home, as Mazzini somewhere says, is the recognised place where the child's first lesson in citizenship is learned. Here, then, is a problem which calls for the urgent attention of all earnest men, irrespective of political opinions and party ties.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

THE INFLUENCE OF ISLAM UPON CHRISTENDOM

BY DR. PERCY DEARMER

I.

WE have seen how Islam, in the hands of two different races, and at two widely separated periods—the seventh and the fourteenth centuries—invaded Christendom—first, as far as France; next, as far as Germany—and threatened the civilisation of Europe. Christendom stood then, as it does now, for civilisation, which does not mean that at any period Christianity was at all perfect. There are crimes and barbarisms in abundance spread over Christian history; and the “Kingdom of Heaven” has proved to be, as its Founder foretold, a leaven spreading slowly through the lump of natural humanity. But it has been a leaven; each century has shed some barbarism and has learnt some wisdom. There has been steady progress; for Christianity is the religion of hope and charity as well as faith, of movement, and of the spirit which makes all things new. Islam, on the other hand, is fatalism and fixity. The one is dynamic; the other static; and the very essence of modern science and modern thought is that we have passed from the static idea of things to the dynamic.

In our natural reaction against the intolerance of our ancestors we are apt to go to the opposite extreme and assume that every religion and every civilisation is as good as any other, which, of course, is nonsense. To compare Islam with Christianity, we need go no further than one instance—a test of thirteen centuries. Muhamed's immediate followers were converting Syria at the same time as England was being converted to Christianity. St. Columba came to Iona in 563, Muhamed was born in 570, St. Augustine came to Kent in 597, the Hegira of Muhamed was in 622, St. Paulinus baptised Edwin, King of Northumbria, in 629, Muhamed died in 632; and, two years after, Syria had been conquered by his disciples, before half England was converted. At that time England was a barbarous land, and Syria was civilised. During the thirteen centuries which have since passed England and Syria have changed places, with this difference—that England has a far higher civilisation than was possible then, and is still rapidly developing.

II.

One obvious result then of the Moslem invasions was that they arrested progress wherever they remained. Even the Saracens (who were a far higher race than the Turks, and had an art, a science, a literature of their own, which the Turks never had) ended in inanition and decay, as the ruined condition of North Africa witnesses. We shall understand better the motive of Italy in retaking Tripoli (which had belonged to the Roman and Byzantine emperors till the Saracens took it twelve and a half centuries ago) when we realise that the decay of North Africa was the ruin of the opposite towns of Sicily (once great and flourishing places), and that Italy can never become what she once was till the African and Asiatic coasts are dotted with great cities, and are rich in prosperous and well-ordered agriculture, as once they were. The rolling back of the Moslem invasions has meant the rejuvenation of the lands recovered, and is going to mean a still more striking new birth when the whole of the Mediterranean world is recovered, and modern civilisation extends, as ancient civilisation did, from Smyrna to Damascus, from the Red Sea to Morocco.

But strangest of all results—and a result, I think, realised by few—is the state of Christendom itself. The present condition of our religion is itself the result of the Moslem invasions. For what did they do? They altered the whole balance of power in the Christian Church.

III.

If I asked the first man I met what Christianity consisted of, he would, in nine cases out of ten, say Roman Catholicism and Protestantism; if he were a reader of EVERYMAN, and better informed, perhaps he would add, “and the Eastern Church” as an afterthought—though, indeed, even learned gentlemen who write books of geography often lump all the ancient Churches of the East under the name of “the Greek Church.” But what would Christendom have been to an observer in the time of the Fathers? It consisted of five great patriarchates, with certain other powerful Churches—Jerusalem, Antioch, Rome, Alexandria, and the later patriarchate of Constantinople. That is to say, great as was the power of Rome, the balance lay with the Eastern Churches and the Latin-speaking Church of North Africa. To take one instance, the six great General Councils (A.D. 325-681), which are to-day accepted by East and West alike, were all held either in Constantinople or near it, and over none did the Bishop of Rome preside. This alone shows the enormous shifting of the balance of power in Christendom, as the ancient patriarchates of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria fell into Moslem hands, and became the shadows of their former selves. If the Saracens had been a seafaring people, instead of being horsemen, they might have taken Rome and left Antioch; and Rome might have become what Antioch now is. They exist still, these shrivelled ancient popedoms, but what does their existence matter to Christendom at large? Even the Patriarch of Constantinople is the ghost of what he once was; and his appointment, by the strangest of ironies, has rested with the Sultan.

IV.

Things are dynamic, it is true, and not static; and Christendom is moving. The Russian Church has already swept over North Asia; and the rolling back of Islam will put new life into the Greek, Servian, and Bulgarian Churches, and into their natural head, the Patriarch of Constantinople. Perhaps in the future Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria will become great patriarchates again. But in the Middle Ages the world seemed static, like a prim garden. Russia had not arisen to make the Eastern Church again a power in the world; Constantinople was dwindling and doomed. What wonder that the patriarchate of Rome became all in all? Our forefathers talked and wrote about Christendom in the Middle Ages as if the Eastern Churches did not exist.

But the enormous power of Rome was not without result. It led to revolt, and revolt led to reaction, and Protestantism was born. Where would Protestantism be to-day if in the year 622 Muhamed had not fled from Mecca to Medina? And what would the Church of Rome be like? The balance of East and West might have been undisturbed, or it might have been heavy on the side of the East.

And all this shows that, though religion may try to keep out of international politics, international politics will not keep out of religion.

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD BY THE EDITOR

III.—GERMANY

I.

NO one who compares Germany with other countries would be prepared to assert that she has been specially favoured by nature. She does not enjoy the sunny, genial, and temperate climate of France, nor can her agricultural wealth be compared with that of her French neighbours, Prussia being, to a large extent, reclaimed from the sand. The mineral wealth of Germany is poor compared with that of Great Britain. She has few harbours, and only a narrow stretch of open sea. Nor has she the magnificent waterways for inland trade which are the pride of Russia, and Germany's finest river, the Rhine, has an outlet in alien territory.

II.

Yet this country, which possesses so few economic advantages, has become one of the great commercial powers of the world. This country, which only possesses a few miles of open sea, has a magnificent overseas trade, and is ready to compete with Great Britain for the empire of the waves, and proudly asserts that her future is on the water. The expansion of Germany is one of the miracles of modern times. The three industrial centres of Germany—Westphalia, Silesia, and Saxony—are amongst the most productive areas of Continental Europe, and the growth of her cities can only be compared to the mushroom growth of American towns. In the silk industry, Crefeld now rivals Lyons; the engineering trade of Westphalia rivals that of the Midlands, and the ship-building of Kiel and Stettin rivals that of Glasgow and Belfast. In the chemical industry Germany has reached a unique position. Hamburg, with Antwerp and Rotterdam, is one of the three leading Continental ports, and Antwerp and Rotterdam are practically German harbours. Everywhere in South America, in the Near East, and in the Far East, German trade is developing by leaps and bounds, and in the Russian Empire, where German supremacy almost amounts to a monopoly, she probably possesses the finest future market of the whole world.

III.

The explanation of this miracle is very simple. Although Germany is poor in natural resources, she is—and always has been—rich in men. The German race is one of the hardest and one of the most hard-working in Europe. The wonder is, not that the Germans have come to the front by the end of the nineteenth century, but that they should have come to the front so late. In the Middle Ages the Hansa towns enjoyed unbounded prosperity. It was the Reformation and the Wars of Religion that ensued which plunged Germany for two centuries back into barbarism. The German is not brilliant. He lacks personality and originality; especially he lacks the supreme political gift. He is not born to rule. The real Imperial races, like the English and the French, easily assimilate, and are not readily assimilated. The Germans do not assimilate alien races, whilst they themselves are speedily assimilated in the United States and elsewhere. The 50,000 French-Canadians, who have become to-day a people of two millions and a half, if they had been German would have lost their nationality.

On the other hand, the Germans have some of the essential qualities conducive to success. They are earnest and conscientious. They have an infinite capacity for taking pains. The "plodding" German has become proverbial. The German race has always been prolific, and to-day, even more than in the past, there is an unlimited supply of "human material." To-day the net increase of the population is at the rate of 1,000,000 a year, and the 65,000,000 of Germans (not including the 15,000,000 Teutons of Austria and Switzerland), before the middle of the century, will exceed 100,000,000.

IV.

The rapid increase of the German population, together with the sudden expansion of trade and industry, is one of the fundamental facts of German economics and politics. Until recently the surplus population of Germany was absorbed by emigration. In the United States there are 10,000,000 people of German descent, and there are large German colonies in Russia and South America. For the last few years emigration has practically stopped. The whole surplus population is being absorbed. The immigration of aliens into Germany exceeds the emigration of Germans into alien territory, and this increase of the foreign element—mainly Slav—causes great concern to patriots, and has already led to stringent and brutal legislation.

In the midst of this abounding prosperity, patriotic German statesmen are not without anxiety, and they ask themselves, "How long is this going to last?" Their anxiety is natural. Hitherto Germany has competed successfully in the markets of the world, because she produced more cheaply than other nations. But the standard of living is rising, and the cost of living is increasing, as protective tariffs and corn laws in favour of the Prussian landlords have raised the cost of meat and wheat to famine prices. Hitherto, also, Germany has had the freedom of the great foreign markets, but those foreign markets may be closed against her. Foreign Governments may imitate her own example. They may retaliate and erect a protective tariff wall. Nor must we forget that Germany, not having the natural or accumulated wealth of her rivals, possesses less working capital, and that her huge trade is built largely on an airy fabric of credit and borrowed money. Hence the sensitiveness of German industry. Hence the periodic crises and the frequent panics on the Berlin Stock Exchange. Hence also the instinctive desire of Germany to possess colonies, that is to say, to possess independent markets of her own. The outcry for colonies is quite intelligible, but it is none the less absurd. Nothing shows better the futility of modern class politics than this clamour of Germany for colonies under the pretence of an outlet for her teeming population and for her trade and industry. So far as the population is concerned, the tropical or sub-tropical regions of Brazil or Asia Minor or Africa would be entirely unsuitable for emigration, and Professor Delbrück, in his recent article in EVERYMAN, admitted this when he said that it is only the educated middle class—i.e., a few thousands—for whom colonies would provide employment. So far as German trade and industry are concerned, it is one of the little ironies of modern history that, incomparably, the three best "colonies" of Germany are the three great political rival countries of France, England, and Russia. If one of those three countries were to keep out German goods by a prohibitive tariff, it would spell ruin to the Fatherland.

MAP OF GERMANY.

V.

If the economic structure of Germany is partly artificial, so is the political fabric. The political unity of the German Empire conceals considerable diversities. Until 1789 Germany was a bewildering confusion of independent feudal principalities. Even until 1848 she was a mosaic of States, but long before 1848 the Zollverein, or Customs Union, had been established. And this Customs Union would have slowly but surely brought about political unity. In 1849 the Radicals offered the crown of United Germany to the King of Prussia, but the Prussian King refused to hold his authority from the will of the people. He preferred to owe it to the "blood and iron" of the battlefield. Three successful wars—the Danish War, the Austrian War, the Franco-German War—welded North and South together. But even after 1870 Germany had not really become one united people. If "blood and iron" may produce political unity, they cannot achieve moral unity, and even the triumphs of the Franco-German War did not accomplish what would have been accomplished if the Germans, instead of appealing to brute force, had trusted to the action of moral, intellectual, and economic agencies. At the beginning of the twentieth century Northern and Southern Germany continue to be separated by political, social, and religious differences, which are much deeper than would appear on the surface. On every frontier there are still millions who have not been assimilated. And the German Empire still presents to us in this year of grace 1913 a heterogeneous conglomerate of disaffected nationalities.

VI.

So true is this that even those who deny it make it, when it suits their argument, the main and only justification for maintaining the present antiquated feudal and despotic régime, for maintaining in Prussia the most reactionary Parliament in Europe, a "Landtag" in which the voting power of one brewer is equal to 200 times the voting power of an artisan. In 1913 the German still stands, politically, where the Briton stood before the Reform Bill and the Repeal of the Corn Laws. When one considers how the German submits even to the most tyrannical institutions, to the most odious abuses, it must be admitted that he is still far from being an ideal citizen, and that he is still content to be an ideal "subject." He may grumble. He may organize himself into a vast Socialist army. But this does not prevent him from accepting the bureaucracy, the East Elbian Junker and landlord, the monstrous tariffs, the famine prices, the ubiquitous police. He believes in discipline, in authority, in a monarch by Right Divine, in a paternal and providential Government. He believes, as the Kaiser has told him in speeches innumerable, that, under Almighty God, he owes his earthly prosperity to the sword of the Hohenzollern.

VII.

For not only does he believe in Authority and Discipline, but, alas! he also believes in Brute Force. He not only believes in a bureaucratic despotism and in a servile State, but he also believes in a military despotism. Prussian militarism is everywhere rampant. The military caste rules in the inner councils of the Sovereign. The profession which is most honoured is not that of the merchant or of the scholar, but that of the soldier. The ambition of every graduate who wants to get on is to become a reserve officer. It is the ambition of every German maiden who wants to get on in Society to marry into the cavalry. By all means let us admire whatever is admirable in our German cousins, but let us also refuse to admire what is the reverse of admirable. Let us recognise that the Prussian militarism which dominates Germany, and which, through Germany, dominates Central Europe, is odious and repellent, and that this justification of brutal force, this glorification of the man with the peaked helmet, is keeping back the progress, not only of the Fatherland, but of civilised Europe.

VIII.

The persistence of Prussian militarism, of the insolent rule of a small minority over an overwhelming majority, is all the more strange, because the Germans, as a race, are intellectual and sentimental, musical and artistic. They believe in brain power and education. They have got an excellent system of gratuitous and compulsory elementary schools. Their technical schools are unrivalled.

At present all the spiritual and moral forces of Germany, the Churches, the Schools and Universities, the Press, the Socialist party, seem to be struck with paralysis. The Roman Catholic Church is selling her birthright for a mess of political pottage. Protestant Churches have ceased to protest. The University teacher dares not speak out, for if he did speak out he would not get promotion. The Press has little political influence. Even the millions of organised social democrats dare not rise in open rebellion.

And yet it is only through social democracy, it is only through her spiritual forces, that the German nation will ultimately achieve emancipation. In the Churches, in the Universities, in the Socialist party there is a growing minority of strong men who are strenuously working to undermine the Prussian military oligarchy. Those efforts have the ardent sympathies of all liberal-minded Britons of every creed and party. For the good relations between the two countries are intimately bound up with the disappearance of the Old Régime. For on the political emancipation of Germany depends, not only the future of Germany herself, but the future of European culture.

WHY THE TURK MUST GO

BY A MEMBER OF THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

THROUGHOUT the dark pages of Turkish history there is scarce a redeeming feature to favour toleration of the disturbing scourge of Moslem misgovernment in Europe.

The Turk is entirely unfitted, by his natural habits and by his religion, for the post of governor or administrator; he is a born soldier—and nothing more.

Turkish misrule is one long hideous chapter of atrocities perpetrated upon the Christian and subject races in the Turkish Empire; yet the Turk is inspired by the Koran, in Sura 47, which reads: "When ye meet those who misbelieve, then strike off heads until ye have massacred them. . . . And those who are slain in the cause of Allah, their work shall not go wrong." No small wonder then that, at once buoyed up and bound down by a religion voicing such barbaric sentiments as these, the Turk has vilely oppressed his invidious neighbours—Greeks, Bulgars, Serbs, Armenians, Druces, and Jews alike—but rather be it a source of surprise that he has not entirely exterminated these "faithless dogs" whom he is bidden to slay.

As a soldier the Turk has splendid stoical courage, making him absolutely fearless in assault and calm and resigned under attack or siege; yet this very stoicism is faulty in that it has bred in the merciless Turk a fiendish cruelty to captured and subjected peoples. Not his grand stoicism of the ancient Greek, who was trained to endure hardship and silently to suffer untold agonies of physical pain; but rather a sublime indifference to the results of his own efforts, whether for good or evil.

Mohammed taught: "Let the champions of the faith of Islam neither argue nor discuss, but slay all who refuse to obey the law or pay tribute. Whoever fights for Islam, whether he fall or conquer, will surely receive the reward. The sword is the key of Heaven." Inspired by this divine call to arms, the Turk can commit the most amazingly diabolical acts of wanton cruelty to defenceless foes, though he can also sit down calmly to smoke his eternal cigarette under a hail of bullets or ride madly at the enemy in the worst of all forlorn hopes, secure in the glorious certainty of the Koran's third Sura: "No soul dieth but by the permission of Allah, written down for the time appointed."

The faith of Islam, as defined by the Prophet Mohammed over thirteen hundred years ago, was a wise and necessary code for the nomadic peoples of the times, when a man's riches were numbered by his herds of cattle and his battalions of sons. Mohammed revealed the will of Allah as to the checking of the natural excesses rampant in those patriarchal times, and to the ordering of men's lives and the preservation of public health; but, unfortunately, these same revelations of the divine will contain no loophole for progress through the ages, and in consequence the Turk of the twentieth century is still governed in thought and deed by that code of the seventh century, which effectually bars all progress towards civilisation.

The Turk is, then, unfitted by his religion to have dominion over Christian people; but, worse even still, he is, by his religious resignation and submission to the will of Allah, who will doubtless provide all in his own good time, without effort on the part of the individual, unfitted to govern at all. Turkish diplomacy justly implies to the Western mind indecision, vacillation, and procrastination—in a word, hypocrisy.

The Turk is no longer to be tolerated in Europe. He is fierce, unreliable, worthless, uncivilised, fanatical, unfitted to govern either his own co-religionists or those unfortunate subject races who profess a faith compatible with modern civilisation. He is, by reason of his intolerance, a danger-signal to the whole of Christian Europe, and having justly roused the tardy ire of his powerful Christian neighbours, must now be banished from the shores of Europe to those of Asia.

For the sake of Christian peace, let those Christian provinces of Turkey be administered by Christian powers, and let the Turks be left to a half-dozen of vilayets in Asia—those of Broussa, Ismidt, Kastamonnia, Angora, Sivas, and Kopnia—there to live in disorder, unadministered to cherish their bloodthirsty, uncompromising spirit.

"What though the field be lost?

All is not lost; the unconquerable will
And study of revenge, immortal hate,
And courage never to submit or yield."

THE DECAY OF OUR NATION, AND IMPERIALIST POLICY * * BY H. MAYERS HYNDMAN

I.

WE have now a great "boom" in trade. Everybody is enjoying it. The prosperity in some departments, we are told, is quite unprecedented, and there is really no reason whatever to be dissatisfied with things as they are in this island. So long as exports and imports mount up so satisfactorily, and profits are being made on so prodigious a scale, it is absurd to argue that there can be anything seriously amiss with our industrial and commercial system. It is scarcely possible to take up a daily newspaper, or to read a political speech, without seeing a series of remarks of this kind. It is true that the very people who are thus jubilant to-day were pointing out yesterday that things were in a very bad way indeed here in Great Britain; that the rush of emigration from the most vigorous and capable ranks of our labouring class in town and country alike spoke of serious pressure in their homes; that the loss of such fine industrious folk could not but be injurious to the country; that the universal unrest which prevailed among the wage-earners told the same tale of hardship in another way; and that the hundreds of thousands of respectable unemployed, who were clamouring for the right to work, exhibited the difficulty of the situation more impressively still.

II.

But all that is now forgotten, as also are two most important facts: First, that the more marked the expansion of trade upon which our journalists of the capitalist press are congratulating us to-day, the more serious will be the corresponding depression that we shall suffer from within the next eighteen months or two years. Secondly, that, even now, when we are assured that trade was never so good, it is cautiously estimated that not fewer than 500,000 men, who are ready to do useful work, are without employment.

This by itself is a most dangerous state of things. The ups and downs of trade, and short work, short wages, and increasing unemployment for the workers, may not greatly affect the employing or profit-making class who can average their incomes; but for the nation as a whole these fluctuations are most prejudicial. And the ordinary drawbacks of our let-alone system are permanently damaging to us all the time.

III.

As a matter of fact, the effect of five generations of capitalism and the great factory industry, with its crowding of the people from the country into the towns, has been a continuous degeneration of the physique of large portions of our population, even at the best of times, as can be verified only too completely from the Blue Books and from the returns of the certifying surgeons. There are whole districts in London and our manufacturing towns in which it is quite the exception to meet a really vigorous, well-set-up man or woman of the working class. Nothing in my own personal experience has given me a greater shock than the poor pairs of shoulders which the majority even of our skilled mechanics possess. Where this inferior physique is put under conditions of bad housing, bad clothing, bad and ill-cooked food, and poor surroundings of every kind, still farther deterioration is inevitable. I have known Lancashire well for just fifty-four years, and I do not hesitate to say that the physical condition of the working people is worse than it was in 1858.

IV.

Now this is not a matter which can be put right by any amount of burden-shifting taxation, or by the operation of Labour Exchanges and a bureaucratic Insurance Act. Much more stringent measures are called for. The moment, however, any serious suggestion is made to deal with this problem of physical deterioration, even by palliatives such as good housing, co-operative employment of out-of-works, free maintenance of children, and their transfer from town to country schools, the cry of "revolution" is raised, and that, for conservative Old England, settles the question.

It is just thirty-two years since the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Poor was held, and more than twenty years since the Royal Commission on Labour sat. Practically nothing of any importance has been done from that time to this, as the result of both those investigations.

But there is a very powerful reason why even the governing minority of the United Kingdom cannot afford to neglect these important matters any longer. They are for the most part strong Imperialists. The idea of giving up the direct or indirect domination of the 300,000,000 of people in India is horrifying to them, to say nothing of the minor consideration of our retirement from Egypt. Say they, "We will not let the people go." But how are they going to keep them? That, I venture to predict, will shortly become a very pressing question; if, indeed, it is not so already.

V.

Take India alone. We conquered and reconquered India in the main with native troops. But for the help of the sepoys in the East India Company's service up to 1857, and of the Sikhs and Ghoorkas during the Mutiny, we could never have held India at all. We have at the present moment, in Hindustan, only 75,000 British soldiers, of whom I am putting it high to say that not more than 50,000 are at any given moment fit for active service. There are also no more than 200,000 Europeans and Eurasians in India all told. If now the Indians themselves become disaffected, the Indian troops could not be relied upon for three months, at a period of crisis, and we should find it also a very difficult matter indeed to move the European troops themselves through the agricultural districts from one portion of the Empire to the other. What sort of recruiting ground have we got to make good our losses of white troops under such conditions?

VI.

Men of to-day are apt to forget that, at the beginning of the last century, we were largely dependent upon Irishmen, Scotchmen, and Germans for the bold front we were able to show in the Peninsula, in Italy, and in the Low Countries. The population of Ireland has greatly decreased and is none too loyal; the Scotch Highlands have been denuded of their inhabitants; and we can rely no longer upon getting mercenaries from Germany. The fighting, therefore, nowadays will have to be done by British townspeople. Go and take a good look at the Territorials in camp, and ask yourself, if you know anything at all about war, how long these well-meaning volunteers would be able to keep to the front in a serious campaign? And they are not the weakest of our people by any means.

A VISIT TO ANATOLE FRANCE * * * BY MRS. JOHN LANE

I.

IN a quaint old room in that famous rambling series of mansions known as the Albany—once familiarly called the "Rope Walk"—which stands in the midst of London, and yet seems so far away that the turmoil of Piccadilly reaches it as a faint murmur of bees and locusts in the country of a summer day, there hangs a wonderful picture of Anatole France, by the well-known artist, Guth. He sits, his knees crossed, in a Roman chair enveloped in a grey dressing-gown, a small skull cap of vivid red, just the needed touch of colour at the back of his head, an eloquent hand upraised, a familiar gesture, while the strong, arresting face, with its brilliant dark eyes, the short pointed beard and the heavy mustache, take one back to the great men of mediæval France. The soul of Anatole France has left its imprint on that keenly thoughtful face which it has illuminated for some sixty-seven years. In those dark eyes one can read the love of beauty, the pity, the wit, the charm, the whimsicality, the profound and all-embracing knowledge, and the virile power which all combined have produced the genius of Anatole France. There he sits in this historic room, surrounded by the portraits of bygone men famous in English art and letters, full of the traditions of the past and the promise of the future. How thoroughly he looks at home in this room, lighted by one great leaded window, full of memories—for here, where during a part of the time that he wrote his History of England Macaulay lived, was discussed and planned the memorable enterprise of translating the writings of Anatole France, thus giving to English readers for the first time the opportunity of studying the works of the greatest modern author of France, if not of the world.

II.

The thanks of the English public are due to Mr. Frederic Chapman for initiating and so ably editing this remarkable series, and for selecting so brilliant a staff of translators to accomplish a work which the perfection and charm and lucidity of Anatole France's style rendered all the more difficult.

Among the translators who have so successfully accomplished their task are Mr. Alfred Allinson, Mr. Robert B. Douglas, Mr. A. W. Evans, Mrs. Farley, Lafcadio Hearn, Mrs. W. S. Jackson, Mr. J. Lewis May, Mr. C. E. Roche, and Miss M. P. Willcocks. And to Miss Winifred Stephens especial recognition is due for her masterly translation of that most difficult and erudite of historical works, his "Jeanne d'Arc," to which she has brought to bear not only her consummate knowledge of French, but her indefatigable and necessary research into the contemporaneous history of that time.

III.

From a sight of Anatole France on the walls of the old room in the Albany to seeing him in the Villa Saïd, his famous house in Paris, seemed only an unbroken continuity from that wonderful portrait. I was taken as an intermediary between an English publisher devoid of French and a great Frenchman devoid of English. To reach M. France, even on his Wednesdays, visitors have, even if unconsciously, to submit to a severe scrutiny from the other side of a "Judas" grating in the front door. The dragon who reconnoitres is either a kindly, plump housekeeper or her husband. Usually it is the lady who interpolates her plump body between the great man and the public. She is by belief a strict Calvinist from Geneva, and her only weakness is Geneva. An unfailing recommendation is: "J'écris pour le Journal de Genève." That she cannot resist, and it is sufficient to carry the wily suppliant to the very presence of the Master.

As we waited for the door to open I had an attack of nervous prostration on the doorsteps, for I suddenly remembered that I was about to confront the greatest master of style in the world, whercupon my French vocabulary immediately began to take flight, and by the time we were following the pleasant dragon upstairs it had quite departed. In a kind of haze I observed that the stair walls were covered with treasures collected by one with the keen eyes and the love of an inspired connoisseur: early German wood-blocks, old prints, old etchings, and specimens of mediæval metal work; but I only realised an acute stage fright when the dragon opened a door and we were ushered into the presence of the Master himself. He stood there, the same commanding personality as in his portrait, but this time in ordinary clothes, and not as I longed to see him, in the famous grey dressing-gown and the little red cap, but with an added charm, at which even the painter could but hint; the captivating wit, the genial courtesy, and that dignified presence, which he must have inherited from some ancestor of the time of Rabelais.

IV.

I was despairingly trying to collect my scattered French when Heaven came to my aid. The Master was not alone; he stood in the midst of a group of seven or eight young men—poets, novelists, journalists and artists, all of them—and just as he courteously gave me time to translate my companion's English, one separated from the group and introduced himself to us, and proved to be a distinguished contributor to the Mercure de France, who recalled to my companion that they had met in London.

I joyfully resigned all further efforts at translation, and so gave my companion the opportunity to explain to Anatole France the technical details of the plan for publishing the contemplated translations both in England and America, and at the same time it was a stimulus for him to realise M. France's interest and high appreciation of so important an undertaking.

To see Anatole France without even knowing who he is, is to realise that here is a great and vital personality. The charm of his language and gestures, the penetrating glance of his eyes, in the background of which is that touch of sadness which is the penalty fate demands of all to whom is given the gift of humour, once seen are never forgotten.

One cannot but realise the profound wisdom and knowledge he has gathered from bygone centuries, and that to him history, literature, and art have unfolded the secrets of past and passing generations.

V.

It shows, after all, the higher intellectual standard of the average Frenchman compared, for example, with the English-speaking nations, that their greatest writer, whose vast range of knowledge places him in the forefront of the most brilliantly learned men of his time, should also be one of the most popular writers of his day. Never does he descend to write down to what might be supposed to be the level of ordinary popular taste, but instead he lifts his readers to his own high plane. In what other country is there another popular writer whose works make such a high appeal, and what other country is there that has such a high intellectual record?

(Continued on page 430.)

ANATOLE FRANCE, NATUS 1844

The famous Wednesday morning receptions begin at about 10.30, and are usually held in the "salon," full of old carvings and precious mementos of Greek and Egyptian art—Tanagra figurines and other priceless sculptures in marble, ivory and wax. On other days of the week, M. France receives his more intimate friends in the "grenier," which has been converted into a writing-room, and the more privileged few who visit him on Sundays. At other times he leads the way to his bedroom, in which he unfolds a curious fastidiousness of taste in decoration—delicate ivory-white silk hangings and an ivory-white bed of a Directoire pattern. For it is his whim to surround himself with whatever is suggestive of the last work on which he is engaged. So the intricate glory of the Renaissance had to make way for the simplicity of the Directoire when he wrote "Les Dieux ont soif," the English translation of which, "The Gods are Athirst," is just about to appear. Here he also receives the elect—usually beginning with his barber, a super-barber he must be and a student of at least the surface of history, or how could he cut the Master's beard in such an historic fashion? If the tonsorial artist comes late, as he often does, that does not matter, for he not only performs his duties unabashed by the presence of the distinguished in art and literature, but he joins in the conversation, and if it is to his taste he has been known to stay the whole morning.

VI.

It may not be generally known that his pen-name—France—he took from a nickname by which his father was called in his own young days, during his military service, because of his absorption in the history of the France of the great Revolution. So Anatole Thibault became famous as Anatole France, and his father was always known as "le vieux France." Teaching was the first step in his career. He taught the classics, and it has indeed been told of him that he often became so engrossed in his subject that he entirely forgot his pupils. From that time on he began to write, prefaces, desultory articles, finally short stories, among the earliest being "Jocasta" and "Le Chat maigre," which led him to what is truly his first novel, and that was "Le Crime de Silvestre Bonnard," which has been so marvellously rendered into English by Lafcadio Hearn. Those who wish to know more of his early days I would refer to that beautiful work just published in English called "My Friend's Book," in which Anatole France has with exquisite touch wonderfully recaptured the days of his childhood.

As I was about to leave, M. France gave me two of his books as a remembrance, and added, with a twinkle in his eye, "I should like to write in them to my sister author, but there is no such expression in French; so I must write, 'To my brother author.'" So it stands. Then in parting he gallantly kissed my hand.

"I shall keep this glove for ever as a sacred remembrance," I said to my companion, for I was quite overcome by awe and reverence. But, alas! The very next time I tied up a bundle of gloves for the cleaners', and when they were irrevocably mixed, I remembered, with a thrill of horror, that amongst them was the sacred glove which the Master had kissed. Which one it was I could never again know!

It was a tragedy of a comic kind which, I always thought, would have appealed to the Master.

SILHOUETTES

From the gallery of memory, mutasopic and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

SHE entered the gate opening on the woods with a feeling of satisfaction. The air was fragrant with the breath of the pines, the sun yet lingered in the heavens. A sense of peace was upon the earth. There was room here to think. Problems that crowd upon the city dweller assumed a just proportion in the spacious leisure of the countryside. She looked round in somewhat condescending fashion, for all her admiration. There was a touch of self-consciousness in her regard of a bracken-covered sweep, and she appraised the colour value of a silver birch against the blue sky with a due sense of her artistic appreciation.

She walked briskly through the woods, past rabbits whisking their white tails over the sandy banks, stopping to gaze in admiration of a hen pheasant screaming in alarm at the disturbance of her brood. She covered a considerable distance, and realised of a sudden she had no notion of her whereabouts. The sun had dipped below the horizon, the short twilight of the October day fell softly on the land. The forest seemed charged with a curious activity, the trees possessed of an oppressive personality. It needed a conscious effort of will to go forward, yet she dare not stand still. She commenced to sing, and was unreasonably angry that her voice would only quaver.

The glow of physical effort had passed. She was conscious of the change in the atmosphere. The forest was no longer a yielding background for the play of her ideas. It was inimical, almost malevolent. The sense of an oncoming terror, swiftly, silently gathering force as it swept through the wood, kept her moving. She was ineffably humiliated; conscious that the slow-witted peasants of the countryside, for whose lethargic brains and slow-moving bodies she had so conspicuous a contempt, would gaze with moon-eyed wonder at the story of her panic.

A turn of the road brought her to the heart of the forest. Giant trees kept the secret of the woods, their branches upflung in an inviolable circle. The last glimmer of red had faded from the sky; night had fallen on the grey gloaming, swooping like a bird of prey upon the trees.

She dared not move; fear and the dread of fear closed in on her. The forest, charged with an active malignancy, watched and waited. The silence was more terrible than the cry of battle. The terror that walked in darkness brooded upon the forest, the beating of its wings stirred the tall pines, the giant oaks. . . .

And then the panic passed. The silence was broken; somewhere in the valley a cock crowed, a house-dog barked. A soft breeze stirred the tree-tops, the forest rustled its dead leaves.

She was back once more in the kindly world of dear familiar things, but the remembrance of fear went with her. She followed the road, treading softly, like a child that dreads to wake the ogre he has vanquished. A red light glimmered softly through the trees, leading her to a cottage. She glanced, half-fearful, through the window, then, with a little startled cry, rushed to the door. The woman of the clever brain and unimpeachable logic emerged from the land of ghosts and goblins to find herself, and contentment, at home.

MASTERPIECE OF THE WEEK

BALZAC'S "OLD GORIOT" BY J. MIDDLETON MURRY

(Editor of "Rhythm")

OF all Balzac's novels, "Old Goriot" is the one which has made an universal appeal and won universal acceptance as a masterpiece, which possesses more than any other the compelling force of a deep and intense humanity. There are certain human relations and emotions which are to the mind of the literary artist profounder, touching the core of reality more closely in the complex mass of everyday happenings which it is the novelist's task to penetrate. The love of a father for his children and the love of a man for a woman are without doubt near the summit of this hierarchy.

The theme of Balzac's novel is the tragedy of ideal affection, the gradual overwhelming of Old Goriot, the retired vermicelli merchant, by blind love for his two daughters, until he dies of a broken heart. Anastasie and Delphine, the daughters, have married into high Parisian society by virtue of Goriot's former wealth, which has since disappeared under their incessant and merciless demands. Goriot himself lives in ever-increasing poverty at a miserable Pension Vauquer, where he is the fellow-boarder of Eugène de Rastignac, a nobly born law student from the South; of Vautrin, a mysterious, almost superhuman figure (afterwards revealed as an arch-criminal); and of Victorine Taillefer, the unacknowledged daughter of a wealthy banker. The tragedy passes between these two remote worlds, linked together by Rastignac, who makes a nervous entry into society under the auspices of its leader, the Vicomtesse de Beauséant, and falls in love with Delphine; and by Old Goriot, who visits his daughters secretly to bring money and to have the happiness of seeing them.

As surely as Goneril and Regan murdered Lear, Anastasie and Delphine murdered Goriot; yet there is that in the very intensity of the unreal world in which they live which affords them some excuse. If "Society" has ever been an absorbing and irresistible power, it was so in the Grand Monde of Paris; and under its impulse in "Old Goriot" not only do the daughters drive their father to his death, but Rastignac, for all his inborn nobility, first makes cruel demands upon his poverty-stricken family in Angoulême, and then falls in with Vautrin's brutal plan and makes love to Victorine, while the father's only son is killed in a put-up duel; and finally it is under this impulse that Mme. de Beauséant's lover, for all his love, leaves his mistress to make her final exit from this strange world triumphant and alone.

A true tragedy is not a negative thing. Its essence is not, as one great thinker declared, "spiritual waste," but positive achievement. Old Goriot went to his death in misery, with no daughter by his side; but had he himself stood for something less lofty or less true to humanity there would have been no misery, no tragedy, and no masterpiece. A love so sure, so careless and impregnable as this is the ideal love made concrete, a potentiality of mankind realised in a retired cornchandler. This is the "canon of humanity," which is the supreme test of the truly great novel. The theme is taken up, again in the minor, in the story of Mme. de Beauséant, whose defeat and abandonment is her triumph; for the tragedy of love may be its completest realisation.

If Goriot and again Mme. de Beauséant are true to the unhesitating singleness of great love, Eugène de Rastignac is the very embodiment of the struggle that is the essence of a lesser affection. He becomes Delphine's lover because he is in love with love rather than with her; but this ripens into a passion for her person. He pities Goriot, watches over him during his illness, implores his daughter to visit him, and for the moment his pity triumphs over his love. He avows himself disillusioned, and cries that the crimes of society are mean: "Vautrin's are greater." At this moment he saw clearly, in spite of himself; but Rastignac and the power of passion are truly represented in the concluding lines of the book, where, after Goriot's mean funeral, he looks at the fashionable quarter of Paris. "He glanced over that humming bee-hive, seeming to draw a foretaste of its honey, and said magniloquently: 'Henceforth there shall be war between us.' And by way of throwing down the glove to Society, Rastignac went to dine with Delphine."

If "Old Goriot" is a masterpiece by conception, it is so in no less by execution; but there is at least one genuine and one presumed artistic problem to be faced. The first is, what is the artistic purpose of Vautrin? Vautrin is one of those phantasmagoric, titanic figures of whom Balzac gives us so many, who loom over his novels, bringing with them not so much personality as a strange atmosphere, which we can also catch in the pictures and etchings of Balzac's contemporaries, Doré and Meryon. It is difficult to see the artistic necessity for Vautrin, and it is probably useless to seek for it. This "fallen archangel, who is for war to the end," is out of proportion to the story; he is too big for the function he has to fulfil in it. If a criminal was needed at all, an ordinary clever criminal would have sufficed instead of this tremendous yet unreal personality. But once given an outlet, Balzac's fondness for the terrific was not to be denied. For him a criminal was a Satan released from Inferno; and Vautrin is the outcome of a failing common to his age, to Hugo and George Sand, that brought Balzac at times to the level of Monk Lewis or Eugène Sue.

Moreover, it is urged that Balzac made a mistake in representing Goriot as a fool whenever neither his trade abilities nor his love for his daughters were in question, and that to have represented him "as ruined in spite of his better judgment" would have been more tragic. There is no use for such niceties of criticism. Goriot is a supremely tragic figure, in virtue of the very fact that he has no "better judgment." His horizon is bounded by his love for his daughters; in sacrificing himself for them he cannot pause nor deliberate. Before the force of such an emotion he has no intellectual capacity; and did he possess it the novel would have lost the direct tragic intensity that it has. This is not the weak point of "Old Goriot."

The unsolved problem is Vautrin. Beyond him we have a perfect work of art, dealing with a great human issue worked out in living experience. That "Old Goriot" is after the manner of "Lear" is of no importance. Balzac paid his debt magnificently by a magnificent recreation, as indisputably and as plainly a masterwork as Shakespeare's tragedy.

LITERARY NOTES

I HAVE been trying to draw up a list of literary centenaries that will occur during 1913, but have only been able to discover two of outstanding interest and importance to English readers. In August will be commemorated the 300th anniversary of the birth of Jeremy Taylor, and in December the 200th anniversary of the birth of Laurence Sterne. Strange indeed is the conjunction of forces by which two such names are brought together! If one wishes to know how comprehensive an ecclesiastical organisation the English Church is, he has only got to remember that its clergy has included Jeremy Taylor, probably the most impressive and influential preacher of personal holiness who has ever occupied the Anglican pulpit, and Laurence Sterne, whose Rabelaisian humour found full vent in the immortal "Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy."

Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying" was to be found in every religious household a generation or two ago, but it is now read only by students of English literature. This devotional classic contains some of the finest examples of sacred eloquence in the English tongue. "Most eloquent of divines," Coleridge called its author, and with truth, for Milton alone surpasses Taylor in gorgeous rhetoric and sublimity of conception. Taylor's writings lie buried in a ten-volume edition published more than fifty years ago. No one wishes them resurrected in extenso, but some enterprising publisher might give us a volume of carefully chosen and representative passages. The famous Dr. Parr said that Englishmen revere Barrow, admire Hooker, but love Jeremy Taylor.

Heartily congratulations to the Nestor of British biologists, Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, who has just entered his ninety-first year. Though sixty-five years have elapsed since Dr. Wallace set out on that memorable scientific journey to the Amazons, his eye is not dim nor his natural force abated. I read the other day that this patriarch is enjoying the best of health, and is prosecuting his study of social problems (which interest him almost as much as scientific ones) with all the ardour of a student half his years. Indeed, we are to have a book from him shortly, entitled "Social Evolution and Moral Progress," which, its author has been confiding to an interviewer, "will make the bishops, the archdeacons, the parsons, and the curates sit up straight—very straight!"

Though Mr. Wilfrid Ward's recent biography sheds considerable light upon the earlier period of Newman's Catholic career, we shall gladly welcome more. It is, therefore, gratifying to learn that Messrs. Longmans will publish shortly two MS. volumes filled with memoranda of sermons and catechetical instructions delivered by the great Cardinal during the years 1847 to 1879. "Sermon Notes," as the book will be called, will exhibit Newman as he was soon after his secession to Rome.

It is announced that owing to the great mass of MS., Sir Charles Dilke's "Life" is not likely to appear for some years to come. I hope this does not mean that we are going to have an elaborate biography running, perhaps, into three volumes. Sir Charles Dilke was a most able politician and publicist, but his career can be quite adequately recounted within the limits of a moderate-sized volume. His books on European politics and the army question were valuable contributions, while his "Problems of Greater Britain" was epoch-making.

Mr. Thomas Seecombe has undertaken to write a monograph on George Meredith for Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's "Literary Lives" series. This is welcome news, for there is no one living better equipped for the task. Mr. Seecombe has already given us a foretaste of what we may expect in his brilliant article in the "Dictionary of National Biography." His list of authorities there covers nearly three-quarters of a page, and is convincing proof that what Mr. Seecombe does not know about Meredith bibliographically is not worth knowing. Mr. Seecombe has published much of the highest literary value during the last dozen years, but I should stake his reputation on "The Age of Johnson," the most masterly text-book survey of that period of our literary history in existence.

A new edition of Kinglake's "Eothen" has just been published by Messrs. Sampson, Low and Co. (12s. 6d. net). The brilliant introduction of Mr. S. L. Bensusan, and the striking designs of Frank Brangwyn, will give this reprint a unique place amongst the many editions of this classic of travel. Not many travel books will stand resuscitation after sixty-eight years, but "Eothen" is no ordinary travel book. One will look in vain for the kind of information served up by the conventional guide-book. "Eothen" is not so much an account of Eastern countries and peoples as a series of charming sketches of what impressed a traveller of marked individuality. I never think of this delightful work without recalling Kinglake's fascinating account of his interview on Mount Lebanon with William Pitt's eccentric niece, but most trusted confidant—Lady Hester Stanhope. "Eothen" won recognition slowly, but it will live when the historian of the Crimea is forgotten.

The "Canadian Boat-Song" controversy is always with us. When, I wonder, shall we reach a final conclusion with regard to the authorship of that remarkably fine poem? The controversy seems to me to be interminable, an opinion in which I am confirmed by a fresh discussion of the subject in a volume by Thomas Newbigging. Hitherto the claims of John Galt, the novelist, and Professor John Wilson ("Christopher North") have received most attention. The "Canadian Boat-Song" was printed in Blackwood in 1829 as "received from a friend in Canada." Now Galt was in the Dominion at that time, and was corresponding with the publishers of the magazine, two facts which would seem to establish a strong presumption in his favour. Unfortunately for those who espouse Galt's claims, it is quite unlike his other verse.

The supporters of Professor Wilson base their claim largely on the fact that it was printed in the "Noctes Ambrosianæ," and was imbued with the "Celtic spirit" which Wilson understood so well. Mr. Newbigging, on the other hand, revives the claim of Hugh, twelfth Earl of Eglinton. Though he argues his case with considerable ability, he is not convincing, and so the authorship of the "Canadian Boat-Song" still remains one of the unsolved problems of English literary history. Perhaps I ought to add that Sir John Skelton ("Shirley") re-wrote the poem in 1889, and that the oft-quoted line, "From the lone shieling of the misty island," differs from the original, which ran, "From the lone shieling on the distant island."

X. Y. Z.

THE GOOSEBERRY-FOOL

"Magnanimous Goldsmith, a Gooseberry-fool."—Retaliation

"WHAT, though I am obligated to dance a bear, a man may be a gentleman for all that," says Third Fellow in "She Stoops to Conquer." Goldsmith often danced a bear. To unfriendly eyes he cut a ridiculous figure—a little, fat Irishman, fond of finery, and avid of praise. So the Boswells and Hawkinses saw him. But the discerning, from Johnson and Burke to Mr. Austin Dobson, know him to be a "gentleman for all that," a man of genius with a heart of gold. It was easy, but not always safe, to laugh at Goldsmith. The village fiddler found that out once, at a party at which the little Oliver danced a hornpipe. The uncouth figure, capering in the middle of the floor, excited a burst of laughter, and the cry "Æsop!" But the retort was at hand:

Heralds! proclaim aloud! all saying,
See Æsop dancing and his Monkey playing.

One winter morning, a friend had to break into Goldsmith's bedroom at Trinity College and extricate him from the ticking of the bed, into which he had crept for warmth. The position, no doubt, was ridiculous, and Wilder, his tutor, had he known of it, would have raved with rage, and very probably have boxed his ears. The blankets had been given away to a poor woman. The incident is significant. Goldsmith had often to be rescued from situations that seemed both ridiculous and humiliating. When the facts were known, it was found that his goodness of heart had upset the conventions. There never was one who was less a man of the world than the author of "The Traveller" and "The Citizen of the World." He did not know the time of day, because his watch was so often in pawn to help someone needier than himself. If he shivered under the cold scorn of wisecracks, it was because he had given away his clothes. One of these had the grace at least to call him "an inspired idiot." "Dear and honoured memory of Goldsmith," cried Thackeray, "gentle, generous, merciful, full of love and pity." Burke could not keep back his tears when he heard of Goldsmith's death. Sir Joshua closed his studio. The staircase at Brick Court was crowded by humble mourners. "Let not his frailties be remembered," said Johnson; "he was a very great man."

Granted that Goldsmith loafed for two-thirds of his life. How heavy with toil the remaining third was! History, ancient and modern, philosophy, science and criticism, poetry, fiction and drama came from his pen. "Qui nullum fere scribendi genus non tetigit," wrote Johnson. There was almost nothing in the way of writing he did not attempt. He undertook work that only a syndicate of specialists would face to-day. Surely never was a writer of genius so hard put to it in Grub Street. To drudgery he gave up what was meant for the Muses. "The Natural History"—it was a work in eight volumes—"is about half-finished," he wrote to a friend. "God knows I'm tired of this kind of finishing, which is but bungling work; and that not so much my fault as the fault of my scurvy circumstances." The circumstances must indeed have been scurvy, for Goldsmith's soul loathed bungling work. There was a "kind of finishing" of which he never tired; but it was not the wearied, hurried finishing of hack work for the printer. Rather, it was the patient, loving revision of the work to which his genius called him. And the hours for this must have been comparatively few during the fifteen years of his literary life in London. As Goldsmith toiled through the wilderness of hack-work, he came to exquisite resting-places, where the shade and a spring of pure water enabled him to forget the burden and heat of the day. Such were Auburn and Wakefield. In these places of delight the true Goldsmith is discovered.

To the historian of literature, Goldsmith's position is full of interest. He can hardly be said even to stand on the threshold of the new time. He was but a pilgrim, with his face set in the right direction, when, at forty-five, "he died of a fever, exasperated by the fear of distress." What Carlyle said of Goldsmith the man may be applied to the writer. "Yet, on the whole, there is no evil in the 'gooseberry-fool'; but rather much good; of a finer if weaker sort than Johnson's; and all the more genuine because he himself could never become conscious of it,—though, unhappily, never cease attempting to become so." This good of the finer if weaker sort, of which Goldsmith could never become conscious, must be sought in certain qualities of his work that gave the promise, however faint, of a new day in literature. His tenderness, humour, and irony would have saved him from feeling himself in an alien world had he lived to work alongside of Burns, Blake, and Crabbe. As it was, he really belonged to the day of Pope—though to the last hours of that long day. The glare of noontide was over; the cool of the evening had come; one could look at the sun. Goldsmith walked in the mellow light. But his world is the spick-and-span, trim, abstract, eighteenth-century world. "When we had dined, to prevent the ladies leaving us, I generally ordered the table to be removed; and sometimes, with the music master's assistance, the girls would give us a very agreeable concert. Walking out, drinking tea, country dances, and forfeits shortened the rest of the day." "Sometimes, to give a variety to our amusements, the girls sang to the guitar; and while they thus formed a little concert, my wife and I would stroll down the sloping field, that was embellished with blue-bell and centaur, talk of our children with rapture, and enjoy the breeze that wafted both health and harmony." It is a charming world, represented with exquisite art. But one cannot but feel that there is something of colour-blindness in the painter. Both its joys and sorrows are anæmic. It is the world where literature is "polite letters," and love a highly agreeable sentiment. The famous vicar is a Job without the boils or the passion. God does not answer him out of the whirlwind. At the close of his trials, he "poured out his heart in gratitude to the Giver of joy as well as of sorrow, and then slept undisturbed till morning."

At the beginning of his life in London, Goldsmith wrote, with unwonted bitterness, to Griffiths, "illiterate, bookselling Griffiths," "I have friendships only with the dead." It was the cry of an unknown, lonely man. For Goldsmith faced London without a patron, and with no weapon save his magic pen. He was one of the noble band who descended on the city from a garret, and took it captive. The living were waiting to welcome a writer of Goldsmith's quality. Johnson soon found him out, and Burke; of the famous club that met at the Turk's Head he became a leading member. Nor does the bond that binds him to the living show signs of weakening. "It is not for me to speak ill of Pope or his great disciples, above all, when they possess pathos and naturalness like Goldsmith," wrote Sainte-Beuve. Criticism has given Goldsmith a secure place. He once made a "burlesque draft" on posterity. "Mr. Posterity. Sir,—Nine hundred and ninety-nine years after sight hereof, pay the bearer, or order, a thousand pounds' worth of praise, free from all deductions whatsoever." If men are still reading books in the year 2765, this draft will be honoured.

W. R. T.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK

Should Teachers Become Civil Servants?

It is a real advantage for any worker to feel sure of a good salary and a good pension, and if elementary school teachers could make sure of these things by becoming Civil Servants and the interests of education be equally well cared for, no one would wish to stand in their way. It is this last consideration that furnishes the chief reasons for not making the change. We cannot make it except at the cost of subordinating the interest of education to the interest of the teachers, and this is not a cost which we have any right to incur. We do not mean that this is the only argument against the merging of the teaching profession in the Civil Service. Another is to be found in the uncertainty that the teachers themselves would really be the gainers. The Government is not always a good paymaster.—Spectator.

Britain and the Opium Traffic

The opium trade is finished. That is the stupendous fact with which the Government of India and the Imperial Government are confronted. What are the alternatives? They are, say the merchants, two. Either the British Government must compel the Chinese Government to admit the stocks—for consumption by the Chinese people or destruction in Republican bonfires—or the Government of India must agree to buy back the whole twelve millions' worth. It is an unexampled situation, brought into being through the sinister disbelief of British and Indian authorities and shippers in the reality of the Chinese resolve to root out the national evil. For six years we have been provided with impressive evidence of Chinese sincerity—since the Shanghai Conference of 1909 we have known that the traffic was doomed—yet we have permitted the continued cultivation of the poppy in India and, to the immense benefit of the Indian revenues, the regular auction sales at unprecedented prices. In the eyes of the world to-day Britain has the appearance of threatening China with a compulsory plunge back into the horror and shame of the slavery from which she is striving with heroic efforts to emancipate herself.—Daily News and Leader.

Public Schools and Civic Training

I have long felt that far more attention ought to be given at public schools to what may be called civic training. Boys ought to be taught what is going on in foreign countries all over the world, to learn something of political and social ideals, the distribution of commerce, the aims of democracy, the organisation of justice, the methods of legislation. Instead of beginning their studies in the remote past, starting with the geography of the ancient world and the history of Greece and Rome, they ought to begin with the modern world and go backwards. The interest of the past really lies in the degree it has contributed to the problems of the present; and when I look back on my own schooldays I see how cloistered, how mediæval an atmosphere it all was. It is useless nowadays to say that classics provide the best training for the mind; a good educator can use any subject as the material for such training.—Mr. A. C. BENSON in Daily News and Leader.

The Future of the Cinematograph

I should say the day will come when . . . a cinematograph will be laid on in every home, as your gas or electricity is now laid on; that the world's stories will be brought to you in a pictorial and dramatic form, such as one has not yet dreamed of. Every child will be taught geography, natural history, and botany by screen pictures, rather than by books; actors and singers will be recorded for all times; the progress of any great engineering feat will be recorded accurately. In short, the future will be made of recorded facts.—Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER in Daily Telegraph.

The Problem of the Land

In spite of all that has been justly said about the desirability of peasant holdings, we are faced by the fact that at the present moment small holdings are not successful except under extremely favourable conditions. Partly there is the problem of capital. The capitalist farmer can stand a bad season; the peasant farmer as a rule cannot. If his crops fail he falls heavily into debt, and two or three bad years will probably complete his ruin. But as every experienced agriculturist knows, there is something more than this. The small holder, if he is to succeed, must himself be, under present English conditions, an exceptional man. He must have grit enough to face difficulties; he must have knowledge enough to be prepared to deal with them. In Denmark these qualities are widely diffused, owing largely to a liberal education. In England relatively few men of the labourer class possess them. For this reason any attempt to create small holdings on a wholesale scale must be deprecated.—Spectator.

A Pressing Rural Problem

The provision of more cottages is in many parts of the country the most pressing and also most difficult of problems. By long custom cottages, whether tied to the farms or not, are everywhere let at rents that will not pay a living interest on their cost, and the farmer takes it out by paying lower wages. If every landowner could be compelled to charge 4s. or 5s. a week for his cottages, and the farmers to raise their wages by a corresponding 2s. or 3s. a week, it would then be possible to build cottages as an ordinary business proposition; but any attempt on the part of an individual to raise rents and wages together only results in his men pocketing the higher rate and trying to live at a distance or to crowd in with someone else as lodgers. To build assisted cottages by means of loans or grants to the local authority would only perpetuate a vicious system and a false standard of wages which needlessly enhances the existing glammers of the town.—Times.

Mr. Bernard Shaw's "Paradoxical" Method

Every now and then we find Mr. Shaw spoken of as a "pioneer," and his magnetic influence in killing some venerable form of thought or emotion is trumpeted with screaming emphasis. It may reasonably be doubted if his writings have any revolutionary effect. The "paradoxical" method, by its very nature, is always cutting its own throat. If you do not mean what other people mean by religion and morality, we do not know whether you mean a compliment or a disparagement when you call Jones immoral or a church a "petulantly irreligious club." It is quite useless for Mr. Shaw to tell us that the English home is neither pure, nor holy, nor honourable, nor in any creditable sense distinctively English. We simply look up the Shavian vocabulary, and find that Shelley was "purer" than Arnold of Rugby, and Goethe "holier" and more virtuous than Bishop Butler or Mr. Gladstone. The invective at once cancels out into nothing, with the result that if Mr. Shaw has anything to teach, his vocabulary effectively prevents him from teaching it.—Spectator.

"A GENIUS AT HIS ZENITH."—ATHENÆUM.

THE WORKS OF Anatole France

(IN ENGLISH)

A COMPLETE SERIES IS BEING PREPARED UNDER THE EDITORSHIP OF FREDERIC CHAPMAN.

THE OPINIONS OF JEROME COIGNARD. A Translation by Mrs. WILFRID JACKSON. [Shortly]

ON LIFE AND LETTERS. A Translation by A. W. EVANS. Vols. 1, 2, 3 and 4. [Shortly]

THE GODS ARE ATHIRST. A Translation by ALFRED ALLINSON. [Shortly]

JOCASTA AND THE FAMISHED CAT. A Translation by Mrs. FARLEY.

THE ASPIRATIONS OF JEAN SERVIEN A Translation by ALFRED ALLINSON.

AT THE SIGN OF THE REINE PEDAUQUE. A Translation by Mrs. WILFRID JACKSON.

ON LIFE AND LETTERS. Vol. 1.

THE RED LILY. A Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS.

MOTHER OF PEARL. A Translation by THE EDITOR.

THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE BONNARD. A Translation by LAFCADIO HEARN.

THE GARDEN OF EPICURUS. A Translation by ALFRED ALLINSON.

THE WELL OF ST. CLARE. A Translation by ALFRED ALLINSON.

BALTHASAR. A Translation by Mrs. JOHN LANE.

THAIS. A Translation by ROBERT B. DOUGLAS.

THE WHITE STONE. A Translation by C. E. ROCHE.

PENGUIN ISLAND. A Translation by A. W. EVANS.

THE MERRY TALES OF JACQUES TOURNEBROCHE. A Translation by ALFRED ALLINSON.

THE ELM TREE ON THE MALL. A Translation by M. P. WILLCOCKS.

THE WICKER-WORK WOMAN. A Translation by M. P. WILLCOCKS.

Also THE LIFE OF JOAN OF ARC. A Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS. With 8 Illustrations and a Map. 2 vols., demy 8vo. 25/- net.

NOW READY.

MY FRIEND'S BOOK. A Translation by J. LEWIS MAY.

"Mr. John Lane is publishing what may rightly be described as an Edition de Luxe of the works of Anatole France, although in price it appears as an ordinary series of volumes."—Academy.

"A few years ago there were hardly half a dozen Anatolians on this side of the Channel. Now one meets them everywhere. The spread of the Anatolian cult is largely due to the missionary zeal of Mr. John Lane, who not only planned, but proceeded to carry out the daring project of publishing a complete English Edition of the works of Anatole France."—Mr. JAMES DOUGLAS in the Star.

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, Vigo Street, W.

THE TYPEWRITER FOR THE HOME AND THE TRAVELLER

A WEEK'S TRIAL FREE AT YOUR OWN HOME.

TRY to think of a bright, strong, and compact little machine weighing but 5 lbs., and you may be able to form an idea of the new and wonderful aluminium 'Blick' Typewriter, which is carried in its handsome leather case, with compartments for stationery by many when travelling and found in the boudoir or library of thousands of homes.

When one considers that the ordinary Typewriter weighs about 30 lbs., one marvels at the lightness, compactness, and durability of the 'Blick,' which, for clear, rapid, visible, and perfect writing, stands without a rival, even when classed with other typewriters that cost twice or thrice as much.

But the convenience of its portability is one of its strongest points. You can take the 'Blick' from room to room, house to house, or country to country, almost as easily as you would a book; and that is why authors, journalists, all who are engaged in literary pursuits, and many others have so readily adopted the 'Blick.' Then, in the boudoir or library it is always bright and ready for use, and is to many indispensable.

You can write on the 'Blick' in any language, including Hindustani, Hebrew, etc., and in any style or size of type, especially script type for social correspondence. Moreover, you can use any of the various types on the same machine, changing in an instant from one to the other.

The mastery of the 'Blick' can be accomplished in an hour. Only a little practice, and you will be able to write with the speed of an expert.

For a week's trial free at your home write to the address given below, and a new aluminium 'Blick' will be sent by return.

If you do not care to keep the machine after the free seven days' trial, you can return it, and you will be under no obligation whatever. The company undertakes to pay cost of carriage both ways to any part of the U.K., accepting all risk of damage in transit.

An illustrated booklet (No. 10) will be sent post free on application to the 'Blick' Co., Ltd., 9 & 10, Cheapside, London, E.C., or to the West-end Branch, 369, Oxford Street, London.

OUR LADY'S JUGGLER * * * BY ANATOLE FRANCE

I.

IN the days of King Louis there lived in France a poor juggler, a native of Compiègne, called Barnaby, who used to travel from town to town performing difficult feats of skill.

On fair days he would spread an old, threadbare carpet on the ground in the market-place, and, having caught the attention of the children and idlers by means of his old juggler's patter, which he never varied, he would strike an unnatural attitude, and balance a pewter plate on his nose.

At first the crowd would regard him with indifference. But when he stood on his hands, upside down, and threw into the air with his feet six copper balls, which glittered in the sunshine, and caught them again; or when he bent backwards until his head touched his heels, and made a perfect wheel of himself, and then juggled with twelve knives, a murmur of admiration would arise from the onlookers, and a shower of coins would fall on the carpet.

Nevertheless, like most people who live by their wits, Barnaby of Compiègne had sometimes much ado to live at all. Earning his bread by the sweat of his brow, he bore more than his fair share of the wretchedness which we inherit by reason of the sin of our forefather Adam.

Of course, he could not work as much or as often as he would have liked, because, in order to display his art, he needed daylight and warm sunshine, just as the trees need them to display to us their flowers and fruit.

In the winter time he was little better than a half-dead and leafless tree. The frozen ground was too hard for juggling on. And so, like the grasshopper Mary of France tells us about, he suffered cold and hunger during the winter time. But, being simple-hearted, he bore these sufferings patiently.

He had never reflected upon the origin of wealth, nor on the inequality of human lots. He felt sure that, even if this world is amiss, the next world would certainly be happy, and this hope upheld him. He was no imitator of those thievish and impious mountebanks who sell their souls to Satan. He never scoffed at the name of God, nor did he covet his neighbour's wife, although he had none of his own; for woman is the enemy of strong men, as one may read in the Bible about Samson.

In truth, his was not a carnal mind, and it was harder to him to go without his wine than to lack the friendship of women, for, though he was no tippler, he was fond of his glass in the hot weather. He was a good man, God-fearing, and most devoted to the Holy Virgin. He never failed, when he entered a church, to kneel before the image of the Mother of God and to offer up this prayer to her:—

"My Lady, watch over my life till it shall please God to take me, and, when I die, grant me the joys of heaven!"

II.

Now, on a certain evening, after a day of rain, as he was walking, sad and bent, carrying under his arm his balls and knives wrapped in the old carpet, and looking for some barn where he could go, supperless, to sleep, he met on the road a monk who was going the same way, and who greeted him kindly.

As they walked side by side they began to talk to one another.

"Friend," said the monk, "why are you dressed all in green? Are you going to act the jester in some play?"

"No, indeed, Father," answered Barnaby; "I am just Barnaby, a juggler—the best calling in the world, too, if only it gave one a meal every day."

"Friend Barnaby," said the monk, "mind what you say. There is no better calling than a monk's. We glorify God, and the Virgin, and the Saints; the life of a monk is a perpetual song to the Lord."

Barnaby answered, "Father, I own I spoke as a fool. Your calling cannot be compared to mine, and although there be merit in dancing while one balances a farthing on a stick from the tip of one's nose, yet that merit is not as yours. Would that I, my Father, like you, could sing the daily office, and especially that of the most Holy Virgin, to whom I have vowed especial adoration. I would willingly give up my own art, by which I am known in more than six hundred towns and villages, from Soissons to Beauvais, if I might only embrace the life of a monk."

The monk was touched by the simplicity of the juggler, and, as he did not lack discernment, he recognised in Barnaby one of those men of goodwill of whom our Lord said, "Peace on earth be unto them."

And so he replied: "Friend Barnaby, come with me and you shall be received into the monastery where I am Prior. He who led Mary of Egypt into the wilderness has sent me across your path that I may show you the way of salvation."

Thus Barnaby became a monk.

In the monastery where he was received the monks vied with each other in adoration of the Holy Virgin, and each of them gave to her service all the knowledge and all the skill which God had given him.

The Prior himself wrote books treating, after scholastic rules, of the virtues of the Mother of God.

Brother Maurice used to copy, with a learned hand, these treatises on parchment rolls.

Brother Alexander painted therein fine miniatures. Here one could see the Queen of Heaven seated on the throne of Solomon, at the foot of which four lions watched. Around her haloed head flew seven doves, which are the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit—the gifts of Fear and of Piety, of Knowledge, of Power, of Counsel, of Understanding, and of Wisdom. Her companions were six golden-haired virgins, and these were Humility, Prudence, Retirement, Respect, Virginity, and Obedience. At her feet were two little white, naked figures in an attitude of supplication. These were two souls pleading, and surely not in vain, for her all-powerful intercession for their salvation.

Brother Alexander, on another page, had pictured Eve and Mary opposite each other, so that one saw at the same time the Sin and the Redemption—the humbled woman and the exalted Virgin.

In this book, too, one could look with admiration on the Well of Living Water, the Fountain, the Lily, the Moon, the Sun, and the Garden enclosed, which is spoken of in the Song of Songs as the Gate of Heaven and the City of God; and these were the similitudes of the Virgin.

Brother Marbode also was one of the most loving children of Mary. He was always carving stone images, so that his beard, his eyebrows, and his hair were white with dust, and his eyes always swollen and tearful; but he was full of strength and gladness, for all his many years, and one could see that the Queen of Heaven watched over the old age of her child. As Marbode carved her she was seated in a chair, and a pearly halo encircled her head. And he was careful that the folds of the robe covered the feet of her of whom the prophet said: "My beloved is like a garden enclosed."

Sometimes, too, he would represent her with the features of a gracious child, and she seemed to be saying, "Lord, Thou art my Lord."

There were also in the monastery poets, who wrote in Latin sequences and hymns in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary; and there was even a Picard, who translated the Miracles of our Lady into the common tongue and in rhyme.

III.

In face of such a chorus of praises and such a harvest of work Barnaby bemoaned his ignorance and lack of skill.

"Alas!" he sighed, as he was walking alone in the little garden under the shade of the monastery. "It is pitiful that I am not able, like my brethren, to worthily praise the Holy Mother of God, to whom I have given all my heart. Alas! Alas! I am a rough and artless man, and I have nothing to offer for your service, my Lady Virgin: neither instructive sermons, nor learned treatises, nor beautiful pictures, nor graceful statues, nor musical verses. Alas! I have nothing!"

So he sighed and fell into a sadness. But one evening, when the monks were chatting together, he heard one of them tell of a pious man who could do nothing but repeat the Hail, Mary. He was despised for his ignorance; but when he died there blossomed from his mouth five roses, in honour of the five letters of the name of Mary, and thus his sanctity was manifest.

Hearing this story, Barnaby was once more filled with admiration at the goodness of the Virgin; but he was not comforted by the example of this happy death, for his heart was full of zeal, and he longed to serve in some way or other the glory of his Lady in Heaven. And he sought for this way in vain, and grew daily more distressed, when one morning, waking quite happily, he hastened to the chapel and stayed there for more than an hour. After dinner he went again. And, from this time forward, he used to go into the chapel daily, when no one else was there, and there he spent a great part of the time which the other monks dedicated to letters and handicraft. He was sad no longer, and no longer did he sigh.

Such odd behaviour awakened the curiosity of the monks. They asked one another why Barnaby made such frequent visits to the chapel. Then the Prior, whose duty it was to overlook nothing in the conduct of his monks, made up his mind to watch Barnaby during his solitary retirements.

So one day, whilst Barnaby had withdrawn to the chapel as was his wont, the Lord Prior, accompanied by two old monks, came to observe through the chinks of the door what was going on inside. They saw Barnaby before the altar of the Holy Virgin, upside down, with his feet in the air, juggling with six copper balls and twelve knives. He was performing in honour of the Holy Mother of God the feats which had earned him so much applause.

The two old monks, not understanding that this simple soul was in this fashion offering his skill and knowledge to the Holy Virgin, cried out at his impiety.

The Prior knew that Barnaby had an innocent heart, but he thought he must have lost his wits. They were all three hastening to remove him from the chapel when they saw the Holy Virgin step down from the altar and wipe away with the corner of her vestment the drops of sweat which were standing on her juggler's brow.

Then the Prior, prostrate on the altar stones, recited these words: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God!"

And the old monks kissed the ground and answered, "Amen."

—Translated by W. Willis.

THE TYRANNY OF FACTS*

DEAN WACE has collected in the volume under review a number of papers on religious and social subjects which originally came before the public in the pages of The Record. As the work of a high dignitary of the English Church, they, of course, command a respectful hearing, and they reinforce that claim by their simple yet scholarly manner of expression. When all this is admitted, however, we must confess that we do not find much to agree with in the substance of the essays themselves. They seem to us inspired by a spirit of reaction and by a quite unnecessary distrust for the developments of the critical mind, whether in politics or theology. The Dean opens with a series of essays on the much-vexed question of Biblical inspiration and authority. Now, no doubt to the devout soul there is something painful in the intrusion of science and history into the world of inherited beliefs and immemorial associations. On the other hand, we would remind such perturbed spirits that much of their suffering is the outcome of a misconception as to the claims both of the inspired writings and of their supposed opponents. The office of the Old and New Testaments is the conveyance, not of scientific or historic fact, but of religious truth, and their effectiveness in this office can be undermined by no attack from science or from history. From the criticism of science and of history, indeed, the spirituality of the Biblical documents only emerges the purer and the more readily discernible. The Dean is surely darkening counsel when he states that such criticism must result in our ceasing to "regard them as recording the actual Word of God, as admitting us directly into communion with Him, and placing us in contact with Him." By surrendering to history and science what is their own in these writings, their efficacy as channels of spiritual truth is no more impeded than is the poetic inspiration of Homer impugned by any theory of Homeric authorship. Just in so far as the Scriptures are claimed by their defenders as historic or scientific documents, the burden of defending their scientific or historic validity lies on such defenders' shoulders. The burden of demonstrating their unique value as instruments of religious truth is another matter, and here neither scientist nor historian has a case against a world-experience. Securus judicat orbis terrarum. The case is one for a wise acceptance of established progress in a spirit of confidence, not for reaction.

In his outlook upon social problems the Dean is not more helpful or encouraging. We agree with him in a regret for the days of industrial peace and mutual good-fellowship between employer and employed. We realise, at the same time, that our regret is vain. On the other hand, there are conditions in modern industrial life which demand of Christians, as of right-thinking men, a measure of righteous indignation.

* "Some Questions of the Day." By Henry Wace, D.D. 6s. (Nisbet and Co., Ltd.)

THE VALUE OF IDEAS.

IT does not require very extensive observation to discover that the men who succeed are those who have their business or profession "at their fingers' ends." They are never at a loss; they are alert, resourceful, and full of ideas—not vague, nebulous visions, but practicable ideas which they lose no time in carrying into effect.

Ability to originate ideas, and the equally, if not more important faculty of recognising the value of an idea and seeing how it may be turned to profitable account is not a gift, but simply and solely a matter of training.

At first sight it seems a contradiction to say that memory begets ideas, but reflection will show that every new idea is no more than the development of an old idea or the application of several ideas in a new combination.

Ideas are the fulcrum of individual success, and the motive power of all progress. To keep on in a fixed and unchanging routine is to revolve in a circle, which to the individual means stagnation—the cessation of growth and advancement.

MAKING NAILS BY HAND.

If a man attempted to make a living by manufacturing nails by hand, he would be laughed at as a fool, because a machine can make a hundred as fast as he can make one. Yet thousands of people act just as foolishly in other ways. They make no real effort to rise because they fail to appreciate the fact that they have in themselves an infinitely greater power and ability than their daily routine calls into play. Their seeming lethargy is not due to lack of desire, but to want of the knowledge of how to develop their latent powers.

The first step is not, as is popularly supposed, to plod industriously through learned and lengthy books. No, it is very little use to wade through books unless one can remember and classify in the brain for future reference the knowledge the books contain. Even without books a man of acute intelligence, keen powers of observation, and a good memory will make himself master of more knowledge in a few days than the bookworm will amass in as many months; and his knowledge will be of far greater practical value.

Mental alertness and keenness of observation depend upon the possession of a good memory, and a good memory can be easily and quickly acquired. This has been proved, and is being proved daily by tens of thousands of men and women in all walks of life.

A FREE MAGAZINE.

The whole subject of Mental Culture is dealt with in the new Magazine, "Brain Power." The system it advocates has been put into practice with extraordinarily successful results by men and women in all parts of the world. It is quite simple, logical, and thoroughly scientific. It develops to the full the natural memory—which modern systems of education tend rather to overtax than to assist—and ensures perfect mental balance and control, concentration, reasoning power, and self-confidence.

Of all the troubles which afflict humanity, mind-wandering is one of the most prevalent. It is a dead-weight handicap which holds men down and condemns them to subordinate and poorly paid positions. The only cure for mind-wandering is to train and strengthen the memory, and this is much easier than would be imagined, while the benefit is little short of marvellous, because every improvement, however slight, makes it easier to effect still further improvements. The benefit thus accrues in compound ratio.

As explained in "Brain Power," the training consists of a short series of interesting and fascinating exercises which can be performed in one's spare time, and even while at work without interfering with it; but, on the contrary, enabling one to do more work with less effort.

There is no space here to give even a general outline of the contents of this exceedingly interesting publication. Everyone who wants a better memory should read it for himself. The Pelman School offers to send a copy, post free, to any reader. It describes the famous Pelman System, and explains how the instruction is conducted entirely by post, thus enabling the pupil to derive the full benefit at very small expense.

To the Secretary,
Pelman School of the Mind,
52, Wenham House,
Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

Please send free copy of "Brain Power."

Name

Address

.....

BRANCHES:—India: 9, Churchgate Street, Bombay. Australia: 47, Queen Street, Melbourne. S. Africa: Club Arcade, Durban.

CORRESPONDENCE RUSKIN ON WAR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In EVERYMAN for January 3rd, in the course of an article entitled "Arbitration as a Substitute for War," it is asked: "How can the average man be imbued with peace sentiments when writers like Ruskin are found investing with the glow of genius the military profession?" In a pamphlet issued some time ago by the National Service League there occurs the passage: "The martial spirit, Ruskin assures us, is 'the foundation of all the high virtues and faculties of men.'" What Ruskin does say—it is in the lecture on war published in "The Crown of Wild Olive"—is not that the martial spirit, but war, is this foundation, but not war when it is a game played by idlers "with a multitude of human pawns," nor war for mere dominion, but only war for "the aggressive conquest of surrounding evil," and war "in which the natural instincts of self-defence are sanctified by the nobleness of the institutions, and purity of the households which they are appointed to defend." In an appendix to the lecture he says that war "causes an incalculable amount of avoidable human suffering, and that it ought to cease among Christian nations; and if, therefore, any of my boy-friends desire to become soldiers, I try my utmost to bring them into what I conceive to be a better mind. But, on the other hand, I know certainly that the most beautiful characters yet developed among men have been formed in war;—that all great nations have been warrior nations, and that the only kinds of peace which we are likely to get in the present age are ruinous alike to the intellect and the heart." As between unselfish war and selfish peace—the mere absence of war—Ruskin may not have been wrong in thinking better of the former; but as between selfish war and unselfish, nobly co-operative peace, neither he, nor anyone but a wild beast in human form, would hesitate for a moment. It is well that war will always be the possible outcome of self-seeking; it is a symptom of deep-seated disease in the body-politic; it is therefore useful, as all such symptoms are; and it would be lamentable if we could get rid of it without curing the disease of which it is a symptom. Ennoble peace and war will inevitably disappear. It is perhaps well that Everyman should know exactly what was the attitude towards war of such a man as Ruskin; and it is to this end that I write to you.—I am, sir, etc.,

Bramhall, Cheshire. J. ERNEST PHYTHIAN.

THE STRANGLING OF PERSIA.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The reviewer of Mr. Shuster's book, in EVERYMAN for December 20, seems to me to take up a position which accords neither with logic nor facts. In one sentence he gives the strength of the Triple Alliance as a valid reason why we may not join it, but must be hostile to its policy; in the rest the strength of Russia is the reason why we must not challenge her policy, however that policy may be opposed either to justice or to our own interests. I fear our foreign policy has been too often both defended and inspired by similar muddle-headed arguments.

I dispute the assertion that "the peace and balance of power of Europe is threatened by the Triple Alliance." We never found it so during all the years from the inception of the Triple Alliance till our ill-starred "entente" with Russia. There is only one Power which is a real and permanent menace to civilisation, and that is the "Empire of one hundred and seventy million people," which crushes out freedom alike with and beyond its borders. Germany and Austria, penned between Russia on the one side and France on the other, have need of all the help they can get from Italy to "preserve the balance of power," without our throwing our weight into the wrong scale. A true friendship between the German and English peoples is possible to-day, and would be the best guarantee for the world's peace and good government. A true friendship between England and the ruthless autocracy of Russia is an impossibility, and thank God for it! The existing diplomatic fellowship has already lowered the moral standard of our diplomacy quite sufficiently.

I will not for a moment admit that the British Government must remain "helpless in Persia, and will be compelled to acquiesce in a policy which the British people disapprove of." Never but once, for a few disgraceful years under the incompetent and dissolute Charles II., has England lain under such shameful compulsion since the Great Armada was swept from our shores. Why must we be Russia's accomplice and bondsman? Why dare we not hold up our heads before all the world to-day as of yore? If we are really so weak or so isolated that we can only bow to Russia's will, then surely it is time that we sought an ally against her, and to that end made friends with Germany speedily. I protest against the cowardly and un-English policy of recent years being longer forced by an anti-democratic Foreign Office on a nation which disapproves of it.—I am, sir, etc., J. FOWLER SHONE.
Forest Hill, S.E.

NAPOLEON AS A SOCIALIST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In the second part of the article by Charles Sarolea, on "Napoleon as a Socialist," there are two statements that seem to me wide of, if not contrary to, the truth. The first is, "The French peasant is conservative because he has something to conserve, as the Russian peasant is a rebel because he has everything to gain by insurrection." Alas! the Russian peasant is not a rebel, though it is the aim and object of the educated student class of that country to make him such, together with his industrial brother of the great cities.

A little further on the writer reiterates what seems to be a commonplace with some students of social questions, namely, "It is the proletariat that always have been most prolific; it is the miserable and unhappy that multiply at the expense of the strong." In refutation of this, I ask the following question, Is it or is it not a fact that the proletariat of all countries produce more wealth than afterwards returns to them in the shape of wages? And by reason of being prolific, do they not create the surplus population which the capitalist finds so useful in keeping wages at or near mere subsistence level? By "the strong" I presume the writer means (since he does not favour the aristocracy and the great landed proprietors) the selfish middle class, who groan louder and louder every day at what they are forced to pay in rates and taxes for the maintenance of (as they term them) the unfit and unworthy. The middle class, like a middle course, is a hateful compromise. The members of it are envious of those above them, and seek to find the reason of their mediocrity in the deadweight (!) of those beneath them.—I am, sir, etc.,

H. W. WILLIAMS.

CELEBRITIES AND SORE THROAT.

How they Cure and Prevent it.

Every reader of this paper who suffers from sore throat should write at once for a Free Supply of the sore throat remedy used by the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, M.P.; Lord Justice Buckley, and the Rev. C. Silvester Horne, M.P., as well as by celebrated singers like Madame Adelina Patti and Signor Caruso, and leading actors like Sir George Alexander and Mr. H. B. Irving.

Who could ask for more convincing and trustworthy witnesses? They are, moreover, particularly prone to catch the complaint, because they are often in hot, crowded places, where the germs which cause sore throat abound.

Wulfing's Formamint—the remedy which they and hundreds of their colleagues all rely upon—kills these germs in the mouth and throat. That is why it is prescribed by over 7,000 medical men for curing and preventing sore throat.

Send to-day for a Free Sample of this pleasant and harmless remedy.

WULFING'S Formamint THE GERM-KILLING THROAT TABLET

The Rev. C. Silvester Horne, M.P., writes: "I have found Formamint most useful and efficacious."

Signor Caruso, the world's greatest tenor, writes: "I have found Formamint very beneficial to the throat, and pleasant to the taste."

Sir George Alexander writes: "Formamint has been my constant companion during the past winter, and I have found it a dangerous enemy to the Influenza fiend."

Follow the example of these famous men. Return the coupon to-day. And afterwards, when you buy Formamint, remember to specify Wulfing's Formamint, because its great success has produced many worthless imitations. Genuine Formamint is sold by all Chemists, in bottles, price 1s. 11d.

FREE SAMPLE.

Messrs. A. Wulfing & Co., 12, Chenies Street, London, W.C.—Please send me a sample of Formamint.

Name

Address

£. 141.

FAME & FORTUNE IN JOURNALISM.

There are many big prizes for the free-lance journalist to-day, but he is up against a hard campaign unless he is properly trained and really knows his business.

Can journalism be taught? This may have been a matter of debate some years ago, but now the only answer is a decided affirmative. The majority of big newspaper proprietors and editors are strong believers in the value of a school for journalism. Journalism can be learnt as easily as any trade or profession—more easily, in fact, than most. There are two ways of acquiring knowledge; one is the tedious and usually disheartening school of experience, and the other by specialised training under the guidance of an expert who “knows the ropes.” Roger Ascham, the famous Elizabethan scholar and educationist, admirably expressed the point when he wrote: “By experience we find a short way by a long wandering. Learning teacheth more in one year than experience in twenty.”

Why Training is Necessary.

“In journalistic work the technicalities are so numerous and important that it would be hopeless for anyone to rely on native talent alone as a means of attaining success. There are difficulties to be surmounted, and they can only be surmounted by the man who has learned how to cope with them by virtue of experience or training.”

The question naturally arises—How is one to learn? Who undertakes to teach the literary craftsmanship which will enable us to “mount Olympus’ hill,” or, if not to gain undying fame, earn the more tangible—and none the less welcome—reward of golden guineas and varicoloured cheques which make life’s outlook so much rosier? The question is answered in the most practical fashion by the well-known institution, the Practical Correspondence College. The College was established to provide ambitious men and women with a specialised training in the profession they elect to enter, with the object of enabling them to reach a money-earning degree of proficiency in the shortest possible time—to show them the “short way” which others have discovered by “a long wandering.” The Journalism Course is under the very able direction of a teacher whose reputation as a successful author and journalist is sufficient guarantee of the efficient and practical nature of the instruction. The latter is not merely a series of cut-and-dried lessons, but is adapted to the individual aims and needs of the student, while at the same time giving an all-round training. The College has a fine record of success, and many of its students earn more than the amount of the fees before completing the course. And, further, the College guarantees tuition till proficient.

These are points which should encourage those who “fear to attempt.” A little booklet giving full particulars of the Course—which is conducted entirely by post—will be sent post free on application to the Secretary, The Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

LAND REFORM.

Opinions of Our Readers.

[The number of letters received with reference to our article on Land Reform in the issue of January 3 has been so large that we are only able to print a small selection, and these in an abbreviated form. This we much regret, more especially as many letters have been withheld simply on account of undue length. Correspondents will please bear in mind that the utmost brevity and clearness are essential. The discussion will be continued in next issue.—ED.]

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—We must get to business on this question, and first pass by those who do not get to business. We must pass by:—

(1) The professional epigrammatists (as Shaw and Chesterton) who give us snuff instead of flour, and fireworks for guiding stars.

(2) The politicians—people whose life is in trickiness and compromise, who combine (and stifle) interests in order to get financial support and votes, and whose blessings are therefore un blessings in disguise.

(3) The extant religious bodies, who are too deeply engaged financially with the world to be in a position to reform it, and who have become nowadays theatrical and theoretical.

(4) Collectivists, who propose to place land wholly in collective possession, and under control of bodies elected by universal suffrage, whereas Democracy is being discovered to be less intelligent and moral than many individuals taken singly, and to involve the negation of progress.

So long as the State survives as an institution—but considering its representatives I think its days are numbered—the State will always be able to tax for public purposes the private owner of land. But the State subsists on individualities, not on the mash of individualities. Anybody can prevent a horse from jibbing by slaying it. The problem is to organise these individualities, to discipline each from seeking, or wishing to seek, merely a private advantage. Oh that we had a Church to convert the rich from wasted lives of golf and game and kennel, or a State to deter them! But bad as things are, there are remedies equally bad. Kill private property in land, impose on the individual, including the wisest and best, the discipline of a talking senate, representing, as it is likely to do, a composite portrait, some moment’s phase of an election crowd, men caught at their worst, a lower will liable to brute lapses—and what will discipline the senate? Nothing but war and collapse.

Nor can we yet do without the senate either, and rush into Syndicalism. The State at present, despite the futility of politicians, is at least some safeguard for public order, and embodies the traditions of civil and religious liberty won for us by our ancestors. The State holds useful traditions, but is not fit to be the universal landlord.

To whom, then, are we to look?

This is a simple question, and it would hardly be asked in Denmark. There, by co-operative societies amongst themselves, the people have restored agriculture by a system of small holdings, scientifically organised together for productive and distributive purposes, without destruction of private property. And the State has rightly been dragged in at the rear of the popular movement to assist it.

This task of getting the common people into closer contact with the land under a system of private ownership—the only system likely to succeed and to meet the ends of righteousness—can be at once undertaken as soon as groups of people combine unofficially for the purpose. The ideal Church would do it—but we have altogether missed the true functions of a Church to-day, and the word has acquired peculiar and anomalous suggestions. But let societies be formed (such as some of us are now trying to form in North London) on a religious basis, selecting their members carefully. Let such societies introduce co-operative banking (people's banks), as they are known on the Continent, and by giving people control of their own capital, and the advantages of credit, enable them to acquire holdings here or in the overseas dominions. In this way the people can themselves solve the land problem and save themselves, body and soul. They don't want sanatoria. They want Saskatoon.

But so long as we are deluded with the idea that all-and-sundry can do it for us, without need for organisation, self-discipline, or religion, and by the simple process of cheering a tinsel phrase and putting a bit of paper in a tin box once in five years, so long shall we remain under the lash of our taskmasters the demagogues, who will give us fleshpots and betray us to wars, and take our money away in taxes and insurance levies, and only give it (partly) back to us when, having been deprived of its use as capital, we fall into destitution and sickness, and therefore are no longer able to use it as capital. And that is Egypt. And that is where we now are.—I am, sir, etc.;

Forest Gate, E.

EDWARD WILLMORE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Differences of opinion there are bound to be between land reformers, but at any rate it is a good sign that there is widespread dissatisfaction with the existing land system, and a growing feeling that land ought not to be private property. Even those who believe in private property in land are driven to condemn the present arrangement, under which the bulk of the land is held in large estates, and it must be admitted that if land is to continue to be regarded as private property, it is far better that there should be a large number of small owners than a small number of large owners.

Against the small ownership policy I would urge the following objections:—

(1) At the very best it leaves large numbers of men landless, for only a certain proportion could afford to buy land.

(2) While it would check them, it would not prevent the existence of large estates, with their attendant evils.

(3) The value of land, which ought to be public revenue devoted to public good, would still be private income devoted to personal ends.

(4) The community would have no more control over land than it now has, and there would be the same difficulty there now is in the carrying out of public improvements.

(5) The purchase of land involves the locking up of money which would be far better employed as working capital.

(6) The only real advantage of small ownerships, security of tenure, would be equally obtainable by tenants of public land.

The single taxer denounces private property in land, but he does not abolish it until he has succeeded in imposing a 20s. in the £ tax. I am convinced that this is an impossibility, and meanwhile we should have the freehold system in full force. He wants the land, but he wants it for nothing, regardless of the fact that hundreds of thousands of men have invested their money in buying land, and that the State has sanctioned and protected such investments.

DO YOU POSSESS AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA?

A Remarkable Offer.

FIRST PAYMENT 2/6 ONLY.

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vamberg, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Waits Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, L.L.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

The "Illustrated Chambers's" (Latest Edition) is a treasury of compact information and a reliable guide on subjects Literary, Political, Historical, Theological, Scientific, Musical, Artistic, Philosophical, and General. It is international in character. It consists of Ten Handsome Half-Leather Volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced, and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

Let the Children use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

Two Opinions.

LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON writes—

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

HILAIRE BELLOC, Esq., writes—

"Chambers's Encyclopædia has been my principal book of reference for the last fifteen years. I have found it much the most accurate of such works, more trustworthy than others, and more comprehensive. . . . I have never found it to fail."

A FREE BOOK.

TO THE CAXTON PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, Post Free, and without any obligation on my part, Illustrated Booklet describing "The Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia," and full particulars of your offer to deliver the complete work for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

NAME

(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS

.....

I venture to predict that any attempt to penalise a man simply because he has bought land is foredoomed to ignominious failure.

The land nationaliser proposes that a national Land Commission and local authorities should be empowered to acquire land, and should pay fair compensation. This we believe to be just, and as it can be carried out gradually it is practical politics. I must not take up more of your valuable space now, but perhaps you will kindly permit me to go further into details in a later issue.

With best thanks to you for throwing your columns open for the discussion of all aspects of the land question, I am, sir, etc.,

JOSEPH HYDER, Secretary.

Land Nationalisation Society,
96, Victoria Street, S.W.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In making the interesting announcement that you will throw open your pages for a full discussion of land reform, you refer to five possible solutions of the problem, two of them being the Taxation of Land Values and the Single Tax. As a matter of fact, these are not two different solutions, but the one is a partial application of the other. Perhaps it will simplify the discussion if you will allow me to give the following brief definitions:

The Single Tax means the nationalisation of rent (rent of land) and the end of private ownership of land. Single Taxers, however, do not propose to put the Single Tax in operation at once. They recognise that their ideal can only be reached by gradually transferring rates and taxes from labour values to land values.

Taxing and Rating Land Values means putting all the rates and some taxes on land values, i.e., on the "unimproved value" of all land, apart from the value of whatever has been put in or on the land by human labour. It means that when the valuation of land (now proceeding) has been completed, that valuation should be used as a new basis for assessment. The Land Group in Parliament, consisting of about 180 members, have urged the Government to give all rating authorities power to levy rates on that new basis (site value), and also to impose a Budget Tax on the value of all land for the purposes of Education, Poor Relief, Main Roads, Asylums, and Police, and in substitution of the taxes on tea, sugar, cocoa, and other articles of food. This is the practical policy of all land-values taxers to-day.

The effects of such a policy may be summarised as follows: In towns, if rates were levied on the true value of every site (annual value based upon its capital value), whether those sites were used well, used badly, or not used at all, a very great many acres of land that now escape taxation would have to contribute a fair share towards local expenditure. That would bring great relief to over-burdened rate-payers, who would also gain by the transference of the cost of the services alluded to in the Memorial from the local to the national exchequer. With land made available and cheap by taxation, and houses rate-free, the building trades would be greatly stimulated, employment would be more abundant, and the supply of houses would be increased. In country districts, if all the local revenue were raised from land values, and cottages, farm buildings, and other improvements were relieved from rates, industry and enterprise would be encouraged, and the withholding of land from use would be discouraged.—I am, sir, etc.,

Manchester.

ARTHUR H. WELLER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your article, "Everyman's' Referendum on Land Reform," you ask, "How is it, if the Conservative party seem to be in favour of small holdings, they can also be in favour of big estates?" The two are not necessarily inconsistent, as big estates and small holdings may, and often do, exist side by side. I think, however, that your assumption, that the Conservative party, as a whole, favour the creation, or even the retention, of large estates, is not justified. The mere fact that a certain number of persons, owning large estates, many of whom, however, would be glad to sell them, if they could, are members of the Conservative party, is surely an insufficient reason for your accusation. Is it not rather the extreme Radicals and the land taxers who are opposed to the breaking-up of large estates, and the creation of a Peasant Proprietorship, or system of small occupying owners? If this was once carried out effectively, it would deal a mortal blow to all confiscatory schemes of land taxation. If land was the monopoly of a few, it would be much easier to tax the wicked land-owner out of existence, than if it was the inheritance of the many. Hence, no doubt, the rooted objection of the Radical party to the creation of small ownership holdings.—I am, sir, etc.,

X. Y. Z.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In view of the proposed discussion on Land Reform in your most interesting paper, may I say that the statement made in the second sentence of your article, viz., that the Land Question is at the root of every social problem, is a very sweeping one, and one that is not accepted by a large number of people. It is a statement which is easy to make, and one which represents a popular view, but which is more difficult to prove; and before any useful discussion can take place it is desirable, and indeed necessary, that it should be clearly and logically demonstrated in what way the Land Question affects the problems you name. The very term "Land Question" is one that needs clear definition.

Take the housing of the poor. Leaving out of account the question of whether it is desirable to interfere with economic laws to cater for a class which the whole tendency of modern social work and legislation is to abolish, it is a well-known fact amongst practical men that the main difficulty in the way of providing cheap houses is not the cost of the land, but the cost of the building. And with the present high price of building materials and increased wages of workmen this difficulty is increasing.

Then, as regards congestion in our cities, is it not a fact that in most cases the congested areas are districts which were built upon many years ago, and that with the great development in the means of locomotion which has taken place during the past twenty years, the creation of congested areas has almost ceased? Whatever the land system, when men had to live within easy walking distance of their work congestion was inevitable.

But it is with respect to the so-called "desolation" of our countryside that I think the greatest misapprehension exists. I defy anyone to prove that there are any large areas in this country which can with any approach to fairness or accuracy be called desolate. I recently had the pleasure of travelling leisurely by road from this town to your city, and I saw nothing but fertile and well cultivated land the whole of the way.

With regard to small holdings, the life of a small-

(Continued on page 444.)

ART TREASURES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

A New Series in Monthly Parts.

PREFATORY NOTE.

THIS Series aims at making lovers of truly great Art familiar with the Art Treasures of Great Britain, in the public Museums and in private Galleries. In so far as it includes not only pictures, but also the masterpieces of sculpture, drawing, pottery, metal work, ivories and Oriental Art in England, Scotland and Ireland, it is the first publication of its kind to appear in this, and perhaps any, country. Without this comprehensive range, no series of "Art Treasures" could be true to its title. Moreover, no publication that included only the work of the past could be regarded as seriously indicative of the extent of the treasures in our country. Furthermore, it is intended, to some extent at least, that this publication shall make known such treasures as are particularly the property of Great Britain; the productions of British Artists that are only seen in this country.

Numerous publications have made popular many of the famous pictures in the National Gallery, so that this series feels excused from republishing masterpieces familiar to all. On the other hand, it is with the less known, but certainly no less wonderful examples, that we are concerned.

In selecting works that are high above the influence of fashion and of mere popular or sentimental appeal, this "Art Treasures" series is sure of permanent value. As the only publication that gives an adequate idea of Great Britain's wealth in the various branches of Art, it answers a need that has been widely felt.

A Prospectus giving the details of the various subjects comprising the First Six Parts will be gladly sent on receipt of a postcard.

READERS OF NEXT WEEK'S "EVERYMAN" will be presented with a Reduced Specimen of a fine Photogravure of a Van Dyck Masterpiece in the

WINDSOR COLLECTION.

J. M. DENT & SONS, 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

holder is very different from what is popularly imagined. It is one of ceaseless toil and drudgery. He and his family must work early and late to make ends meet. He cannot afford labour-saving implements of cultivation. As a matter of fact, the small holding is an uneconomic and wasteful method of cultivating land, when it is desired to produce the crops we in this country depend on.

In conclusion, may I refer briefly to a statement made in the letter of your correspondent, E. F. MacClafferty, in EVERYMAN for Jan. 3rd? He says the rent which comes from the land is the property of the community, and should be divided up amongst the community. In making this somewhat crude assertion, he seems not to be aware that the rent of land is in many cases little or no more than interest upon the money that has been spent in clearing and enclosing the land and bringing it to a state of cultivation. The late Sir Tatton Sykes spent huge sums in enclosing the hitherto considered barren and almost valueless Yorkshire wolds, building homesteads and demonstrating that they could be profitably cultivated. If you assert that the community now has a right to the rent, you must equally claim that the community has a right to all interest on capital, whatever form that capital may take.—I am, sir, etc.,

W. E. SMITH.

Scarborough.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your proposed study of Land Reform will be excellent, provided it is carried out by persons with real knowledge. Therefore I propose that you ask everyone who writes you on this subject to state what personal experience he has had of getting a living out of land. I think the primary question to be considered is: Whether is it better for the nation that the greatest quantity of food should be produced at the lowest cost, or that the largest number of people should make a living out of the land, irrespective of the quantity of food produced or the cost of it?—I am, sir, etc.,

JOHN W. NEWALL.

Montgomeryshire, Jan. 3rd, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—A prominent Labour M.P. has suggested that the land should be purchased by the community at its present value. All further increment value would then go to the community, but such purchase would entail giving the dispossessed landowners and their descendants, for an indefinite period of time, a fixed toll upon the national labour, for which they would render no "equivalent service." This suggestion, therefore, will not stand the test of principle. The landowners can show no moral right to exact toll or even to retain possession of the land. This lack of moral right applies with equal force to all the "means of production."

Most probably it will be found advisable (if not absolutely necessary) to nationalise all the "means of production"—including land—at one and the same time, hence I suggest the following legislative action: (1) The possession and control of the "means of production" to be transferred from the legal owners thereof to the community. (2) The transfer not to release the transferrers from the civic duty of rendering "equivalent service." (3) The transfer consideration to be subject to the dictum, "No man should be allowed to possess more than he could reasonably enjoy."—I am, sir, etc.,

ARTHUR T. PHYTHIAN.

Lytham.

THE TEMPLE ON THE HILL*

LIFE in Transylvania, if we are to trust the impression produced on us by Mme. de Szász's powerful story, must not infrequently lead to the delusions of claustrophobia. The same is true of many novels dealing with Slavonic or semi-Slavonic countries. The horrors of the interior, its cruelties and its injustices, drive many men and women, in this story and others, to the wilderness and the fastnesses of the rocks, especially in the fairer seasons of the year,

"When talk is safer than in winter-time."

Winter and the society of the hearth are to be dreaded.

No character in this book is safe from the terror that lies at the heart of human society. The priest of the village, who is, in a manner, the hero of the story, discovers at the very beginning of his career that he is incapable of all the gentler emotions—love, pity, and sympathy. A strange fancy takes their place; he will build a church that shall be the exact reproduction of a Bramante church, seen long ago in Rome, and loved by him with a love that is more than personal. Money fails; no more money can be raised by the penance of his flock; his mind leaves him. One creature alone cares for him and sympathises with him—a peasant woman, who replies to a critic: "Why, a child could see that this hardness is nought but tenderness born deaf and blind."

The other principal male character of the book, a boy, the undeservedly disowned son of a rich father, murders a man, and is set by the mad papa to save his soul by building the church. His tragedy, and the tragedy of the girl he loves, who is forced into a marriage with his elderly father, are, with the papa, the chief elements of the story. But the incidental characters have their horrors and tragedies, as well, with nothing to redeem them but the weary revellings of holidays or weddings.

FOLK-TALES OF BREFFNY†

BREFFNY is a corner of Ireland, consisting of the counties of Cavan and Leitrim. Here the authoress of the present volume—for we understand her preface to concern herself—hung in childhood on the lips of a romantic stone-breaker, "who said he had more and better learning nor the scholars." The stories told by him, and by others like him, belong to the oldest tradition, and to a tradition that is in grave danger of being completely lost. They are told, or retold, in a simple but captivating idiom that seems to scorn the limitations of paper and printer's ink, and to call imperiously for the human voice as its proper vehicle. They deal mainly with the misdoings of the "good people," who gained their distinguishing epithet, as we should judge, by much the same process as the Eumenides of the Greek stories. As a rule, they mean nothing but ill by the human race; occasionally, as in the story of the "King's Daughter of France," they apparently mean some good, but they quickly return to their evil ways when their conditions are not observed.

The stories are nearly all of miniature dimensions, but they explore the whole range of human sentiment. Most of them are eerie, some of them have morals, but they are all permeated with humour and with the good peasant creed that the man of the tillage and the pasture is more distinctively a man than the emis-

(Continued on page 446.)

* "The Temple on the Hill: A Tale of Transylvania." By Elsa de Szász. 3s. 6d. net. (Sidgwick and Jackson.)

† "Folk Tales of Breffny." By B. Hunt. 3s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

Are you furnishing an Office?

If you are opening up new offices or refurnishing your present one, call at any of our Showrooms mentioned below, or send for our Catalogue No. 72 O.F.

Globe-Wernicke Office Furniture

Desks (over 50 Styles), Vertical Filing Cabinets, Card Index Cabinets, Tables, Chairs, "Elastic" Bookcases, etc., everything high grade and designed to give the greatest efficiency with due regard to the economical use of space.

Style No. 1633.

Packing Free—Orders of £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.; 82, Victoria Street, S.W.; 98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

It is always difficult, even at the best circulating libraries, to get a recently published work promptly on publication

The Times Book Club's New Special Service ensures the early delivery of any new book in circulation in the Library.

Country subscribers are not required to return their books until a fresh supply arrives, and are thus never without books.

The Times Book Club is thus offering

A UNIQUE LIBRARY SERVICE

Full particulars, rates of subscription, etc., will be sent on receipt of post-card mentioning Everyman.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB CIRCULATING LIBRARY

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

"THE PATH" INSTITUTE.

LECTURES and CLASSES.

To promote systematic study of Comparative Religion, Philosophy, Science and Art, and to assist in the application of the results of such study to life.

Spring Term opens Monday, January 27.

Classes on Christian Mystery-Teachings, Bergson's "Creative Evolution," Social and Political Re-Construction, Science, The Value of Art in Education, etc.

Syllabus on application to the Hon. Sec., at Oakley House, Bloomsbury Street, W.C.

GREAT ANNUAL BOOK SALE

For the month of January only

On all Orders of 10/- and upwards
A SPECIAL 10% DISCOUNT FROM REDUCED CATALOGUE PRICES

ASK FOR CATALOGUES

W. H. SMITH & SON'S LIBRARY

186, STRAND, W.C., & BRANCHES

The Bookbuyer's Opportunity

The UNDERWOOD

HAS A REPUTATION BUILT UP ON SHEER MERIT.

'The Machine you will eventually buy.'

WRITE FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND TYPISTS' GUIDE.

SENT POST FREE ANYWHERE.

Underwood Typewriter Co.

120, Queen Victoria Street,

LONDON, E.C.

Phone: 2902 LONDON WALL.

sary of modern commerce or the lord of lands and cities. Both these last two characteristics are well illustrated in the tale of the "Little Settlement," where a proud father, who has rejected all the suitors to his daughter's hand, is near to having to accept the devil for a son-in-law. Here are some of the suitors: "There were strong farmers, small farmers, trademen and dealers; a cow doctor, a blacksmith, and even a man that travelled in tea. Himself was disgusted with all; he put out the farmers and dealers very civil and stiff, but the tea man he stoned down the road for a couple of miles."

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MR. SHEEHAN has attempted a difficult task. He has attempted to combine fiction with revivalism. His study of Professor Garth is clever and arresting. He builds up the character carefully, and we feel an interest in the man which overcomes a prejudice against the insistence on his propaganda. The book (THE PROPHET, T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.) treats of miracles and faith-healing; but, and this should be noted to the credit of the author, the Professor combines spiritual salvation with the raising of wages, and demonstrates the truth, too often forgotten, that clear spiritual vision is largely dependent on a sufficiency of food and decent conditions of life generally. In the ultimate the Prophet is killed in the course of his ministry. The conclusion is dramatic. The style throughout the book is simple and arresting. We shall look forward with interest to Mr. Sheehan's future work.

THE ENGLISH FAIRY BOOK (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.) includes all the well-known and well-loved figures in nursery lore. Mr. Ernest Rhys has kept the flavour of the stories, while phrasing them after his own inimitable style. "Robin Goodfellow" is told in a delightful fashion. A series of pictures rise before one. Robin and his pranks are very real; not a child but will recognise him, not a child but will recognise the real, right ring in his song of the Chimney Sweeper:

"Black I am from head to foot,
And all doth come by chimney soot;
Then, Maidens, come and cherish him
That make your chimnies neat and trim."

The author has not left out the Giant Killer, beloved of all small fry. Nowadays it is the fashion to give our fairy stories new guises, leaving out the old adventurous strain. We are treated to good fairies ad nauseam; writers seem to have forgotten that the all-important fact to children is to send a thrill of terror creeping through the blood, accompanied with a feeling that in the ultimate all will come right. The story of THOMAS HICKATHRIFT, "A poor labouring man, but so strong that he was able to do in one day the ordinary work of two," gives us not only adventure, but rhetoric, the rhetoric that children love. "Now in the course of time, Tom was thoroughly tired of going such a roundabout way. 'The King's Highway ought not to be twisting and turning, like a worm,' he used to say, 'it should go straight through here.' Without telling his plans to anyone, he resolved to pass through the Giant's domain, or lose his life in the attempt. . . . He accordingly drove his cart in the forbidden direction, flinging the gates wide open, as if for the purpose of making his daring more plain to be seen." This is the perfection of story-telling. We can see the giant coming out of his castle. We can hear the growl in his voice. "'Sirrah,' said the monster, 'who gave you permission to come this way? Do you not know how I make all stand in fear of me? and you, like an impudent rogue, must come and fling my gates open at your pleasure! . . . but I will make you an example for all rogues under the sun! Dost thou not see how many thousand heads hang upon yonder tree—heads of those who have offended against my laws? But thy head shall hang higher than all the rest for an example!'" A splendid fight follows, and the story concludes on the right note. "Tom having beaten the giant, cut off his head and entered the cave, which he found completely filled with gold and silver." There is an opulence in the description which no amount of detailed magnificence could equal. Imagination finds satisfaction in the ever-flowing streams of gold and silver. We cannot resist quoting from "Tom Thumb." The extract seems to us to strike the exact medium between fantasy and matter of fact that is the key to the child's mind:—

"The Fairy Queen, wishing to see the little fellow thus born into the world, came in at the window, kissed the child, and gave it the name of Tom Thumb. She sent for some of the fairies, who dressed her little favourite in this way:—

"An oakleaf hat he had for his crown;
His shirt of web by spiders spun;
With jacket wove of thistle's down;
His trousers were of feathers done;
His stockings, of apple rind, they tie
With eye-lash from his mother's eye;
His shoes were made of mouse's skin,
Tanned with the downy hair within."

Miss Stacpoole Kenney has published a volume (OUR OWN COUNTRY, James Duffy and Co., Dublin, 2s.). The book does not strike us as being Irish in sentiment or style. The characters spend most of the time in giving long-winded explanations of what happened to friends and relations outside the story. The plot is thin, and the characterisation is not convincing. "She bathed her eyes with eau de cologne, and, taking a big bunch of violets from a silver vase in front of a photo of an officer in uniform, fastened it at her throat; then, with a quick, impulsive movement, she stooped and kissed the photo." We are rather tired of the officer in uniform, also the violets and the silver frame.

That "the green country meadows are fresh and fair to see" we all admit; but there is an aspect of rural life, for those of us who are poor and have to work for our living, that leaves the dwellers in the town, even the slum people, untouched. This aspect Mr. F. E. Green describes in vivid and convincing fashion in THE TYRANNY OF THE COUNTRY SIDE (Fisher Unwin, 5s. net). The landlord and the squire are emphatically the tyrants of the village. It is not only in the matter of rent or of wages that the oppression is exercised; but if the tenant or laborer should not share the political tenets of the particular great man who lets him his house, or employs him on the land, the unfortunate peasant has to march. Not only in politics, but in matters of religion or social customs, this supervision is exercised.

If the landlord is a teetotaler, the wretched labourer at his peril takes a glass of beer; he is liable to be told to quit his cottage at a moment's notice. This statement of the case may appear exaggerated, but to anyone who has lived for some length of time in the rural districts of England, Mr. Green's indictment is overwhelmingly true. So ingrained is the feeling

(Continued on page 448.)

the GEM Turkish Bath CABINET

My Health Secret.

DON'T waste money on drugs. You may spend pounds that way without getting more than temporary relief. Sufferers from rheumatism, sciatica, gout, neuralgia, and other nerve troubles testify that a safe, sure, and pleasant remedy is a course of Turkish Baths, taken in the privacy of home. Ill-health is caused by a poisoned blood stream—the pores of the skin being inactive and clogging the system with waste matter. The "Gem" Turkish Bath, by inducing free perspiration, helps Nature to do her work. The effect is almost magical. Don't doubt—try it at once. A "Gem" Turkish Bath costs 25/-, and if you aren't satisfied with the result you can return the Bath within ten days of purchase and get your money back. Cheques and P.O.'s should be made payable to:

THE GEM SUPPLIES CO., LTD.,
(Dept. S), 67, Southwark Street,
London, S.E.

LITERARY COMPOSITION. By the Rev. J. EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. (Cantab.). Third Edition. Contains Rules on Construction and the Choice of Words, the Employment of Figurative Language, Logical Analysis, Essay Writing, with specific directions how to make a piece of Composition animated and interesting—the interest growing to the end of the theme. The methods recommended are not to be found in any other work on Composition.

Price 2s. 6d. per copy, post free, from
J. F. SPRIGGS, 21, Paternoster Square, London, E.C. Circulars free.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof, complete outfit, foolscap size. Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.

A. R. QUADRUPLIX Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES. New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. EACH OFFERED.—Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863; Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863; Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878; Baxter's Cabinet of Faints, 1837; Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879; Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865; Synnonds' Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881; Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. 101,000 Books for Sale and Wanted. Exchanges made. Please state wants.—Baker's Great Book Shop, 14-16, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

LITERARY.—Novels, Short Stories, Articles, Poems, placed with 179 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. £3s. per 1,000 words obtained for unknown author. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

THE "IDEAL" DIVISIBLE MS. BOOK. All work can be done in one book and rearranged in any manner. Absolutely simple. No rings, posts, or staples. Rapidly becoming universal at all Universities. Specimens, 1s. 9d. post free.—WM. HUNT, 18, Broad Street, Oxford.

MSS. WANTED.—Well-established publishers are open to consider MSS. in General Literature and Fiction for immediate publication on favourable terms. Book form only.—Write Box 850, Reynell's Advertisement Offices, 44, Chancery Lane, W.C.

WEAK SIGHT CURED IN ONE MONTH.

EYE SPECIALIST'S NEW TREATMENT MAKES GLASSES, MEDICINES, AND OPERATIONS UNNECESSARY.

The remarkable new treatment for weak sight discovered by Dr. Gilbert Percival, the eminent eye specialist, has cured many thousands of sufferers. One month effects a complete cure in most cases, even among aged patients of many years' duration. Spectacles can be thrown away entirely, all medicines and operations are unnecessary.

The principles of this new home treatment are approved by the whole medical profession. A wonderfully simple and painless means of massaging the weakened eye muscles (the main cause of poor sight) absolutely assures a speedy cure in all cases of astigmatism, near sight, far sight, and aching or strained eyes. Since this treatment was first announced, thousands have written saying that they were able to discard their spectacles entirely after one month. Further reports proved complete and permanent cures in every case.

Glasses Discarded in Two Weeks.

Read the remarkable testimony of Miss May Gilson, 18, Broad Street, East Road, Cambridge, who writes, June 16th, 1912:—

"I am very pleased with the Neu Vita Sight Restorer; it is surprising the good it has done. I began to use it on May 3rd. I am very glad to say that I have not had glasses on for five weeks, and I can see to write, needlework, and everything much better than I have ever done before. I have received very great benefit."

Mr. H. O. Webber, 261, Foxhall Road, Ipswich, September 30th, 1912:—

"I am very glad to say that AFTER THREE WEEKS' use of your Sight Restorer I have dispensed with glasses, which I have worn for three years. I spent a great deal of money with an oculist, who failed to give any benefit. I consider your Treatment a very valuable invention."

Mr. Wm. Simpson, 33, Dyehouse Fold, Apperley Bridge, Bradford, October 18th, 1912:—

"I feel it my duty to tell you of the great benefit I have received from your treatment. I began to use it a month ago for weak sight, and now the defect has left me altogether."

Dr. Percival's Standard Work, "Weak Sight and its Cure," Offered Free.

Everyone who is now disfigured by unsightly spectacles should write at once for a copy of Dr. Percival's standard work (1s. edition) on the Eyes, which he has arranged to distribute FREE of charge. It is filled with priceless advice and information; every form of eye defect is described at length with the proper method of treatment. Further complete details of Dr. Percival's wonderfully simple and pleasant cure are given, so that everyone now suffering from weak sight can quickly cure himself and discard spectacles for ever. The above cases are only three out of hundreds that are being accomplished every week. If your sight is not as perfect as you wish, no matter how long you may have suffered, Dr. Percival's treatment will cure you. It is absolutely harmless; by overcoming the actual cause of weak sight, permanent restoration is assured.

Dr. Percival's invaluable book is quite free. Write your name and full address on the coupon, and post it at once to E. N. Percival, Neu Vita Health Association, 95-106, Exchange Buildings, Southwark, London. This remarkable free book to cure your weak sight will be sent by return.

FILL UP AND POST AT ONCE.

COUPON

E. N. Percival, Neu Vita Health Assoc.,
95-106, Exchange Buildings, Southwark, London.

Please send me your book on "Weak Sight and its Cure," as offered in Everyman, for which I enclose 2d. in stamps (4d. if abroad) for postage.

NAME

ADDRESS

Everyman, 17/143.

Learn to Sketch in Two Hours . .

An entirely new method of drawing has been invented by A. A. Braun, Director of the Association of Designers, Artists, and Illustrators (the well-known commercial studio). The A.B.C. or Hieroglyphic System of Drawing, which is taught by correspondence, enables students to produce creditable sketches after the first lesson. The complete Course contains hundreds of original devices (the outcome of experience) for obtaining immediate facility in remunerative commercial drawing. Write to-day for Booklet T, with full details and opinions of leading illustrators, to

A.B.C. SCHOOL OF DRAWING,
46, Chancery Lane, London.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

SLOAN-DUPOYAN SHORTHAND saves a year's study. Used by Official Parliamentary reporters. Send for free illustrated handbook with specimen lesson.—SLOAN SHORTHAND CO., Ramsgate.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27 Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws"; in a Nutshell, on Card. Teaches the new way to acquire Knowledge. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

THE PROGRESS SOCIETY links up lonely men and women everywhere into a social body, affording wider intellectual and material interests through its various circles. No membership fee. For descriptive booklet send stamp to the Secretary, E. M., 107, Greencroft Gardens, Hampstead, London.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. 'Phone 6111 Hol.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

SCALE OF RATES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS IN

EVERYMAN

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY. 1d. PRESS DAY—TUESDAY.

	Whole Page	Half Page	½ Page	¼ Page
FIRST THREE RIGHT HAND PAGES ...	£22 10 0	£11 5 0	£5 12 6	—
ORDINARY POSITIONS—Facing not less than Half a page of matter	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
BACK PAGE	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	—

PER INCH (2 columns to the Page, 3½ inches wide), 21s.
Depth of Page, 10½ inches.

ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
Telephone: 2452 Central. Telegrams: "Templarlan, London."

among agricultural workers, that it is only with difficulty you can induce the inhabitants of a village to discuss any topic other than a purely personal one. The fear of the tyrants is over them all; the shadow of the squire, the dread of the landlord, stops free speech with deadly efficacy. A man thinks twice before he risks his job—in the country; and to be turned out of house and home is a far more serious matter for an agricultural labourer than a city dweller. It is no great business to shift from one street to another, but the housing accommodation in rural England is hopelessly inadequate to the needs of the population, and to be without a cottage is to break down the man's power of resistance and deprive him of earning power. Cottages are rarely "to let" in the countryside, and a man is obliged to live within walking distance of the land on which he is employed. The author points out that the small holder and the peasant proprietor possess a liberty of thought, a freedom of action beyond the hope of the agricultural labourer, harried by the oppression of the landlord and the squire. The book should be read by everyone interested in the land question. Mr. Green carries conviction in every page.

ECCE DEUS, STUDIES OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY, by William Benjamin Smith (Watts, 6s. net), is a disappointing book. The work, which has already appeared in German, is verbose, pedantic, ill-arranged, and insufferably dull. We have tried hard to ascertain precisely Professor Smith's theological position; and if we understand it aright, it is that he regards Christianity as pure monotheism, the historical existence of the man Jesus being entirely rejected. If he does not actually subscribe to Matthew Arnold's dictum that religion is simply "morality touched with emotion," he comes perilously near doing so. But we would rather not embark upon an exposition of the thesis adumbrated by Professor Smith. Its obscurity reminds us of a remark of Hegel. "Of all living men," said the philosopher once, "there is but one who has understood me; and," he added, after a moment's reflection, "he misunderstood me." We conclude with a word of advice. If Professor Smith wishes his book to be read, let him compress it to half its present size, let him try to write less pompously, and let him remember that lucid statement and orderly arrangement lie very near the high road to successful authorship.

MEMORIES OF TWO CITIES, EDINBURGH AND ABERDEEN, by David Masson (Olipant, 7s. 6d. net). We cannot imagine a more admirable gift-book for those who are natives of either of those cities, or who were privileged to enjoy the inspiring teaching of the late Professor of English Literature in Edinburgh University. Dr. Masson was born in Aberdeen, but quite the larger half of his long life was spent in Edinburgh. As a young man he was powerfully influenced by Chalmers, and he knew personally most of the distinguished men who lent lustre to the Scottish capital sixty years ago. This fact gives piquancy to his reminiscences of Chalmers, "Christopher North," Sir William Hamilton, Hugh Miller, De Quincey, and others. The opening chapter, entitled "Edina, Scotia's Darling Seat," affords a brilliant description of Edinburgh as it was a few years after the death of Scott, and before its literary glory had quite departed. Five out of the twelve chapters are devoted to Aberdeen. There is a striking word-portrait of the famous Dr. Melvin, the recognised head of the Scottish Latinity of his day. Byron was one of the pupils of the grammar school of which Melvin came to be rector. We would also commend the papers on "Aberdeen and its Traditions" and "Marischal College and its Professors" as being eminently readable. The volume has for frontispiece a lifelike portrait of Professor Masson in his old age.

THE JANUARY MAGAZINES.

I.

SERIOUS students of the Eastern Question and of the problems raised by the Balkan War will find plenty of food for reflection in the January Fortnightly. Mr. Sydney Brooks, in his article on "British Policy in the Near East," regards Great Britain's engagement in a European conflict as a serious possibility of the next few weeks. To "the man in the street" this may seem an alarmist view, but every student of international politics knows it to be sober fact. This incisive article should be followed by a perusal of Mr. J. Ellis Barker's "The Peace Conference and the Balance of Power." Mr. Barker's view is that whilst the distribution of power in the Balkans has directly little bearing on British interests, the maintenance of the balance of power in Europe is all-important. Two articles dealing with the non-controversial aspects of the situation in the Near East are "An Englishman in Montenegro," by Mr. Roy Trevor, and "A Captured War Correspondent," by Mr. Angus Hamilton.

II.

In "The Study of Empire," Mr. Sidney Low discusses, with his usual ability and foresight, the necessity for Imperial learning. He eloquently urges that in all University examinations in history, the rise, growth, and constitution of the British Empire should be made a compulsory subject. He also suggests the formation of a central school in London for Imperial research and teaching. Altogether, Mr. Low makes out a very strong case, for, as he most truly says, "we must study the Empire as well as praise it." Imperialism, in short, has not got much beyond the sentimental stage, and the Duke of Westminster, in his article on the Imperial Fund, admits as much. His conclusion is that while Imperial feeling has grown enormously, practical and creative Imperialism is nowhere. The causes are somewhat obscure, but the Duke of Westminster is probably right in assuming that Imperial Federation suffers because "it is a purely ideal movement." It "lacks the propelling power of self-interest."

III.

Considering the subjects with which it deals—religion, theology, and philosophy—the Hibbert Journal, as a rule, keeps wonderfully free from any suggestion of dullness; but the latest number rather errs on this side. The place of honour is given to Lord Haldane's address to the citizens of Bristol on "The Civic University." It is a vigorous, well-reasoned, and, we need hardly add, well-informed pronouncement regarding the part which our newer universities are capable of playing in national education.

IV.

For the first number of the British Review, with which is incorporated the Oxford and Cambridge Review, the editor, Mr. R. J. Walker, has succeeded in bringing together quite a galaxy of literary talent. The names of Sir A. Quiller-Couch, G. K. Chesterton, Hilaire Belloc, Cecil Chesterton, and Philip Gibbs invest the magazine with both interest and authority.

VIEW LIFE WITH NEW EYES.

In every part of the civilised world "Scientific Concentration"—the famous Course of all-round Mental Training—is showing Men and Women in every station how to view life with new eyes. It is giving them hope and inspiration, broadening their outlook, enabling them to throw off bad habits, and other success deterrents, by enormously developing their Will-Power and Self-Reliance. It is making them attend better, observe better, remember better, is making them more effective writers, speakers, and thinkers. Well-known Editors recommend it. The late Mr. W. T. Stead said: "I do not remember ever having seen such treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, and wish it every success." Learn what "Scientific Concentration" will do for you. Send to-day for Free Descriptive Booklet and testimonials to the CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

WOMAN AND MARRIAGE.

A Handbook. By MARGARET STEPHENS.
Third Edition. Cloth, 3/6. (Post free, 3/10.)

"If more such books were written, and more such knowledge disseminated, it would be a good thing for the wives and mothers of the present day."—The Times.

"We cordially approve of such straightforward dealing with the subject."

M. A. B. (Mainly About Books).
An Illustrated Monthly Magazine for Book-lovers.

Price 1/- per annum, post free.

ON SALE AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount price from Hunter & Longhurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. New Catalogue, just ready, sent post free.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in 12 Lessons. Used in Parliament daily. Handbook and Lesson free.—Shorthand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel. 6111 Hol.

VIVID NAVAL WAR GAME. 30 ships, coloured map. Fascinates boys 12 upwards. Cruiser raids, torpedo attacks; who first captures enemy's base wins. 3/6 p.f.—LEES, Frou, Degany, Llandudno.

NOVELS, SHORT STORIES, ETC., successfully placed by The Surrey Literary Agency. Booklet Prospectus free.—"Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

WHO SAID THE STUDY OF GERMAN WAS DECLINING?

Write to: THE DIRECTOR, Eversley Language Institute, 43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C., for particulars of CORRESPONDENCE COURSES IN GERMAN & NINE OTHER LANGUAGES.

CAN YOU SPEAK? Bright, original talk commands a guinea an hour! 2nd (Brit.) Edn. now ready: "Public Speaking for Pay and Pleasure." Month's study sufficient. 1s. post free.—MORGAN, Poulner, Ringwood.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, etc. Private and Class lessons and translation. Moderate terms. Prospectus free. Rosenblum's Language Institute, 319, Oxford St., W.; 26, High Holborn, W.C.; 42, Lombard St., E.C.

OWING to the extraordinary demand for the January Number of THE POETRY REVIEW, which contains (inter alia) an arresting article by the Editor, Stephen Phillips, Lord Dunsany's play, "The Gods of the Mountain," and the offer of Preliminary for Original Verse. Orders should be placed at once, 6d. net of all reputable booksellers, or direct from The Poetry Society, Clan House, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Mr. Gibbs leads off with a racy article on "The Secrets of the Bulgarian Victories." Then comes "My Views Regarding True and False Science," by Leo Tolstoy, a rather disappointing paper despite the great name it bears. Mr. Cecil Chesterton attempts to define Huxley's relation to the Catholic faith from the point of view of one whose first convictions were largely formed on his writings, and who is now a Catholic. Sir A. Quiller-Couch moralises pleasantly in a sketch entitled "If Every Face Were Friendly," and readable poems are contributed by Katharine Tynan, G. K. Chesterton, Hilaire Belloc, and J. C. Squire. The editor furnishes "Obiter Dicta," in which he writes sensibly and with moderation on the Balkan question, the North-Eastern Railway strike, provincial universities, etc. The last sixteen pages are devoted to reviews of important books. On the whole, we should say that there is a brilliant future for the British Review if it can maintain the interest, variety, and talent of its first number.

V.

Superlatives are at all times perilous, but one might almost be forgiven for employing them in the case of Chambers's Journal. It is always so good. One of the most conservative of magazines, it avoids dullness without calling in the aid of the meretricious. The January number is as fresh and brightly written, as entertaining and instructive as any of its predecessors. We would single out for special mention the personal sketch of Sir William Arrol. The writer, Mr. James H. Young, brings together many interesting and little known facts concerning the world's greatest bridge-builder. Then there is a seasonable and gossipy paper by Lady Napier of Magdala, entitled "It is Time to go Abroad"; an illuminating review of Mr. R. C. Lehmann's "Charles Dickens as Editor," by Sir Henry Lucy; and a most readable article on "Boot Troubles, and a Remedy," by "Skipper." The remedy proposed is the sandal.

VI.

With the January number, the Poetry Review enters upon what we hope will be a new lease of life under the editorship of Mr. Stephen Phillips. The present number promises well, both articles and verse being stimulating and suggestive. The genesis of "The Ancient Mariner" is appropriately discussed by Mr. E. Hartley Coleridge, and the Editor has some reflections on the poetic drama. He also reviews some recent verse. The fourth number of The Blue Book has a strong academic flavour, but this is surely as things ought to be in the case of a magazine conducted by Oxford undergraduates. Most University magazines are a strange mixture of crudeness and cleverness, but here we have a series of essays which convey a very favourable impression of the critical judgment and literary skill of the Oxford undergraduate of to-day. Some of the articles, however, would have been none the worse for compression. A new threepenny illustrated magazine called The Dial has reached us. The title is not very happily chosen, but the format is excellent. The magazine will cater for the intellectual, artistic, and musical interests of members of the Church of England, more especially women, and will give assistance when difficulties arise in social and parochial work.

BOOKS OF REFERENCE.

WHO'S WHO. 1913. (A. and C. Black, 15s. net.)
The place of honour belongs to this valuable reference book. It is as difficult to imagine the library of a journalist or a writer or a politician without a copy of WHO'S WHO as it would be to imagine a lawyer's office without a legal directory. The present issue, like each preceding issue, is considerably larger than its predecessor.

In BOOKS THAT COUNT, a dictionary of standard books, edited by W. Forbes Gray (5s. net), Messrs. A. and C. Black are making a new departure, which, in its own way, is as full of promise as "Who's Who." The editor, Mr. W. Forbes Gray, who is known to the readers of EVERYMAN by his articles, "What's Wrong with the Churches?" has brought to his task copious information, a trained literary taste, and wide sympathies.

The LITERARY YEAR BOOK. Volume XVII. (John Ouseley, 6s. net.) The first half of this most valuable book of reference consists of literary biographies, and practically covers the same ground as "Who's Who," but is necessarily much less complete. I would suggest that the LITERARY YEAR BOOK should give much more definite information and advice on the legal and the financial aspects of the literary profession.

Whitaker's PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, AND KNIGHTAGE (5s.) is as good as Burke and De Brett, and is considerably cheaper. Again, this issue contains considerably more matter than the previous issues, which does not suggest that the Peerage and Baronetage and Knightage and Companionage of the United Kingdom, in our democratic and socialistic age, are decreasing in number or in social importance. As for Whitaker's ALMANAC (2s. 6d. net), it is so universally known and so deservedly appreciated that it is superfluous to recommend it. It would be difficult to improve on the present edition.

The INTERNATIONAL WHITAKER (price 2s. 6d.). There has been a long-felt want for a manual which would give all necessary information on the countries of the world, and which would cover the same ground as the "Statesman's Year Book," but at a more popular price. The INTERNATIONAL WHITAKER fills this long-felt need, and it is certainly destined to as brilliant a career as Whitaker's "Almanac," if the quality of this first year of issue is maintained.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarlan London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

ASK YOUR BOOKSELLER TO SHOW YOU A SAMPLE VOLUME

OF

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

1/-

NET,
CLOTH.

TO BE COMPLETED IN 12 VOLS.

2/-

NET,
LEATHER.

THE FIRST VOLUME WILL APPEAR ON

FRIDAY, JAN. 24TH, 1913.

THE REMAINING VOLUMES WILL BE ISSUED MONTHLY, AND BE COMPLETED IN DECEMBER.

ITS DISTINCTIVE FEATURES ARE:—

THE WORK CONTAINS MORE ARTICLES
THAN ANY OTHER ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

IT IS ENTIRELY A NEW WORK, CONTAINING INFORMATION UP TO 1913, AND EMBRACING THE FULL
HAPPENINGS OF THE PRESENT TIME.

EACH VOLUME CONSISTS OF 640 PAGES,
AND ABOUT 500,000 WORDS:

THE FULL SET—Six Million words.

THERE ARE 1,200 ILLUSTRATIONS.

THE PRINTING IS DONE FROM AN IMPROVED TYPE, WHICH IS ABSOLUTELY LEGIBLE, AND QUICKLY READ.

THE FULL SET WILL ONLY MEASURE 11½ in. LONG, 7 in. HIGH, 4½ in. DEEP.

If your Bookseller is unable to hand you a copy of our 8-pp. Prospectus, please send us a Postcard, and we shall gladly send you one, or more; or, if there is no Bookseller near you, we shall be pleased to send you a copy of VOL. I., post free, on receipt of a Postal Order for One Shilling. You are at liberty to return the specimen copy if it does not meet with your approval.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

DARN NO MORE

Holeproof Hose

Stockings and Socks That Don't Want Mending.

Wear our Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO months of purchase we will Replace them absolutely FREE

You can imagine that we should not make such an offer unless we were convinced of the extraordinary good wearing quality of our stockings. No more eye-straining, eye-opening, and congenial occupations. You can now turn to more pleasant and congenial occupations. When you buy our GUARANTEED TO LAST, which is that the smallest hole appears within TWO months of purchase, the hose will be replaced absolutely free. So you can see the enormous saving that is realized by purchasing our Holeproof Hose. These Holeproof Socks and Stockings are of medium weight, shapely, well-made and comfortable, with that pleasant sense of good fit which is one of the many pleasures of wearing them. It is desirable that it gives to continued pressure and wear just as a sponge may be depressed by griping of the hand, until it has done no damage to its fabric. The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business men and busy housewives to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 2/10, post 2d. Two Pairs Ladies' stockings 3/10, post 2d.

COLOURED HOSE for Ladies, in Black, Navy, Mole, Champagne, Pearl Grey, Tan & H. at 3/6, at same price. SILK HOLEPROOF. Most delightful. Specially strengthened in to. sand heels with our holeproof mixture yarn. The best Champagne colour is stocked, also Empire Blue, Tan, Pearl Grey, and Black. Price—Two Pairs of Gent's Socks 7/8, post 2d. Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings 10/6, post 2d. On the guarantee that we will replace a pair free if a hole develops within Two Months of purchase, will you send our P.O.? State boot size. Write your name and address distinctly. Call or write: Vaughan & Heather (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

500 HOURS' LIGHT for 1½d.

"FOOL - PROOF" LAMP.

It can be used as a smoker's companion, and is absolutely odourless.

AGENTS WANTED.

We have named this the "Fool-Proof" Lamp, because even with the most careless handling it is absolutely safe. That is, there is no exposed flame to flicker or blow out when used out of doors, near bedroom windows or curtains, or draughty corners.

Many people would like their dark recesses, hall or basements well lighted, but cannot manage this because of the expense. But one of these little "Fool-Proof" Lamps, placed in these eerie corners or dark staircase landings, will cost no more than 1½d. for 500 hours.

You will realise this better when you know that candles give only 15 hours for the same amount and are also highly dangerous. Now, these lamps are really artistic, the pattern is beautifully designed and well executed on a copper base, and the whole is so well finished that it has the appearance of a really expensive article.

It is essentially "good" looking and is totally different to the usual run of rather cheap looking oil lamps.

Burns Paraffin Oil. Turns up or down with one finger. Wears for years, and is a great boon to those who are nervous in the dark. Price 2/8. Postage and Packing, 2d.

Vaughan & Heather (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGHTON.

MOST WONDERFUL COAL SAVER

Important Discovery that will make 1 cwt. last nearly as long as 2 cwt.

Agents Wanted.

It doubles the warming, heating, and cheering power of coal—that is the almost miraculous achievement of the scientific invention sold by an enterprising Brighton firm.

It means that you will be able to light the fire at once every time, even if it be not well laid. It means that your coal bill will be cut in two, and that you will have extra leisure time of several hours a week in which to have other pleasures, which can be paid for with the saved half of the coal bill. It means all of these things at a total cost to you to-day of 1/- or 1/6. That is all you pay for these privileges, except 3d. postage to bring the patent "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" to your home. Every ounce of the coal in the grate will burn and yield up its cheery influence for your benefit, because there is room for air to get round at the back. Look at the illustration. You can see there is. So the fire will burn brighter and warmer and clearer always. And yet it won't burn away the coal any faster.

Why? Because you are burning a combination of half coal and half air. Coal costs money. Air costs NOTHING—it improves the fire—so burn it. Just fancy, only half as much coal to be bought.

Send your P.O. now for Large Size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (5½ in. wide), 1/6; or small size "V. & H. Grato Coal Saver" (4 in. wide), 1/- Postage on each, 3d.

Go to the Post Office NOW. You will get the price back at least once a month for the next ten years.

Call or write—VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON

Burning half coal, half air. Result: Great Heat with V. & H. Coal Saver

POKE YOUR FINGER INTO THIS MANTLE & IT WILL NOT BREAK

You have heard of so-called strong Mantles, but never one like this. This one is flexible. That is, after it has been burnt off you can touch it, poke it, and instead of falling to pieces it resumes its shape, an amount of heavy tramping overhead, draughty passages, etc., is "just nothing" to what our Flexible Mantle can stand.

THIS MANTLE SHOULD LAST FOR YEARS

Try one on the most hardily used burner you have at home, and you will soon see the difference. Two Mantles supplied for 1/-, postage and packing 2d. State whether upright or inverted. The slight extra cost is saved over and over again.

Don't let good inventions pass you. Call or write to: Vaughan & Heather (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, Brighton.

After burning off.

This Tea actually costs less than 1/1 per lb., as 1 lb. will go as far as 2 lb. of ordinary tea, while for flavour and quality it is equal to any 2/6 Teas.

10,000 lb. TEA

TO BE GIVEN AWAY to prove the superiority of HORNE'S DIGESTIVE FLOWERY PEKOE BUDS at 1/9 over any ordinary Tea up to 2/6 per lb.

OF ALL TEAS THE MOST DELICIOUS.

¼-lb. FREE

To every reader of "Everyman," enclosing 2d. for postage; or 1 oz. Sample sent post free (no postcards will be attended to). ONE TRIAL will prove to everyone that all Teas this is the MOST DELICIOUS, will go TWICE AS FAR as ordinary Tea, is ready in 3 MINUTES, while the weakest digestion can assimilate it, and it acts as a nerve tonic.

Every day New Customers send orders, AFTER TESTING FREE SAMPLE, stating that since drinking this Tea they can enjoy no other. One important feature of these YOUNG BUDS is the quantity of Theine they contain, which is most invaluable to all who suffer from their nerves and brain fag. Theine is a form of brain food and arrests the waste of brain tissue, and by nourishing both brain and nerves aids the digestive organs.

ITS LEADING FEATURES:

1st. AN AID TO DIGESTION.

Dr. F. H. WORSWICK, M.D., M.R.C.P., Manchester, writes: "After twelve months' trial of 'Horne's Digestive' Tea, I have formed a most excellent opinion of it. My experience is that the Tea is of excellent quality and possesses a delicate and agreeable aroma. As a Chronic Dyspeptic, also, I have had better health since I began its use than previously. I have advocated it to my friends, some of whom I know have had some and speak in high terms of it."

Rev. D. T. MILLIGAN (of Fawcett Vicarage, Birtswith, Leeds) writes: "I never lose an opportunity of recommending your excellent and delicious 'Flowery Pekoe Buds' at 1s. 9d. I am most grateful to you for bringing this Tea to my notice, for NOW I thoroughly enjoy a cup of tea, which I was unable to do before. It ASSISTS rather than hinders digestion. I am thankful to have made its acquaintance. You are at liberty to print the above, with my name and address."

2nd. NERVE AND BRAIN NUTRIENT.

Extract from a letter, dated May 23, from Mrs. HALL, Edleston Road, Crewe: "I have suffered with a nervous breakdown for three years and unable to finish any work I began; in fact, I positively could not sit down. Since drinking your 'Buds' at 1s. 9d. I have been able to complete work I commenced two years ago, and enjoyed a busy time of work with ease and comfort. Your Tea is all you advertise as a BRAIN AND NERVE NUTRIENT."

BRIDGEND.—"After teaching all day in school I find your digestive 'Buds' a better pick-me-up than anything else."

GLASGOW.—"I have decidedly improved in my health since using your 'Buds.'"

3rd. GOES TWICE AS FAR AS ORDINARY TEA.

LEITCHWORTH.—"I now only have to fill my caddy (1 lb.) once a fortnight with your Tea, instead of once a week as previously."

SOUTHGATE.—"It is not only the most delicious but the most economical I have ever used."

ST.—"DIOCESAN HOME.—"Please repeat our order monthly, as we find your 'Buds' goes twice as far as other teas."

4th. OF ALL TEAS THE MOST DELICIOUS. HAMPSTEAD.—"We consider your 'Digestive Tea' is better than any we have used, and equal both in flavour and quality to ordinary teas at higher prices."

HIGH WYCOMBE.—"We have never had tea before we like so well as your 'Flowery Pekoe Buds.'"

LUTON.—"Please repeat last order, as both for economy and flavour we can find no tea to equal your 'Flowery Pekoe Buds.'"

5th. EQUAL TO ANY 2/6 TEA. HAWARDEN.—"I think the 'Flowery Pekoe Buds' the most delicious tea I have ever tasted, and much better than I have given 2s. 6d. and 2s. 10d. for."

THETFORD.—"I consider it quite equal to any I have ever had at 2s. 6d., and it merits all your advertisement stated."

6th. INFUSES IN 3 MINUTES. We have thousands of letters from Customers as under:—

"This Tea is all you claim for it."
"You have in no way over estimated the merits of this Tea."

OF no other Tea can it be said that while it is the most economical for Servants' Hall, no choicer flavour and quality is required in the Drawing Room.

TERMS CASH. 4 lb. upwards Carriage paid to any address in the United Kingdom. 1 lb. Sample post free, 2/-

HORNE & SUTTON, TEA SPECIALISTS (Dept. E), OLD TRINITY HOUSE, 5 to 8, WATER LANE, GREAT TOWER STREET, LONDON, E.C. SPECIAL TERMS FOR EXPORT.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 15. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 24, 1913.

One Penny.

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	453
Taxation and Social Reform— By Hector Macpherson	454
The New French President— Monsieur Raymond Poincaré	455
Countries of the World— By the Editor —IV.—Switzerland	456
The Eternal Now— By Edmund G. Gardner	458
The Burden of Books, and How to Bear It— By F. T. Dalton	459
Was Burns a Modern Dante?	460
Portrait of Robert Burns	461
The Moss Troopers	462
Winter Thoughts— Dartmoor Gao!	462

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

LEWIS MELVILLE

EDMUND

GARDNER

CHARLES SAROLEA

F. T. DALTON

The Peaches— Short Story By André Theuriet	PAGE 463
Literary Notes	465
Masterpiece of the Week— Rousseau's "Emile"—By Charles Sarolea	466
The Making of Irish Character	467
Letters to Living Authors— I. To Anthony Hope, Esq.—By Lewis Melville	468
Correspondence	469
Reviews—
Round the World for Gold	476
A Vision of Christian London	477
An American Estimate of Words- worth	478
The Fighting Spirit of Japan	479
The Essays of a Liberal Protestant	479
Books of the Week	480

Readers of this week's EVERYMAN are presented with a reduced facsimile of a fine Photogravure of a Van Dyck Masterpiece, now in the Windsor collection. (See page 471.)

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THOUGH unity exists in the Unionist ranks, there is not yet unanimity of opinion with regard to the food taxes. Speaking in Newcastle, Viscount Ridley said he believed the Unionist party had made a mistake in postponing the food duties. In his opinion, a great many of those who had agreed to the postponement would regret that step. They would find that they had shirked one difficulty only to stumble into a great many other difficulties. Viscount Ridley clearly does not believe with Lord Derby, who described the memorial to Mr. Bonar Law as a "golden bridge," over which Unionists could "march in safety without any single member feeling that he had made any sacrifice of principle." Meanwhile the farmers are not enamoured of the "golden bridge." In addressing a Farmers' Association at Darlington, Lord Durham received the applause of his audience when he asked those whose livelihood depended on agriculture how they were going to benefit by having the price of everything they had to buy raised by artificial means, while there was no increase in the price of farm produce.

In addressing a gathering of farmers at Taunton, Lord St. Audrie welcomed full and impartial inquiry into the land system. He had no desire to go back to the old system of Protection, but it was only fair that the difficulties of agriculturists should be considered.

Circumstances have proved too much for the British Medical Association in the controversy over the Insurance Act. In view of the large number of doctors who had agreed to work under the Act, something had to be done to release them from their pledge to the Association. At a representative meeting of the Association, held in London, it was agreed to release all practitioners from their pledge. The meeting recorded its emphatic protest "against the discreditable methods adopted by the Government in forcing doctors to give their services on terms derogatory to the profession and against the public interest."

The Select Committee of Inquiry into the Marconi Contract have received a letter from Mr. Godfrey Isaacs, managing director of the Marconi Company, asking the Government to agree to the company treating the contract as no longer binding in the meantime. The company thought it inequitable that it should remain bound while investigations which were never contemplated were continued over an indefinite period.

At a Conference in Edinburgh on the subject of destitution, Mrs. Sidney Webb, who was the principal speaker, called attention to the fact that the administration of the Insurance Act had largely fallen into the hands of capitalistic companies. The action of those associations connected with the insurance companies had altered the character of sickness insurance in such a way that she believed Friendly Societies and Trade Unions would have rejected the scheme had they known beforehand.

The Labour party are about to enter on a great agitation in co-operation with the Miners' Federation of Great Britain for the nationalisation of mines. A Bill for that purpose is now drafted.

The election of M. Poincaré as President of the Republic has given great satisfaction in Paris. There is no precedent for the elevation of the Prime Minister actually in office to the Presidency. In view of the critical state of international affairs, it was felt to be imperative to have a responsible head of the Foreign Affairs Department, and not an interim Minister. In these circumstances the Cabinet resigned. M. Briand has formally accepted the task of forming a new Cabinet. M. Briand will be best remembered in connection with the great railway strike in France in 1910, when he was at the head of the Cabinet. His work in suppressing the strike was all the more remarkable, as not so many years ago he was a Socialist agitator.

In consequence of his inability to effect a Coalition with existing groups, Prince Katsura, the Japanese Prime Minister, has announced the formation of a new party.

Lord Avebury, who presided on Monday at a public meeting of the City of London Committee of the Free Trade Union, expressed the opinion that the Colonies would never insist upon the food taxes, which, he believed, were now dead. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, in moving a resolution in favour of Free Trade, declared that Imperialism which is based on trade appeals only to traders. He thought they had heard the last of the food taxes.

M. Gueshoff, the Bulgarian Prime Minister, has telegraphed to the delegates in London giving them full power to telegraph direct to General Savoff, Commander-in-Chief in the field, to resume hostilities when, in their opinion, there is no reasonable prospect of the conclusion of peace. It is pointed out by a special correspondent that unless the Balkan States are expected to face the horrors of famine, the men now with the colours must be back in their fields from the end of January.

TAXATION AND SOCIAL REFORM

WITHIN recent years Liberalism as a political creed has undergone something like transformation. One of its prominent watchwords was Retrenchment, and in harmony with that, Mr. Gladstone's great ambition as finance Minister was to keep a sharp eye on national expenditure. Liberalism of the old type restricted itself largely to the work of political reform, under the belief that, freed from the oppression of unjust laws, the people would work out their own social salvation. With the appearance of the Labour party a change came over historic Liberalism, under the banner of which reformers like Bentham, the two Mills, Cobden, Bright, and Gladstone, laboured valiantly. Political reform by the leaders of the working classes was no longer an end in itself; it was viewed as a means to another end—Social Reform. Industrial and social problems were felt to be too vast and complex for treatment by purely voluntary effort, and a demand was made for legislation, with the result that under the present Government the old creed of Liberalism has been replaced by humanitarianism, which has given to recent legislation quite a Socialistic complexion. At every stage of his career, from childhood to old age, the individual is under the guardianship of the State. The extent of the guardianship is seen in the following resolution passed at a meeting in Edinburgh, at which Mrs. Sidney Webb was the principal speaker, for the abolition of destitution:—

"That Parliament devote the whole of next session to the consideration and passing of measures which will permanently raise the standard of life of the large masses of the working people who are suffering from the evils of poverty; and that this be done by means of legislation to secure (1) a legal minimum wage; (2) reduction of hours of labour; (3) complete provision against sickness; (4) a national minimum of child nurture; (5) prevention of unemployment; (6) healthy homes for all; and (7) the abolition of the Poor-law."

This programme cannot be carried out without money. Where is it to come from? Clearly from increased taxation. The middle and upper classes, under the growing pressure of national and municipal taxation, are viewing with distrust and dislike the humanitarian propaganda. In many minds the question is arising with regard to the proper sphere of public expenditure and the true function of taxation. Guidance on this point is had from Gunton, an American economist, who dissipates some misconceptions which have gathered round the subject. He divides Government functions in the sphere of taxation into two—the static and the dynamic. The static embraces taxation needed for the defence of the nation, the army and navy for the external, and the police force and the staff of judiciary and executive officials for the internal defence. The dynamic embraces taxation needed to increase the health, intelligence, and social comfort of the people. Manifestly the expenditure on these objects is calculated to reduce expenditure on internal defence, on the upkeep of prisons, and the machinery needed for the suppression of crime. Viewed thus dynamic taxation is pre-eminently productive. It is a case of casting bread upon the waters and finding it after many days. As Gunton puts it, taxation raised for the purpose of socialising the opportunities of the people is a positive benefit, and the increase of which is the surest way of diminishing the taxation raised for the repression of crime, etc. In his own words, "To the degree that wealth is consumed in extending public improvements and enlarging the social opportunities of the people, it is both economically and socially an advantage."

In the matter of taxation there must be a limit; in the national expenditure there must be retrenchment. If taxation for purposes of social reform cannot be lessened, where is retrenchment to begin? Obviously, in unproductive taxation, such as the huge outlay on armaments. At present, instead of reduced expenditure in this direction, there is increased expenditure, which is, from an industrial point of view, wholly unproductive. No doubt, at present, the money spent on the upkeep of the defensive force, is a necessity as a defence against aggression—an admission which, at the present stage of civilisation, is melancholy in the extreme. It is a sad commentary on our national profession of Christianity that, while millions are voted for Dreadnoughts, violent opposition is raised when it is proposed to devote a few thousands to fighting our real foes, ignorance, poverty, and crime. There is only one remedy for this state of things, the substitution of international arbitration for war. The nation cannot bear heavy taxation for social reform and heavier taxation for war purposes. In spending money freely in social reform without decreasing the expenditure on armaments, the Government are pursuing a policy which is full of danger. Their only course of safety lies in carrying to a successful issue a propaganda in favour of international arbitration.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

THE NEW FRENCH PRESIDENT

MONSIEUR RAYMOND POINCARÉ

I.

NEVER before has the election of a French President roused to the same extent the attention of the civilised world. Never before has any candidate called forth, like Monsieur Raymond Poincaré, the unanimous approval of the French nation. In vain has one section of the political caucus tried to bar the way. The will of the people has overruled the tyranny of a clique. For thirty-five years France has had to be satisfied with respectable mediocrities at the head of the State. The French Republic was not strong enough to afford a Strong Man. There was always the danger that the Strong Man might become a Dictator. To-day the French Republic has ceased to dread the phantom of dictatorship. Another danger more imminent has arisen—the European danger, the peril of foreign aggression, and to meet that peril a strong man at the helm is a prime necessity.

II.

Monsieur Poincaré was born fifty-two years ago at Bar-le-Duc. He is, therefore, a citizen of Lorraine. Lorraine inspires her children with a patriotism more intimate, more tender, more anxious, than any other region of France. For Lorraine is the country of Joan of Arc. Lorraine is still suffering from the wounds of a tragic war, and from a mutilation, against which the conscience of Europe and the wishes of the conquered people continue to protest.

The son of a Civil Servant, an Inspector-General of Forestry, Poincaré is a typical representative of the French middle class, and his family is an admirable illustration of the splendid vitality and of the traditional virtues which still subsist in that much-maligned French "bourgeoisie." One of his brothers occupies one of the most responsible offices in the Ministry of Public Instruction. His cousin, Henri Poincaré, whose recent death was mourned by the scientific world, was the greatest mathematician of the age, and has been deservedly called the "modern Euclid." Another cousin, Professor Boutroux, of the Sorbonne, the master and forerunner of Bergson, was recently a Gifford Lecturer in the University of Glasgow, and has also achieved worldwide fame.

Poincaré was educated, like every child of his class, at the Lycée, or Government school, of his native town. There is no finer school in Europe than the French Lycée. There is none which gives a better all-round training in the "humanities." From the day he entered the Lycée, Poincaré's career has been an uninterrupted succession of distinctions, won by intellectual ability and force of character. At twenty years of age he was called to the Bar. At twenty-seven he was a Member of Parliament. At thirty-three he was appointed Minister of Public Instruction, and when the Cabinet of which he was a member was overthrown, he joined the next Cabinet as Chancellor of the Exchequer. In those critical years, when the Dreyfus affair had plunged France into the chaos of a civil and religious war, when a Government seldom lasted longer than a twelvemonth, there was no room and no scope for a man like Poincaré. To accept office was to be the slave of a party, and Poincaré has always refused to serve sect or party. For eleven years, from 1893 to 1904, he retained his seat in Parliament, taking a prominent part in debate, but refusing to join any of the administrations which followed in ephemeral succession. The young politician was abiding his time, and devoted his splendid abilities to the law. Like another strong man and contemporary statesman, Waldeck-Rousseau, he rapidly acquired one of the most lucrative practices on the Paris Bar.

III.

In 1906 Poincaré re-entered the political arena, and took office once more as Chancellor of the Exchequer. But the opportunity of his life came to him on the resignation of the Briand Cabinet. To succeed to a politician of infinite wit, but erratic and incalculable, to liquidate all the difficulties created, and to allay all the passions aroused by his predecessor, to face the dangers, internal and external, which were threatening on every side, to meet the opposition of Clemenceau, the "Old Tiger," whose life was spent in wrecking a score of successive administrations, would have taxed the ingenuity and resourcefulness of a Thiers or a Talleyrand. But Poincaré proved equal to the task, and he succeeded in doing what no other Prime Minister could have done. By the magnetism of his personality, by the integrity of his character, by the absolute confidence he inspired, he brought together a "Conciliation" Cabinet, which included a Socialist like Millerand as Minister of War, a former Syndicalist like Briand as Minister of Justice, and a Radical like Delcassé as Naval Secretary. The miracle was that those men of absolutely different temperaments and with different policies were all made to work harmoniously together. Poincaré's Cabinet proved not only the most brilliant, not only the most heterogeneous, but also the strongest Cabinet the Republic has produced since the "Great Ministry" of Gambetta. It did, indeed, deserve its name of the "Ministry of all the Talents." France could have given no better evidence to the world of the new patriotic spirit which animates her. In this extraordinary administration Poincaré held both the offices of Foreign Secretary and of Prime Minister. It fell to him to liquidate the Treaty with Germany which settled the Moroccan question, and it is largely owing to his firmness and tact and dignity that a European war was averted.

IV.

It is of good omen for the future that such a man should just now be called to the highest magistracy of the French Republic. Poincaré possesses in a supreme degree those political virtues which are required at the present juncture. He has been tried in the three most delicate dignities of the Republic—the Ministry of Public Instruction, the Treasury, and the Foreign Office. He has been tried, and he has not been found wanting. The President of the French Republic is invested under the Constitution with executive powers, almost as extensive as those of the American President. Hitherto no occupant of the Presidency has ever chosen to exert his prerogative. We earnestly hope that Monsieur Raymond Poincaré may never be called upon to use those powers which the Constitution gives him. But should an emergency arise which would call for the exercise of his constitutional authority, all patriotic Frenchmen and Britons must feel a sense of security in the conviction that a statesman so strong in intellect and character should have been chosen to direct the destinies of the French people. C. S.

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD BY THE EDITOR

IV.—SWITZERLAND

I.

The most striking characteristic of the physical configuration of Switzerland is its infinite diversity and complexity. Scientists may reduce the geological chaos to something like order and system, but to the outsider the country remains a bewildering labyrinth of lakes and valleys and mountain ranges, the high table-land of Central Europe, where her three great rivers—the Rhine, the Rhone, and the Danube—take their source. The tourist can observe and verify for himself in one afternoon's walk that perplexing diversity. In a few hours he will pass from the sunny southern slopes near the lake or at the foot of the mountain to the solitary sublimity of the summit. In a few hours' walk he will have covered thirty-five degrees of latitude, and he will have experienced every sample of climate, every extreme of temperature. In rapid succession he will leave behind him the region of vine and chestnut, of oak and beech, of fir and pine, till he comes to the dreary waste of rock and moraine, where every trace of natural vegetation and human habitation disappears in the region of eternal snow.

II.

That infinite diversity in the physical surroundings provides a corresponding variety in the conditions of human life. As you pass from one canton to a neighbouring canton, or from one village to another, you find most startling and most sudden changes: from a sedentary life to a nomadic life, from pasture to agriculture, from agriculture to industry, from an Italian population to a German or French population, from Catholicism to Protestantism.

To take first the linguistic and racial divisions, Switzerland is a country of three languages—French, German, and Italian—and those three languages are again subdivided into many dialects, and some dialects, like that strange language Romansch, spoken in the Upper Engadine, are really independent linguistic units. Those racial and linguistic boundaries have changed very little in recent generations. German is spoken by seven-tenths of the population (about 2,400,000), French is spoken by about two-tenths (about 750,000), the remaining tenth speak Italian and other dialects. If the German language has the superiority of numbers, the French language has the superiority of culture and literature. The great names of Swiss literature are French, and no critic would think of putting the greatest German names, Godfried Keller and Ferdinand Conrad Meyer, on the same level with Rousseau and Madame de Staël.

The divisions of language and race are still further complicated by the divisions of religion. Like the racial boundaries, the religious boundaries have hardly varied. Six-tenths of the population are Protestant, four-tenths are Catholic. It is strange that religion in Switzerland should be entirely independent of race. French Lausanne is Protestant, but French Freiburg is Catholic. German Lucerne, Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden are Catholic, but Zürich and Bern are Protestant.

The Belgian economist, Professor Emile de Laveleye, wrote, forty years ago, a famous pamphlet, which was edited in English by Gladstone and translated into every European language. Comparing the influence of Protestantism and Catholicism on national morality and national prosperity, he uses the Swiss cantons to prove his contention, arguing that the Protestant cantons are far more prosperous and more moral than the Catholic. But the problem is far more complex than de Laveleye presumed. The prosperity of Catholic Switzerland has enormously increased, and if divorce can be taken as any index to morality, divorces are four times more frequent in Protestant cantons than in Catholic ones, and they are six times more frequent in the case of mixed marriage. Still, it may be said that, on the whole, Swiss civilisation is Protestant and not Catholic. To the student of history, Switzerland remains the country of Calvin and Rousseau, of Madame de Staël and Benjamin Constant.

III.

Economically, Switzerland has hitherto been a poor country. In olden days, the Swiss mountaineer had to leave his country to serve as a mercenary soldier. The soil is unsuitable for the growing of cereals. There is a little wine-growing on the shores of the Lake of Geneva, but in most cantons people are restricted to the breeding of cattle and to such agricultural industries as condensed milk and the making of chocolate. Switzerland has certainly a great economic future before her. But so far she has been hampered in her development by the absence of coal and iron. Numberless waterfalls provide her with an inexhaustible supply of electric motive power. Already the industrial population has risen to 320,000, having doubled in five-and-twenty years, and foreign labour, mainly Italian, has to be imported. And those industries have especially prospered where the value of human labour is more important than the value of the raw material which Switzerland cannot herself produce. I need only refer to the silk and cotton industries and to the industry of watch-making. This highly skilled and minutely specialised industry gives employment to nearly 130,000 artisans, and is mainly centralised in the Jura, in the interesting towns of Locle and Château de Fonds, the most elevated city in Europe. But even more important than watch-making is the national industry of hotel keeping, wherein the Swiss people are without rivals.

IV.

In politics, Switzerland has been for centuries the home of republican institutions and of political liberty, and she remains to this day a pure and undiluted democracy. She has given to the world both the practice of popular government and its theory in that immortal little treatise of Rousseau, the "Contrat Social." Switzerland is probably the only country where the people both initiate, make, and administer the law. Any important measure is directly referred to the people, and so successful has been the Swiss Referendum that it is likely to be extended in the near future to other European countries.

In asserting their political rights, the Swiss people have shown extraordinary moderation and self-control, and have given the lie to those reactionaries who hold that pure democracy must necessarily be rash and impulsive. So far from being revolutionary, the Swiss have often erred on the side of conservatism and extreme caution. At the same time they are always ready to make experiments, and they have the courage of reversing their policy when it does not prove a success. They have experimented free trade in drink, and have replaced it by a Government monopoly. Some cantons have adopted a progressive Income Tax, others have preferred a tax on capital, others are imposing both! They have experimented Free Trade, and they recently abandoned it for Protection. Probably the most interesting of all their experiments has been their territorial army. Every Swiss owes military service to the fatherland, and the Swiss army is both the most democratic and cheapest in Europe.

V.

Physically the Swiss people are not a fine race. It seems as if man had been dwarfed by nature. The women are mainly remarkable for their plainness. Nor are they as a people particularly healthy, which sounds like a paradox, considering that the Swiss air is supposed by millions of tourists to possess wonderful health-giving virtues. In recent years the progress of hygiene and the increase of national prosperity have considerably improved the physique of the race. Drink is still a national plague. I have seen on New Year's day as shocking scenes of drunkenness in Switzerland as in Scotland, and it is doubtful whether the establishment of a State monopoly in the sale of alcohol will reduce it.

In the province of education, Switzerland is in advance of most countries in Europe. Education is gratuitous and compulsory. Illiteracy has practically disappeared, and this small country of three millions and a half can boast of no less than eight universities.

Some of those universities, Geneva and Zürich, are, practically cosmopolitan institutions. On the other hand, it is doubtful whether the moral progress of the people has kept pace with their intellectual progress. I am inclined to believe that the annual invasion of millions of idlers from all over the world is having a most deleterious effect on public morality.

VI.

Like most other countries, Switzerland is passing through anxious times. The town population is increasing out of all proportion to that of the rural districts. There is an enormous influx of foreign elements, not always desirable. Out of the half-million foreign residents, more than three hundred thousand are Germans, and Bâle and Zürich are rapidly becoming commercial fiefs of the Empire. Still, when all facts are weighed in the balance, the Swiss people have many reasons to look forward confidently to their future, as they have every reason to be proud of their past. Switzerland has taught us many a valuable lesson. She has taught Europe a lesson in the possibilities of democracy, and she has proved that democracy is compatible with an ordered and settled Government. She has taught a lesson in the virtues of Home Rule, and has proved that the most extreme policy of local autonomy is consistent with national patriotism. Above all, she has taught a lesson in the virtue of tolerance, and she has proved that different races professing different religions and speaking different languages can live together in generous emulation and peaceful rivalry.

THE ETERNAL NOW* BY EDMUND G. GARDNER

I.

THERE are few more famous scenes in literature than that in the ninth book of the "Confessions," where St. Augustine and St. Monica, as they leaned in a window that looked into the garden of the house at Ostia, spoke together of the Beatific Vision, sighing after that "moment of understanding," in which, here and now, they might anticipate the unending and changeless life of the hereafter. More than a century later, the last of the Roman philosophers, under sentence of death in his dungeon at Pavia, gave philosophical expression to the conception of Eternity, as "the completely simultaneous and perfect possession of limitless life." This sentence of Boëthius, in itself strongly Platonist, became the standard definition of Eternity throughout the Middle Ages; it was elaborated by Aquinas; it inspired the "Divina Commedia" of Dante, who describes himself as one "who had come from time to the eternal," from the tempest of succession to the vision and possession of the eternal now, in which "every where and every when is brought to a point." As Mr. Wicksteed has well expressed it: "To the mediæval thinker Eternity is not endless time, but a state in which perfection is found in the co-existence, not in the succession, of the parts that make the "whole." In the mystical sense, Eternal Life is the permanent abiding of those highest and deepest moments in the experience of the soul in which the intensity of its life transcends space and time.

II.

The aim of Baron von Hügel in the volume before us is to represent Eternal Life as "an experience, requirement, force, conception, ideal which is, in endless degrees and ways, latent or patent in every specifically human life and act; which, in its fullest operativeness and its most vivid recognition, is specifically religious; and which, in proportion to such fullness and recognition, is found to involve the consciousness, or possession, of all the highest realities and goods sought after or found by man, and the sense (more or less) of non-succession, of a complete Present and Presence, of an utterly abiding Here and Now." He sets out to emphasize "a sense of the closest of relations, of the most delicate difference within affinity, between two, the deepest and most real of all realities really known to us, our finite, durational spirit, and the infinite, eternal Spirit, God."

III.

In an impressive historical survey, the author first traces the idea of Eternity, as distinguished from the simpler one of Immortality, through the various religions and philosophies of the past. The Nirvana of Buddhism represents mainly the soul's horror of mere succession, whereas, in other Oriental religions, Eternal Life is implied in the soul's participation in the divine qualities of Brahma, and in the Eternal Light to which it attains in the teaching of Zarathustra. The spiritual outlook of the Jews, with all its sublimity, contributed less to the conception of Eternal Life (as here understood) than did that of the Greeks. The doctrine of Eternity, with its discrimination between an Eternal Now and Succession, is first clearly promulgated by Parmenides in the sixth century before Christ, and is then more fully developed by Plato, from whom it passes to the

* "Eternal Life: A Study of its Implications and Applications." By Baron Friedrich von Hügel. 8s. net. (T. and T. Clark.)

Alexandrian Jew Philo, and to the Christian Neo-Platonists, led by St. Augustine. We are given particularly suggestive chapters on "Primitive Christianity," considered under the headings of the utterances of Christ in the Synoptic Gospels, the teaching of St. Paul, and the Johannine writings, and on the "Middle Ages," as represented by St. Thomas Aquinas and Johannes Eckhart. This historical survey ends with Spinoza and Kant, the significance of the latter lying especially in his conception of Evil as something positive, as essentially "flight from, or revolt against, the light, and hence as an act or habit of the Will."

The second part, the contemporary survey, goes somewhat beyond what the title of the book promised. It is, in fact, a most illuminating summary of the chief movements of the present day, in philosophy and in life, whether for or against this experience and conception of Eternal Life. Not only philosophical speculation, but Biology, Socialism, and Institutional Religion are included. The pages devoted to Bergson are, perhaps, particularly clear and helpful.

IV.

Baron von Hügel concludes his survey with emphasising the part of the institutional element in the religious life of the soul: "Thus souls, who live an heroic spiritual life within great religious traditions and institutions, attain to a rare volume and vividness of religious insight, conviction, and reality. They can, at their best, train other souls, who are not all unworthy of such training, to a depth and tenderness of full and joyous union with God, the Eternal, which utterly surpasses, not only in quantity but in quality, what we can and do find amongst souls outside all such institutions, or not directly taught by souls trained within such traditions. And thus we find here, more clearly than in any philosopher as such, that Eternal Life consists in the most real of relations between the most living of realities—the human spirit and the Eternal Spirit, God; and in the keen sense of His Perfection, Simultaneity and Preventence, as against our imperfection, successiveness, and dependence. And we find that this sense is awakened in, and with, the various levels of our nature; in society as well as in solitude; by things as well as by persons. In such souls, then, we catch the clearest glimpses of what, for men even here below, can be and is Eternal Life."

V.

Eternal Life is thus essentially a religious experience, and only in a secondary sense a philosophical conception. It is discovered by Religion in the life of the soul, and analysed by Philosophy:—

"It is only Religion that, in this matter, has furnished man with a vivid and concrete experience and conviction of permanent ethical and spiritual value. Philosophy, as such, has not been able to do more than analyse and clarify this religious conviction, and find, within its own domain and level, certain intimations and requirements converging towards such a conviction."

We have given little more than an inadequate summary of a great book—a book remarkable no less for the lofty spirituality that pervades it than for the wide range and depth of the learning that has gained for its author his European reputation. It is a truly valuable contribution to the religious and philosophical thought of our time.

THE BURDEN OF BOOKS, AND HOW TO BEAR IT

By F. T. DALTON.

I.

IN the course of last year there were published in Great Britain (according to figures given in the Book-seller) just under 13,000 books. This is, no doubt, under the mark, for many books do not appear in the publishers' lists, and escape calculation. We can safely say that, Sundays apart, on an average, nearly fifty new books come to the birth daily, and each new book means anything from 50 to 1,000 copies. Every day of the year, then, the number of books which the public is expected to read is increasing by thousands; every day the brain of the reading class is pelted with an unceasing blinding storm of printed words; every day new thoughts or new expressions of old thoughts are added in incalculable profusion to the mental storehouse of the world.

One thing is certain—that the more rapidly and profusely that storehouse is filled up, the less valuable do its contents become. One is almost inclined to think that the greatest disaster the civilised world has ever suffered was the invention of printing. Certainly it is arguable, with less suspicion of paradox, that the amazing developments in the way of rapid printing, and in the facilities for the distribution of printed matter, are by no means an unmixed good. Is it consistent with any true ideal of culture? Does it make any culture worth having easier for the individual to attain, or more difficult? Cast the mind back two thousand years, and in the groves of classical Athens, or, later, among the literary circles of Augustan Rome, you will find the meaning of culture far better understood than it is to-day. Books, even in those days, were written and were read, but a book was the product of a rare mind. Its advent was hailed as an event; its contents were studied and discussed at leisure. The thoughtful men and women of the Platonic or the Ciceronian circle, if they woke in a world where fifty new books a day were offered for their perusal, would, we fancy, very soon have come to regard literature as one of the idols of the marketplace, and the habit of indiscriminate reading one proper to the crowd of meaner intelligences and baser minds.

II.

Or pass to an age nearer our own—the age of the Revival of Learning. The human mind was richer by centuries of thought and history than it had been in the days of ancient Rome and Athens. Books were many, literature flourished, and it was the period of great imaginative creations. Above all, it was the period of intense interest in intellectual things, and of minds enriched and chastened by reading, thought, and learning. But what would its finer spirits—Erasmus, More, Colet, Sidney—have thought of a world smothered, as we are, by an unceasing avalanche of new books, the good lost to sight amongst the bad, and none able to ensure the leisurely attention which alone can do justice to a work of merit? They also would have thought, it is to be feared, that the proper training of the mind was hard to come by in such a world.

Yet the wide dissemination of literary matter, inevitable as it has become, need not make us despair. The burden of books has to be borne; it may even be welcomed as a blessing if we know how to bear it. And the secret must be learnt from the humanists of those old days which we have just recalled. There were fewer books then, and they got the best out of them by two methods: first, the leisurely and careful perusal of a single well-chosen book or a single subject, and, secondly, by a practice, which was the chief means of education to the Greeks of old—the practice of thrashing a subject out with a friend, and bringing one mind to test and strengthen another. Both plans may seem difficult for the solitary reader anxiously seeking to know something of the riches of literature, of the bearings of the great problems of thought or history, of the strange and beautiful things in the world of nature, but, at the same time, groping his way helplessly in the vast maze of printed matter, with no guide to put him on the right path or like-minded friend with whom to compare notes of progress. But his plight is not irremediable. He has only, for instance, to become a member of such a society as the National Home-Reading Union*—the People's University, as its founder, Dr. Paton, used to call it—and, for an annual subscription amounting to about the sum he pays every day for dinner, he gets both advantages. He gets guidance as to subjects and as to books, with magazines giving help in reading them; and he is encouraged to join "reading circles" for co-operation and companionship in study.

III.

In the ocean of print which is engulfing the world there is only one way of keeping the head above water—only one way, to change the metaphor, of keeping the mind a healthy instrument and of deriving true enjoyment and real profit from reading. The one thing needful is to be systematic—not to weaken the faculty of attention and fritter away the power of thought by reading nothing but periodicals and an occasional chance novel, but to recognise that reading is an art which must be acquired; and to learn an art it is necessary, at any rate, for most people, to put oneself under a master, confident that the more guidance one has in setting out the more profitable and the more engrossing will the practice of the art become. So only can the burden of books be borne—not only without fatigue, but with willing effort that will never fail to brace and invigorate the mind.

THE OWLS

(From the French of Baudelaire)

IN the inky depths of the yew-tree's shade,
In meditation, side by side,
The owls are sitting, fiery-eyed,
Like strange gods carved in wood or jade.

There they await, immobile quite,
That melancholy hour of day
When the sun's last expiring ray
Is strangled in the grip of night.

Their attitude should teach the wise,
Who this world rightly would apprise,
Hurry and movement to despise.

Man, drunk with dreams fleeting and strange,
This chastisement for ever bears:
The love of movement and of change.

* Address: 12, York Street, Adelphi, London, W.C.

WAS BURNS A MODERN DANTE ?

MATTHEW ARNOLD once, in a famous essay, read a little lecture to Scotsmen on their attitude to Burns. They were duly warned against the "bias of the personal estimate," and reminded that they are so familiar with the Burns world, the world of "Scotch drink, Scotch religion, and Scotch manners," that they have a "tenderness" for it, and "meet its poet half way." The result is that their enthusiasm is not always expended on "the real Burns." Arnold certainly had no tenderness for the Burns world. He found it often "harsh, sordid and repulsive." And he bade us seek the "real Burns," not in the citizen of the Burns world, but in the poet who triumphed over it, not in such lines as "Leeze me on drink," or "For a' that and a' that," or even in

"To make a happy fireside clime
To weans and wife,
That's the true pathos and sublime
Of human life," but rather in "the four immortal lines" beginning, "Had we never loved sae kindly," in the ironic refrain, "Whistle ower the lave o't," and in "Tam o' Shanter" and "The Jolly Beggars." In the last named, Burns masters his world. It is a squalid, hideous, and even bestial world, yet such is the "breadth, truth and power" of its treatment that the result is "a superb poetic success."

There is chastening material in this criticism for those charged at this season with Burns dinner orations. A glimpse of the Burns world through Oxford spectacles may not be without its uses. It must not be thought, however, that Arnold's criticism—though not without the delightfully characteristic touch of the airy oracular—lacked real loyalty to Burns. It was Arnold who spoke of the poet's "profound and passionate melancholy," of his "infinite pathos," of his "benignity," of his "archness and wit," and of the "flawless manner" of his masterpieces. The most perfervid Scot may well take a word of warning from such a source.

Mr. Oliver Elton, our latest writer on Burns, has no hard things to say of the Burns world, though his name does not suggest that he is qualified—in the Arnold sense—to regard it with tenderness, or to meet its poet half way. He goes all the way, from the south to the northern shrine, and in his book ("A Survey of English Literature, 1780-1840." Arnold.)—a book, it ought to be said, as remarkable for its learning as for its insight—keeps nothing back in the way of loyal homage. "Our southern share in his glory is made good," he writes, "and the very freedom and intensity of his natural genius serves to lower, not to stiffen, those barriers which history and religion have raised between the two branches of our race." He does indeed remark that the "endless fatuous admirers of the 'bard' require at least one such shock in every generation as those administered by Jeffrey and Henley." But, this generation having received its shock, it is no part of Mr. Elton's intention to repeat it, or add to its strength. His aim is critical, in the greater sense of that word—the sense of which men became aware when they turned from the work of Jeffrey to that of Carlyle—i.e., it is interpretative and constructive. Jeffrey stated the "gentlemanly objections" to Burns. He spoke the last word of cultured, eighteenth century Scotland in regard to the prodigy from Ayrshire. Carlyle saw the stature and force of the man. When he turned aside to drink of the "little Valclusa Fountain," and to "muse among the rocks and pines" that guarded it, he led the world in the right way of understanding Burns. But Wordsworth had been there before him.

"He rules 'mid winter snows, and when
Bees fill their hives,
Deep in the general heart of man
His power survives."

So had Lamb, whom Mr. Bradley does not hesitate to call the best critic of the nineteenth century. Lamb would kiss his copy of Burns as he put it back on the shelf. And Arnold, Stevenson, Lord Rosebery, and William Watson followed in Carlyle's footsteps.

"For 'mid an age of dust and dearth,
Once more there bloomed immortal worth.
There, in the strong, splenetic North,
The spring began.
A mighty mother had brought forth
A mighty man."

"His true life," said Lord Rosebery, "began with his death; with the body passed all that is gross and impure; the clear spirit stood revealed, and soared at once to its accepted place among the fixed stars in the firmament of the rare immortals."

In the new world of criticism made accessible by Carlyle, Professor Elton moves with freedom and zest, and, though he writes as a historian of literature, his treatment is far from being academic. As to Burns the man, he attempts neither to whitewash him nor whine over him; he does not "proceed to the insolence of excessive compassion." Burns is for him, chiefly, a living force in literature. His wide "Survey" enables him to see the poet in relation to his own and previous ages—to the classicism of Pope, the romantic movement of which Blake and Cowper were forerunners, and to the long history of Scottish poetry. But in the width of the survey he does not miss the man himself, or undervalue the personal contribution. "There is nothing new or mysterious in Burns except his perfection." The secret of this perfection, Mr. Elton goes on to say, is an open one. It is Burns's "power to represent everything, every feeling as it comes, and just as it is, and to have done with it." It is this gift that entitles Burns to be called a classic. One finds in his work what a recent writer on the Greek genius has called "the note of directness." From the school of Pope, Burns learned something in the way of economy, swiftness, and plainness of speech, and of compactness of structure; but his gift was his own. He is a classic, not merely because he says certain things in such a way that they do not need to be said again, but because his art is not a medium in which life is refracted, but the very voice of life itself.

Equally suggestive are Mr. Elton's remarks on Burns's relation to the romantic movement. He was part of that movement, for he was a child of his age, and the spirit of the revolution moved in him. Yet he was "anti-romantic" in temper, because there was consummated in him the realism and humour that had always characterised Scottish poetry. Romanticism, as a reaction against rationalism, tended to the vague and abstract. But humour is the sworn foe of the abstract. A ghost may be solemn or terrifying, but never funny. The moment we laugh at a ghost we know that we are laughing at a flesh and blood man masquerading as a spirit. In Scott's humorous pictures of peasant life he is realist rather than romanticist. So with

(Continued on page 462.)

W.M. CAFFYN.

ROBERT BURNS, NATUS 1759, OBIT 1796

Burns. He laughs at his witches and warlocks. They dance "hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys and reels," and have "life and mettle in their heels." Burns even pokes fun at the devil. Tam o' Shanter had experiences of the supernatural, but they were not awe-inspiring. Any one of the Jolly Beggars might have shared them. As Mr. Elton neatly puts it, Burns was a comic Dante.

Burns knew much about the passions. Unfortunately, he never knew a great passion. He had too many Beatrices, and life does not give its best through syndicates. Unfortunately, too, religion in Burns's day could not make the sort of appeal to him that a man of his temperament needed. In a time of barren controversy religion appealed to his anger, his satire, to his natural Scottish combativeness, never to his imagination. There was nothing gracious or humanely compelling in the face it turned toward him. The strong feeling of the man was in instinctive revolt against dogma. But the waves of feeling, dashing against the rocks of logical propositions, were driven back in confusion. Much that was finest in Burns found no proper channel.

It is well to have, from time to time, a fresh and sound study of Burns, such as Mr. Elton or Mr. Secombe gives us. Such a study is even more useful than the "shocks" to which Mr. Elton refers. How fittingly, e.g., Mr. Elton speaks of the songs: "To pass from Burns's poems to his songs is to pass to something purer, more piercing and aerial . . . from the earth to the air or the fire. . . . He captures the 'whole breath and finer spirit' of a nation which, more than any other, is inconceivable without its songs. . . . He really became the singing soul of his people." Here is something fine and true for our Burns orators. In his songs Burns caught what is hidden from the wise and prudent, and revealed to those whose hearts are open to the simplicities, to the appeal of life itself.

"When day is gane, and night is come,
And a' folk bound to sleep,
I think on him that's far awa'
The lee lang night, and weep,
My dear—
The lee lang night and weep."

"THE MOSS TROOPERS" *

IN "The Moss Troopers" Mr. S. R. Crockett takes us back to his beloved Galloway, and that is something to be thankful for, even though we look in vain in this new novel for the verve and glamour of "The Raiders." The period with which it deals (early nineteenth century) is less remote than might be inferred from the title. But a hundred years ago the age of wild adventure was not yet over on Solway's shores. Napoleon still kept the British Government, Army, and Navy fully occupied, and the "free traders" made the best use of their opportunities. Daring smugglers in Galloway, dissipated princes in London, and a headstrong heroine of a familiar type are the chief characters in Mr. Crockett's story, which, if somewhat loose in construction and unconvincing in tenor, is pleasingly easy to read, and invested with a certain homely charm. Indeed, the most salient quality of this writer is his faculty for reproducing the domestic atmosphere, and painting for us scenes of family life with which we are all familiar. His heroines are invariably fresh, healthy girls, and if they are not complex, they are at least straightforward.

* "The Moss Troopers." By S. R. Crockett. 6s. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

WINTER THOUGHTS—DARTMOOR GAOL

NOW grey Winter throws its pall
Over those within the wall;
Seals as with strong iron band
All the green and green-brown land.
Blackabrook now flows beneath
A strong firm-spread icy sheath,
And no delicate sun breath
Back to view awhile shall thaw
That fair stream the summer saw.
Cows and sheep are safe in byres,
Free men crouch o'er warm turf fires;
Only children merrily go,
Bless the frost, desire the snow,
And with multitudinous pranks
Give the Lord of Winter thanks.
Frozen-footed, frozen-lipped,
All mankind is Winter-gripped,
And, not worse dealt with are we,
Who, as all with eyes can see,
Live within our prison cells
Snug as walnuts in their shells.
Comrades mine, be bold and brave,
Winter takes what Summer gave;
Soon the eager Spring will come,
Birds will sing that now are dumb.
That dear stream which frozen is
Will upraise its harmonies,
And give back for me and you
To the Heaven, the Heaven's blue.
He, who leads the cattle forth,
Routs the wind-blast from the North,
Starts the sap into the bud
With the flow of His own blood.
When the first lamb sucks its ewe
The earth-frolic starts anew;
All the grey is doffed and donned
The sweet shine of leaf and pond.
If to-day the feeble fret
That the Winter tarries yet,
Bid them look at yonder wood,
Where, in patient hardihood,
The strong forest folk endure
The wild rigours of the moor.
English trees to Englishmen
Should preach hope and beauty, when Joy and comfort there is none
From the pale unkindly sun.
Unto us in gaol, 'tis sooth,
There is rough as well as smooth.
Worser ills, the felon finds
In his trade, than ruthless winds,
Or with these as well contends
As his perilous way he wends.
Comrades mine, be brave and bold,
Earth grows young as earth grows old:
Though to-day the Winter stands
Monarch of the barren lands,
In a month or two shall shine
The sun that makes the water wine,
The young trees dance, and the young boys
Shatter Heaven with their noise.
Then shall we throw off restraint,
Lose the odour and the taint,
Quit the shops wherein we laze
These cold misty winter days;
And with joyance unconcealed
Seek the labours of the field,
Cleave the rock or build the wall,
Or dig peat at Greenaball;
Each in his so varied part
Doing his best with brain and heart.

THE PEACHES * * * BY ANDRÉ THEURIET

THE first time that I saw my old chum, Vital Herbelot, again after twenty-five years was at the old boys' dinner of a provincial lycée, where we had worked for our degree. Reunions of this kind are almost all alike: hand-shakings, noisy recognitions, familiarities that one is surprised to hear again after a quarter of a century's silence, melancholy and unmistakable signs of the changes years have wrought in faces and fortunes; then the formal speech by the president, the toasts, the calling up of school memories, the bitterness of which time has removed, leaving only the honeyed savour of the days when each of us held in his hand a Pandora's casket full of golden hopes.

I was tolerably surprised to find a very different Vital Herbelot from the one I remembered. I had known him slender and shy, spick and span, correct and reserved, a combination of all the amiable qualities of a young civil servant who wishes to make his way in the administration where his family has placed him. I saw a burly, large-limbed fellow, with sunburnt neck and complexion, a keen eye, and the high, clear, loud voice of a man who is not accustomed to weigh his words. With his hair cut so as to stand up straight, his English cloth suit, his fan-shaped pepper and salt beard, there was something easy, decided, and unrestrained about him which did not smack of the civil servant.

"What has happened to you?" I asked him. "Are you no longer in the service?"

"No, old man," he replied, "I am simply a farmer. I am working a fairly large estate half a league from here at Chanteraine, where I sow corn and get in a little Burgundy that I shall make you taste when you come and see me."

"Indeed!" I cried, "you, the son and grandson of bureaucrats, you who were spoken of as a model civil servant, for whom a brilliant future was predicted, you have thrown it up?"

"Indeed I have."

"How did it happen?"

"My dear fellow," he replied with a laugh, "great effects are often produced by the most trifling causes. . . . I resigned on account of two peaches."

"Two peaches?"

"Neither more nor less, and when we have had coffee, if you will go with me as far as Chanteraine, I will tell you the story."

After coffee we left the dining-room, and, as we walked along smoking a cigar beside the canal on a warm afternoon towards the end of August, my friend Vital began his story:

"You know," he said, "that I followed my father's profession, and he, an old civil servant, saw nothing to be compared with an official career. So, as soon as I had got clear of my degree, nothing was more urgent than to settle me as a supernumerary in my father's office. I had no special vocation, and meekly took to the banal highway of bureaucracy on which my father and grandfather had slowly but surely walked. I was a hard-working, well-disciplined youth, brought up from the cradle in the respect due to superiors and deference towards authority, so I was favourably noticed by my chiefs and quickly went through the first grades of promotion. When I was twenty-five years old, my director, who had taken me into his favour, made me his secretary, and my comrades envied my lot. Already they spoke of me as a coming high official and foretold the most brilliant future for me. Then I married. She was a very pretty girl, and, what is more, very good and very affectionate—but with no fortune. It was a grave wrong in the eyes of the civil service world in which I lived. They are very positive there; they scarcely see anything in marriage except a business transaction, and willingly lay down the rule that 'if the husband brings the wherewithal to breakfast, the wife should provide the dinner.' Now my wife and I together had scarcely the wherewithal for a scanty supper. There was a great outcry that I had behaved foolishly. More than one good citizen among my acquaintances declared openly that I was mad and was wantonly spoiling a good position. However, as my wife was a very pretty and very good girl, as we lived unassumingly, and by dint of economy succeeded in making both ends meet, they condoned my 'improvidence,' and the society of the place deigned to go on receiving us.

"My director was rich, loved show, and prided himself on making a good figure in the world. He often had company, gave sumptuous dinners, and from time to time invited the families of the functionaries and leading men of the town to a dance. My chief did not allow his invitations to be refused, and at his house his subordinates had to amuse themselves to order.

"Just when my wife was about to make me a father, there was a great ball at my director's, and, of course, whether I would or no, I had to put on my black coat.

"When it was time to go, my wife, while fastening the knot of my white tie, gave me many injunctions:

"It will be very fine. . . . Do not forget to keep your eyes open, so that you can tell me all the particulars: the names of the ladies who are there, their dresses and the supper menu. . . . For there will be a supper. It seems they have ordered heaps of good things from Chevet's, . . . fruit just in season; I hear of peaches costing three francs apiece. . . . Oh, those peaches! . . . Do you know, if you were nice, you would bring one home for me."

"It was in vain that I protested, showed her that it was hardly practicable, and how difficult it was for a gentleman in a black coat to put one into his pocket without the risk of being seen and put on the index. . . . The more objections I raised, the more obstinate she became in her fancy.

"On the contrary, nothing is easier. . . . In the midst of the coming and going of people at supper, nobody will perceive it. . . . You will take one as if for yourself and will hide it cleverly. . . . Don't shrug your shoulders! . . . Well, perhaps it is childish, but I want it; since I heard of those peaches I have had a great wish to taste them. . . . Promise me that you will bring me at least one. . . . Swear it! . . ."

"How can one oppose a categorical refusal to the woman one loves? . . . I ended by murmuring a vague promise, and made haste to be off; but just as I was turning the handle of the door, she called me back. I saw her large blue eyes turned towards me, shining with greed, and she cried once more:

"You promise me? . . ."

"A very fine ball: flowers everywhere, new dresses, an excellent orchestra. The mayor, the chief magistrate, the officers of the garrison, all the upper crust were there. My director had spared nothing to give splendour to this feast, the honours of which were so graciously done by his wife and daughter. At midnight supper was served, and the dancers went in couples into the dining-room. I went in trembling, and hardly had I entered when I saw, in a good position in the middle of the table, the famous peaches sent by Chevet.

"They were magnificent! Placed in a pyramid in a Luneville china basket, daintily arranged and set in vine-leaves, they proudly displayed their appetising colour, in which dark-red tints streaked the greeny whiteness of the velvet skin. Only to see them, one guessed the fine, perfumed savour of the rosy, melting flesh. My eye caressed them at a distance, and I thought of the joyful exclamations that would welcome me on my return if I managed to take home a specimen of the exquisite fruit. They aroused general admiration; the more I looked at them, the more my desire took the shape of a fixed idea, and the stronger the resolve to take one or two sank into my brain. . . . But how? . . . The servants kept good guard round these rare and costly delicacies. My chief had kept for himself the pleasure of personally offering his peaches to some privileged guests. From time to time, at a sign from him, a steward delicately took a peach, cut it with a silver-bladed knife, and presented the two halves on a Sèvres plate to the chosen person. I greedily followed this manoeuvre, and saw, with trembling, how the pyramid dwindled. But the contents of the basket were not exhausted. Either the consignment had been skilfully executed, or it was discreetly managed, but when the people, recalled by a prelude from the orchestra, hastened back to the ball-room, there still remained half a dozen fine peaches on the bed of green leaves.

"I followed the crowd, but it was only a feint. I had left my hat in a corner—a tall hat that had considerably worried me all the evening. I went back under the pretext of taking it, and, as I to some extent belonged to the house, the servants did not suspect me. Besides, they were busy in carrying to the kitchen the plate and glasses which had been used at supper, and, for a moment, I found myself alone near the sideboard. There was not a minute to be lost. After a furtive glance right and left, I approached the basket and quickly rolled two peaches into my hat, where I rammed them in with my handkerchief; then—very calm outwardly, very dignified, although my heart was beating terribly—I left the dining-room, carefully placing the opening of my hat against my chest and keeping it there by passing my right hand into the opening of my waistcoat, which gave me a very majestic pose almost Napoleonic.

"My plan was to cross the ball-room quietly, to take French leave, and, once outside, to carry home in triumph the two peaches wrapped up in my handkerchief.

"It was not so easy, as I had thought. The cotillon was just begun. All round the room was a double row of black coats and elderly ladies, surrounding a second circle formed by the dancers' chairs; then, in the middle, a large open space, where the couples were waltzing. It was this space that I had to cross to reach the door of the ante-chamber.

"I timidly inserted myself into the spaces between the groups, I wound among the chairs with the suppleness of an adder. . . . At every instant I trembled lest a brutal elbow-jog should upset the position of my hat and make my peaches fall. I felt them tossing about inside it, and went hot all over. At last, after many difficulties and many frights, I entered the circle just as they were arranging a new figure. The lady is placed in the centre of the gentlemen, who go round with their backs to her; she has to hold a hat in her hand and put it on the head of the cavalier with whom she wishes to waltz as he passes. Scarcely had I taken two steps, when my chief's daughter, who was leading the cotillon with a young municipal councillor, called out:

"A hat! We want a hat!"

"At the same time she perceived me with my stove-pipe glued to my chest; I met her look and all my blood froze.

"Ah!" said she, 'you come at the right time, Monsieur Herbelot! . . . Quick, your hat!'

"Before I could stammer out a single word, she seized my hat . . . so abruptly that, at the same instant, the peaches rolled on to the floor, dragging with them my handkerchief and two or three vine leaves. . . .

"You can imagine the scene. The young ladies laughed in their sleeves to see my misdeed and my discomfiture; my chief frowned, the grave elderly people pointed at me and whispered, and I felt my legs giving way. . . . I should have liked to sink into the floor and disappear.

"The girl squeezed her lips to repress a burst of laughter, then, returning my hat:

"Monsieur Herbelot," she said in an ironical tone, 'pick up your peaches!'

"Laughter then broke out from all corners of the room: even the servants held their sides, and I fled, pale, haggard, staggering, overwhelmed with confusion; I was so upset that I could hardly find the door, and I went away with death in my heart to tell my wife of my disaster.

"The next day the story went round the town. When I entered my office my comrades greeted me with a 'Herbelot, pick up your peaches!' which made a blush come to my face. I could not venture into the street without hearing a mocking voice murmur behind me: 'It is the gentleman with the peaches!' The place was no longer tenable, and a week later I sent in my resignation.

"An uncle of my wife's had an agricultural establishment near my native town. I begged him to take me as his assistant. He agreed, and we installed ourselves at Chanteraine. . . . What need I say more? . . . I set to work with determination, getting up at dawn and not minding difficulties. It seems I had more vocation for farming than for quill-driving, for in a short time I became an agriculturist in earnest. The estate prospered so well that on his death our uncle left it to us by his will. Since then I have improved it and brought it to the satisfactory state you will see it in. . . ."

We had reached Chanteraine. We went through an orchard full of fruit. The branches were bent down to the ground under their load of apples, pears and plums. At the end of this enclosure a sloping meadow went down to the blue river, beyond which rose a hill-side covered with vines, where the grapes were beginning to swell and where the thrushes were singing. On the left, behind the trees, the noise of a threshing machine indicated the position of the barns, and when we had crossed the kitchen garden, we perceived the white front of the farmhouse, where climbed an espalier covered with fine ripening peaches.

"You see," said Vital Herbelot, "I pay my respects to the peaches. I owe my happiness to them. But for them I should have been still a civil servant, trembling at the slightest frown from my superiors, increasing the already too numerous band of those who have great difficulty in making both ends meet, and even refusing myself the joys of paternity."—
Translated by A. C. Wood.

LITERARY NOTES

PUBLISHERS are now busy preparing their spring lists. Some of the leading firms, Messrs. Macmillan, for instance, have already announced their chief books; others will be ready with their lists before the end of this month. One ought not to prophesy in these matters, but there seems every prospect of the approaching season being an exceptional one, both as regards output and quality. It is not likely, however, that the spring season will witness the publication of any books of outstanding importance.

* * * * *

One of the most interesting announcements is that we are to have a sumptuous edition of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's works in prose and verse, newly arranged and corrected by the author. But I fear that the Bombay Edition, the publication of which Messrs. Macmillan will begin in April, is not likely to appeal to readers of EVERYMAN, as it is to be limited to 1,050 copies, and will occupy twenty-three royal octavo volumes. The books will be printed in the well-known Florence type, the paper will be hand-made, and the first volume of every set will contain an autograph signature by the author. I sometimes wonder who buys these costly editions, but that there is a market for them has been clearly proved; and I have no doubt that a thousand Kipling enthusiasts will be found for the purchase of the Bombay Edition.

* * * * *

Among other works to come from Messrs. Macmillan are a further instalment—the third—of Dr. Sven Hedin's account of his last expedition, "Trans-Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet"; two works by Maurice Hewlett—"The Lore of Proserpine" and "Helen Redeemed, and Other Poems"; and the two concluding parts of the third edition of Dr. J. G. Frazer's brilliant work, "The Golden Bough." Messrs. Macmillan are also bringing out a new edition of Professor Saintsbury's "Short History of English Literature," arranged in five parts. This will be welcome news to many students who have learned to prize this most useful manual. To my mind, one of its valuable features is the system of inter-chapters providing a chain of historical summary as to general points. I hope it will be retained in the new edition, which I take to be the fourth.

* * * * *

A comprehensive history of India on the model of the Cambridge Modern History is announced by the Cambridge Press. The work is to be complete in six volumes, two volumes being devoted to each of the main periods. As in the case of the Cambridge Modern History, the services of many competent writers will be enlisted. There is room for a work of this character, but I should say a compact and up-to-date history of India from the earliest period in one volume is even more needed.

* * * * *

Elphinstone's work reached a ninth edition in 1905, but as it was published so long ago as 1841, it is useless for modern history. Meadow Taylor's student's manual is excellent, but it requires bringing up to date; and the same remark applies to the popular summary of Marshman's "History of India," which, if I mistake not, ends with Lord Mayo's administration in 1870. We have several admirable books on British India, but what is wanted is a clear, reliable, and well-informed survey of the whole course of Indian history which could be compressed into a single volume.

* * * * *

Several important additions will be made to Dickens literature during the next few weeks, and one that interests me much is Mr. W. Walter Crotch's book, "Charles Dickens: Social Reformer," which Messrs. Chapman and Hall are to publish next week. Considering how much Dickens did to further social reform, I am surprised that a volume bearing this title has not been published long ago. Mr. Crotch, the one-time editor of Household Words, and a founder of the Dickens Fellowship, will endeavour to indicate the wide range of the novelist's social sympathies, chapters being devoted to education, housing, sanitary, parliamentary, prison, legal, and poor law reforms, etc.

* * * * *

Mr. Frederic Harrison seems to be renewing his literary youth. On my shelves are no fewer than six volumes which he has published during the last half-dozen years since he attained the age of seventy-five, and that does not represent his total output during this period. Now, aged eighty-one, he has sent forth "The Positive Evolution of Religion," which is intended to be the final summary of his philosophy. I have not seen his latest work, but the bulk of the material of the earlier books is reprinted from magazines. This fact notwithstanding, one marvels at the literary industry of a man of Mr. Harrison's years. I hope, however, that Mr. Harrison's latest book is not going to be his last, for a more refreshing and accomplished writer on "Men—Books—Cities—Art" (to quote the sub-title of his "Memories and Thoughts") it would be difficult to find.

* * * * *

Mr. John Masefield has just finished a long poem called "The Daffodil Fields," which will appear in the February number of the English Review. Mr. Masefield thinks it contains some of the best poetry he has written, and it will be interesting to see whether this judgment is upheld by the critics.

* * * * *

Mr. G. K. Chesterton makes excursions into so many fields of human knowledge that one never knows where he may turn up. Only the other day I read an article of his in a church magazine in which he held out the pleasing prospect of a new "Established Church, armed, like the Inquisition, with the most violent engines of earthly government." I now learn that he is about to invade the field of eugenics with a book which Messrs. Cassell are to publish immediately. Mr. Chesterton intends to deal categorically with the various aspects of the subject and to give the supporters of the theory of eugenics a very bad time.

* * * * *

I observe that a bronze statue of Carlyle will shortly be erected on a prominent site in Edinburgh. Such a project has been before Carlyle's countrymen for a number of years, but it has never taken practical shape owing to lack of funds. It does seem a singular fact that one of the greatest of Scotsmen should be without any memorial in the capital of his native country—the city, too, in which he spent some of the happiest days of his life. Be that as it may, a London sculptor has offered to provide the statue if a suitable site can be found, and I understand that the city authorities are favourably entertaining the proposal.

X. Y. Z.

MASTERPIECE OF THE WEEK

ROUSSEAU'S "EMILE"*

BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

ROUSSEAU'S "Emile" is one of the strangest paradoxes of the whole history of literature. It is a book composed by a man in the grip of a fatal mental disease, yet it is one of the sanest and wisest books ever written on the conduct of life. It is the work of a Bohemian and a vagabond who had sent his own children to a foundling hospital, yet it remains to this day the most stimulating and the most inspiring treatise on the theory and practice of education. It is the utterance of the last consistent Protestant of the greatest of the children of Calvin, who, unlike modern Protestants, protested all his life, and yet it is a work essentially catholic and universal.

On its publication in 1762, the powers, temporal and spiritual, took sudden alarm. "Emile" was burnt by order of Parliament. It was condemned in a special charge by the Archbishop of Paris, and the author narrowly escaped imprisonment, and had only just time to seek refuge in his native Switzerland. And Church and State had good reason to be alarmed, for no single book did more to overthrow the old monarchy and to hasten on the advent of the French Revolution. Its influence was immediate, it was universal, and it was permanent. Educational topics became the fashion. Mothers awakened to a sense of their responsibilities; aristocratic ladies deserted their salons for the nursery, and interrupted their receptions to suckle their babies. Rousseau advocated a return to nature, and a return to the country, and lo! the upper classes left Versailles and Paris for a simple life of rural pursuits. Rousseau recommended that every child should be taught a manual trade, and lo! poor King Louis XIV. became a locksmith and Marie Antoinette built herself a dairy-farm in the Petit Trianon. Rousseau preached the creed of the Savoyard priest, and lo! Robespierre made this creed the religion of the State. Wonderful miracle of the literary art, which thus subjected to the magic influence of the same potent mind both the old Aristocracy and the new Democracy which sent that old Aristocracy to the scaffold! And that influence of "Emile" has continued down to our own times. A hundred and fifty years have not exhausted its fecundity. Wherever there has been an educational revival in the nineteenth century, we can trace it directly or indirectly to a study of Rousseau. Some years ago, in a remote village of the Russian plain, Tolstoy confessed to the writer of these lines that it was Rousseau who first started him on his career as a social reformer.

II.

The first quality which strikes us in "Emile" is its lofty idealism. No teacher who reads the book—and it ought to be in the hands of every instructor of youth—will enter on his calling with a light heart. Few thinkers have done more to make us realise the formidable responsibilities which are attached to the noblest of professions, for that profession demands not merely intellectual ability, but the sacrifice and dedication and surrender of the whole man. What Rousseau expects of a teacher is not a knowledge of books, but a knowledge of the child. Rousseau is no doctrinaire; he would laugh at our endless pedantic arguments on the exact methods and subjects which are best suited for children. All subjects are bad in the hands of incompetent teachers, and the value of even the best methods almost entirely depends on the value of the teacher. Whatever subjects or methods may be adopted, the condition of success is that a teacher shall study and respect the individuality of his pupil, that he shall draw out the powers latent and dormant in the juvenile soul.

III.

The lofty idealism of Rousseau is combined with the most minute realism. It is precisely because Rousseau possesses such high aims that his teaching is so concrete and so scientific, for it is obvious that such a concrete knowledge can only be gained through sympathy and imagination. To a mere pedant, however learned, the soul of a child will never yield its secrets. "Emile" has been called the Romance of Education, and it must be confessed that it is often a wild and Utopian romance, but this does not prevent the book itself from being intensely true. Its imaginary characters, Emile, Sophie, and the Savoyard priest, are only an ingenious but necessary device which gives point to the treatment of educational problems. Most writers on education are content to give us an abstract argument. On the contrary, Rousseau is always definite. He does not only say what is to be done, but how it is to be done. He likes to dramatise his lessons. He does not evade any difficulties. He condescends to the humblest and the most minute details of infant hygiene and diet and clothing. We hear a great deal to-day about child-study, and about the application of psychology to education, but how insignificant is the amount which we have added to the pioneer work of the Genevese thinker. With all our much-vaunted methods, specialists will still find more valuable suggestions and observations in "Emile" than in the vast majority of treatises of our modern pedagogues.

IV.

With all this wealth of detail, Rousseau never loses sight of general laws and principles, and the most important of those laws is the law of mental development. Rousseau has anticipated by a hundred years the theory of evolution in its relation to the education of children. He is never tired of reminding us that education must not only vary with every child, but it must be adapted to every stage of childhood. The whole plan and scheme of the book is based on a scheme of "progressive" training: first the education of the senses, then the education of the intellect, then the education of the feelings, to culminate in the education of religion and citizenship. For the sake of method and exposition, Rousseau may have driven too far a division of those processes which in real life are not successive but simultaneous. Like every discoverer of an important truth, Rousseau may have made too much of his discovery, but he is undoubtedly right in his general contention that education must be considered as a succession of processes, as a gradual unfolding of several activities, and that the higher activities must be built up on a secure foundation of the lower. Even to-day there would be fewer failures in our schools if teachers did more carefully keep in mind that great principle of progressive education. We would not then see, as I have recently seen, the "Georgics" of Virgil—a treatise on the technique of agriculture—taught in a Scottish school to little boys of twelve, nor would we see the "Princess" of Tennyson inflicted on boys of fourteen.

* An excellent translation of "Emile" has recently appeared in Everyman's Library. Lord Morley devotes no less than a hundred pages to a discussion of the book.

V.

The fifty pages expounding the "Creed of the Savoyard Curate" ("Profession de Foi du Vicaire Savoyard") have given rise to more heated controversy than any other work of Rousseau, except the "Contrat Social." Those pages still remain unsurpassed as a plea for a natural, non-dogmatic, universal religion. All our "New Theologians" are only repeating what Rousseau has said once for all in simple, rhythmic, impassioned prose. The developments on the Existence of God, on the Immortality of the Soul, on the Still Small Voice of Conscience, on the Virtue of Toleration, on the Majesty of the Gospel, are as fresh and impressive to-day as when they were published in 1762. It is, therefore, little wonder that the Savoyard Vicar should have had disciples innumerable, in literature as well as in real life. Herder and Lavater, Kant and Fichte, Madame de Stäel and Madame Necker, and Jean Paul and Pestalozzi have all been following in the wake of Jean Jacques. The Priest in the "Atala" of Chateaubriand, the Country Vicar of Balzac, Jocelyn of Lamartine, the Bishop in Victor Hugo's "Misérables" are all replicas of Rousseau's Ideal Priest.

VI.

It is easy to point out the obvious shortcomings of "Emile," nor is it difficult to detect traces of the mental disorder which was so soon to overcloud and finally to overwhelm the noble intellect of the Genevan philosopher. Those who believe in the equality of sexes cannot approve of the training given to Sophie. Those who believe in stern discipline will be severe in their condemnation of a "negative" education, where liberty threatens to degenerate into anarchy. Those who believe that religious education cannot be started too soon will point out the grave danger of postponing it until adolescence. Of course, any educational system which ignores father and mother, and human fellowship, must be highly artificial. "Emile" abounds in psychological errors, but those errors are generally too obvious to be dangerous, and his most conspicuous blunders are only a reaction against the tyranny of the teacher armed with the rod and against the tyranny of the preacher armed with the Shorter Catechism. Even the mistakes of a man of genius and of an enthusiastic reformer are more fruitful than the commonplaces of pedantry. It is only when we strike a balance of the blemishes which everybody can see, and of the inspired truths which Rousseau has been first to proclaim, that we shall realise the value of one of the imperishable monuments of modern literature.

THE MAKING OF IRISH CHARACTER *

THE title of this book is not happily chosen. The work might more appropriately have been called "The Making of Irish Character," for its main object is to describe the "very curious and very unfavourable conditions" under which the modern Irish character has been formed. The writer starts with two assumptions. The first is, that the present condition of

*"The Beginnings of Modern Ireland." By Philip Wilson. 12s. 6d. net. (Maunsell.)

Ireland ("which affords a most humiliating contrast to that of almost every other country with a pretence to civilisation") is one of political disease. The second is, that the causes of this condition are traceable to the past history of the country. The first proposition is, in his view, indisputable. He therefore concentrates attention on the second, which is "less generally acknowledged."

In this volume he endeavours to show how the conquest of Ireland during the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary influenced the development of Irish character. A second volume will carry the narrative down to the close of the Tudor period. Though not impartial, the book is written in an historical spirit. It is quite evident that Mr. Wilson has made a careful study of the original authorities. Indeed, they are a little obtrusive. A considerable portion of the narrative is derived from materials existing only in manuscript, while the remainder is based upon expensive and not easily accessible works. We could have wished for fewer lengthy extracts from official and other contemporary documents, as these rather detract from the readableness of the book. At the same time, this method of writing history, as the author well says, has one obvious advantage. It places the facts before the reader in the words of the original authorities.

In an elaborate introduction, Mr. Wilson expresses opinions on the general aspects of the subject which, if not always convincing, are, at all events, interesting and novel. He begins by characterising the theory which traces Irish misfortune to the ineradicable defects of the Celtic character as—"at once the most widespread, the most pernicious, and the most absurd." Historical evidence, he maintains, demolishes a doctrine dear to the heart of many English writers upon Ireland. But Mr. Wilson goes further. He emphatically denies that the inhabitants of Ireland are mainly or exclusively of Celtic origin. He regards it as an indisputable fact that from the time of the great plantation of Ulster the non-Celtic Irish have been numerically superior, and he argues that this population has contributed its full share of the political and social maladies of the country.

Equally interesting, but also controversial, is the view that "what is popularly called the disloyalty of Ireland cannot be ascribed to any irreconcilable antipathy between the Celtic and Teutonic races." In support of this contention, Mr. Wilson compares the history of Ireland with that of other Celtic and non-Celtic peoples. He instances Wales and the Scottish Highlands, where, notwithstanding the fact that the Celtic blood has been subjected to little foreign admixture, the inhabitants for at least a century and a half have been peaceable and law-abiding. On the other hand, disorders essentially similar to those of Ireland have, it is affirmed, been found in every community which has been governed as Ireland was governed until within comparatively modern times.

It is only fair to Mr. Wilson to say that, although he makes much of the misgovernment of Ireland, he does not regard the Irish character as immaculate. On the contrary, he believes it chargeable with grave faults, which have had the most baneful influence on Irish history. He repudiates the notion that the shortcomings of Irishmen are precisely those which are generally attributed to them by English writers.

Mr. Wilson is an Irishman, and he brings to his task certain prepossessions which hardly place him in the most favourable position for judging fairly the situation. But he has a point of view which was well worth stating. Moreover, he elucidates it with the aid of valuable historical data and considerable argumentative skill.

LETTERS TO LIVING AUTHORS

I.—TO ANTHONY HOPE, ESQ.

SIR,—You are to contemporary society what Thackeray was to the society of his day, the most representative Englishman of letters. No function, from a Court ceremonial to a theatrical garden-party, is complete without your presence; no new literary club is formed without the founders urging you to join it; no literary dinner is entirely satisfactory unless you deliver one of those delightful little speeches for which you are famous.

It is, however, as a novelist that you are most widely known, and I venture to congratulate you on having given pleasure to hundreds of thousands, nay, to millions of readers during the score of years you have been before the public. With your earliest books you appealed, I think, mainly to the large body that is usually dismissed as "the general reader." "Mr. Witt's Widow," "Half a Hero," "Father Stafford," and "A Man of Mark," to mention some of these, had promise, and I, sir, who have read every line you have written, can still turn to them and re-read them with pleasure. They are vastly interesting as the work of your 'prentice days, written in the brave days when you were in your twenties. You always have a story to tell, and you always tell it well; your characters are admirably drawn; and you were born with the gift of style. A sense of humour pervades even your first books, but perhaps it was only with the publication of the "Dolly Dialogues" in the columns of the Westminster Gazette in 1894 that you disclosed the full flavour of your delicate wit.

While all literary England was acclaiming you as a master of dialogue, you published "The Prisoner of Zenda," and sprang at a bound into a world-wide popularity. In that work you gave us a new style of romance, a romance of the present day, in which the characters with which you peopled your imaginary kingdom of Ruritania were of real flesh and blood, not the absurd puppets that had figured in the works of the older school. Yet "The Prisoner of Zenda" has a fault that innumerable readers, myself among the number, have deplored: it is too short. We wanted more of Rupert Rassendyl and the Princess Flavia, more of Captain Sapt, more, too, of Black Michael; and our objection, which I venture to hope you will not take in bad part, was not entirely removed by the publication of a sequel, "Rupert of Hentzau." With "The Prisoner of Zenda" you founded a school. A large number of novelists began to imitate you in this vein; but they shared the well-deserved fate of all literary imitators who cannot improve upon their model. The very names of their books are already forgotten, while "The Prisoner of Zenda" is as fresh to-day as when it was published sixteen years ago.

"The Prisoner of Zenda," and those of your novels that fall into the same category, "Simon Dale," "Sophy of Kravonia," and the rest, show but one side of your literary talent. You did not fully develop your powers until 1899, when you presented a delighted world with "The King's Mirror," wherein, in my humble opinion, you combined those gifts of wit and humour, of pathos and romance, and of characterisation, of which you had already shown yourself possessed, and to them added an insight into human nature so deep and so rare as to surprise even your most ardent admirers. To "spot" masterpieces is a game popular among critics, and, sir, when it comes to my turn to declare my hand, I, to borrow an illustration from the field of green cloth, will "go nap" on "The King's Mirror."

"Quisanté," "The Intrusions of Peggy," "Double Harness," "A Servant of the Public," "The Great Miss Driver," and "Second String," to select half a dozen of your stories, each and all possess the undefinable quality of charm with which, happily for yourself and for us, you have been plentifully endowed. To take these books one by one would occupy far more space than is at my command; yet each deserves consideration. I have heard your works disparaged because, unlike some of your contemporaries, you do not deal in each with some problem of the day; because, let us say, "The Intrusions of Peggy" does not discuss the ethics of company promoting, "The God in the Car" the question of Empire, or "Second String" the problem of the unemployed. But, sir, you probably do not regard the novel as a place wherein to discuss these matters. You believe it to be the duty of the novelist to interest and to entertain. This no living novelist does better. At the same time, it is also your desire, as it has been that of every great novelist since Harry Fielding, to show, by holding the mirror up to nature, poor humanity its faults, its follies, and its foibles; and this purpose, only adumbrated in your earlier books, is, in the writings of your maturity, very clearly to be discerned by all those who read your works with that sympathy which has been declared by Coleridge to be the first essential of criticism. You are not, indeed, a fiery evangelist; but you have a healthy hatred of shams, and you attack, in a manner not less effective because it is quiet, arrogance born of pride of birth or pride of purse. With pride of intellect, however, I think you have a sneaking sympathy; but you lash those who will not love and those who are devoid of the qualities engendered by the spirit of romance.

We live in a scientific age, and love to trace the origin of all things. When we study a novelist, we ask what is his literary ancestry. Your literary forbears are not such as to make you blush, for, prominent among them, are Sterne and Thackeray. From Thackeray you have inherited the gift of a wide tolerance that enables you to look benignly upon mankind; from Sterne you have inherited your rare gift of dialogue and that touch of whimsical fancy which underlies all your writings. There are conversations in your books that are pure Sterne, and if that great master had not written in the eighteenth century I doubt if in the twentieth century we should have had Mr. Jenkinson Nield or Mr. Jack Rock, or the most delightful scenes in "Second String," or any part at all of "The Intrusions of Peggy." If works of fiction are read in another and a better world, I think the two great novelists, whose influence I am sure you would proudly own, must look down upon their disciple with pride and affection.

You have presented us with a picture-gallery upon the wide range of which again and again we cast our eyes delightedly. That range extends from the actors and music-hall singers to statesmen, from men of the world to Esmond-esque gentlemen and noble-hearted ladies. You have written many delightful books, instinct with charm, and for all these we are grateful. For my part, I leave it to the next generation to thank you for "The King's Mirror."—I am, sir, yours faithfully,
LEWIS MELVILLE.

CORRESPONDENCE

LAND REFORM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It seems to me that private ownership of land, whether by landlords or peasant proprietors, is a thoroughly vicious principle. Hence the Napoleonic testamentary expedient and the Chestertonian peasant State are irrelevant. The Conservative party's solution of small holdings is merely the great landed proprietors' attempt at temporising and at the same time enhancing the rent-rolls of their estates. The taxation of land values, again, is little better than useless, because the landlord, in virtue of his supreme economic position, is able to make his tenants pay the tax by raising the rent. If the tenant is a tradesman he makes his customer pay extra for his goods. The customer, if he is in receipt of wages or a salary, cannot make anyone else pay—so he pays the land tax. The single tax also fails if we follow up the argument after Euclid's fashion, with a "much more therefore."

The only solution that remains is that of land nationalisation: and it is the only rational one. The State should acquire the land from its present owners by purchasing it. With all due respect to those worthy persons who give rein to their virtuous indignation against the land-grabbing propensities of the feudal baronage, I beg to submit that the only expedient method by which the land may be nationalised is for the State to buy it. What if the land was stolen from the people in the past, that is no reason why we should thieve it back after so many hundreds of years! When Mr. Lloyd George's new Domesday Book is complete, we shall know the market value of every inch of land in the country, and, knowing the price, we shall be able to buy the whole country back for the people at a twenty years' purchase (or fifty years if necessary). Then good-bye to slums, rural depopulation, skyscrapers, and other similar enormities! The diabolical leasehold system shall also be abolished.—I am, sir, etc.,

Risca, Mon.

GEO. H. BOWYER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Although I believe in Socialism and am a member of the Land Nationalisation Society, I must admit that the hard facts of actual experiment can only be seen in respect of the English system of large estates, and the system of small proprietorship under what is usually known as the Code Napoléon. The single tax as a solution of the land question is absurd, and the proposal to take taxes off industry and capital will meet with the fiercest opposition from land reformers, whose chief desire in land reform is to prevent concentration of capital as well as at the same time repopulating the rural districts.

The French system is far better than that which prevails in this country. It is true that the position of the French peasant proprietor is not ideal, but he is a lord compared with the agricultural labourer in this country. It is not fair to compare the English farmer with the French peasant proprietor, but the English farmer with fifty acres absolutely his own would finish up, were he an industrious farming scientist, better than he does as a renter of hundreds of acres.

Still, I am in favour of land nationalisation; but I hope that should that system be adopted a limit will be set as to the extent of land any individual should be allowed to use. The worst system advocated is to lend public money to set up small freeholders. The truth is, the big landlords could, if they liked, settle the land question without legislation by letting small holdings at fair rents and under rational conditions. The reason why they won't do it is that they prefer sport to national welfare.—I am, sir, etc.,

A. J. MARRIOTT.

London, W.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Peasant proprietorship, despite its obvious disadvantages, seems to have attained much success on the Continent. The Scottish crofting system, although often depreciated, is in many respects an admirable solution of the land problem. The crofter, by improving the housing and soil of his holding, benefits himself, his children, and his children's children; and should bankruptcy overtake him, he or his posterity receive ample compensation. This legislation is eminently just, for it is based on the reap-what-is-sown principle. It has been found that crofting in no way tends towards the diminution of the population. Moreover, the sturdy sons of Scottish crofters are received with open arms in the colonies, because their upbringing and home life peculiarly fit them for the rigorous conditions consequent on the development of a new country.

But the crofting system, commendable as it undoubtedly is in many ways, is still capable of improvement. True, the question of succession, although by no means so formidable as in the case of peasant proprietorship, also exists in the crofting system. The capital required to work a croft is only about one-third of what is needed in a peasant estate of similar size, and it is by no means uncommon in crofting circles for the father to give a sum of money to his sons as they successively leave the home, on the distinct understanding that it shall constitute their sole inheritance. In this way, the croft, on the decease of the father, is left intact and unencumbered to the son—usually the eldest—who remained at home to assist in the farm work.

But the real blemish in the crofting system is the dearth of holdings of an average size. While the crofter can no longer look upon the harvest of the sea as a source of revenue, there has been no proportional extension of his land harvest. In crofting, too, the standard of living has advanced. But with increased responsibilities there has been no corresponding enlargement of holdings. It is significant that there should be a great number of farms with rentals between £50 and £60 (and therefore outside the pale of the Crofters' Acts) and comparatively few holdings with rentals between £30 and £50. Crofting also stands in need of systematic co-operation and improved modes of cultivation.—I am, sir, etc.,

D. B. G.

Halkirk, Caithness.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As one who professes no party, I shall watch with interest the discussion you are opening upon "Land Reform." I trust, however, that any conclusion reached on the subject will start with the assumption that, rightly or wrongly, the present system has arisen with the sanction, and, presumably, under the protection of the law, and that the man who has the misfortune to have his money invested in land is probably just as honest as the man who has it invested in railways, and that if there is an improvement in value in either case, it is just as much the work of the community in the latter instance as in the former.

The talk of "reform" so far is based upon the idea that the landowner is a pariah who has acquired what he has got by dishonesty. The fact that an increase in value in one place is counterbalanced by a decrease elsewhere is overlooked entirely. Under the system of "reform" that has been started, the unfortunate owner is harried in every way, as on the one hand he is debited for holding so-called undeveloped land, whilst on the other hand the system of taxation is calculated to prevent his developing it by depriving him of the benefits, and that, too, by a system of fictitious valuations.

If State ownership or nationalisation or any other system is desired, let it be adopted by all means, if started on a basis of honest acquisition by fair purchase and not by means of depreciating values or ruining owners.—I am, sir, etc.,

London.

VIATOR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—On the subject of Land Reform I crave a small space in your columns to propose a simple method, having in view the taxation of monopoly and acquisition by the State.

A Doomsday Book is, of course, the first necessity, and this should be accomplished by a quicker and cheaper process than the one now in operation.

First, let the landowner know that it is the intention of the State to purchase compulsorily any land that is required for national or municipal purposes, and that no private bargaining can in future be permitted if the public is the buyer. Then compel all present owners to register their properties at any values they like. Failure to register and declare the value should be followed by very heavy penalty or forfeiture.

Finally, tax the owner on his own assessment, until such time as the Government of the day are prepared to take over his ground at his own valuation.

Of course, the owner must be allowed to revise his figures once a year, and would have to be compensated for any money spent on improvements since last assessment, in the event of acquisition.—I am, sir, etc.,

H. NIMMO.

Leyton.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I should like, if I may, to remind your readers of a system of land tenure—employed in certain parts of Germany—which is a very near approach to nationalisation, and which is also conducted on a remunerative basis. Certain municipalities, some numbering over 50,000 inhabitants, have purchased the agricultural land within their boundaries; and, by charging the farmer-tenants the same rent as the previous private owners did, have received a return so great that the towns are free from rates, and, in some cases, a bonus has been returned to the cultivator in addition.—I am, sir, etc.,

ARNOLD FROBISHER.

[This letter is a good instance of the vagueness and indefiniteness which detracts a great deal from the value of the many hundreds of excellent letters which we have received on the Land Question. The writer refers to a most important experiment in land nationalisation, or, rather, "land municipalisation," attempted in Germany. Surely it would have been worth while to give a few particulars on those German experiments.—THE EDITOR.]

AN ETON EDUCATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read Mgr. Benson's last two articles on "An Eton Education," and "An Eton Master's" comments upon the first article of the three, the one which I have not read. I gather, however, from my colleague's reply that Mgr. Benson states, or implies, that in his day no allowance was made for individual temperament, and that he cannot remember a single lesson being given him in history or English. It may, therefore, interest you and him and anyone who has read his articles and has believed them to state the facts even of the education given twenty-five years ago, that Mgr. Benson himself was for a time an intending candidate for the Indian Civil Service, and that he did special history work for that end with a young master fresh from Oxford, to whom Mgr. Benson's tutor handed him over, as he was himself too busy with ordinary work to undertake the task. The book set by the Civil Service Commissioners was Hallam's "Constitutional History," and a very stodgy book it is. Neither did the boy make anything of it. But who shall say if the fault lay with the book, the teacher, or the taught? Anyway, the boy's requirement, if not temperament, was considered, and a special arrangement was made for his instruction. It may be that he also was taking up literature, but my memory of events of that date is not strong enough to state that definitely. At the present time, as "An Eton Master" has shown, far more facilities are given for special study, so that fifty-three boys out of the first hundred choose for themselves what subjects they shall take.

My colleague has traversed some statements of Mgr. Benson. Let me comment on a few more. He says that he can vaguely remember plenty of sermons. He may have forgotten some, as he has forgotten the Hallam. But is it not possible that he got profit even from the sermons which he remembers vaguely? Our body does not remember past meals precisely, though they were appreciated and did valuable work at the time. As to studying the temperament of the soul, at Eton a boy has his parents in the first place, and Mgr. Benson was particularly well off in that respect. He also has his tutor, and the free interchange of older and younger minds by reason of the tutorial system is a feature of especial value at Eton. But when Mgr. Benson's tutor, during the preparation for confirmation, asked him if he had any difficulty to discuss, the boy "really had about twenty or thirty," and, "of course, I said that I didn't think I had any." You see, he thought his tutor "might" tell his parents, and so he told a lie owing to a suspicion which was probably groundless. A suspicious or a cunning boy can always outwit a man who comes with nothing but kindness and honourable feeling; but I do not think that poor Eton is at fault, when this happens. The story about the Sunday work on page 404 is a puzzling one, as boys do not naturally put work on a master's study-table. It is collected in school. But whether or no it is given correctly in all its details, you and I can cap it by the story of the lie to the tutor on page 376.

Mgr. Benson writes of the school that nurtured him, "hardly any boys in the world fare so hardly . . . than (sic) do those educated under such a system as prevails at Eton." Hasty writing this, and hasty, ungenerous thinking! A public school, like a day-school, does "throw the responsibility upon the parents." Who else should be responsible? The school does what it can with chapel services, prayers,

(Continued on page 472.)

A New Series to be issued Monthly.

THE ART TREASURES

OF

1/- net
each No.

GREAT BRITAIN.

1/- net
each No.

Edited by C. H. COLLINS - BAKER
(Of the National Portrait Gallery).

IN this Series the publishers have aimed at giving to EVERYMAN fine reproductions of the Art Treasures in the public and private Galleries of Great Britain at a price within his reach. The scheme embraces not only paintings, but also the masterpieces, ancient and modern, of sculpture, drawing, pottery, metal-work, woodwork, ivories and Oriental Art, and the publication will be the first of its kind to appear in this or any other country. Separate collections of the various works of Art have been issued from time to time, but it is believed that this is the first attempt to give the public a representative collection of reproductions of the masterpieces of Art in the British Isles.

The most famous paintings in our National and Tate Galleries have been reproduced, and are obtainable in many forms, and therefore the pictures most familiar to EVERYMAN will be excluded, at least from the earlier issues of the Series, and possibly altogether, in order to have sufficient room for the less known but not less wonderful works that have rarely, if ever, been reproduced.

The first Number will contain the following Plates:—

THE ADORATION OF THE KINGS.

The famous "Castle Howard Mabuse." By Jan Gossaert de Mabuse.

PORTRAIT OF THE PAINTER.

Known as "The Ilchester Rembrandt," and regarded as the most important of Rembrandt's many Self-portraits.

"Group of Horsemen."

From the Parthenon Frieze. From the Elgin Collection in the British Museum.

THE HON. MRS. GRAHAM.

A Gainsborough Masterpiece in the National Gallery of Scotland.

OLD BATTERSEA BRIDGE.

An unique example of Whistler's work. From the Edmund Davis Collection.

THE ANNUNCIATION.

The wonderful Enamel Triptych of Nardon Penicaud in the Victoria and Albert Museum.

MADONNA AND CHILD.

An Ivory Statuette in the British Museum. A fine Specimen of excellent craftsmanship and sympathetic sculpture by a French Artist of the XIVth Century.

ONE SHILLING NET PER NUMBER.

SEE THE SPECIMEN PLATE PRESENTED WITH THIS ISSUE.

Ask for the Prospectus.

EACH NUMBER WILL CONTAIN NOT LESS THAN 7 PLATES.

Order No. 1 from your Bookseller or Newsagent.

A PROSPECTUS WILL BE GLADLY SENT ON RECEIPT OF A POSTCARD.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

A TON OF COAL for 2/6

*Its cost a box of Seldonite
Abundantly repays:
In every hundredweight of coal
A hundredweight it saves.*

"Seldonite" (so-called after the discoverer, Prof. Frank Seldon) doubles the heating and lasting power of Coal, Slack, or Coke. It makes one scuttleful of cheap Coal go as far and give as good a heat as two scuttles of the best Coal do in the ordinary way. It can be applied without the slightest trouble to all Coal, Slack, or Coke in a few moments, and Coal which has once been "Seldonised" retains its double strength for any length of time. By using "Seldonite" you can save half or more of your coal-money, and you will ensure greater cleanliness and comfort, because your Coal will burn to fine ashes with a complete absence of soot.

"SELDONITE" is Concentrated Heat

If you use only one ton of coal per month "Seldonite" will save you about £4 in the winter. It is guaranteed to be perfectly harmless, does not smell or smoke, and gives a bright, beautiful, intensely hot fire. "Seldonite" can be used easily in the smallest household as well as in the largest factory, and its money-saving effect is equally great, whether for kitchen, grate, oven, copper or furnace.

AS A SPECIAL INDUCEMENT to encourage you to convince yourself of the marvellous efficiency of this Coal-Improver, the Sole Licensees have decided to send post free a full-size 4' box (sufficient to treat one ton of Coal, Slack, or Coke), with full directions, to all readers for only 2/6, provided the order and P.O. for 2/6 are received within the next few days.

5 BOXES POST FREE FOR ONLY 10/-

Beware of imitations which are useless. Write to-day, enclosing P.O. for 2/6 or 10/-, to the Sole Licensees—

"Seldonite" Laboratories, Dept. 88, Holborn Hall, London, W.C.

A FEW WELL-KNOWN USERS OF "SELDONITE."

DOWAGER COUNTESS OF GULFORD; VISCOUNT COMBERMERE; LADY ANGLIER; LADY L. WEMYSS; LADY HARRIET WARDE; LADY BROWNLOW CECIL; SIR S. PONSONBY; ADMIRAL SIR JAMES BRUCE; HON. MRS. SIDNEY PONSONBY; HON. R. HENLEY EOE; COL. LEIR; COL. BUTLIN; CAPT. RICHMOND; CAPT. WEBBE; COM. C. STRICKLAND, R.N., Plymouth; THE MOTHER SUPERIOR, House of Retreat, London; ST. EDITH HOME FOR GIRLS; REV. D. LEWIS, Lilanor; REV. JOHN M. MILLER, Symington; REV. ALEX. WALKER, Millport; REV. C. WILSON, Arklow; REV. T. T. TAYLOR, Chelmsford; REV. CANON WILSON-BROWN, Bury St. Edmunds; REV. DR. L. WILLIAMS, Royston; REV. BANFIELD, Hertingfordbury.

Now is the time to Buy and Sow

Eckford's

GIANT SWEET PEAS

if you wish to grow Sweet Peas to Perfection this Season.

In choosing your Collection of Sweet Peas for this Season it is as well to note that Eckford's Sweet Peas are all strong growers, and every plant needs to be placed at least six inches apart, so that, while you may buy more seed for the money elsewhere, remember, a cheaper collection may not be more profitable.

CAUTION.

There is a great deal of Rubbish being sold nowadays as Eckford's Sweet Peas, but they are not Eckford's unless direct from Wem. If you have bought Sweet Peas as Eckford's elsewhere, you have not got Eckford's. We have many thousands of Customers in every part of the globe, and they are all enthusiastic about Eckford's Seeds.

FREE. Send a postcard to-day for large illustrated and coloured Catalogue. It gives full particulars of all novelties in Sweet Peas for 1913, and contains full list of all flower and vegetable seeds.

HENRY ECKFORD, Sweet Pea Specialist WEM, SHROPSHIRE.
(Dept. 74).

and kindly intercourse. The private school sends the child—he is only that—on to us with good advice, which the parent endorses and the tutor probably recalls to the child's mind. The master, as even our critic admits, "strains every nerve to combat" vice. You might think it "impossible," as the bishop said to St. Augustine's mother, "that the son of these tears should perish." And after many years of experience, I honestly think that an enormous majority pass from childhood to manhood unscathed. Of course, there is the "nightmare" of Mgr. Benson's master, the anxiety from his elders that attends every child, whether at home or at school, on his progress through the physical development that distinguishes child from man. Some fail, and we have good warrant for trying to help the hundredth, but the novelist and the well-known journal are apt to forget the ninety and nine. We who work do not. We know the help which boys give to one another towards leading a decent life. Vicious boys are not really, you know, "reverenced as young Sir Galahads."

Just a word on "the absence of official encouragement to devotion." Our critic says that there is this, and that he once saw about a hundred boys at early Communion in the parish church. I cannot say that I see much harm in that. The parish church in his days had an early celebration every Sunday, and the College chapel every other Sunday; and on the intervening Sundays, after the 10.30 service, there was a midday celebration. For many years, however, the College chapel has had an early celebration every Sunday; but Mgr. Benson does not know this, any more than he knew about the arrangements for work and many other things. Some boys prefer the parish church, and that is why they go there. But any stick is good enough to beat Eton with. As to Mgr. Benson's itinerant chaplains with all the good qualities, like "Stalky and Co.'s" "padre" indefinitely multiplied, I confess that I should join in the "howl," if you like to call it that, supposing they were appointed to come round the houses, and exactly upon the grounds given by the proposer; and I can add that I do not think that the boys would tolerate them for a moment.

This letter is long, but, if you publish it, it may correct some erroneous impressions caused by Mgr. Benson's articles upon Eton in the imaginations of those otherwise unacquainted with the place.

ANOTHER ETON MASTER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Concerning the major part of the statements and charges contained in Mgr. Benson's articles relating to the above it is not my intention to speak, but with regard to his concluding remarks on morality I should be glad if you would allow me to make a few observations.

That Mgr. Benson is deserving of much commendation for the frank and courageous manner in which he has brought forward this extremely important question I am ready to admit; it is with his suggested remedy for the evil that I disagree. After an experience of schoolboy life, as a medical man, extending over a considerable number of years, I have come to the conclusion that the religious and prayerful methods of combating this vice are of infinitesimal value, and I should also unhesitatingly relegate all "passionate" and "mystic" and "confessional" treatment to the same category. That one could for a moment imagine that this latter method would be successful with the average English schoolboy—intensely diffident as he is with adults in all matters sexual, and with his extreme sensitiveness of being ridiculed as “pious” by his fellows—shows, if I may say so without offence, a lamentable lack of practical knowledge of the subject. It is no use blinking the fact that the thing that weighs most with the average adolescent, the thing in which is his most earnest desire, is not his spiritual or even mental excellence, but his physical—his stature, his “muscle,” his “fitness” and “form.” And it is obvious that it is just this ruling characteristic that, with his prestige and influence in relation to these matters, the doctor, and not the priest, nor even the master, can turn to the most advantage. For it doesn't require any very deep consideration to come to the conclusion that (apart from those cases dependent upon local abnormalities—more common than one would think—which should, of course, be surgically corrected in infancy) this matter rests almost in its entirety upon the twin evils of ignorance and curiosity as a foundation, and to deal in any way successfully with it it becomes necessary to dispel the one and alleviate the other.

What I would advise, and what I have found by far the most successful method of procedure, is not to wait until a lad has “fallen,” but to take every possible precaution to prevent him falling. To be forewarned is to be forearmed, and I would have all boys a year or so before puberty taken in hand by the doctor and talked to kindly, but seriously and firmly, and warned and prepared, guardedly, of course, for the approaching physiological change. At the critical age, and at intervals subsequently, I would have boys in class addressed by the doctor in the same way, but more freely, the relative physiological phenomena frankly explained, with requisite diagrams, etc., the serious danger, both mental, moral and physical, of the violation of Nature's laws dilated upon, and illustrated with short but vivid histories of typical cases in the knowledge of the lecturer.

To conclude, I would earnestly recommend some such plan as this that I have outlined to the serious consideration of those in authority in all schools throughout the country, a plan very easily carried out, and one by which I am confident this very serious evil—this “nightmare,” as it has been so graphically described—would be, not absolutely abolished, of course, but enormously lessened.—I am, sir, etc.,

M. R. C. S. (Retired).

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been extremely interested in Mgr. Benson's lucid articles on Eton, and thankful that there is a writer of his eminence to deal fearlessly with the moral condition of our lads—at Eton or elsewhere. It is deplorable that a most vital function of their being should be involved in mystery and secrecy, that they should be left to find out as best (or worst) they can the most sacred obligations of life. It is really time this were altered. It seems to me that at the age of puberty (and this age, of course, varies) all lads should, by their parents' suggestion, have an interview with the family doctor. The matter would be then treated with due respect and as a functional matter, and with the vanished secrecy and mystification, away would go the need for enquiry and foul talk with lads like themselves, with no real knowledge to guide them. It is grievous to think of the fine boys of England being left in any uncertainty on such a subject.

I do not think the parents or friends are the right ones to tackle this subject, as it is important that the

THIS PEN will not leak—no matter how you carry it.

Waterman's (Ideal) Fountain Pen

“Safety” Style.

Upside down in pocket or bag—doesn't matter a bit. The Pen can't leak—it's sealed when open and sealed when closed. As a pen —absolutely efficient. Writes smoothly, without spurting or faltering; lasts a lifetime. Nibs to suit every hand.

Of Stationers and Jewellers, everywhere. Booklet free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London. (New York: 173, Broadway.)

Give him

Bovril

Because

the Body-Building Power of Bovril has been proved to be from 10 to 20 times the amount taken.

matter should be treated on its own medical basis, and not emotionally. There are numerous booklets that it is safe to hand to lads at this crucial time of life, and I have used and posted many copies of Rev. F. B. Meyer's manly and Christian pamphlet, "A Holy Temple," admirable in its way, but not so efficient as a more radical explanation from a medical standpoint.—I am, sir, etc.,

MEDICA.

THE VALUE-OF THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I feel that I cannot allow Mr. (?) Ferriss' letter to pass unchallenged. I should imagine, like so many critics of the Bible, that he has read very little of it, and that without understanding.

The value of the Bible lies, not in any question of morality or inspiration, but in the fact that in it we have something absolutely unique—the history of the development of a race. At one end we see the mere germs of a civilisation; at the other end the Superman—Christ. From a mere family of shepherds we can trace the gradual development of a nation, the evolution of its law, its architecture, literature and art, its system of government, its adaptation to a constantly changing environment. And then, as the outcome of this, we have Christ. Not only this, but the whole history is written impartially; it is a mere narrative, which the writers offer in all sincerity. In addition, the best intellects of the succeeding ages have been joyfully expended upon its translation, and thus we have in the Bible an example of the best and simplest language.

As a piece of psychological history it is invaluable, especially now the theory obtains that the history of the race is re-mirrored, with, of course, environmental changes, in the development of the individual. If, therefore, we wish satisfactorily to educate our children we must study the development of the race, in order to understand the material we have to work upon.

I think if your correspondent considers the Bible from this point of view, a view outside any religious dogma, he will see that we can gain from "the superstition and savagery of the ancient Hebrews" something I defy him to gain from the present-day novel. Novels may be all very well as a relaxation, but as far as helping the race upward goes, or furthering our elementary, blind knowledge of man as a human being, I, for one, fail to see their value. In conclusion, I should like to add that I am not a Christian, and therefore I can enthusiastically and impartially echo the judgment of my intellectual betters—the Bible is the greatest and most wonderful monument of literature in the world.—I am, sir, etc.,

I. M. F.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—The question raised by Canon Barry in his article on "The Tyranny of the Novel," and the letter by your correspondent in the issue of the 10th inst., suggest that here, as in most other cases, a middle course is perhaps nearer the truth.

The plea for the study of the Bible as literature has been made by abler pens than mine, but it is well also to venerate a book which has influenced in some measure the thought and character of every European nation. Let us not be guilty of scorning the steps by which we did ascend.

To say that the bulk of the Bible is "in moral conflict with the Gospels," and that "the teaching of Paul has widely supplanted the teaching of Christ Himself," indicates that the message of the book is misinterpreted. The Bible is essentially a national history of a Semitic and pastoral people—still pastoral in spite of international buffeting, judging by their work in South America and Palestine. It therefore reflects their religion, their hopes, and their statute laws, of which the Ten Commandments form part—typical of the mandate of the desert, "Thou shalt not." The message of their prophets is always the same: firstly, a threatened dispersion among the nations; secondly, a regathering both foreshadowed by their great Law-giver, and which makes one wonder whether the colonisation schemes at present in Palestine are not the natural sequence of the Jewish dispersion.

The so-called "moral" teaching of Christ was the individual aspect of the ancient Mosaic laws, modified and divested of ritual and ceremony, due to the break-up of the national life. The promises to the patriarch of the race (which, by the way, Paul styles the Gospel) are still the rallying point, the theme of both the teaching of Paul—"the restitution of all things spoken of by all the prophets"—and of Christ Himself—"the restoration of the kingdom to Israel." Gentiles, as such, are said to be "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenants of promise," and the baptised into Christ are called "the seed of Abraham and heirs according to the promise."

If this nationalism is the keynote to the Bible, surely it does not merit abuse if we do not find in it moral teaching in accordance with modern ideas.—I am, sir, etc.,

W. H. BARKER.

THE CROSS AND THE CRESCENT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Dr. Dearmer, in returning to the attack on Islam, does well to remind us that there was once a Moslem occupation of Spain. His acquaintance, however, with this portion of history seems to be somewhat inaccurate, and his views rather distorted.

The serious error in the article is Dr. Dearmer's suggestion that the Christians of Spain learnt their lesson of intolerance from the Moors, their neighbours for eight centuries. The truth is that they might have learnt precisely the opposite lesson, for there is a most striking contrast between the enlightened government of the Moslems in Andalusia and the bigotry and tyranny of their Turkish co-religionists in the East. The glories of Spanish Islam appear the more resplendent by contrast with the darkness in which Christendom was plunged at the time, as well as with that which succeeded their expulsion from Spain. The torch of science, all but extinct in Christendom, was borne aloft by the Jews and Moors. When Sancho the Fat wished to be cured of his obesity it was to Caliph Abd-er-Rahman that he applied, and it was a Jewish physician that was sent. And Spain was also the home of toleration. When Tarik the Moor overran Spain, the old serf population found their new masters kinder than the old ones, and the Jews and Christians, so long as they did not openly curse the Prophet, were allowed to practise the rites of their religion freely. The Caliph was not to be blamed for the suicidal deaths of the martyrs of Cordova, even to the same slight extent to which some may hold the present Government responsible for the imprisonment of the more fanatical of the militant Suffragettes.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. K. WILKINS.

PELMAN PUPILS PRAISE PELMAN PRINCIPLES

A PAGE OF TESTIMONIALS FROM MEN WHO HAVE PROVED THE VALUE OF THE PELMAN COURSE OF MIND AND MEMORY TRAINING

Accountant

(R. 4,042.) 20-4-12.
 "I have found your course of instruction intensely interesting; and, what is more important, most practical for business purposes. I am engaged as an accountant with a large engineering firm, and about one dozen different kinds of coal, coke, etc., are in daily use. It is part of my duty to check these invoices. Since reading your books I have taken the trouble to make a proper mental classification of the different kinds used in the various departments, noting the current price of each. During the recent crisis, when prices rose alarmingly every day, I found this ready information of great use when questioned by the Managing Director, and now I find he is leaning on me for such information. I am very well satisfied with the course."

Assistant Supt.

(P. 4,059.) 23-7-12.
 "The chief benefit I have received lies in the alteration of my point of view from negative to positive. I have also a keener feeling of business ability, and my memory is certainly better."

Bank Clerk

(P. 4,048.) 19-7-12.
 "Among other benefits, I have learned how to concentrate my attention; how to read so as to be enabled to remember; how to speak without notes; how to originate new ideas; how to gain self-confidence; how to remember details for a temporary purpose; how to approach a subject so as to find out all about it; and how to correctly observe at all times."

Journalist

(G. 2,388.) 1-9-10.
 "I have enjoyed the lessons exceedingly, and after completing them I ventured to take up a course of reading which I thought had years ago passed out of my reach. After six months' work, however, I find the benefit of your tuition unmistakable. Your lessons give one the mental grip and freshness of schooldays."

B.Sc.

(D. 2,417.) 20-6-10.
 "When I entered upon a study of your System of Memory-Training I was studying for the final B.Sc. degree of London University. I was successful at that examination in October, 1909. Your System enabled me to memorise many things which occupy too much time to work out ab initio in an examination room—then there was the certainty which your System gives that what is remembered is correct. Had I known of your System at the beginning of my University Course I could have taken my degree much earlier."

Literary and Dramatic

(B. 2,929.) 11-3-10.
 "I think your System is most excellent. It is quite astonishing how it enables one to remember details and get into the habit of comparing and classifying. The lessons are most interesting and clever, and I think you are to be congratulated on having invented a very wonderful system, which I have found very helpful."

Solicitor

(J. 3,122.) 17-5-12.
 "I thank you very sincerely for the kind expressions contained in your last letter. I appreciate very highly the thoroughness of your work, and particularly that feature of your training which leaves the sense of personal contact between teacher and taught very vividly on one's mind, and thus bridges over a seeming failure in teaching by correspondence."

Artist

(B. 4,088.)
 "Your last lesson is creating in me a very great stimulation to learn more and more, and I am taking with me the last two lessons on my holiday to push on more thoroughly and to master every bit of the sections more carefully."

Marine Engineer

(T. 2,306.) 24-2-09.
 "Some months ago, when preparing for an examination, I had a partial lapse of memory of a distressing character. I took and worked through your Course, with the result that I have obtained the First-Class Marine Engineer's certificate at the first attempt, with a high percentage of marks. My success is due entirely, I consider, to your excellent system of memory training, and I desire to tender you my heartfelt thanks for the benefit derived and for the courtesy shown me while going through the Course."

Ink Manufacturer

(R. 4,069.) 22-7-12.
 "Have learned the relation between thought and action; the value of ambition and observation, concentration and interest. Have seen also how to go to work where the will is concerned. The course is splendid; the student is to blame if he does not benefit thereby."

Master of Arts

(P. 3,188.) 23-2-12.
 "I have certainly received good value for my money. I am a teacher of psychology myself, and I can safely certify that your system is based on scientific principles. It is especially valuable in that it gives a prominent position to the training of the senses."

Schoolmaster

(R. 4,035.) 15-3-12.
 "I have found exercises in Perception very interesting, especially in my work, and that is where I have used them most. Practice in this direction enables me to get through my work with greater ease and pleasure, and therefore with an absence of fatigue, that was not possible before I commenced your system, and in this sense again most profitable. I may say that things which taxed and worried me before seem to come to me now with a facility that is almost astounding."

Clergyman

(D. 4,038.) 23-4-12.
 "I appreciate the worth of your exercises. Your system is superior sense made common sense."

H.M. Customs

(M. 2,309.) 13-3-07.
 "The system is, no doubt, a splendid one, and only needs to be practised with some degree of regularity to yield substantial benefits. My chief regret is that I did not meet with it much earlier in life."

Merchant

(B. 2,020.) 20-5-10.
 "I should like to say how thankful I am that I was introduced to your Memory Training System. I know already a marked improvement in my power of concentration, consequently mind-wandering is diminishing."

Engineer

(T. 4,057.) 8-7-12.
 "My memory is vastly improved, concentration also improved. I have levelled myself to a proper course of thinking, feeling and willing, and now have a steady aim and goal in front of me."

FAMOUS JOURNALS ENDORSE THE PELMAN SYSTEM

"Daily News"

"The success of the Pelman System is world wide."

"The British Weekly"

"About sixty per cent. of the effort now spent in the act of remembering is wasted owing to the ignorance of the natural method. The Pelman Course eliminates all this waste effort."

"Public Opinion"

"The value of the Pelman Course cannot be over-estimated."

WRITE FOR FREE COPY OF "MIND AND MEMORY" and the new Magazine, "BRAIN POWER," also full particulars of the Pelman Course of Training.

NOTE.

When forwarding particulars we will also forward you the names and addresses of the writers of the above letters.

Address your application (a postcard will do) to the Secretary,

THE PELMAN SCHOOL OF THE MIND,
 52, Wenham House,
 Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

Branch Schools—47, Queen Street, Melbourne. 9, Churchgate Street, Bombay. Club Arcade, Durban.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Our latest Introduction, Special New Dry Cleaning Treatment for Dogs and Cats. See below. Every purchaser is presented FREE with first-class treatment and cures for dogs and cats.

DRAPERY Dept. 154.

The Mail Order House (Dept. 154), Queen's Rd., Brighton.

operated by turning a handle. An Automatic Gas Ring which turns low as soon as the kettle is removed, and a host of other equally interesting household labour lighteners and money savers.

Send for Illustrated Catalogue telling of hundreds of new and useful things. Write to Dept. 154, Queen's Rd., Brighton.

Dazzle n Plate, which will clean 100 spoons and forks in one minute. Patato Peeling Machine.

DARN NO MORE

Stockings and Socks that Don't Want Mending. Read the following Guarantee which is given with every pair of Hose we sell:

Wear your Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO MONTHS of purchase we will REPLACE THEM FREE! ABSOLUTELY

Holeproof Hose.

Holeproof Socks and Stockings are of medium weight, shape, well made and comfortable, with that incomparable sense of good fitting that is one of the many pleasant features of our Hose.

It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still no damage done to its fabric.

The comfort and pleasure of a good-wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business girls and busy housewives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable. Price, Two Pairs of Gent's Socks, 2/6, post 2d.

Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings, 2/6, post 2d. COLOURS stocked: Black, Navy, Champagne, Pearl Grey, and Light Moire.

SILK HOLEPROOF. Sold under same guarantee as above. Two Pairs of Gent's Socks, 7/6, post 2d. Two Pairs of Ladies' Stockings, 10/6, post 2d. (Colours: Ladies—Champagne, Empire, Blue, Pearl Grey, Tan, Black; Men's—Tan, Navy, Black, Pearl Grey. State Boot Size. Call or write.

Veterinary Dept. 154.

DRY CLEAN YOUR DOG.

Clean your dog without water by using our powder. Just sprinkle over dog, rub in coat and brush out.

This is all you have to do to get your dog's coat and skin thoroughly cleansed. Every small and disease germ is destroyed. So easy and simple; no fear of catching cold through washing. Cats can also be shampooed. Just try a tin, the price is 1/6, post 1d., which contains enough to dry shampoo an ordinary terrier 4 times; 4 times the quantity, 2/-, post 2d. We send free with each order our hints and cures on Home Treatment. Call or write.

Ironmongery Dept. 154.

500 HOURS LIGHT for 1 1/2d.

The "Fool Proof" Lamp is absolutely safe. It does not flicker or blow out in draughty places. One of these little "Fool Proof" Lamps placed in those eerie corners or dark staircase landings will cost no more than 1d. for 500 hours. Candles give only 15 hours for the same amount. This Lamp is beautifully designed on a copper base. Looks good, and is totally different to the usual run of cheap oil lamps. Turns up and down one finger. Burns paraffin oil. Can be used as a smoker's companion, is absolutely odourless, wears for years. Call or write. Price 2/6, post 2d. and packing 2d.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154) The Mail Order House, (Call or write) Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

ROUND THE WORLD FOR GOLD*

THIS may well be reckoned one of the best books of travel of the present season. It recounts the varied experiences of an expert mining inspector in different parts of America, Australia, the Philippines, Siam, China, and West Africa. The author had a story which was well worth telling. We pass, it is true, in hot haste from country to country and from one class of impressions to another; but this discursiveness, so far from being an objection, really constitutes the peculiar charm of the book. If we have a criticism to offer, it is that Mr. Way has given us too many technical details and overmuch about his professional work. No doubt it is of absorbing interest to himself, but his readers may be pardoned if their enthusiasm regarding such matters is appreciably less.

For the rest, we heartily commend this book. It is freshly and brightly written, extremely well informed, and contains many vivid topographical descriptions. While Mr. Way's experiences are seldom of the thrilling order, they are usually lively and entertaining. The book opens with an account of his American wanderings, and we are afforded some pleasant glimpses of life among Kansas cattle punchers, of mining round Rico, and of what "roughing it" means in Colorado. Mr. Way was disgusted with the States, presumably on professional grounds.

"There was no honest press; all the papers were subsidised by the monometallists to hoodwink the people. The continued contraction of the currency was the curse of these times."

The visits to Australia and the Philippines were comparatively brief. In the Antipodes our author spent most of his time at Coolgardie. One thing there which particularly impressed him was the very large percentage of salt in the water. He writes:

"Looking at a map of Western Australia one would imagine the country to be remarkably well watered, for blue lakes are shown all over it; but the truth is that these are nothing but dry salt pans, over which you can gallop, kicking up the salt-encrusted sand behind you."

Some of the most interesting passages in the book are to be found in the section treating of Siam. Thither the author went in 1907, so that his impressions are quite modern. As mining engineer to a company formed for exploring Siam and taking up mining concessions, Mr. Way travelled a good deal and saw much of the life of the people. His view of their future is by no means optimistic. The Siamese men are, he tells us, very weedy compared with the women, and, in his view, it looks as though it would not take many generations to stamp out the Siamese as a separate people. Bangkok he calls the Venice of the East; but it is also "a city of smells." Mr. Way paid visits to the Kabin and Watana gold mines.

"Kabin is famous for Siamese cats and scorpions. The cats are most fascinating animals, with cream-coloured bodies, and black faces and paws, and light blue eyes. The scorpions I found most frequently in the bathroom, where I often killed as many as eight or ten in a morning."

From Siam Mr. Way proceeded to China, of which he gives a fairly full and interesting account. He inspected numerous mines, and his narrative contains vivid word-pictures of the country through which he passed, of the people whom he met, and of little incidents of one kind and another by the way. Thence he proceeded to Tibet and Burma. The only French missionary in Tibet, Abbé Tintet, is thus described:

"He was a very simple man, much beloved by those among whom he lived. His church he showed us with great pride,

* "Round the World for Gold." By Herbert W. L. Way. 21s. net. (Sampson Low.)

The UNDERWOOD

HAS A REPUTATION BUILT UP ON SHEER MERIT.

'The Machine you will eventually buy.'

WRITE FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE AND TYPISTS' GUIDE.

SENT POST FREE ANYWHERE.

Underwood Typewriter Co.

120, Queen Victoria Street,

LONDON, E.C.

Phone: 2902 LONDON WALL.

for he and his people had built it entirely themselves. . . . We pointed out to him the danger he was in on account of the spread of the Boxer rising, and implored him to accompany us out of the country; but he refused absolutely to leave his people or to move at all without the consent of his Bishop."

The concluding portion of the book deals with West Africa, to which Mr. Way paid a flying visit in 1901. The many full-page and smaller illustrations much enhance this charming volume. There are also six maps, showing the portions of the four continents visited by the author.

A VISION OF CHRISTIAN LONDON*

IN this quite remarkable book a courageous attempt is made to show the wonderful transformation that would be brought about were all who profess the Christian religion honestly and whole-heartedly to give practical effect to its teaching. A "divine visitation" is supposed to have come to the British nation on the 23rd of April—"England's Day, St. George's Day, Shakespeare's Day"—and the book conveys a singularly vivid impression of some of "the wonderful things which happened in London on that memorable and holy day."

Here are a few of the visions which the exuberant imagination of our author conjures up. The Duke of Gloucester, remembering that he has two big country houses standing empty, implores the Ragged School Union to fill them with children. A clerical landlord, who fares sumptuously every day, pays a visit for the first time in his life to his property in the East End, and is so shocked by its "sluminess" and the squalor and wretchedness of the tenants that he decides to pull all the houses down and to build better ones.

In the House of Commons, the leader of the Opposition, in a speech marked by unwonted religious fervour, expresses the willingness of his party to cooperate with the Government "to render the life of England glorious and beneficent." The Bishop of Brompton is seen in Piccadilly attempting to rescue unfortunate women. The churches agree to sink their differences and unite their forces "for the interests of morality." Suffragettes cease their belligerency and become harmless as sucking doves. No longer are they bent upon getting "the vote" at all costs; their energies are now concentrated upon "the spiritual uplifting of women throughout the whole world."

The eventful day closes with the strangest of spectacles—"an enormous host" of religious enthusiasts "marching through the midnight streets."

"Just ahead of me went a numerous band playing 'Onward, Christian Soldiers!' Behind them followed a host of clergymen, among whom I noticed the Bishop of Brompton, Dr. Garth, and several well-known ministers, both Anglican and Nonconformist. . . . For the most part this army of London represented the young men of the great city. . . . The procession was estimated to be four miles in length."

The objective was St. Paul's Cathedral, where the processionists arrived a minute or two before the clock struck twelve.

"The Bishop of London, surrounded by clergy, stood on the topmost step, in the shadow of the great doorway. Below him was massed the first band. Behind the band flowed an immense multitude as far as eye could see—an ocean of souls, each one conscious of God in the solitude of its isolation. . . . The band played 'O God, our help in ages past.' Midnight struck as thousands of voices filled the air with that noble hymn. Then the Bishop, with lifted hand, led the people in 'Our Father.' . . . It seemed to

* "The Day that Changed the World." By the Man Who was Warned. 6s. (Hodder.)

It is always difficult, even at the best circulating libraries, to get a recently published work promptly on publication

The Times Book Club's New Special Service ensures the prompt delivery of any new book in circulation in the Library.

Country subscribers are not required to return their books until a fresh supply arrives, and are thus never without books.

The Times Book Club is thus offering

A UNIQUE LIBRARY SERVICE

Subscriptions from 7 6

Full particulars, rates of subscription, etc., will be sent on receipt of post-card mentioning Everyman.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB CIRCULATING LIBRARY

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

PLAYER'S Navy Mixture

Out of the sweetest and ripest leaves of the tobacco plant "pipe perfect" Player's Navy Mixture is made.

Player's Navy Mixture is everything that a tobacco can be.

It is cool and even burning, with a bouquet as distinct and delicate as that of some rare vintage wine.

Then fill your pipe with this best of Mixtures and know all the joy that a perfect tobacco can bring.

IN THREE STRENGTHS:

Mild 5^{D.} per oz. Medium 5^{D.} per oz.

White Label 4¹/₂ D. per oz.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes
of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete.
Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free.

A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Conwell Road, LONDON.

LITERARY.—Novels, Short Stories, Articles, Poems, placed with 179 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. £3 5s. per 1,000 words obtained for unknown author. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. EACH OFFERED.—Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863; Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1865; Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878; Baxter's Cabinet of Paintings, 1537; Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879; Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1863; Symonds' Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881; Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. 100,000 Books for Sale and Wanted. Exchanges made. Please state wants.—Baker's Great Book Shop, 14-16, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

TO AUTHORS.—MESSRS. DIGBY, LONG & Co. (Publishers of "The Author's Manual," 3s. 6d. net, Ninth Edition) are prepared to consider MSS. in all Departments of Literature with a view to publication in Volume Form.—Address 16, Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

SLOAN-DUPLOYAN SHORTHAND saves a year's study. Used by Official Parliamentary reporters. Send for free illustrated handbook with specimen lesson.—SLOAN SHORTHAND CO., Ramsgate.

WHY NOT LEARN SPANISH?

Write to: THE DIRECTOR, Eversley Language Institute, 43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C., for Prospectus of CORRESPONDENCE COURSES IN SPANISH & NINE OTHER LANGUAGES.

BOOKS by Behmen, Law, Guyon, Jane Lead, Bourignon, Swedenborg, T. L. Harris, etc., for sale by Thomson & Co., Pleaknowe, Condorrat, Glasgow. Lists on application.

BOOKS FOR SPEAKERS.—"Speaking in Public" (showing how to prepare speeches and acquire fluency). By Charles Seymour. 5/- net (post 3/3). Also "Short Speeches for Social Occasions," 1/- net (post 1/3).—London: "The Speaker's Library" Press, 8, Paternoster Row, and all Booksellers.

STAMPS FREE!—Grand set of 14 Austrian Jubilee, 1h. to 1kr. complete. Send id. postage, Gift D.65.—BRIGHT & SON, 164, Strand, W.C.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws"; in a Nutshell, on Card. Teaches the new way to acquire Knowledge. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

THE PROGRESS SOCIETY links up lonely men and women everywhere into a social body, affording wider intellectual and material interests through its various circles. No membership fee. For descriptive booklet send stamp to the Secretary, E. M., 107, Greencroft Gardens, Hampstead, London.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A.

5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

me that England might now justly call herself Christian England."

Such are a few of the author's notions of what would transpire in London were the people suddenly to become dominated by the idea that God really exists, and that they are living miserably selfish lives. The book reminds us forcibly of Mr. C. M. Sheldon's "In His Steps," though we should say that the present writer exhibits more imaginative power. There is nothing grotesque about his conceptions. Keeping in view the basal idea of the book, he writes with admirable restraint and in a style which proclaims literary craftsmanship of a high order. We commend the book to all who are interested in practical Christian ethics.

AN AMERICAN ESTIMATE OF WORDSWORTH*

PROFESSOR SNEATH has restricted himself almost severely to one aspect of his subject. He is the psychologist, not the literary critic of Wordsworth. His mission is to reveal to us what Wordsworth thought, and what Wordsworth sought, and, since no poet has made more conscientious attempts at revealing himself, his thoughts, his aims, and his actions, than the poet of the "Prelude," this object has been very largely attained. Professor Sneath lets his subject tell his own story, and has restricted himself for the most part to the functions of showman. Enough authentic words of Wordsworth have been printed to fill quite a substantial anthology, and enough to stimulate in the reader the desire to read or reread the whole poems of which these are typical extracts. The rest of the book is combination and elucidation; certain theses are deduced or confirmed, certain distinctions are drawn, and a general view of the poet's psychology is presented. There is a good deal of repetition, even of quotations, as is perhaps inevitable. Occasionally, too, we become rather satiated with the debauch of paraphrase in which the lecturer indulges.

We would not go so far as to say that a new Wordsworth emerges from these pages, but we do think that a very clear conception of the man and the poet is to be obtained from them. The old criticisms based on the triviality of Wordsworth's topics are successfully refuted. On the Wordsworthian conception of Nature, Professor Sneath is nothing less than excellent, if at times prolix. He gets us away from the popular idea of his hero as the poet of the sheltered life, and gives us the truer picture of an earnest questioner, who at last "beat his music out." He finds in his Nature poems "the unifying tendency of the mystical poet—the intuition of the one in many, the synthetic apprehension of manifold of sound as one song, as though it were a harmonious creation of the natural world." Professor Sneath has a good reply for those who accuse Wordsworth of insipidity—he is "a poet who knows the human heart. He has sounded its depths. . . . He knows the passions of the soul, not in their superficial tumult, but in their profound undercurrents." We are rather surprised that Professor Sneath should have thought it necessary to give parallels—"Break, break, break," in extenso, for example—for Wordsworth's occasional sorrow in contemplation of Nature. This is surely the greatest commonplace of poetry, one of the best explored regions of the pathetic.

* "Wordsworth: Poet of Nature and Poet of Man." By E. Hershey Sneath, Ph.D., LL.D. 7s. 6d. net. (Boston: Ginn and Co.)

THE FIGHTING SPIRIT OF JAPAN*

IN his preface the author apologises, not wholly without reason, for inflicting "upon a long-suffering public another book on Japan." He went to Japan, he tells us, some fourteen years ago in order to take up a journalistic appointment, but he confesses that for a considerable period after his arrival he "lived more particularly for the study of the language and the practice of the celebrated art of judo, more commonly known abroad as jiu-jitsu." No doubt, a reader of strong pugilistic tendencies will revel in this book, but the ordinary man and woman will, for the most part, find it rather boring.

About one-half of the volume is devoted to an exposition of the "occult aspects of Japanese military arts," and we are furnished with much dreary detail regarding the history and rationale of judo and where and how it is taught. There are two chapters on "The Esoteric Aspects of Bujutsu," and another on "Fencing, Wrestling, and Sword." We do not say such information is valueless, but it is relatively unimportant, and, what is more to the point, of little interest to the reading public. All that the author has to say about judo and the allied arts might have been compressed with advantage into a single chapter of moderate length.

The remaining essays, treating of Japanese superstitions and occult practices, of theatres, and of Japanese women, contain little that is fresh; but they are readable, inasmuch as they are a record of personal impressions. The book is provided with many excellent illustrations from photographs.

THE ESSAYS OF A LIBERAL PROTESTANT†

DR. HORTON has done well by the public in republishing this volume of essays at a price which renders it accessible to the many. "Great Issues" is a collection of studies on subjects of universal appeal, written from the standpoint of a really liberal and enlightened Protestantism, and informed by that spirit of "sweetness and light" which is the outcome of a wide culture and a true humanity. The essential and individual element of Dr. Horton's teaching is to be sought in his contention "that religion is as universal as humanity, that it is not yet disposed of, nor will ever be." Its forms, its theology, are variable to infinity, and liable to all the evolutionary processes of growth and decay; but the religious experience is coterminous and coeval with the race.

His volume opens with a very excellent discussion of Myths, based upon the Platonic use of the myth as the symbol of an ultimate but inexpressible reality, and passing on to a very informing defence of the ideal truth of the Christian documents. "The question," he writes acutely, "about the story is not, Is it true? but, Does it convey truth?" We must distinguish between facts whose court is that of science or of history, and facts whose appeal is to religious consciousness. So far as the former of these categories is concerned there may be admitted to be an element of myth (in "the vast and honourable usage of the word") underlying even the Gospel narrative itself. However, "it is the myth in Plato's sense, the human medium through which high and difficult matters, which evade logic and definition, may be conveyed to the soul."

* "The Fighting Spirit of Japan." By E. J. Harrison. 12s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

† "Great Issues." By Robert F. Horton. 2s. 6d. (London: T. Fisher Unwin.)

MAKE 1913 YOUR LUCKY YEAR

by taking up the world-famous Course, "Scientific Concentration," the finest and most practical all-round training of the mind before the public. It will give you a new outlook on life, and will treble your efficiency in business or in professional life. It will make you keenly attentive and observant, will greatly increase your memory, will develop your will-power and self-reliance enormously, and will enable you to control both mind and body. So impressed was the late Mr. W. T. Stead with the Concentro Course that he said: "I do not remember ever having seen treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, 'Scientific Concentration,' and wish it every success." Send to-day for free booklet (which gives full particulars of what "Scientific Concentration" is and what it will do for you) to the

CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121, 3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8130.)

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLIX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Short-hand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27 Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, etc. Private and Class lessons and translation. Moderate terms. Prospectus free. Rosenblum's Language Institute, 319, Oxford St., W.; 26, High Holborn, W.C.; 42, Lombard St., E.C.

LITTLE SALON SOCIAL-LITERARY CIRCLES.—For Men and Women of Culture (Speakers and Non-Speakers); include Drama, and Open Discussions of Questions of the Day. New Books, etc. Sub. Mod.—Write, M. L. B., Salon Secretary, 24, Bloomsbury Square, London, W.C.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 83 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

NAVAL WAR GAME.—30 metal ships, fine coloured map of China Seas. Pitched battles, blockade-running, etc. 5/6, p.f.—LEES, Fron, Deganwy, Llandudno.

WHICH?—Bench, desk, or counter—long, hard, ill-paid toil? or the Platform—an hour's fascinating high-paid work? Simple, common-sense talk, NOT "Oratory," wanted. £3 to £4 weekly, evenings only, may be earned by studying "Public Speaking" (Special Section: "How to get Engagements"), 1s. post free.—MORGAN, Poulner, Ringwood.

NEW CATALOGUE OF CURRENT LITERATURE. This Catalogue gives at a glance complete lists of the best of the various series of handy reprints now being issued. General Literature, Art, Science, Nature Study, Books of Reference and Fiction Generally. All lovers of Books should at once write for a copy, gratis and post free.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London, W.C.

The same excellent and (in the best sense of the word) modern spirit pervades the other essays. We are only inclined to join issue with Dr. Horton on two questions, which are closely inter-related. The first of these is his tendency to develop the moral teaching of the Gospel-Christ at the expense of the purely spiritual and eschatological. The second is his exhibition of a certain animus against the more highly organised Christian institutions. The whole tendency of the most modern research (as shown, for instance, in M. Loisy's "Synoptiques" and Prof. Schweitzer's "Quest of the Historical Jesus") is to establish the Christ of history as pre-eminently a "religious genius," and to emphasise the conclusion that His revelation to His own age and to all after time was primarily a spiritual one, and that His spirituality found its clearest expression in His conceptions of the life hereafter and of the second coming. The second of these two issues, that of the institutional forms of Christianity, we would raise rather in the interest of history than of "the Churches" themselves. Admitting frankly the complete lack of Scriptural and early authority for the Catholic expression of the Christian idea, we would yet suggest to Dr. Horton that Catholicism (either Eastern or Western) was for over a thousand years the sole expression of that idea, and that under its influence (despite their subsequent corruptions) were developed movements profoundly significant for and formative of the spiritual life of the race. To rule out Catholicism from one's synthesis, or to account for it merely by Prof. Harnack's rather rhetorical conception of it as the successor of Imperial Rome, must inevitably result in a certain loss of spiritual values, from which loss, as it seems to us, Liberal Protestantism is not out of danger of suffering.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MR. CUNNINGHAM GRAHAME occupies a unique position among present-day writers. He is one of the few authors who have mastered the art of the sketch, and have attained in its perfection that most difficult achievement of suggesting a drama in a few vivid strokes, of creating an atmosphere with a pregnant phrase. SUCCESS (Duckworth and Co., 2s. 6d. net) contains some of his finest work. There is a fearlessness of treatment in "Los Seguidores." He reproduces the loneliness of the Pampas, shows us the fierce, primitive natures of the Guachoes, their almost uncanny understanding of their horses, their flaming jealousies and swift, fierce gleams of hate and passion. Take this description: "The Seguidores, the greatest object of the brothers' love, were black as jet, with their off fore and off hind feet white, so that the rider, riding on a cross, was safe from the assault of evil things by night. . . . Both horses were rather quick to mount, not liking to be kept a minute when the foot was in the stirrup iron. . . . They could turn when galloping in their own length, their unshod feet cutting the turf as a sharp skate cuts ice, when a swift skater turns at topmost speed." Take again the concentration in the following; it is the description of a cat, thrilled with terror at the sight of one of its own species lying dead: "The fascination, such as seems to draw the eyes of women to some sight their nerves abhor, possessed it, and it laid down, purring, close to the corpse, stretched out a paw in horror, felt the cold flesh, and, shrieking, fled again into the street." You have a picture in a few short words strung together in a succession of phrases that hit the mark each time. The volume is well up to the author's level, and provides a literary treat to all those who enjoy a perfection of style and vividness of treatment.

Mr. Tighe Hopkins has given us a most thoughtful and interesting book in WARDS OF THE STATE (Herbert and Daniels, 7s. 6d.). He deals with the problems of penal servitude, prison labour, and emphasises in no measured terms not alone the barbarity, but the "futility of flogging." In one of the ablest chapters in the book he deals with the failure of the lash as a prevention for the recurrence of crime. Flagellation has, he insists, an evil and hardening effect upon all who assist at and witness it, and he deals very effectively with the argument that the cat stopped garotting. The case of the woman he devotes largely to the treatment of the Suffragettes. But he conclusively proves that the rules in force against the unhappy female prisoners are, if possible, more injurious, morally and mentally, than to the males. He quotes the statement of Patrick O'Leary, convicted at the London Sessions of stealing lead from a roof. The appeal makes one twinge with sympathy. "All you have heard of me is rotten and bad. But, your Lordship, I don't want to be a criminal all my life. I want to get a job and work hard. . . . The more I go to prison, the more I shall keep on going there, and the worse I shall get. Give me one more chance, and you will not regret it; I will do my very best to run straight." The crying necessity for the criminal to be given "one more chance" is eloquently and forcibly urged by Mr. Hopkins. Ably written, admirably argued, it is a book to be in the possession of all those interested in the amelioration of our social conditions.

THREE PLAYS, by John Galsworthy, contains "The Eldest Son," "The Little Dream," and "Justice." Mr. Galsworthy gives us strong drama with a directness of treatment and a simplicity of style that is forceful to the point of occasionally leaving one breathless. The first of the three plays deals with the situation of the Squire's son and the gamekeeper's daughter. The young man has seduced the girl, who is about to have a child; there is a parallel between the case and that of the under-gamekeeper and a girl from the village. Sir William Cheshire hauls the gamekeeper before him, and insists that he shall marry the girl or leave his service. Dunning explains that neither he nor Rose, the girl in question, desire to become man and wife. The Squire will not listen to any such excuse, and finally he has his own way. Faced with a similar situation with his son Bill and Freda, the lady's maid, he does not live up to his ideal. The son, however, though he admits he has not an ardent affection for Freda, insists that he will play the game and make her his wife. He turns a deaf ear to his father's threats and his mother's pleading, and Freda is persuaded, half against her will, to consent to be married. The situation is finally solved by Freda's father, the head gamekeeper, who very humbly, but most emphatically, says he does not wish his daughter to enter a family where quite obviously she is not wanted, and therefore takes her home. "Justice," a powerful study of a clerk who has served his time in prison, seeks to gain re-employment, only to be recaptured by the police for not having reported himself as a ticket-of-leave man, is as convincing now as when it first appeared, some two years back. It may be remembered that to Mr. Galsworthy's genius we owe the abolition of that most execrable system, "the ticket-of-leave," under which the wretched convict was allowed to leave prison, only to be fetched back, as a cat fetches a mouse, to be retortured.

PUBLISHED TO-DAY!

The First Volume of

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

Edited by ANDREW BOYLE.

Can be had at all Booksellers'.

The Full Set will be in 12 Volumes, one volume of which will be issued monthly until the work is completed in December, 1913.

THE DISTINCTIVE FEATURES ARE:—

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA is an entirely new work, and embraces events up to the present time.

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA contains more articles than any other encyclopædia.

Each volume of THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA consists of 640 pages and about 500,000 words.

The Full Set of THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA contains six million words.

There are over 1,000 illustrations.

The printing is done from an improved type, which is absolutely legible and quickly read.

The Full Set will only measure 11½ ins. long, 7 ins. high, 4½ ins. deep.

If your Bookseller is unable to hand you a copy of our 8-pp. Prospectus, please send us a postcard, we will gladly send you one, or more. If there is no Bookseller near you, we shall be pleased to send a copy of Vol. I. on receipt of a Postal Order for One Shilling and Threepence, including postage. You may return this specimen copy if it does not meet with your approval.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, LONDON, W.C.

THE LADY OF MYSTERY (James Duffy and Co., 2s.) is a simple, unpretentious story of rural and manufacturing life. It is written in pleasing style, dealing with the life of a country village and a country mill, from the somewhat romantic point of view. The descriptions of scenery are dainty, and the characterisation, though not strong, is, at least, convincing.

Mr. Arthur D. Lewis has written a book to explain, in part at least, what is popularly called Syndicalism (SYNDICALISM and THE GENERAL STRIKE, Fisher Unwin, 6s. net). The volume should certainly do something to clear the minds of those who are at present interested and, in some part, confused on the issue. At the present moment the majority of modern nations that have been affected by industrial development are rapidly dividing into two camps. On the one hand we have the rich owners directing and amassing profit from the production of their workmen; on the other, the mass of workers forced to sell their labour for a wage, and, in the majority of instances, unable to fix that wage at anything approximating to a standard of decent living. It may certainly be prophesied that such a condition of society cannot endure. Some method must be arrived at of giving to the army of workers a control over their own means of livelihood, or their status must be realised to be that of a separate and subject community. The inevitable alternative is to find some method of redistributing ownership, or to accept the fact that a portion of the nation, and that a most important portion, must be classed as slaves. Syndicalism, as interpreted by Mr. Lewis, is the attempt to work out the idea of freedom for the workers by a revolutionary strike. Mr. Lewis does not, however, clearly state the inevitable objective of this movement. That, if Syndicalism is to be effective, it must aim at the transfer of property, not to the State, but to the workers in their capacity as such.

Miss Marjorie Bowen has given us a stirring romance in A KNIGHT OF SPAIN (Methuen, 6s.). She has the faculty of suggesting the atmosphere of the times of which she writes, and with a few swift touches conjures up historical scenes and personages, which in her pages become invested with actuality and appear to us clothed in flesh and blood. The story treats of the time of William of Orange, and the intrigues between Spain and that Prince form the background for the hero. Her love scenes are excellently written. She has the faculty of striking the note of romance, finding the nerve of humour, turning with a swift touch to tragedy. "His full lips curved into a smile; he kissed Marguerite's white wrist, and the fingers with which she held the silver gilt flagon she served him with. But she was so adorned with rings and bracelets that he touched pearls and gold, not flesh. 'Who's hair have you in your earring?' asked Marguerite. 'The hair of a dead woman,' he answered slowly." The scene works up to a contest between the beautiful woman on one side, caring for nothing but vanity and the amusement of an idle hour, and the grave, chivalrous Don Juan on the other. The contest continues throughout the book. It would be unfair to foretell the ending. The story will be eagerly read by lovers of romance and adventure.

Mr. Hilaire Belloc is invariably arresting and picturesque in his style. THE RIVER OF LONDON

(Foulis, Edinburgh and London, 5s. net) is a history of the Thames. The author deals with it from political and mercantile aspects, and devotes certain chapters to its possible defence in time of war. But the most noticeable thing about the book is the emphasis the author lays on the close, the inseparable connection between London and its river. The Thames is, indeed, the soul of London. "No one can see the marriage between London and its river without wondering in what degree things, other than ponderable and measurable things, may enter into the habitation of man. There is nothing man does, of course, which has not in it the soul. But it may be also true that there is nothing done to man wherein some soul is not also. . . . We must properly lend to these insensate things some controlling motive; and we may rightly say, but only by the use of metaphor, that all these things have a spirit within them. I cannot get away from it, that the Thames may be alive, and London most certainly is." We journey with the author from Tilbury. He paints for us the low-lying flats, the houses, and the places of change, and the great stores, and the abrupt street ends with their water steps, and the picture grows on us till we seem to feel and understand the soul of the river of London. But, while he does full justice to the Thames, he seems to us to slight the City so intimately connected with it. London, he protests, is mean in its approach, "for one mile after another you pass the thousands of little houses all shamelessly similar, for in none does a man intend to make his being, to possess his soul, or to live and die there." He upbraids London that she offers no salutation to the stranger approaching her streets, and characterises those same streets as narrow and crooked, declaiming that when at last "one comes to the inner part where there is something of history and of meaning, and of an intelligent culture, one comes upon it without introduction and without grace." The wonder of London lies in her vastness, her myriad moods, her ever-changing character. It is her boast that she hides behind no citadel gates or fortifications, and opens up a refuge for all who seek her. One must either love London with an ever increasing passion, or reject her utterly. But for the river so inseparably associated with her Mr. Belloc has an innate sympathy and understanding. Those chapters devoted to the strategical position of the Thames are forcible and incisive.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

Here's MY Barber

I don't have to wait for him
—he waits for me—always ready to give me a surpassingly smooth, comfortable shave, at any time of the day or night.

ONE OUTFIT WILL LAST A LIFETIME. THERE IS NO CONSTANT EXPENSE FOR NEW BLADES—THERE IS NO GRINDING OR HONING EXPENSE EITHER

ITS SHAVING EASE.

The CLEMAK is the simplest and most perfect shaving device known to civilisation. There is nothing to get out of order—no screwing, fixing or adjusting to waste your time. The blade is adjusted at the only right angle automatically. You simply press the knob and this fine, smooth, sure, safe, speedy, clean "barber" is ready to give you the best shave—not once but every day of the year.

THE PERFECT BLADE.

CLEMAK Blades retain their exceptionally keen shaving edges because they are manufactured from the finest quality Sheffield Razor Steel, hardened and tempered by our new secret electrical process.

The CLEMAK Stropping Machine (price 3/6, including good leather strop) compels you to strop at the correct angle and pressure and ensures a clean blade for every shave.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

EVERYBODY'S USING IT.

- CLEMAK Razor and Seven Blades 5/-
- NEW MODEL SET & Twelve Blades 7/6
- COMBINATION OUTFIT, Stropping Machine, Velvet Hide Strop, Clemak and Twelve Blades 10/6

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

OF ALL STORES, CUTLERS, etc.,

or post free from the
CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street,
LONDON.

POST IT NOW

GET THE BOOK.

POST TO US —

CUT THIS CORNER —

POST IT NOW

Please post free your revised edition of "His First Shave," the humorous booklet illustrating in colours the most popular Clemak Outfits and useful Hints on Shaving.

Name

Address

How to Raise Yourself Above the 'SMALL PAY' Crowd

THE people in the "small pay" crowd face a routine of monotonous, hopeless toil. They labour long hours for poor pay; have no responsibility; no freedom.

ARE you one of the men in that crowd? Are you anxious for higher pay, more responsibility, and more congenial work?

YOU can raise yourself above the crowd if you will. Thousands have done it; so can you. Are you not as good as they? If you lack anything essential to success, is it TRAINING?

TO-DAY it is the trained man who wins, always. But it is no longer necessary to go to school to be trained for a first-class post. Thousands who to-day hold high positions trained themselves by the I.C.S. way.

THE International Correspondence Schools show splendid results in this matter of raising men above the crowd. They give a man a practical, profitable training in his own home at small cost. The I.C.S. have already helped thousands of men and women to raise themselves above the crowd. They can help you.

THE proof of the value of the I.C.S. system of Training is found in the attitude of employers toward I.C.S. students. Employers everywhere are on the look-out for I.C.S. Trained Men. Every day the I.C.S. Students' Aid Department receives applications for I.C.S. Trained Men to fill well-paid positions; more such applications indeed than they can fill.

WHAT is to prevent YOU from qualifying yourself for better pay by aid of the I.C.S.? Doubling, perhaps trebling, your earnings in the immediate future? £1, or £2, or £3, or £4 more a week? Would not that be useful to you?

IN any case, you must admit that I.C.S. Training is worth enquiring about. Such an enquiry has been for thousands the first step to promotion and better pay. Take your first step on the way to Better Pay TO-DAY.

SUCCESS ENQUIRY COUPON.

International Correspondence Schools Ltd., 44b, International Buildings, Kingsway, London, W.C.

Please explain, without any obligation on my part, how I can qualify for Better Pay in the position, trade or profession, or gain a knowledge of the subject before which I have marked X.

- | | |
|--|---|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Commercial Training | <input type="checkbox"/> Mechanical Engineering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Advertising | <input type="checkbox"/> Electrical Engineering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Illustrating | <input type="checkbox"/> Architecture |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Designing | <input type="checkbox"/> Contracting and Building |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Marine Engineering | <input type="checkbox"/> Structural Engineering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Gas-Power Engineering | <input type="checkbox"/> Concrete Engineering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Motor Engineering | <input type="checkbox"/> Chemistry |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Cotton Manufacturing | <input type="checkbox"/> French, German, Spanish, Italian |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Woollen Manufacturing | <input type="checkbox"/> Agriculture, Poultry Farming |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Refrigeration | |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Steam Engineering | |

Over 180 Courses to choose from.

Name.....

Address.....

Please use full address.

Do not postpone your first step toward joining the "BIG PAY" Crowd. Enquire TO-DAY.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 16. Vol. 1.

[REGISTERED
LAT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 31, 1913

One Penny.

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

PERCY DEARMER

GILBERT THOMAS

CHARLES SAROLEA

HENRI MAZEL

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	485
The Cult of Pleasure—By Hector
Macpherson	436
An Irish Mystic: "Æ" and Agricultural
Co-operation.	487
The Living Wage.	488
Countries of the World—By the Editor
—V.—The Kingdom of Poland	439
Silhouettes	491
Mons. Poincaré as a Man of Letters
—By Charles Sarolea	492
Portrait of Raymond Poincaré	493
Literary Notes	494
The Boy and his Mother—By Gilbert
Thomas	495

The Spirits' Mass—Short Story—By	PAGE
Anatole France	496
Mr. Darrell Figgis' Essays	497
The Night Side of London	498
The Future of the Russian Church—
By Dr. Percy Dearmer	499
Masterpiece of the Week—Balzac's
"Cousin Pons"—By Henri Mazel	500
Correspondence	503
Reviews—
A Japanese Farmer Sage	509
The Moslem Christ	509
A Plea for Scientific Christianity	510
The Struggle for Bread	511
Books of the Week	512

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

BY the overthrow of the Government of Kiamil Pasha the situation in the Near East has been greatly changed for the worse. The Young Turks, who now hold the reins of power, and claim to represent the national sentiment, repudiate the policy of their predecessors. Adrianople, they declare, cannot be ceded. Having taken over the responsibilities of the late Administration, it now devolves upon the Young Turks to send a reply to the Note of the Powers. Meanwhile the Allies, conscious that the peace negotiations have broken down, are preparing for a resumption of hostilities. However, until Turkey has delivered her reply to the Powers the Allies will take no decisive step.

It is, however, unlikely that Turkey will resume hostilities unless pushed to the extreme point of resistance. The Allies are at the moment not averse to a breathing space, and are not likely to push forward a renewal of the attack. Meanwhile the Turkish Government is busy raising money and restoring order in the capital. The Young Turks feel so sure of their hold upon the country that the free circulation of people at night in the streets of Constantinople, which had been stopped in the time of Kiamil Pasha, is now allowed once more. It is rumoured that the Cabinet will endeavour to settle terms direct with the Balkan peoples, independent of the interference of Europe, as it is felt that had previous negotiations been conducted with no outside pressure peace by this time would have been arranged.

The atmosphere of the House of Commons, which for days was heavily charged with excitement, was suddenly thrown into an electrical condition by the reply of the Speaker to a question of Mr. Bonar Law with regard to the amendments on the Government's Franchise Bill relating to women's franchise. Sheltering himself behind the authority of Erskine May, the Speaker said that if the form and substance of the measure were substantially affected by the amendments, as practically to make it a new Bill, it would be necessary to have it withdrawn and re-introduced. The statement created excitement in the House of Commons and searchings of heart in the Cabinet. All doubt on the subject was set at rest on Monday, when the Speaker announced that the Franchise Bill would have to be withdrawn and a fresh Bill introduced if one or other of the amendments to grant women's franchise was inserted. In accordance with the Speaker's ruling, the Prime Minister intimated that the Government would not proceed with the Bill this session. When opportunity offered they hoped to proceed with electoral reform and redistribution, but as regards plural voting, they hoped to deal with it during the present Parliament. The Government, Mr. Asquith continued, were not prepared to introduce a Female Suffrage Bill, but would give facilities for a private member's Bill next session. In view of the new situation the militant Suffragists have resolved to resume their campaign of violence. Mrs. Pankhurst has declared guerilla warfare, in which sorties and riots will form a part. Short of taking human life, Mrs. Pankhurst said, they were warranted in using all the methods that are resorted to in time of war.

In view of the recent crisis in the Unionist party, great interest was taken in Mr. Bonar Law's speech in Edinburgh on Saturday last. In replying to the attacks made upon him, he denied that he had hauled down the flag of Imperial Preference. If returned to power, they intended to impose a moderate tariff on foreign manufactured goods, and to give the Colonies the largest possible preference without the imposition of food taxes. In regard to Home Rule, he said the Government were gambling with the liberties and the rights of the people of the North of Ireland. If the Home Rule Bill should pass through all its stages the King's position would be very difficult. If he gave his assent, one-half of the people would say it ought not to have been given. To put the King in such a position was a crime greater than any that had ever been committed by any Minister who had ever held power.

At a luncheon in London Lord Roberts reiterated his views on national defence. He not only wanted a large army, but one imbued with the patriotism of the Bulgarians and Servians. He denied that national defence was a party question.

A deputation of the British Cotton-growing Association waited on Mr. Asquith with the request that the Government should guarantee a loan of three millions, to be spent in turning the Gezira Desert, in the Sudan, into a rich cotton field. Mr. Asquith acceded to the request. Already a Bill has been drafted, to be introduced at the earliest possible opportunity next session.

Lord Hardinge has sufficiently recovered from his wounds to be present at the Legislative Council at Delhi. He said the recent outrage would not make him waver a hair's breadth from the policy he had pursued. He had confidence in the determination of the people of India to stamp out the fungus growth of terrorism.

THE CULT OF PLEASURE

MORALISTS in all ages have found a fruitful theme for meditation in the enervating effects of civilisation. That civilisation, when it reaches a high stage of development, that man, just when victorious in his conflict with Nature, should find a blight falling upon his highest powers—this is, indeed, the paradox of history. Every schoolboy knows how luxurious living, devotion to the cult of Pleasure, sapped the energies of the ancient Romans and made them an easy prey to the hardy, vigorous barbarians. Is it to be true of the moderns as of the ancients that when wealth accumulates men decay? Certain ominous social symptoms seem to point in that direction. How else are we to explain the mad race for pleasure, particularly the enormous sums spent in London, for example, in senseless luxury, records of which confront us almost daily in the newspapers? Luxurious living, glaring enough as it is among the idle rich of London, is surpassed by the Americans, who, in this as in other matters, to use their own phraseology, "lick creation." This much is plain from a book, "The Passing of the Idle Rich," written by a member of the American wealthy class, who is alarmed at the frightful extravagance of his own set. Here are a few samples. At the conclusion of an elaborate banquet in New York City the cigarettes were handed round. When each cigarette was unrolled it was found to be wrapped, not in the usual white paper, but in a 100-dollars bill, with the initials of the host in gold letters. In another case the wife of a millionaire wears a necklace that costs more than 600,000 dollars. "The infant son of this favoured lady reposed during his tender years in a cradle that was valued at 10,000 dollars, and a retinue of servants was formed for the sole benefit of the infant. This corps of retainers consisted of four nurse ladies, four high-priced physicians, who examined the child four times a day and posted serious bulletins for the information of the clamant Press and public." The young son of another millionaire had a staff of personal attendants, consisting of two cooks, six grooms, three coachmen, two valets, and one governess. We are told of a 75,000-dollars feast, at which monkeys sat between the guests, and ducks swam about in pools contained in ivory fountains. An entire theatrical company journeyed from New York to entertain a company in which there was drunkenness without conviviality. There is also the account of a banquet given by a wealthy man whose ingenuity was taxed to relieve the monotony of an idle existence. A monster pie was carried before the astounded diners upon the shoulders of four servants. The top crust was cut open—a slip of a girl bounded to her feet; a score of birds were released at the same moment.

So much for the extravagance of the rich, but what of the extravagance of the poor? The horny-handed sons of toil are found elbowing the idle rich in their eagerness to worship in the temple of Pleasure. It is one of the weak points in the Labour movement that the leaders, while eloquent on the rights of the working man, are silent on his duties. One prominent leader recently declared emphatically for the right of working men to get drunk. He would have been more profitably employed in reminding them of their duty to keep sober. Labour leaders might do well, when advocating higher wages, to impress upon the workers the duty of spending their earnings wisely. In this connection they would find ample scope for their energies in starting a crusade against gambling. The misery caused in working class homes owing to this senseless and demoralising craze is appalling. An authority on the subject tells us that not only is gambling prevalent among working men, but their wives are also passing under the influence of the curse. "In many districts bookmakers and their agents go from door to door tempting women to bet. Money given by the husband for food and rent is put on horses, and when it is lost, as it usually is, new furniture and clothes are purchased on the credit system, and pledged to make good the losses. One working man with seven children found himself in debt to the extent of £70 in this way, and the children's beds and cupboards almost destitute of clothes." A Newcastle gentleman, in his evidence before the Royal Commission, said: "I have noticed that the University Extension Movement is dead in many of the mining districts, and that Secondary Schools are scouted by most young men. Drink clubs have taken the place of the lecture rooms, the bookmaker the place of the lecturer, and the sporting newspaper the place of the text book. . . . The intellectual waste caused by betting is enormous. Where gambling has increased I have observed that intellectual movements have decreased. Lads of bright intellect, who might have made the world better, are drawn into the vortex of this madness, and develop low cunning instead of character. They become moral and intellectual wrecks. Their highest ambition is to be a bookmaker."

Some idea of the widespread nature of the gambling epidemic is had from the statement of a leading statistician that over £5,000,000 annually goes into the pockets of the bookmakers, a great proportion of which comes from those living on the edge of poverty. Here surely is a state of matters deserving the earnest and urgent attention of all who are interested in the moral and social well-being of the people. The cult of Pleasure, carried to the extent indicated, spells national degeneracy.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

AN IRISH MYSTIC:

"Æ" AND AGRICULTURAL CO-OPERATION

IRELAND'S economic backwardness has been variously diagnosed. There are some that attribute it to the British Government and to landlordism; others that attribute it to the priest, or to an inherent defect in the character of the people. There are the "Nationalist" arguments on the one hand, and the "Unionist" arguments on the other. We find that during a few years at the end of the eighteenth century Ireland enjoyed complete legislative independence. The period was one of economic prosperity. After the Union in 1800 economic decline set in. The historical case for Home Rule rests upon these facts. Unionists contest their relevance. They assert that the economic prosperity of Ireland under Grattan's Parliament was an artificial condition that could not have been maintained. They hold that the Irish would have profited by the Union if they had not spent their time agitating for its repeal. They point to Belfast and the wealth of Protestant Ulster. But both parties agree that Ireland has not made full use of her considerable natural resources.

I.

The Nationalists said: "We must wait upon Home Rule"; the Unionists: "Let first the revolutionary agitation be stamped out." Meanwhile, an Irishman, Sir Horace Plunkett, returned from an American visit, and ignoring the warnings of both parties, founded the co-operative movement in Agriculture, which is the subject of this book.* Sir Horace Plunkett had his own views on the constitutional question; but he felt at the same time that the Irish problem was not so much a political as an economic and social problem. Nor did he believe that the fate of his country was being finally decided, or could be finally decided, by the results of general elections or votings at Westminster. Salvation must come from within—a proposition that Parliamentarians as a rule find it difficult to accept.

II.

Sir Horace Plunkett did not seek battle with the Parliamentary leaders of Irish opinion; but, indeed, invited them into his council. Mr. Redmond was not at once unfriendly; until lately, indeed, two members of the Home Rule party have been actively associated with his work. The most definite opposition first came from the Orangemen, who accused Sir Horace of "trafficking with rebels." To-day, however, the Irish Unionist M.P.'s are, nominally at least, in sympathy with the movement, whereas the Irish Nationalist party is openly hostile. Sir Horace Plunkett's propaganda has been successful in the sphere of practical action, which is the great thing; but it has also spread the light of ideas. Irishmen are still Home Rulers, but they no longer believe that Home Rule will usher in the millennium. Nor do the Nationalist M.P.'s themselves now attack the theory of the movement; that criticism of Sir Horace Plunkett is based upon the fact that with him theory and practice do not correspond. He is, they say, a Unionist politician first and last. Agricultural co-operation is an excellent thing; but in Ireland it has been worked as a piece of mere political strategy, the aim of Sir Horace being to destroy the Home Rule party.

* "Co-operation and Agriculture." By Æ. 1s. (Maunsel and Co.)

III.

There are able Irishmen who are neither in Parliament nor in the Civil Services, nor yet in the Army—men whose ambition it is to serve Ireland in Ireland, and who will not wait for Home Rule to begin—and among these Sir Horace Plunkett finds his best champions. The author of "Co-operation and Nationality" is a notable Irishman of this type. Mr. George Russell (or, as he calls himself, "Æ") is a poet, a painter, a mystic, who, as editor of the Irish Homestead, the journal of the Irish Agricultural Organisation Society, has more influence upon the thought of this generation in Ireland than any other man. How was "Æ" drawn into the vortex of Irish controversy? The story goes that Mr. W. B. Yeats told Sir Horace Plunkett, some years ago, that if he wanted the Irish people to listen to economic doctrine he must get a poet to teach it to them. Mr. Yeats himself was not available; but "Æ's" name was suggested—a young man who earned his livelihood as an accountant, but was then best known to the town as the author of a little book of mystical poems, "Homeward Songs by the Way," as Mr. Yeats' co-worker in the Irish literary revival and as prophet of the Celtic nature faiths. Sir Horace Plunkett caught Mr. Yeats' idea, and immediately engaged "Æ's" services. "Æ" went round Ireland on a bicycle, preaching the doctrine of co-operation, "winning friends to the movement wherever he went," as Mr. George Moore has said, "by his personal magnetism and the eloquence of his belief in Plunkett."

IV.

"Æ" believes in humanity, and especially in rural humanity, and he believes in Ireland. There is only one great centre of manufacture in Ireland—Belfast; but probably "Æ" is not sorry that Ireland had so little share in the great industrial progress of the nineteenth century. He does not ask, as the Ulstermen do, why Catholic Ireland does not produce a Belfast, if it wants to keep its population at home, and stop grumbling. "The thoughts of the world," he says, "have been too much with the cities." The miracle to be wrought is the creation of a rural civilisation; but civilisation can only be attained when the community is organised and has strength to retain some surplus of wealth beyond what is required for the bare necessities of life. The main need of Ireland is another agricultural revolution. The Irish farmer has thrown off the yoke of the landlords, but he is now enmeshed in the toils of the middlemen, who make sure that his riches "shall not prove a stumbling-block at his entrance into the Kingdom of Heaven." "The old aristocracies swaggered royally to the devil. They borrowed money at sixty per cent. and ruined themselves. The new aristocracy, whose coming I dread, have been accustomed to lend money at sixty per cent., and ruin others." What will be the end of it, if we do not beware? Not Socialism, but the Servile State, the establishment of which is an even more actual danger in Ireland than in England. Sir Horace Plunkett, because he foresaw that danger and preached self-reliance, initiative and independence of spirit, inevitably provoked the hostility of those who believed in the power of the State to make people prosperous by Act of Parliament, or by stopping other people from passing such Acts.

V.

"Æ" has the Irishman's gift for controversy and an Irishman's pugnacity. He does not spare those who have represented the Irish agricultural movement to be a "piece of mere political strategy." The conspiracy against Irish agricultural co-operation originated in the small country towns, the shopkeepers in which are large subscribers to the funds of the Irish Parliamentary party. What is this class which dominates Irish politics? It has a bad economic reputation. These shopkeepers are the universal credit-givers in the country districts (Mr. Shaw referred to them in EVERYMAN the other day as the Ikey Mo's of Mr. Chesterton in Ireland—really Tim Malones). At the fairs they combine market-rigging with money-lending. Well, people have accused the co-operative movement of decreeing capital punishment to the centres of their activities—the country towns. It is not quite true; at any rate, "some rows of licensed premises, with a few men spitting at the corners, do not constitute a civilisation whose lapsing Ireland need lament over with too exquisite a pain."

VI.

The soundness of the economics of "Æ" has been questioned; his eloquence as a controversialist is rivalled by other Irishmen; but the book is finally the vision of a poet. "I hate the people," writes "Æ," "who talk scornfully of Paddy or Hodge, of those who work on the land, as if the low brow and the dull brain were an inevitable accompaniment of such toil, as if spirit were not there, an awful presence, a majesty imprisoned from the infinite." His book is for those who know humanity is going "from the great Deep to the great Deep of Deity, with wind and wave, fire and water, stars and suns, lofty companions for it on its path of a divine destiny." "Æ's" rôle in Ireland reminds one, of course, of that of William Morris in England. He too is the poet turned economist who has kept his vision. And if one were to compare the vision, the philosophy, the economics of "Æ" with the vision, the philosophy, the economics of Morris, one would perhaps find the difference between Ireland and England. I should like to make such a comparison, but "Æ's" mystical writing, his poetry, and his paintings are, alas! insufficiently known in this country, and it would involve too great a trespass upon the space of EVERYMAN.

social else are we particularly the example, in se.

front us almost da

LIVING WAGE

living, glaringly enought the case for a living wage London, is surpassed by moderation. He does con-as in other matters, to use to a good deal further than creation." This much is pilt to live," but he does Passing of the Idle Rich," writz theories to affect his American wealthy class, who is a has resisted, if he ful extravagance of his own set. trinaire, and has samples. At the conclusion of an eem he discusses in New York City the cigarettes were of view.

When each cigarette was unrolled it wa;tulate; it is wrapped, not in the usual white paper, bng. But it dollars bill, with the initials of the host in gorant. It In another case the wife of a millionaire wears cry, to lace that costs more than 600,000 dollars. on of infant son of this favoured lady reposed during the tender years in a cradle that was valued at 100cy, dollars, and a retinue of servants was formed fo: all sole benefit of the infant. This corps of retainth consisted of four nurse ladies, four high-priced net. sicians, who examined the child four times a da and physical well-being, enough to enable him to qualify to discharge his duties as a citizen." The practical objections are all based on expediency. Dislocation of trade would, no doubt, follow an ill-judged application of an accepted principle, and the interference of the State is not a good thing in itself. Mr. Snowden is careful to demonstrate that the State has, with much reluctance and in simple obedience to the logic of facts, admitted the principle of interference with wages. The only question now left to answer is, how far should that interference go? The strikes of 1911 and 1912 showed the workers in a new light; not as the antagonists of capital, but as the enemies of society at large. Society at large replied by "disclosing a power of resistance which was a surprise and a discomfiture" to the organisers of the revolt; but the harm done to the principle of voluntary conciliation in disputes about wages is probably irreparable. A sanction is necessary, and will and must be found in the immediate future.

To those who are inclined to qualify wage reform as fantastic, Mr. Snowden replies by enumerating its results in those of our colonies where it has been tried. Various are the schemes, but almost invariable has been the success. The question whether what can be done in a new country can be done with equal effect in an old country is not propounded, explicitly at least. Mr. Snowden points out that "there are many industries, employing large numbers of workers, where substantial advantages might be given without incurring the least risk of injury to the trade." He instances "government and municipal service, the railways, the transport trades, and, to a great extent, coal-mining and the building industry." Some industries must be carefully handled, and some concerns even had better cease, to be replaced by others, better and more humanely administered.

The possibility of a successful reform is proved by the continual upward progress of taxable income, with no corresponding ascent on the part of wages, whether real or monetary. Mr. Snowden stipulates that the wage-earner should not be "the last person considered" in the distribution of the spoil. Wages are largely governed by the needs of the least employable. A sound minimum wage means better remuneration for the best workers. The agitation has come from the more thriving of the wage-earners; it has always been so since the time of the peasants who made the French Revolution, and probably before; at any rate, de Tocqueville first discovered the truth from this particular instance. Starvation wages are a blight that affects the whole body politic; labour and capital suffer, though not in an equal degree; the margin of subsistence is a very vulnerable condition.

Mr. Snowden does not ask us to surrender our national prosperity at the bidding of abstract justice; he does not impeach well-husbanded capital and imaginative brains; he merely asks the whole community to make of the cause of the starveling their own cause. Though mercy seasoned with justice happens to be the best policy for the community and its members, it is the moral aspect of the matter that concerns us most—the contemplation of a savage injustice, without hope or endeavour to mend it, is bad for us all, and sets up an apathy that is in danger of degenerating into a mere callous indifference to the sufferings of others, so long as we ourselves are not affected. To rule out certain of our fellows from our purview is mentally to shorten our sight and narrow our vision. You cannot injure a member of the body politic without affecting the whole; thus a veto on the human aspirations of a large part of our largest class of citizens is bad for the community.

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD * * * BY THE EDITOR

V.—THE KINGDOM OF POLAND: WHERE THREE EMPIRES MEET

I.

THE English traveller on his way from London to Odessa, after crossing the dreary march of Brandenburg, reaches a vast and monotonous plain where three Empires meet, where Prussia ends, where Russia and Austria begin, a region inhabited by one of the most gifted races of Europe, whose sufferings are one of the tragedies of history, and whose future is one of the perplexing enigmas of international politics. That vast plain, of which no hill relieves the melancholy uniformity, is the once mighty Kingdom of Poland. It is true that neither the name of the country nor that of the people appears on any map of Europe, but then it is often the most important maps that are ignored by the cartographer. In this case it must be confessed in extenuation of the cartographer's omission that the boundaries of that Kingdom of Poland are arbitrary and indefinite. Few geographers will agree as to the exact area occupied by the Polish race. But we shall not be far wrong if we estimate the total number of Polish-speaking people at twenty millions, of whom four millions belong to Austria, and four millions and twelve millions respectively are unwilling subjects of the Kaiser and of the Czar. And that number is increasing, for amongst many uncertainties one fact is certain, that in the wide expanse where the Pole and the Teuton are confronted, it is the Teuton who is losing ground, and it is the Pole who is gaining.

II.

Perhaps the simplest way to explain the unique position of Poland to a British reader is to describe her as the Ireland of Central Europe, with this difference, that whereas Ireland has long ago been delivered from the despotism of the Conqueror, Poland is still in the grip of her oppressors. Otherwise the annals of Poland are very much a repetition of the tragic annals of Ireland, and both countries make a similar appeal to the student of history, of ethics, and of politics.

In the first place, we ought to be interested in Poland on historical grounds. Poland can boast of a heroic past. On more than one occasion Poland saved Europe from the invasion of Turk and Tartar, and although the Poles are branded to-day by the Russians and Prussians as an inferior race, predestined to slavery, the truth is that Poland was a highly civilised country when the Prussians and the Russians were only hordes of barbarians.

In the second place, we ought to be interested in Poland on moral grounds, for the Poles have been, and still are, the victims of an odious persecution, which must rouse the indignation of all those who believe in justice, and who believe in freedom.

In the third place, we ought to be interested in Poland on practical grounds, because the question of Poland remains a burning question. Poland remains an open sore. The map of Europe is just now being recast in South-Eastern Europe, on the principle that each nation has the right to decide her own destinies, on the principle that the Balkans belong to the Balkan people. It is quite safe to prophesy that the next great change will take place in North-Eastern Europe, and on exactly the same basis of the great principle of nationalities, and that a not distant future will see the resurrection of the ancient Kingdom of Poland.

III.

The "partition" of Poland, the murder of a great civilised people, is one of the most revolting political crimes of modern times. Of this crime, Frederic, called "the Great," was the instigator, and he secured impunity for his crime by obtaining the complicity of Russia and Austria, of Maria Theresa and Catherine "the Great." To use the cynical phrase of Frederic, "the three Sovereigns partook of the Eucharistic body of Poland." The three murderers of the Polish nation have tried to justify themselves, and they have justified themselves by slandering the Poles. Even thus, in Imperial Rome, the public executioner dishonoured his victim before execution. We are told that the Poles fully deserved their fate. We are told that they were a prey to the Jesuits, or that they were a prey to anarchy, or that they were a prey to an unruly aristocracy. We have been long familiar in the past with similar arguments on the Irish Question, and in both controversies the arguments have about equal value. It is quite true that Poland was a prey to anarchy, but that anarchy was largely caused by the intrigues of her mighty neighbours. It is quite true that after playing an important part in European culture, after resisting the Tartar and the Turk, the Polish aristocracy oppressed the people whom they had originally saved. But, alas! the oppression of the people by a tyrannical aristocracy is not a phenomenon peculiar to Poland, and it was more apparent in Poland simply because of the total absence of any Middle Class, owing to the poverty of the country, and owing to the insecurity of war. It is only in our own generation that we have witnessed in Poland the gradual emergence of a Middle Class. Even to-day trade and industry are largely in the hands of the Jews, to whom, for historical reasons, Poland has become a country of refuge, and a second Palestine. About four million Jews are living within the limits of the old Kingdom.

In any case, those accusations against Polish anarchy, against the unruly Polish aristocracy, were only a thinly veiled pretence on the part of the conquerors to excuse their crime. Those excuses were merely used to deceive public opinion. In his moments of cynical outspokenness, Frederic, yclept "the Great," never concealed his real motive for the annexation of Poland, which was the same as his motive for the annexation of Silesia, namely, self-aggrandisement and the lust of territory.

IV.

It is, then, under such flimsy pretences, which added insult to violence, that Poland was divided amongst the three Empires of Central Europe, and that Poland was deleted from the map of Europe. This is not the place to recall the tragic history of the nation since the Partition. In Austria the Poles rose and failed, they rose again and succeeded, and were granted autonomy. In Prussia the Poles were too few, and the army of the Hohenzollern too strong to give any chance to the rebels; they had, therefore, to be content with opposing a passive and sullen resistance to unjust laws. But most poignant of all was the national tragedy in Russia. The Poles rose in 1830, they rose again in 1863, and once more they rose in 1905. Each time they were unsuccessful. After each revolution, they have been governed with more ruthless severity. Oppression, suppression, and repression have been the three recurrent phases in the monotonous drama of Russian Poland.

To a superficial observer, the story of the Polish nation may appear to be, on the whole, a history of national failure, but as in Ireland, so in Poland, the people have really triumphed. For their spirit has never been broken. The strength of the three great military powers has not been equal to the indomitable resistance of a poverty-stricken, disarmed, dismembered race. The Polish people were determined to live, and as a result they are stronger to-day than they were a hundred years ago. Poland is to-day more than a dream, more than a pious aspiration. Unless patriotism is only an illusion, unless nationality is only based on political force, and is to be measured only by commercial success, the Polish nationality is an accomplished fact, for the Polish people are united by the strongest bonds which can unite any people: a common language, a common religion, common traditions, the memory of common sufferings, and an unshakable faith in a common Destiny.

V.

Of the three component parts of Poland, the Austrian part, Galicia, need not detain us, although to the ordinary traveller it is far more interesting than the two other parts. Its capital, Krakow, the Polish Rome, is one of the historical cities of the world. Austrian Poland possesses in the Carpathian Mountains some of the finest scenery in Central Europe.

Its Alpine resorts attract an ever-increasing number of tourists, and Zakopane is, in summer, a brilliant and fascinating Kurort, and the gathering place of Polish patriots from the three Empires. But to the student of politics, Austrian Poland appeals much less than Prussian or Russian Poland, except in so far as it shows the political capacity of the people. After being the most disloyal, Galicia has become one of the most loyal provinces of the Austrian Empire. The influence of the Austrian Poles in politics is shown not on the side of anarchy, but on the side of conciliation and moderation. The result of such Polish autonomy as has been granted to Galicia is the best answer to those that maintain that the Poles are incapable of self-government.

VI.

If Austrian Poland is the least important, Russian Poland is the most important of the three branches of the Polish family. It is also the most homogeneous. There are some tens of thousands of Germans, three hundred and fifty thousand Russian soldiers and officials, and nine hundred thousand Jews, who are the proletariat of Israel. But the bulk of a population of over twelve millions are Poles, and their numbers are rapidly increasing with the industrial expansion and the prosperity of the country, for as Prince von Bülow, the German Chancellor, put it, the Poles breed like rabbits. He might, perhaps, have added that they have often been shot like rabbits. Russian Poland, with the ancient capital of the Kingdom, Warsaw (population, 850,000), is one of the busiest centres of the Russian Empire. But this extraordinary industrial and commercial expansion has brought neither contentment nor real prosperity to the people. Not only has Russian Poland more than her share of the industrial unrest, prevalent all over Europe, but that industrial unrest is complicated by constant political and religious troubles, by the conflict between conquerors and conquered, between Greek Orthodox and Roman Catholic. Warsaw, once the gayest of cities, is now one of the saddest. Occupied by a Russian army corps, she gives the impression of a beleaguered city. Any political life, or even any expression of political opinion, is impossible. The writer of these lines was invited not long ago, by a group of leading Liberals in Warsaw, to give a lecture describing his impressions of the country. He accepted the invitation, but was given to understand that it would be safer for him not to deliver his address, and the recent arrest and imprisonment of a British citizen, Miss Malecka, clearly proved that it was better to err on the side of caution.

As there is no political life, so there is little intercourse between the different sections of the people. The Jew does not mix with the Christian, nor the Pole with the Russian. Social life is at its lowest ebb. The police is everywhere visible, and the Polish population lives in an atmosphere of suspicion and terror.

VII.

It seems inconceivable that national antipathy could go any further than the antipathy of the Pole for the Russian, yet Prussia has succeeded in inspiring her Polish subjects with a hatred even more deadly. And this is not because Poles and Russians belong to the same Slav race, whilst Poles and Prussians belong to different races. The Pole hates the Prussian, because there is in Prussian despotism something even more odious than in Russian despotism. The Russian is content to persecute the Pole, but the Prussian both persecutes him, despises him, and slanders him. The Russian at least does not use any canting phrases. He oppresses the Pole, merely because he is the stronger. The Prussian oppresses the Pole, and calls it civilising him. He brands him as being of an inferior stamp. German Liberals have denounced the imperial policy for two generations. But it is getting worse. The Pole is not allowed to hold public meetings, or to wear his national colours. The Polish child is not allowed to pray in its mother-tongue, because German culture, forsooth, in virtue of its superiority, must stamp out Polish culture. The Polish peasant is not allowed to possess the land of his fathers, and whereas the Russian bureaucracy in the days of Milioutine has distributed millions of acres to Polish peasants, the Prussian bureaucracy have already spent hundreds of millions of marks to expropriate them.

VIII.

Limitation of space prevents me from discussing the Prussian theory. Nor is it worth discussing. The whole pedantic contention can be disproved by the summary verdict of history, and disposed of in the following single remark: Surely a race which in modern times has produced a thinker like Copernic, a hero like Sobieski, a musician like Chopin, a poet like Mickiewicz, a physicist like Madame Curie, a race which still can boast of the most beautiful, the most witty women of Central Europe, cannot be said to be so incurably inferior to the heavy East Prussian, nor will such a race be subjected much longer to brutal persecution.

SILHOUETTES

From the gallery of memory, mufascopic and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

HE was a hard man, and a successful one. He had fought his way from the rut of mediocrity to the head of a large firm. Men did his bidding eagerly, women trembled at his frown, not an employé but felt a sickening of the heart when he drew near.

He was hated, but he was feared, and the sense of power and of authority grew within him.

It was an early day of spring, and the open window of his office let in a glimpse of blue sky, the waving branches of a tree, grown old in the greyness of the city, but still, with infinite charity, renewing every year its promise of green leaves. But neither the warm sunshine, the note of the birds, nor the scents of spring stirred the ice at his heart, and he frowned severely when he caught his typist smiling at the golden weather.

The girl fulfilled her duties with punctuality and with despatch; in his regard she was a highly skilled and technically efficient machine. Her smile irritated him, he was reminded of the world outside his office, a world of youth and hope, of eager strivings and deep longings, a world that he had left years ago when he went to the great city.

The typist made quite three mistakes in a letter he was dictating, and stumbled hopelessly when he asked her to read it. She wore a flower in her belt, and the ogre was irritably conscious of its scent. The perfume lingered after she had left. He did not immediately summon a second minion, as was his custom, but, opening his door, discovered, within a stone's-throw, his typist and a clerk in conversation. The look on her face, the light on his, told the same tale. They had broken the ogre's iron law, forgotten the grind of the machine, and remembered only for a moment youth's enchanted garden. The ogre had no understanding of the lapse, however, and decided the girl must leave, and the young man also.

He rang his bell, and directed the girl should come before him. The summons was not immediately obeyed, and as he waited the same insistent scent that had troubled him before came to him again. His keen eyes saw a touch of rich red-brown upon the carpet—brown with a glint of gold—and he picked up a sprig of gillyflower. The office walls rolled back, giving place to a cottage garden fragrant with lemon thyme, sweet-scented narcissi, old-fashioned flowers. On a may tree a blackbird was singing, and beside him—ay, him, the ogre—stood a girl in a white gown. Her hands were full of blossoms, the soft brown of the gillyflower accentuated the whiteness of her skin. Somehow the scent, pungent yet haunting, was intimately associated with her. She came back to him now on the breath of the perfume. He had talked of the city and the wonderful things that awaited him. She had listened, smiled, sighed, and wished him "God-speed"—and the garden gate had clicked behind him. He had never opened it again. The city with its visions of wealth and power had held him. But the perfume of remembrance remained.

"He wasn't so bad," said the typist. "I am to stay on till we get married, and next month he'll raise my screw. I can't imagine what's come to him, . . . and I thought our luck was right out, Ted, when I lost the bit of gillyflower you gave me!"

MONS. POINCARÉ AS A MAN OF LETTERS

I.

It is often contended that democracy does not care for culture, and that the people have an instinctive distrust for the scholar and the artist. Recent events are an emphatic refutation of such a contention. Almost simultaneously the two greatest democracies of the world, having to choose the head of the Executive, have deliberately chosen two men of letters: the American Republic selected an eminent University professor; the French Republic selected a member of the French Academy, one of the forty Immortals.

II.

I have before me three volumes of the works of the new French President.* They are mainly composed of literary essays, of political and forensic speeches. They are distinguished by all those qualities which we are accustomed to associate with the best French writing: lucidity and logic, symmetry and proportion, ready wit and versatility. Whether the author sings the praise of Joan of Arc, or of the modern French novelist; whether he brings in a financial measure or an Education Bill, his thought is uniformly perspicuous and his language invariably felicitous. But paradoxical though it may appear, the chief merit of those three volumes to the outside reader lies in their total lack of originality. For if M. Poincaré's essays and speeches did reveal any striking originality they would only reflect the personality of the writer. On the contrary, being entirely devoid of originality, they express all the more faithfully the opinions of millions of Frenchmen. And for the first citizen of a democracy it is so much more important to be the spokesman of millions of his fellow-citizens than to merely express his own vision of the world.

III.

A perfect equipoise of judgment, an instinct for realities, a sense of measure, what the French call "le juste milieu," and what Matthew Arnold would have called "sweetness and light," are amongst the most obvious qualities of Poincaré's writings. He is a man of principle; he is not a mere opportunist and a time-server.

"The foundation of all politics is ethical. Politics are founded on a belief in goodness, in justice, in the love of truth, in the respect of human conscience, in the destinies of our country. Politics which are worthy of the name cannot live from day to day on empirical measures and contradictory expedients."

At the same time he is not a man of Utopias.

"The French people have faith in principles. They believe in the ideal. They have an innate taste and a traditional need for general ideas, but they do not confuse general ideas with vague ideas, principles with formulas, ideals with terms. They want solid living realities."

He is a genuine democrat. But he is also a resolute anti-socialist. He believes in the French Revolution, but he stops at 1789; he does not go as far as 1793. He does not think that the Republic can be saved by a Reign of Terror.

"With the party of agitation, of violence, of disorder, no political understanding is possible. A Government which would seek it would abdicate its authority, and would itself defy the law. A Government which would submit to it, or which would not repudiate it, would be swept away by its own hypocritical and equivocal policy."

* Idees Contemporaines, Questions et Figures Politiques, Causes Littéraires et Artistiques.

He believes in the supremacy of individual reason and conscience. He is determined to resist the tyranny of the Church. But he is no less determined to resist the tyranny of the State.

"The action of Government cannot extend to the intimate thoughts of individuals. Political life is not the final end of Man. Human energies which put in motion the social mechanism are not entirely absorbed by it. The State cannot be allowed to encroach on the liberty of human reason, and this liberty outside the sphere of the State constitutes the inner life of the Soul. Our individual energies are not wholly attracted and captured by the social mechanism. Human Society is made of free volitions, and it is only on an absolute respect for human dignity that the greatness of a community can be established."

IV.

It would be unfair to call Monsieur Poincaré a Conservative, and it is an appellation which his supporters would particularly resent, for the word "Conservative" is in very bad odour in France, and is synonymous with reaction. He delights in appearing as a Modern of the Moderns. He glorifies recent tendencies in Literature and Art. Yet his sympathies are with the past as much as with the present. He likes to repeat the famous words of Comte, "The Dead count for as much as the Living" ("L'humanité se compose de plus de morts que de vivants"). He has been nourished on the humanities, and he would probably contend that, even so far as the French Revolution is concerned, it was not merely an overthrow of the past, but a return to the most ancient democratic traditions of humanity.

But the dominant note of Poincaré's Essays and Speeches is the patriotic note. He is a citizen of Lorraine, and, as we said in our last number, Lorraine inspires her children with a patriotism more intimate, more anxious, more tender, than any other region in France. The love of France is his supreme inspiration. He is, no doubt, a good European, because he assumes that a good Frenchman must necessarily be a good European, because French culture is bound up with universal human culture. But I suspect that M. Poincaré has little interest in European culture as distinct from French culture.

V.

This cursory analysis of the characteristics underlying M. Poincaré's writings will enable us to some extent to forecast the policy which the new President will try to impress upon his Ministers.

I do not think that his Home Policy will be one mainly of social reform. It will mainly be a policy of Republican concentration and of resistance to lawlessness.

Even as his Home Policy will be mainly a policy of resistance to the party of disorder, M. Poincaré's Foreign Policy will be mainly a policy of resistance to the encroachments of Germany. We may expect a firm though conciliatory attitude in international affairs, and a strict adherence of France to the Triple Entente. And this vigorous Foreign Policy will entail increased Naval and Military expenditure. That is another reason why his Home Policy cannot be one of Social Reform. Social Reforms cost a great deal of money, and for the next seven years all the available resources of France will be claimed by the exigencies of national defence.

CHARLES SAROLEA.

RAYMOND POINCARÉ, NATUS 1860

LITERARY NOTES

SATURDAY last being the anniversary of Burns's natal day, the floodgates of oratory were opened, and copious streams of eloquence flowed from hundreds of Scottish tongues. I think it is Andrew Lang who reminds us that on few literary subjects has more been said or written than on Robert Burns, and that on none, perhaps, is it more difficult to say anything satisfactory. The first statement is indisputable. Shakespeare alone excepted, no poet has been the subject of so vast a volume of praise. As to the second, I am not so sure. I should say that many quite satisfactory estimates of Burns's poetry are forthcoming at the annual festivals held in his honour.

Where, it seems to me, the real difficulty comes in is with regard to Burns the man. When shall the critic arise who, undeterred by indiscriminate eulogists of Burns and the glamour of his poetic genius, will courageously face the problem of his life? It is a difficult and thankless task, as Campbell Shairp and Henley, among modern critics, found; but it has still to be done. The truth is, Burns has been canonised. His devotees not only insist upon the supreme merit of his poetical achievement, but upon his singular worth as a man. I have read Burns orations in which the poet's life was extolled as a great moral triumph, and I have even known him to be claimed as "a wise religious teacher." It is high time that there was an end of such hypocritical talk. Those who are guilty of it are no true friends to Burns's memory.

The late Lord James of Hereford played so conspicuous a part in legal, political, and social circles that it would have been regrettable had no record of his brilliant career been forthcoming. His executors, however, have arranged for a biography, and have entrusted the writing of it to Mr. Alfred Lyttelton, M.P. No doubt they have been influenced in this decision by the fact that Mr. Lyttelton was for four years Legal Private Secretary to Lord James when the latter (then Sir Henry James) was Attorney-General. Mr. Lyttelton, so far, has been innocent of authorship, and it is difficult to say what are his literary qualifications, but at any rate the biography ought to be strong on the legal side.

Canon Julian's death removes the foremost British hymnologist. His "Dictionary of Hymnology" is the most valuable and comprehensive work of its kind in existence. First published in 1892, it was the fruit of more than ten years' laborious investigation. The MSS. used in the work number nearly 10,000. But this monumental "Dictionary," which sets forth the origin and history of Christian hymns of all ages and nations, was only one of many valuable contributions to hymnology, for Canon Julian was indefatigable in his devotion to the history and elucidation of sacred song. Personally, he was a man of much charm, and was always most willing to place his vast stores of hymnological learning at the disposal of those who sought his help. Canon Julian had a very large collection of hymnological books and MSS., which have now found a permanent home at the Church House, Dean's Yard, London.

My recent note on the authorship of the "Canadian Boat-Song" has brought me an article by Mr. Hector Macpherson, which sheds fresh light on the subject. As I indicated a fortnight ago, the "Canadian Boat-

Song" was printed in Blackwood in 1829 as "received from a friend in Canada." Galt, as I also noted, was then in the Dominion, and was corresponding with the publishers of the magazine, two facts that seem to establish a strong presumption in his favour. Mr. Macpherson now supplies another link in the chain of evidence by producing a letter which Galt wrote to David Macbeth Moir (Delta), relating how he had been rowed down the St. Lawrence by Canadian boatmen, who enlivened the voyage with songs. "Here," as Mr. Macpherson says, "we have circumstantial evidence, approaching to demonstration, that the author of the 'Canadian Boat-Song' was no other than John Galt."

The barriers between England and Scotland have all been swept away except one—the linguistic. Incredible it may seem, but it is a fact that the pronunciation of English by a Scotsman differs in not a few respects from that of a Briton born south of the Tweed. And in saying this I am not thinking of the Scot whose speech is, for the most part, the dialect of the northern kingdom, but of the educated Scotsman who wishes to speak standard English. Even long residence in England makes little difference. The reasons are somewhat obscure, but no doubt some light will be shed on the subject in a work entitled "The Pronunciation of English in Scotland," by William Grant, which the Cambridge Press are publishing shortly.

Why have we never had a biography of so interesting a personage as Anthony Trollope? His "Autobiography," no doubt, is both informative and amusing, but it can hardly take the place of a biography. Happily, there is now some prospect of the gap being filled by a monograph which Mr. T. H. S. Escott is publishing through Mr. John Lane. I hope it will compel reconsideration of the popular judgment of Trollope, which has been a little unkind. Trollope is usually regarded as a mediocre person, who turned out novels with the unfailing regularity with which a factory turns out boots. Be it so; but at any rate his books are readable and wholesome, which is saying more than can be said of the work of some novelists who stand much higher in literary favour.

It would really seem as if Mr. A. C. Benson were going to take the place of Mr. Andrew Lang, both as regards versatility and industry. He has already more than thirty volumes to his credit, and next month he adds to the number with a volume of essays entitled "Along the Road." Not a bad record for a writer who has just turned fifty. And if Mr. Benson gives us quantity, he also gives us quality. He has made his mark in literary criticism, biography, and history; he has also won distinction as a scholar, essayist, and critic. The extreme felicity of the titles of many of Mr. Benson's books is, to my mind, a most notable feature. "The House of Quiet," "The Hill of Trouble," "The Isles of Sunset," "The Thread of Gold," "Beside Still Waters," are titles which cling to the memory.

With the appearance of Vols. 19 and 20 ("The Dynasts" and "Time's Laughing Stocks"), Messrs. Macmillan have completed the publication of the Wessex edition of Mr. Thomas Hardy's works. Each volume is furnished with a preface and notes; also a frontispiece in photogravure and a map of the Wessex of the novels and poems.

X. Y. Z.

THE BOY AND HIS MOTHER * * * BY GILBERT THOMAS

I.

THE question as to whether the public school system is a success or a failure is, as it has been before, and as it will be again and again until it is finally settled, one of the questions of the hour. It is a question that has attracted the attention of every type of professional and lay critic, and innumerable remedies have been suggested for innumerable complaints. Nor out of all this welter of debate has much light dawned; simply because, as is too often the case with public discussions, the solution has been sought by worrying around side issues and neglecting the heart of the situation. The educational toothache can only be removed by removing the offending tooth; any amount of poulticing can only serve, in the long run, to aggravate the wound which it strives to heal. In an admirably sincere and refreshingly common-sense book just issued anonymously under the title of "A Housemaster's Letters," the author, who is obviously a man of wide and genuine experience with a deep sense of the responsibility attaching to his profession, lays his finger with sure judgment upon the offending tooth. I say that he has a deep sense of his responsibility, and he makes no attempt to shirk it. He has a loyal faith in the public school, and a high estimate of what it is able to achieve. Nevertheless, he is convinced that why the public school fails to realise the ideal is because its limitations are insufficiently realised—not, as superficial critics urge, by the public school authorities themselves, but by the parents who surrender their boys to the care of a system from which they expect more than the best organised system can possibly supply.

II.

The mistake which the average parent makes is to regard the public school as affording in itself a whole and perfect education for the body, mind, and soul of a boy when once he is released from his mother's apron-strings. Whereas, the truth is, of course, that there is no time when a boy stands more in need, especially of a mother's influence, than when he is cast as "a waif upon the wind," to quote the Harrow song, into the vortex of school life. It is then that the mother must let her spirit go forth to him in her letters; while in the holidays—and it is a mistake to suppose that the holidays are a day too long—she must take every opportunity of maintaining and deepening that spiritual communion between mother and son which is the choicest of God's gifts to both. It is the purpose of the public school to supply the wind of discipline, to strengthen and to prune the garden of the young life; it is the mother's part to supply the sun, to mellow, to beautify and mature. Therefore, fond mother, let the garden which God has given into your care have plenty of sun. Without plenty of sun, it must wither; and, if it wither, the wind, unable to fulfil its true function, since it has not the right soil to work upon, can only wither it the more. Given good soil, the public school can produce good results; but given bad soil, it can only achieve indifferent results. It cannot gather grapes of thistles.

III.

Now all this is not to suggest that the mothers of our public school boys are guilty of wilful neglect. Such a thing is unthinkable, except in those very rare instances which, we are told, always go to prove the rule. It is simply a case of misunderstanding. As the author of the book I have mentioned says, there is an idea abroad that too much maternal attention makes a boy effeminate. It is false. Too much sentimentality, too much surface fussiness, is ruinous to the constitution of any soul; but too much healthy sentiment it is impossible for a mother to bestow upon her son. And yet so deeply has this fear of effeminacy taken root in the mother's heart that when her boy comes home for the holidays she makes no attempt to melt the solid ice of reticence with which she is confronted, and sometimes she even tries to keep as much as possible out of his way, lest she should prove a stumbling-block to his manhood! While the boy, in the presence of his mother's reserve, recoils more and more into his own shell, much as he yearns for the warmth of her sympathy. What a pathetic misunderstanding on both sides!

IV.

If the public school problem (falsely so called) is to be solved, the mother must rid herself of this wholly erroneous notion, and remember that the highest type of manhood is that in which there is most of gentleness. Remembering this, she will no longer hesitate to open her heart freely to the youngster during his holidays, and she will be surprised to see how quickly the apparently impenetrable ice thaws under the sunshine of her sympathy. She will learn to talk easily to the boy about her own interests and her own doings, and she will be surprised to find how much more ready he is to admit her into his own confidences. She will learn to take him about with her; nor will she hesitate to let him mix freely in feminine society, if once she realises how heavily the responsibility of the boy's ultimate attitude towards womanhood weighs upon her own shoulders, and how vital is that attitude in the forming of his character.

V.

And, finally, the mother will not forget that the true education and culture of her son's mind, while largely the father's concern, is still more largely her own. At school the boy will learn that any two sides of a triangle are together greater than the third, and will pick up smatterings of knowledge on various concrete subjects. But, after all, what is taught at school is less of intrinsic value than it is of worth as a sharpener of the receptive faculties; the true flower of culture must always be of home growth. The wise mother, therefore, will do all in her power to encourage her son to read and to think for himself, and she will not deny him any reasonable class of literature for which he may show an affinity. And, if she be truly wise, she will make a regular habit of reading to him herself. For, while many boys will only read books of an ephemeral order spontaneously, they will often listen to words of more permanent worth when they come through the medium of a mother's lips, and irradiated with a diviner glory in that they come also with the emphasis of a mother's heart. By thus reading to her boy, a mother not only unlocks for him treasure houses of wisdom and beauty, but she establishes a still fuller spiritual bond between herself and him, which nothing can destroy, and which will remain eternally fresh even when the primroses have blossomed many times, perchance, upon her grave.

THE SPIRITS' MASS * * BY ANATOLE FRANCE

THIS is the story that the sacristan of the church of Ste. Eulalie at Neuville d'Aumont told me in the arbour of the "White Horse" one fine summer's evening, as he drank a bottle of old wine to the health of a well-to-do man who had died, and whom he had that very morning carried to his grave with all due honour, covered by a pall strewn with fine silver tears.

"My poor dear father" (to use the sacristan's own words) "was a grave-digger all his life. He had a pleasant disposition, which was doubtless the effect of his trade, for it has been observed that people who work in graveyards are of a jovial nature. Death does not frighten them; they never think about it. As for myself, sir, I go into a graveyard at night as calmly as into the arbour of the 'White Horse.' And if by any chance I meet a ghost, I am not in the least upset by it, for I bethink myself that it has as much right to go about its business as I about mine. I know the ways of the dead and what they are like. I know things concerning them that the priests themselves do not know, and if I told you all I have seen you would be astonished. But it is not all truths that will bear repeating, and my father, who was nevertheless fond of telling a tale, did not reveal a twentieth part of what he knew. But, on the other hand, he often repeated the same stories, and he has, to my knowledge, related at least a hundred times what happened to Catherine Fontaine.

"Catherine Fontaine was an old spinster whom he remembered having seen when he was a child. I should not be surprised if there were still as many as three old men hereabouts who remember having heard of her, for she was very well known, and of good reputation, though poor. She lived at the corner of Nuns' Street, in the little tower which you can still see, and which belongs to an old tumble-down house looking on to the garden of the Ursulines. On this tower there are some half-effaced figures and inscriptions; the late curé, of Ste. Eulalie, M. Levasseur, declared that there is among them a Latin sentence saying that love is stronger than death. 'This is to be understood,' he would add, 'as referring to divine love.'

"Catherine Fontaine lived alone in the little house. She was a lace-maker—you know that the lace of these parts was very famous in the old days. She was not known to have any relations or friends. It was said that at eighteen she had been in love with the young lord of Aumont-Clery, and had been secretly betrothed to him. But honest folk would not believe a word of this, and said it was a tale invented because Catherine Fontaine looked more like a lady than a working woman—because, in spite of her white hair, she still preserved traces of great beauty, because she had a sad face, and because on her finger was to be seen one of those rings on which the goldsmith has wrought two little clasped hands, and which in olden days used to be exchanged at the betrothal ceremony. You shall soon know the truth of the matter.

"Catherine Fontaine lived a devout life. She was a great church-goer, and went every morning, whatever the weather, to six o'clock mass at Ste. Eulalie's.

"One December night, while she was asleep in her little room, she was awakened by the sound of bells; never doubting that they were ringing for the first mass, the pious soul dressed and went down into the street, where it was too dark to see the houses, and where no gleam of light showed in the black sky. And in the darkness the silence was so intense that not even a dog was to be heard barking in the distance, and that one felt cut off from every living being. But Catherine Fontaine, who knew every stone underfoot, and who could have found her way to the church with her eyes shut, had no difficulty in reaching the corner of Nuns' Street and Parish Street, where the wooden house stands which has a Tree of Jesse carved on a great beam. When she reached this spot she saw that the church doors were open, and that a great glow of lighted candles was shining forth. She walked on, and, passing through the porch, found herself among a numerous assembly, which filled the church. But she did not recognise any of the people present, and was surprised to see them all dressed in velvet and brocade, with feathers in their hats, and wearing swords in the fashion of long ago.

"There were noblemen carrying tall canes with gold knobs, and ladies with lace caps, held in place by a jewelled comb. Knights of the Order of St. Louis went hand in hand with ladies who were hiding their painted faces behind their fans, so that all that could be seen was a powdered temple and a patch at the corner of the eye. All of them were noiselessly taking their places, and, as they walked, neither the sound of their steps upon the stone floor nor the rustle of their clothes was to be heard. The side aisles were filled with a crowd of young artisans in brown jerkin, linen breeches, and blue stockings, who had their arms round the waists of pretty girls with rosy cheeks and downcast eyes. Near the holy water basins peasant women in red skirts and laced bodices were seating themselves on the ground with the placidity of domestic animals, while young fellows stood behind them, wide-eyed, twirling their hats in their hands. And it seemed as though the expressions of all these people were mutely immortalising the same thought, at once sweet and sad.

"Kneeling in her accustomed place, Catherine Fontaine saw the priest approach the altar, preceded by two of the clergy. It was a silent mass, during which no sound could be heard from the moving lips, nor any tinkle from the useless bell. Catherine Fontaine felt herself under the observation and influence of her mysterious neighbour, and, looking at him almost without turning her head, she recognised the young lord of Aumont-Clery, who had loved her, and who had been dead for forty-five years. She recognised him by a little mark under his left ear, and particularly by the shadows cast on his cheeks by his long black lashes. He was dressed in the red hunting costume, with gold braid, which he was wearing on the day when, meeting her in St. Leonard's Wood, he had asked a drink of her and taken a kiss. He had preserved his youth and his good looks; his smile still disclosed teeth like those of a young wolf.

"Catherine whispered to him, 'My lord, you who were my love and to whom long ago I gave a girl's dearest possession, may God hold you in His grace! May He at last inspire me with regret for the sin I committed with you; for the truth is that, white-haired and near death as I am, I do not yet repent of having loved you. But, my dead love, my good lord, tell me who are these people in the dress of olden days who are attending this silent mass?'

"The lord of Aumont-Clery replied, in a voice softer than a breath and yet clearer than crystal: 'Catherine, these men and women are souls from purgatory who, like us, have offended God by the sin of carnal love, but who are not for that reason cut off from God, because their sin, like ours, was free from evil intent. While, parted from what they loved on earth, they are being purified in the lustral fire of purgatory, they suffer the pains of absence, and this suffering is most cruel to them. So unhappy are they that an angel from heaven takes pity on the anguish of their love. With God's permission he every year, for one hour of the night, unites the lovers in their parish church, where they are permitted to attend the mass of the shades hand in hand. This is the truth. If it is given to me to see you here before your death, Catherine, it has not been brought about without God's permission.'

"And Catherine Fontaine replied: 'I would I could die and become beautiful again, as, my dead lord, in the days when I gave you to drink in the forest.'

"While they talked thus softly a very old canon was collecting alms and offering a great brass plate to the congregation, who, one after the other, dropped into it old coins which have not been current for long past: six-guinea pieces, florins, ducats, ducatoons, jacobus and rose-nobles; and the coins fell silently. At last the old canon stopped before Catherine Fontaine, who searched in her pocket without finding a farthing. Then, unwilling to refuse an offering, she took from her finger the ring the knight had given her the day before his death, and dropped it into the brass plate. The gold ring as it fell rang like a great bell-clapper, and, at the sounding noise it made, the knight, the canon, the officiating priest, the clergy, the ladies, their cavaliers, and the whole congregation vanished; the candles went out and Catherine was left alone in the darkness."

His tale concluded, the sacristan took a large gulp of wine, remained thoughtful for a minute, and then began again as follows. "I have told you the story as my father told it to me many a time, and I think it is true, because it agrees with all I have noticed as to the habits and customs peculiar to the dead. I have been much in the company of the dead ever since my childhood, and I know that it is their habit to return to their love. So dead misers wander about at night near the treasures they have hidden in their lifetime. They keep good watch over their gold, but the trouble they take, far from serving them, turns to their hurt, and it is not rare to find money buried in the ground by digging in a spot haunted by a ghost. Again, dead husbands come in the night to trouble their wives who have married again, and I could name several men who have kept better watch over their wives after death than they ever did in their lifetime. These last are blameworthy, for, in all justice, dead men ought not to be jealous. But I am telling you what I have noticed, and one must beware of this when one marries a widow. Besides, the story I have told you is proved in the following way:

"In the morning after that night of wonders Catherine Fontaine was found dead in her room. And the beadle of Ste. Eulalie found in the brass plate used for alms a gold ring with two clasped hands. Besides, I am not a man to tell stories in jest. Suppose we call for another bottle of wine!"

THE path led by an easy descent to the edge of the lake, which now unfolded itself . . . in all its languid and silent beauty. Willows bent their tender foliage over it. Reeds, like pliant swords, swayed their delicate plumes on the water. They stood ruffling in islands, and around them the water-lilies spread their broad heart-shaped leaves and their pure white flowers. Over the flowering islands shrill dragon-flies flew, whirling and darting, with emerald or sapphire breast-plates and wings of flame. . . . From its lowly stem the iris yielded them its scent; all around the ribwort unrolled its lace on the edge of the sleeping waters which were studded with the loosestrife's purple flowers.—From "Bee; the Princess of the Dwarfs," by Anatole France.

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS' ESSAYS*

OF the sixteen papers in this volume, thirteen deal with Victorian and post-Victorian writers. Two are devoted to J. M. Synge, and those are by far the most valuable, embodying, as it seems to us, the final verdict on the work of that gifted writer. Mr. Figgis regards Ibsen and Synge—the former for "breadth and scope," the latter for "sheer beauty"—as two modern dramatists who pre-eminently stand out "from the ruck of mere journeyman work." But his admiration for Synge is by no means unqualified.

"If there is one thing more than another noticeable in Synge's work, it is his small and limited field. . . . It is not small only in its final achievement: it is small also within that achievement, since there is a certain sameness running through it. There is also a character of unhealthiness in it that it would be unwise to neglect."

This is well and wisely said, and we hope it will be taken to heart by those whose infatuation has led them to think of Synge as being only a little lower than Shakespeare himself.

Equally interesting is the paper on another distinguished Irish dramatist—Mr. W. B. Yeats—to whom, as we are reminded, Synge owed practically his literary being. Mr. Figgis, however, is concerned merely with Mr. Yeats' poetry. Here, again, he is on unassailable ground when he says that Mr. Yeats' art is "that of simplicity wrought mystical and magical. It deals only with essences. When he succeeds his success is that of pure delight; when he fails there is either confusion or banality." On the other hand, Mr. Figgis' appraisal of Mr. William Watson is too high. To say that "next to Milton I know no craftsmanship so complete in English verse" is surely to express a view which, even when every allowance is made for the superb quality of much of Mr. Watson's work, will not command general approval.

The paper on Meredith is in Mr. Figgis' best critical vein. He is one of the few persons, we should imagine, who have "read through Meredith, work by work, prose and poetry, in chronological order." As the result of this formidable mental effort, Mr. Figgis has become impressed by the organic unity of Meredith's thought, and by the fact that philosophy plays a vital part in the novels. He sums up Meredith's philosophy in one word, "Earth," its correlative being "Man."

The centenary tribute to Dickens, while it does not advance anything particularly new, utters many things in an interesting and attractive way. More penetrating is the companion paper on Thackeray. In the case of the author of "Vanity Fair" the critics are never likely to be agreed, but Mr. Figgis contrives, within brief compass, to state a point of view both shrewd and moderate.

"It is impossible to read any portion of Thackeray without realising that here, if ever, was a man of genius, if he had only been content absolutely and fearlessly to trust that genius, and to dare it in the face of proprieties and smug conventionalities."

No space is left in which to call attention to the exhilarating papers on Browning, Mr. Robert Bridges, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. W. H. Davies, and Mr. Herbert Trench, but enough perhaps has been said to show that Mr. Figgis' book ought to be in the hands of all who appreciate sane and robust criticism wedded to a style of singular charm.

In preparing a second edition Mr. Figgis should remember that the name of the Edinburgh reviewer who cried out on Wordsworth's "Excursion," "This will never do," was not Jeffrey, but Jeffrey.

* "Studies and Appreciations." By Darrell Figgis. 5s. net. (Dent.)

THE NIGHT SIDE OF LONDON

To the stranger within her gates, London at night may seem drab, dull, forbidding, presenting only miles upon miles of darkened streets and heavy houses. Those who know and love the mammoth city, however, have found that its night side has an interest all its own, strong enough to tempt them sometimes from the cosy shelter of their homes to look again upon the strange scenes, the weird effects, the almost incredible contrasts that make London at night the most fascinating place in the world. The very streets seem clothed in a new, a wonderful aspect, as though you were seeing them for the first time. Filled as they are with an unexpected, a delicious quietude, and freed from the pressure of the crowds that throng them all day long, you notice a thousand new points about them, and you realise that till you have seen London at night, you have not really seen her at all.

* * *

Entering the City proper by its eastern gate, having, let us suppose, reached Liverpool Street by an early morning train, you cannot forbear a gasp at the silence that has descended upon the Temple of Mammon, for not a sound is to be heard save the eerie echo of your own footsteps as you swing along, wondering, as well you may, if anywhere else in the civilised world, let alone London, there is a spot more absolutely deserted, more utterly free of man. Not a soul, not a living creature, can you see. If you were to choose a spot for an assassination, surely it would be here, within a stone's-throw of Throgmorton Street, where all day long men strive and shout, but which is now hushed to a profound stillness. And yet, even here, activity suddenly breaks the silence, for, see, a smart young messenger boy, who ought, you think, to have been in bed these four hours and more, swiftly emerges from a building from which the lights are flashing into the sombre mirk of Cornhill. It is from the cable offices that Mercury has come, bearing you know not what message of life or death, that has been received, perhaps, from the uttermost ends of the earth, a message, perhaps, that is to tell the nations that war has broken out, or that a great ruler is dead, or, who knows? that "earthquake has hit 'Frisco again." Who can tell what an hour may bring forth? You recall that memorable night in December, 1895, when Mr. Chamberlain, sick of waiting for news of Jamieson and his raiders at the Colonial Office, and, with characteristic directness, drove straight to the headquarters of the Cable Company, and, if you are human, you think with a pang of sadness of the tragedy which has rendered that statesman silent as the streets about you. But those streets are soon behind you, and, marching on, you reach Fleet Street, thronged now with carts, crowded with shouting, eager men, who are loaded with bundles of papers, and with the roar of the presses so insistently in your ears that you are eager to escape into the Strand, the region of Bohemia. Here, for the first time on your tour of inspection, you find something of the London that you see every day. There are cabmen, taxi-drivers, young men in evening dress. One who has returned from a concert embarrassed with an enormous 'cello, is arguing with the proprietor of a "growler." "I have paid you your legal fare," he remarked stiffly. "Yus, guv'nor, that's all right for yourself," retorts Jehu, "but," with withering scorn, and pointing at the gargantuan 'cello, "ow about the flute?"

* * *

If you are not too tired with your walk, and care to saunter up Bedford Street, you will have suddenly brought before your eyes the most brilliant night scene that all London affords. You are in Covent Garden, amid a blaze of colour. The air is heavy with the scent of roses; there are masses of lilies, carnations, the spoils of a thousand gardens, the harvest of the countryside. Porters, hoarse of voice, burly of frame, a pyramid of baskets on their heads, lurch across your path. Costers raucously chaffer for their wares, and pile their barrows with vegetables, heaping marrows, cabbages, and lettuces in a glorious mass of colour. Strawberries pervade the atmosphere, pottles and pottles from the fields of Kent. Flower women argue over bundles of blossoms, and, amid a crowd of interested spectators, my Lord Tomnoddy, who has been dining out, and is taxi-ing home, drops in to spend a fi'-pound note and to cover his companion with a wealth of floral offerings as bright as the sacred lamp of burlesque, of which she is a high priestess.

* * *

You must not go home yet. Not till you have seen one other night scene, just a stone's-throw from the Strand, too, where, under the catacombs of the arches beneath the Adelphi, there huddle together in shapeless masses the outcasts of the city, creatures that once were men—and women—now broken in heart and spirit, chilled to the bone, compelled thus to burrow underground and to share their shelter with the rats.

"Oh it is pitiful,
Near a whole city full
Home they have none."

For them there is no rest. For them there is no repose. They will start the day too exhausted, too weary to make a real effort to find work, too weak to do it were it provided. They must look with strained eyes at the cinema show in the Strand of Dante's "Inferno," for the lost souls therein are not more hopeless, not more tortured.

* * *

In the suburbs, on the fringe of Greater London, on the open spaces still left as a harbour of refuge to the City's waifs and strays, you will find men, women, and children huddled under the shelter of the trees and bushes, nestling close to the earth, that in their case proves but a stern stepmother. Once—it was a sight never to be forgotten—a car drew up beside one of the "Greens" in Hammersmith; a tall, opulent-looking man alighted and strode towards the shadowy forms outlined on the grass. He did not wait to question or inspect, but simply threw largesse amongst them with a generous hand. A convenient coffee-stall hove into view, and a stampede was made in its direction.

The poor things could not give their orders quick enough; one—she was a grey-haired matron, with two little ones clinging to her skirts—pulled at the sleeve of the stranger and thanked him in such broken tones of gratitude and eagerness that in his own eyes the tears began to start.

But, see, the night is ending, and a flush of rose tints the sky. In the parks the outcasts are trying to make their poor toilets, washing their hands in the Serpentine, the women trying pitifully to arrange their hair. The lions' whelps are leaving the shadow of the Nelson Column. Jeames is stirring in Mayfair, and Lord T. is turning in in Curzon Street. Down the river at Bermondsey the dockers are up, waiting to get busy with the vessels that have come up London's river in the night with bread for her millions. The armies are beginning to pour over the bridges. The day's work has begun.

THE FUTURE OF THE RUSSIAN CHURCH

BY DR. PERCY DEARMER

THE evils in Russia are more picturesque than the good, and form peculiarly vivid material for novels and plays; from whence come many one-sided English ideas. Yet when an advanced Radical like the late Mr. Stead visited the Empire, he returned full of enthusiasm for what he had seen; and most Englishmen who get to know the Russian people retain for them ever after a particularly warm corner of their hearts. It is certainly so with myself: a year has nearly passed since I left Moscow, and to-day the frost in the London streets brings back to my mind the snowy roofs and golden cupolas shining under a blue sky, as when I last looked down upon them from the Kremlin; and I long to be in touch again with the Eastern Church and to feel again the brotherliness of the Russian people.

For that is the characteristic of Russia. It is a family, and its very quarrels are family quarrels,—which, perhaps, accounts for their violence. Solidarity is the supreme Russian quality—or to use the Russian word, sobornost, which means more, and carries the sense of national unity into the sacredness of religion. The Russian character is indeed bound up with religion, and forms a brotherhood of faith in a way that we do not know in England. And especially is this the case with the peasantry, which is Russia. The Russian word for peasant is "Christian"; and the peasant is a Christian just in those points where Christianity is most difficult to us—patient, simple, meek, poor in spirit, and very charitable, he is a brother in his village community, and the Tsar is his "little Father." He has the qualities of the Sermon on the Mount, and is a born evangelical.

The history of Russia has been a long trial of its solidarity and patience, first in its struggle under the Tartar yoke, then in its efforts to free itself from the Poles (who held Moscow in Shakespeare's lifetime), then in its subsequent expansion. The Christianity of Russia has been intimately bound up with its political history, so that the State bonds are now too close, and Russian ecclesiastics are working to restore the Patriarchate of Moscow and to substitute it for the Holy Synod. Yet the very fact that the head of the Synod is a layman nominated by the Tsar is itself significant, and of a piece with the way in which an ordinary parish church is worked by laymen. The people do not depend upon their minister, as they do in England; a bad priest does not empty his church—the people see that he keeps up the services, and stand in their crowds, as before, packed together for the long Liturgy of the Eastern Church. Religion is everywhere, and its symbols: sacred ikons are in every room, in the restaurants, the café-chantants, even in the brothels: it is bone of the people's bone, and flesh of its flesh. And there is no self-consciousness about it, no false shame: a peasant in his sheepskin, rugged of hair and beard, kneeling on the frozen ground—that is typically Russian; but even more typical to my mind is the picture which lingers in my memory of the great railway station waiting-room at Petersburg, with its two altar-like ikons, and a prosperous merchant in his snow-besprinkled furs crossing himself with his cigar.

All this which I have tried to sketch means, I think, two things—that the Russian Church will endure, and that it will always be strongly national and nationally strong. The Russian Church is indeed going through a period of religious crisis. It is like other Churches in this; but it is less prepared: Western criticism has come to shake it, and it possesses an insufficiently educated clergy. Scepticism is widely spread among the "Intelligenza," and is not unknown in the seminaries. There may be heavy losses in the next generation, and obscurantist bishops may produce a catastrophe. The autocracy too (or the bureaucracy) may make further blunders, and the Church may be fatally involved in them. Very likely the Russian Church is going to be worse before it is better.

Yet I think its roots are so deep that it will in the end recover and endure. And it will be national. Probably it will be less isolated from the West in the future; but there are few signs of its making any terms with the Western Papacy—fewer signs even than there were in the past. The period of copying Italian architecture and French ways is over, as the Germanising policy of Peter the Great is over. Russia has got much harm, as well as good, from the West, and means to go forward into the future on Russian lines. And surely she is right: she still has many beautiful and precious things which we have lost; and now that she has a great literature, and great artists of her own, and men of science, she is wise to do things in her own way, if haply she may avoid some of our Western mistakes.

Now, the Orthodox Church of Russia has always been a great missionary Church, which is little realised by us, because (characteristically) the Russian missionaries have followed the flag—or preceded it, and have had little touch with Western missions. This began when Russia was almost covered by pagan tribes; it spread through the conversion of peoples whose very names are unknown to us—Ijor, Tchud, Korel, for instance—till all Russia was converted. In the sixteenth century the Church, under enormous difficulties, began to work in Kazan, Astrakhan, and Siberia. In the nineteenth century a great educational movement spread from Kazan, through Nicholas Ivanovitch Ilminski, who was a remarkable linguist, even among Russians: he was a master of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Arabic, and Persian, and he also knew Turkish, Tartar, Yakut, Altai, Kirgis, Tcheremis Mordva—and many others! The Scriptures were translated into these strange tongues, in the pronunciation of which "not only the throat, the tongue, the teeth, the cheeks take part, but also the eyebrows and the lines in the forehead, and even, it would seem, the hair." Strange tongues indeed!—in Samoyede there was no word for bread or fruit (there being neither in the land), and none for love or mercy; and one well-known text had to be translated, "Be ye wise as ermines and simple as seal cubs."

And still Russia spreads. After North Asia came Central Asia—the strange hidden regions where the human race began. And everywhere the Russian Church is at work, herself Eastern, with a natural affinity to Oriental ways. Certainly she has a future in Asia. From Constantinople have sprung the Slav Churches which already stretch, continuous and solid, from the mountains of Montenegro to the remotest plains of Siberia, from the gates of Italy on the Adriatic to the Behring Strait and the Sea of Japan.

MASTERPIECE OF THE WEEK

BALZAC'S "COUSIN PONS"

 BY HENRI MAZEL

NONE of Balzac's novels brings us into closer touch with the author than "Le Cousin Pons." The psychology of the work is singularly subtle, while the plot is both interesting and pathetic. Further, it is a book that anybody can read.

I will try to sketch as lightly as I can the sad fortunes of the kindly soul whom Balzac has drawn. Cousin Pons, about the year 1844, was a tiny, wizened, old man whom everyone turned round to stare after in the street, because he stuck to the fashions of thirty years earlier, when he was young. He wore a light brown English "Spencer" over a dark green coat with white metal buttons, a threefold waistcoat, an immense cravat, in which his chin was buried like a nut-cracker's head, crowned by a huge silk hat, perpetually on the point of tumbling backwards.

But the old caricature of a man was, nevertheless, an artist, being both an accomplished musician and a connoisseur in painting. Indeed, in the latter art his unerring judgment had enabled him to profit by the whirlwind of the Revolution and the Napoleonic epic, when art was at a discount, to get together the best collection in Paris of Italian and Flemish masters. But nobody knew of their existence. A confirmed old bachelor, Cousin Pons never asked anybody to his house except one old friend, a German musician named Schmucke, who was as queer a creature as himself; in fact, the owner of so many masterpieces guarded their privacy against the public eye as jealously as does the Sultan his seraglio.

This worthy old gentleman had one weakness. He was a gourmand whose mouth so watered after savoury meats that he used eagerly to accept the occasional invitations of a distant relative, M. Camusot de Manville, President of one of the divisions of the King's Court in Paris. This he did, in spite of the fact that the President's wife showed no great liking for a poor devil whose humble function was to lead the orchestra in a small theatre, and of whom she condescendingly spoke as "poor Cousin Pons." The novel opens with the President's wife trampling so heavily on the feelings of the "poor relation" (although he had just made her a present of one of the best things in his collection) that Cousin Pons, hurt, miserable, and heart-broken, got up and walked out of the President's house, swearing never to put foot inside it again.

But the amiable old virtuoso has no malice about him, and it is enough for the President to make a little speech about family jars and things not being really meant, for him to forgive them, and even try to return good for evil by making a match for their ill-dowered daughter with a German banker who was four times over a millionaire. The affair went like clockwork, and Cousin Pons was in the seventh heaven, when at what was intended to be the betrothal breakfast the rich banker abruptly called the match off, explaining with German brusqueness that he has never been informed that the young lady was an only daughter, that all only daughters are abominably spoilt, and that, this being so, he won't marry her. And the President's wife, fancying this to be a vengeful stab plotted between the millionaire from the other side of the Rhine and the spiteful old cousin, closed her door against the latter, and said such things about him to their acquaintances that the poor old man found himself cut by everybody. So crushed was Cousin Pons by this unfair coalition, and so broken-hearted was he at finding himself thus slandered and misunderstood, that he fell ill, very ill indeed; and from this point onward the reader sees the man's sickbed becoming a focus of low greeds and ignoble speculations. The dirty wench, Cibot, his concierge, and her neighbour, Remonencq, the marine-store dealer, have got an inkling of the existence of certain valuable treasures in the collector's flat. They manage to bring into his rooms one Magus, a Jew, who keeps a curiosity shop, and is amazed to behold this incredible prize.

The sinister trio see a veritable fortune before them, and they proceed to lay formal siege to it. Poor Pons, who takes a long time over his dying, has nobody to defend him but his old friend Schmucke; and what can he do against the infernal alliance of the concierge, the marine-store dealer, and the curiosity-shop Jew? More vampires come flapping to join the alliance, a shady man of business, a rascally notary, a hypocritical doctor, not to mention others, some working on their own and some in the interest of the President's wife. She has found out what a fortune the old collector possesses in his mysterious abode; she is furious at her ill-luck in having quarrelled with him, and her object is to keep him from making a will disinheriting her, or, if he does so, to arrange for its invalidation.

However, before he actually dies, the old man does have time to make a will, leaving his whole collection to his inseparable friend, the worthy Schmucke; but the latter, simple as a child, overwhelmed by his loss, and hunted by the whole pack of commercial and legal hounds, does not know which way to turn. A writ is served upon him, and he finds himself accused of having exercised undue influence over a testator, a serious crime in the eye of the law, which punishes it with severity; and this completes his discomfiture. He consents to renounce his friend's legacy in consideration of a mere pittance of £100 a year for himself, enough for his own humble needs, as well as of a few thousand francs which he insists must be allotted to a certain minor employee of the theatre, who alone amid the greedy pack of rogues had shown pity and affection for poor Cousin Pons. Thus the finale is that the President's wife becomes the heiress of the wonderful collection.

This bare outline gives a very inadequate idea of the novel. Seldom has the mass of dirty jobs that do sometimes make up modern life been painted more clearly, more vividly, and with so much pathos. The main battle rages round the bedside of the dying man, but there are fresh intrigues, cunning and shameful, which spring to life and come into collision with each other; there are ambitious political and social schemes on the part of the President and his wife, dirty tricks on the part of the shady subordinates who work for the President, but have to avoid compromising him, actual crimes committed by the lowest of the scoundrels, the concierge poisoning her husband in order to marry the curiosity-shop man, after having helped the latter to steal the best pictures in the collection without even waiting for the death of poor Pons.

And all these characters, weaving the threads of these multiple intrigues, are marvellously drawn, every

(Continued on page 502.)

Which are Balzac's best novels?

The Great French Author's Masterpieces, as chosen by Clement Shorter, Editor of the Sphere—the only complete and unexpurgated edition—First payment 2/6 only.

To the man or woman who is concerned with the study of character as the mainspring of action, as to the philosophic observer of mankind and to the plain, straightforward reader who likes his fiction to be a real record of real life, the novels of Balzac have an enduring charm.

How simple is his spell! How lightly he taxes the mind with all his greatness! How easily and yet how subtly does he make clear the working of the human heart, unchanged and unchanging throughout a constantly changing civilisation!

An immense sensation was created in the publishing world by the issue of "The Caxton Balzac"—this being the only complete and unexpurgated edition of Balzac's Works ever published in England. And there is no doubt that to the publication of the Caxton Edition of Balzac's Works is largely due that revival of the cult of Balzac amongst cultured Englishmen and Englishwomen, and that practical realisation that Balzac's novels are the Books of Humanity, the novels of the world, and the stories for all time.

It will be good news to those who are only beginning to realise that the novels of Balzac, more than those of any other writer, will bear reading and re-reading again and again to hear that the Caxton Publishing Company is now issuing in a small series a selection of the Best Novels of Balzac for the convenience of those who do not wish to buy the complete edition, and yet who wish to make a profitable acquaintance with Balzac through the best of his works.

The selection of the Best Novels of Balzac was placed in the hands of Mr. Clement Shorter, the Editor of the Sphere, an acknowledged authority on the subject.

What Clement Shorter says:

"I have been asked which, in my judgment, are the best novels of Balzac. There is little difficulty in coming to a decision. I would give them as follows:

Cousine Bette.
Cousin Pons.
La Duchesse de Langeais.
The House of the Cat and Racket.
Gobseck.
Old Goriot.

Eugenie Grandet.
The Lily of the Valley.
The Illustrious Gaudissart.
The Village Curé.
The Country Doctor.
The Magic Skin.
The Unknown Masterpiece.

"Something has been said of the fact that the publishers advertise that their Balzac is 'unexpurgated.' This is of the utmost importance. The charge that a translator 'betrays' is justified where there is a prurient attempt to modify and alter phrases in the interests of Mrs. Grundy. Nothing can justify that. When face to face with a great classic we want the book as near as possible as the author presented it.

"Altogether it would be impossible to speak too highly of the excellence of translation of this edition of Balzac's novels. There are those who say that Balzac should be read in the original, as only thus can you secure his peculiar charm. It is possible to lay too much stress on this point. At least half of Balzac's work relies not so much upon quality of style as upon strength of intellect, and that intellectual power can be captured in a translation, particularly in a translation so good as this."

But as some of these selected stories of Balzac are but short stories, or comparatively short stories, and as, moreover, their charm and interest are greatly accentuated when they are read in conjunction with other Stories—the designs of which have direct reference to them—the Publishers, while they have kept this series a small and compact one, have not confined it strictly to the above list. To give merely one instance. The two first of the Stories selected by Mr. Shorter are "Cousine Bette" and "Cousin Pons." Both of these, though each in itself is complete as a story, form a part of the admirable series known as "The Poor Relations."

And so the Publishers have thought it well to include the whole series of "The Poor Relations" in "The Best Novels of Balzac" series.

"The Best Novels of Balzac," in fourteen volumes, of a style and a size convenient for constant reading, include in all twenty-six Novels, each one absolutely complete and unexpurgated.

The Magnificent Illustrations.

These fourteen handy volumes are beautifully illustrated by great French Artists, who have embodied the very spirit of the Author. The frontispieces are etchings printed from the copper plates.

"The Best Novels of Balzac" are issued on the same advantageous terms which the Caxton Publishing Company has already made so deservedly popular. This is to say, the set of fourteen volumes are delivered for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by a few small monthly payments.

Andrew Lang's opinion:

"It is impossible to enter on a detailed criticism of Balzac's novels. In them he scales every height and sounds every depth of human character. The qualities of Balzac are his extraordinary range of knowledge, observation, sympathy, his steadfast determination to draw every line and shadow of his subject, and his keen analysis of character and conduct."

What "Truth" says:

"I can testify not only to the excellence of translation, but also to the charm of the type, binding, paper, and especially of the exquisite illustrations by famous French artists. I should mention also that they are absolutely unexpurgated, and are translated with fidelity, avoiding the coarseness which is so marked in the works of less skilful translators, although quite foreign to the spirit of Balzac himself. Considered in every light, I am unable to conceive a more satisfactory edition of the great novelist's work."

A FREE BOOKLET.

We have prepared a charming detailed prospectus containing interesting information about Balzac, his life and his work, which will be sent post free to those who apply for it. It contains a list of the works included in "Balzac's Best Novels." It will also tell you how the fourteen volumes are delivered for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by a few small monthly payments.

To the Caxton Publishing Co., Ltd.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge, and without any obligation on my part:

Detailed prospectus of "BALZAC'S BEST NOVELS" with terms of easy payments.

NAME

(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS

.....

The Times Book Club

LIBRARIANS AND BOOKSELLERS

THE LARGEST AND MOST CONVENIENT BOOKSHOP
... IN THE WORLD ...

All the best Books, English and Foreign, in every department of Literature, at the lowest prices charged by any bookseller.

Bibles, Prayer Books, Books of Devotion, in all styles.

Bookbinding of every description.

Restoration of Old Books and Bindings.

Second-hand Books withdrawn from the Circulating Library, in excellent condition, at greatly reduced prices.

High-class Stationery of every kind.

Catalogues post free on request.

Orders by post receive immediate attention. Free delivery within the United Kingdom of parcels of books to the value of 20s.

AN UNEQUALLED CIRCULATING LIBRARY
(Particulars on application.)

376 to 384, OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

Telephone:
5390 Gerrard (5 lines).

Telegrams:
"Unleme, London."

Learn to Sketch in Two Hours . .

. . . An entirely new method of drawing has been invented by A. A. Braun, Director of the Association of Designers, Artists, and Illustrators (the well-known commercial studio). The A.B.C. or Hieroglyphic System of Drawing, which is taught by correspondence, enables students to produce creditable sketches after the first lesson. The complete Course contains hundreds of original devices (the outcome of experience) for obtaining immediate facility in remunerative commercial drawing. Write to-day, enclosing 1d. Postage, for Booklet T, with full details and opinions of leading illustrators, to one of them with crispness, with colour, with life. Once we have read the story we can recall the scenes of it years afterwards with perfect precision. Even the figures in the background, making only a passing appearance on the stage, stand out sharply silhouetted as individuals. The various women servants are as completely differentiated one from another as the solemn members of the Camusot family or the various legal luminaries who come up to the assault in turn. To make his figures more lifelike, the novelist is at times at pains to show us their accent, their very mispronunciations; the good Schmucke speaks German-French, the marine-store dealer talks the patois of Auvergne, Magus uses the jargon of the low-class Jew, and the concierge murders the French language in the slang of the faubourgs. The sensation is that of falling into a literal menagerie of rogues and bandits.

A.B.C. SCHOOL OF DRAWING,
46, Chancery Lane, London.

Take, for instance, the portrait of the shady man of business who has just been changing his clothes in order to call on the President's wife, and submit to her his scheme for the acquisition of the collection.

"Fraisier, in a white tie, yellow gloves, and a new wig, redolent of Portugal water, was like some deadly poison decanted into a crystal bottle, the stopper covered with white kid, the very label of it coquettish down to the bit of baby ribbon tied round it, and the poison all the deadlier in consequence. His keen glance, his pimpled face, his cutaneous disease, his green eyes, his villainous savour smite like storm-clouds on a sky of blue." The portrait might stand for Robespierre himself.

But if the drawing of the arch-criminals is perfect, it is no whit more so than that of the heroes of goodness and devotion. A truly touching figure is that of the good Schmucke, with his devoted love, too affectionate almost for a man of sixty, an age when the feelings are necessarily rather less warm; and how he draws our sympathies to the worthy German type! What a perfect pair they made, Pons himself also so kindly, so delicate, and at the end so clear-sighted when in his last agony he discovers the network of villainies spread around him; Schmucke so absolutely devoted, and so absolutely incapable of getting out of any kind of difficulty by himself. And how the third honest man in the story, Topinard, the scene-shifter, is also drawn with sympathy and truth, a poor devil of a working-man, living with his wife and three children in a garret, who shelters poor Schmucke in entire simplicity, with no notion of his being the heir, and shares with him his roof and humble board.

Stories there may be found of greater depth, or grandeur, or brilliancy than Cousin Pons in that rich series of masterpieces known as the "Comédie Humaine"—there is nothing with truer characterisation or more pathetic feeling.

PASSERS-BY

I SOMETIMES wonder when I meet you, dear,

And talk of nothing in an easy way;

I wonder if you understand and hear

The things that my poor heart would like to say.

We talk of weather, but I mean that you

Are like a very perfect April day;

We talk of people, but (my dear, it's true!)

There's no one else but you is what I'd say.

And so we meet and talk and part again—

Part, though my very soul would have you stay;

Part, and a smiling face hides all my pain,

And so I take my solitary way. ERIC LYALL.

SCALE OF RATES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS IN

EVERYMAN

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY. 1d. PRESS DAY—TUESDAY.

	Whole Page	Half Page	1/3 Page	1/4 Page
FIRST THREE RIGHT HAND PAGES ...	£22 10 0	£11 5 0	£5 12 6	—
ORDINARY POSITIONS—Facing not less than Half a page of matter	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
BACK PAGE	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	—

PER INCH (2 columns to the Page, 31 inches wide), 2s.
Depth of Page, 10 1/2 inches.

ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
Telephone: 2152 Central. Telegrams: "Templarlan, London."

CORRESPONDENCE

[As our space is limited, correspondents will please bear in mind that the utmost brevity and clearness are essential. We regret having been compelled to withhold a number of excellent letters simply on account of their great length.—ED.]

LAND REFORM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The opening of your columns for the discussion of the Land Question is very opportune and should clear the issue.

If it be admitted that the private ownership of land is the root cause of all our social evils, then the case for peasant proprietorship falls to the ground. We merely change a number of large estates for a greater number of small ones, and a number of large landowners for a greater number of small landowners, leaving the land private property.

On the other hand, "State tenancy," with fixity of tenure, fair rent, tenant right, the principle of betterment, etc., with which the tenant is assured of the full value of his own labour and improvements, gives to the occupier all the advantages of a peasant proprietor, without the disadvantages.

If reformers could agree on this point, there only remains the question of how to effect the change. Briefly, the methods advocated are (1) Confiscation, (2) Taxation, (3) Compensation. How may we reconcile these three schools of thought, so that by concentrated effort the task may be easily, swiftly, economically, and justly effected? Let us assume that municipalities have obtained power to acquire land wherever needed for the community's use, and that the purchase price is a fixed quantity, in accordance with the values tabulated in a new Doomsday Book. Then pay the present landlords, not in cash but by municipal or national bonds, bearing interest, but stamped "Land Values," and subject to the ordinary income-tax, death duties, etc., as ordinary incomes are taxed, plus the "taxation of land values." The bonds could be met annually by the rent obtained from the tenant, the bond reduced by further taxation if the "taxation on land values" were increased, and the redemption of the decreased value brought about by the increased increment, which would now be the general property of the community.

The "compensators" would thus buy the land without expending any cash. The "taxers of land values" may tax the scrip when they tax the land still privately owned; and the "confiscators" may by aiding the single taxers, or those who advocate terminable annuities for a term of years, life, or lives, finish the job at a season which seems to them good. The whole nation would then be divided into two classes: (1) Occupiers of land, paying rent; (2) non-occupiers, receiving rent. Class 1 would also be rent receivers as much as Class 2, and the landlords who had received compensation would also receive rent as Class 2.

Briefly, by payment in bonds, taxable, terminable, redeemable, we make a payment without cash, using the credit of the nation; we give the single taxers the opportunity, when they have the power, to tax land values to the ultimate, and the confiscators the opportunity to terminate the payments when their chance arrives. And we get the land we require at once, and put the people (after education) on the land at once, and increase our agricultural output at once, gradually reducing payments out and increasing the payments in.—I am, sir, etc., REUBEN MANTON.

Hull.

A Smoker's Death

Tragic Story of a Young Guardsman's End at Chelsea Barracks.

Excessive cigarette smoking was said to have caused the death of Pte. Hatfield, aged twenty-three, of the 2nd Batt. Goldstream Guards, upon whom an inquest was held at Chelsea to-day.

When reveille sounded at the barracks on Sunday morning Hatfield did not stir, and a comrade who went to his bedside found him dead.

Lieut. Osmonde, of the R.A.M.C., said that when Hatfield returned from furlough recently he complained of giddiness, and he advised him not to smoke so much. The cause of death was syncope from degeneration of the heart set up by excessive cigarette smoking.

Extract from the Evening News, Jan. 23, 1913.

How to Completely Overcome

TOBACCO

HABIT

ATTAINED AT LAST—

A SUCCESSFUL REMEDY

Victory in 3 Days

Read these Testimonials. They are but a few from Legions.

NO LONGER WANTS A PIPE.

Mr. M. Denford, Merton, Devon, writes: "I took your 3 days' C Treatment, and am very pleased to testify that it completely took away the craving for tobacco, and I am also glad to say that I am feeling in much better health than I have for many a day. I have never once had a crave for the pipe since the first day I started taking your treatment."

CHEWED AND SMOKED FOR 25 YEARS.

Mr. Wm. Courtney, Mostyn, writes: "I had been a heavy smoker and chewer for 25 years. I am proud to say that since taking your C Treatment the craving has entirely gone. I am a cured man with a clear brain and elastic step."

SMOKED 100 CIGARETTES WEEKLY.

Mr. C. Stables, Horsforth, writes: "I feel that I must write and let you know the result of your C Treatment, which has been a success. I used to smoke 100 cigarettes per week, and the craving for them was very great; but before I had finished your three days' treatment I had lost all desire to smoke, and I must say that I feel much better now that I no longer smoke."

HEAVY SMOKER OF CIGARETTES.

Mr. J. Sincock, Redruth, writes: "Your C Treatment is all that you claim it to be. I was a heavy smoker of cigarettes, but I now have no more desire to smoke, and I thank you very much for what your C Treatment has done for me."

ALL DESIRE OR CRAVING IS REMOVED for Pipe, Cigars, Chewing Tobacco, Cigarettes, Snuff.

I offer a genuine guaranteed remedy for tobacco or snuff habit in 72 hours. It is mild, pleasant, strengthening. Overcomes that peculiar nervousness and craving for cigarettes, cigars, pipe, chewing tobacco, or snuff. Tobacco is poisonous and seriously injures the health in several ways, causing such disorders as nervous dyspepsia, sleeplessness, gas, belching, gnawing, or other uncomfortable sensation in stomach, constipation, headache, weak eyes, loss of vigour, red spots on skin, throat irritation, catarrh, asthma, bronchitis, heart failure, lung trouble, melancholy, neurasthenia, loss of memory and will power, impure

TOBACCO HABIT CONQUERED IN 72 HOURS

(poisoned) blood, rheumatism, lumbago, sciatica, neuritis, heartburn, torpid liver, loss of appetite, bad teeth, foul breath, lassitude, lack of ambition, weakening and falling out of hair, and many other disorders. It is unsafe and torturing to attempt to cure yourself of tobacco and snuff habit by suddenly stopping—don't do it. The correct method is to eliminate the nicotine poison from the system, strengthen the weakened, irritated membranes, and gradually overcome the craving. You can quickly and easily quit tobacco and enjoy yourself a thousand times better while feeling always in robust health. My FREE book tells all about the wonderful 3 days' method. Inexpensive, reliable. Also Secret Method for conquering habit in another without his knowledge. Full particulars, including my Book on Tobacco and Snuff Habit, mailed in plain wrapper, free. Address:

FREE

EDWARD J. WOODS, 10, NORFOLK ST., 454 T.A., LONDON, W.C.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your three desiderata for an effective discussion are excellent. May I suggest, for another, a careful and studied avoidance of vagueness and variety in the use of technical terms? For example: when a writer mentions "the Land," let it be quite clear that he is not meaning the land with something else mixed up with it, or only some of the land, as the rural districts, but that he means what he ought to mean, the aggregate area, above and below, of our common territory. When he speaks of "Land Ownership," let the term stand for the real thing, which is, simply, the legislative sanction of exclusive tenure and control, combined, suicidally, with the perpetual and full remission of what it costs the community, in diminution of its aggregate of natural opportunity, to accord and continue such sanction.

When one writes of "Land Values" again, let it be quite clear whether he means (1) what it costs the body of citizens for the time being to go without the use of this or that tract in favour of one or another of their number—the letting value; or (2) the lump sum which such citizen is enabled to command from a fellow-citizen for transferring to him, along with the title to the tract of land, his present legal immunity from the payment of its current and prospective public dues—the selling value. The arrogation of the term "Labour" (or "the worker," as in Felix Elderly's letter last week) to a particular class ought, I think, to be barred; the "working" man, properly speaking, being only another name for the "honest" man—that is to say, for everyman—who, in place of coveting or desiring other men's goods, prefers to do his duty towards his neighbour by learning and labouring truly to get his own living.—I am, sir, etc.,

Edgbaston, Jan. 6th, 1913. A. C. AUCHMUTY.

(This Correspondence is now closed.)

SHOULD TEACHERS BECOME CIVIL SERVANTS?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—This letter has been suggested to me by a paragraph from the Spectator, which appeared under the heading "Echoes of the Week," in EVERYMAN for January 17th. The writer of the paragraph seems to think that education would suffer through teachers becoming civil servants. He writes: "We cannot make it (i.e., the change) except at the cost of subordinating the interest of education to the interest of the teachers, and this is not a cost which we have any right to incur."

I am one of a large and, I think, growing number of people who think that education in this country might be a very great deal better than it is, but couldn't very well be much worse. That is not, however, the special point I want to raise. May I ask what the teacher counts for in education? Are his interests not worth consideration? Is his profession, from a national point of view, not the most important of all professions? Does the character-building of the citizens of the future not lie largely in his hands? We might well take a pattern from Germany and France, not only as regards education generally, but also the treatment meted out to teachers. In these countries the teacher is a civil servant, and in Germany he is better paid than his British colleague, whilst in both countries his conditions of service generally are a long way better. The Germans do not waste their money paying large salaries to head masters for organisation (blessed word!) while starving their assistants; hours of work are reasonably long, and ample time is allowed for the correction of exercises. We see that the Germans have an excellent system of education, and yet the teachers are State servants.

Why, then, should education in this country suffer through the improvement of the teacher's position? So far he has had precious little attention given to the betterment of his conditions. The men who do the really educative work of the school get a beggarly pittance, with which they are supposed to keep their libraries up to date, to take Continental holidays (especially if they are language masters), to keep a decent house, bring up a family, give their children a good education, and if they are in the country to go to town to attend educational conferences. In many of our schools—I refer particularly to secondary and higher grade schools in Scotland—the assistants are sweated to produce examination results, Government grants, and attractive prospectuses.

Two years ago a "Report of an Enquiry into the Conditions of Service of Teachers in English and Foreign Secondary Schools" was published by George Bell and Sons, price 2s. Let all assistants in secondary or higher grade schools in this country provide themselves with this report and judge for themselves; the money will be well spent; let them study with particular care the chapters dealing with France and Germany, and then perhaps they will wonder at their own apathy and long-suffering willingness to endure conditions that are in a great many schools almost beyond endurance, conditions that are scoffed at by Continental teachers, who have a status and receive a consideration that the teacher in general in this country has never had.

I enclose my card, and beg to sign myself

STUDENT.

THE "DOWRY" QUESTION AND FRENCH MARRIAGES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In a recent issue of EVERYMAN, the article, "Why is Living Cheaper in France than in England?" revealed a keen and fair insight in the understanding of a question which is nearly always misinterpreted on this side of the Channel—the question of the dowry. It is very gratifying to see it at last put before the English public in its true light:

But I think that one thing has been omitted; for, if, indeed, the dot is not usual in England, it is not quite true that money-matters play no part whatever in English marriages, only it takes a different aspect, and is far from having the same result.

In fact, generally speaking, the English girl of to-day does not, as the writer of the article seems to insinuate, "trust to Providence and to the future," for she wants her future husband to have a fairly high income. I am alluding here to the classes of society which correspond to those in which in France a dowry is thought of as necessary.

How many English girls have I met who "do not marry yet" because their fiancé has not a sufficient income, i.e., as a rule, an income of £350 to £400? These girls have no money of their own, and their parents have now for the whole family about £500 to £600 a year, sometimes less. They are, in four cases to my knowledge, over thirty years of age, and are thus wasting the best years of their life. I wish to add that, although, to my mind, they are distinctly

(Continued on page 506.)

NUMBER ONE.

NOW READY.

THE

ART TREASURES

1/- net Each Number. OF GREAT BRITAIN 1/- net Each Number.

The Size of the Page is 12 ins. by 9 ins.

A New Monthly Series Edited by C. H. COLLINS-BAKER.

The Publishers aim in this new Series at giving fine Reproductions of the Art Treasures that now enrich our private and public galleries. Illustrated Catalogues of separate collections of the various works of Art have been issued from time to time, but it is believed that this is the first attempt to give the public a representative collection of reproductions of the Masterpieces of Art in the British Isles.

Each number will contain Four or Five Photogravure, One Colour, and One Monotone Reproductions of the Treasures of

PAINTING, DRAWING, SCULPTURE,
POTTERY, CHINA, IVORIES,
METAL WORK, Etc.,

*THE FIRST NUMBER CONTAINS:—THE ADORATION OF THE KINGS.

The famous "Castle Howard Mabuse." By Jan Gossaert Mabuse.

PORTRAIT OF THE PAINTER.

Known as "The Ilchester Rembrandt," and regarded as the most important of Rembrandt's many Self-portraits.

GROUP OF HORSEMEN.

From the Parthenon Frieze. From the Elgin Collection in the British Museum.

THE HON. MRS. GRAHAM.

A Gainsborough Masterpiece. In the National Gallery of Scotland.

OLD BATTERSEA BRIDGE.

A unique example of Whistler's work. From the Edmund Davis Collection.

THE ANNUNCIATION.

The wonderful Enamel Triptych of Nardon Penicaud in the Victoria and Albert Museum.

MADONNA AND THE CHILD.

An Ivory Statuette in the British Museum. A fine Specimen of excellent craftsmanship by a French Artist of the XIVth Century.

*A full Prospectus with a reduced facsimile of a Photogravure will be gladly sent on receipt of a postcard.J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

THE SORCERY CLUB.

By ELLIOTT O'DONNELL. 6s.

"The Sorcery Club' is a highly successful effort to maintain a continuous interest in the supernatural."—The Athenaeum.

"A book that should be in the greatest demand everywhere. . . . Thrills are continuous and cumulative."—Globe.

"Fantastic, ingenious, and at times horribly thrilling."—The Graphic.

THE GODS of the DEAD.

By WINIFRED GRAHAM. 6s.

"The eerie atmosphere which it possesses is not the least excellent of its many good qualities. It can be recommended to anybody in search of a thrill."—The Bookman.

THE WEIRD of the WANDERER.

By PROSPERO & CALIBAN. 6s.

"Very exciting and interesting."—The Times.

"Very cleverly done."—The Scotsman.

POSSESSED.

By FIRTH SCOTT. 2s. net.

"We can say with assurance that no one who begins reading this book will be inclined to put it down until the last page has been turned. . . . This is such a tale of mystery and imagination as Poe himself would have been proud to own."—The Globe.

"The story, with its mixture of stark realism and wild supernaturalism is grimly powerful, and we watch the progress of the 'Possessed' Mordant with intense interest."—The Outlook.

THE INFERNO.

By AUGUST STRINDBERG. 2s. 6d. net.

"The work of a writer whose international fame has hitherto been bounded by the North Sea. Strindberg has been called 'the greatest subjectivist of all time,' and the epithet is not exaggerated."—The Globe.

"The book has powerful, pathetic and moving passages."—Everyman.

WM. RIDER & SON, Ltd., 8, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

MASEFIELD'S

GREAT NEW POEM,

"The Daffodil Fields," appears in the February Number of

THE ENGLISH REVIEW.

1/-

"BRILLIANT BEYOND BELIEF."

Ready 1st February, 1913.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. EACH OFFERED.—Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863; Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863; Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878; Baxter's Cabinet of Paintings, 1837; Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879; Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865; Symonds' Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881; Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. 100,000 Books for Sale and Wanted. Exchanges made. Please state wants.—Baker's Great Book Shop, 14-16, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

wrong, it is difficult to blame them entirely in the present state of society.

It is not rare either to hear the money side of a marriage discussed in England. Whenever I have heard a marriage announced, one of the first questions asked was whether the girl had got any money. There are many families where the son's wife is not at all appreciated because she was not rich enough. I could quote many instances of these kinds.

The money question comes into consideration just as much in England as in France; but it seems to me that the sense of parental responsibility, alluded to in the article of EVERYMAN, which prompts French people to constitute a dowry for their daughter, is of a higher kind than the one which causes a girl to wait until her future husband has got an income, which, to a French girl of the same situation, seems a very high one to begin married life with.

On account of her dowry and its consequent participation in the prosperity of the family, the French woman feels that the family she creates is built up on her money as well as on that of her husband; she feels more independent in the proper sense of the word; she feels a true right to claim a part in the making of plans in which her money is entrusted; her husband does not disdain to ask for her advice, and to rely upon it.

To these last few points may probably be traced one of the reasons why the French woman plays so great a part in the life of the country; why she is conscious of the place she occupies; and why the English suffragist movement has not had in France any parallel worthy of notice.

I must add that, if the question of the dowry may prevent some marriages in France, the French girl has always a say in the choice of her husband; that no one is ever forced on her, as is the current opinion with a large number of persons in England; and, moreover, that it is also quite certain that a girl without money has just as many chances of marrying in France as in England.

If you think these few words likely to interest your readers, I shall be grateful to EVERYMAN for the opportunity given to me to show, although I have not by far said all there is to say about it, that the dowry question is not so shameful after all.—I am, sir, etc.,

Reading.

YVONNE M. SALMON.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC EDUCATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Monsignor Benson has given us his account of Eton education with regard to religion and morality, which, to a certain extent, he contrasts with religion and morality as taught in the Roman Catholic Church. And now may I be permitted to render an account—with sole reference to the two subjects under discussion—of my six years' education at a Roman Catholic Secondary School?

The most important part of my boyhood I passed at this establishment, and my reports can prove that I always obtained high marks for Doctrine and Scripture. Furthermore, during all that time and for a few years afterwards I was an altar-boy at a Catholic church, where I came into contact with numerous priests of that faith. So it is plain that I received a good deal of Catholic instruction, and obtained a fair insight into the methods of instructing the boyhood of the Roman Catholic Church for their welfare.

In his boyhood Monsignor Benson learned religion and morality according to the Eton system, and I fancy that I am not wrong in saying that, could this distinguished man of religion have his boyhood over again, he would prefer the Catholic method. Well, in the writer you have a case of one who was educated entirely under the latter system, and who, if it were possible for him to have his boyhood once more, would strain every nerve NOT to have morality and religion taught him in the way it is done in the Roman Catholic Church. I am perfectly confident that I am by no means a solitary case in this respect, because the extremely lax system prevalent in the Roman Catholic Church of inculcating morality in the young is, in an enormous measure, to blame for those who throw off the yoke of Rome. It is absolute humbug having beautiful churches, elaborate ceremonial, magnificent singing, and high-sounding prayers, when at the same time there is an entire failure to instil morality in the young.

Monsignor Benson would have us to believe that what is lacking in the Eton education is a man who can be the confidant of the boys, and that a sympathetic man, sworn to keep such confidences, would be the right man in the right place. The Catholic priest in the confessional is bound by the laws of his Church to keep confidences, and Monsignor Benson implies that here is the man wanted. But does he really believe that every Catholic boy gives his confessor absolute confidence?

I strongly maintain that there are very large numbers of Catholic boys of the impressionable age who are absolutely unaware of what the particular form of vice in question really is, by reason of the fact never having been explained to them. Does Monsignor Benson think that the average Catholic schoolboy, totally ignorant that indulgence in this vice is a most grievous sin, is going to confess as a sin that which he (the boy) regards as being perfectly natural and harmless?

Unfortunately the youth of the Catholic Church receives no explicit teaching as to what ruin to both body and soul the insidious blight can do. Of course, at the school where I was educated there were religious lectures to apply specially to boys; yet the subject of purity was always spoken of in a vague, indefinite manner, so that the vast majority of the boys hardly understood what the instructor was driving at.

From my own experiences, the Roman Catholic clergy evidently treat the subject as a "nightmare"—the matter is too unpleasant for them to discuss. Most likely they expect parents to inform their children, while at the same time the parents confidently rely on the priests, as moral and spiritual guardians, to enlighten their children on this all-important question. The moral and spiritual welfare of Catholic youth is entrusted to the clergy of that Church, who leave the boys in the dark to feel for themselves. To my mind, it is absurd to have such elaborate ritual, confessions, and so forth, whilst at the same time the boys are left to their own devices in the most important part of all.

Practically all the boys at the church I used to attend, altar-boys and choir-boys included, fell into vicious habits, but never a word was uttered on the subject—it would, perhaps, have been a breach of (supposed) good manners. At my school, as well as at the church, this particular form of vice claimed too many victims, who might doubtless have been of fine character but for this besetting evil. I often wondered later on how some of the boys escaped, and this I discovered was owing to proper instruction by their sensible parents, who evidently did not trust all to the priests.

I ought to mention that it is one of the proudest

Mr. HEINEMANN'S LIST

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS.

LOST IN THE ARCTIC.

By CAPTAIN EJNAR MIKKELSEN. Illustrations, Map, etc. Crown 4to. 18s. net.

"Captain Mikkelsen's book may be accounted one of the best that has ever been devoted to the story of Arctic Exploration."—Daily Telegraph.

WITH THE TURKS IN THRACE.

By E. ASHMEAD BARTLETT. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

THE POSITIVE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION.

By FREDERIC HARRISON, D.C.L. Demy 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

PAUL I. OF RUSSIA:

The Son of Catherine the Great. By K. WALISZEWSKI. Royal 8vo. 15s. net.

RECENT EVENTS & PRESENT POLICIES IN CHINA.

By J. O. P. BLAND. Royal 8vo. Illustrated. 16s. net.

IN THE SHADOW of the BUSH.

By P. AMAURY TALBOT. With many Illustrations. Large Demy 8vo. 18s. net.

The CHILDHOOD of ANIMALS.

By P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, F.R.S. (Secretary of the Zoological Society). With Illustrations in Colour, etc. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

EPOCHS OF CHINESE AND JAPANESE ART.

By E. F. FENOLLOSA. In 2 vols. Cr. 4to. 36s. net.

WILD LIFE and the CAMERA.

By A. RADCLYFFE DUGMORE. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

SIMPLICISSIMUS.

By HANS VON GRIMMELSHAUSEN. Large cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

ESTHER WATERS.

A Play, by GEORGE MOORE. Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d.

JESUS OF NAZARETH: A Poetical

Drama. By ALEXANDRA VON HERDER. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

Five New Volumes are now ready. (1 & 2) Euripides, Vols. III. & IV. (3) Appian's Roman History, Vol. II. (4) Catullus, Tibullus, Pervigilium Veneris. (5) Lucian, Vol. I. Full particulars on application to Prospectus Dept. Va.

FINE NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE HIPPODROME - - Rachel Hayward
THE FRONTIERS of the HEART

Victor Margueritte
THE STORY OF STEPHEN COMPTON

J. E. Patterson
WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO?

Elizabeth Robins
A RUNAWAY RING - - Mrs. Henry Dudeney

KING ERRANT - - - - - Flora A. Steel

THE DECLENSION of HENRY D'ALBIAC
V. Goldie

MOLYNEUX OF MAYFAIR Duncau Schwann

ADNAM'S ORCHARD - - - - Sarah Grand

BETWEEN TWO THIEVES Richard Dehan

The Great Romance of Bulgarian Liberation.
UNDER THE YOKE - - - - Ivan Vazoff

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

REVISED RATES FOR ANNUITIES.

Welcome Announcement to all who have money invested or to invest.

CONTINUING its policy of giving customers the benefits which accrue from unusually profitable investments, sound administration and successful enterprise, the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada again announces a further reduction in rates. The new rates came into force on January 1st, and are the lowest offered by any Insurance Company.

It may be news to some readers to learn that the "Sun Life of Canada" transacts not only the largest Annuity business in the British Empire, but actually a greater Annuity business than all other Canadian Companies put together. And Canadian Companies, remember, specialise in Annuities. This enormous business is due entirely to the Company's enterprise and sound financial standing.

The "Sun Life of Canada" issues annuities to suit individual needs. The man or woman who desires a plain, straightforward annuity—paying the Company a lump sum down and receiving so much per annum until death, however long he or she may live—purchases one on better terms than can be obtained elsewhere. If a joint annuity is desired, or a deferred annuity, or an educational annuity (which all parents should consider) the "Sun Life of Canada" provides the ideal policy—ideal inasmuch as it gives the best value and unsurpassed security. Another very popular form is the "Sun Life of Canada" Annuity with return of capital guaranteed. There are many other Forms, too numerous to mention here. Annuitants with impaired health are granted extra favourable terms.

The "Sun Life of Canada" has assets of £10,000,000 invested in accordance with Canadian Government requirements. Its affairs—in common with all Canadian Insurance Companies—are subject to yearly audit and inspection by the Government. Risk, therefore, is eliminated, and those who deal with the "Sun Life of Canada" know that their income is, in very fact, secure for life. Will you send for further particulars?

ENQUIRY FORM.

To J. F. Junkin (Manager), SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA, 94, Canada House, Norfolk St., London, W.C.
Please send me particulars, explanatory booklets, etc., of your various forms of Annuity Insurance. (Enquirer should state age, particulars of annuity required, etc., the communication being regarded as confidential.)
NAME.....
ADDRESS.....
DATE OF BIRTH.....	ANNUITY REQUIRED.....

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

PRINT YOUR OWN CIRCULARS, Cards, etc.—Printing Presses complete from 10s. to £5. "Printing Made Easy," 6d.—Adams Bros., Daventry.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount price from Hunter & Longhurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. New Catalogue, just ready, sent post free.

LEARN FRENCH . . .
WITH A NATIVE (University Degree).
Pronunciation and Conversation carefully taught. 2/- per hour (private lesson).
—Mr. LEON, 50, Bloomsbury Street (New Oxford Street), 1 minute from Tube.

boasts of the Roman Catholic Church that her teaching everywhere is the same. A fair sample of some of this latter and its results have been given here.

You will not eradicate this vice by means of the confessional. It should be one of the principal laws of all religions that every boy be told frankly and straight what personal purity really is, and thus ensure that the foundations of manliness be firmly laid.

After I had left school I got a tremendous shock, when I found out (from a non-Catholic though unbiased source) what morality really meant. This set me thinking seriously for a long time, the result of which was that I could not consistently remain a member of such a religion, and consequently I felt it my duty to leave the Roman Catholic Church.

Monsignor Benson joined the Catholic Church long after his boyhood. The writer was born and brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, and I might go so far as to say that had this eminent cleric, as a boy, been educated in religion and morality according to Roman Catholic methods, he would now, perhaps, think a little different as regards those same methods, which are very, very sadly in need of reform.—I am, sir, etc.,
F. A.

THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—At the very summit of English Literature stands the English Bible. It is worth reading from this point of view, and, if rightly interpreted, it presents a conspectus of the world's history and of the gradual revelation of God's will concerning us. Mr. Ferris is mistaken in supposing that we teach to-day in the Church of Christ the infallibility of every word in the book. We find in it a record of progress, in spite of constant retrogression, of mistakes which taught useful lessons, and of the tendency of rules, regulations, and ceremonial to harden the heart. Mr. Ferris is right in saying that the tradition of the elders which our Lord set aside was the immediate cause of the Crucifixion, and this should have been a sufficient warning to all who call themselves by His name that the same result will always follow—as indeed has been the case—whenever a prophet has arisen with a call to righteousness. "I wot, brethren," says St. Peter, "that it was in ignorance ye did it"; but such ignorance is no longer a righteous plea. We are bound to search the Scriptures, and we do, but bound still more to use the light now spread abroad by them to see where we have gone astray in the past, and mend our ways in the future. The revelation of Jesus Christ is plain. God is our Father. All distinctions of race or position are abolished; wealth is a snare and should be only used as a trust for the common good; absolute truthfulness and honesty are prime duties; every shadow of hypocrisy is hateful.

No line should be drawn, as Mr. Ferris would draw it, between the Old and the New Testament. He will find in the Apocalypse passages which will shock him all the more, because they proceed from a Christian source; but he will admire the glorious beauty of other passages, and take into account the horrors of the Neronian persecution.—I am, sir, etc.,

OCTOGENARIAN.

In our issue of last week, referring to the forthcoming edition of "The Art Treasures of Great Britain," we inadvertently stated that the editor, Mr. C. H. Collins-Baker, the well-known art critic, was of the National Portrait Gallery. Mr. Baker has a unique knowledge of the works of art in the Gallery, but is not officially connected with it.

A JAPANESE FARMER SAGE*

"If we would only develop the deserted wastes in human minds, we could then let the deserted fields look out for themselves." This, one of the favourite sayings of Ninomiya Sontoku, the Japanese Farmer Sage, may fitly be regarded as the inspirational idea of his life-work.

Ninomiya is the most famous man Japan has given to the industrial world. Born in 1787 in the province of Sagami, he was a farmer from a humble home, who educated himself, and became one of the great moral and intellectual forces of Japan just before the dawn of the Meiji Era, the age of enlightenment. After his death in 1856, his teaching and methods were perpetuated by a band of enthusiastic disciples. But it is only since the Russo-Japanese War that his writings have become popular. Now his followers are scattered all over Japan, and such is the esteem in which his teaching is held that the Home Department of the Japanese Government, acting in co-operation with the Educational Department, recently endeavoured to introduce it into the whole school system of Japan.

Ninomiya was an economic and moral rather than a religious force. His career was largely an attempt to show that, while the cultivation of the land is the true basis of economic success, this ideal was attainable only by people who had moral stamina. The most careful and economical methods of utilising the resources of the country would be largely futile, if those who employed them were morally indifferent. Many notable men in Japan had emphasised the fact that in the tillage of the soil lay the happiness and prosperity of the people, but Ninomiya was the first to base economic success upon morality.

The fundamental teaching of the Farmer Sage is contained in his "Evening Addresses," which have been likened to the "Analects of Confucius." It is known as "Hotoku" (literally "The Rewarding of Graces"). Hence the well-known Japanese organisation of that name, with its two-fold object—the development of morality and the promotion of industry and economy.

English readers will feel grateful to Mr. Armstrong for his brief but quite adequate record of the life and teaching of Ninomiya Sontoku, who, in trying to rescue his countrymen from the misery of bad economic conditions and to make them prosperous and contented, is entitled to be regarded as one of the makers of modern Japan. There is a portrait of the Sage and other illustrations.

THE MOSLEM CHRIST†

THERE was room for a popular and well-informed exposition of the life and teachings of Jesus Christ according to the Koran and orthodox tradition, and Dr. Zwemer was eminently qualified to write it. For many years he has been not only a devoted missionary to the Arabic-speaking Moslems of Bahrein, but an enthusiastic student of the literature of Islam.

In a former work he expounded with insight and learning the Moslem doctrine of God, and now he directs the attention of English readers to what the Koran has to say of the Christ. Dr. Zwemer writes tersely and graphically, and is seldom prosy, but we have noticed some grammatical slips and ambiguities

* "Just Before the Dawn." The Life and Work of Ninomiya Sontoku. By Robert Cornell Armstrong. 6s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

† "The Moslem Christ." By Samuel M. Zwemer, D.D., F.R.G.S. 3s. 6d. net. (Oliphant.)

It is always difficult, even at the best circulating libraries, to get a recently published work promptly on publication

The Times Book Club's New Special Service ensures the prompt delivery of any new book in circulation in the Library.

Country subscribers are not required to return their books until a fresh supply arrives, and are thus never without books.

The Times Book Club is thus offering

A UNIQUE LIBRARY SERVICE

Subscriptions from 7/6

Full particulars, rates of subscription, etc., will be sent on receipt of post-card mentioning Everyman.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB CIRCULATING LIBRARY

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

Monthly 1s. Net 1s. Net Monthly

THE BRITISH REVIEW

FROM FEBRUARY CONTENTS

The Conference of St. James's	M. G.
A Prisoner of the Bulgars	Francis McCullagh
Ulster's Resistance	"A Child of Ulster"
The Ethics of Resistance	Joseph Keating, S.J.
Ireland: a Plan for a Parley	Richard FitzWalter
Fiscal Reform—I.	Hilaire Belloc
Some Light on the Mystery of Evil	J. Godfrey Raupert
Poetry	Francis Burrows; H. G. de Hamel; C. E. Snowden
The Soul at the Window	Maurice Hewlett
More Mediaeval Byways, II.	L. F. Salaman, F.S.A.
"Vox Populi"	R. L. Gales
Marjorie	G. Egremont
Obiter Dicta	The Editor

LONDON. WILLIAMS & NORGATE

THE PATH.

CONTENTS. FEBRUARY NUMBER.

THE THREE REALITIES (An Address)	ABDUL BAHÁ
CHRIST AND HIS MISSION	JOHN UNDERHILL
THE SECRET OF BERGSON	CHARLOTTE E. WOODS
THE GATE TO THE ART OF THE FUTURE	W. WRÓBLEWSKI
THE LORD MAITREYA	WILLIAM L. HARE
THE SYMBOLISM OF THE TAROT	P. D. OUSPENSKY
REFLECTIONS AND REFRACTIONS	THE EDITOR

Price 6d.; by post 7d. Send to Dept. B3.
THE PATH PUBLISHING CO., Oakley House, Bloomsbury Street, W.C.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS" (Copyright)

evolved by G. H. Cox and invariably used by nature when concentration of Brain Power is required; exemplified in Musicians, Scientists, etc., through all ages.

All subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE. A natural gift.

Sir Ray Lankester says: "There is no branch of science about which it is so desirable that every one should have some general knowledge and of which the general public is so little informed as the Science of Mind. There is no elementary instruction in this subject attempted in our Schools, nor in English Universities."

Dr. Deanesley, Wolverhampton, writes: "You may certainly use my name in support of your method."

Dr. W. F. Cholmeley, F.R.C.S., Wolverhampton.—"It seems to me to get at the whole root of the matter and to prove conclusively the absurdity of the modern method of education. In your medical and scientific facts I can find no flaw, and the deductions you draw from them appear to me to be absolutely sound."

Musicians, Teachers, Students, Engineers, Speakers, Business Men, and all who need memory, should write, stating subject required for, GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhall College), Address—Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws"; in a Nutshell, on Card. Teaches the new way to acquire Knowledge. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

"Give us a Miracle"

Since the beginning men and women of all creeds have sought after a sign or miracle to encourage and strengthen them in their faith. "Give us a Miracle" is a 16-page booklet giving a thrilling account of such a demand, and how it was fulfilled, quoted from a remarkable new religious novel entitled "The Prophet." Send for a copy of the booklet to-day. IT IS FREE if you mention EVERYMAN.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8190.)

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

READERS WHO SUFFER FROM SORE THROAT can secure a free supply of FORMAMINT, the throat remedy used by prominent speakers, by writing to A. WULFING & Co., 12, Chancery Street, London, W.C., mentioning the offer made in EVERYMAN.

THE PROGRESS SOCIETY links up lonely men and women everywhere into a social body, affording wider intellectual and material interests through its various circles. No membership fee. For descriptive booklet send stamp to the Secretary, E. M., 107, Greencroft Gardens, Hampstead, London.

THE "IDEAL" DIVISIBLE MS. BOOK. All work can be done in one book and rearranged in any manner. Absolutely simple. No rings, posts, or staples. Rapidly becoming universal at all Universities. Specimen, 1s. 9d. post free.—W.M. HUNT, 18, Broad Street, Oxford.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size. Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete. A. R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

which, with careful proof-reading, might have been avoided. Be that as it may, the book presents a vivid conception of Jesus Christ "as known (if known at all) by the vast majority of Moslems, whether learned or illiterate."

Dr. Zwemer, at the outset, reminds us that there is a paradox bound up with his theme.

"Islam is the only one of the great non-Christian religions which gives a place to Christ in its book, and yet it is also the only one of the non-Christian religions which denies His deity, His atonement and His supreme place as Lord of all in its sacred literature."

Moslems acknowledge Jesus Christ not only as a true prophet, but one of the greatest before Mohammed. And the fact is also worth remembering that no fewer than three of the chapters of the Koran, namely, that of "Amran's Family" (Surah III.), that of "The Table" (Surah V.), and that of Mary (Surah XIX.), are so named because of references to Jesus Christ and His work. But, as Dr. Zwemer brings out in a most interesting way, the Koran alone of the sacred books of the East gives Christ a place, but does so by displacing Him. The cardinal attributes of His life and teaching are left out; to the people of the Moslem world he is only a prophet, and a minor prophet.

But the very fact that the Founder of Christianity has a place in the literature of Islam ought to be of immense service to the Christian missionaries who labour among the Moslems. Dr. Zwemer sees this clearly, and has wisely devoted his final chapter to the problem of how to preach the Christ of the New Testament to the Mohammedan world. As regards this aspect of the subject, it is interesting to learn, on the testimony of so experienced a missionary, that beyond the shadow of a doubt "the hour is ripe for evangelising the Moslem world." It only remains to add that the book contains several illustrations and a useful bibliography.

A PLEA FOR SCIENTIFIC CHRISTIANITY*

THIS new and cheaper edition of an eminently thoughtful book, first published some four years ago, will be welcomed by many who seek to reconcile the claims of science and Christianity. The writer takes his stand upon the Darwinian theory, and his book is an effort to investigate "the true scientific basis of religious phenomena." He argues that the whole nature of man is subject to laws which operate universally, and that when these laws are so applied they furnish the key to a good many problems, including how to live the greatest life, by which is meant the highest ideal conceivable by the human intellect.

Dr. Leighton's position is thoroughly antagonistic to the current conceptions of orthodox Christianity. He does not allow for the play of supernatural forces. To differentiate religious truth from other kinds of truth is, in his view, unwarranted. Spiritual experiences, he says, must be governed in accordance with the laws which rule the rest of the universe. And so he concludes that the future evolution of man, if it is to be in the direction of higher ethical progress, can only be attained as the result of what he calls "a scientific Christianity."

The writer's leading positions are lucidly and skillfully set forth, and the book is full of sober reflection. Dr. Leighton wholly misunderstands orthodox Christianity, which professes to be a divine revelation, and therefore incapable of scientific demonstration. To ask, Can no place be found for spiritual truths in the natural order of things? is to ignore entirely the supernatural claims of Christianity. Dr. Leighton says "that the age of acceptance by faith of any truth is gone for ever." If that be so, Christianity is doomed, for it rests upon faith.

* "The Greatest Life." By Gerald Leighton, M.D., F.R.S. 2s. 6d. net. (Duckworth.)

THE STRUGGLE FOR BREAD *

THAT Mr. Norman Angell should have succeeded in bringing into the field so able, vigorous, and well-equipped an antagonist as "Rifleman" is in itself a striking testimony, if not to the profound significance of his views, at all events to their novelty and attractiveness. "Rifleman" sees clearly that Mr. Angell's arguments have taken strong hold upon the popular imagination, and, as he is firmly convinced that they constitute "the most gross and dangerous illusion ever based on ignorance and preached to ignorance," he summons to his aid all his dialectical skill (which is saying much) and straightway attempts to demolish them.

It may seem paradoxical, but it is a fact, that there is a class of militarists who define their position somewhat hesitatingly, as if haunted by a suspicion that it was not quite tenable and required extenuation. "Rifleman" does not belong to this school. He is a pronounced militarist, who does not mince matters. Not only does he state quite frankly the logical conclusions of his position, but he seems to accept them with an air of triumph. He ridicules the idea that economic security has no relation to military power, and maintains, on the contrary, that without the fostering care of armed strength, trade decays.

The present economic situation in Europe fills "Rifleman" with the gloomiest forebodings.

"We are sailing 'full steam ahead!' to one of the most tremendous conflicts in history, and if we are to survive in this struggle it behoves us to study well the chinks in our armour and gird up our loins for the fray."

-His case is briefly this: The capitalist nations of Europe are struggling desperately for bread. Germany is the hungriest of them all, and by the economics of the case is bound to become hungrier still. Irresistible forces are therefore driving her to better her economic position, which can only be done by ousting Britain from her premier position in the markets of the world. If the ruling classes of Germany do not attempt the military conquest of Britain, then that nation will be face to face with an internal revolt of Labour forces which will practically amount to a revolution. War or Socialism—between them lie the fate of Germany.

"Rifleman" devotes considerable space to showing that Germany has every inducement to fight. From a military point of view she is all-powerful, whilst her navy is rapidly being brought to a high state of efficiency. On the other hand, if she were victorious, the economic gain would be enormous, for not only would she capture the carrying trade of Britain, but the receipt of a gigantic war indemnity would capitalise German industry and place eventually in her hands the bulk of British export trade.

"Rifleman's" conclusion is that the day is not far distant when we shall be menaced by the twin dangers of foreign war and industrial revolution. The first can only be warded off by a powerful navy; the second by a firm administration of the law, and a policy of sane, enlightened social reform.

Altogether, the book furnishes a powerful state-

The Struggle for Bread: A Reply to "The Great Illusion" and Enquiry into Economic Tendencies. By "A Rifleman." 5s. net. (Lane.)

THE MOST WONDERFUL COURSE OF LESSONS IN THE WORLD.

OVER 200,000 leaders in the Professions, Business, Trade, Commerce, Finance, Literature, Science, and Industry, have already profited by these self-same lessons.

Men or women who aspire to Business or Professional Success or to Social Progress without utilising the aid of the Mental Training afforded by the renowned Pelman School of the Mind are neglecting the greatest assistance the modern world offers.

It will pay you over and over again in the increased income brought in by your increased skill and capacity.

The following is a brief summary of the leading features of the Pelman Course:—

Lesson I.—The Three Elements of Success.

Men who succeed work on right lines. The failures, though industrious sometimes, are on wrong lines. Mental Powers: their development—The origin and analysis of ideas—The Study of Human Nature—Will Power—First Aids to Memory (Part I.).

Lesson II.—The Creation of Ambition.

Failure generally comes from lack of ambition. The Pelman Course creates ambition and arouses thought forces into action. It abolishes the forgetting habit, and thus saves money and reputation. The thought that leads to action—Think scientifically—Positive Thinking—First Aids to Memory (Part II.)—Conscious and Sub-conscious Memory—Methods to avoid forgetfulness, e.g., posting letters, appointments, etc.

Lesson III.—Knowledge and the Senses.

There is a right way of thinking and accumulating knowledge for business purposes just as there is a right way of laying bricks. How to define accurately—Importance of Classification—Observation—How the foregoing methods increase our receptivity of ideas.

Lesson IV.—Observation as a Business Asset.

Success may often be due to a quick eye. How to become a keen Observer—Memory for Sights and Sounds.

Lesson V.—Attention, Concentration, and Interest.

Mind-wandering is paid for in hard cash or in loss of position; the Pelman Course completely cures the habit and makes you master of your mind. Spontaneous and voluntary attention—Classification by agreements and differences—Commercial value of Concentration—Exercises in Concentration—Studies in Memory Training (Part I.)—Recalling lost ideas—Momentary forgetfulness—The Law of Contiguity—The Law of Similarity.

Lesson VI.—Ideation; or, How to Originate Ideas.

An empty purse may speedily be filled by a mind full of ideas. Ideas for Profit—Conversation—Creative Reading—Studies in Memory Training (Part II.)—Mental Connection.

Lesson VII.—Originality in Aims and Methods.

Originality the great need of the day. The secret put into practice to be turned to financial advantage. The laws of Association—The Imagination—Reasoning by Analogy—Two Business Illustrations—Your dormant possibilities—Studies in Memory Training (Part III.)—How to remember unconnected facts and ideas—Correlation.

Lesson VIII.—The Influence of Mind on Mind.

The compelling power of personality. The possession means in business the difference between a sale or no sale, successful negotiations or failure. This lesson calls out latent forces—to your advantage. Personal Magnetism—How a crowd thinks—Unconscious mental influence—The Positive Outlook—Exercises—Studies in Memory Training (Part IV.)—Homologues—A Striking feat of Memory.

Lesson IX.—A Business Man's Mind and Memory.

To think profits and to make them; that is the business mind. Learn to judge what the public wants and how to supply those wants. The conquest of difficulties—Memory for commercial purposes—Adding at sight—Remembering figures—How to remember names and places—Remembering the Selling Talk—Speeches, how to prepare and deliver them.

Lesson X.—Training the Mind for Study.

Every mind needs training. Not one in a hundred can study, even for business purposes, without a course. Wrong v. Right Methods—The logic of study—Rules for testing an argument—Memory and Scholarship (Part I.)—Dates and Figures—The Collative Method—The Pelman Memory system applied to mathematics, languages, physiology, history, geography—How to master a book at a reading.

Lesson XI.—Auto-suggestion.

A remarkable application of a new law which banishes the fear of failure and makes you live in a success atmosphere. After the Pelman Course you feel you can never turn back. Attainment is bound to come.

Lesson XII.—Will Power.

Thinking is not much good without action. You must do something, and this final lesson shows you the how of it; just as the Pelman System teaches Concentration so it teaches Action.

WRITE FOR FREE COPY OF "MIND AND MEMORY" and the new Magazine, "BRAIN POWER,"

also full particulars of the Pelman Course of Training.

Address your application (a postcard will do) to the Secretary,

THE PELMAN SCHOOL OF THE MIND,

52, Wenham House, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

Branch Schools—47, Queen Street, Melbourne; 9, Churchgate Street, Bombay; Club Arcade, Durban.

HOW TO STUDY

Rapidly, Effectively & Scientifically,
with the Minimum of Fatigue

To study rapidly and effectively you must understand how to pay attention, how to observe, how to employ your memory so that you may remember what you read. You must know how to develop your Will-power so as to enlist its valuable aid when your Will flags. You must know how to control your thoughts so as to inhibit alien ideas, and to shut out distracting influences. You must know how to guard against Fatigue, for to engage in study when your mind is fatigued is to make your study of no value. You are taught how to secure the above in an easy, sure, and scientific manner in the World-Famous Course—"Scientific Concentration," the finest all-round Mental-Training you can undertake. It will revolutionise your outlook on life and make you much more efficient in study, or in your Profession, or Business. In every part of the civilised world men and women in every walk of life testify to this. "Scientific Concentration" is highly recommended by the late Mr. W. T. Stead (Editor of the "Review of Reviews"), "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "Great Thoughts," etc. Learn all about this splendid All-Round Mental-Training by sending to-day for their Free Descriptive Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46 CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, etc. Private and Class lessons and translation. Moderate terms. Prospectus free. Rosenblum's Language Institute, 319, Oxford St., W.; 26, High Holborn, W.C.; 42, Lombard St., E.C.

LITERARY.—Novels, Short Stories, Articles, Poems, placed with 179 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. £3 3s. per 1,000 words obtained for unknown author. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 113, Strand, W.C.

WHICH?—Bench, desk, or counter—long, hard, ill-paid toil? or the Platform—an hour's fascinating high-paid work? Simple, common-sense talk, NOT "Oratory," wanted. £3 to £4 weekly, evenings only, may be earned by studying "Public Speaking for Pay and Pleasure" (Special Section: "How to get Engagements"), 1s. post free.—MORGAN, Poulner, Ringwood.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

REMAINDER BOOKS.—February Catalogue of Publishers' Reminders Now Ready, Gratis and Post Free.—WM. GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon.

PERSONAL PURITY.—"Healthy Boyhood," by Arthur Trewby, M.A. The Lancet "could wish a boy entering his public school no better present." 1s. post free.—Hon. Secy., Healthy Boyhood Crusade, Hurlford, Ayrshire.

K.O. SCHOOL OF GRECIAN WISDOM.—Founded Manchester, 1911. Neoplatonic Exposition of Lesser Mysteries. For particulars write, S. G. W., c/o EVERYMAN, Aldine House, Bedford St., W.C.

MY COURSE OF INSTRUCTION (by post) in the mail order trade teaches you how to make money; Interesting particulars free.—NAPIER, "Avoca," Flamstead, Dunstable.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. and General Copying, 8d. 1,000 words; with carbon, 9d.—GIRTON, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Shorthand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free. from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

ment of the militarist view. But we rise from its perusal dissatisfied, unconvinced. We feel that at bottom the author is out of sympathy with what we shall call "the humane view," and his whole outlook is coloured by this fact. There is no suggestion in this book that he has ever been impressed by the truth that "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than those of war." Militancy appeals to him, and it is not difficult to discover that his antipathy to the pacificist policy is more influenced by this fact than by the logic of events.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THIS AND THAT AND THE OTHER (Methuen, 5s. net) includes some of the most delightful things ever said by Mr. Belloc. The essay on "Inns" cheers one even to read, and fills one with an ardent longing to discover the special hostels of which he writes. He contends the noblest are in South England, "and it is in South England that the chief inns of the world still stand. In the hall of it, as you come in, are barrels of cider standing upon chairs. The woman that keeps this inn is real and kind. She receives you so that you are glad to enter the house. She takes pleasure in her life. That which was her beauty her daughter now inherits, and she serves at the bar. Her son is strong, and carries up the luggage." A paradise such as this is rarely to be met with. Nowadays the good old taverns have given place to showy hotels, where the raucous gramophone has ousted the local singer. For it is noticeable that in the country—always excepting the South of England—the inn, as Mr. Belloc describes it, is gradually becoming extinct, and what a few years ago was a cheerful, roomy place you find to-day turned into a draughty building, built after the fashion endorsed by the Garden City, with its drink to match. The essay that gives us keenest delight is on the "Servants of the Rich." The opening paragraph sets the key to the delicious whole, and we cannot resist quoting. "Do you mark there, down in the lowest point and innermost funnel of Hell's Fire Pit, souls writhing in smoke, themselves like glowing smoke and tortured in the flame? You ask me what they are. These are the servants of the rich: the men who in their mortal life opened the doors of the great houses, and drove the carriages, and sneered at the unhappy guests." We have at times suffered intensely from the superior butler, the man who seems instinctively to spy out the hole in your boot, and fixes his eye on the darn in your coat. No one has ever written of the tyranny of these people so perfectly as the author. "That man who looked us up and down so insolently when the doors were opened in St. James's Square, and who thought one's boots so comic. He, too, and all his like burn separately."

The rest of the essays, "The Human Charlatan" and "The Fanatic," are amongst the most brilliant and convincing.

The success of the Ammergau play notwithstanding, there has always been in this country an instinctive dread of dramatic representations of Christ. Religious people imagine that they are bound to degenerate into unedifying theatrical displays, from which the spirit of reverence and devotion has fled. Those who entertain such scruples would do well to read BETHLEHEM TABLEAUX FROM BEHIND THE SCENES, by John K. C. Chesshire (Dent, 5s. net). The author is fully convinced of the religious value of representations of this sort, and says that wherever the attempt has been made "it has been found that reverence and the right spirit increases so marvellously as the preparations and rehearsals proceed that anything in the nature of bad taste automatically disappears." His book is based on personal experience gained in connection with the management of the Wribbenhall Bethlehem Tableaux of 1911 and 1912, and is a compendium of practical information, showing how such tableaux may be represented in town or country parishes. At the end of the volume there is a suggested scheme for a representation of the Bethlehem Tableaux, with an Old Testament introduction, together with suitable music. The work is enhanced by numerous illustrations from photographs taken, with three exceptions, by flashlight from a reconstruction of the actual groupings of the Wribbenhall Tableaux.

NAN AND OTHER PIONEER WOMEN OF THE WEST, by Frances E. Herring (F. Griffiths, 3s. 6d.), is not exactly a pleasant book. It consists of sketches of British Columbia life as the writer knew it some forty or fifty years ago. These are, for the most part, somewhat gruesome, especially the first (which gives the title to the book), in which we are introduced to the horrors of cannibalism. But the writer does not eschew entirely the lighter vein. In "Miss Phoebe's Courtship" she shows herself possessed of some humour. As a whole, however, the book is rather amateurish, and we do not quite see why it was published, unless it was to enforce the lesson that the pioneer women of the West had a terrible time, mainly owing to "the over-thraldom of men." Certainly, suffragettes will find consolation in this book.

WASHINGTON IRVING occupies a unique position in literature. He shares with Charles Lamb the elfin humour and Puck-like spirit that mark out the salient points for ridicule and gentle sarcasm. But he has a fund of sympathy not always present in the essays of "Elia." Save, perhaps, in "Dream Children," where Lamb touches the high-water mark of pathos, the American has a broader and more human outlook on life, possesses a wider understanding of man's weaknesses and foibles. THE SKETCH BOOK is at once the most popular of Irving's works, and the most notable. Eloquent as are his descriptives, picturesque as are his accounts of the "Alhambra" and Moorish art in Spain, nothing attains to the perfection of his art in "Rip van Winkle." In style Irving is easy and pleasant to read. The stream of his narrative flows on like a country road, winding in and out the hills, until of a sudden through the trees you catch a glimpse of purple mountains in the distance, or the smoke of a little homestead rising to the sky. The story of Rip is immortal. He paints for us the picture of those dear and familiar things that we can never forget. For the legend tells us not only of life's failures, hardships, and heartaches; it enshrines for us the most precious things of all, the memory of old hopes, the ideals of our lost youth, the fragrance of our first love.

Messrs. Frowde are to be congratulated upon their production of this edition. Well bound and admirably printed, it is astonishing that so valuable a book can be obtained for the small price of a shilling.

"In a poplar-girt Vallach village of Transylvania there lived once upon a time a boy whose world was a large green meadow full of daisies." This is the promising beginning of a well-written book. THE TEMPLE ON THE HILL (Sidgwick and Jackson, 3s. 6d.) is a

Twenty years ago

"Swan" Fountain pens were regarded as luxuries, toys and nonsense. To-day they are looked upon as necessities and very valuable aids to the rapid and easy conduct of affairs that engage men and women and which call for writing, signing, sketching, etc. The "Swan" fountain habit once acquired—and it is quickly acquired—is the most tenacious of habits, and, as a "Swan" is serviceable for years, it is easy to realise that each "Swan" convert is one less user of steel nibs to the extent of, say, one gross per annum.

'SWAN'

Ranks as the standard not only for quality, high finish and reliability, but also for progressive improvement. Moreover, every "Swan" is guaranteed.

Sold by Stationers and Jewellers.

Safety Pattern from 12/6 upwards.
Standard Pattern from 10/6.

MABIE, TODD & CO.,
79 & 80, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

38, Cheapside, E.C., 95A, Regent Street, London, W.; 3, Exchange Street, Manchester; 37, Ave de l'Opéra, Paris; 10, Rue Neuve, Brussels; and at New York, Chicago, Toronto and Sydney.

fills and cleans any pen in "no time." 1/- and 1/6 each.

story of life in a Roumanian village; the characters are strongly drawn, are convincing and arresting in their elemental simplicity. Anuce, the beauty of the countryside, is married by her parents to an aged man, though she already loves Cyprian, the boy whose world is a meadow of daisies. The stress of the situation lies in the fact that her husband is Cyprian's father. The boy, early in revolt against life, becomes embroiled with a forester, whom he kills. Tormented by remorse, he confesses to the priest, who as penance lays on him the task of completing the church he has already commenced to build upon the hill. Designed as a landmark throughout the country, the edifice grows in the priest's imagination out of all proportion to reality. Ambition and a fierce desire to complete this fantasy dries up the springs of human sympathy, and he lays this task on the unhappy youth without remorse. The story ends on a tragic note, and, though the final catastrophe is inevitable, we confess we are disappointed. It is a fault of so many stories of the people that the joy of life and the simple contentment with small things that play so large a part in their existence are persistently ignored. We wish Miss Elsa de Szasz would give us a novel in a less poignant setting.

To the solution of the mystery of Edwin Drood there is no end, but especial interest attaches to that which has just been published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall at 7s. 6d., under the title of THE COMPLETE EDWIN DROOD. The fact that the work is from the pen of so distinguished a Dickensian authority as Mr. J. Cuming Walters alone suffices to give the volume unusual interest. We have not space at our command to deal exhaustively with the theory which Mr. Walters advances, but it deserves the careful attention of all students of the master's work. Perhaps the most arresting portion of the book is that in which Mr. Walters analyses the personal testimony which he claims has been advanced in support of his conclusions, and which includes a reference to the evidence of Madame Perugini, Charles Dickens's only daughter, and that of the late Charles Dickens, junior. Scarcely less valuable is the chapter in which Mr. Walters summarises the numerous attempts to clear up the mystery, none of them perhaps quite convincing, although the contributors to the symposium include authorities as distinguished as Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. William Archer, and Mr. Clement Shorter. Says Mr. Walters, "It is true the riddle is answered in different ways. That is inevitable. No Daniel can come to judgment. But the theorists display much ingenuity, and, thanks to them, many new facts have lately been brought to light, and some extremely valuable personal evidence has been tendered. Like the alchemists of old, the theorists may not have discovered the secret elixir they sought, but golden grains have come to the surface of the seething cauldron."

Among the more interesting reprints of Messrs. Macmillan is JIMBO, by Algernon Blackwood (7d. net). The author has a quality of investing things with an atmosphere of horror or tragedy with striking effect. JIMBO is the story of a boy that was frightened. The facts, as they appear on the surface of the tale, include the tossing of the boy by a bull: "The swinging gate was only twenty yards off; now ten; now only five. Now he had reached it—at last. He stretched out his hands to reach the top bar, and in another moment he would have been safe in the garden and within easy reach of the house. But before he actually clutched the iron rail a sharp, stinging pain shot across his back. . . . The horns had caught him just behind the shoulders." The description of the boy's delirium following on the accident is a marvellous piece of writing. Mr. Blackwood succeeds in conveying the border line between fact and fantasy with such reality that he recalls half-forgotten images from our own dreamland, fantastic, terrible imaginings, when we were whirled from great heights or swept breathlessly into a vast abyss full of unnamable horrors. The boy is captured and held in the Empty House, from which he occasionally escapes on long flights through the air. He is pursued by Fright, and whenever he is on the brink of regaining that other self, lying at home in his bed, he is plucked back to the house, where the children cry and strange shapes throng round the door. The book sustains its high level throughout, and is notable for its finish of execution. NOT WISELY, BUT TOO WELL, by Rhoda Broughton, is one of the best-known novels of that clever writer. She is paid too little attention in these days, but she understands to the full the art of telling a story, and inevitably tells it well. GRIEFENSTEIN, one of Marion Crawford's most powerful romances, still sustains its place in popular favour. The writer has a sense of the dramatic, and works up his situation with admirable art. The tragedy strikes one as the only possible termination to a situation involving the marriage of one woman to two brothers.

THE LOVE STORY OF GAYNOR DACE (Washbourne, 6s.) is a tiresome story of unreal people. The old plot, most impossible of any created, is worked once again. A bogus report of the marriage of the hero, Gerard Hamborough, convinces the heroine that he is faithless. The evidence is entirely inconclusive, and rests solely on a newspaper cutting from an obscure journal. As a consequence, Gaynor—the author cannot be congratulated on the euphony of the name—marries a man whom she "respects, but cannot love," a proceeding which strikes us as a little hard upon the husband. In the ultimate, Gerard Hamborough is proved guiltless of the alleged marriage, receives the Victoria Cross, and dies. The husband also dies. Last of all, Gaynor dies also. Many pages are devoted to dissertations on the Catholic faith, and arguments are advanced for and against secularism.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

NUMBER ONE NOW READY.

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

ON SALE AT ALL BOOKSELLERS'

TO BE COMPLETED IN 12 VOLS.

They will be issued monthly until the work is completed in December, 1913.

If your Bookseller is unable to hand you a copy of our 8-pp. Prospectus, please send us a postcard, we will gladly send you one, or more. If there is no Bookseller near you, we shall be pleased to send a copy of Vol. I. on receipt of a Postal Order for One Shilling and Threepence, including postage. You may return this specimen copy if it does not meet with your approval.

ITS DISTINCTIVE FEATURES ARE:—

It is an entirely new work, and embraces events up to the present time.

It contains more articles than any other encyclopædia.

Each volume consists of 640 pages and 500,000 words.

The Full Set contains six million words.

THE FIRST REVIEW.

The DAILY NEWS & LEADER, Jan. 24th, says:—

"So far as may be judged from a single volume, they are to be heartily congratulated on the way in which this considerable and exhausting undertaking has shaped in the hands of its editor, Mr. Boyle. That is saying a great deal, for we are getting rather spoiled and therefore exceedingly critical in the matter of encyclopædias."

"No stately folio opens more uncompromisingly flat, the thin page making no unseemly attempt at independence; and although 600 such pages lie within a breadth of a bare three-quarters of an inch, the indispensable capacity is much more perfectly preserved than in some much more grandiose works which have sought to compress the full quart of learning into the pint pot of portability. Messrs. Dent owe something to their type, which we should have thought it impossible to set so closely but for the event which proves us to be wrong; and more to their ink, which is of an estimable blackness. . . . It is also a gazetteer, a lexicon, a classical dictionary, and a dictionary of dates, as well as a storehouse of information, well worthy of inclusion in its place among the 'Everyman' volumes, and of the attention of a public perhaps even wider than they command."

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, LONDON, W.C.

WELL-KNOWN artists in all parts of the world have been helped to do saleable work—and sell it! Hundreds of young men and women have been enabled to enter the profession by a quick and easy route, personally conducted by post, by one of London's most successful designers of Pictorial Publicity, an English artist of international repute who has taught more people to earn money by Art than any other man. Formerly Art and Artists were in a bad way. Only the wealthy could buy pictures, and the poor painter had to sell his work or perish.

It was better to be a plumber than a painter, for plumbing was needful, while painting was a luxury dependent upon the prejudice and fancy of the wealthy.

To-day the artist can snap his fingers at the retired usurer or mill-owner, because there is a new and widening market for his work. Artists can now do better than paint portraits of magnates "done in oils," and cumber up the dining-rooms of Dukes.

DRAWING FOR PLEASURE AND PROFIT.

They may draw pictures for the people.

The Advertiser clamours for "the picture that tells the story," and the publisher must buy it.

Art in Advertising also offers a splendid field. Men like Walter Crane, R.W.S., Bernard Partridge, E. J. Sullivan, Hubert Herkomer, R.A., and Chas. E. Dawson design advertisements because they know that it is better for our walls and magazines to be covered with designs that are good in drawing and colour than with advertisements that are bald, crude, and brutally bad, as they used to be.

When a firm spends thousands of pounds on an advertisement, it realises that any price paid for a design that makes the advertisement more effective is money well spent.

THE MODERN ARTIST'S OPPORTUNITIES.

Commercial Artists usually sell their work by post, thus saving time and the embarrassment of personal interviews and verbal bargaining.

By post, also, anyone with a taste for drawing can enjoy the advantages of a London training at home.

The Directors of the Practical Correspondence College—the All-British Art School with the world-wide Reputation—offer the full Course of Instruction in Black and White at half fees to the first 50 readers to pass a postal examination. The balance of fees is only payable when the student has earned Ten Pounds as a result of his tuition. The Scholarships will be awarded to those who are most likely to be successful; our interests are mutual, for we succeed or fail with the student.

If the Course fails to help the student to earn £10, then the student is under no further obligation to complete payment of fees.

THE COLLEGE STAKES 200 GUINEAS UPON THE SUCCESS OF THE 50 SCHOLARSHIP HOLDERS.

Most of our students are helped to earn while they learn, and easily dispose of their work at the completion of the Course.

Any reader with a taste for drawing, common sense, and ambition stands a chance of launching, on unprecedented terms, right into the most interesting and lucrative of the artistic professions either as a profitable spare time pursuit or a regular occupation.

No preliminary training or expenses are necessary. Awards will be made in the order in which specimen sketches are received.

Send as soon as possible, not later than February 16, stamped, self-addressed envelope for full particulars of the most successful Course of Home Study in Commercially Applied Art at the most favourable terms ever offered.

It costs nothing, and you risk nothing by entering for this unique scholarship.

The lessons, exclusive and confidential to each Scholarship Winner, are superbly illustrated. Exercises are set expounding the technique of drawing for reproduction. These exercises are sent by post to the Art Director, who criticises them; his long letters of personal advice and encouragement are alone worth more than the moderate fee for the course.

He gives "reasons why" for praise or blame—his Art Criticism in the foremost magazines of Great Britain and America have won for him a Reputation only equalled by the high regard shown on both sides of the Atlantic for his notable advertisement designs. His pen and pencil have lent Refinement and Distinction to the announcements of the leading advertisers, among them:

Rova Cocoa, Van Houten's, Fry's, Jaeger's, Frame-Food, Kelway's, Pelman Memory System, Luce's Eau-de-Cologne, His Master's Voice Gramophones, Oetzmann's, Wolseley Cars, Liberty's, and the chief London Publishers.

The subjects taught include:

Drawing for reproduction, book cover, advertisement designs, lettering, perspective, line, wash and body colour sketches, splatter work, time and labour saving devices, originating saleable designs, establishing a connection, commercial correspondence, dealing with printers, publishers, and advertisers, how, when and where to sell designs to the best advantage.

IF YOU CAN DRAW WELL ENOUGH TO AMUSE YOUR FRIENDS,

you can learn to earn some of the hundreds of pounds that advertisers—in London alone—spend daily upon the simple but effective sketches they want.

Correspondence must not be directed to the Editor of EVERYMAN, but to the SECRETARY, PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

Courtesy of the Buckinghamshire Players and Miss Gertrude Robins.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 17. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1913

One Penny.

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	517
The Problem of the Slums—By Hector Macpherson	518
The Labour Revolt—By H. G. Wells	519
A Russian's View of Russia	520
George Bernard Shaw as the Champion of Capitalism—An Open Letter on the New Copyright Bill—By Charles Sarolea	521
The Present Position of Women's Suffrage—By Mrs. Henry Fawcett, LL.D.	523
An Appreciation of Mrs. Henry Fawcett—By Mrs. H. M. Swanwick	524
Portrait of Mrs. Henry Fawcett, LL.D.	525
Literary Notes	526

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

MRS. HENRY
FAWCETT
H. G. WELLS
THOMAS HOLMES
HENRI MAZEL

Masterpiece of the Week—Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic"	PAGE
527
A Few Facts Concerning Imprisonment—By Thomas Holmes	523
The Practical Teaching of Literature	529
The Nationalisation of Education	530
The Trial of Joan of Arc—By Henri Mazel	532
Silhouettes	534
Correspondence	535
Reviews—
Lady Lyttelton's Letters	540
Men, Women, and Mixes	541
England, 1880-1898	542
The Story of the Renaissance	542
Books of the Week	544

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Balkan armistice expired on Monday evening, and ere many hours had passed hostilities were proceeding briskly at various points. The Powers worked strenuously for peace up to the last, but the departure of the Balkan delegates from London showed clearly that the Rubicon had been crossed. Optimists, however, may derive some consolation from the assurance of the Bulgarian and Greek Premiers that the war is not likely to last long, as the fall of Adrianople seems to be imminent.

The House of Lords rejected the Home Rule Bill on Thursday week, an event which was fully anticipated by both friends and opponents of the measure. The only uncertainty was as regards the size of the majority, and in this matter it is worthy of note that while the Bill of 1893 was rejected by a majority of 378, the Bill of 1912 was thrown out by a majority of 257. The debate as a whole was interesting; but, owing to the result being a foregone conclusion, it did not rouse so much public attention as otherwise it would have done.

On Friday, the day following the rejection of the Home Rule Bill by the House of Lords, the city of Londonderry returned to Parliament Mr. D. C. Hogg, a Liberal and a Home Ruler. Mr. Hogg, whose majority was 57, gives a seat to the Government, and places the Home Rulers of Ulster in a majority of one. At the General Election in 1910 the Marquis of Hamilton, the Unionist candidate, was returned by a majority of 105.

The Ulster Unionist Council at its annual meeting in Belfast on Friday, approved of the draft articles of the Ulster Provisional Government, which it is proposed to set up in the event of the Home Rule Bill becoming law. Letters were read from Sir Edward Carson and Lord Londonderry, the former expressing the hope that the Council would empower the leaders to take the necessary steps to emphasise Ulster's resolution of resistance.

The outstanding political speeches of the week were those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the National Liberal Club, Mr. Balfour at Nottingham, and Mr. Austen Chamberlain at Birmingham. The Chancellor referred to land reform as one of the tasks confronting Liberalism in the immediate future; Mr. Balfour vigorously denounced the Home Rule scheme, which, he declared, had no more chance of working satisfactorily than he had of becoming Governor-General of Laputa; and Mr. Chamberlain spoke hopefully of the amalgamation of the two wings of the Unionist party.

The Lansbury incident proved an apple of discord at the annual conference of the Labour party. The meetings were held in London, and were largely attended, though one notable absentee was Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, who is in Madras. He, however, sent a letter, in which he testified to the warm interest with which the affairs of the Labour party were followed in India. Mr. G. H. Roberts, M.P., delivered a stirring presidential address, advocating, among other things, the extension of the principle of the Trade Boards Act to every low-paid industry, including agriculture, and the public ownership of railways and mines.

The obituary of the past week includes two distinguished Peers, Lord Ilkeston and Earl Crawford. The former entered politics late in life, after a brilliant medical career. He sat for twenty years in the House of Commons, and in 1892 became Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board.

THE PROBLEM OF THE SLUMS

THERE is abundant evidence to show that the dominant note of the twentieth century will be humanitarianism. In previous centuries what Carlyle calls the condition-of-the-people question occupied the attention of earnest thinkers. In his "Utopia" Sir Thomas More dwells sorrowfully on the hard lot of the poor, whose condition he compared unfavourably with that of the beasts. He was a voice crying in the wilderness. It was reserved for Rousseau, in piercing tones, and with an eloquence and pathos that arrested the attention of the civilised world, to champion the cause of the downtrodden multitudes. His writings undoubtedly sowed the seeds of the French Revolution, which, in cataclysmic fashion, compelled those in authority to listen to the groaning defiance of the prisoners of poverty. As has been well said: "Not since the voice of Luther was heard, hardly since the words of the Gospel were spoken, had there been words so charged with far-reaching effects—words which stirred poets, the middle classes, and the people; words which have been the fountain-head of all Revolutionary, Communistic, and Socialistic literature since, and whose influence will be felt while the earth revolves in space."

Rousseau not only declared in trumpet tones that struck terror to the hearts of despotic rulers that the toilers were "everywhere in chains," but in heart-burning eloquence he called upon the people to strike off their fetters. Rousseau's method of emancipation does not stand the test of analysis, but his democratic evangel has had the all-enduring effect of calling the attention of the civilised world to the fact that a social problem exists of portentous magnitude, which statesmen and philosophers can only ignore at their peril.

The reaction caused by the French Revolution had the effect in this country of relegating the social problem to the background. In the midst of the terror Pitt's scheme of franchise reform was abandoned, and the people found their political chains more firmly riveted than ever. Then came the Industrial Revolution, which had the effect, intensified by the land monopoly, of crowding huge masses in congested districts under conditions of what may be termed economic slavery. Manufacturing supremacy was England's ideal, and in pursuit of this was ruthlessly sacrificed the well-being of the toiling millions. Even children of tender years were offered on the altar of the Industrial Moloch. The Blue-books of the time, which Marx utilised in his great work with deadly effectiveness, record a state of things which were a disgrace to humanity, not to mention Christianity.

About the middle of last century the spirit of Rousseau awoke from its long slumber, and the writings of men like Maurice and Kingsley as Christian Socialists, Carlyle and Ruskin as passionate Idealists, and J. S. Mill as Economists, roused the national conscience to a sense of responsibility to the poor.

Improved environment has a transforming effect, not only upon children, but upon adults. Miss Octavia Hill, whose labours among the London poor entitle her to a hearing, has left on record her experience of the good effects of improved dwellings on the habits of the people as follows:—"I have learned to know that people are ashamed to abuse a place they find cared for. They will add dirt to dirt till a place is pestilential, but the more they find done for it, the more they will respect it, till at last order and cleanliness prevail."

Striking testimony in the same direction was given in Glasgow last week in a lecture delivered by Colonel Kyffin-Taylor, M.P., Chairman of the Housing Committee of the Liverpool Corporation. The usual method of slum reform, as far as the dwellings are concerned, is to demolish the old houses, thereby driving the people out, without an attempt at rehousing. The Liverpool solution was to build houses for the identical people who were turned out, on the spot where they were turned out, at rents they could pay. This rehousing scheme was carried out at a charge on the rates of a little more than 1½d. in the £. In addition, public-houses in the improvement area were bought up and closed. What effect had these improvements upon the character and habits of the people? In the rebuilt areas the death-rate had decreased from 60 per 1,000 to 27, and the consumption rate from 4 to 1.9. Police offences had fallen 50 per cent. Colonel Kyffin-Taylor referred to other advantages in having the people back to the districts already equipped with schools, churches, and shops, and spoke of the remarkable transformation in the habits of the people by being provided with new and healthy dwellings.

It was a true instinct that led the Liverpool Corporation to accompany their housing reform scheme with closing of the public-houses. Improve the domestic environment in the slums as we may, so long as we leave the social environment untouched, so long as the gin palace, with its garish allurements, is allowed to tempt the people from the path of sobriety, so long will the efforts of reformers be neutralised. Drink was once described by Mr. Gladstone as "the cause of a curse more terrible, because more continuous, than war, pestilence, and famine combined," and so long as this curse remains workers in the cause of humanity will find their energies largely dissipated, for the simple reason that it is just in the poor congested districts that the public-houses are most congested. A flood of light is thrown upon this aspect of the problem by an article which appears in this month's Missionary Record, under the title of "Darkest Glasgow." The writer points out that in two densely populated districts of Glasgow there are 190 licensed drink-shops, and of these 180 are public-houses, as against 31 Protestant places of worship. Some of these public-houses occupy the best corner sites, and are open fourteen hours a day on six days a week. In the Cowcaddens district there are nine places of Protestant worship and over 100 public-houses. In the face of these figures, it is at once seen how little effective the rehousing of the people in the slums will be so long as these plague spots are left untouched. The truth is, the evils which flourish in slum-land are too complex and deep-seated to be eradicated by one remedy. The complexity of the problem is increased by the fact that evils which themselves are the effects of demoralising causes become, in their turn, causes of further demoralising effects. The domestic discomforts of slum-dwellings drive the people to the public-house, which sends the miserable frequenters another stage on the downward path. Inspired by the humanitarian spirit, bands of noble men and women are engaged in continual conflict with the hydra-headed evil of the slums; but inasmuch as their schemes lack co-ordination, and their enthusiasm organised direction, energy tends to run to waste. It would almost seem as if voluntary action, however well intentioned, is inadequate to the problem, the herculean nature of which demands for its solution something of the nature of a national crusade.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

THE LABOUR REVOLT * * BY H. G. WELLS

THE present discontent of the labouring mass of the community is a thing at once dangerous and fine. In the last thirty years or so the working-man has quickened from acquiescence to intelligence, has become imaginative, hungry, fastidious, human, as we who read and talk and think estimate humanity. The ideal State, its cities splendid and spacious, its affairs benignant, its life of fearless action and clear thought, has passed from being the peculiar vision of rare thinkers to an integral part of our collective consciousness—and his. And there is an infuriating contrast between that ideal and present reality, the muddle of misery and drudgery streaked with preposterous pleasures which the rich have built out of his toil—toil he has performed far more conscientiously than they have ever performed their duty of government. The Labour revolt is a revolt of the imagination against the pettiness of the immediate life, and more particularly a revolt of the worker's imagination against the ignoble extravagances of wealth and authority.

But much of this revolt still fails to find expression, or stutters into misleading claims. Socialism, and especially Social Democracy, the first coherent attempt to state a democratic polity, has all the excesses of definition that are natural in a first attempt to give a form to ideals. Finality is the negation of life. Life is change, and for the mastery of life we must be quick to foresee and challenge its changes. In Social Democracy I find little more than a disposition to lop the present social system into a truncated finality.

That cry, "The World for the Workers," gallant as it is, perpetuates a social error. It is true to-day that the world is far more for the cotton-spinner than it is for the scientific investigator, that it takes far more care that the cotton-spinner shall work in a proper place and under proper conditions. And Social Democracy seems to have no suspicion of the foolishness and wastefulness of that. A triumph for Social Democracy as it is imagined to-day would—at the best—make us a nation of prosperous trade unionists, well-fed, well-paid, cocksure; cotton-spinners, railwaymen, bootmakers, and post-office clerks, and—functionaries. Admirable Webblets, mysteriously honest, brightly efficient—bright with the shine of varnish rather than the gleam of steel! One sees these necessary, unavoidable servants of the workers' commonwealth—trusted servants, indispensable servants, in fact, authoritative and ruling servants—bustling virtuously about their carefully involved duties, and occasionally raising a neatly rolled umbrella to check the careless course of some irregular citizen, who had forgotten to button up his imagination or shave his character. . . .

* * * * *

I think the idea of a specialised working-class, whether victorious or enslaved—in practice it would be very much the same thing—detestable. I believe that this burying alive of a class in the pit of labour is sheer waste of humanity. It is largely the result of meanness of outlook, and a knowledge that men are cheaper (at any rate, under existing conditions) than machines. That is certainly the case on our railways, which, though managed haughtily, are managed without pride, generosity, or even common sense, where men risk their lives every day in doing dirtily and clumsily what a simple mechanical device could do much more efficiently. And partly it is the result of our national curse, our contempt for psychology. We've never taken the trouble to deliberate under what conditions the best work is done. We have an infantile faith that the longer and longer a man works, the more and more work he must produce, and we shirk discussion of the variations in quality of the work. To do so means no end of brain fag. Possibly, too, there is a pretty definite desire—it is no use pretending that the leisured class are gentlemen when they are dealing with workers—to tame the workman's spirit by keeping his nose to the grindstone.

But supposing that a scientific investigation of the psychology of work proved that work has its crises and its times of apparent inertia, of slow inception and rapid evanescence? It may be that a man has a clearly defined period of maximum efficiency; that he begins by fumbling at his work, that his interest and skill rise slowly to a climax of supreme achievement, and then sink towards boredom. This is certainly true of some most necessary forms of social service. They begin in enthusiasm, they end in degeneration. Teaching, for instance, if persisted in, gives the mind a spinsterish knack of over-explanation and strained lucidity, a kind of laborious lassitude in the face of living ideas and living realities, a habit of dogma. It is probably true of all other occupations that, followed too loyally and too long, they bruise the mind as the constant use of a spade raises callosities on a man's hands. And if this is true, then ours is an over-specialised world, and our course towards a better economic civilisation lies through an established versatility, a wider distribution of "labour" throughout the State. This spreading-out of labour could be conveniently initiated by a labour conscription, enrolled from all classes of the community for a year or two of service on public works.

Instead of having one class doomed to labour for life, I would make a phase of labour a part of everyone's life. Road-making and navvying, teaching and nursing, post-office and telephone work, the simpler kinds of service in hospital, and suchlike toil, are tasks as honourable at least as military service, and I would give everyone a share in them. To a leisured class as relaxed as ours they would come as a bracing privilege. And I would have every child born into the State destined first for service and then for the freedom such service would render possible. The toil of a few years should purchase the independence of the rest of a lifetime. Everyone would belong to the labouring class in order that everyone should belong to the leisure class.

But I believe that the ordinary Socialist, endowed as he is with a hard prudishness that recoils from the temptation of leisure, and with a mulish determination to be a worker, that is to say, to work habitually at mean labour, would be bitterly opposed to such a scheme, for that would necessitate paying through trade unions, or competent expansions of trade unions, a regular salary to people who would have done their work, who would be, oh, horror!—idle! . . .

There's an extraordinary illiberalism about the Socialism of to-day. It is largely a congress of crude minds, swayed by mutually destructive passions of benevolence and resentment, and devoid of a collective intelligence. To help it to achieve that we must give it much better means of self-expression. The first barrier in our way to a sane social organisation is, I am convinced, the system that has stolen representative government from the people and turned the House of Parliament into a desert of lawyers. We must get rid of this old, careless method of election of representatives in one-member local constituencies by a single vote, which gives the voter no choice beyond the candidates nominated by the stupid conclaves of the two great Parties. It poisons our public life as a leaky drain poisons a household. At present our voting is a hysterical matter of rejections. We vote recklessly for the blindest figure who presents himself as an alternative to Home Rule or Tariff Reform, and in a three-cornered contest we may find ourselves voting not for the candidate with whom we agree, but for some nonentity whose sole virtue is that he will probably defeat the most hateful candidate. It is a preposterous business, and the more since there is an infinitely more satisfactory alternative already planned—proportional representation, with large constituencies returning many members each. I do not, of course, mean such a system as that in force in Belgium, the failure of which was cited by M. Vandervelde as a proof of the ineffectiveness of proportional representation.

That is a mere politician's dodge to avoid the inconveniences of one-member constituencies; electors have to vote on lists presented by the parties. That, obviously, is no release from the politician. But with the single transferable vote an elector is enabled to vote for any candidate he may choose from a long list, and to be sure that, if his candidate has enough votes already, or too few to have any chance at all, his vote will not be wasted, but will be transferred to any other candidate for whom he has indicated a second preference. It is a perfectly simple method, and it breaks the back of the party system completely. It gives a method of legislative expression to all those factors in the life of the community which the barristers and financiers, with their feats of libel and their disciplined party organisations, now elbow more and more out of government.

My belief in proportional representation as a means of recovering our social controls from the specialised politician, and reanimating every aspect of our intellectual activities with the sense of collective significance, is profound. There is a limit to the devotion of the artist or the intellectual worker. Our art is trivial where it is not feeble, our science is taught without spirit, and falls more and more into the hands of spiritless and inferior men, our literature splutters with protest or declines towards preciousness, because our political machinery is indifferent to and contemptuous of all these finer things in life. They become unreal because they are ineffective things.

You cannot expect a Bacon or a Milton, a Shakespeare or a Michael Angelo, to spring from a system that exalts men like Mr. F. E. Smith. You cannot expect leadership or wisdom. We drift towards a deepening discontent of the mass of our population, with no means whatever of saving that discontent from the foolish and violent methods of expression that are natural to an entirely base and silly political system, a depraved sham of representation, that baffles and cheats and disheartens every constructive force in the community.

WE have pleasure in announcing that the articles on "The Countries of the World," which have roused so much interest and attention, will be resumed next week, when we are publishing THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

A RUSSIAN'S VIEW OF RUSSIA

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I fully appreciate the writings of your talented contributor, Dr. Sarolea, but in his last article on Russia there are a few points requiring further explanation, which, as a Russian, I cannot withhold.

It is quite true that Russia is not a country, but a continent (or a sixth part of the world), being an unwieldy conglomerate of different nations (big and small), having no common tie, but bound together, like a gang of fettered slaves, by one of the most horrible despotisms known in the history of man—"irresponsible bureaucracy," as Dr. Sarolea, somewhat mildly, calls it.

It is a great mistake to suppose that "Russian government," as says Dr. Sarolea, "is instituting a gigantic experiment in land reform, which . . . our land reformers would do well to follow closely."

In initiating and organising the destruction of the Russian Land Commune (Obschina) the late Premier, Stoloupin (who was a very clever man), had principally in view to create, as a new bulwark against any new revolutionary movement, a class of small land proprietors in the village. He saw clearly that the Land Commune proved to be a very dangerous element in the great upheaval of 1905. That he was creating a village proletariat as a consequence did not trouble him much. Of course, agriculture of the country was to profit, to a certain extent, from the reform; but it was a secondary consideration.

I do not understand how, according to Dr. Sarolea, English land reformers are to profit by "closely following" this political move of the Russian bureaucracy; and I still believe that our Land Commune, modified and renovated, will come a victor out of the coming strife with small village capitalists (mostly of venal type) created by Stoloupin.

Of course, we all know that there is no real Parliamentary regime, or the so-called Constitution, in Russia, and the present "packed" Douma, like its predecessor, is a sham, kept up only for appearance before the eyes of Europe—to keep up Russian financial credit and value of State securities on the European money market. The indebtedness is tremendous, and the maintenance of the credit, in view of the future foreign loans, is a question of life and death to Russian bureaucracy.

Dr. Sarolea speaks of the Greek Orthodox Church, the State religion of Russia. I venerate this ancient Church, with its great traditions and its comparative freedom from bigotry; but at present it has become a mere handmaid of the almighty bureaucracy.

It is dangerous to dive into the future, and speculate as to what will happen twenty-five years hence, when, according to Dr. Sarolea, the population of Russia will number 250,000,000, and "it will become one of the most formidable world Powers for good or evil." I do not agree with him, though I am proud of our glorious literature, and I love my countrymen, amongst whom are to be found the greatest heroes and martyrs for liberty the world has ever seen; and I do not see that the future belongs, not to England, to France, or to Germany, "but to Russia." I only surmise that "long before the first half of the present century has run its course," and when the name of the Turks in Europe has become a memory, there may arise before European nations, on the borders of the present Russia, a new gigantic Eastern question, upon the solution of which, perhaps, will depend the future of mankind. But Deus videt.—I am, sir, etc.,

RUSSIAN MODERATE.

St. Petersburg, January 22nd, 1913.

G. BERNARD SHAW AS THE CHAMPION OF CAPITALISM

AN OPEN LETTER ON THE NEW COPYRIGHT BILL

I.

MY DEAR SHAW,—A Government which professes to be democratic and progressive, and which boasts of its socialistic tendencies, passed in the year 1911 one of the most anti-democratic, one of the most reactionary, and one of the most individualistic measures in the history of recent legislation. I am referring to that odious new copyright law, which I can best describe as an unblushing attempt on the part of publishers to deprive the people of their inheritance in the masterpieces of literature. Britain had the good fortune to possess a copyright law which was liberal and just, which might still be susceptible of improvement, but which was certainly far better than that of other countries. That British copyright law has been repealed, and a new law, which is practically the copyright law of France and Germany, has been substituted for it. To enable the reader to form a judgment, it is almost sufficient to compare the provisions of the new with the provisions of the old law. Under the old British law, copyright was limited to forty-two years after publication or seven years after death. The new law extends the copyright to fifty years after death. Under the old law all the great Victorian writers have now become the property of the nation. If the new copyright law had been in force, Macaulay, Carlyle, Ruskin, Emerson, Thackeray, and Browning would still be withheld from the people, and that magnificent industry, the publishing of popular classics, the democratisation of literature, which is one of the most hopeful signs of the times, would not exist, even as it does not exist in France and in Germany.

II.

When, on returning to London, after a protracted absence, I was informed that this odious measure had been placed on the statute book, my first feeling was one of indignation, and my first impulse was to denounce both the measure itself and its authors. My second feeling was one of surprise that a law so obviously in the interests of a few publishers, and so obviously against the higher interests of the public, should have been allowed to pass in the teeth of the opposition of so many public-spirited writers like yourself and Mr. Wells. For I assumed as a self-evident proposition that you at least would be on the side of the people and against the capitalists. Alas! I had been strangely mistaken, and my indignation and surprise gave way to blank bewilderment when I heard that you, even you—the Superman of Socialism—were emphatically on the wrong side, and that the law was passed, not only with your tacit acquiescence, but with your cordial approval.

III.

There will certainly be found cynical critics who will complacently tell us that, after all, your attitude was quite natural. It is quite natural for a Socialist author to defend Socialism in the abstract where it is only a case of confiscating other people's property, but it is also quite natural and quite human for a Socialist author to remain a confirmed individualist where it is a case of safeguarding his own literary property. Now any one who has the privilege of knowing you realises that those cynics do you a flagrant injustice. I am convinced that if it had been with you a matter of conscience, if you had understood the principles involved, you would have stood up for those principles, and you would not have hesitated for one moment to sacrifice your personal interest to those principles. I am convinced that if the action had commended itself to your judgment, you would have been quite prepared, like Tolstoy, to surrender your copyright altogether, and, like Tolstoy, to present your book rights to the public, instead of selling them, as you do at present, at a price which is prohibitive to the student and the working man. It therefore seems obvious to me that in this matter of copyright law you have failed to see what Tolstoy saw and what even an individualist like Macaulay saw, namely, that there is a vital principle involved. It is obvious that you have simply been hoodwinked by a conspiracy of vested interests, and that, like the merest Philistine, you have been the victim of your own ignorance.

IV.

That an intellect so uncannily acute and clear-sighted and far-sighted should thus have been hoodwinked by a few publishers and mercenary authors, that the greatest Socialist writer of this generation should thus have supported so sordid a capitalist measure, is a practical paradox which requires some explanation. The problem is all the more deserving of close scrutiny, because it throws such a vivid light on what seems to me a vital weakness of modern Socialism—namely, its total inability to understand the spiritual and moral interests of the people. The older French Socialists of the Jean Jacques Rousseau school were concerned mainly with moral values. They were passionately interested in matters of religion and education. Their creed was illuminated by a reflected light from the Republic of Plato, and from the New Testament. But the new German orthodox Socialistic Gospel according to Saint Marx has nothing in common with the Gospel according to St. Mark. It stands at the very antipodes. It boasts of presenting a strictly materialistic interpretation of history. It is not concerned primarily with moral or religious or educational values.

Alas! that such a creed should have taken your genius captive and should have infected all your political writing! You have identified yourself with controversies innumerable, and what a magnificent champion you are when you choose to espouse any cause! But, pledged as you are to the materialistic conception of human society, you have but seldom chosen to take any interest in educational or religious reforms. You never seem to realise the point of view of Plato, of Rousseau, or Tolstoy, that all political or economic changes must be conditioned by changes in our educational system and in our religious ideals.

V.

There, to my mind, lies the explanation of your extraordinary indifference in this matter of the copyright law. If you had taken a genuine interest in popular education, you would at once have noticed the vital issues involved. You would have noticed that the new copyright law is a serious blow struck at the publishing of literary classics for the people, and, therefore, at their higher education. As it is, it does not seem to have occurred to you that when, through the operation of the old copyright law, a literary masterpiece became "public property," the people actually did succeed to an invaluable spiritual possession, of which the new law is actually dispossessing them. It does not seem to have occurred to you that if the nationalisation of bread is a Socialistic policy, the nationalisation of literature is no less a Socialistic policy—with this difference, that the former is at best a distant ideal, whereas the latter had almost become a reality.

VI.

Having failed to understand the moral issues underlying the new copyright law, it is not astonishing that you should have misunderstood its political and economic aspects. And yet if ever there was a test case illustrating fundamental principles of political philosophy, the copyright law is such a case, for the old law embodies the highest form of Socialism and the new law illustrates the worst kind of individualism.

The individualist conception of literary property, id est, the conception of the ordinary publisher and art dealer, implies that literary property is a commodity like any other commodity, that it is to be bought in the cheapest market and sold in the dearest. The publisher, as such, is not concerned about producing a good book or a beautiful book, but a book yielding the highest returns for the capital and labour invested by the publisher. I do not say that all publishers strictly act on that principle; all I say is that the average publisher is mainly concerned with commercial values. And those commercial values have no relation to the intrinsic values, artistic or moral. Only a few weeks ago a portrait by a living French painter, Begas, which was originally sold by the artist for twenty pounds, was ultimately resold for eighteen thousand pounds, the artist thus having received about one-thousandth part of the ultimate money value of his work.

On the contrary, the Socialistic conception of literary property—which, on the whole, is also the conception of every true artist and writer—is that literary property is not a commodity like any other commodity. The aim of every writer is the discovery of truth. The aim of every artist is the creation of beauty. Both are a permanent addition to the spiritual inheritance of humanity. No true artist is primarily concerned with the commercial value of his work, and the community is not in the slightest degree concerned that he should make money. And the Socialist holds—and in this matter all idealists are Socialists—that the truth, once discovered, and the beauty, once created, must not be withheld from the nation. The Socialist holds that it would be as monstrous to appropriate a work of genius as it would be to appropriate the elements of nature. That principle is so universally accepted that all Governments to-day try to secure the treasures of art and literature for their national museums and libraries. So firmly convinced is public opinion of the social character of literary property that the owners of pictures in Italy are now forbidden by law to export them, the assumption being that a canvas by Raphael and Leonardo belongs, ultimately, not to Prince Borghese or Prince Colonna, but to the Italian people and to humanity. And it is because those legislators who, seventy-five years ago, made the old copyright law held those Socialistic and idealistic views of literary property that copyright was practically restricted to the lifetime of the artist, so as to ensure their possession to the nation after his death.

VII.

If the foregoing considerations are right, and if such are the Socialistic interpretation and limitations of literary property, then it is obvious that you have been countenancing the worst kind of individualism, where even a Whig and individualist like Macaulay was prepared to accept the Socialist principle. But it is not only on the political principles of the problem that you are wrong; you are equally wrong on the economics of the question. On the one hand, common sense proves that the long duration of the new copyright law does not increase the productivity of a writer. On the other hand, experience has proved that the short duration of the old copyright law enormously stimulated the enterprise of author and publisher, and increased the diffusion and efficiency of their publications.

In the first place, it is obvious that whether the term of copyright is reasonably short or unduly protracted, it does not in the least affect the productivity of the writer. Although Victor Hugo was the most avaricious of poets, and was possessed with the miserly instincts of the typical French bourgeois, he would not have written one line more or less, whether the copyright of "Odes et Ballades," published in 1822, lasted as under the English law until 1864 or as under the French law until 1934. And similarly, although you yourself are the most generous of writers, you would not write one line more or less, whether the copyright of your new play produced in 1913 would have expired as under the new law fifty years after your demise, say in 2005, or as under the old law in 1962.

And whereas the duration of the copyright does not in the least affect the productivity of the writer, a short term of copyright enormously affects the diffusion and usefulness of his work. I have heard you defend the proposition (and it is a strange proposition for a Socialist to defend) that it is better for the circulation of a book to be monopolised by copyright, that whatever is everyman's property is nobody's property, and that a book has a better chance when a publisher has an exclusive interest in pushing it. Now experience proves that you are hopelessly in the wrong, that a large circulation of a work only begins after the copyright has ceased. For that reason popular publishing is infinitely more advanced in countries with a short term of copyright. Popular series like the older "Camelot" series, like the "World's Classics," like "Everyman's Library" would simply have been impossible under the Continental law. So obvious is this superiority of Great Britain in popular publishing that it has been left to a Scottish publisher to present the reading public of France with popular editions of their own French classics.

VIII.

Such as it is, reactionary and anti-democratic as it is, the new copyright law has, alas! been voted. By a stroke of the legislator's pen hundreds of masterpieces of world literature which might have been "public property" this year of grace 1913 will not become "public property" for another half-century! But I venture to prophesy that this law will not remain on the statute book very long. Things move quickly in our generation. Thanks to a few men like yourself, Conservative England is Conservative no longer. The democratic spirit is astir. When the people succeed in dead earnest to political power, and when they choose to make their voices heard in Parliament, when they realise what is meant by the new copyright law, they will insist on recovering that spiritual inheritance of which a few capitalistic publishers and mercenary authors have deprived them under the most hollow pretences.

CHARLES SAROLEA.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE * * BY MRS. HENRY FAWCETT, LL.D.

IF I am asked to express in the shortest possible form what the general effect of the events of the last fortnight has been on the Women's Suffrage question, I reply, "Its prospect of immediate success in this Parliament has been destroyed, but its position in the country and in the House is stronger than ever. It has become the dominant issue in home politics."

The general outline of recent events is clear in every mind. Over and over again, from May, 1908, when he first became Prime Minister, to November, 1911, when he invited a deputation of suffrage societies to Downing Street, Mr. Asquith has repeated that he intended to introduce and carry a great measure of Parliamentary reform, and that the advocates of the enfranchisement of women would then have the opportunity of moving amendments to that measure. These amendments, if accepted by the House, would then become part and parcel of the Bill, and would be pushed on by all the driving force at the command of a powerful Government. The opportunity of thus getting women's suffrage made part of a Government Bill was accepted by nearly all the suffrage societies; an enormous amount of well-organised work was done; public interest and support were stimulated to the highest possible degree; and the time for this great Government Bill to go into Committee was fixed for January 24th, 1913, the fag-end of a long and exhausting session. On January 23rd Mr. Bonar Law asked a question of the Speaker about the effect of certain amendments given notice of by the Government to abolish the occupation franchise. The Speaker replied to the effect that these amendments so materially altered the Bill as to make it a different measure from that which had been read a second time in July, and therefore on Report stage he would rule that it must be withdrawn and a new Bill introduced. Then, without any question at all being asked respecting the various suffrage amendments, the Speaker went on to say (speaking in a very unjudicial tone of the "huge difference" these amendments would make, and "Heaven only knows in what shape the Bill would emerge from Committee") that his ruling would probably be the same in regard to them, namely, that they would introduce a change of principle so great as virtually to make the measure a new Bill, and that although the amendments might be held by the Chairman of Committees to be in order, yet he should rule on Report stage that if carried the Bill would have to be withdrawn and a new one introduced.

"What a satire," as the Observer exclaimed, "upon male government!" The whole house of cards came toppling down. The intrigues and wirepulling and seething excitement of the lobbies were transformed into a ministerial crisis of an acute kind. The new situation aroused intense interest and sympathy: even opponents of women's suffrage freely acknowledged that women had been badly treated; and when it became known that though the Bill was withdrawn and the Plural Voting Bill was also abandoned for this session, yet in lieu of the pledges and promises which the Prime Minister had given to women suffragists in November, 1911, all he was now prepared to offer them was "facilities" for a private member's measure in the coming session, the sympathy and indignation were intensified. Not a single suffrage society, not even the Women's Liberal Federation, considered the new offer an equivalent to the unredemmed pledges the Prime Minister had given fourteen months earlier.

But the women's agitation had entered upon a new phase. It had caused the withdrawal of one of the Government's principal measures. It had destroyed the unity of the Cabinet; and the House and the country were diverted, and perhaps also a little disgusted, by the spectacle of the Colonial Secretary pouring forth a stream of concentrated venom, in polished phrases, against the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the chief Cabinet champions of women's enfranchisement.

The situation was dramatic enough already, but the drama was not over. The curtain was rung down in the House of Commons: the next scene was to take place upon another stage. The Parliamentary fiasco ended on January 27th. The annual conference of the Labour party began on January 29th. The delegates at this conference represented over 1,800,000 members, all but a small fraction trade unionists. On January 30th it resolved first of all to tighten up party discipline, so as to secure greater unity of action; secondly, it "called upon the party in Parliament to oppose any Franchise Bill in which women are not included." This was carried on a card vote by 850,000 to 437,000, amid a scene of the greatest possible enthusiasm, the delegates jumping on the seats and waving hats and vociferously cheering.

The importance of this vote is tremendous. Forty votes subtracted from the Government majority and cast on the other side, and these votes coming too from the very class that had most to gain by the proposals embodied in the Government Bill, will alter the whole centre of gravity on the Franchise question. It is one of the most generous political actions on record. The resolution represents not merely a pious opinion, but a definite instruction to the Parliamentary Labour party. The terms of the resolution, as well as the proportion of supporters and opposers, indicate an immense advance over a somewhat similar vote given last year. Then the resolution simply was that "no Bill can be acceptable to the Labour and Socialist party in which women are not included." This milder resolution was accepted a year ago by 919,000 to 686,000, or, roughly, a good deal less than three to two, whereas the far stronger resolution of January 30th was carried by nearly two to one.

It should be observed that both last year and this year the speakers representing the minority were careful to explain that they were all for women's suffrage, but did not see why men should not get more votes for themselves, leaving women out, if opportunity offered. Against this natural human selfishness, Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., protested in a speech of very great eloquence and power. One of the Labour papers said it was "the speech of his life." It was on fire with conviction and fine feeling. Much of the victory of our cause in the Labour Congress is due to it. The Labour vote in the House of Commons will now certainly be given against any Bill for giving more votes to men without giving any to women, and this makes our position infinitely stronger. A new factor has come upon the scene; a new chivalry is making itself felt. The cry no longer is as in 1884, "Throw the women overboard"; but "no more votes for men unless women are admitted at the same time."

AN APPRECIATION OF MRS. HENRY FAWCETT

* * *

BY MRS. H. M. SWANWICK

"WHAT Mrs. Fawcett thinks" has become a matter for the inquiry of intelligent men in all matters relating to women and the family. Throughout her life she has shown herself so upright, reasonable, and self-controlled that in any crisis—such, for instance, as the present—people know that her view will not be a distorted or exaggerated one; logic, not rhetoric, has ever been her instrument, and a lifetime spent in honourable service has given her the right to speak and to be consulted. One cannot but feel that fewer mistakes would have been made and the suffrage question less mishandled on both sides if her counsel had been taken.

I.

Millicent Garrett Fawcett was born at Aldeburgh, in Suffolk, on June 11th, 1847. Her father, Newson Garrett, J.P., and mother, Louisa (née Dunnell), were both Suffolk bred. They had ten children, and, up to the age of sixteen, the girls had very little that would now be called education. Except for two years in a Blackheath school, Mrs. Fawcett taught herself by reading books and newspapers, and by the lively talk and discussion that went on in the large household of active-minded people; and her sister Elizabeth (Mrs. Garrett Anderson) also won her way by native gifts of mind and character. On April 23rd, 1867, she married Henry Fawcett, the blind professor, who became a Privy Councillor and Postmaster-General in a Liberal administration. Four months after her marriage this girl of twenty spoke for the first time in public, at a Women's Suffrage meeting, and on the same platform were men of such repute as her own husband, John Stuart Mill, Charles Kingsley, John Morley, and James Stansfeld. It would be a remarkable thing for a girl of twenty to do even in these days. Think what it was at that time! Philippa Fawcett, the only child, was born in 1868, and, two years later, in Mrs. Fawcett's drawing-room, was held the meeting from which sprang the foundations of Newnham College. It is reported that Professor Fawcett, in advocating the opening of Universities to women, remarked, "I do not suppose they will be senior wranglers." No one would have been more delighted than he to have seen this doubt abolished by his own daughter, who, in 1890, did what no man can do—appeared in the class lists "above Senior Wrangler."

II.

Mrs. Fawcett's writings include a novel, "Janet Doncaster"; "Political Economy for Beginners" (1870); "Tales in Political Economy" (1875); "Essays and Lectures," jointly with Henry Fawcett (1872); "Some Eminent Women of Our Time" (1889); "Life of Queen Victoria" (1895); "Life of Sir William Molesworth" (1901); "Five Famous Frenchwomen" (1906); "Women's Suffrage" (1912). Countless articles and speeches on many subjects have been thrown off with what looks, to the outsider, ease; in fact, Mrs. Fawcett's power of work is largely the result of an orderly and concentrated mind, which is "all there" for a remarkable number of hours a day.

III.

It will be seen that she was in at the beginning of the agitation for Women's Suffrage in Great Britain, and she has been the leader ever since, having been President of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies (now numbering 36,000 members) ever since its formation. She regards the political enfranchisement of women as only a part of the great movement for "uplifting a whole sex," and she has taken a very large share in securing their intellectual enfranchisement, through education, and their civil enfranchisement, through the opening up of professions and employments, and through reforms of the kind so bravely advocated by Josephine Butler and W. T. Stead. In her evidence before the Divorce Commission (1910) she showed herself an advocate for the reform of marriage law, but this reform should, in her opinion, be a levelling up, not a levelling down, and her desire for greater liberty is always closely associated with the complementary desire for training, discipline, and responsibility. Being an active person, she would always rather be doing things than talking about them, and committees are, therefore, frankly a weariness to her; but common sense and a democratic conscience cause her to submit to this weariness with much grace and good humour, although it must be confessed that procedure and points of order are, and will probably to the end of time be, to her a very evil and never completely mastered necessity.

IV.

When one mentions so many of the austere virtues as belonging to a woman, one is oppressed by a suspicion that those who do not know her will get an impression of a forbidding or charmless person. This would be a ludicrously false impression in the case of Mrs. Fawcett. She is the best of good company, and has an excellent memory for good stories and a vivacious art in the telling of them. Her humour irradiates the dullest committee, and peeps out in witty repartee or in graphic reports of interviews and statements which might be dull from the lips of another. Being appealed to recently by a sentimentalist, "Why can't we all be united?" she replied breezily, "Yes; shall we all break windows, or shall we all not break windows? The Gadarene herd was very united!" She has many tales to tell of the queer ways in which she has been treated as a public personage: one enterprising journalist came to her with the plea that he was writing a series on "Famous Faddists," and wanted to interview her; another blandly declared that he had been used to interviewing distinguished men, but, having broken down in health, had now declined upon women.

V.

It is, however, recorded of the late Lord Derby that he said of a speech by Mrs. Fawcett, that it was "the best political speech I ever heard." Her manner and appearance are unpretentious, exceedingly, but her quiet reasonableness of speech always commands respect from all but the most hooligan audience. She is small in stature, and very nimble and quick, running her younger friends mercilessly off their legs. Her face, with its alert expression and genial smile, is that of a woman fifteen years younger, an impression confirmed by the masses of chestnut hair coiled round her shapely head. She takes pleasure in many things: in music and painting, in literature and the play; she loves needlework, and is most happy in country rambles. Perhaps, above all else, she is happy in her home relations and in the love and regard of a very large circle of friends, tried by time and tempered by association in great causes.

MRS. HENRY FAWCETT, LL.D., NATUS 1847

LITERARY NOTES

DR. WOODROW WILSON is signalling his entry upon the presidency of the United States by publishing a new book through Messrs. Chapman and Hall, entitled "The New Freedom: A Call for the Emancipation of the Generous Energies of a People." I am rather interested in this book, for it promises to reveal the writer's personality, of which, I venture to say, the vast majority of us knew next to nothing a few weeks ago. The new President is not only a politician, but a man of strong religious conviction, as one might expect in the case of a direct descendant of the historian of the Scottish Covenanters, and his new book will be an earnest attempt to infuse new life into American politics, in other words to raise political ideals to a higher level, and to bring national life more into harmony with the religious spirit.

Now that the feminist movement has entered upon a new lease of life, and militant suffragettes are daring their worst, we are sure to have a fresh crop of books dealing with the subject. One thing is sure, it will remain a thoroughly "live" topic for a considerable time to come, a fact which publishers will not be slow to recognise. So, if there is any literary aspirant who has something really original and attractive to say regarding the feminine movement, now is the time to put pen to paper.

I observe that the first book of the season is to come from Messrs. Putnam. It is to take the form of a survey of the whole question, and will be prospective as well as historical. The book is called "The Women Movement," and the writer is Miss Ellen Key, a lady who is known on both sides of the Atlantic as a prominent exponent of advanced "feminism." As regards the new phase of the women movement, Miss Key takes the line that the claim to exert the rights and functions of man is less important than the claims of woman's rights as mother and educator of the coming generation. I ought to add that an introductory chapter is being supplied by Mr. Havelock Ellis, who, only the other month, dealt instructively with the changing status of woman in his "The Task of Social Hygiene."

Comparatively little notice has been taken of the death of Mr. Eirikr Magnusson, of Trinity College, Cambridge, who did more to popularise Norse literature in this country than any other man since the death of William Morris. So long ago as 1870 he was associated with Morris in the translation of the "Völsunga Saga: the Story of the Volsungs and Niblungs, with certain songs from the Elder Edda," and more than twenty years later both again collaborated in bringing out the Saga Library, which Mr. Quaritch published in six volumes. These were issued at intervals between 1891 and 1906.

After Morris's death in 1896, the burden of the work fell upon Mr. Magnusson. The Saga Library contains the most extensive selection in English of the Icelandic sagas. Mr. Magnusson's most important contribution to this work was the compilation of a commentary, together with indexes and genealogies—a formidable undertaking which put his Icelandic scholarship to a severe test. Besides being lecturer on Icelandic at Cambridge, he was Sub-Librarian of the University, a post which he held for close upon forty years. An accomplished linguist, Mr. Magnusson was a leading spirit of the Cambridge Philological Society.

I suppose the books that can be said to be selling briskly at the present moment could be numbered on the fingers of one hand. One of them is Mrs. Barclay's "The Rosary," a fiftieth edition of which Messrs. Putnam have just printed off. During the week before Christmas 3,000 copies were sold, and more than 1,000 copies were disposed of the week after Christmas.

Many books have been, or are in course of being, written about the unfinished war in the Balkans, but comparatively little has been published about the now concluded war between Italy and Turkey. Next month, however, Messrs. Nisbet are to publish "Two Years Under the Crescent," which will recount the experiences with the Turks in Tripoli and Thrace of Mr. H. Seppings Wright, the well-known war correspondent. The censorship upon Mr. Wright's dispatches from the front was so extremely severe that his book will contain fresh matter practically from beginning to end. It is interesting to add that, so great was Mr. Wright's interest in the Turkish cause, that it induced him, after his return from Tripoli, to set out again for the new scene of conflict.

My paragraph about the need for a clear, reliable, and well-informed survey of the history of India has brought me reminders of J. T. Wheeler's "A Short History of India and of the Frontier States of Afghanistan, Nipal, and Burma." I am grateful to my correspondents, but I should like to say that, when I wrote the paragraph, I had in mind a work on more popular lines, and certainly less expensive. Moreover, Wheeler's narrative does not extend beyond 1880, and much has happened in India since then. But I am fully alive to the scholarship and literary value of Wheeler's work, and in any comprehensive list of histories of India, it ought assuredly to find a place.

I would not again have referred to the vexed question of the "Canadian Boat-Song" were it not that readers of EVERYMAN, judging from the letters I have received, appear to be interested in the subject. One correspondent writes me to say that he has searched the four volumes of Professor Ferrier's edition of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ," but has failed to find the "Canadian Boat-Song." He overlooks the fact that, of the seventy-one "Noctes," only forty-one were reprinted as Wilson's own. The truth is that the composition of the "Noctes" was a joint concern, in which Lockhart and James Hogg, the "Ettrick Shepherd," and others were partners with Wilson, and the question of the extent of the collaboration has never been definitely decided, and, I suppose, never will. My correspondent will find what he wants in Blackwood's Magazine for September, 1829.

Apropos of the same subject, another correspondent points out that the line "From the lone shieling of the misty island" does appear in the original published in Blackwood in 1820. I regret if there has been an error, but I may explain that my authority for the statement that Sir John Skelton was responsible for this line, and that the original ran: "From the lone shieling on the distant island," is "Chambers's Cyclopædia of English Literature," a work which is usually unimpeachable on the score of accuracy.

X. Y. Z.

MASTERPIECE OF THE WEEK

MOTLEY'S "RISE OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC"

I.

ABOUT the middle of the last century, a young American writer turned his studies to the investigation of the History of the United Netherlands, the Mother of Modern Republics. For ten years he buried himself in the libraries of Europe, and the archives of Brussels and the Hague, and finally emerged with a formidable manuscript of 2,000 pages. He offered that manuscript to the house of Murray. The manuscript was refused, a fact which proves that even the most experienced publishers are not infallible, and that even publishers' readers do not always recognise a masterpiece on the rare occasions when they are given a chance of seeing it. Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic" was, therefore, published at the author's risk and expense. The risk proved to be non-existent, for on the day after the publication the unknown writer woke and "found himself famous." The work took the literary world by storm. It was translated into every civilised language. It was multiplied in countless editions. It found equal favour with the masters of the historical craft and with the wide reading public in quest of tragedy and romance.

II.

Nothing is more arbitrary than the history of literary reputations, and it is the unexpected that often happens. Therefore it is often very difficult to give satisfactory reasons either for the success or the failure of a book. It is not easy to explain, for instance, why one of the greatest of American historians, Francis Parkman, should have been ignored for two generations. No such difficulty is felt in explaining the triumphant reception and continued vitality of Motley's "Dutch Republic." The greatness of the work must be visible to the untrained observer.

First of all, to account for its popularity, there is the fascination of a magnificent subject. The choice of a fitting subject is important to all artists, but most important of all to the historical writer. Alone it may make or mar the fortune of a book. Carlyle devoted the best years of his life, in the fullness of his power, to the history of Frederick the Great. Yet Frederick the Great is nearly forgotten, whilst the "French Revolution" retains all its vitality and freshness. Gibbon originally decided to write the history of Switzerland. If he had persevered in this purpose, he would be read to-day by a few specialists. In a fortunate hour, he chose the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," and his work remains one of the immortal masterpieces of the language.

The names of Carlyle and Gibbon naturally rise to our minds in connection with the "Rise of the Dutch Republic." For Motley chose one of the very few subjects which in intrinsic interest rival the "French Revolution" and the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." Motley's theme has more continuity than Gibbon's theme, and lends itself better to artistic treatment. On the other hand, it has the same dramatic unity as the "French Revolution." It is as fertile in stirring episodes: the execution of Egmont, the siege of Leyden, the sacking of Antwerp, the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. It is as rich in arresting and tragic characters: the gloomy and narrow Spanish tyrant, the brilliant and weak Egmont—hero of poetry and romance—the cunning, ambitious, and greedy Granvelle, the brave and cruel Duke of Alva, the wise and indomitable William the Silent. And, like the French Revolution, the Dutch Revolution is worldwide in its significance. More strikingly than any other modern struggle, it incarnates the conflict between despotism and liberty, and it culminates in the collapse of a mighty Empire and in the birth of a nation.

III.

This brings us to the second element of greatness in the "Rise of the Dutch Republic." The interest of the book is perennial, because the book deals with permanent issues. Prescott's "Conquest of Mexico" may be equally romantic, but it does not involve, like the "Dutch Republic," the most inspiring of political principles, the most vital of all political issues. What was at stake in the struggle was the whole spiritual future of European civilisation. If William the Silent had been beaten, or if he had been murdered at the beginning of the conflict, there was an end of European liberty. The Spanish Monarchy would have been supreme in two continents. Christianity would have been perverted into a grovelling tyranny. There are some misguided Catholic and Protestant historians who tell us that the triumph of William the Silent was the triumph of Protestantism. No historical view could be more superficial. Catholicism has nothing in common with the debasing and almost Oriental despotism of Alva and Philip II. Roman Catholicism and Protestantism were equally interested in the defeat of Philip II. His triumph would have been equally fatal to both. The triumph of William the Silent has benefited all the Churches and all the nations of Christendom, because it was the triumph of political and religious liberty, because it seems to me a self-evident proposition, which I submit to the reactionaries of every creed, that the separation of temporal and spiritual power, the supremacy of the religious conscience, is the very essence of Christianity.

IV.

In the "Rise of the Dutch Republic" the craftsmanship of the artist is equal to the merits of the historian. The style has all the qualities required by the subject. It is forcible, impetuous, vehement. It stirs our imagination; it vibrates with passion. Is there in Carlyle any scene more vivid than the abdication of Charles V.? Are there in Macaulay any portraits more striking than those of Egmont and Alva, of Viglius, the crafty lawyer, of Titelmans, the diabolical agent of a diabolical Inquisition?

I admit that the style has also serious defects. It is strained and lacking in ease. It is magniloquent and lacking in simplicity. It is monotonous and lacking in variety. It is redundant and lacking in brevity. But those defects of Motley are only the counterpart of his splendid qualities. It is difficult for him not to be florid when his mind is steeped in the turgid atmosphere of Spanish surroundings. It is difficult for him not to be rhetorical when all through his book he is pleading for a great cause. It is difficult for him to use self-restraint when his soul is boiling over with indignation. It is difficult for him not to be redundant when his mind is full of his tremendous subject.

V.

If from the consideration of the style we pass on to the consideration of the spirit and purpose, there are obvious blemishes in Motley's "Dutch Republic." It must be admitted that, although he is not constitutionally inaccurate, like Froude, he frequently ignores facts which do not fit in with his theory. Still, those scientific prigs and pedants who are always ready to pick holes in an historical masterpiece ought to remember that after all Motley was a pioneer, and that he opened to modern research a magnificent and unexplored field. Far more serious than the charge of inaccuracy is that of partiality. Even his most enthusiastic admirers would not contend that Motley is without a strong bias, and that this strong bias not infrequently perverts his historical judgment. He is not fair to Charles V. He does not do justice to Balthazar Gerard. William of Orange is not the ideal hero, nor is Philip the inhuman monster, depicted by the historian. But the admission of partiality scarcely detracts from the value of the work. There are cases where impartiality is both impossible and undesirable. Who would desire an historian to be neutral where the interests of humanity are at stake? We do want him to take sides against tyranny and treachery and cruelty. We are not particularly anxious that he should show sympathy for a tyrant like Philip II. or a brutal janissary like Alva. No doubt there may be circumstances where there is scope even for the "devil's advocate." But when the devil is incarnated in Philip II., in Alva, in Titelmans, and Viglius, it is better far to stand firmly "on the side of the angels" and on the side of the martyrs. It is better far for the historian to retain his moral conscience, for the conscience of the historian sooner or later becomes the collective conscience of the human race.

A FEW FACTS CONCERNING IMPRISONMENT

By THOMAS HOLMES

I WANT to put before the readers of EVERYMAN a few facts about prisons and prisoners, in the hope that they will prove as startling as they are important.

Fact 1. During the decade ending 1910 about a million of people were, in England and Wales alone, committed to prison because they could not forthwith pay fines imposed upon them in courts of summary jurisdiction.

Fact 2. Every year, right up to the last date for which figures are available, more than one-half of those committed to prison have been committed for the same reason; in other words, they were put in prison because of their poverty, not because of their criminality.

Fact 3. Fifteen per cent. pay, or part pay, their fines after they are in prison, the law allowing a pro rata payment, a reduction being made in the amount payable, according to the days served in prison, every portion of a day counting as a whole day.

This means that friends raise the necessary money and obtain their release.

Fact 4. A large percentage of the prisoners thus detained were youths between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years. During 1911 10,380 males and 1,506 females under twenty-one years of age were received into prison.

Fact 5. 1,548 of these young people were sent to prison for offences against police regulations or for breaches of by-laws, and 1,427 for vagrancy or offences against the poor law—non-criminal offences.

Fact 6. That the London courts furnish an abnormal proportion of committals; 1,341 youths under twenty-one years passed through Pentonville Prison in one year—1910. During the two years 1909, 1910, 1,791 youths of similar age were committed to Wandsworth Prison. Of those imprisoned in Pentonville 947 were given sentences of less than one month, many being sentences of a few days only.

Fact 7. That a large proportion of these young offenders had the option of paying fines, but were unable to pay forthwith.

Fact 8. That many of their offences were of a trumpery kind, including pitch and toss, selling newspapers in prohibited places, kicking footballs in the streets, disorderly conduct, bathing in the canals, etc., etc.

Fact 9. That the Prison Commissioners tell us that nearly 40 per cent. of first offenders committed to prison return to prison more or less frequently, and help to form the army of prison habitués.

Fact 10. That the Prison Commissioners frequently tell us that our prisons are largely peopled by the very poor, the ignorant, the weak, and the afflicted.

Fact 11. That prison is at present the one great corrective for the offences of the poor, and the one grand specific for their delinquencies.

Fact 12. That these frequent and unnecessary imprisonments have largely destroyed the primary object of prison, all fear being removed; familiarity breeding contempt.

Fact 13. That the system of fines is in principle just, if time is allowed for payment and the amount is not prohibitive. The maintenance of public order costs money, and offenders against it ought to contribute towards the expenses incurred.

Fact 14. That time after time different Secretaries of State have sent strong letters of remonstrance to all the magistrates, warning them against the evils of prompt committal to prison, and asking them to use the optional powers they possess of giving time for payment.

On October 3rd, 1912, Mr. McKenna also sent a strongly worded circular letter on the same subject. But at present the ruling principle appears to be—Your money or your liberty.

Fact 15. Persons who have designedly robbed others are often dealt with under the Probation Act, and thus avoid all legal punishment, but prison is the fate of the poor who have committed non-criminal offences and cannot pay at once.

Fact 16. That imprisonment should be the final resource of the State, not the first.

Next week I will deal with serious crime.

HER HAT

(From the French of Jules Lemaitre)

IN a corner of her hat,
Among the lace and roses,
A dainty little humming-bird,
With shining wings, reposes.

The silken skies are calling her
To loose her wings and fly away;
Alas! my lady's locks her tomb
Have been this many a day.

Poor little bird! slight as a bee;
A jewelled pin right through the heart
Transfixes thee.

I, too, am pierced through the heart,
'And held a captive hand and foot,
'And feel an arrow's smart.

THE PRACTICAL TEACHING OF LITERATURE

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Having had the privilege of reading in proof the article on "Motley" in this week's issue, I venture to make a practical suggestion in connection with your new series: the "Masterpiece of the Week." I have no doubt that this series might be made a very important feature in your paper, and of invaluable benefit to teachers and students, and that it might be used as a means of training the critical faculty, and of developing the literary appreciation of your readers.

To achieve that desirable consummation, it would be necessary (1) that in each case you should ask definite questions, whether those questions are explicitly raised in the paper or whether they are implicitly suggested by the book under discussion. (2) That the readers of EVERYMAN should be invited to answer those questions. (3) That EVERYMAN should discuss those answers in a subsequent issue, in so far as the answers are relevant.

To make my meaning quite clear by a concrete illustration, I would submit the following questions in connection with the paper on Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic."

1. With regard to the Spirit and Purpose of Motley's masterpiece, is the writer of the article correct in calling Motley "the historian of European liberty"? Would it not be more appropriate to call him, like Froude, "the historian of Protestantism"; or does the writer see any fundamental difference between the purpose of Froude and that of Motley?

2. With regard to the impartiality of Motley, does the writer sufficiently discriminate between that lower and negative form of impartiality or neutrality which refuses to take sides or to espouse any cause, and on the other hand that higher or positive kind of impartiality which proceeds from a sense of justice and generosity, and which is equally fair to friend and opponent? Judging Motley from that higher point of view, can he really be regarded as impartial? For instance, do the readers of EVERYMAN not think that he is signally unjust to the murderer of William the Silent? Is he not blind to the magnificent heroism and fortitude of Balthazar Gerard?

Generalising my question, is Motley not systematically unjust to the Spanish side? Is it credible that all the men who are on that side are unmitigated scoundrels, or bigots, or imbeciles?

3. With regard to the literary value of the "Dutch Republic," what are Motley's specific merits as a portrait painter? Can it be said that all his portraits are equally true to life? Shall we accept as artistic fiction or as true to history the portraits of Charles V., of Philip, of Alva, of Egmont, of Viglius?

4. The writer points out four blemishes in Motley's style: (1) redundancy and lack of brevity; (2) rhetoric and lack of ease and restraint; (3) monotony and lack of variety; (4) floridity and lack of simplicity. Can the readers of EVERYMAN select passages illustrating those blemishes?

To enable them to follow the discussion, I would suggest that for all purposes of reference and questions they should use a definite edition: either the edition of "Everyman's Library," or any other edition announced beforehand.

I am convinced that if questions were proposed and answers given on those lines, we would come much nearer to a critical appreciation of the "Masterpiece of the Week" under discussion.—I am, sir, etc.,

"SIGMA."

FOOT'S ADJUSTABLE REST-CHAIRS.

Automatic Adjustable Back.

"THE BURLINGTON" (Patented).

Simply press a button and the back declines, or automatically rises, to any position desired by the occupant. Release the button and the back is locked.

The arms open outwards, affording easy access and exit. The Leg Rest is adjustable to various inclinations, and can be used as a footstool. When not in use it slides under the seat.

The Front Table, Electric Light Attachment, Reading Desk and Side Tray are adjustable and removable. The only chair combining these conveniences, or that is so easily adjusted.

The Upholstery is exceptionally deep, with spring elastic edges.

Catalogue C 30 of Adjustable Chairs, Free.
171, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's NAVY CUT

Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets
and Tins.

May be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute.

Regd. No. 154011

THE NATIONALISATION OF EDUCATION

I.

LORD HALDANE'S Manchester speech has once more brought the Education problem to the front. Educational schemes have been so often wrecked in the past by political partisanship and religious sectarianism that we have become almost as sceptical in the matter of educational reform as in the matter of temperance reform, and it will take something more than Government announcements and pronouncements to restore confidence. I cannot, therefore, share the wild enthusiasm of Professor Sadler, who, in a recent article of the Daily News, calls the Lord Chancellor's utterance an "historical speech." Still, that speech would have served a useful purpose, even if it had produced no other result than to concentrate once more an apathetic public opinion on the deplorable condition of national education. That those conditions are, indeed, unsatisfactory no competent authority would deny.

"When a numerous and powerful body like our schoolmasters, of all grades and classes," says Mr. W. R. Lawson in his suggestive book, "John Bull and His Schools," "almost unanimously condemn their own work, there is evident need to find out what is wrong with it. When education committees all over the country frankly express their disappointment with the results of their arduous labours and vast expenditures, what stronger call could there be for a thorough reconsideration of the whole question? When parents, employers, and ratepayers are equally dissatisfied with the products of our schools, primary and secondary alike, no possible excuse remains for groping along blindly in the dark."

II.

Anarchy is the best description that could be given of our education: Anarchy tempered with Despotism. It is Anarchy: for the educational authorities, i.e., the Universities, have one policy, and the administrative authorities, i.e., the Education Department, have a totally different policy. It is Despotism: for Bureaucracy rules supreme. Government inspectors, arbitrarily selected, increasingly interfere with the liberty of the teacher; Government circulars take the place of educational principle, and the Machine takes the place of the living Spirit.

III.

Lord Haldane proposes drastic legislative changes, both as regards the pupils and as regards the teacher. With those reforms which only affect the pupils—improved sanitation, feeding of children, continuation schools—I shall deal in another paper. In the present article I am only concerned with the teachers. And when I consider the recruiting and training of our 250,000 teachers, I confess that I do not see how a Government measure, however drastic, could help us out of the present difficulties.

Will the new Bill give more power to the Bureaucracy? But it is obvious that the Education Department has already too much power, and already interferes too much with the independence of the teacher.

Will the new Bill impose more stringent tests, introduce fresh examinations? But there are already too many examinations, and John Bull is getting more and more in the grip of a Chinese system.

Will the new Bill provide more money for national education? We do not object to increased expenditure, although Britain already spends on education three times more than France. But what is wanted is not only more money, but that the public should get full value for the money which is being spent.

Will the new Bill introduce better methods? But the value of the methods entirely depends on the value of the men who use them, and the real problem, therefore, is not how to secure the best methods, but how to secure the best teachers.

IV.

Now, I am firmly convinced that the problem of securing the best teachers is not mainly a financial problem, but a moral problem. I do not say that the financial conditions of the teaching profession might not be considerably improved, and that if we spent a hundred millions on popular education instead of sixty millions, that would not be an excellent investment. But I do think that is not the main difficulty. Nor do I say that our vast army of two hundred and fifty thousand teachers does not contain splendid elements. But I do say that the teaching profession does not generally attract the best men from the schools and universities, and that even where it does attract such men, there is no scope and no career for them under present conditions. And the best men more and more refuse to enter the profession, not because teachers are underpaid and overworked, but simply because the teaching profession does not enjoy that public confidence and does not hold that position and confidence and that status to which it is entitled. For instance, a distinguished Oxford graduate will rather be a teacher in a public school at a lower salary than a teacher in a Council school at a higher salary. Paradoxical though it seems, he would rather serve a private institution than serve the nation, simply because if he enters a Council school or a Board school he at once loses "caste," and, losing caste, he must give up all hope of an academic career.

In this odious word "Caste" lies the explanation of many of our troubles. The curse of our whole educational system is that it is infected with the "class" spirit. Schools are not classified according to their educational efficiency. They are not divided into schools good, bad, and indifferent. They are divided according to the social class which frequents them. They are divided into popular schools, into middle-class schools, and into upper middle-class schools. The Public school looks down upon the Council school, even as the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge look down upon provincial Universities. Successful tradesmen living in Birmingham or Edinburgh will not send their sons to their native Universities of Birmingham and Edinburgh. They will rather send them to the aristocratic Colleges of the South.

V.

The tyranny of the class spirit and of the "caste" system points to one remedy and one remedy only—the nationalisation of Education. But let us remember that education cannot be nationalised mainly by Act of Parliament. It can only be nationalised by the nation itself. It cannot be done by compulsion, but by the free-will of parents. Education will only become national when parents give their confidence and support to the schools of the Government instead of giving it to private institutions. But, again, that is a moral problem, it is not a financial or political problem. Schools will only cease to be run on class lines when a truly democratic spirit will have taken the place of the snobbism and flunkeyism which is characteristic of the middle classes of Great Britain.

6d. Net.
Cloth, 5th DOZEN VOLUMES. NOW READY

— THE —
PEOPLE'S BOOKS.

4. ZOOLOGY: THE STUDY OF ANIMAL LIFE. By Professor E. W. Macbride, M.A., F.R.S.
27. PSYCHOLOGY. By H. J. Watt, M.A., Ph.D., D.Phil.
34. THE BIBLE AND CRITICISM. By W. H. Reonett, M.A., D.D., Litt.D., & W. F. Adeney, M.A., D.D.
40. CECIL JOHN RHODES. By Ian D. Colvin.
52. WORDSWORTH. By Rosaline Masson.
65. POND LIFE. By E. C. Ash, M.R.A.C.
68. FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE. By M. A. Mugge.
78. WELLINGTON AND WATERLOO. By Major G. W. Redway.
94. THE NATURE OF MATHEMATICS. By P. E. B. Jourdain, M.A.
98. ATLAS OF THE WORLD (in colour). By J. Bartholomew, F.R.G.S.
103. TURKEY AND THE EASTERN QUESTION. By John Macdonald, M.A.
106. EVERYDAY LAW. By J. J. Adams

NOTE THE COMPLETE ATLAS IN COLOUR.

"With the 'People's Books' in hand there should be nobody of average intelligence unable to secure self-education. His library—this library—should be his all-sufficing university."—Sunday Times.

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack, Publishers, Edinburgh.
Please send me your Complete Catalogue, free by post.

Name _____
Address _____

LONDON: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 67, Long Acre, W.C.; and Edinburgh.
And all Booksellers.

NATIONAL UNION
— OF —
WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE SOCIETIES

President - - Mrs. HENRY FAWCETT, LL.D.

Colours—RED, WHITE and GREEN.
The OLDEST, LARGEST SUFFRAGE ORGANISATION, extending from Land's End to the Shetland Islands.

OBJECT and METHODS.
To obtain the Parliamentary Vote for Women on the same terms as it is, or may be, granted to men, by united action in Parliament and by all constitutional methods in the country.
ALL MEN AND WOMEN who approve of our Object and Methods are invited to join the Union.

For further information apply to—
THE SECRETARY, NATIONAL UNION OF WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE SOCIETIES, 14, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

A SIMPLE WAY TO TRAIN YOUR MEMORY.

If you wish to train your memory on the simplest yet most up-to-date lines, you will find such training given in the Concentro Course "SCIENTIFIC CONCENTRATION." Everyone with a knowledge of Psychology recognises the value of "Scientific Concentration" as a training for the memory. If your memory fails to respond to this training you are not normally constituted, for the Concentro exercises are founded on strictly scientific lines—the lines which everyone with an intimate knowledge of Psychology recognises as the only known means of developing memory. Learn more about this splendid Course. SEND TO-DAY for Free Booklet to the

CONCENTRO Co., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

DICKENS DAY FEBRUARY 7.

The Complete Works of CHARLES DICKENS

CENTENARY EDITION in 36 large cr. octavo volumes.

Containing the whole of the novelist's writings, novels, short stories, sketches, essays, articles, plays and poems, as well as all the Prefaces, Dedications and Notices that appeared during the Author's lifetime.

WITH 747 ILLUSTRATIONS AND PORTRAITS.

The Special Features of this Edition are:

1. It is absolutely complete.
2. It is printed from the text last revised by Dickens himself.
3. The illustrations, 747 in number, have been reproduced from the original plates and wood blocks, which, drawn under Dickens's own supervision, necessarily represent his own conception of his characters.
4. The type is large and artistic: the paper of extra-superfine quality; the special red cloth binding handsome and distinctive.

CASH PRICES
36 large cr. octavo volumes.

Handsome Red CLOTH binding - - - £4 16 0
Half Polished CALF, lettered in Gold, Art
Linen Sides, Gilt Top Edge - - - 15 0 0 or by MONTHLY INSTALMENTS of 7s. 6d. for the Cloth; or 21s. for the Half Calf binding.

CARRIAGE PAID WITHIN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB
376 to 384, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

Works by
H. G. WELLS.

MARRIAGE. 6s.
24th Thousand.

Miss M. P. WILLCOCKS in THE DAILY CHRONICLE.
—"A book that thrills with the life, the questioning of to-day. Whatever the autumn publishing season may produce, it is not likely to bring us anything more vital, more significant, than Marriage."

Crown 8vo. Gilt extra. 3s. 6d. each.

When the Sleeper Wakes.	Twelve Stories and a Dream. (Also 8vo, sewed, 6d.)
Love and Mr. Lewisham.	The Food of the Gods and how it came to earth.
Tales of Space and Time.	Kippis: The Story of a Simple Soul.
The Invisible Man.	In the Days of the Comet.
The Stolen Bacillus. (Also pott 8vo, 7d. net.)	Tono-Bangay. (Also pott 8vo, 7d. net.)
The Flatterer Story.
The First Men in the Moon.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

THE TRIAL OF JOAN OF ARC * * * BY HENRI MAZEL

It was at Compiègne, on May 23rd, 1430, that Joan was taken prisoner. Her captors turned her straight over to the English, apparently without the intervention of their liege lord, the Duke of Burgundy, or without any effort being made to buy her back by the ungrateful French King. What the price of her blood was we know: it was put at an annuity for the actual captor, the Bastard of Wandonne, and ten thousand livres, Tours currency, then a considerable sum, for his chief, John of Luxemburg.

This phrase, "the price of her blood," is the literal truth, for Cardinal Beaufort, who was acting as regent in France for the young king, Henry VI., had resolved that the Maid must die. But as a preliminary he desired to have her found guilty of heresy, imposture, and sorcery, by way of bringing dishonour both upon her and her work. Accordingly, instead of hanging her out of hand or sewing her up in a sack and flinging her in the river, after the pleasant fashion of those days, an official process, in regular legal form, was commenced against her.

The moment she became a prisoner Joan was claimed simultaneously both by the Inquisition and by the Court of the Bishop, for both of these authorities had the right to take cognisance of the ecclesiastical crimes laid to her charge. Compiègne lay in the diocese of Beauvais, and the Bishop of Beauvais, Pierre Cauchon, was, as it happened, an ardent partisan of the Burgundians and English. When Beauvais rallied to the cause of Charles VII. the Bishop had had to flee, and he had taken refuge in Rouen, where there was a vacant archiepiscopal chair, the succession to which he might well hope to obtain in return for the great service he proposed to render to his liege the King of England.

With this motive Joan was transferred to Rouen towards the end of December, 1430. The Chapter at the Norman capital had little love for the Bishop of Beauvais or for the University of Paris, confederate with the Bishop against the prisoner; nevertheless, it gave authority for the case to proceed. The case, indeed, was already in process, for the accusation had been re-formulated immediately after her capture, and Pierre Cauchon had spent the seven months since then in procuring informations and documents of every sort, even sending inquisitors to her native place, Domrémy. The case was yet to drag on for five months longer.

The trial of Joan was truly a Passion. History offers no instance of a prosecution more savage and more pitiless, of a more dignified defence, of a more piteous death. Now, when all those ancient passions are cold, Joan of Arc shines with a marvellous glory, not only in France, where she is universally honoured as the national heroine, but equally in England, where numerous authors unite in glorifying her life and bewailing her end; now she shines not only in the religious world of Catholicism, where she has been canonised by the Pope, but in the great world of civilisation, which finds it impossible to refuse homage to one who added to a man's courage and a woman's modesty the constant soul of a martyr.

Joan, being prosecuted for an ecclesiastical offence, should by rights have been placed in an ecclesiastical prison. By a breach of the law at the very outset she was shut up in a tower, now destroyed, of the old castle of Rouen; and she was there guarded by English soldiers. It may even be true that she was kept in an iron cage; it is beyond doubt that irons were placed on her hands, her feet, and her neck. She had once attempted an escape while the Burgundians held her prisoner, and the English soldiers made up their minds that the victim never should escape from them. Henry VI. had arrived and taken up his residence at Rouen, and Cardinal Beaufort and Warwick were also there to inflame the zeal of his partisans.

On February 21st she appeared for the first time before her judges. A round hundred of assessors had been convoked, ecclesiastics all, and almost all Frenchmen, belonging, of course, to the Anglo-Burgundian party. Of them scarcely the half took their seats. On this first day Cauchon was supported by forty-three, who included abbés, priors, and inquisitors, canons of Rouen, and doctors of the University of Paris. The session from the start was a mixture of questions and of insulting exclamations. It was vain for Joan to take exception to the Bishop of Beauvais on the ground of his being her enemy. His answer was, "I have the King's orders to try your case, and I am going to do so."

And try it he did, in a style that the most critical official of the King could find no fault with. Pierre knew how to conduct the debates so as to give the illusion of scrupulously observing legal forms, while, in fact, his one object was to stifle the truth and destroy the prisoner; and he ended by having her condemned to death—to the most cruel of all deaths—in absolute disregard both of pity and of justice.

His first step was to re-establish order in the hall where the Sessions were held. No more shouts and no more insults, as on the first occasion; but the questions were all the more entangling, the more insidious, the more deadly. There were six of these public examinations; and then, as Joan's serene and pious loyalty was making too good an impression on the Bishop's colleagues, the later sessions were held in private, twice a day sometimes, and so continued till the 17th of March.

We have the official reports of the examinations; they are complete in the Latin, and part of them exist also in French. With them before us we can live over again, hour by hour, minute by minute, the days of anguish endured by Joan. History shows no spectacle more amazing than this peasant girl of nineteen, ignorant of reading and writing, holding her own for fifteen interminable sessions against the most captious and cunning of inquisitors. They question her about everything, and for everything she has an answer. Each moment they spread snares for her, they travesty her meaning, they ask her questions to which "yes" or "no" is a reply equally dangerous for her, and never once does her clearness of mind, her courage, nay, even her good temper, desert her. And yet she is a woman; she has her hours of despondency, of weakness, of weeping; she is neither a virago, nor a Stoic, nor an enthusiast. The very sceptics, who do not admit the supernatural character of her mission, and regard her "voices" and her visions merely as products of her own imagination, recognise that apart from them Joan is a young girl of perfect sanity, very frank and very simple.

If Joan had been dealing with true judges she must have been acquitted. A sorceress she could not be, because the fact of her virginity was established—a conclusive proof, according to the ideas of that period. She was not a heretic, because she had always protested her submission to the Church. She never admitted being an impostor, seeing that nothing could make her express the faintest doubt as to the reality of the mission confided to her by her "saints." All they could find against her was that she had worn men's clothes, and to transform this into a serious crime they had to unearth the canons of a Council of the fourth century.

A Rouen lawyer, Jehan Lohier, before whom the opening of the proceedings had been laid, declared that the process was not in due form, the judges not being free and the accused not having an advocate. He had to leave Rouen. Another lawyer, La Fontaine, disclosed to Joan that she possessed the right to appeal to the Pope. He was excluded from the case. On the other side what traitors and spies surrounded her! The Bishop of Beauvais plays the farce of exhibiting his fatherly affection for her, and forges against her the twelve propositions, professedly extracted from her answers, which are to serve to condemn her. He assigns to her a confessor, one Loyseleur, and poor Joan believes him to be loyal. Loyseleur plays her false, urges her to set herself above the Church, betrays the secrecy of her confessions; and, almost alone among those judges, this wretch has the atrocious courage to vote that she, the young girl who is his spiritual daughter, should be stretched upon the rack.

These multiple torments must have overstrained the strength of Joan: she was, after all, only a poor young girl. On the 24th of May they took her to the cemetery of St. Ouen. There, before her judges and in the presence of a yelling crowd, they read to her the list of errors of which she had been declared guilty by the tribunal. She can save her life only by abjuring these errors, and thereby implicitly admitting her guilt. For long does her loyal nature resist! She holds out against the sight of the executioner, there with his cart before her eyes, all ready to take her to the stake; against the awful thought of being burned alive, against threats, against insults, even against the entreaties of those who, perhaps in good faith and out of pity, cried out to her, "Abjure and you will be saved." Three several times does Cauchon in vain demand that she shall abjure, and then begins the reading of the unjust sentence. She is aware that if he reaches the end she will be burned alive, and her woman's weakness overcomes her; she interrupts the judge, she confesses everything, every single thing they want: that her visions are false, that she has been an idolater, a schismatic, a wanton, a shedder of blood. Thereupon the Bishop of Beauvais tears up the first sentence, and reads to her the alternative one, which spares her life indeed, but condemns her to perpetual imprisonment, with the bread of sorrow and water of affliction.

Hereupon those who wished Joan to be put to death shouted that the Bishop had betrayed them; and now it was on the judges and assessors that insults and stones were showered by the soldiery. The ecclesiastics essayed to calm their fury. "Don't disturb yourselves; we'll catch her again!" And truly they were not long about it. Even if Joan had failed to recover her heroic temper they would have burned her all the same. They removed her female garments, leaving her only her male attire, so that her action in putting it on again after swearing not to do so should render her a relapsed offender. But, more than that, she herself declared to Cauchon, who came to verify with his own eyes the fact of her having relapsed, that she had been told by God, through St. Catherine and St. Margaret, how it had grieved Him to behold her abjure in order to save her life, adding that her abjuration had been a lie. She had condemned herself to death. "Be of good cheer," said Cauchon to Warwick; "that settles it!"

This scene took place on the 28th of May. Next morning an assembly of doctors declared that Joan, having relapsed, must be handed over to the secular arm, and on the morning of the day after they came and told her she was to be burnt alive. Joan wept. "Alas! must I be treated so horribly and so cruelly, and must my body, so pure and clean, be reduced this day to ashes? Ah! I would be beheaded seven times over rather than be burned." She made her confession, and asked for the communion; and the Bishop gave his consent, thereby admitting that she, whom he proclaimed to be a heretic cut off from the Church, might nevertheless receive the sacred host. Joan made her communion with much fervour. Then, seeing her judge, she said: "Bishop, my death is on your head. Had you put me in a prison of the Church and given me ecclesiastical guards, this would not have come to pass. Wherefore do I appeal against you before God?"

It was nine o'clock. They came to carry her to the Old Market. An immense pile of wood had been prepared opposite the seats where sat the judges and the representatives of the King of England. Joan shivered. "Oh, Rouen, Rouen! is it here, then, that I am to die?" Possibly she may have hoped to the last for some victorious charge to be made by her former companions in arms, or even—who can say?—for a miraculous intervention of her Saints. It is said that just before the last moment she shook her head sorrowfully: "I do see plainly that my voices have deceived me." But at the very last, face to face with certain death, her grand soul found itself again in all its heroism and all its angelic sweetness. With patience she listened to the sermon and then to the sentence; she fell on her knees, asking the prayers and the pity of the beholders, and all in so devout and humble a manner that everyone fell to weeping, even Cauchon, the Cardinal, the English soldiers.

Others, it is true, were impatient and grumbled. These latter dragged Joan to the pile, where the executioner hoisted her up. At the sight of the fire she gave a great cry. Brother Martin, her confessor, held up before her a cross, which she looked at ardently. Amid the roaring of the flames she was heard to repeat the name of Jesus, and to give her testimony to her Saints. "Yes, my voices were of God, my voices have not deceived me." Doubtless in that supreme hour she understood that the deliverance they had promised was no escape from her earthly prison, but her ascension to Paradise, "where, with God's help," she had declared some hours earlier, "I shall be to-night." What sacred memories these words recall! Joan of Arc's passion is alone worthy to be set alongside our Lord's.

Poor Joan! the victim of her friends even more than of her enemies. For in this fifteenth century, a century of atrocious outrages, one can comprehend the ferocity with which a Cauchon or a Cardinal Beaufort set themselves to her undoing. But a Charles VII., who owed his crown to her! a Pope Eugenius IV., who was the master both of the Inquisition and of the Episcopate! How is it that neither one of them did aught to ransom, or to rescue, or at the very least to save from the fire the Holy Maid of Orléans?

It is always difficult, even at the best circulating libraries, to get a recently published work promptly

The Times Book Club's New Special Service ensures the prompt delivery of any new book in circulation in the Library.

Country subscribers are not required to return their books until a fresh supply arrives, and so are never without books.

The Times Book Club is thus offering

A UNIQUE LIBRARY SERVICE

Subscriptions from 7/6

FULL PARTICULARS, rates of subscription, etc., sent on receipt of postcard mentioning Everyman.

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE OF 10,000 NEW AND SECOND-HAND BOOKS AT REDUCED PRICES.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB CIRCULATING LIBRARY

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Short-hand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. EACH OFFERED.—Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863; Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863; Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878; Baxter's Cabinet of Paintings, 1837; Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879; Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865; Symonds' Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881; Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. 100,000 Books for Sale and Wanted. Exchanges made. Please state wants.—Baker's Great Book Shop, 14-16, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any voice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete. Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. A. R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

LITTLE SALON SOCIAL-LITERARY CIRCLES.—For Men and Women of Culture (Speakers and Non-Speakers); include Drama, and Open Discussions of Questions of the Day. New Books, etc. Sub. Mod.—Write, M. L. B., Salon Secretary, 24, Bloomsbury Square, London, W.C.

FOR SALE, the numbers of the "British Weekly," from July, 1890, with exception of one number, in good condition. Offers to John Milburn, Waterworks, Wylam-on-Tyne.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

SILHOUETTES

From the gallery of memory, mutascopia and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

SHE was seventy years and over, and life, that had brought her many things, love and suffering, hope and disappointment, had narrowed to the space before her window—a glimpse of garden merging into green fields, and to the right the curve of the long white road that, winding like a ribbon over the hills, lost itself at last in the surge of the great city. Her eyes, infinitely wise and tender, wistfully followed the road to where it passed out of sight; followed and then returned, lingering on each remembered landmark by the way. When evening came she would have a lamp set on a table in the window, so that its friendly gleams sped a welcome to the wayfarer on the brow of the hill.

She had lost the husband of her youth long since, and of her children some were dead, others were married. There remained one only who was out of the fold; but "night brings all home," said the patient mother, and set a lamp to guide him. A brilliant youth, full of promise that had never blossomed to achievement, he had played fast and loose with opportunity till, outworn by repeated failure, his friends left him, his companions denied him; only the old mother was left. She neither reproached nor entreated him, but sent all that her love could hoard. And he had promised to return to her within the year.

Spring dropped her treasure of violets on the lap of earth; summer with her riot of roses passed by. The browns and reds of autumn were over—a powder of snow lay on the hills, and the road was a sheet of ice.

"He will never come," said her daughter. "I would not worry, mother, if I were you. Promise? He never kept a promise yet."

She waited, half-angry that no remonstrance or protest came from the patient figure at the window. "You think more of him than any of us," the daughter grumbled; and when the door was closed the tender eyes shed a few tears.

He would not fail her; though the whole world were against him he was still her boy. And in the wonderful fashion of motherhood she saw him, the prodigal of middle age, as the curly-headed boy that leant against her knee.

"Now perhaps you are satisfied and won't worry," said the daughter on the last night of the year. "He can't possibly come, mother, the last train is in and there's a heavy fall of snow. . . . Put him out of your mind, he's not worth thinking of."

But the lamp was set as usual on the table, and the mother watched the long white road with wistful eyes. Anne was a good woman, but she had no son—she could not understand.

She dozed in her chair by the window, and for the first time for many nights slept soundly. And as she slept the old year passed, and, as the daughter said, the prodigal had not returned.

But in the morning, on the brow of the hill, just where the welcoming beams of the lamp would meet him, they found him in the snow, and on his face was set the seal of the great peace; and the hunger in the mother's heart was satisfied. The prodigal had remembered, her boy had come home at last!

CORRESPONDENCE

[As our space is limited, correspondents will please bear in mind that the utmost brevity and clearness are essential. We regret having been compelled to withhold a number of excellent letters simply on account of their great length.—ED.]

GERMANY AND RELIGION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to your interesting article about Germany in No. 14 of EVERYMAN, I should like to allude to several points which seemed to me to be inaccurate.

If you range the Churches within the spiritual forces, which are strenuously working to undermine the Prussian military oligarchy, this is certainly not the fact. It is true that a few men like Jatho and Traub object to the high reactionary pressure of the orthodoxy, which is protected and fostered by the Government. But even those men see that things cannot go on as they are, and therefore endeavour to find a way out in order to avoid the coming revolution.

Now I think it will be impossible to understand the German nation without mentioning one most important point, viz., the religious question, which is practically a question of politics as well. The German nation may be divided into three parts, the reactionaries, the progressives, and those who are more or less indifferent. This last category is naturally the largest one, whereas the progressive section is growing from day to day.

It must be remembered that Germany has a State religion, or rather two, the Protestant Orthodox and the Catholic. Jews are already regarded as second-rate subjects, whereas dissenters are suppressed by all possible means. That children of dissenters are forced to attend religious lessons might be unthinkable in England and France, but it is a fact in Germany.

No wonder that, by degrees, people become obstinate, and that this obstinacy, which is, in the first instance, directed against the Orthodox Church, extends itself also against the State, which supports the Church. This movement is growing, and in a very short time there will be a breakdown of the old system.

Every broad-minded German will thank you for the last words of your article; for the good relations between the two countries are intimately bound up with the disappearance of the old régime.

May I express the hope that these words will find an echo here?—for the English nation could help a good deal if Jingo papers would stop pointing at a German danger. There is no danger at all. The old régime will not be able to conduct an offensive war successfully, whereas the coming generation will be too advanced to wish any complication.—I am, sir, etc.,
E. SCHMIDT.

Dulwich, London, S.E., January 30th, 1913.

THE MORAL PROGRESS OF THE SWISS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In the article on Switzerland in this week's issue, the statement is made that "in the province of education Switzerland is in advance of most countries in Europe." May I suggest that this view is not quite borne out in the subsequent passage, when it is doubted whether "the moral progress of the people has kept pace with their intellectual progress"? I am aware that this is partly attributed to the influences of those visitors who are drawn to that beautiful country, but surely there must be something badly wrong

DO YOU POSSESS AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA?

A Remarkable Offer.

FIRST PAYMENT 2/6 ONLY.

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vamberg, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Watts Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

The "Illustrated Chambers's" (Latest Edition) is a treasury of compact information and a reliable guide on subjects Literary, Political, Historical, Theological, Scientific, Musical, Artistic, Philosophical, and General. It is international in character. It consists of Ten Handsome Half-Leather Volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced, and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

Let the Children use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

Two Opinions.

LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON writes—

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

HILAIRE BELLOC, Esq., writes—

"Chambers's Encyclopædia has been my principal book of reference for the last fifteen years. I have found it much the most accurate of such works, more trustworthy than others, and more comprehensive. . . . I have never found it to fail."

A FREE BOOK.

TO THE CANTON PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, Post Free, and without any obligation on my part, Illustrated Booklet describing "The Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia," and full particulars of your offer to deliver the complete work for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

NAME
(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS
.....

Mr. Frank Hartley's Generous Offer to put another 100 Readers of "Everyman" upon the Royal Road to Success, Power and Influence.

Owing to the success with which his recent remarkable offer has met, Mr. Hartley has decided to extend the special arrangement for the benefit of another 100 ambitious readers of EVERYMAN.

So, if you are anxious to grasp this life's opportunities with both hands and make the most of them; if you want to know how to train your mind, to develop your personality, and acquire influence along true and scientific lines, get into communication to-day with Mr. Frank Hartley, the author of one of the most inspiring books ever published, entitled—

"HOW FAILURE BECOMES IMPOSSIBLE."

This book shows how to make failure impossible, and how to make sure and steady progress to success. It tells you how the Frank Hartley Course of Menti-Culture deals, as no other course of training does, with

The Mysteries and Secrets of the Mind.

It explains simply and clearly to the uninitiated the mysteries and secrets of the inner constitution and workings of the human mind. It shows how one can become compelling and attractive in personality, and how to influence the thoughts and actions of others. Mr. Hartley's Course is not merely one of memory training or mind concentration. It is more—much more. It is a scientific course of mind development—a development which puts one in possession of all the mysterious powers of the mind, and makes those who follow it a personal force wherever they go.

Mr. HARTLEY'S SPECIAL OFFER.

Every reader of "Everyman" can have a copy of this remarkable book, and also a specimen lesson, by sending two penny stamps, but to the FIRST HUNDRED who respond to this week's offer, and decide to enrol for the entire Course, Mr. Hartley's generous offer is to accept them at half his usual low fee. This means another 100 STUDENTS at HALF FEES.

Guarantee of Successful Training.

There is no risk in taking the Course, no possibility of spending money uselessly. You must make satisfactory progress. Mr. Hartley guarantees it. He promises specially to readers of EVERYMAN taking advantage of his offer, that "If any student, after taking the Course, has not improved himself, he is at liberty to return his instruction papers, when the fee paid will be refunded in full."

1,000 GUINEAS GUARANTEE.

Further, in order to remove all possible doubt as to the success and efficacy of the Course, a few opinions of those who have already taken it are here given, under Mr. Hartley's penalty offer of 1,000 guineas if they can be proved not genuine.

Your Course is a gold mine.

"Dear Mr. Hartley,—I am more than pleased with the results I have gained from practising the lessons of your Course. There seems to have been a gradual development of a power within me, giving a feeling of self-confidence and a consciousness of ability to attract whom I will. This power is invaluable to me in my occupation as a traveller . . . the Course will prove to be a 'gold mine.'
Yours sincerely,
A. F. C."

Mr. R. CURTIS writes:—"I have just finished my fifth lesson, and I must say that I realize the truth it contains. If one does carry out the instructions carefully it will lead him to success, and if all would persevere in this principle it would make our nation a strong, self-reliant people."

Perfect happiness, influence, rapid progress and absolute success are now brought within your reach. If you are not totally indifferent to your own interests you will grasp this opportunity.

Application for the book and specimen lesson, which will be sent on receipt of two penny stamps, places you under no obligation to enrol. Please remember this. Write to-day, and address your reply to—

FRANK HARTLEY,

Room 49, London Institute of Menti-Culture, 35, Wellington Street, London, W.C.

with the educational system when it fails to produce a people with sufficient character to resist the adverse influences of the holiday-makers—and, after all, a large proportion of these visitors must be those contact with whom would tend to strengthen and not to weaken the moral fibre of the people. "Switzerland," the article says, "has taught us many a valuable lesson." There is one to be followed up here.—I am, sir, etc.,
J. F. COLE.

Finchley, January 29th, 1913.

THE VALUE OF THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In the discussions on the Bible, two facts are frequently lost sight of: (1) It is not one book, but many. These books were written by very different people, at very different periods of the world's history. Hence we find various theological views therein. It unfolds progressively man's idea of God. (2) The books of the New Testament were not written to make people Christians. They were written to confirm and correct, to instruct and guide those who had already accepted the Christian faith.

The Jews had a "genius for righteousness," as Matthew Arnold points out; and because the books of the Bible help us to attain rightness of conduct, in a greater degree than any other literature, they will always retain their value.—I am, sir, etc.,

Truro, January 27th, 1913.

W. G. KERR.

LAMB AND BURNS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your article on Burns, in your issue of January 24th, it is stated that "Lamb would kiss his copy of Burns as he put it back on the shelf." What is the authority for this statement? I cannot find anything about Burns in the index to Lucas' "Life of Lamb," which one would expect to mention such an incident.—I am, sir, etc.,

London.

H. M. CHARTERIS MACPHERSON.

"THE KING'S MIRROR."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is curious how tastes in books differ. I agree with nearly everything Mr. Lewis Melville says about Mr. Anthony Hope's works, except his extravagant praise of "The King's Mirror." I regard that work as piffle, totally unworthy of its distinguished author.—I am, sir, etc.,
EDWARD MARKWICK.

Godalming, January 28th, 1913.

'AN ETON EDUCATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been following the articles by Mgr. R. H. Benson on "An Eton Education," and hope that you will find room in your next issue for this protest against what I consider an unwarrantable intrusion upon the pages of EVERYMAN.

After reading the first few parts of Mgr. Benson's series, one cannot help thinking that his object is, not to give a fair outline of education, but to seize upon every conceivable opportunity to exalt the Roman Catholic religion and to disparage the Protestant faith.

What he says about the morals of the schoolboys at Eton is undoubtedly true, but he need not make it an opportunity of glorifying the Roman Catholic religion and of sneering at non-Catholic religions. The evil is entirely physical, and must be dealt with on physiological lines, and from what we know of public school boys we must believe that there are plenty of devout Catholic lads who are not one whit better in this respect than the most unblessed heretic that ever shirked his lessons.—I am, sir, etc.,

STANLEY E. GULLICK.

Leyton, January 28th, 1913.

THE TYRANNY OF THE NOVEL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—May I venture to suggest that, judging from his article on "The Tyranny of the Novel," Canon Barry either does not know in what spirit the novel is read, or does great injustice to the novel-reading public.

From his article it would appear that all novels are written either with no purpose at all (except of enriching the writer), or with the direct object of upsetting ancient faiths and Christian beliefs.

Is not the question, "Why the novel and not the Bible?" rather absurd, and does not the answer, "You have taken to the human story rather than the divine one," betoken a disregard of fact? Surely the Bible and the work of fiction cannot, out of respect for the one and fairness to the other, be compared in this way.

The reverend gentleman says that the novel, in Christian hands, is well adapted to illustrate the Gospel. Would he be so intolerant as to suggest that no novel is good but one written to expound the Gospel, and that in an orthodox manner?

He bemoans the fact that the storyteller is nowadays taken seriously, and asserts that the popular novelist always attacks Christian axioms and institutions. What the advanced novelist who is to be taken seriously does is to assail, not Christian axioms, but their frequently questionable applications. The novel is not always fancy let loose; it is often philosophy of a true kind. The existence of the "heterodox-pious" does not threaten religion; and, because it is not written with a Gospel text, the novel is not therefore the enemy of the Bible.—I am, yours, etc.,

WILFRED J. NEDEN.

74, Chelsham Road, Clapham, S.W.

"THE DAUGHTER AT HOME."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Not having read "The Upholstered Cage" (noticed in your issue of January 3rd), I cannot criticise your reviewer's estimate of the book nor his general impression of its purport.

His attitude, however, to "the daughter at home" is a common and exasperating one, and calls for criticism.

It is difficult to imagine anyone "despising" her, but surely a little of the superabundant pity and sympathy bestowed by our present-day novelists on married people—pity on the happy and sympathy on the unhappy—need not be grudged to the daughter at home.

Her troubles and tragedies are as real, if less romantic and, as a rule, less deserved.

Putting aside the question of the servitude of woman, and allowing, for the sake of argument, that the care of an invalid mother, the taking of a mother's place in the household, and all the other duties which fall to the lot of the daughter at home form an ideal occupation for a woman, it cannot be denied that it is a "blind alley" one.

When the invalid mother no longer needs her care, and the brothers and sisters she has mothered have all gone their separate ways, what prospect has the daughter—now without a home—of making one for herself and earning enough to provide for her present needs and for her old age?

The chance of marriage as a solution of her diffi-

A Delicious COCOA and MILK

Messrs. Savory and Moore make a preparation of Cocoa and Milk which all who like cocoa should try. Its advantages are:

DIGESTIBILITY.—This is ensured not by the elimination or removal of certain parts of the cocoa, but by a process of peptonising or partially predigesting, which renders it perfectly easy of digestion, even by the most delicate.

DELICIOUS FLAVOUR.—Elaborate treatment of cocoa often robs it of its flavour. By Savory and Moore's process the original flavour of the cocoa is retained, and even refined and improved.

NOURISHING PROPERTIES.—Savory and Moore's preparation contains all the nourishing properties of the best cocoa and pure, sterilised country milk; a combination unsurpassed in actual food values.

UTILITY.—Neither milk nor sugar is required, but merely the addition of hot water. A cup of this delicious beverage can thus be made without trouble, at a moment's notice. Tins, 2s. 6d. and 1s. 6d., of all Chemists and Stores.

SAMPLE for 3d. POST FREE.

A Trial Tin of the Cocoa and Milk will be sent by return, post free, for 3d. Mention EVERYMAN, and address: Savory and Moore, Ltd., Chemists to The King, 143a, New Bond Street, London.

SAVORY & MOORE'S COCOA & MILK

DEAF?

OH DEAR NO!!

This is the happy reply made by all Deaf persons who use the "AURIPHONE."

If you are deaf and have not yet tested the "AURIPHONE," we urge you to call at once at our offices for a free demonstration of our wonderful little "pocket telephone," which magnifies the slightest sound and simply makes the deaf hear. A new era has already dawned for hundreds of deaf people, and what our instrument has done for others—it can do for you.

The "AURIPHONE"

is a genuine British-made instrument similar in principle to the telephone, and conquers deafness just as the telephone conquers distance. It weighs only a few ounces, is perfectly comfortable, almost invisible in use, and goes neatly into the pocket when out of use. If other devices have failed, the "Auriphones" will succeed—it's different from them all.

NEW PERFECTED MODEL NOW READY.

Call at any time for a

FREE DEMONSTRATION

or write us for our free booklet and particulars of home trials.

Auriphones, Ltd., 42, Walter House, 418-422, Strand, London, W.C.

Agents: Arnold & Co., 6, Giltspur Street, London, E.C.;

MANCHESTER: Percy Sims, 49, Deansgate;

LEICESTER: F. E. Butler, Son & Co., High Street;

BRISTOL: Hodder & Co., 5, Nelson Street;

PORTSMOUTH: Timothy White.

culties need not be considered, being too vague a possibility.

All professions and skilled trades infer an apprenticeship. What's wrong with the daughter at home occupation is that it is a perpetual apprenticeship, and, unlike other apprenticeships, leads to nothing.

Domestic work—for the worker's "own people"—is considered unskilled labour, to all intents and purposes, and has little or no value as "experience" to potential or prospective employers. That specialisation so notable in the present-day industrial world makes it very hard for a jack-of-all-trades to compete with younger, more modern women trained from girlhood to some profession or trade, as men are from boyhood.

Her experience, moreover, does not do much to fit her to face the world "on her own." When she comes to that she is rather like a strayed cat, only less likely to "fit into" any offered refuge than the cat. Food and shelter are not the only necessities of life.

Woman's sphere may be in the home and the family, and these great institutions may provide her with scope and freedom for the exercise of her highest qualities: but when she is only a "daughter at home," and these institutions not her own, she is expected to play "second fiddle" cheerfully and to accept with equanimity the prospect of being left to make a home and a living for herself at an age when her more fortunate sisters are resting a little on their oars, and looking forward to a comfortable and secure old age!

Gissing understood a little of the tragedy of the "odd women," but your reviewer, being either very old or very young, does not.—I am, sir, etc.,

Glasgow, January, 1913.

F. L. C.

THE DOWRY QUESTION IN FRANCE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I think that your contributor, who seems to be a friend of France—a fact on which I cannot but congratulate him—seems also to be determined to see only the "fair side" of the "dowry" question. The "dot" would be all right if the reasons of its existence were those described by him—self-sacrifice, in order to provide for the uncertainties of human life; feeling of independence and dignity in the French-woman. Perhaps once (!!) it was so; but as it is, the reason is because—to put it plainly—a dowerless girl cannot marry. I know many girls, charming, clever housewives, cultured, of good birth and family, who are still single because they've no dowry. I and others have tried to find good husbands for them, but invariably the first question of the would-be suitors was about the dowry. And when the answer was given, "No dowry," or "A very small one," they one and all went their way. Many matches were broken off because the girl had lost her dowry before the marriage had taken place.

But there is another evil, far worse than the unhappy condition of these girls. Young men, instead of trying to work and to get a position which would enable them to marry and support a wife and family, have learned to rely upon a good match to get a living. Some, indeed, go so far as to anticipate, and run into debt (tradesmen being assured they will get their due after the wedding).

Your contributor says that women insist on not being dependent on their husband's income; but I can assure you that men have no such scruples, and the consequence is that young men no longer "struggle for life," but "marry for life." French-women are less than Mohammedan women—they are held of some value, since their husbands must buy them from their parents. But we are held cheaper. Husbands only take us with a "compensation gift." On the other hand, I know English girls—very nice, but penniless—they are all engaged to nice men, who are working hard to get a position which will enable them to marry. Some have been engaged for years.

Our system has another drawback. Men do not care much about their wives, for they have been chosen chiefly for money's sake, and not for their own; and temper and personal appearance are not taken into consideration.

As a conclusion to this too long letter, may I tell you that many years ago, in the Annales Politiques et Littéraires, this question of dowry was discussed, and a remark was made which is very accurate (at least, I think so)? It was said that, to prevent the decay of the race, the dowry ought to be suppressed, for healthy girls remained single, while sickly girls (cripples even) got married and had children, because they had money. Men, it was argued, would naturally love healthy and pretty girls, and only the lack of money prevented them from marrying them. Surely this is an argument worthy of consideration.—I am, sir, etc.,

(Mrs.) L. GEOFROY.

Sainpigny (Meuse), France.

NIETZSCHE, SHAW, AND OSCAR WILDE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—In your article on "The Philosopher of the Superman" you state, "After all, Mr. Shaw is not his only disciple in England. The late Mr. Oscar Wilde was a heavy debtor to his teaching." I was very much surprised to read that. Considering that some of Nietzsche's most characteristic work was written after some of Wilde's most characteristic, one might as well say that Nietzsche was a debtor to Wilde. Could Wilde read German with ease? While he had a comprehensive knowledge of French and French literature, and was friendly with many eminent French writers, Henri de Regnier, André Gede, Bourget, dined with the Goncourts, paid a visit to Victor Hugo, his writings show no first-hand knowledge of German literature. He refers certainly to Goethe, but the trend of Goethe's writings were, of course, known by every man of letters, and his works available in English translations. In 1896, when Wilde had written everything except "The Ballad of Reading Gaol" and "De Profundis," appeared an article in the second number of the Savoy, by Havlock Ellis, on Nietzsche, where he wrote, "If we turn to Scandinavia or to France, whither his (Nietzsche's) fame and his work are penetrating. . . . At present I know of no attempt to deal with Nietzsche from the British point of view."

In the same year appeared in book form, translated in English, "The Case of Wagner, etc.," and "Zarathustra." Well, if Wilde did not read them in the original, how could he be "a heavy debtor to his teaching"? Why should we think less of our men of letters than Germany thinks of them? Precisely in those circles where Nietzsche is most admired in Germany, centres of intellectual life surpassed by none in Europe, there Bernard Shaw and Oscar Wilde are intensely appreciated, not as imitators and disciples, but literary artists of the first rank.—I am, sir, etc.,

RALPH ALKER.

CONSIDERATIONS of space prevent us from inserting our summing-up of the discussion on the Land Question this week.

THE
ART TREASURES
of GREAT BRITAIN

A NEW MONTHLY SERIES EDITED BY C. H. COLLINS-BAKER.
 PRICE ONE SHILLING NET, MONTHLY.

J The publishers' aim in this new series is to bring before the eyes of art lovers the lesser known but no less wonderful art treasures which enrich private and public galleries throughout the kingdom. Various of our masterpieces have suffered innumerable reproductions; it is not the publishers' intention to include such works in any large proportion, but to restrict the scope of the series chiefly to the unpopularised productions.

1/-
 NET.

Each number will contain Four or Five Photogravure, One Colour, and One Monotone Reproductions of the Treasures of

PAINTING, DRAWING, SCULPTURE,
 POTTERY, CHINA, IVORIES,
 METAL WORK, Etc.

Size of Page,
 12 in. x
 9 in.

THE FIRST NUMBER CONTAINS:—

THE ADORATION OF THE KINGS.

The famous "Castle Howard Mabuse." By Jan Gossact Mabuse.

PORTRAIT OF THE PAINTER.

Known as "The Ilchester Rembrandt," and regarded as the most important of Rembrandt's many Self-portraits.

GROUP OF HORSEMEN.

From the Parthenon Frieze. From the Elgin Collection in the British Museum.

THE HON. MRS. GRAHAM.

A Gainsborough Masterpiece. In the National Gallery of Scotland.

OLD BATTERSEA BRIDGE.

A unique example of Whistler's work. From the Edmund Davis Collection.

THE ANNUNCIATION.

The wonderful Enamel Triptych of Nardon Penicaud in the Victoria and Albert Museum.

MADONNA AND THE CHILD.

An Ivory Statuette in the British Museum. A fine Specimen of excellent craftsmanship by a French Artist of the XIVth Century.

A full Prospectus with a reduced facsimile of a Photogravure will be gladly sent on receipt of a postcard.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

MY COURSE OF INSTRUCTION (by post) in the mail order trade teaches you how to make money; interesting particulars free.—NAPIER, "Avoca," Flamsteed, Dunstable.

SHORTHAND. A STUDENT'S EXPERIENCE: "I studied the old style of shorthand for four years and could only write eighty words per minute with a strain. I went in for three exams, and failed in all. The rules seemed to contradict one another. I then learnt Sloan-Duployan in 32 hours, and at the end of four weeks could write eighty words per minute. Since then my speed has increased by leaps and bounds."

From Mr. H. Beaumont, Garden City, Thurnscoe, Rotherham. SLOAN-DUPOYAN is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for interesting illustrated handbook, with specimen lesson, free.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

"ALL LITERARY MSS. must be Typewritten." We can do it under expert supervision Neatly, Cheaply, Accurately, and Quickly. Work can be sent out same day as received.—W. B. BRIDGES, 70, Rutland St., Leicester.

WHICH?—Bench, desk, or counter—long, hard, ill-paid toil? or the Platform—an hour's fascinating high-paid work? Simple, common-sense talk, NOT "Oratory," wanted. £3 to £4 weekly, evenings only, may be earned by studying "Public Speaking for Pay and Pleasure" (Special Section: "How to get Engagements"), 1s. post free.—MORGAN, Poulner, Ringwood.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

BOOKS FOR SPEAKERS.—"Speaking in Public" (showing how to prepare speeches and acquire fluency). By Charles Seymour, 2nd Ed., 3s. net (post 3s.). Also "Short Speeches for Social Occasions," 1s. net (post 1s.).—London: "The Speakers' Library," 8, Paternoster Row, and all Booksellers.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

REMAINDER BOOKS.—February Catalogue of Publishers' Reminders Now Ready. Gratis and Post Free.—WM. GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon.

TYPEWRITING intelligently executed; good paper; high references. 7d. per 1,000.—Mrs. Manners, 42, Delvino Road, Parson's Green, S.W.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH, ITALIAN, RUSSIAN, etc. Private and Class lessons and translation. Moderate terms. Prospectus free. Rosenhulm's Language Institute, 319, Oxford St., W.; 26, High Holborn, W.C.; 42, Lombard St., E.C.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws"; in a Nutshell, on Card. Teaches the new way to acquire Knowledge. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

THE PROGRESS SOCIETY links up lonely men and women everywhere into a social body; affording wider intellectual and material interests through its various circles. No membership fee. For descriptive booklet send stamp to the Secretary, E. M., 107, Greencroft Gardens, Hampstead, London.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121 3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 83, Goswell Road, E.C.

LADY LYTTTELTON'S LETTERS*

COWPER, whom Southey accounted "the best of English letter-writers," summed up the whole theory of familiar correspondence by saying that nothing was necessary but "to put pen to paper and go on." If by this is meant the power of being one's self, of being always real and always human, then assuredly Lady Lyttelton understood the art of letter-writing. To say that her letters are good literature, in the sense that Cowper's and Lamb's were, would be preposterous; but that she possessed a genuine gift for correspondence is revealed on every page of this delightful book. An uninterrupted flow of spontaneous, open-hearted utterance, the outcome of a sympathetic, affectionate, and tolerant nature, a sprightly fancy, a rare fund of humour, charm and grace of style—such are some of the qualities that mark the letters of Lady Lyttelton. And to these epistolary virtues ought to be added a gift of terse and felicitous characterisation and a narrative power of a high order.

Sarah Spencer lived in four reigns, two of them the longest in British history. She was born when George III. was nearing the middle of his reign, and Victoria had completed rather more than half of hers ere she died. The elder daughter of the second Earl Spencer, whom posterity remembers as an able coadjutor of Pitt and as the founder of the famous Althorp Library, Sarah Spencer belonged to a family as harmonious as it was distinguished. She had the benefit of a sound and liberal education, which in those days was not so common even among persons of her rank as it should have been, and she grew to be not only accomplished, but wondrously shrewd, observant, critical, and businesslike. Moreover, hers was a radiant nature, keenly sensitive to the joyousness of life, and eschewing everything gloomy or morose. She had a genius for friendship, and, as her letters testify, she kept it constantly in repair. Deeply interested in public affairs, and acquainted with most of the famous people of her time, her correspondence abounds in well-informed, sagacious, and instructive comment upon the leading events and personages of her long life—political, social, literary, and religious.

The letters in this volume begin with the year 1804, when Sarah Spencer was seventeen years old, and end with the year 1868. During the years preceding her marriage, in 1813, to Mr. (afterwards Lord) Lyttelton, most of her epistles were addressed to her second brother, Robert, who was a naval officer and the favourite of his sister Sarah. These contain many finely drawn pictures of old England when the wheel of existence turned slowly and there was time for the cultivation of those qualities which sweeten and intensify home life.

In 1813-14 Lady Lyttelton, with her husband, paid a lengthened visit to the Continent, and travelled over a large part of Russia and Sweden. Napoleon was then setting Europe in an uproar, and our correspondent was an eye-witness of more than one incident of the memorable drama. What she saw she depicted, with many a graphic touch, in a series of letters to her parents, and in a diary, part of which is reproduced.

In 1838, a year after her husband's death, Lady Lyttelton became Lady-in-Waiting to Queen Victoria, and four years later she was made governess to the royal children. She held that onerous position for nine years, and acquitted herself to the entire satisfaction of the Queen and Prince Albert. "Laddle" was the pet name given to her by the royal children, to whom she was greatly devoted, especially to the Princess Royal, who seemed to betoken much promise. The letters written during this period are by far the best in the book. Taken as a whole, they present a most intimate and attractive picture of Court life at the beginning of Victoria's reign, besides affording lively descriptions of many distinguished personages who had entré to the royal circle. Lady Lytton's admiration for the Queen and Prince Albert amounted almost to veneration, and she was constantly dilating upon the domestic happiness which prevailed at Windsor.

* "The Correspondence of Sarah Spencer, Lady Lyttelton, 1787-1870." Edited by her great-granddaughter, the Hon. Mrs. Hugh Wyndham. 15s. net. (Murray.)

"Her Majesty and the Prince are both very well. It was pretty to see him yesterday, after Mrs. Sly had vainly endeavoured to get on the Prince of Wales's glove, and thrown it aside at last as too small, just coax the child on to his own knee, and put it on, without a moment's delay, by his great dexterity and gentle manner; the Prince, quite evidently glad to be so helped, looking up very softly at his father's beautiful face. It was a picture of a nursery scene. I could not help saying: 'It is not every papa who would have the patience and kindness,' and got such a flashing look of gratitude from the Queen."

We have given only a very faint idea of these charming letters. To be fully enjoyed, they ought to be read in their entirety and in the order in which they were written. We conclude by remarking that a more engaging volume of correspondence has not been published for many a day. W. F. G.

MEN, WOMEN, AND MINXES*

A MELANCHOLY interest attaches to this volume, not by any means on account of its contents, which are lively and entertaining, but because of the prefatory note, which must have been, if not the last thing, one of the last to come from the versatile and genial pen of Mrs. Lang's husband. Mr. and Mrs. Lang chose the essays of this volume together, "and laughed over them together." And we can well imagine that the laughter would be hearty, for there is in these essays that vivacity, and wit, and allusiveness which Andrew Lang so keenly relished.

The sketches, which are reprinted from various magazines, cover a wide field—literary, social, and artistic. The portraits of the women preponderate, and their wide dissimilarity furnish much of the piquancy of the book. The contrast is striking between (for example) Madame de Genlis, that strange, volatile creature who convulsed the gay throng at Versailles by undertaking the education of the children of Philippe Egalité, and Miss Grant of Rothiemurchus, the stolid, outspoken, but sagacious Scots-woman who, although she found Scott's novels dull, had sufficient imagination to write the "Memoirs of a Highland Lady," which present a wonderfully vivid picture of the manners and customs of her time.

But the essay to which we first turned was that on "French and English Minxes." Instead of a running commentary on French and English minxes, as the title might lead one to expect, we have a lengthy analysis of "the most wholly satisfactory of all the minxes," Ariane de Montespan, in Gyp's "Le Cœur d'Ariane." Mrs. Lang, it is true, does furnish some comparative results, but they are too fragmentary to be of value. The true home of the minx, it is consoling to an English reader to learn, is France, where the conventional and artificial training of girls is well calculated to foster those qualities which go to make up this forbidding type of female character. But, "if an English minx is less depraved than a French one, she is undoubtedly far less clever, and much more

* "Men, Women, and Minxes." By Mrs. Andrew Lang. 7s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

FREE LESSONS IN ENGLISH

The Rev. J. C. Wilcox, M.A. (Camb.), has obtained a world-wide reputation by his "Simplified" system of teaching the supposedly difficult Hebrew language, which has gained the admiration of thousands of students and scholars. This method has now been successfully applied to the teaching of English. A thorough knowledge of this subject will be a great asset to anyone whose desire is to improve his position and take his place in the forefront of commercial, social and political life.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE.

The first four Lesson Papers, with full particulars of this scientific and simplified system of teaching English by correspondence, will be sent to you post free and without any obligation on your part.

The "WILCOX" System is Unique, Thorough and Tried.

Write now to the Secretary (Dept. 27),

THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY,
19/21, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

IN LATIN

Are you desirous of learning Latin? If so, write to the address below for particulars of "Latin Simplified," the easiest possible introduction to the Latin language. Perhaps you have little time to devote to such a subject. Then this is just the Course for you. Twenty minutes daily study by the "WILCOX" System will ensure success.

To master Latin is to obtain possession of a key which will unlock the treasures of at least four European languages. A knowledge of Latin will enable you to read the English classics with ease and pleasure. It will enable you to read such writers as Macaulay without the constant use of a dictionary.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE.

The first four Lessons will be forwarded to you free and without obligation, if you will write to-day to the Secretary.

The "WILCOX" System is Simple, Scientific and Pleasant.

Write now to the Secretary (Dept. 27),

THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY,
19/21, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

IN LOGIC

Are you logical? Of course you are. Everyone thinks he is, and most people think other people are not. But have you made a study of this "Science of Sciences"? Can you always express your thoughts with logical accuracy and penetrate through rhetorical artifices? Your own common sense helps you to do these things to a degree, but without a knowledge of Logic you are liable to be at the mercy of any plausible theorist.

If you wish to train your mental faculties, if you wish to have a clearer outlook in life, you would do well to master the Wilcox "Logic Simplified" Course. Logic is useful in every sphere of life, and to the public speaker it is indispensable. It is not an easy subject, studied from the usual text-books, but the "WILCOX" System makes it simple and interesting.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE.

Do not fail to write at once for particulars of this Course of study. The first four Lesson Papers will be sent to you free and without obligation.

The "WILCOX" Logic Course is Easy, Clear and Accurate.

Write now to the Secretary (Dept. 27),

THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY,
19/21, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

vulgar." We do not know that Mrs. Lang's judgment will be upheld when she names Isabella Thorpe ("Northanger Abbey") and Blanche Amory ("Pendennis") as the two typical English minxes. Becky Sharp, it is admitted, was an adventuress, but she was more bountifully endowed with the attributes of the minx than probably any other character in English fiction.

One of the best chapters in the book is that in which Mrs. Lang dilates very sensibly and with quite good humour upon the trials of the wife of a literary man. We do not know if the essay is to be regarded as a record of personal experience, but, at all events, we can well imagine that the lot of the wife of a man of letters is not to be envied, when the latter is dominated by one idea.

"Morning, noon, and night does he expatiate interminably upon the subject to which he is at that moment giving his attention. . . . Yet for months together—in fact, till one burning question is replaced by another—she must be content to have the topic recur at every meal. Perhaps she would like to speak of the matters which interest her, . . . but she is never given a chance, for men have a wonderful power of assuming that what interests them is bound to interest other people."

In "Rousseau's Ideal Household," Mrs. Lang offers some acute criticism of "Nouvelle Héloïse" and of "Emile," though on pages 161 and 162 she gives the wrong dates of their publication. Other notable papers are: "Morals and Manners in Richardson," a penetrating study of the author of "Clarissa Harlowe"; "Pitfalls for Collectors," an anecdotal account of the ingenious forgeries perpetrated upon connoisseurs; and "Poets as Landscape Painters."

ENGLAND, 1880-1898*

HISTORIANS of the older school were wont to lay undue stress on the fact that man is a rational animal; they credited him with a reasoning power which could dominate all impulses and prejudices; they argued that because he believed in such and such principles he would follow them to their logical conclusion; that because he knew such and such a course was to his advantage he would pursue it regardless of obstacles. This view of history and politics is now largely abandoned. We recognise that men are not rational beings; that habit, instinct, prejudice, and a score of other motives are continually interfering with the free exercise of his reasoning faculties; that our actions are seldom logical. We are glad to welcome a book on recent history which takes some cognisance of these facts. Mr. Gretton shows us, to take a trivial example, that Lord Rosebery lost, in 1894, his hold on the Liberal party, not because he had abandoned the traditions of the party, not because he had played traitor to the cause, but, forsooth! because his horse had won the Derby. Mr. Gretton emphasises then the human element in politics; he recognises that psychology and history are not separate sciences; and it is in the setting forth of the general state of feeling at a given epoch in the various strata of the national life that makes this volume so interesting and so valuable. He gives us the spirit of the year he is describing, the varied causes which brought it about, and its direct influence on the political events of the time. We feel that if we were transported to some year in the eighties, we should be able to join in their conversation, and to understand something of their point of view. In a word, Mr. Gretton makes us feel that the decades of which he writes are alive; that they are full of the same motives and impulses which move us now; that history is, as Freeman has said, only "past politics."

THE STORY OF THE RENAISSANCE*

THE literature dealing with the Renaissance is very extensive, but while many books treat of particular aspects of the subject and trace the influence of revived classicism in various countries, Mr. Hudson's is the first, so far as we are aware, which attempts a broad survey of the whole field in a condensed, popular, and readable form. The difficulties in the way of carrying out such an idea are very great, and it is no disparagement of Mr. Hudson to say that he has not wholly succeeded. Some doubt may be expressed as to whether the arrangement he has adopted is the most effective for his purpose. We think also that his sense of proportion has occasionally failed him. Furthermore, as we shall presently show, he is a trifle careless about his dates. But these defects are almost inseparable from a work of this character, and they are amply compensated for by substantial merits. The book is evidently the fruit of wide and varied reading, and it reveals withal a sound and charitable judgment, and an admirable literary gift. As a competent, comprehensive, and popular exposition of the Renaissance, Mr. Hudson's volume is not likely to have any rivals.

So many diverse views exist as to what is meant by the Renaissance that we are glad that Mr. Hudson has sought, in his opening chapter, to bring order out of chaos. It is not easy to hit upon a definition which will adequately describe so complex and many-sided a movement as the Renaissance, but Mr. Hudson probably divides us least when he says:—

"The Renaissance meant many things. But beneath them all, it meant a fundamental change in men's attitude towards themselves and the world. Through the mere shifting of their point of view, phases of life were revealed to them of which hitherto they had never dreamed, and, what is equally important, long familiar phases were brought before them under a totally fresh light. A new spirit was everywhere at work. Its transforming power was shown alike in politics and society, in science, philosophy, and religion, in literature and art."

Quite the strongest section of the book is the sketch of the revival of learning in Italy, Germany, France, and England. Mr. Hudson shows clearly and convincingly how the renewed interest in the long-lost masterpieces of Greece and Rome powerfully affected the growth of personality and of the critical spirit. Interesting, too, is the way in which he brings out the fundamental difference in spirit between the Renaissance in Italy and the Renaissance in Germany and England. In the case of the former, it was scholarly and æsthetic; in the latter, practical and religious. Mr. Hudson does not fail to deal with the much-discussed problem of Italy's moral and political corruption during the Renaissance. He combats the popular idea that the frightful depravity of the time was mainly due to the rebirth of classical learning, and argues with much force that the real causes behind Italian corruption were the social disorganisation which followed the perpetual internecine wars and the flagrant immorality of the Church. At the same time he frankly admits that classical enthusiasm cannot be wholly absolved.

Arising out of the mistaken view that neo-classicism and moral decadence were cause and effect is the

(Continued on page 544.)

* "A Modern History of the English People." Vol. I. By R. H. Gretton. 7s. 6d. (Grant Richards.)

* "The Story of the Renaissance." By William Henry Hudson. 5s. net. (Cassell.)

THE MOST WONDERFUL COURSE OF LESSONS IN THE WORLD.

How Over 200,000 Leaders Have Developed Increased Mental Power and Business Capacity.

100,000 FREE MAGAZINES FOR READERS.

Priceless information concerning "The 12 Most Wonderful Lessons in the World" is available for readers to-day, free of cost.

100,000 Specimen Copies of two remarkable new magazines, entitled Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency and Mind & Memory respectively, are to be distributed with a view to informing anxious-to-get-on men and women how they may fit themselves for Higher Positions and Higher Pay.

Men or women who aspire to Business, Professional or Social Success, without utilising the aid of the Mental Training afforded by the Pelman School of the Mind are neglecting the greatest assistance the modern world offers.

The Man Who Wins.

In the biggest Business houses, in the Professions, in the Ministry, in the Services, it is the Pelman-trained man who is rising to the top.

The Pelman System develops in your brain just those mental qualities which aid you to attain that supreme capacity which wins Success in any line of life.

It develops in your mind the linked and associated qualities of

- PERCEPTION
- MEMORY
- JUDGMENT
- IDEATION
- CONCENTRATION
- DETERMINATION
- ORGANISING POWER
- DIRECTIVE ABILITY
- COMPREHENSION
- COMPARISON
- DECISION
- INITIATIVE
- APPLICATION
- ENERGY
- DRIVING FORCE
- SELF-CONFIDENCE

After a course of Pelman Training you are able to do more than twice the work you did before in the same time, and to do it better, too, and with greater ease and interest.

You are also able to get more work out of those who are under your direction.

Readers are invited to write to-day for a copy of Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency and particulars of these 12 lessons.

Best-Paying Investment.

These will be sent, together with information showing how you can have this wonderful course for a small inclusive fee.

It will pay you over and over again in the increased income brought in by your increased skill and capacity.

The following are the titles of these 12 lessons:

- Lesson I.—The Three Elements of Success.
- Lesson II.—The Creation of Ambition.
- Lesson III.—Knowledge and the Senses.
- Lesson IV.—Observation as a Business Asset.
- Lesson V.—Attention, Concentration, and Interest.

Lesson VI.—Ideation; or, How to Originate Ideas.

Lesson VII.—Originality in Aims and Methods.

Lesson VIII.—The Influence of Mind on Mind.

Lesson IX.—A Business Man's Mind and Memory.

Lesson X.—Training the Mind for Study.

Lesson XI.—Auto-suggestion.

Lesson XII.—Will Power.

The Pelman System is essentially practical. You can at once put it to profitable use in your own particular occupation. Those who practise it find the income-earning powers of their minds steadily—and in many cases rapidly—increasing as a direct consequence.

Striking Personal Experiences.

Hundreds of Pelman Students have written to say that as the result of practising the Pelman lessons they have gained higher positions in life. A most striking collection of these letters will be forwarded you gratis and post free. You have only to follow the Pelman System to be able to record similar experiences for yourself.

The magazine entitled Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency is the most stimulating and ambition-arousing periodical ever published.

In its pages some of the world's greatest scientists and business men tell you how to train your mind for Success.

Inspiring articles deal with various aspects of Mental training, and show how you can develop in your mind just those qualities which are most useful to you.

Increases Your Earning Power.

Thus, if you are a barrister, you increase that power of rapid thinking, that quick eye for the weak spot in an opponent's case, that readiness to take instant advantage of the slightest opportunity, that "lawyer's memory" which remembers every detail of the case in hand, and that power of lucid and persuasive speech, all of which are necessary to forensic success.

Should you be a salesman, this system will make you a better salesman. It gives you that instant appreciation of a customer's wants and idiosyncrasies, and that power of persuading, pleasing, and convincing that enables you to sell more goods.

The clerk becomes a better clerk, so that he catches his employer's eye, and is selected for promotion out of many.

Start for Success To-day.

The minister, politician, lecturer, public speaker finds himself able to speak fluently and convincingly without notes.

Whatever your occupation or profession, your efficiency is wonderfully increased.

Don't get in a rut or groove. Don't get lost in the slough of Mediocrity, Little Power, and Small Salaries. Boldly face the summit and mount the hill of Success. Follow the path that over 200,000 Pelman Students have already trod, and you will gain your ambition. But now is the time to begin. Others are beginning now—don't let them get ahead of you. To-day you can obtain, free of all cost, postal or otherwise:—

1. Full particulars of the 12 "Most Wonderful Lessons in the World," and how you can learn them at a cost easily within your reach, and which will be returned to you in increased earning-power within a few weeks.

2. A copy of the new magazine, Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency, which every man or woman anxious to get on should read.

3. A copy of Mind & Memory, which tells you all about the simple "spare time" system which so greatly increases your mental efficiency.

Send coupon or post-card to-day to the Secretary, the Pelman School of the Mind, 52, Wenham House, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

By return you will receive this triple gift, gratis and post free, to enable you to increase your mental efficiency for Business or Social success and to realise your life's Ambition.

FREE TO READERS OF "EVERYMAN," 100,000 FREE MAGAZINES.

To the Secretary,

THE PELMAN SCHOOL OF THE MIND, 52, Wenham House, Bloomsbury St., London, W.C.

Kindly forward, gratis and post free, to the following address, as offered in this week's EVERYMAN.

1.—Full particulars of the 12 Most Wonderful Lessons in the World, with "Experiences" of men and women who have achieved success through their aid.

2.—Free Copy of the new magazine, Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency.

3.—Free Copy of the magazine, Mind & Memory.

The sending of this coupon involves no charge or obligation.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

equally erroneous notion that the Reformation was a reaction against the Renaissance. Here, again, Mr. Hudson is on unassailable ground when he says that the Reformation was the spiritual and moral side of the Renaissance, the intellectual aspect of which was principally connected with the revival of the classics of Greece and Rome. Mr. Hudson handles the problem of Erasmus' connection with the Reformation on moderate and sensible lines. The weakness of the position of the great Humanist must not be traced to pusillanimity, but to personality. A scholar to his finger-tips, Erasmus was temperamentally averse to contention and strife. He forgot, as Mr. Hudson points out, that conflict cannot be shirked when we get to close quarters with mighty evils.

On page 117 the amazing statement is made that by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685 "Richelieu practically annihilated Protestantism in France." Considering that that great Minister had been in his grave for forty-three years before this event occurred, we are at a loss to know what Mr. Hudson means. But this is only one of a number of misstatements. It was in Verona, and not in Florence, that Petrarch found a collection of Cicero's letters. In the city on the Arno he discovered a fragment of Quintilian. Perhaps this is what Mr. Hudson may have had in his mind. Reuchlin died in 1522, not in 1532; Colet in 1519, not in 1515; John XXII. in 1334, not 1324; Dolet was burned in 1546, not 1540. The English translation of Castiglione's "Cortigiano" was published in 1561, not 1586; Tasso's "Aminta" appeared in 1581, not 1573; and Guarini's "Il Pastor Fido" in 1585, not 1590. The Society of Jesus was founded in 1534, not 1540. Linacre did not found the London College of Physicians, but the Royal College of Physicians. We point out these errors, not in any carping spirit, but because they detract from the value of an otherwise excellent book.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

WE welcome a new and cheaper pocket edition of THE MUSEUMS AND RUINS OF ROME, by W. Amelung and H. Holtzinger (2 vols., Duckworth, 5s. net). The English edition of this work was revised by the authors, and edited by Mrs. S. Arthur Strong, and was first published in 1906. Since then it has come to be recognised as indispensable to English readers who are contemplating an artistic pilgrimage to Rome. The work is much more than a guide-book, for it is based on a theory of artistic development, and endeavours to lead the student to view each ruin and each statue not as so many isolated units, but as integral parts of a connected whole. The first volume, by W. Amelung, is a concise and authoritative survey of the most important works in the various collections of antiquities in Rome, whilst the second volume, by H. Holtzinger, aims at giving, on a topographical basis, a general appreciation, historical, architectural, and æsthetic, of the buildings of ancient Rome. The work contains 264 illustrations.

We are glad to welcome the second series of Wernër Laurie's delightful books on OLD ENGLISH TOWNS, by Elsie Lang (6s.). The present volume deals with as widely differing places as Liverpool, St. Albans, Tamworth, Ely, and a dozen more. The history of the town from earliest days is touched on, the reason for its foundation, its greatest townsmen, and leading points of interest are given; delightful illustrations, most of which are taken from drawings by Myra Hughes, add greatly to the charm of the book. The short sketch of Boston is one of the most interesting in the series. Few people realise that "the humble and primitive mother" of the great city in the United States is a little, and at the present a wholly unimportant, township at the mouth of the Lincolnshire Witham.

The author of BELGIUM, THE LAND OF ART, W. E. Griffis (Constable, 5s.), is an American. The book is written from an American standpoint, and for American readers. Thus the only comment on the present King of Belgium is that he, "besides having travelled in the United States, is a warm friend of America." Such statements are harmless, and, no doubt, interesting to Americans; but when, in an earlier paragraph, Mr. Griffis calls Leopold II. "a man of great public virtues," and merely qualifies it by saying that over his private life his friends prefer to draw a veil, we are tempted to wonder how far an author writing from Ithica, New York, can be expected to be cognisant of modern Belgian politics. Historically, however, the book is of some value. It deals with the history of the Fleming and Walloons, from the Roman dominion down to the present times, there is an interesting chapter on Ypres, Ghent, and Bruges in the middle ages, and the story of Charles the Bold is vividly set forth. The style, however, is at times very trying. Sentences, of which the following is a good example, "As in a favoured environment, the crystal becomes the purer and the larger gem, so behind the portcullis, the consummate white flower of pure womanhood, protected from violence, bloomed into fullness of beauty," leave us somewhat cold; but we must remember that the book was written for Americans.

The Crown Prince of Germany says, in the introduction to his own book, FROM MY HUNTING DAY BOOK (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), "I do not pretend to claim any literary merit for these plain, unadorned sketches. . . . They are just pages taken from the hunting diary of a man who loves open-air sport, and to whom nature, grand and beautiful, is an inexhaustible source of delight and joy." They tell of elephant hunts in Ceylon, of grouse-shooting in Scotland, of a famous tiger hunt in India, and the reader will not lay the book down till the last page is turned. Numerous illustrations from photographs add greatly to the interest of this delightful book.

Mr. Rider Haggard has travelled a long road since he wrote "King Solomon's Mines," and has wandered very far from the first promise of his genius. But now, after many days, he has recaptured the secret of his power, found again the wizard wand that created "She Who Must be Obeyed" and the invincible Umsloopagas. CHILD OF STORM (Cassell and Co., 6s.) takes us back to Zululand, where we meet our old friend, Allan Quatermain, with his faithful Kaffirs, and discover the greatest witch-doctor the author has yet sketched—Zikali the dwarf, "the Thing-that-should-never-have-been-born." There is a compelling attraction in Mr. Haggard at his best. You read without question, eagerly taking in the magic and the marvel of the story, never pausing to think as to probability of event or fidelity of characterisation. And the reason is not far to seek. The author writes in simple yet vigorous Anglo-Saxon. He is a master of a forcible yet restrained style, using words as a craftsman uses a chisel to carve out his meaning from

(Continued on page 546.)

Ryders new

Seed Catalogue Free

RYDERS P. P. SEEDS

Bring Real Success.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESSFUL GARDENING in a nutshell is, sow the right seed in the right way, at the right period. Every seed in every packet bearing the name RYDER is the right seed, and the cultural instructions given on every packet ensure the right period and method of sowing. SOW RYDERS and you are sure of success because they are the best seeds from the best strains it is possible to produce—each and every one healthy and fertile.

PENNY PACKET SEEDS

SEND AT ONCE FOR RYDERS 1913

FREE CATALOGUE.

Illustrated from actual photographs and two beautiful coloured plates from originals by the finest Floral Artist in Europe. Send your post-card to-day if you have not already received your copy of the catalogue.

No Agents.

“Imitated, but Unequaled.”

The Only Address

RYDER & SON LTD
 HOLYWELL HILL
 ST ALBANS

the rock. Allan Quatermain tells the story, an epic of war and beauty, vengeance and love. Mameena is an African Helen, a gorgeous, copper-coloured beauty, with the brains of a genius and the wiles of a Cleopatra. She plays one lover off against another, using them as steps to climb to power. The only man she loves, or thinks she loves, is Quatermain, who, though he loses his heart for a moment, safely preserves his head—a notable achievement in the troublous days of Panda, father of Cetewayo. In descriptive, the author achieves some very fine effects, and, for sheer word-painting, the picture of Zikali is difficult to surpass. Mameena, true to her name, carries trouble wherever she goes, and, having sent Prince Umbelazi to his death and arranged for the downfall of another lover, is finally condemned by an outraged society, and only escapes execution by suicide. But before she dies she claims Allan's promise that he will kiss her before all the people. "Slowly she lifted her languid arm and threw it about my neck; slowly she bent her red lips to mine and kissed me, once upon the mouth and once upon the forehead. But between those two kisses she did a thing so swiftly that my eyes could scarcely follow what she did. It seemed to me that she brushed her left hand across her lips and that I saw her throat rise as though she swallowed something." . . . A deep silence followed, a silence of awe and wonderment, till suddenly it was broken by a sound of dreadful laughter. It came from the lips of Zikali the ancient—"Zikali that should never have been born." Graphically sketched, full of swift touches of vivid colour and fine prose, CHILD OF STORM is one of Mr. Haggard's most notable productions.

§ § §

Mr. George Ryven, in a praiseworthy attempt to achieve originality of style, has fallen into a most cumbersome method of expression. "Can you call Shafton's, world-known long before the great Venetian princes, its marvellous influence met with again and again in our annals, even before Alfred's acknowledgment of their loan to him, short-lived?" Such sentences as these make only for the weariness of the flesh, and do not attempt further excursions through THE SHINING DOORS (Griffiths and Co., 6s.). The author has fallen back on the old transportive descriptions of female beauty, and explains that his heroine—by the bye, her name is Rona—"was loveliness made human." The plot is never ending, and includes secret missions, spies, and intrigues galore.

§ § §

BAYREUTH AND THE WAGNER THEATRE (T. Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d. net) contains some interesting notes on the necessity of Bayreuth "to protect Wagner from the desecration that his greatness and popularity bring upon him." The authors, Anna Bahr-Mildenburg and Hermann Bahr, contend that the performance of the operas under conditions of extravagant staging and rich scenic effects does not make for their understanding, and that only in the comparative simplicity of Bayreuth can the genius of the master be even faintly apprehended. Says Mr. Bahr: "The highest miracle of the drama is here attained. Some entirely lose themselves and only live in the light represented on the stage—all thoughts and feelings dominated for the time by the genius of the composer, who has created a new world for them. . . . Perhaps never since the time of the ancient Greeks has the preparation and purification of the soul of man for the receiving and adoption of a new will and new ideas been so clearly seen as here in Bayreuth." . . . The authors point out that the real reason of the intimate success of the Wagner opera in Bayreuth is that the whole dramatic caste, in common with the audience, feel and acknowledge the force appealing to their innermost feelings. Soaked in the Wagner traditions, the townsfolk make a unique audience, able to appreciate to the uttermost the influence of the master on the performers.

The book contains an interesting sketch of Frau Wagner. "Her movements had a spiritual grace about them, but, nevertheless, there was something in her unrelenting, decided, and strong willed, which was plainly written on the long, thin, pale features of this notable woman. Her hair, which was turning grey, was drawn back from a high forehead beneath which two incomparably kind eyes greeted me. I felt as if my very soul was laid bare before her, and was being read and estimated, and my entire will being taken possession of."

Free from technicality and translated into simple, easy English, the book is well worth reading.

§ § §

Mrs. Stanley Wrench has a flippant style that is sometimes fairly readable and in parts amusing. Her sentences, however, are badly in need of pruning; simple short statements spy out the poverty of the novelist's resource, however, while wordy paragraphs cover paucity of idea and drape inaccuracies of characterisation. THE COURT OF THE GENTILES (Mills and Boon, 6s.) is a story about writing women, and incidentally suggests other and more notable books. There are quite a number of pages devoted to love scenes in the desert, which the author somewhat naively tells us is called by the Arabs the Garden of Allah! The episodes, however, come a very long way after the remarkable novel of that name, and Rachel Challoner's confession in the Garden is both disappointing and unreal. She explains to her fiancé that certain things in her past stand between her and his love. Keyed up to the tiptoe of expectation, the reader learns with surprise that her fateful secret lies in the fact that she has used her friends and her admirers as "copy" for her books! Stephen, the lover, is puzzled at her remorse, and learns, somewhat regretfully, that she has destroyed her latest masterpiece because "he was in it!" There is also a dancer, Fatima by name, a traditional breaker of hearts, who, on the night of her début in London, is fatally stabbed by a dusky admirer. Altogether, the book is full of limelight situations and blood-curdling incidents, strung together on the thin thread of an outworn plot.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

TO BE COMPLETED IN TWELVE VOLUMES.
VOL. I. NOW ON SALE AND CAN BE SEEN AT ALL BOOKSELLERS'.

SCARCELY A YEAR GOES BY THAT DOES NOT SEE THE BIRTH OF YET ANOTHER ENCYCLOPÆDIA. THEY VARY IN WISDOM AND IN STATURE. SOME ARE CUMBERSOME AND OF SUCH BULK AS TO RENDER THEIR TRANSIT FROM BOOKSHELF TO READING TABLE A MATTER OF PHYSICAL EXERTION. OTHERS ARE LESS GUILTY IN THIS RESPECT, BUT, ALAS, EQUALLY CULPABLE IN OTHER DIRECTIONS. THERE ARE MANY MORE, TOO NUMEROUS TO MENTION, ALL DIFFERENT IN STYLE AND FORMAT, AND YET ALL SINGULARLY ALIKE IN THE FACT THAT THEY EACH FAIL TO BECOME THE IDEAL ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

NOW "EVERYMAN" SETS OUT TO AVOID THESE COMMON FAILINGS AND TO PLACE BEFORE THE PUBLIC A PRACTICAL, COMPREHENSIVE, AND ENTIRELY NEW ENCYCLOPÆDIA WHICH SHALL NEITHER SUFFER FROM INCLUSION OF SUPERFLUOUS MATTER OR EXCLUSION OF NECESSARY DETAIL. EACH VOLUME WILL CONTAIN MORE THAN 500,000 WORDS, MAKING THE NUMBER OF WORDS IN THE COMPLETE WORK OVER

CLOTH,
1/- NET.

6,000,000.

LEATHER,
2/- NET.

If your Bookseller is unable to hand you a copy of our 8-pp. Prospectus, please send us a postcard, we will gladly send you one, or more. If there is no Bookseller near you, we shall be pleased to send a copy of Vol. I. on receipt of a Postal Order for One Shilling and Threepence, including postage. You may return this specimen copy if it does not meet with your approval.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, LONDON, W.C.

Do you Waste Time in your Spare Time?

Have you "spare time" or "waste time"? In these days of keen competition for the very right to earn one's daily bread, this is an important question for all.

Perhaps you will say that you have a very little spare time each day, certainly not in long enough periods for it to be worth anything. Well, this little fact will show you what can be done in odd moments. One of the missionaries in India, in the early part of the last century, was a member of a religious community. During the time it took him daily to walk from his room to the dining hall for meals he first of all committed to memory the entire Psalter and the Gospel according to St. John, and then translated them both into

Hindi, his translation being to-day the standard version of those portions of the Scriptures. Working about six minutes daily, he completed a task which would satisfy many a scholar's life ambition. He was neither better nor more learned than his fellows, but he had no spare time. Every moment was of value.

"Dost thou love life?" wrote old Ben Franklin in his "Poor Richard." "Then do not squander time, for that is the stuff life is made of."

What do you do with your odd minutes? Do you use them to further your progress in life? Have you reached the highest post you are fit for? Have you exploited every one of your possible talents and made the most of them? If not, you are not getting the full value out of your life.

Can you use your unoccupied moments to rise to greater power and wealth? Certainly you can if you wish to. Naturally there are few callings which can be pursued at odd times without the use of special books, special appliances or suitable surroundings; but pen and pencil and paper are portable. If you find ideas for stories crowd into your head, jot them down, and when you get a little leisure elaborate these notes into short stories. Send one or two to some reliable teacher, and he will tell you if it is worth your while to be trained properly in journalism. Many of our most popular writers have commenced in this way.

JOURNALISM CAN BE TAUGHT.

The theory that "Journalists are born," and that training is quite a superfluity where talent exists, is now fully exploded. The greatest authorities—men like Mr. Justin McCarthy, Lord Northcliffe, Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., and many others have expressed their opinion that well-conducted training is of the utmost value to the aspiring Journalist.

There are two roads to success in every phase of life. One is the road of experience—a long, tedious and, more often than not, disheartening road—and the other, and by far the wiser course, is to take advantage of the experience of others.

THE PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE Course in FREE-LANCE JOURNALISM is personally conducted by a well-known Author and Journalist, and each student is personally trained by the Instructor, whose personality and wide and varied experience are in themselves a guarantee of thorough and efficient tuition.

SEND SPECIMEN MS. FOR FREE CRITICISM.

Readers of EVERYMAN are invited to send a short story, essay or article upon any subject, and this will be criticised by the Instructor and returned together with full particulars of the P.C.C. Course. The P.C.C. will not accept any student who is unlikely to profit by the training—hence the invitation to examine MSS. free of charge. Investigation is invited, and all interested readers should send at once full particulars to the Secretary,

PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
77, THANET HOUSE, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Our latest introduction. Special New Dry Cleaning Treatment for Dogs and Cats. See below. Every purchaser is presented FREE with Hinton's home treatment and cures for dogs and cats.

DRAPERY Dept. 154.

The Mail Order House (Dept. 154), Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

Send for Illustrations of our Catalogue telling of Butter Savers, Whistling Egg Poilers, Dazzle Plates, which clean 100 spoons and forks in one minute, Potato Peeling Machine, an Automatic Gas Ring which turns low when kettle is removed, and other interesting household labour lighteners.

DARN NO MORE

Stockings and Socks that Don't Want Mending. Read the following Guarantee which is given with every pair of Hosiery we sell:—

Wear your Hosiery as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO MONTHS of purchase we will REPLACE THEM FREE! ABSOLUTELY

Holeproof Socks and Stockings are of medium weight, shapely, well made and comfortable, with that incomparable sense of good fitting that is one of the many pleasant features of our Hosiery.

It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still no damage done to its fabric.

The comfort and pleasure of a good-wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business girls and busy housewives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefits incalculable. Price, Two Pairs of Gent's Socks, 2/6, post ad. Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings, 3/6, post ad. COLOURS stocked: Black, Navy, Champagne, Pearl Grey, and Light Blue.

SILK HOLEPROOF. Sold under same guarantee as above. Two Pairs of Gent's Socks, 7/6, post ad. Two Pairs of Ladies' Stockings, 10/6, post ad. COLOURS: Ladies—Champagne, Empire, Blue, Pearl Grey, Tan, Black; Men—Tan, Navy, Black, Pearl Grey. State Boot Size. Vaughan & Heather (Dept. 154), Brighton.

NO MORE COLD FEET.

1/- per pair postage id.

For Men, Women & Children.

SLIP ON A "SLIPON" AND KEEP WARM.

Cold feet, with all the attendant misery and pain, can now be a thing of the past! Do away with your ever by the advent of our new "Slipon" Under-Socks.

The new "Slipon" Under-Socks are made of beautifully warm, non-irritating woolly material. Warm heat to the skin. Your socks or stockings if worn over them. They create a glowing warmth. They also add enormously to the comfort of those who suffer from chilblains. Do not fill up the boot. Can be washed again and again. 1/- PER PAIR, post. id. extra. State boot size. P.O.'s only.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), BRIGHTON

POKE YOUR FINGER INTO THIS MANTLE AND IT WILL NOT BREAK.

You have heard of so-called strong Mantles, but never one like this. This one is flexible. That is, after it has been burnt off you can touch it, poke it, and instead of falling to pieces it resumes its shape, any amount of shaking the chandelier, heavy tramping overhead, draughty passages, etc., is "just nothing" to what our Flexible Mantle can stand. The light given by the V. & H. Flexible Mantle is of remarkable brilliancy. Cannot be broken by fair means. We claim that they will last ten times longer than ordinary mantles.

THIS MANTLE SHOULD LAST FOR YEARS. Try one on the most handy used burner you have at home, and you will soon see the difference. Two Mantles supplied for 1/6, postage and packing ad. State whether upright or inverted. The slight extra cost is saved over and over again, and you get a remarkable light in the bargain. Don't let good inventions pass you. Call or write to: VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), Queen's Road, BRIGHTON.

NO MORE CHILLY BEDROOMS OR ANY OTHER ROOMS.

Our Heat and Light Deflector is absolutely the very thing needed for this weather. It sends down all the heat from the gas to the lower part of the room (where it is needed), and entirely takes off that shivery feeling that is so unpleasant. It is very easy to fit on chimney of Gas Burner or Oil Lamp, and forms a splendid ceiling protector. Made of Aluminium, therefore white and light. Articles of this description are usually expensive. Note OUR price and just try one. REDUCED PRICE, 9d. each, postage ad. Postal Orders only.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), BRIGHTON.

DRY CLEAN YOUR DOG.

Thoroughly Clean your Dog without water by using this Powder. Just Sprinkle on Dog—Rub into Coat and Brush Out.

This is all you have to do to get your dog's coat and skin thoroughly cleansed; every smell and disease germ is destroyed, and your dog in his old age will not suffer from rheumatism, caused by too frequent water washing. So easy and simple to do that the animal can be washed twice as often, and is therefore much more healthy. It can be done ten minutes before it is going out without fear of catching cold. So easy that a child can clean its own pet.

Cats can be shampooed with this wonderful Dry Shampoo Powder. Perfectly harmless. Just try a tin, the price is 1s., post ad., which contains enough to dry shampoo an ordinary terrier six times; owing to popular demand, three times the quantity reduced to 2s., post ad. We send free with each order our hints and cures on Home Treatment and Cures.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, (Call or write), Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 18. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1913

One Penny.

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	549
The Problem of the Child—By Hector Macpherson	550
A British Hero—Captain Robert Falcon Scott	550
How to Improve Anglo-German Re- lations—By Prof. Eucken	551
More Facts Concerning Imprisonment —By Thomas Holmes	552
Day and Night in London—Poetry— By William A. Page	552
Mr. John Redmond: A Misunderstand- ing—By Prof. T. M. Kettle	553
Countries of the World—By the Editor —VI. The Argentine Republic	554
Rudolf Eucken—By E. Hermann	556
Portrait of Rudolf Eucken	557

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

RUDOLF EUCKEN

PROF. KETTLE

DR. W. P. PATERSON

RICHARD CURLE

CHARLES SAROLEA

Literary Notes	PAGE
558
Masterpiece of the Week—Maeter- linck's "Blue Bird"—By Florence G. Fidler	559
"G. K. C." as a Heretic—By Charles Sarolea	560
A High Churchman's Project of Unity By Prof. W. P. Paterson, D.D.	561
Silhouettes	562
The Putumayo Atrocities	563
Three Volumes by Strindberg	564
A Crust of Bread—A Short Story—By Henri Lavedan	565
Correspondence	567
The February Magazines	575
Books of the Week	577

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ON Monday afternoon the startling intelligence reached this country from New Zealand that Captain Scott, the leader of the British Antarctic Expedition, and the four other members of the Southern party had perished on their way back from the South Pole, which had been reached on January 18th, 1912, only thirty-five days after Captain Amundsen's arrival. Captain Scott, Dr. E. A. Wilson, chief scientist of the expedition, and Lieutenant H. R. Bowers, commissariat officer of the Southern party, died from exposure and want during a blizzard about March 29th last year, when 155 miles from the base at Cape Evans. Captain L. E. G. Oates died from exposure on March 17th, and Seaman Edgar Evans died from concussion of the brain on February 17th. The news of the disaster has caused profound sorrow throughout the civilised world.

Owing to the decision of the respective Governments to exclude newspaper correspondents from the seat of war, news from the Balkans is scanty and not very reliable. At the time of writing, all that we know is that the bombardment of Adrianople, which began on Tuesday week, is still proceeding vigorously; that the Bulgarians have defeated a Turkish force before the lines of Bulair, in the Gallipoli Peninsula, with heavy losses; and that the Montenegrins and Servians have captured several important points outside Scutari.

On Saturday the German Emperor delivered a speech full of religious fervour to the students of Friedrich Wilhelm University, Berlin. He claimed the facts of Prussian history as sure proofs of the governance of God, and called upon the whole of Germany's youth "to forge for itself that shield of faith, proved in the fire, which must never be lacking in the armoury of Germans and Prussians." Armed with such a weapon they could pursue their straight path, "eyes upraised, hearts upraised, trusting in God." With the words of Germany's first Chancellor, "We Germans fear God and nothing else in the world," the Emperor concluded a singularly impressive speech.

The House of Commons during the past week was mainly occupied with the final stages of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill and the Lords' amendments to the Temperance (Scotland) Bill. The former measure passed its third reading by a majority of 107. Its rejection was moved by Mr. Lyttelton, who maintained that the measure was conceived in a narrow spirit and without due regard to the report of the Royal Commission. Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. McKenna were the principal speakers on the Government side. The Chancellor combated the idea that Disestablishment would mean a decay of religion in Wales, and pointed to the Colonial Churches in support of his view. The discussion on the Temperance (Scotland) Bill ended in the rejection of the Lords' amendments by a substantial majority.

Two papers were read at a meeting of the Chemical Society of London foreshadowing another momentous scientific discovery. The papers, which were the joint work of Sir William Ramsay, Professor Norman Collie, and Mr. H. Patterson, described the results of experiments that either establish the transmutation of elements or announce the transformation of energy into matter.

The obituary of the week includes Sir Gordon Sprigg, ex-Premier of Cape Colony; Colonel J. M. McCalmont, M.P. for East Antrim and a prominent anti-Home Ruler; Mr. Bradley Martin, the American millionaire; and Sir George Reid, a distinguished portrait painter, formerly President of the Royal Scottish Academy.

THE PROBLEM OF THE CHILD

WITH the passing of the Education Act a great step forward was taken on the path of progress. Experience was not slow in revealing the fact that education does little for underfed children from miserable homes, where the elementary comforts of civilised life are absent. Out of this grew an inquiry into the environment of the children of the poor. The nutrition of the child depends on the wages of the parent. A medical officer of health examined children of thirteen years of age whose fathers earned wages ranging from 25s. to 12s. On an average, children whose fathers earned 25s. a week weighed 99.6 lbs. The other children's weight gradually and regularly dropped as their father's wages dropped, till from weighing 99.6 lbs. they fell to 84 lbs., 77 lbs., 76 lbs., and 74 lbs. when the father's wage stood at from 12s. to 14s. In the matter of physique, clothing is an important sever, and here, too, the children of the poor are London handicapped. The head master of an East London school states that out of 300 scholars in the very coldest days in winter ten to twelve are without boots; in the warmer weather thirty to forty; 25 per cent. are never supplied with boots; 50 per cent. on any wet day are found with useless boots. As regards clothing 50 per cent. in colder weather are inadequately clothed for warmth, and 10 per cent. inadequately clothed for cleanliness. How unfit those children are may be seen from an investigation which took place some years ago in one of the slum schools in Leeds. With the consent of the School Board, medical examination of the children was made. With the exception of about a dozen, the children were physically unfit. Bad teeth, spongy gums, defective sight, wisps of hair, skin spotted with a kind of scurvy, rickety, crooked limbs—these and other ills, we are told, characterised the majority. A large number of the children had not enough food to eat, and the little they got was of the wrong kind.

In the face of this state of things, is it surprising that School Boards are now adding to their educational function the task of feeding and clothing the children of the destitute poor? It is felt that children are a national asset of the highest possible value, and that, ethics apart, and from a purely utilitarian standpoint, it is good business to maintain our racial supremacy, upon which our industrial supremacy ultimately rests. But what of parental responsibility? Are we not almost unconsciously drifting towards the Socialistic state, when family life becomes a matter of public management? The ideal domestic circle is the home, the nursery of all the virtues. On the other hand, where in the slums of our villages, towns, and cities is there to be found anything approaching ideal home conditions? Before such conditions are possible the dwellings of the poor must be radically improved; in a word, poverty, with all its demoralising consequences, must be got rid of. The problem of the child, therefore, is closely related to another problem—that of the redistribution of the national wealth. The richest nation in the world, we have within our borders masses of poverty and destitution which are an ironical commentary upon our Christian civilisation. Thanks to the increasing sensitiveness of the public conscience, the glaring contradiction between our principles and our practice is stirring the hearts of all right-thinking people. Humanitarianism is abroad, and before the twentieth century is much older the problem of poverty will be grappled with in deadly earnest.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

A BRITISH HERO

CAPTAIN ROBERT FALCON SCOTT.

A TERRIBLE catastrophe has been added to the epic and romance of British history. An inspiring name has been added to the glorious roll of British mariners. There always have been matter-of-fact critics who, in the past, would question the uses of Polar exploration, and who would contend that the final results were not commensurate with the effort. If Captain Scott and his brave fellows had returned loaded with honours and with all the pomp and circumstance of victory, even then those practical men would not have been silenced or convinced. The sacrifice and death of the young explorer and his companions have done what no triumph could have achieved. They have revealed once more why a whole nation may be stirred more profoundly by the vision of the desolate ice-bound Antarctic plateau than by all the visions of Eldorado. They have revealed to the most obtuse mind the transcendent meaning of an eternal and apparently aimless quest. And dull indeed must he be of soul to whom this last episode in the history of exploration does not also reveal the deeper meaning of the only things that matter—love of country, love of home, sense of honour, self-surrender, loyalty to duty.

The catastrophe of the Scott expedition also teaches us a lesson much needed in our commercial age—that failure may be infinitely more valuable than triumph. Captain Scott, after all, did reach what he set out to achieve. Like Blake and Nelson, like Wolfe and Moore, he died in the hour of victory. But the discovery of the Pole counts as nothing as compared with the spiritual value of his deed, and as compared with the inspiration of his example and personality.

We know, on the explorer's own authority, the hardship, endurance, and courage of his companions which would have stirred the heart of every Englishman. However poignant may be our sense of the loss of such a tale, Captain Scott has left behind him in the record of his last days, a literary bequest which will impress itself more deeply on the memories of men than any previous written record of exploration. The brief and pregnant page in which Captain Scott narrates and explains the failure of his hopes, and where, in face of imminent death from exposure and starvation, he unites, in one supreme thought, the honour and love of his country and the love and care of the widows and children left behind, is as sure of immortality as any masterpiece which he might have written if he had survived to tell his tale. We certainly do not know in the vast literature of travel anything more moving in its pathos, more heroic and yet more human, more sublimely forgetful of self and yet more intimately personal. We know of nothing more notably characteristic of the British temperament in its subdued accent, in its restraint and reticence.

In the presence of this great event let us therefore, like Captain Scott, "bow to the will of Providence, determined still to do our best to the last": both humble and proud, humble worshippers of the hero and proud partakers of a common citizenship; both mourning and rejoicing; mourning an irreparable loss, but even more rejoicing that Great Britain still is, as she ever was, the mother of an heroic breed of men.

THE Editor has pleasure in announcing that he has arranged for a striking series of articles from Miss Margaret Hamilton, dealing with an important problem of modern industrialism, and entitled WOMEN AT WORK. The series will open in our next number with "The Shop Girl."

HOW TO IMPROVE ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS

* * *

BY PROF. EUCKEN

THERE can be no doubt that an improvement in the mutual relations between England and Germany is highly desirable. It is an utterly unnatural situation that these two great and capable nations, who have been, and can be, so much to each other, should find themselves in a condition of mutual irritation. This state of things can only be overcome if an earnest desire on both sides for a more friendly understanding not only exists in the minds of the people, but is put into effective practice.

I.

The main point is that the nations should learn to understand each other better, that each of them should be more able to put itself into the position and enter into the feelings of the other. The German must recognise that through Germany's increase in power, economic and political, in the last ten years a new situation has arisen, which is causing the Englishman much anxiety. He must also recognise that England must maintain her maritime security, her unassailability by sea, by every means; that this is a question of national self-preservation.

But, on the other hand, the Englishman should recognise that this growth of power on the part of Germany and the extension of her interests over the whole globe urges the necessity for building a large fleet, and that this in no way implies aggressive designs against England. The lack of a sufficient fleet has brought Germany into deplorable situations, even in the second half of the nineteenth century. In the war of 1864 Prussia and Austria together could not retain mastery of the sea against tiny Denmark, and in the Franco-Prussian War only the rapid victories of the German armies prevented German trade from being entirely paralysed by the French fleet. Such recollections being still fresh, is it to be wondered at if a universal longing for increase of power by sea penetrates the German people?

II.

If, in spite of goodwill on both sides, dissatisfaction still arises, a good deal of it is due to the Press, though, of course, only to a part of it. The newspapers are often not aware of the great responsibility which they possess; they throw out unfriendly—ay, hostile—remarks, with no evil intention perhaps, but which must necessarily wound those on the other side. At the same time, the mistake is often made of selecting unfriendly remarks from a paper without examining of what importance that paper is in the other country, and how far it represents public opinion there, and treating them as typical for the whole people. Thus the nations easily receive a completely distorted picture of the mood which prevails in the other country.

In these circumstances it is especially necessary to counteract this tendency energetically, to bring the Press to a better realisation of its responsibility, but also at the same time to practise more independence in our own judgment, and not take to ourselves every unkind remark and every exaggeration brought to us by any kind of paper. But there are not only misunderstandings to do away with; it is also necessary to put more positive value upon that which binds the great nations together and makes them valuable to one another. The English and German peoples, in particular, find themselves in the fortunate position of being different enough to be mutually able to proffer something new, and yet of resembling each other enough to be able to come to an intimate understanding and to feel with one another. We should mutually bring ourselves to a greater sense of what we have been to each other during the centuries, and of what we owe to one another. How strong, for example, has been England's influence on German culture since the beginning of the eighteenth century!—towards greater freedom not only in political and economic affairs, but also in philosophy and the whole conduct of life.

III.

English Empiricism gave the most fruitful stimulus to German thought, and the greatest German thinker (Kant) acknowledged that he was awakened from the slumber of dogmatism by a Scottish philosopher (Hume). And is it not worthy of remark that this thinker is descended, on the paternal side, from a Scottish family (Cant)? Further, with what joy have not German poets and musicians often acknowledged the consideration and encouragement which they have received from England, sometimes in greater measure than from their own country?

Goethe, the greatest German poet, often gave warm expression to his sympathy for the English character, and the fact that the greatest English poet, Shakespeare, is esteemed by the German people quite as much as if he were a poet of their own, that his "Hamlet" appeals to the German almost as much as Goethe's "Faust," is surely distinct evidence that a close relationship of thought and feeling binds the souls of the two peoples.

All this should be powerfully and clearly represented by tongue and pen. Literary effort can do much to bring about a better understanding between the two nations. If they learn to know each other sufficiently well they will mutually respect and value one another, and that is a sure way to the peaceful and friendly arrangement of all problems which the present time may bring. Much can also be done in this connection by an increasing development of personal relations, which the nature of present-day communication makes so easy. As many Englishmen as possible must go to Germany, and as many Germans to England, not in search of a momentary pleasure, but for thorough study of the nature and the institutions of the other people. That will be the surest protection against the hasty generalisation of isolated mistakes and blunders, and at the same time against all spiteful popular catchwords. It will be considered bad taste to disparage the other people in the mass. Every nation, like every man, has its failings, but where excellence is as predominant as in the case of the English and the Germans no failings should be allowed to obscure the picture as a whole.

IV.

The fact that England and Germany to-day have both to solve the same great problems particularly urges them towards friendly agreement and mutual interchange of ideas. We are thinking in this connection especially of the religious and social problems. Here, as there, in relation to religion, alterations are being energetically effected; old forms have been done away with, the new are but coming into existence. It is a time of seeking and striving.

The social problems show no less complication: the rising of the great mass of the people, the necessity for bringing their claims into agreement with the demands of the State and within the limitations of actual circumstances. There is a very great deal to be done in both directions, and both nations can learn much from each other: the Englishman from the more intellectual and systematic method of the German, the German from the more practical character of the Englishman, emphasising, as it does, independence of personality. It is of the greatest importance for the whole of mankind that both ways of thinking should mutually complete each other, and work together towards a common goal. The experiences of the one people could in this case become a direct gain to the other.

After all this, the conviction should rule in England and Germany that a hostile encounter, with its lasting enmity, seems simply impossible; it should be established beyond doubt that whatever complications may arise between the two nations, these should be settled by friendly agreement, or at least before a peaceful court of arbitration. Naturally, both nations have problems enough at home on which to exert all their strength. But each individual should consider it his duty to strive to the best of his ability that in this great question reason and justice may triumph over blind passion and confusion.

MORE FACTS CONCERNING IMPRISONMENT

By THOMAS HOLMES

MENTAL AND PHYSICAL DISEASE versus CRIME

FACT 1. No Industrial School will receive any boy under fourteen years who is criminally inclined, unless he can pass a medical examination and be declared sound in mind and body.

Fact 2. No Reformatory School will receive a boy under the age of sixteen years without a similar certificate. Further, if any boy, after his reception in either of these schools, reveals any mental or physical infirmity, he is discharged as "unfit for training."

Fact 3. No young offender, after conviction, is given Borstal treatment unless he is strong, healthy, and declared fit.

Fact 4. That a large proportion of the weaklings who have been denied reformatory treatment and training become prison habitués.

Fact 5. That a medical examination of thousands of youths who passed through Pentonville Prison proved that they were two inches less in height and fourteen lbs. less in weight than the industrial population of similar age; also that 28 per cent. of them suffered from physical disease, affliction, or deprivation, and that they furnished the highest proportion of reconviotions, no less than 40 per cent.

Fact 6. That a considerable number of prisoners are classified by the prison authorities as "unfit for prison discipline," about 400 fresh names being added to this list every year.

Fact 7. That the "unfit for prison discipline" spend the greater part of their lives in prison.

Fact 8. That in local prisons during the year ending March 31st, 1912, 156 prisoners were certified insane, and 522 others reported "weak-minded."

Fact 9. That in Parkhurst Convict Prison during the same year 100 prisoners, certified to be weak-minded, were undergoing sentences of penal servitude, twenty-eight being sentenced for crimes against the person, including seven murders and fifteen for arson. These prisoners shared 875 convictions amongst them, more than one-half receiving their first sentences before they were twenty years of age.

Fact 10. That in due course, except death intervenes, the whole of these prisoners will be free and at liberty to commit other crimes.

Fact 11. That epileptics are treated as criminals. During 1910 155 known epileptics suffered imprisonment.

Fact 12. That during 1910 253 prisoners were certified to be criminal lunatics and sent to asylums, making a total of 1,089 under detention, of whom 411 had been detained for more than ten years.

Fact 13. That the neglect by the State of criminally inclined youthful defectives entails disastrous consequences, and is largely responsible for the prisoners' progress, as indicated by the above facts.

DAY AND NIGHT IN LONDON

Every day in London—

From the opening of the morn,
Three hundred babes and twenty-five
They tell us now are born.

Every night in London—

At the closing of the day,
One hundred souls and ninety
Have passed from earth away.

Every day in London—

Amid its rapid strides,
One hundred of the fairer sex
Are now becoming brides.

Every night in London—

Sorrowing mothers weep,
While festive scenes oft trouble
The mighty city's sleep.

Every day in London—

Its council has to find
Four thousand pounds and upwards
For the poorest of mankind.

Every night in London—

On pictures, songs, and plays,
Thirty thousands pounds, it seems,
Are spent in all such ways.

Every day in London—

Thousands are seeking work,
And bravely trying hard to bear
Burdens they cannot shirk.

Every night in London—

Thousands are going back
To squalid homes and weary wives
Along life's fruitless track.

Every day in London—

The traffic is so great,
Four millions of the people now
Travel from morn 'til late.

Every night in London—

"The Curtain" seldom "falls,"
E'en though the darkness gathers
O'er the City of S. Paul's.

WILLIAM A. PAGE.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: A MISUNDERSTANDING

BY PROF. T. M. KETTLE

I.

In political geography, Ireland possesses this remarkable feature: it has no East. Everybody has heard of the Orange North, of the vowelled and insinuating South, of Celtic Connaught. But of the Eastern sea-board, the English know only the Shelbourne Hotel. And yet this strip of coast happens to have been the gate of invasion, and the focus of war in all our history. It also happens to have given to the political leadership of Ireland Mr. Redmond, and before him Parnell, and before him Grattan. There is in this a symbolism. Mr. Redmond is an Eastern Irishman. That is to say, he stands with all Ireland behind his back, and he looks England squarely in the face. His county is Wexford, which, of all Irish counties, is the most lethargic in speech, and the most energetic in action. It is renowned for tillage and taciturnity. It is what your writers would call "thoroughly English": so much so that its most recent, distinctive appearance in history was when in 1798 the torrent of Wexford pikes overwhelmed the red-coats as lava swallows up stubble.

These are what London journalists call the paradoxes of Ireland. In other words, they are the elementary laws of human nature.

II.

Mr. Redmond was educated at Clongowes, which then was and still is the Irish Eton, and at Trinity, which then was but no longer is the anti-Irish Oxford. He proceeded to the Bar, which then was but no longer is—for times and men are changing—the cemetery of national ideals. As an advocate he might have won the reputation and the rewards of his younger contemporary, Sir Edward Carson, and something more. That lucid mind and masterful presence must have carried him long since to the first place on the Bench, but there was a blot in his escutcheon. He was a Nationalist, and his youth was touched and made drunken by the magic of Parnell. He found his way from junior counsel's seat to Westminster via the dock and the prison, as was the custom of those days. And there, revisiting the place that he had known earlier as an official of the House, he discovered himself, his métier, and his destiny. During that rending civil war called the Split he was, as leader of the Parnell remnant of nine, to discover deeper wells of passion both in himself and in Ireland. The fire of it searched and annealed him.

III.

Of Mr. Redmond as the perfect Parliamentarian there is no need to say anything. As one who served under him, I limit myself to saying that he was an easy man to work with, to live with, and to reason with. When Mr. Dillon rose, with that white intellectual passion as of a Scotist or a Thomist in his face, you knew that you were going to hear either the best or the worst speech you had ever heard, but you did not know which. Mr. T. P. O'Connor was bound, under all his genius, to be just a little too liberal in his allowance of Hymettian honey; Mr. Devlin, under all his, to be just a little strident. Of Mr. William O'Brien you could prophesy that he would trip himself up and finally strangle himself in his own trailing periods; and you saw Mr. Healy rocketing into the inane on one of his own aimless fireworks. But of Mr. Redmond you knew that he would rise to the occasion, and, what is still more important, that he would not rant beyond it.

He nothing little said or mean
Upon each memorable scene."

In technique he belongs to the gradual school. It is the method of the Alpine avalanche in nature, and of Tolstoy in imaginative literature. Stroke follows stroke as flake follows flake. No one of them is in itself noticeable or memorable. But they accumulate, they gather momentum, finally they sweep you off your feet.

IV.

As befits one who, from his boyhood, has been a Shakespearean and a classicist—his best playing part at school is said to have been that of Brutus—he employs few words, and means them all. His official vocabulary is as limited as that of Sir Edward Grey. He has never coined a phrase, or imprisoned his mind in an epigram. One image, and only one, I remember. When we were condemning the Irish Council Bill as lacking organic integrity, the friends of that measure kept on telling us that half a loaf is better than no bread. Our case was that the Government of a people is a living unity, and that there can be no control of administration without control of legislation. Mr. Redmond gave us the mot juste, the clinching metaphor. "Half a loaf," he said, "is undoubtedly better than no bread, but is half a chronometer much better than no watch?"

He is scarcely ever humorous in business hours. Outside them, when he is shooting or fishing down at Aughavanagh, in Wicklow, or otherwise released, he rivals his brother "Willie," although it cannot be said that he excels that super-Shavian.

V.

Two points remain to be annotated—two points common to all the world—his past and his future. What he has been few Englishmen can understand. For more than thirty years this man has tramped through division lobbies, ridden on the wave of electoral triumph, and been drenched and menaced by it. He has known all pains that the immortal spirit must endure when it devotes itself to a political cause. Sitting below the gangway he has seen young man after young man, with not one tithe of his public genius, pass from obscurity to office. He ground his teeth, and remembered Ireland. Now at last the fruits of power stoop down to him, and beg to be gathered. What will he do with them?

Two things. First of all, he will heap coals of fire on the heads of the former enemies of Home Rule. He will encumber them with tolerance, and bury their bigotries under a tumulus of fair play. Next as to social policy? He passes for a Conservative, but I have never known a humane cause that did not carry his heart with it. We come nearest to his philosophy in certain verses of John Boyle O'Reilly, the Irish-American poet.

"Only from day to day
The life of a wise man runs.
What matter if seasons far away
Have glooms or have double suns?"

"Like a sawyer's work is life:
The present makes the flaw,
And the only field for strife
Is the inch before the saw."

From these lines you may construct the curve of his future development, and of that of Ireland.

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD * * * BY THE EDITOR VI.—THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC*

I.

A VAST plain of nearly a million square miles, extending north and south for more than two thousand miles, without hills and almost without undulation, without trees and almost without a pebble—a virgin country of inexhaustible fertility, which, without manure, gives abundant harvests, and which has already become one of the great wheat growing and meat producing centres of the planet—a land possessing splendid harbours and a wide stretch of coast on the open Atlantic, a land watered by magnificent rivers which form so many inland seas, a land blessed with a temperate, dry and healthy climate (Buenos Aires is Spanish for "Good Air"), a nation of seven million people, which before the end of the century may have increased to a hundred millions—such is the Argentine Republic.

It is true that against those inestimable advantages we must place the absence of coal, timber and stone, which will prove a serious obstacle to industrial development, and we must also place the twofold plagues of withering droughts and devastating locusts. The evil effects of the drought may be minimised by irrigation, and by a greater variety of cultivation. The locust invasion only occurs on an average every seven years, but when it does occur it spreads destruction and desolation throughout the country.

II.

All that is wanted to develop the resources of the Argentine are capital and labour. Northern Europe—and mainly Great Britain—has provided the capital. Southern Europe—mainly Spain and Italy—has provided the labour. The Old World has been slow in recognising the unbounded possibilities of the country. The long sea voyage, which used to take a month, and which has now been shortened to fifteen days, an invidious reputation for bad government, for political corruption and anarchy, and especially periodical bankruptcy, all combined to frighten away intending immigrants. About 1882 the Government settled down; the Argentinians finally discovered that honesty is the best policy, and determined scrupulously to pay their debts, and from that day the tide of immigration set in the direction of Buenos Aires. Interrupted during the early nineties by a severe financial crisis, immigration assumed tremendous proportions in the last years of the nineteenth and in the opening years of the twentieth century, and we may confidently prophesy that it will still further increase in geometrical ratio, as the United States and Australia are closing their gates.

III.

Compared with the United States, the Argentine population is remarkably homogeneous. Ninety per cent. of the people are of pure Latin race: the Germans and the English form an infinitesimal minority. There is only a remnant of thirty thousand aboriginal natives, and there are no negroes.

But although there are no negroes, and although the homogeneity of the Latin races makes assimilation

* Amongst many good recent books on the Argentine and South America, I would specially recommend (1) Martínez and Lewandowski, "The Argentine in the Twentieth Century" (Fisher Unwin, 12s. 6d. net); (2) García-Calderón, "Latin America" (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d.); (3) Clemenceau, "South America of To-day" (Fisher Unwin, 12s. 6d. net); (4) James Bryce, "South America" (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net); (5) Koebel, "Modern Argentine."

much easier, Argentinian immigration has its own special difficulties. In the first place, there are many undesirable elements amongst the Italians and the Spaniards. Underfed Neapolitan paupers and Sicilian anarchists are not the best foundation for a future Argentinian Commonwealth. And, in the second place, immigration in the Argentine Republic presents a curious and almost unique phenomenon. Immigration is a seasonal flow and ebb. The influx at the beginning of the year is followed by the ebb of emigration at the end.

The unsuccessful immigrant remains to fill the slums, and to increase the congestion of the great cities. Already the population of Buenos Aires has increased to one million and a half, and forms more than one-fifth of the total population. On the other hand, the successful immigrant returns to Andalusia and Sicily with his savings, and thus withdraws from the Argentine both capital and labour—a disastrous drain for a new country.

IV.

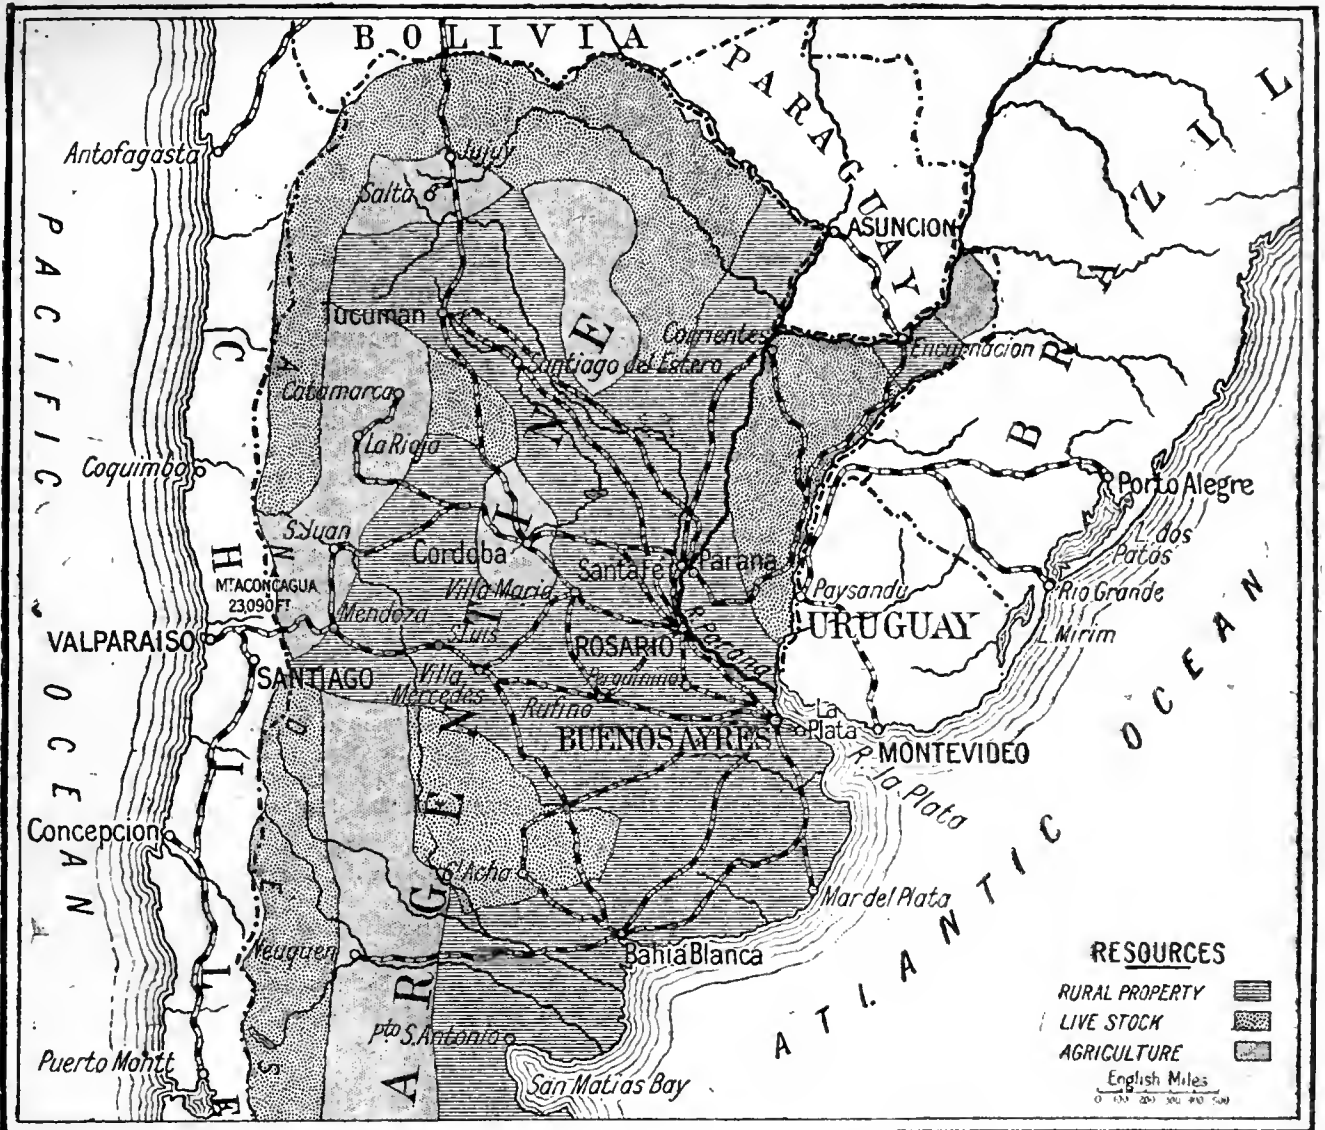

The abnormal fluctuations of immigration, the congestion of the cities compel us to face at the very outset the whole problem of Argentinian civilisation. Most writers on the Argentine profess unbounded optimism, and burst out in raptures about the expansion of the Southern Republic. That the Argentine Republic is rapidly progressing is an obvious fact, but is it progressing in the right direction? Is the progress normal and healthy? Are the people really becoming civilised?

If civilisation only means material development, increase of capital, elevators, improved machinery, splendid buildings, then certainly Argentinian civilisation is advancing by leaps and bounds. Whereas, twenty-five years ago, the country had to import its flour, to-day fifty million acres out of two hundred and fifty millions are cultivated. The annual value of the harvest exceeds a hundred millions sterling. The country is covered with a close network of 25,000 miles of railways. Artificial harbours have been built at enormous expense. The Argentine has become, indeed, the New Atlantis of the statistician and of the Manchester economist.

V.

On the other hand, if civilisation means lofty civic ideals, a high standard of morality, of education and religion, then the Argentine is still in a state of semi-barbarism. Some pessimists might even urge that the fruit of Argentinian culture is rotten before it is ripe. It is true that there are no religious difficulties, but that is because there is little religion left to quarrel about! It is true that there is no political strife, but that is only because there is no political life. It is true that there are giant papers, like the Prensa of Buenos Aires, which is housed in a palatial building, but the Prensa does not represent public opinion, for there is no public opinion. Government is largely personal. Parliament counts for little. Elections are manipulated by the party in power.

And as there is little civic life, there is little artistic activity. Whatever literature there is, is imported from France, in the form of questionable Parisian novels. Buenos Aires, with its population of a million and a half, is no centre of culture. It is essentially a Metropolis of Business and a City of Pleasure. Every hour which is spared from the scramble for wealth is given to gambling—betting and racing are the favourite national amusements. The Argentine is not a democracy, it is not an aristocracy, it is a plutocracy!

"GEOGRAPHIA," LTD., 33, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

I admit that the Argentinian is a great patriot, and that is a healthy sign, but his patriotism tends to be of the jingo kind, bluffing and boasting, bragging and blustering. The Argentinian jingo is already basking in the vision of a glorious future, when the Southern Republic will have become a mighty Empire. And in anticipation of that future—although the Government cannot afford to build schools, and although batches of boys in Buenos Aires can only attend classes alternately in the morning and the afternoon, for lack of accommodation, yet the jingo politician is already spending millions a year on armaments and Dreadnoughts to defend that problematic future mighty Empire against future imaginary enemies.

VI.

It may be objected that it is unfair to judge Argentinian civilisation either by a materialistic criterion or by the criterion of the idealist, and that it is much safer to take the common-sense Benthamite criterion of the greatest happiness of the greatest number. Unfortunately, if we are to accept that good old Radical test, our judgment of the Argentine Republic will be even less favourable. The Argentine has solved the problem of the production of wealth, but she has not solved the problem of the distribution of wealth. The Argentine politicians have shown a recklessness and lack of forethought almost without a parallel in history. If forty years ago the Argentine Government had leased or distributed those public lands to desirable settlers in moderate allotments, on the principle of the American Homestead Act, the Argentine would to-day be a model agricultural community. Instead of so simple and obvious a policy, the corrupt Argentine politician has distributed sixty millions of acres of the best soil to an insignificant number of speculators, and, what was even more criminal, he put endless difficulties and formalities in the way of the small settler, with the result that to-day, in the richest agricultural country of the world, there exists no peasant class, but there only exist, on the one hand, a few landed magnates, each with hundreds of thousands of acres, and, on the other hand, a proletariat of farm labourers. Is it to be wondered at that already in this new country anarchism is rampant, that two years ago bombs were thrown in the opera house of Buenos Aires, and that the metropolis was declared in a state of siege?

To any reader who wants to realise the evils of irresponsible individualism, to anyone who would realise the vital importance of a sound land policy, the Argentine must be an ever memorable object-lesson. With a rational land system the Argentine would have been a peasants' paradise; with a bad land policy it threatens to become a country of wasted opportunities!

RUDOLF EUCKEN

By E. HERMANN

THOSE who know Professor Eucken only through reading his books are apt to form an entirely wrong impression of the great thinker's personality. Some imagine him to be a conventional German "Gelehrter"—one of those desiccated creatures who view the world from behind the narrow rampart of their professorial desks, and are roused to animation only when the occupant of some other desk attacks their pet theory. Others, again, picture him as a sentimental German "schöne Seele" of wide but watery culture who has somehow strayed into the realm of philosophy. In truth, he is as remote from the one as from the other. He is a man of the North, closer akin to the Anglo-Saxon than to the Middle or to the South German type. If his calm and finely developed brow and his gentle manner suggest the peaceful thinker, a glint of his blue eyes reveals an ancestry that lived cheek by jowl with nature and did grim business in great waters. "Wir leiden an Gelehrsamkeit" ("We suffer from erudition") is a characteristic mot of his, and there is a certain plein air quality about him—something of the breadth and freedom of the open sky—which, one suspects, has a less than soothing effect upon the muck-raking petits maîtres of index-learning who are so large a factor in German academic life. And if his philosophical temper and outlook are anything rather than typically German, his political convictions—taking the term in its broad, non-party signification—are still less so.

I.

As a teacher, Eucken has the rare gift of evoking in his students a sense of the deepest personal obligation. It is now about thirty-nine years since he became professor at Jena, and it is not too much to say that of the thousands of students who came from the ends of the earth to hear him, few went away without being more deeply touched to vital issues. Men seem to find it well-nigh impossible to expose themselves honestly to the impact of this teacher's personality and remain altogether unchanged. The award to Eucken of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1908 gave a powerful impulse to the translation of his books into many languages, including Japanese; and since then his lecture-room has taken on a truly cosmopolitan character. Briton and Japanese, Servian and Icelandic, Australian and Swede, and men of almost every civilised country jostle each other in the passages, sit side by side taking notes, gather in groups to discuss the secret of his influence, to find out, if possible, wherein the strength of this gentle and unassuming Samson lieth. And his influence is by no means confined to academic students; the humblest soul in search of mental and spiritual anchorage amid the seething cross-currents of bewildering thought evokes his most sincere and sympathetic interest. Of the snobbery of the schools he knows nothing. "The emergence into new life of the humblest soul," he once said to the present writer, "is more to me than the birth and discovery of a thousand new worlds." His way with souls en route is a delight to witness. Perhaps it is a thoughtful "man in the street" who approaches him, halting and awkward through consciousness of ignorance and cramping disability. "Now just let me tell you all about this," the genial teacher will begin, using the German word "erzählen," with its happy suggestion of homely fireside talk. And then, in forceful, direct, refreshingly unacademic language, his very look betokening unfeigned joy in his task, he will seek to bring the bewildered spirit into serious and intimate adjustment with the great realities.

II.

The genuine catholicity of Eucken's sympathies has won him the affection and confidence of men of the most widely varying convictions. A Protestant by ancestry, training, and temperament, he has many friends in the Roman Church, and has been invited to lecture at Rome. For the Catholic Church in Germany he has a word of high praise, contending that, there at any rate, she has stood for the equality of man and paid no slavish homage to wealth and influence. Yet a Protestant he remains to the backbone, and confesses that he finds it easier to converse with a non-German than with a South German Catholic, whose traditions and interests differ so utterly from his own. His relations with members of the Greek Orthodox Church are no less happy, and one of his most interesting connections is his correspondence with a member of the Greek Patriarchate at Constantinople. His relations with English-speaking students have been particularly happy, and he much enjoyed his visit to England in the spring of 1911, while his present visit to the United States has revealed his power of influence over pragmatic thinkers impatient of the jargon of the schools.

III.

And what is this wonderful philosophy of life which people talk about? Not a few tell us that there is really nothing new in it, and one has heard of a poor Methodist woman who, on having the fundamental principles of Eucken's philosophy explained to her by an enthusiast, exclaimed, "Why, I learnt all that long ago in class-meeting!" But while Eucken's philosophy may be described as a vitalistic rehandling of classical concepts, a matter of emphasis as much as of discovery, "a new culture rather than a new category," yet his originality asserts itself at every point, and he will stand out in the history of thought as the protagonist of a new Idealism.

IV.

Eucken entered the arena at a critical moment. Naturalism and Intellectualism alike were breaking down, and men everywhere began to feel themselves bankrupt of a true interpretation of life, and sought desperate alliances with the Pessimism of Schopenhauer and the Subjective Emotionalism of Nietzsche. He re-emphasised the spiritual significance of man, but, unlike the intellectualist, he did not leave the spiritual suspended in vacuo. Man represents the spiritual in nature; he marks the emergence of a new field of reality in the development of the world. For Eucken a philosophy of life does not mean a philosophy that follows life and seeks to explain it, but one which is part of life and must therefore first of all be itself lived. Life is not a debating society, but a battlefield on which nature and spirit are at desperate grips over the soul of man. Philosophy is not an excogitation; it is a pilgrim's progress, a holy war, a wager, a venture. Pascal is right when he says that man must wager, must venture; for he who refuses to wager, wagers all the same, and he who refuses to choose has thereby already chosen. Small wonder that a teacher whose philosophy offers, not the pro and contra of theoretical reason, but the "Either-Or" of vital choice, should speak the revealing word to thousands in a generation athirst for reality.

RUDOLF EUCKEN, NATUS 1846

LITERARY NOTES

MESSRS. WILLIAMS AND NORGATE make the welcome announcement that next week they will publish an additional ten volumes of the "Home University Library." When this venture was started I was a little sceptical regarding its success, being strongly of opinion that specialists are the last persons to whom one ought to apply for popular expositions. The experts, I was wont to say, are so full of their subject that they lose all sense of proportion, and, what is worse, are usually incapable of broadly generalising their knowledge and presenting it in an appetising form to "the plain man." This view I have not relinquished, but certainly it has been greatly modified by the uniform excellence of the volumes of the Home University Library, the writers of which are, without exception, specialists.

* * * * *

But perhaps I should attribute the success of the Home University Library to the extraordinary good fortune of the editors in enlisting the services of the right men, rather than to any flaw in my argument that experts are usually bad popularisers of knowledge. Anyhow, as one who has a pretty wide acquaintance with the fifty odd volumes of this series already published, I venture to say that never before have the salient features of the most important fields of human knowledge been brought before the average reader with such compactness, lucidity, and charm of presentation.

* * * * *

The new volumes of the Home University Library promise to be as attractive as their predecessors. One of the three editors, Mr. Herbert Fisher, writes on Napoleon, a subject of which he is one of the first masters. Another addition to the Historical section is "The Navy and Sea Power," by the well-known naval writer, Mr. David Hannay. "The Newspaper," by Mr. G. B. Dibblee, claims to be the first full account, from the inside, of British newspaper organisation as it exists to-day. Science will be represented by a volume on "Chemistry" by Professor Meldola; also one on "The Origin and Nature of Life" from the pen of Professor Moore, of Liverpool.

* * * * *

Three notable additions will be made to the Literature section. Mr. John Bailey, who, if I mistake not, is the writer of many of the brilliant leading articles in the "Times Literary Supplement," contributes a volume on "Dr. Johnson and his Circle"; Mr. G. K. Chesterton, in "The Victorian Age in Literature," passes under review most of the prominent figures of the time, from Macaulay and Newman to Mr. Shaw and Mr. Wells; and Professor J. G. Robertson deals with "The Literature of Germany," a subject about which he has already given us an able book. The remaining volumes are by Professor Estlin Carpenter, whose subject is "Comparative Religion," and Sir Frederick Wedmore, who discusses "Painters and Painting," mainly in relation to the French and British schools of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

* * * * *

Jane Austen, whose novels all admire but comparatively few read, has probably been more written about than any other British lady novelist, with the exception of Charlotte Brontë. I could name nearly a dozen volumes about her, some of them excellent in their way, notably Goldwin Smith's monograph; Miss Constance Hill's "Jane Austen, her Homes and her Friends"; and Miss Mitton's "Jane Austen and her Times." But the fact remains that we have never had a satisfactory biography. The memoir published by Jane Austen's nephew, the Rev. J. E. Austen Leigh, in 1869, though it filled a gap, could not be regarded as a final appraisal of the novelist's life and work. In 1884 Lord Brabourne edited a selection of Jane Austen's letters, mainly addressed to her sister Cassandra, but these did not throw much light upon the writer's character. Now comes the announcement of what promises to be the definitive "Life." The writers are two members of the novelist's family, Mr. W. Austen Leigh and Mr. R. Austen Leigh, and their work, which Messrs. Smith, Elder will publish during the spring, is based on the memoir and the letters edited by Lord Brabourne mentioned above, supplemented by other family documents, some of them hitherto unpublished.

* * * * *

The fruits of Mr. William Watson's poetic genius ripen slowly. No one would ever dream of describing him as a facile versifier. But when he breaks silence his admirers expect what Mr. Darrell Figgis has called "a rare repast of grandeur," and seldom are they disappointed. Another of these delectable periods appears to be approaching, for Mr. Herbert Jenkins announces that he will publish shortly a new volume of Mr. Watson's poems, to be entitled "The Muse in Exile." It will be prefaced by a prose essay on "The Poet's Place in the Scheme of Life."

* * * * *

Hearty congratulations to Messrs. Jack on the issue of the fifth dozen volumes of their People's Books. They are slighter in form than the volumes in the Home University Library, and naturally, being half the price; but along their own lines they are wonderful value. As I write I have in mind one particular volume of the People's Books to which I am constantly referring. No other work with which I am acquainted presents so admirable a summary of the leading facts of the subject.

* * * * *

I am glad to learn that Messrs. Routledge and Kegan Paul are about to issue a new edition of Dr. E. A. Baker's "A Descriptive Guide to the Best Fiction: British and American." This most useful work, which was first published in 1903, aims at furnishing "a fairly complete list of the best prose fiction in English," each book being accompanied by a brief descriptive note which tells the reader just what he wants to know. The work has been brought down to date and enlarged by the incorporation of a large number of novels of all periods. No other work, so far as I am aware, covers exactly the same ground, though Mr. Jonathan Nield's book, now in its fourth edition, forms an excellent guide to the best historical novels and tales.

* * * * *

A long list of books is announced by Messrs. Constable for publication in the spring. Mr. Hilaire Belloc is represented by "The Staines Street," which will contain an introductory chapter on the Roman road in Britain, and Mr. Charles Whibley by a volume of biographical essays. A fresh instalment of "Emerson's Journals" (Vols. VII. and VIII.), covering the period of Emerson's visit to England and Scotland, will no doubt be warmly welcomed. The same firm is also to publish a brief monograph on W. E. Henley from the pen of Mr. L. Cope Cornford, who wrote the Stevenson volume for Messrs. Blackwood's Modern English Writers Series.

X. Y. Z.

MASTERPIECE OF THE WEEK

MAETERLINCK'S "BLUE BIRD"

M. CAMILLE MAUCLAIR, at a very early period of Maeterlinck's literary career, drew attention to the peculiar duality of mind of the Belgian writer, which enables him to create simultaneously a concrete form complete in itself, and a web of symbolism, subject matter for deep thought. Thus he appeals to a double audience; and while the "Blue Bird" play completely satisfies the children for whom it is written and the superficial adult intellect which never seeks to investigate beyond the obvious, it offers at the same time material for abstract speculation which invites the interest of the more thoughtful.

I.

We have been told again and again that the Blue Bird is the symbol of Happiness, and the programme of the Haymarket production tells us that "the Blue Bird, inhabitant of the pays bleu, the fabulous blue country of our dreams, is an ancient symbol in the folk-lore of Lorraine, and stands for Happiness." Now, the play was avowedly written for children, and it is entirely suitable that this explanation should be given them, for it is only children who understand the meaning of happiness; children, and those few who retain the simple souls of children. To the rest of us it exists merely as the necessary but unfamiliar contrary of unhappiness. Assuredly Maeterlinck, with his unique dual nature, has provided this superficial interpretation for the children, and at the same time has offered us a beautiful example of the symbolic mysticism by which he leads us to search for that hidden meaning of things which is just outside the obvious. Few writers have been so consistent in this. Always it is the mystery lying immediately out of sight to which he lures us by his compelling simplicity, the element only just beyond our reach which he indicates by his wonderful symbolism. We will accept the statement, therefore, that the Blue Bird represents Happiness, and at the same time look for a deeper meaning.

II.

Tyltyl's final words are, "We need him for our happiness, later on"; and the Oak describes the Blue Bird as "the great secret of things and of happiness." The Blue Bird, therefore, is something that is needed in order that we shall be led towards that perfection of the ideal of life which, for want of a better term, we call "happiness." Not once is it stated that the Blue Bird is intended to represent happiness itself; there is distinct evidence that it is intended to represent something that is far better.

In the first scene we find the two children, not miserable and unhappy, but as joyful and content as children well can be. They have loving, kind parents, a happy home, and they are so unselfish that they do not even grudge the rich children their party and cakes. Mytyl and Tyltyl are not really happier in the last act than in the first; they are only more conscious of it, for during their travels they have been introduced to the Happinesses of the Home. The Bird was in the cottage all the time. What they lacked was the key to the situation, and that key is Knowledge. Tyltyl grumbles, "It is darker here and smaller, and there are no cakes"; and the Fairy replies, "It's exactly the same, only you can't see," and sends the children on the journey of life, to find the Blue Bird of true knowledge, in order that they may learn to "see."

III.

The germ of the theory that the Blue Bird represents Knowledge is to be found in Night's speech: "I cannot understand Man these last few years. What is he aiming at? Must he absolutely know everything?" Night personifies the darkness of ignorance and prejudice, which has for so long hidden the true way. She complains bitterly of the advance of human learning, which has already captured her Mysteries, frightened her Terrors, bored her Ghosts, and made her Sicknesses ill—"the doctors are so unkind to them." Only the Wars remain, "more terrible and powerful than ever," for we have yet to learn how to settle our quarrels without killing each other; but, "fortunately, they are rather heavy and slow moving." The Cat, Night's Aide-de-Camp, describes the unfortunate situation in the Fairy's Palace. "Listen to me! All of us here present—Animals, Things, and Elements—possess a soul which Man does not yet know. That is why we retain a remnant of our independence; but if he finds the Blue Bird, he will know all, he will see all, and we shall be completely at his mercy."

IV.

The first blue bird that Tyltyl found was at his Grandfather's cottage in the Land of Memory; but he had barely time to re-cross the threshold before he discovered that it had turned black. Is it that the bird of knowledge that was blue in our grandparents' time of limited enlightenment turns black by the light of modern research? Or is it that Death opens the door of that Land, which is the only place where the longed-for Blue Bird can live?

In the Forest Scene the Oak has a blue bird, the knowledge of Nature's secret, on his shoulder; but the children cannot obtain it. For the Animals and Trees hate and fear Man. They remember that as Man's knowledge has increased, so has his mastery over themselves. If he should obtain the Blue Bird of all Knowledge, then would their servitude be made "still harder." So, as the Cat explains in his telephonic conversation at the beginning of the scene, "there is no room for hesitation . . . he must be done away with."

The Blue Bird is not to be found in the Palace of Happiness. Happiness, obviously then, can exist without him. The Luxuries, naturally enough, "have a poor opinion of him"; and the two Great Happinesses, the Great Joy of Being Just and the Joy of Understanding, who ought to know all about the Blue Bird, if anyone does, have to confess, "We are very happy, but we cannot see beyond ourselves." This act (which is a subsequent addition to the work in its original form) sheds great light on the symbolism of the play as a whole, and particularly on two important points. It has made quite clear that Light has known from the first the real whereabouts of the Blue Bird, and that she is taking Man through Life "only to realise and to learn." But most welcome of all is the explanation given of the repeated failure to find the Blue Bird. The reason is that Man is not yet ready for it. When implored by the Great Joys to put aside her veil, and lead them to the "last truths and the last happiness," Light can only answer sadly, "I am obeying my Master. The hour is not yet come."

FLORENCE G. FIDLER.

"G.K.C." AS A HERETIC BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

In the recent book on "The Great State," Mr. Wells, discussing the various schools of contemporary political thought, singles out Mr. Chesterton as pre-eminently the typical reactionary of our generation. To any reader of Mr. Chesterton's works, such a description of his political or philosophical position certainly sounds more startling than any of the paradoxes which he is accused of having launched forth into the world. To affix any label on the most elusive, the most individual of latter-day prophets, is sufficiently strange, but to brand him, the most liberal, the most democratic of humorists, a herald of rebellion, one of the pillars of the Daily News, as a mere obscurantist Tory, seems at first sight almost too ludicrous for refutation. Yet, when one tries to read a meaning into Mr. Wells' statement, one discovers that, after all, the statement does have a meaning. One is reluctantly compelled to admit that this label is not a libel, and that this definition contains a large element of truth. It may be due to a misunderstanding, but it can hardly be called a misstatement, and if it is a misstatement, it is Mr. Chesterton, and not Mr. Wells, that must be held responsible.

II.

For I am bound to confess that, in reading some of Mr. Chesterton's later writings, he seems to me to be in considerable danger of really developing into an intellectual and religious reactionary. He seems to take a perverse pleasure in opposing the most legitimate aspirations of the present, and in sympathising with some of the most doubtful tendencies of the past. With an insistence which would be wearisome—if it were possible for "G. K. C." ever to be wearisome—he denounces our modern belief in human progress as one of the idols of the tribe. Progressives of every shade and colour he denounces as heretics. Modernism has become to him a term of reproach and a mark of imbecility. And his condemnation of the Progressive and the Modernist is unqualified. If he had only said that the majority of Progressives and Modernists do not know what they mean; if he had told us that they do not distinguish between aimless movement and conscious and purposeful advance towards an ideal goal; if he had told us that they do not discriminate between the Rake's progress towards the Devil and the Pilgrim's progress towards Christian perfection, I, for one, would have understood his position. But no! what he seems to attack is the very principle and law of progress in human history. What he attacks is the advocacy of the present and of the future as against the past, and he attacks it in the name of tradition, in the name of Christianity, in the name of Catholicism.

III.

Now, it seems to me sufficiently strange that Mr. Chesterton, who believes in the general soundness of democratic sentiment, should reject as a mere whim a principle which, for nearly two hundred years, has formed part of the popular creed, and a creed which has already produced countless martyrs. It seems to me sufficiently strange that he, who believes in the French Revolution, should reject a principle which was one of the guiding principles of that Revolution. But that he should persistently repudiate it in the name of Christianity and Catholicism seems to me more than a harmless paradox, I must denounce it as rank heresy.

For Mr. Chesterton seems to me entirely to ignore that the idea of progress has come into the world with Christianity. It has grown with the growth of the Catholic Church. The ancient heathen did not know of progress. To him the Golden Age was not in the future, but in the dim and distant past. The modern Calvinist does not believe in it. To him there is no Pilgrim's progress, but only salvation and damnation from all eternity. The Catholic alone proclaims that the life of collective humanity, like the life of the individual Christian, is a march onwards, a "pilgrim's progress," a striving after perfection, an ascent to heaven through the mount of Purgatory. "Per angusta ad augusta." To the Catholic alone, hope is not only an undying human instinct, but a theological virtue. To the Catholic alone, human advance is not in a circle, the aimless circle of the Rationalist; still less is it in a straight line. The true symbol of Catholicism is the spiral of Dante's "Purgatory," still reverting to the same point, but always on a higher plane.

IV.

And I submit to Mr. Chesterton that the Catholic belief in human progress also implies that other belief which he constantly deprecates, the assumption that the future must necessarily be better than the past, that the sufferings of one generation are to be put to the credit account of the next generation, that the whole of human life is a "capitalisation" of effort, that the sanctity of Saints and the martyrdom of Martyrs are handed down to future ages, that the just of to-day are justified not only by their faith, not only by their individual works, but by the work and merits of their fathers. In other words, to believe in progress is to believe in an apostolical succession of virtue and moral energy.

Again and again Mr. Chesterton has protested that to magnify and glorify the present and the future at the expense of the past is to appraise intellectual or moral or religious values in terms of time: the truth of to-day, he argues, cannot be better than the truth of yesterday, for truth is eternal. But, verily, his protest against progress is the protest of a Protestant, or rather of a Pagan. As a matter of fact, to the Catholic, time does enter in the definition of religious truth. To the Protestant the Old Testament may be as true as the New Testament. To the Catholic the New Testament proclaims a higher truth. To the Protestant truth has been written down for ever in a book. To the Catholic it is progressively revealed by the Church. To the Protestant Christianity is only a written law interpreted by reason. To the Catholic Christianity is a historical institution, a living Church, ever growing, that is to say, ever changing, adapting itself to new needs, assimilating fresh experiences.

V.

I must confess, therefore, that, whether I examine Mr. Chesterton's political doctrines or his religious doctrines, the more I examine his attitude to the idea of progress and to modernism, the less I understand it, or the more I am convinced that he understands neither what is implied by progress or modernism. As I hinted at the beginning of these remarks, I would have understood his position if he had turned the tables against Rationalists and Agnostics, and if he had told them that merely as Rationalists they have no right to believe in progress, that a belief in progress is inconsistent with their creed. For the idea of progress cannot be justified in the name of individual justice, of individual reason, of individual equity. For to the eye of individual reason progress is the supreme iniquity. Progress is irrational, it is supra-rational, it is metaphysical, it is mystical and transcendental.

Mr. Chesterton has written two books against Heretics, and a third book in defence of Orthodoxy. That third book is, in my opinion, the most brilliant and the most original apology for Christianity which has been written since Joseph de Maistre; but if the argument contained in these remarks is sound, Mr. Chesterton has encountered the fate of many a Christian apologist and many a heresy hunter; his orthodoxy is itself tainted with heresy.

A HIGH CHURCHMAN'S PROJECT OF UNITY

BY PROF. W. P. PATERSON, D.D., OF EDINBURGH

I.

IN an interesting and vivacious book Father Kelly has mooted a scheme for the reconciliation of the Nonconformists with the Church of England. What he proposes is, not federation and co-operation, but an incorporating union. And never, surely, did High Churchman write so candidly about Anglicanism, or so generously about the Nonconformists. "Their separation," he says, "has brought to us something like ossification and death. Their reconciliation would be to us life from the dead."

II.

As a preliminary to bringing together Anglo-Catholics and Protestants he tries to ascertain the essential character and difference of the two systems of Christian thought. The fundamental difference, he thinks, is connected with the interpretation and valuation of the sacraments. The Catholic believes that in the Holy Communion Christ has provided for us a true renewal of the bodily presence of His spiritual humanity, in order that we, partaking of the humanity thus given, may attain to the redemption manifested in the body of His resurrection. The Protestant, in spite of better traditions, gravitates towards the opinion that the communion is merely a symbolical act, which recalls the idea of a Saviour now remote from him in time or place. With the Catholic view of the sacraments is indissolubly bound up the provision of a priesthood which validly administers them, and the priesthood, in turn, is dependent for orders on the divinely instituted Episcopate.

The religious vindication of this scheme is that it is the only way of taking the Incarnation seriously, or at least of making it effective; and it has the practical advantage that sacramental doctrine and practice take a grip, such as no other system does, of the commonplace and unspiritual mind of the multitude. While Catholicism thus witnesses to and applies the fact of the Incarnation, Protestantism rather stands for the truth that there is a Holy Spirit, who is the Lord and Giver of life, and who is manifested in the love of liberty.

"The strength of Nonconformity is that it has maintained and developed the witness of the personal gifts of the Holy Spirit." It has a passion for religious freedom which chafes even against wholesome restraints; it has built a congenial home for a religious aristocracy; and it has shown boundless activity in the realm of Christian work.

III.

Is there, now, a possible synthesis of these diverse religious types? Mr. Kelly's programme is that the Nonconformists should accept the sacramental system of the Catholic Church, with its corollaries of priesthood and episcopate, and that the Anglo-Catholic Church should recognise and annex the Nonconformist bodies as societies usefully engaged in evangelistic work and in the labours of a pastoral and philanthropic ministry. There would, indeed, be no rigid division of labour; but the official priesthood would, on the whole, confine itself to administering the sacramental gift and explaining its significance, while the leaders of the religious societies representing the Protestant tradition would largely take over the business of preaching and the organisation of Christian service.

IV.

As Mr. Kelly reminds us, all things are possible with God. But in the meantime, as he frankly admits, the project does not seem, so far as man is concerned, even to approach the region of practical politics. The points on which he asks the Nonconformists to capitulate are precisely the points which Protestants regard as marking a grave relapse from the purity and spirituality of the Christian Gospel. In particular, there is nothing which they are less likely to accept than the type of sacramental doctrine which is here represented as an essential element of the Gospel. They might, indeed, accept the teaching of the Thirty-nine Articles on the subject—Presbyterians at least profess something very similar in the Westminster Confession—but what Mr. Kelly insists on as Catholic is a doctrine which seems largely repudiated in the Articles, and which is an unintelligible something that lies halfway between the Roman and Calvinistic conceptions. A doctrine cannot well be imposed as essential Catholic truth which the Romanist will not have because it does not include transubstantiation, and which leaves even the student in extreme doubt as to what he is really expected to believe. In a reunited Anglican Church room should certainly be left for those who hold the highest type of sacramental doctrine, but it is intolerable that they should claim to be entrusted with the keys of the temple.

V.

It is a further objection to the project that it would require Nonconformist ministers to cease from administering the sacraments, unless and until they should admit their want of title to the ministerial office, and should penitently seek episcopal ordination. But the hopelessness of the suggested concordat does not imply that Father Kelly's book is useless. It is instructive as showing how and why the sacramentarian and sacerdotal scheme may commend itself to a reasoning and sincere mind. And, in any case, Father Kelly renders the service of commending a splendid objective.

He is right in saying, as Macaulay said long ago, that the Church of England grievously blundered when she failed to make room within her pale for movements which, like Wesleyanism, represented a new outpouring of freedom, enthusiasm, and spiritual energy. And he has shown to others an inspiring vision—of a Church which, though not free from spot or wrinkle, would yet be a most glorious Church, in which the faith, reverence, and clear-sightedness of Anglicanism would be combined with the spiritual zeal, the intellectual avidity, and the moral earnestness of the descendants of the Puritans.

The arguments in Professor Paterson's interesting and suggestive article are founded on "The Church and Religious Unity" (Longmans, Green and Co., 4s. 6d. net).

1913 New Spring Books 1913

THE MEDIAEVAL TOWN SERIES.

A Series of beautiful Books dealing with the Historical Associations and Archæological interests of Mediæval Towns. Fcap. 8vo. With Illustrations and Maps.

The following Volumes are already published :

ASSISI, CONSTANTINOPLE, MOSCOW, NUREMBERG, PERUGIA, PRAGUE, TOLEDO.

Cloth, 3/6 net. Leather, 4/6 net.

AVIGNON, BRUGES, BRUSSELS, CAMBRIDGE, CAIRO, CANTERBURY, CHARTRES, COVENTRY, DUBLIN, EDINBURGH, FERRARA, FLORENCE, JERUSALEM, LONDON, LUCCA, MILAN, OXFORD, PADUA, PARIS, PISA, ROME, ROUEN, SANTIAGO, SEVILLE, SIENA, VENICE, VERONA.

Cloth, 4/6 net. Leather, 5/6 net.

DUNDEE ADVERTISER:—"Those who are familiar with Messrs. Dent's publications will know how beautifully the volume is bound and printed. The illustrations add great value to the work."

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS.

By E. G. GARDNER, M.A.

Demy 8vo, 7/6 net.

The present work treats of the mysticism of Dante, of the poet's appeal to St. Augustine in defence of the mysticism of the Paradiso, as well as of Dante and Dionysius, and, again, of Dante and St. Bernard, the Victorines, the Franciscan Mystics, and the Twain Mechtilds.

STANDARD:—"The book is a notable addition to the rich literature of critical interpretation which has gathered in recent times around the 'Divina Commedia.' Mr. Gardner has made all students of Dante his debtor by his masterly analysis of the wonderful poem and the manner in which he has brought to light the strict relation in which the poet stands to the mystics who preceded him."

DAILY CHRONICLE:—"The book is something to be thankful for, both in itself and in what it indicates."

WINDS OF DOCTRINE.

STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY OPINION.

By Prof. G. SANTAYANA.

Small demy 8vo, 6/- net.

The Author's general view is that the convictions and ideals of Christendom are in a state of disintegration and anarchy, in which the beginnings of a theoretical reconstruction are barely perceptible, although in practice and in honest feeling new principles are already largely dominant.

CHAUCER. By EMILE LEGOUIS.

Translated by L. LAILAVOIX.

Large crown 8vo, 5/- net.

As M. Legouis states, this is the first full-length study of Chaucer from a French critic. As Chaucer was very largely subject to French influences, this makes such a work of peculiar interest. M. Legouis traces Chaucer's life and examines his character in relation to the history of his times; and then continues to examine the works critically in detail, always keeping their historical background in memory.

GLOBE:—"The translation of the book is by M. Lailavoix. It is excellently done, and, indeed, runs so smoothly that there is never a hint that it is a translation."

A PROSPECTUS RELATING TO ANY OF THE ABOVE BOOKS WILL BE SENT IMMEDIATELY UPON RECEIPT OF A POSTCARD.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,

137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

SILHOUETTES

From the gallery of memory, multiscopic and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

SHE was a pretty woman and a charming one, and possessed sufficient of this world's wealth to enjoy many excellent good things. Life, however, that had endowed her so lavishly withheld the one experience she craved. Suitors she had in plenty. Young poets praised her eyes, and asked nothing better than to kneel at her small feet. But the woman was not satisfied, for she desired to fall in love. It chanced on a blue, unclouded morning, insistent with the promise of spring, that she met a man unlike the poets of her acquaintance. Tall, strong, tanned with the sun, fresh as the wind that blows over the sea, she straightway lost her heart to him.

He was a new experience, and she felt that at last she had found the one thing worth knowing. The man, having work to do, was sent to the other side of the world, and in his absence she forgot her vision of happiness. She forgot his simplicity of strength, that had seemed to her so splendid, and remembered he was not skilled in the turning of a phrase, and occasionally forgot that she was utterly adorable.

Love seemed to the woman more unattainable than before, and she returned to the society of minor poets. Meanwhile the man worked early and late, unmindful of weariness, careful only to save that he might be able to give the sunshine of his heart all she could desire when she was his. For that she would be his wife was to him a sure and certain hope. His enterprises prospered, and at last she learnt the day of his return. The news found her dispirited, and left her dull. His prosperity affronted her; his success seemed a reproach. He no longer played a dominant part in her life, avid of happiness, and she went to meet him as to a painful ordeal.

The train was signalled, and the great platform was crowded; friends and relations waiting to greet those dear to them jostled against hurrying porters eager for baggage and tips. Everyone was on the tiptoe of expectation, and the woman wished she could catch the contagion. A girl, flushed and tremulous, ran to the end of the platform; a young man paced nervously to and fro. If only she could feel with them that joy or sorrow would come to her in the onrushing train! . . . She did not see him at first. She looked unconsciously for a tall, prosperous figure, with head held high, and a look of victory on his face—victory of which she was the spoil.

He saw her first and touched her gently on the arm. He was older, had gone grey, and in some strange fashion seemed to have lost his size. His face, no longer tanned, was worn and wistful; his eyes filled with a hunger and a longing such as she had never known. And as she met his gaze she knew the things that he had suffered, and that the work and the endurance were for her. And a great sob rose in her throat. She forgot she desired to love, and remembered only that she longed to comfort. And she put her arms about his neck and kissed him. "Am I so changed?" he asked, reading her face. "Don't you care any more? . . . I—I have lived only to meet you, Sunshine—my Sunshine!"

"Changed?" she asked, between her tears. "You've grown dearer, that's all. . . . Oh, Dick, Dick! I don't think anything matters now I've got you."

THE PUTUMAYO ATROCITIES*

THE abuses connected with rubber-gathering in the Amazon Valley, now known the world over as the Putumayo atrocities, are not by any means a revelation of yesterday, though British public opinion was only thoroughly aroused a little more than six months ago. The Peruvian Government have long been aware that the Indians of the rubber-bearing regions of the Republic were being abominably maltreated in the interests of rubber capitalists. In Great Britain attention was first drawn to the occurrences on the Putumayo so far back as 1907, but two more years elapsed ere Mr. Hardenburg (whose extraordinary narrative of his travels in the Peruvian Amazon region forms a large portion of this book) told, through the British Press, his grim story of the barbarities being committed on the Putumayo. There was instant denial both by the Peruvian Government and the Peruvian Amazon Company, but the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines' Protection Society, with the help of the editor of Truth, brought Mr. Hardenburg's terrible indictment under the notice of the Foreign Office, with the result that in 1910 a British Consul, Mr. Roger Casement, who had previously investigated the Congo atrocities, proceeded to the Putumayo. In July last his exhaustive report was laid before Parliament, and, as everybody knows, Mr. Hardenburg's story was fully confirmed. Consul Casement wrote:—

"The condition of things fully warrants the worse charges brought against the agents of the Peruvian Amazon Company and its methods on the Putumayo."

What action the British Foreign Office is likely to take it is impossible to say, in view of the fact that a Select Committee of the House of Commons is at this moment hearing evidence regarding the atrocities. But that steps of some kind will be taken to end the unspeakable horrors of the Putumayo can hardly be doubted.

Meanwhile, those who wish to be thoroughly posted up in the facts of this appalling story cannot do better than read this book. It is based on first-hand knowledge, for it not only furnishes Mr. Hardenburg's thrilling narrative of his experiences in the South American rubber region, and of the hardships and imprisonments he suffered at the hands of the Peruvian agents of the rubber company on the Putumayo, but it includes the most important portions of Consul Casement's report.

An additional feature of the book is the valuable introduction by Mr. C. Reginald Enock, who has travelled extensively in Peru, and has written the standard book on the country. Mr. Enock deals with one point which will have occurred to many. How was it possible that such atrocities could take place in a country where dwells a highly civilised and sensitive people? His reply is, first, the remoteness of the Putumayo, and, secondly, political strife. For these reasons the educated people of the Peruvian capital and coast region must, in general, be exonerated from knowledge of the occurrences in the rubber districts of the Republic.

The book contains sixteen illustrations and a map. The latter is useful, but the pictures might well have been dispensed with. They are, for the most part, very gruesome, and do not much assist the letterpress, being, in fact, studies of torture and emaciation of so terrible a character that the soul sickens at the sight. The scenes portrayed render it difficult for a sensitive person to read the book without suffering from acute depression.

* "The Putumayo: The Devil's Paradise." By W. E. Hardenburg. 10s. 6d. net. (Unwin.)

MESSRS.

CHAPMAN & HALL

have much pleasure in announcing that they have just commenced the publication of a new series of Manuals, entitled under the General Editorship of the Rev. HENRY W. CLARK, Author of "The History of English Nonconformity," &c.

THE GREAT CHRISTIAN THEOLOGIES,

The Volumes are not intended to be controversial, except incidentally, but are, primarily, careful expositions of the theological systems dealt with. At the same time they are critical in the sense that the authors indicate, in the course of the exposition, the relations between the systems and current theological and philosophical tendencies. In this way the student is helped, not only to knowledge, but to that "thinking things together" which is so necessary to sound and satisfying theological instruction. Each Volume is by a scholar of acknowledged eminence, and, while the series will prove indispensable to clerical and ministerial students, it is hoped that it will appeal no less to that large body of thinking laity which is interested in theological matters to-day.

THE FIRST VOLUME

(Now Ready) IS

THE THEOLOGY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND,

by Rev.

F. W. WORSLEY, M.A., B.D.;

and it will be followed shortly by

SCHLEIERMACHER:
A CRITICAL AND HISTORICAL STUDY,

by Rev. W. B. SELBIE, M.A., D.D., Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford,

and

THE THEOLOGY OF THE ROMAN CHURCH,

by Rev. Father H. THURSTON, S.J.

EACH VOLUME, HANDSOMELY BOUND,
DEMY 8VO, 7/6 NET.

A Prospectus, giving a list of the subsequent Volumes arranged for, will be sent post free by the Publishers to any address on receipt of a postcard. Please mention this paper when writing.

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD., W.C.

THREE VOLUMES BY STRINDBERG

THE first of these volumes, "Legends," is one of Strindberg's autobiographical works, and the other two consist of translations of some of his most celebrated plays. They have made their English appearance quite lately, and are a visible sign of the great interest Strindberg is now arousing over here. Nor are they the only translations of this Swedish author. Others of his plays are obtainable in English, and two more of the autobiographical works ("The Confessions of a Fool" and "The Inferno"), and we are promised still further specimens of his work. This awakened inquisitiveness is partly, no doubt, due to his recent death, but it is also due to the fact that Strindberg does represent, to a very marked degree, certain of the most curious and emotional tendencies of our age. Before examining the three particular books before us, it would be as well to notice in what way some of these tendencies are represented in Strindberg.

To begin with, he is a convinced pessimist. Life to him is a hateful medley of suffering and illusion. He sees it stripped of its conventional respectability. And yet, in the midst of his unflinching realism, there are streaks of exquisite romance. His gloominess and the rebellion of his spirit do not hide his deep longing for happiness and peace. Obsessed by the ugliness of motive, by the sordid baseness of existence, he is at heart the sternest of Puritans. No light French cynicism for him. The indecency of some of his works is a sort of cry of agony. He loathes vice, and yet it seems to surround him wherever he looks. And he has all the modern sensitiveness—and this to a quite morbid extent. Also he is extremely and painfully candid. At one moment he reminds one of Tolstoy, at another moment of Ibsen, but never does one lose sight of the fact that it is actually Strindberg, himself, who is speaking, Strindberg with his egoistic, passionate, and mournful soul. Although so immensely versatile (he left, according to Mr. Harrison, "some sixty plays, having destroyed others during a time of depression; fifteen volumes of short stories; seven autobiographical works; three volumes of poetry; four volumes of history; five volumes of science; nineteen volumes of studies, critical, literary, social, scientific, ethical, and philosophical"), Strindberg strikes one as a man hopelessly narrowed and deformed by introspection. His mind really was unhealthy. Spasmodically his influence may be very intense, but it is highly improbable that it will ever be universal. His literary genius and his strange individuality must give him a hearing, but his philosophy is too much an echo of a personal and bitter despair to make his name a classic in any wide sense.

But, of course, there is no space here to enter upon a general criticism of this remarkable man. We should advise anyone who wants to know more of Strindberg to read the very able and enthusiastic articles by Mr. Austin Harrison in the English Review for November and December last. For an estimate at once less brilliant and more frigid, see the Times literary supplement for January 16th, 1913.

Coming then to the three books that it is our business to review, let us take "Legends" first of all. This, as we have said, is one of the autobiographical works, the most famous of which, "The Confessions of a Fool," created something like a sensation when it first appeared in English, about a year ago. To speaking frankly, "Legends" is of a very different calibre, and must be judged as little better than the ravings of a man far gone in mental disorder. It relates the author's experiences, his spiritual experiences in the main, in Sweden and Paris during 1896 and 1897. At that period Strindberg was in the full violence of the crisis which is shadowed forth in the earlier (in time) "Confessions of a Fool." Now, "The Confessions of a Fool" is the production of a man in an extraordinary state of excitement, a state bordering on insanity. It is a powerful and moving book, but it is obviously all that just because it is not mere raving, but a reasoned, even if frightfully over-coloured, study of temperaments and events. But in "Legends" one feels at once that Strindberg has crossed the line between sanity and madness. A book that is one long wail in the key of persecution mania, childish superstition, and groundless terror soon bores one. It is impossible to sympathise with the dehumanised. They are pitiful externally, but the workings of their brains leave us cold. And in "Legends" we are watching a dehumanised brain—not entirely dehumanised, but very largely so. Strindberg had much too strong and eager an intelligence to let go of himself altogether, but in this work his grip is very uncertain.

"Miss Julia" is one of Strindberg's best known plays. The story is disagreeable and quite simple—the seduction of her father's footman by a young lady, and her remorse and suicide on the next morning. It is a play into which Strindberg threw all the force of his savage and disdainful realism. He seems to hate and despise both Julia, with her lewdness, her emancipation, and her wretched terror, and the loutish, and, by turns, cringing and domineering Jean. It is the kind of play one can imagine Swift writing if he had been alive to-day. The whole thing is bitter to the last essence of bitterness.

"The Stronger" is a tiny dialogue (or rather, a "dialogue" in which only one character speaks) between two actresses in regard to one of their husbands. It is a bizarre and original fragment, and shows great skill and dramatic intensity.

"There are Crimes and Crimes" is another of Strindberg's most generally known plays, and perhaps it has been acted more than any other. It is a long play of over seventy pages, and one can only give a fragmentary résumé of the plot. An unsuccessful playwright, Maurice, has a mistress, Jeanne. They have a daughter of five called Marion. Maurice has a dear friend, Adolphe, who also has a mistress, Henriette. Suddenly Maurice becomes famous—one of his plays has succeeded. About then he meets Henriette for the first time. They are momentarily fascinated with one another, and they go off together. But horrible disasters at once ensue. Maurice's child dies naturally, but with mysterious suddenness, and he is taken to be the murderer. The rumour of this ruins his play, Henriette comes to hate him, and he comes to hate Henriette (each suspects the other of the child's death). But, at last, the clouds begin to roll away—the inquest reveals the true cause of death, the play is reinstated at the theatre, Maurice writes humbly to Jeanne to take him back. It is a play that does not read very convincingly. There is something fantastic and symbolic about it that strikes one as almost ludicrous, and the characters don't seem to hold together. "Miss Julia" is a finer performance, and it is also a much more impressive presentation of life.

RICHARD CURLE.

* "Legends." 5s. net. (Melrose.)

"Miss Julia; The Stronger." "There are Crimes and Crimes." Each translated by Edwin Björkman. Each 2s. net. (Duckworth.)

A CRUST OF BREAD * * BY HENRI LAVEDAN

"LET me see: eight sandwiches—seven pieces of cake—nine éclairs—six ices . . .?"

The group of well-groomed and correctly garbed young men, all anxious to pay at once, insistently tendered their gold on the marble counter, without for a moment interrupting their lively chatter with the bevy of pretty girls with whom Thiboust's, the famous pastrycook's, was crowded.

Every time the door opened, a perfume of baked crust was wafted over the thoroughfare, and every minute small, white-capped and aproned cook-boys marched out, bearing on their heads, with all gravity and respect, trays loaded with odorous and appetising wares.

Outside, a tall, white-faced young man, poorly clad, stood gazing, his face close against the window.

It is in December . . . not too warm! There will surely be a frost to-night. The traffic goes by, people meet and pass each other, hastening about their business; the sergents-de-ville blow upon their fingers; cabmen, on the point of running down a pedestrian, shout a belated warning; Paris, the Great City, roars on as of custom.

The white-faced young man still stood there, gazing. . . .

A lady approached, dragging an expensively dressed, plump little boy of four, a dead weight on his mother's skirts. He seemed to run a great risk of choking himself with the big spice-bun he was attempting to eat.

"Mamma, I can't eat my cake!"

"Very well, dear; throw it away."

The child let fall the bun by the edge of the pavement. The white-faced youth turned, bent down, and stretched out his hand, . . . then suddenly recovered himself. Of a certainty he would not disdain to eat what that pretty child had touched with his little, pearly teeth, but there were too many people about, and he was ashamed. He hesitated a moment, plunged his two fists into his pockets; then he started to go away, skirting the shop windows.

No doubt he is in haste, for he walks at a great pace. Where is he going? He passes the shelter where the 'buses stop, crosses the Place du Palais Royal, and takes the Rue de Rivoli. At a corner, under the arcades, a loud-voiced street hawker accosts him. "Map of Paris, with views of the principal monuments, three sous! It's giving them away!"

Without turning his head, the young man passed on, crossed the road, and made directly to an open door on the far side of Louvre courtyard, threaded several white, echoing galleries, and stopped at length, silent, cap in hand, as though in a church.

The Gallery of Antiquities! Calmness and quietude.

A caretaker slumbered upon a bench, his mouth wide open. Close by, in the embrasure of a window, a girl in black was copying the "Diana and Fawn." She had the cool complexion and calm, pure eyes of a studious child, beautiful brown eyes glancing upwards at the marble goddess and immediately lowered upon the paper over which her fingers, blackened with charcoal, moved to and fro. The short sleeve exposed a slender, bare wrist; and upon the bar of her stool rested her feet, half-hidden under the serviceable skirt. Not the feet of a leisured idler, but honest little feet that every day bore her down the hill of Montmartre, tripping bravely in their thin boots, and tired themselves in the long walk through distant and ill-paved suburbs. She worked on, permitting nothing to distract her attention, neither the stifled laughter of a group of lads in front of a Hercules, nor the loud voices of a troop of foreign sightseers searching for the exit, nor the caretaker's prolonged snoring in a minor key,—nor even the presence of the tall, pale young man who was standing behind her. Only now and then a pretty, impatient gesture; the pout of a schoolgirl who has just blotted her copy; the rosy tongue-tip brought by a crisis of concentration to the corner of the lips; bread rubbed into crumb upon the same spot twenty times over—dainty and charming mannerisms of a girl artist in presence of a model whose relentless perfection induces a feeling of despair.

The Diana opposite, with her long, slight robe stretched back and her disdainful lips, had the air of posing expressly for the girl's benefit; the fawn also, crouching in readiness to spring, curving her two clean-cut, sinewy forelegs into parentheses, seemed to be waiting until she had finished before lying down beside the Huntress to lick her white feet.

All around, upon pedestals of green, violet, grey, bluish or polychrome marble, stood Mercurys, poised for flight, Satyrs with pointed ears and salient cheekbones, shaken with wild laughter as they breathed into their pipes; Athletes fastening their sandals; Tiber, indolently reclining upon his bed of oozy weeds; Æsculapius with his serpent; the Discobolos, serene, self-confident; Ceres, Apollo, Silenus and Bacchus; shaggy Fauns, groaning under the burden of the architraves resting on their shoulders; Cybele shaking her taboret; lions in green Egyptian basalt rolling marble balls, tawny as their eyes, under velvety paws; Jupiter and the Sages, with their curling beards, their fillet-bound brows, their blind eyes, wide open, yet regarding not, eyes such as Œdipus and Homer must have had, which seem to plunge into deeps beyond human ken. . . .

Daylight was waning. In winter darkness comes swiftly on. It invaded the vast gallery, casting great pools of blackness into the corners, drawing shadowy blinds over the tall windows, draping the statuary in wrappers of thick, yet diaphanous shade, through which the eye could distinguish here and there, dimly white, the fugitive contour of a shoulder, the fibula clasping a peplum, the wing of a caduceus, the roundness of a hip, or the barely perceptible curve of a delicate limb. . . .

The alien visitors had at last discovered a door, and the noisy youths had followed, indulging themselves with a little horse-play; the gallery had fallen silent. The Louvre clock struck the quarter. The caretaker shook himself awake.

"Closing time!"

His voice rolled, echoing beneath the vaulted roof, and the Antiques, yawning, stretched limbs wearied with an eternity of sculptural poses, seeming also to be whispering to one another: "Closing time! . . . At last!" The girl rose, laid her drawing-board by the wall, gave her skirt a little shake, and, whilst she was unhooking her toque from the regulator of the window . . . slowly, with the stealthy movements of a cat after a bird, the white-faced young man thrust out his hand, seized the big piece of bread lying on the stool between the pencil-case and the gloves, hid it under his coat, and remained standing there, in a stupor, rooted to the floor, his heart beating great bell strokes, seeing nothing, not even hearing the

THE MEANING AND VALUE OF LIFE.

By RUDOLF EUCKEN.

Translated by LUCY JUDGE GIBSON

and

W. R. BOYCE GIBSON, M.A.

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price 3/6 net. By Post, 3/9.

CAN WE STILL BE CHRISTIANS ?

By RUDOLF EUCKEN.

Authorised Translation by Mrs. W. R. BOYCE GIBSON.

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price 3/6 net. By Post, 3/10.

LIFE'S BASIS AND LIFE'S IDEAL.THE FUNDAMENTALS OF A NEW PHILOSOPHY OF LIFE.

By RUDOLF EUCKEN.

Translated by ALBAN G. WIDGERY.

Demy 8vo, Cloth. Price 7/6 net. By Post, 7/11.

RUDOLF EUCKEN'S PHILOSOPHY OF LIFE.

By W. R. BOYCE GIBSON.

SECOND EDITION.

With Frontispiece Portrait of Rudolf Eucken.

Crown 8vo. Price 3/6 net. By Post, 3/10.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London, W.

Mr. Heinemann's New BooksWITH THE TURKS IN THRACE

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

Splendidly Illustrated and with Map. Royal 8vo, 10s. net.

TIMES: "Not only an entertaining record of personal experience, but an illuminating record of the military disasters of the Turkish Army."

THE POSITIVE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION. By FREDERIC HARRISON, D.C.L.

Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

PAUL I. OF RUSSIA: The Son of*Catherine the Great.* By K. WALISZEWSKI.

Royal 8vo, 15s. net.

LOST IN THE ARCTIC. By CAPT. E.

MIKKELSEN. Illustrations, Map, &c. Crown 4to, 18s. net.

IN THE SHADOW ^{OF} THE BUSH.

By P. AMAURY TALBOT. With many Illustrations.

Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

New 6s. Novels.GUTTER BABIES. - - - Dorothea SladeTHE HIPPODROME - Rachel HaywardFRONTIERS of the HEART Victor MargueritteWHERE are YOU GOING TO? Elizabeth RobinsTHE STORY OF S. COMPTON J. E. PattersonA RUNAWAY RING - Mrs. Henry DudeneyKING ERRANT - - - Flora A. SteelADNAM'S ORCHARD - - - Sarah GrandBETWEEN TWO THIEVES. Richard DehanUNDER THE YOKE - - - Ivan Vazoff

Completion of ROMAIN ROLLAND'S Great 20th Century Romance

JOHN CHRISTOPHERVol. I. DAWN AND MORNING; Vol. II. STORM AND STRESS; Vol. III.
JOHN CHRISTOPHER IN PARIS; JUST OUT, Vol. IV. JOURNEY'S END.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

mustachioed caretaker's voice: "Well, young man, what are you doing here, after I've told you it's closing time?"

It was no appetising piece of bread, none of the bread which smells good and rejoices the eye, the golden-yellow bread, with the soft, white crumb grateful to old folks' gums and crisp crust for the sharp teeth of the young—the bread one eats relishingly, recalling the harvest-fields, thanking God who gives it and the bakers who labour nightly, kneading the dough with their strong white arms, that the delicately browned loaves may be delivered, all hot, just as one is waking in the morning. No; this bread was stale, hard, blackened; it was food of a kind to excite disgust rather than satisfy hunger. Yet, seemingly, the pale young man did not find it too bitter, for he was there next day at the same hour, lurking in wait behind the girl, who, as before, was absorbed in her task of copying the Diana.

Events followed the same train as on the previous evening.

The clock gave the same husky wheeze before striking the same quarter; in the same monotone the caretaker pronounced his warning. The girl rose. The bread, a big, magnificent crust, lay upon the stool. As on the evening before, it openly invited seizure.

The tall young man, dull with fasting, stretched out his hand, but in his eagerness he struck the stool and upset it.

Then, as he stood motionless, trembling to find himself caught, clutching the stolen bread tightly in his fingers, all at once the blood surged into his face, and two tears of gratitude towards the girl—who did not even turn her head—rolled down his thin cheeks.

It was a piece of new bread.

—Translated by Sidney Dixon.

TO SOME BIRDS SINGING ON A MILD MORNING IN MIDWINTER.

O FOOLISH birds, why do ye sing

As tho' 'twere Spring?

Do ye not know 'tis but a dream,

This sudden gleam

Of warmth and light—do ye not know

That very soon may come the northern snow?

O foolish birds, ere half the song,

So glad and long,

Is sung that fain your hearts would sing,

The wind may fling

Its poisoned arrows sharp and chill,

And all your golden throats for ever still!

O foolish birds! . . . Or is it we May foolish be?—

We who but seldom sing a note

Except by rote,

Who worship not the sun, but reason;

Poor slaves to self-made bonds of time and season?

O small, wise birds, teach us to sing

To greet the Spring!

Tho' gleam it thro' a winter's sky,

Better to die

In greeting it; for doubly dies

The man whose soul is sealed against surprise!

—GILBERT THOMAS.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE CULT OF PLEASURE."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Macpherson, in an article intended to indicate the ultimate effects of pleasure on civilisation, first exposes the prodigalities of an exclusive set of wealthy Americans, and then performs an exceedingly interesting mental somersault to attack the moral "weaknesses" of the poorer labouring class. As if there were any logical relationship existing between the two instances! The one is a renewed and varied indulgence to escape from the ennui and surfeit which it itself produces; the other is an attempt to escape from the hideous monotony of soul-desolating labour. I quite agree that your contributor's apparent motive in attacking pleasure is an admirable one, but to libel the labouring classes, who cannot fight him equally with his own weapons, does his cause but an ill-service. Your contributor ought to have attacked such an organisation of society as will permit the existence of these ghastly orgies, and at the same time allowing masses of human beings to exist in such conditions of poverty unknown to the old days of slavery.

I have read Mr. Macpherson's article very closely, and I must say I take serious exception to the method by which he introduces to the unsuspecting reader the remark of a Labour leader who argued for the workman's right to get drunk. To have done justice both to reader and Labour leader, Mr. Macpherson ought either to have stated the history of the Labour leader's plea, or have omitted any reference to it.

I see nothing immoral in one man arguing for the right of individual action. It did not follow because a Labour leader supported the right of a workman getting drunk that he personally supported drinking. It does not require any considerable degree of mental perspicacity to see the difference between stating an argument and actually endorsing it. Though I should support neither, I would rather have the company of a drunken miner than the company of an aristocratic sensual gourmand. The former might possibly curse and the latter sneer. The miner possibly would tell a yarn, the aristocrat might possibly make an insinuation. But I know from whose drunkenness would spring the least corruption; I know whose curse and whose sneer would leave the nastiest taste!

The labouring classes are not, as a rule, drunken, neither are they addicted, in proportion to the wealthier classes, to gambling. And I think it a grave tendency when educated men write caricatures of a class which receive little enough support from those who are best able to help. I know very well how the middle-class look upon the working class: with that indifferent feeling which one has for another species. I have had many evidences of this in recent years among those whose means of subsistence largely depends upon the dusty, grimy-faced men who ply at the grimier loom of life!

I have often wished that the commercial classes possessed a wider and truer knowledge of those who are a little more removed from the social comforts which they enjoy as a first consideration of life; then might there exist some hope for an impartial and just judgment being formed, when the horny-handed sons of toil bear witness to their sense of economic justice by risking all in strikes. These men do not strike for fun; they understand very well the deadly earnestness of things. And as for their little bacchanalian

FOUR GREAT WORKS

OFFERED ON INSTALMENT TERMS.

carriage paid, within the United Kingdom.

THE CENTENARY EDITION OF THE COMPLETE WORKS OF

CHARLES DICKENS

IN 36 LARGE VOLUMES.

Containing the whole of the novelist's writings, novels, short stories, sketches, essays, articles, plays and poems, as well as all the Prefaces, Dedications and Notices that appeared during the author's lifetime. With 747 Illustrations and Portraits.

Handsome Red Cloth 14 Monthly Instalments of 7/6
Half Calf ... 15 Monthly Instalments of 21/-

THE CENTENARY EDITION OF THE WORKS OF

W. M. THACKERAY

With Biographical Introductions by his Daughter, Lady Ritchie.

Containing hitherto unpublished writings; twenty-six Portraits of the Author, from the age of three onwards; and over five hundred Plates and other Illustrations. Printed in large type on fine paper. In TWENTY-SIX volumes, Demy 8vo. forming the best edition obtainable.

Cloth ... 12 Monthly Instalments of 14/- each.
Half Calf 16 Monthly Instalments of 21/- each.

THE SURREY EDITION OF THE WORKS OF

GEORGE MEREDITH

IN 24 HANDSOME VOLUMES.

The text embodies the author's last revisions, and three of the volumes contain his poems. Beyond question this is one of the finest editions of the works of Meredith ever issued.

Pale Blue Cloth ... 12 Monthly Instalments of 15/- each.
Sumptuous Half Calf 16 Monthly Instalments of 21/- each.

HANDSOME LIBRARY EDITION IN FOUR VOLUMES OF

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE

The Standard Biography in the English Language.

Initial payment of 6/., followed by 3 Monthly Instalments of 5/- each

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB, 376 to 384, Oxford Street, London, W.

HOW TO STUDY

Rapidly, Effectively & Scientifically, with the Minimum of Fatigue

To study rapidly and effectively you must understand how to pay attention, how to observe, how to employ your memory so that you may remember what you read. You must know how to develop your Will-power so as to enlist its valuable aid when your Will flags. You must know how to control your thoughts so as to inhibit alien ideas, and to shut out distracting influences. You must know how to guard against Fatigue, for to engage in study when your mind is fatigued is to make your study of no value. You are taught how to secure the above in an easy, sure, and scientific manner in the World-Famous Course — "Scientific Concentration," the finest all-round Mental-Training you can undertake. It will revolutionise your outlook on life and make you much more efficient in study, or in your Profession, or Business. In every part of the civilised world men and women in every walk of life testify to this. "Scientific Concentration" is highly recommended by the late Mr. W. T. Stead (Editor of the "Review of Reviews"), "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "Great Thoughts," etc. Learn all about this splendid All-Round Mental-Training by sending to-day for their Free Descriptive Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46 CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

STAMMERING AND ILL-DEVELOPED SPEECH. Mr. Herbert Miall, whose exposition created so much interest at The Children's Welfare Exhibition, can take a few more cases at any age, personally or by correspondence. Home or school visited; clientele at Rugby, Uppingham, and Christ's Hospital Schools. This reformed method of instruction is guaranteed. —Address 8, Argyll Place, London, W.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Short-hand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

"INTENSIVE CULTURE" OF THE MIND.

A remarkable magazine is causing a sensation in business and professional circles. The Managing Director of one of the biggest commercial firms in England has just asked to be supplied with 100 copies for distribution amongst his staff.

"I want," he writes, "the head of every department to read and study this journal, as I am convinced the result will be a large increase in the annual turnover and profits. I also want to give the brightest and most enterprising of my younger men the opportunity of following what it says."

INCREASING THE MONEY-MAKING FACULTY OF YOUR BRAIN.

This magazine, sent free, shows you how to increase the money-making and success-winning powers of your mind, by means of the famous Pelman system of scientific Menti-Culture.

By following this system you develop those powers of organisation and leadership which qualify you for more responsible and better-paid positions. Thus you will get the best work out of other people. The efficiency of everyone underneath you or controlled by you is doubled. Your department or business makes larger profits than ever before.

This system also develops the rare and priceless power of Initiative. It gives you confidence in yourself, and enables you to gain the confidence of others. People will look upon you as a man who "carries things through." You will be on the road to success.

CREATING IDEAS THAT ARE WORTH MONEY.

All business men are on the look-out for men with ideas. Men who can think out new schemes, new plans, new improvements on old methods, by which profits can be increased, are always in demand. Their services are rewarded with big money. Such a salary or income will be yours when you train your mind in business principles on this remarkable plan. The Pelman Course develops this power of Ideation. The particulars posted you free with the copy of the Pelman Magazine show you how those brilliant ideas which some people call "inspiration" are the natural products of a scientifically cultivated mind, the efflorescence of intellectual growths due to intensive mental culture.

Amongst the men and women who have increased their income by this method—as their letters printed in this magazine show—are:—

- | | | |
|-------------------------|--------------------|------------------------|
| —Bankers | —Musician | —Chemists |
| —Doctors | —Heads of Business | —Engineers |
| —Clerks | —Teachers | —Working Men |
| —Minister of Religion | —Accountants | —Architects |
| —Salesmen | —Cashiers | —Land Agents |
| —Army and Navy Officers | —Secretaries | —Commercial Travellers |
| —Artisans and Mechanics | —Politicians | —Excisemen |
| —Law Students | —Railway Servants | —Builders |
| —Financiers | —Signalmen | —Telephone Operators |
| —Book-keepers | —Barristers | —Cabinet-makers |
| | —Journalists | |
| | —Managers | |
| | —Lecturers | |

Their letters are well worth readings.

Call or write for the magazine to-day before too late. The address to which to call or apply is the Secretary, THE PELMAN SCHOOL OF THE MIND, 52, WENHAM HOUSE, BLOOMSBURY STREET, LONDON, W.C. The magazine will be sent you by return gratis and post free, with full particulars and enrolment Form for a course of Pelman Training.

Oversea readers should apply to Pelman Schools at the following addresses:—Melbourne: 47, Queen Street. Bombay: 28, Esplanade Road. Durban: Club Arcade.

excursions—what about that? What would Mr. Macpherson have them do during their little intervals from the soul-killing hours of toil, many of them down in the bowels of the earth? Has Mr. Macpherson ever heard of Omar Khayyám?

"Oh, come with old Khyyám,

And leave the wise to talk;

One thing is certain, that Life flies;

One thing is certain, and the Rest is lies—

The Flower that once has blown for ever dies."

This ought to prove a corrective to that kind of mood which provokes in your contributor's mind the question of the right of a workman to get drunk.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. G. SINCLAIR.

Oxford, February 1st, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—One is justified in going to almost any extreme in satirising and denouncing the riotous notions of pleasure possessed by many of the very rich. Their excesses indicate, not only a diseased state of society, but also a deplorable mental degeneracy of certain individual members thereof.

Mr. Hector Macpherson is quite within his rights, also, when he has his fling at drunkenness and gambling among the workers. The fact of their existence is regrettably true, and its manifestation often pitiable. But in bracketing the two classes in one accusation, he omits a consideration of vital importance. There is a difference. The plutocrats squander what is not their own, what they have not earned. They spend what has been made by the workers. The workers spend their own earnings, and they also make what the "Idle Rich" lavish stupidly and often idiotically.

I am not here assuming that a man can do as he likes with his own, but I assert that the moral aspect is not quite the same in the two cases. Nor am I defending gambling or over-drinking on the part of the workers. I feel otherwise. (It was with a somewhat chastened sense of national pride that I listened to the statements made to me by a reverend gentleman and his wife from Copenhagen, regarding their experiences in that connection, while on holiday in Scotland. What they encountered was, seemingly, a revelation to them.) But I am convinced that were pure liquor supplied to working people, instead of the nasty, crazing stuff that unstrings the nerves and so intensifies the desire for stimulants; were their bodies well nourished with sound food; were their social surroundings cheerful and healthy; and were their minds free from the worrying uncertainty and anxiety that dog nearly every man and woman of them, the drink and gambling questions would sink into insignificance.

We must remember, however, that there is a number of good people, who never lose sight of human frailties, even when they are unnoticeable by the average man. The mission of such is to remind us of our Original Sin. These, our monitors, believe that drink and gambling, with one or two et ceteras, cause all destitution and unhappiness. Economic environment has no place in their scheme of things. Lock-outs, strikes, casual employment, and no employment are the result of proletarian cussedness; while as for the upper classes—well, God rewards superior merits, and if superior merit invest capital, the law of nature and the Manchester School decree that it must get dividends.

I expect that the prominent Labour leader "who declared emphatically for the right of working men to get drunk" had got "fed up" with the fussy ministrations of these self-satisfied admonishers.

Probably the Newcastle gentleman who spoke his little piece before the Royal Commission, mentioned by Mr. Macpherson, was one of that class. He had noticed that "the University Extension Movement was dead in many mining districts, and that secondary schools were scouted by most young men."

I would be very much surprised to learn that the University Extension Movement was ever very flourishing among miners, and am not at all surprised that young miners are indifferent to Secondary Education. These are both fine things, and fine it would be if all young and other men and women had desire that way. But what can we expect? Except in the case of a few with a special mental endowment, or an uncommon ambition, or a mind previously stimulated by some degree of culture, men with untutored minds, whose days are given over to hard, grimy, unremunerative toil, amid dingy, uninspiring surroundings, which, so far as they can see, will be their portion to the end, seek variety in excitement. That excitement they find in drinking, gambling, dogs, and coursing; not in books, the understanding of which requires further toil, the very thing they seek to escape.

If they think the matter out, gentlemen from Newcastle or anywhere else must admit that their own desire for books and culture is largely due to the fact that they were caught young and had book-learning pumped into them, presumably much against their will.

Mr. Macpherson, referring to Labour leaders, says: "While eloquent on the rights of the working man," they "are silent on his duties." And further on he continues: "Labour leaders might do well, when advocating higher wages, to impress upon the workers the duty of spending their earnings wisely." He says, again, that "Labour leaders would find ample scope for their energies in starting a crusade against gambling."

If that last sentence means anything (mark well "ample scope"), it means that all the time of Labour representatives should or might be spent in an anti-gambling crusade. What time, then, is to be devoted to Old Age Pensions, Unemployment, Feeding of Children, Eight Hours Day, Minimum Wage, and other measures for the benefit of their class?

What are the leaders sent to Parliament for? What are Trade Union secretaries elected and paid for? Is it to censor the morals of their employers, the workmen? Is it their duty to lecture the workers on their duties, to tell them how to dispose of their wages?

These so-called leaders are not leaders, and should not be leaders. They are the servants of those who elect and pay them. They exist officially to attend to the interests of those who employ them, on the lines laid down by their employers. If, instead of performing their well-defined duties, they were to spend their time as Mr. Macpherson suggests, then— But tell me, if Mr. Asquith's secretary were foolish enough to take such a view of what constituted his duty, what would Mr. Asquith do?—I am, sir, etc., A. MCK.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It seems a pity that Mr. Macpherson's intense antagonism to gambling should have destroyed much of the value of his contribution. The illustration of the extravagance of the idle rich is passed by without comment, but the extravagance of the poor is animadverted upon in unsparing terms. That the

Can you answer these questions?

An Article for All Engaged in Business.

You will probably find it quite easy to answer most of these questions, but unless you are a rare and brilliant exception you will find several others a good deal more difficult. Some of them, indeed, may be altogether beyond you.

And yet you will agree they are all questions that you might have to answer any day in your own business. So, if only out of curiosity, run through the list and see how many you can answer correctly.

13 Specimen Questions.

1. What is the exact purpose of a ledger?
2. What do these signs mean: "E. & O. E.," "F. A. S.," and "G. A."?
3. How would you open a branch?
4. What is a consignment note?
5. Do you know how to organise a sale?
6. Do you understand office organisation?
7. What is the difference between sending goods on "consignment" and "on sale or return"?
8. How often by law must a factory be "limewashed"?
9. How and when is a judgment summons issued?
10. What is the cost of registering a limited company?
11. Do you know how to take out a patent?
12. How would you draw a selling scheme?
13. How can you recover debts at court without the expense of a solicitor or collecting agency?

How Many Did You Answer?

Well, how have you come through this examination in business knowledge? You must not forget that the knowledge of these facts and of many other facts like them is absolutely necessary to you if you mean to succeed. If you are in business for yourself, you know how useful you would find it to be able to answer any business problem that arose; if you are working for others, you must realise that your employer will value you more highly if he knows he can go to you for information when he needs it.

And that is why the "Business Encyclopædia and Legal Adviser" is so valuable a work—because it contains information about every point in business life. With it by your side you can answer any question about business that is put to you. For instance, you can answer all the questions that you have just asked yourself. You will find the full purpose of a ledger in the article on Ledgers, Vol. III., page 294. Under "Abbreviations" you will find the meaning of every symbol and sign that is used in business to-day. The third question you will solve by looking up the fine article on the Basic Idea in Business, and so on with all the other questions; and, in fact, with any question about anything relating to business.

How This Concerns You.

These questions may not arise in your business, but others do, and if you think it would mean anything to you to know at once what to say or do in every emergency, you should send the coupon below for a handsome illustrated book on Business, telling all about the "Business Encyclopædia," and giving the names of the successful business men who have written it. It also tells how any reader of EVERYMAN may obtain the complete work in seven volumes for a first payment of 1s. 6d. only, and pay the balance in small monthly payments. Sending the coupon commits you to nothing. Is such an opportunity one you should miss?

A FREE BOOK.

This coupon entitles you to one free copy of the book describing the "Business Encyclopædia," but it must be sent at once. It tells all about the work and the specially low terms to readers of EVERYMAN.

To THE CANTON PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me one complimentary copy of the book on the "Business Encyclopædia." I am a reader of EVERYMAN.

NAME.....
(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS

.....

Do you Waste Time in your Spare Time?

Have you "spare time" or "waste time"? In these days of keen competition for the very right to earn one's daily bread, this is an important question for all.

Perhaps you will say that you have a very little spare time each day, certainly not in long enough periods for it to be worth anything. Well, this little fact will show you what can be done in odd moments. One of the missionaries in India, in the early part of the last century, was a member of a religious community. During the time it took him daily to walk from his room to the dining hall for meals he first of all committed to memory the entire Psalter and the Gospel according to St. John, and then translated them both into

Hindi, his translation being to-day the standard version of those portions of the Scriptures. Working about six minutes daily, he completed a task which would satisfy many a scholar's life ambition. He was neither better nor more learned than his fellows, but he had no spare time. Every moment was of value.

"Dost thou love life?" wrote old Ben Franklin in his "Poor Richard." "Then do not squander time, for that is the stuff life is made of."

What do you do with your odd minutes? Do you use them to further your progress in life? Have you reached the highest post you are fit for? Have you exploited every one of your possible talents and made the most of them? If not, you are not getting the full value out of your life.

Can you use your unoccupied moments to rise to greater power and wealth? Certainly you can if you wish to. Naturally there are few callings which can be pursued at odd times without the use of special books, special appliances or suitable surroundings; but pen and pencil and paper are portable. If you find ideas for stories crowd into your head, jot them down, and when you get a little leisure elaborate these notes into short stories. Send one or two to some reliable teacher, and he will tell you if it is worth your while to be trained properly in journalism. Many of our most popular writers have commenced in this way.

JOURNALISM CAN BE TAUGHT.

The theory that "Journalists are born," and that training is quite a superfluity where talent exists, is now fully exploded. The greatest authorities—men like Mr. Justin McCarthy, Lord Northcliffe, Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., and many others have expressed their opinion that well-conducted training is of the utmost value to the aspiring Journalist.

There are two roads to success in every phase of life. One is the road of experience—a long, tedious and, more often than not, disheartening road—and the other, and by far the wiser course, is to take advantage of the experience of others.

THE PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE Course in FREE-LANCE JOURNALISM is personally conducted by a well-known Author and Journalist, and each student is personally trained by the Instructor, whose personality and wide and varied experience are in themselves a guarantee of thorough and efficient tuition.

SEND SPECIMEN MS. FOR FREE CRITICISM.

Readers of EVERYMAN are invited to send a short story, essay or article upon any subject, and this will be criticised by the Instructor and returned together with full particulars of the P.C.C. Course. The P.C.C. will not accept any student who is unlikely to profit by the training—hence the invitation to examine MSS. free of charge. Investigation is invited, and all interested readers should send at once for full particulars to the Secretary,

PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
77, THANET HOUSE, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

poor should gamble is no doubt a mistake, but that we should blame them for gambling when their very existence is a gamble is another question. We have the two positions—that of the extravagant rich, so secure in their material position that means have to be found to enable them to evade the very responsibilities their position incurs. On the other hand, we have the position of the extravagant poor—so dependent on circumstances from day to day, and so liable to incidents which entirely alter their whole material outlook, that duty, while recognised in the abstract, must perforce give way to the conditions prevailing. That the poor should gamble is not surprising. They only are the true gamblers. That the extravagant rich should gamble seems ridiculous.

Mr. Macpherson duly notes what he considers a weak point in the Labour movement—the failure of the leaders to preach duty while being eloquent on rights. Has it not occurred to him that the highest duty of man is to establish and maintain his rights; that his position, until the accomplishment of such an aim, is that of a serf, and that the incidentals accruing to serfdom, such as gambling and drink, are only the inevitable corollary of a false and intolerable situation? The cult of so-called pleasure is undoubtedly wrong. But let us look to its source. Give to the extravagant rich their rights, but only their rights. Give to the extravagant poor their rights, and all their rights. In each case the perspective will so surely and certainly be altered that pleasure, instead of being a cult, will be the handmaid of the duty imposed on the units composing the only state which can effectively destroy the enervating influences of extravagance and poverty.—I am, sir, etc.,

February 5th, 1913.

F. G. M.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Hector Macpherson's commendable article, I venture to ask for an inch of your space.

Though it is well to talk to men in slums about intemperance and gambling, it is more especially the day for talking to the man in Park Lane about the slums. It is not the gambling of those in the slums which is to be branded "demoralising," but their miserable hovels. Gambling and a dozen kindred vices are but the branches from this root. Let the day be born when men shall find it a glorious happiness to give their personal attention to the management of slum estates, and not be content to indolently receive their rents.—I am, sir, etc.,

London, S.W.

S. W. COOPER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In his article on the "Cult of Pleasure" Mr. Macpherson attacks both rich and poor on the score of national degeneracy. Take the matter of drink. If he will consult the statistics, he will find that not only are the British more temperate than they were ten years ago, but offend less in this direction than the people of other great industrial countries. In this direction your contributor's charge of national degeneracy is quite unfounded.

Mr. Macpherson then quotes the figures of a "leading statistician" to the effect that "over £5,000,000 annually goes into the pockets of the book-makers, a great proportion of which comes from those living on the edge of poverty." Surely we are entitled to ask how this unnamed statistician got his figures, for the unfortunate speculator would refuse to make known his losses, and the bookmaker would not be likely to publish the amount of his profits?

Some pessimistic gentlemen "who gave evidence before the Royal Commission" asserted that the "University Extension Movement is dead in many mining districts." Again, without contradicting Mr. Macpherson's authority, I ask him if he has consulted the reports issued by the Extension Boards of the various universities, and that of the Workers' Educational Association? The statements made in these are to the effect that there never was such a demand for education amongst the working classes as there is to-day. In the North Staffordshire Coalfield—the miners have themselves commenced a Higher Education Movement, which has met with wonderful success.—I am, sir, etc.,

Stoke-on-Trent.

J. HENRY CAWLEY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am quite in agreement with Mr. Macpherson that the cult of pleasure, carried to the extent he has indicated, spells national degeneracy. We are all of us shocked at the lavish expenditure of the rich, but the pity of it is that their pleasure is so necessary to the livelihood of the working classes. If those who amass wealth did not squander it in this fashion, many trades, and hence workers, would suffer thereby. To quote just one example: Many working girls find employment in large dressmaking establishments, where they make luxurious and expensive dresses for society ladies. In the season, when balls and social functions are in full swing, they are kept busy; but out of season, or owing to some other cause, as, for instance, national mourning, when society does not demand its extravagant dresses, their work ceases.

Now, what is the cause of this mad rush after pleasure in rich and poor alike? For an answer we must look to what is considered as its very opposite—work. The idle rich strive continually to surpass each new pleasure. The poor, to whom work means bread, go through their monotonous toil and drudgery, and when that is over try to obtain the full enjoyment out of life.

Work in this industrial age does not afford that healthy and pleasurable sensation which the craftsman enjoys, hence the craving for sensation. Oh that disciples of William Morris would arise, to take their places as true Labour leaders, advocating not only higher wages, but also the expression of those beautiful ideals with which that great Socialist was imbued!

If we do not get pleasure out of our work, if we are not filled with the joy of being alive, then we are on the wrong track. Let us, therefore, look to Work for our salvation from national degeneracy.—I am, sir, etc.,

NORMAN ELLIS.

THE SAD LOT OF THE SCHOOLMASTER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I was glad to see "Student's" letter in your issue of January 31st advocating that schoolmasters should be Civil servants.

There are three points which I should like to insist upon in the case of the assistant master:

(1) The schoolmaster, before taking up his work, should be required to pass a professional examination (such as a University diploma in education), as is the case in France and Germany. The public should demand that the very best men only should educate the youth of the country, and a professional qualifica-

WHEN I AM RUN DOWN.

Personal Statements of Well-known People.

Disinclination to effort of any kind, depression of spirits, and a "used up" sensation, are part of the lot of those who are run down.

In a large proportion of cases this condition is due to a deficiency in the body's supply of those essential elements which are needed for the repair of nerves and tissues. When these are made good, the objectionable symptoms disappear at once. In spite of this simple method of cure, many people regard their lack of vigour and general run-down condition as natural to themselves, and never take steps to overcome their suffering.

Yet it is extraordinarily easy to overcome the enervating sensations due to being run down, and to get vigorous, strong, and full of vitality. Read the letters printed below from celebrities who were run down, but were quick to realise the advantages to be derived from Sanatogen. They took it, and gained splendid health and vigour.

Why do not you follow their example? Instead of often feeling listless and out of sorts, you will gain an unaccustomed and glorious sensation of health and vitality.

The Rt. Hon. THOMAS BURT, M.P., Member of H.M. Privy Council:

"I have used Sanatogen for some time past with excellent results. I have found it most useful as a tonic when I have been run down."

Thos Burt.

The Rt. Rev. the BISHOP OF CHICHESTER:

"I have found Sanatogen a first-rate pick-me-up for a tired digestion, on arriving home late at night after a long day's work."

C. J. A. Cusk.

Sir CHARLES A. CAMERON, C.B., M.D., F.R.C.P., etc.,
Medical Officer of Health and Public Analyst, Dublin:

"I have arrived at the conclusion that Sanatogen is a substance of the highest nutritive value, containing as it does a large amount, relatively speaking, of organic phosphorus—that is, phosphorus which is offered to the tissues in exactly the form in which it can be easily absorbed. It is an excellent nerve food."

Charles A. Cameron.

Sir ALEXANDER CROSS, Bart.:

"I have no doubt Sanatogen has had a material effect in the vigour and physical fitness with which I have been enabled to go through my duties. It is only fair to say I have been rather surprised at the results. They have just been what you predicted."

Alexander Cross.

Mr. HARRY DE WINDT:

"I have derived enormous benefit from taking a short course of Sanatogen. Sanatogen, in a few short weeks, has made a new man of me, both physically and mentally."

Harry de Windt.

Anæmia, dyspepsia, lassitude, and the innumerable symptoms which are associated with nervous disorders, all disappear rapidly when Sanatogen is taken. It restores and invigorates the system after influenza, operations, and illness generally; while it is invaluable for nursing mothers. It also rapidly improves the condition of weakly children, making them vigorous, robust, and full of life and energy.

That every reader of EVERYMAN may prove these statements for himself, Messrs. A. Wulff and Co., 12, Chancery Street, London, W.C., will send a Free Sample to all who write for it, mentioning this paper.

Sanatogen can be bought from all Chemists, from 1s. 6d. per tin.

TO THE RHEUMATIC AND GOUTY

as well as those suffering from

BACKACHE SCIATICA

INDIGESTION

STIFFNESS

NEURITIS

HEADACHE

LUMBAGO

NEURALGIA

COLDS

ANTURIC BATH SALTS

give relief by extracting from the blood and muscles the URIC ACID in the system, which, if not invariably the direct cause of these ailments, does much to aggravate them.

In addition to being a proved treatment for the above complaints there is nothing so refreshing and reviving as an ANTURIC BATH when tired or out of sorts.

TREATISE EXPLAINING HOW and WHY this treatment is so successful
FREE on application.

ANTURIC SALTS, Ltd. (Dept. E), 379, Strand, W.C.

How I Saved £11-15-3 of my Clothes Cost in One Year!

Like most fellows who wish to take advantage of all that will help them along socially and financially, I wanted to "keep up appearances," and to look as smart and well-dressed as the people I came in contact with. I liked good clothes, but found their cost limited my expenditure in other ways. Then I thought I would see if "Achille Serre" could help me. Their advertisements said they could make old clothes "practically as good as new," so I sent one suit as a test. The result was such an agreeable surprise that I followed it up with others instead of buying new. The following balance-sheet shows the difference it made in my expenses.

What I should have spent.	What I did spend.
3 New Suits at 60/- each £9 0 0	3 Suits "Achille Serred" at 3/9 each 11 3
1 New Overcoat at £3 10 0	1 Overcoat "Achille Serred" at 3/6 3 6
	14 9
	SAVED! £11 15 3
£12 10 0	£12 10 0

The "Achille Serre" Process of cleaning removes all marks of wear and restores the good shape of your clothes. It costs but 3/9 for a suit—and takes but Four Days. Write for Booklet—"Pride of Dress"—or send a suit direct.

Achille Serre Ltd.

Hackney Wick, London.

Branches and Agents Everywhere.

tion, in addition to academic qualification, ought to ensure this.

(2) The salary of an assistant master should rise automatically with his term of service, and he should receive a pension after, say, thirty years' service. There is a widespread idea that a schoolmaster's life is "all holiday," and that he deserves to be paid accordingly. I have often been told that my work "begins at nine and ends at four." Happy the schoolmaster whose teaching hours occupy more than half the time he devotes to the school! Games, officers' training corps, and the endless correction of books, etc., are not done between nine and four.

(3) Celibacy should not be demanded of the schoolmaster. Under the present system a man is prevented from marrying, not only by poverty, but by the knowledge that his position may be rendered insecure by marriage, and his chance of preferment very considerably lessened. This is almost universally true, especially in the public schools. It is no uncommon thing to find a staff of a dozen men of whom the head master only is married. One head master who interviewed me informed me that he expected me to be a regular attendant at Holy Communion in the school chapel, and that if I married I must expect to be asked to leave. Another offered me a £10 rise on condition I did not marry. A few weeks ago a friend of mine received a letter from the head master of a certain school, asking for particulars about a man who had applied for a vacant post. He desired to know particularly if the applicant had Socialistic views.

These, then, are conditions under which the schoolmaster is supposed to do his work: he must have approved religious and political views, must not marry, or do so with the disapproval of the head master, and he may not receive more than £160 per annum. (This is a high average estimate.)

We are told that the state of English education is deplorable. Of course it is deplorable. Money is spent on building and equipment and in paying large salaries to head masters, while the men who do the educating are not considered; they are willy-nilly philanthropists. The tragedy of the capable man of forty-five, who is too old for a headship, and is earning the same miserable salary as he did twenty years ago, is only too common in our secondary schools. If State control is going to improve the condition of the "worker," Heaven send State control soon!—I am, sir, etc.,

M. A.

February 3rd, 1913.

THE FRENCH DOWRY SYSTEM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been much interested in the discussion of the French "dowry" system, but I do not remember to have seen any reference to the biological aspect of the question; an aspect, to my mind, which is of considerable importance. It was, I believe, the late Francis Galton who gave a certain amount of prominence, some forty years ago, to the influence exercised by the dot system in checking the increase of the population of France.

If, as I suppose, your correspondent, Yvonne M. Salmon, is a Frenchwoman, I think she will bear me out in stating that on the French marriage market—using the expression without offensive meaning—the fille unique and, to a lesser extent perhaps, the filis unique are regarded as specially desirable, while in a similar way a preference tends to be shown for children of small families as compared with those where children are numerous, and where the amount available for "dowry" purposes must be spread over a large area.

It is generally admitted that children of large families tend to be more prolific than those of small ones, and where one of the parents is an only child there is a prima facie probability of there being an absence of issue, a probability greatly increased if both parents are only children.

It is not difficult to appreciate how great may be the cumulative effect of this financial selection, continued through many generations, in checking the natural increase of a country's population. If, then, there be any element of truth in Galton's theory, the "dowry" system is one of the last things we should desire to introduce into this country—it is, of course, already found in the wealthier classes—in view of the significant figures which are brought before our notice periodically by the Registrar-General.—I am, sir, etc.,

W. G. BARRETT.

Honor Oak, S.E., February 3rd, 1913.

THE INTRINSIC VALUE OF THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—“Octogenarian” praises the Bible as being the summit of English literature. Surely literature has nothing whatever to do with the intrinsic value of the Bible as the Word of God.

Again, “Octogenarian” claims to speak for the “Church of Christ” when he says that he does not accept “the infallibility of every word in the Book.” This is a very dangerous statement without further explanation. Does the writer mean to say that we are free to accept some parts of the Bible and reject others? Surely the point is this. We do not go to the Bible for exact history or to learn geography or any natural science. We go there for a Divine message to the individual. I am a Swedenborgian.—I am, sir, etc.,

RICHARD H. TEED.

Derby.

THE PARTITION OF POLAND.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I beg to thank you for your interesting article on the “Partition of Poland” in issue of January 31st. I only regret that you did not refer to the only noble incident in all that sordid and dishonourable act of royal brigandage, viz., Maria Theresa's personal repudiation and noble shame at being forced to be a party thereto. Her indignant words ring true in our ears to this day, and her attitude is the grandest thing any member of the House of Hapsburg ever did. This is her letter to her Minister, Prince Kaunitz:—“Feb. 1772. When my lands were invaded, and when I did not know where to find a place to be brought to bed in, I relied on my good right and the help of God. But in this thing, where not only public law cries to Heaven against us, but also all natural justice and sound reason, I must confess never in my life to have been in such trouble, and am ashamed to shew my face. Let the Prince (Kaunitz) consider what an example we are giving to all the world, if, for a miserable piece of Poland, or of Moldavia, or Wallachia, we throw our reputation to the winds. I well see that I am alone, and no more in vigour; therefore I must, though to my very great sorrow, let things take their course.”

And, some days afterwards, here is her Majesty's official assent:—“Placet, since so many great and “Always complete but never finished.”

Globe-Wernicke
“Elastic” Bookcases

combine the useful with the beautiful. Being built of “Units,” which are interlocked by a patent device, one can easily move them about from room to room or house to house, and rearrange them in new and harmonious groupings without taking out the books inside—an advantage not possessed by ordinary bookcases.

Another important advantage is the individual library. That is, one or more sections may be placed in different rooms so that favourite authors are within instant reach at any hour. And a third advantage is this: There is no limit to the capacity of a Globe-Wernicke “Elastic” Bookcase. As fast as your book possessions increase you can add more “Units” to accommodate them. You never have to sell a Globe-Wernicke “Elastic” Bookcase in order to obtain a larger one. For full particulars see Cat.: No. 729.

Packing Free.—Orders for £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.;

82, Victoria Street, S.W.; 98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

Learn to Sketch
in Two Hours . .

. . . An entirely new method of drawing has been invented by A. A. Braun, Director of the Association of Designers, Artists, and Illustrators (the well-known commercial studio). The A.B.C. or Hieroglyphic System of Drawing, which is taught by correspondence, enables students to produce creditable sketches after the first lesson. The complete Course contains hundreds of original devices (the outcome of experience) for obtaining immediate facility in remunerative commercial drawing. Write to-day, enclosing 1d. Postage, for Booklet T, with full details and opinions of leading illustrators, to

A.B.C. SCHOOL OF DRAWING,
46, Chaucery Lane, London.

REMAINDER BOOKS.—February Catalogue of Publishers' Remains Now Ready. Gratis and Post Free.—WM. GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, 11th Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon.

SHORT STORIES, Articles, Novels, placed with 179 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices and fairest terms. 16pp. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

PRACTICAL FRENCH OR GERMAN LESSONS. Easy modern methods. Good pronunciation, conversation, grammar, commercial. Moderate.—W. BERGHOFF, 2, Harmsworth Street, Kennington, S.E.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30, 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, 11th Holborn, London, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. POYLER, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8189.)

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS" (Copyright)

evolved by G. H. Cox and invariably used by nature when concentration of Brain Power is required; exemplified in Musicians, Scientists, etc., through all ages.

All subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE. A natural gift.

EVERY musician can play from memory by this system. It gives new essential ideas on TEACHING and PRACTISING.

Dr. W. F. Cholmeley, F.R.C.S., Windsor, Hampton.—"It seems to me to get at the whole root of the matter and to prove conclusively the absurdity of the modern method of education. In your medical and scientific facts I can find no flaw, and the deductions you draw from them appear to me to be absolutely sound."

Mr. H. Stanley, 10, Princes Street, Hanover Square, London, Your Specialist and Lecturer.—"I consider the instructions of great value to parents, teachers, professional men—in fact, to all who realise the importance of memory, will, and clear thinking as the basis of successful achievement. It opens up new and more definite ways of teaching and learning, which prove that many of our previous methods of teaching and learning music, singing, and general educational subjects have been antagonistic to Nature. In consequence of this antagonism, the acquisition of accomplishments and of mental attainments of many students and children have been greatly retarded, if not almost wasted. The amount of time to be saved thereby will be enormous."

Business Man (Huddersfield).—"I have worked through two memory systems, but I am sure you have got nearer to the root of the trouble with your memories than anything I have come across before. I am making constant use of your system every day with very satisfactory results."

A Schoolmaster near Leicester.—"Your system COMPELS a thoroughness which I never dreamed of before—a REAL thoroughness which I have already begun to apply to the violin and the removal of a defect of speech of many years' standing, namely, the trilling of the letter R."

Musicians, Teachers, Students, Engineers, Speakers, Business Men, and all who need memory, should writer stating subject required for. GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhall College), Address—Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

learned men will have it so: but long after I am dead it will be known what this violating of all that was hitherto held sacred and just will give rise." These very magnificent words should be engraved on granite and placed in the most public place in Vienna, to remain as a perpetual memorial to remind future generations of their greatest Sovereign.

Austria has had less trouble with her Polish subjects than either of the other Royal robbers of an ancient nation's independence. To Russia and Prussia their stolen goods have proved a veritable dannosa hereditas to this very hour! May your good wishes for Polish independence be soon fulfilled, and this blot on the map of Europe be speedily removed.—I am, sir, etc.,

TWEEDIENSIS.

February 1st, 1913.

CATHOLIC EDUCATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I beg that you will allow me to make use of your columns in order to answer the attack made by "F. A." in your issue of January 31st against Catholic methods of education. I began my education in a Catholic elementary school, and finished it at a well-known Catholic college. Moreover, I am now a Catholic priest, so that I also may claim to speak from experience, and my experience obliges me to state, boldly and unhesitatingly, that in both the elementary school and the college in which I was educated the law of God regarding the virtue of purity was taught with as much emphasis and lucidity as could be applied to such a delicate subject. Only a boy who wilfully threw dust into his own eyes and outraged his conscience could, after receiving such teaching, have persuaded himself that indulgence in the vice of impurity was "perfectly natural and harmless."

As a Catholic priest I must confess that the Catholic clergy do regard this subject as a "nightmare," inasmuch as they share with all decent-minded people a proper horror of the sin and its consequences; but that they make no effort to deal with it I most emphatically deny. It may be debated whether or no it is advisable to "enlighten" children on this question. Personally, I admire innocence (which does generally mean ignorance, in spite of all sophisms to the contrary) so much that I should be sorry to destroy it by teaching the wisdom of the serpent a moment before it had to be learned, particularly as the knowledge of sexual matters so often breeds morbid curiosity, and at once opens the way to sin. As a rule, I imagine that both priests and parents prefer that the matter be dealt with in the confessional. There the mischief can best be repaired, except in the case of those who are not candid with their confessors. There is no way of helping these until they choose to accept the truth, which hitherto they have refused to believe.

From "F. A.'s" letter it would appear that the enemies of the Catholic Church are changing their tactics. They were wont to rage because she found a certain beauty in virginity; because she thought, with St. Paul, that there were certain things which ought not so much as to be named among us; because, in a word, she taught morality by the positive method; that is, she taught her children to admire and practise modesty, knowing full well that the best means of escaping from any vice is to aim at the opposite virtue.—I am, sir, etc.,

(Rev.) WILLIAM FOLEY.

The Presbytery, Tottenham Road, Kingsland, N.,
February 2nd, 1913.

[This correspondence is now closed.—ED.]

200 VARIETIES SWEET PEAS, 6d. and 1/- pkts. Write for free circular. I can save you pounds.—ROGERS, "Seedsmen," Selbourne Road, Luton.

NEW GEORGIAN CLUB: The White House, Randolph Crescent, N.—A quiet, comfortable Residence for Women of good social status. Rooms from 25s. weekly, including baths, breakfast, and dinner. Non-members received at special rates.—Apply Secretary.

TYPEWRITING intelligently executed; good paper; high references. 7d. per 1,000.—Mrs. Manners, 42, Delvino Road, Parson's Green, S.W.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

SEND A POSTCARD TO-DAY for a large illustrated and coloured catalogue of giant sweet peas. It gives full particulars of all novelties for 1913.—HENRY ECKFORD, Sweet Pea Specialist, Dept. 741, Wem, Shropshire.

THE MONTAGUE AUTOMATIC SECRETARY

It is often too much trouble to write out cards for a "Follow-up" system of correspondence. Accounts Due, Freight Claims, Advertisement Replies, Enquiries, etc. Moreover, documents should not be permanently filed until fully dealt with, otherwise it is difficult to keep together all papers on one subject. The illustration shows exactly what the MONTAGUE AUTOMATIC SECRETARY is.

Each day the contents of that day's folder are attended to, and the empty folder is then placed at the back of the guide marked "Next Month." It is not necessary for the 4to Outfit, 2/9.

Fcap size, 3/9.

user to keep the file, the Typist or Confidential Clerk can bring in the day's folder, take necessary particulars and refile the documents according to how they are dealt with.

Send for the MONTAGUE AUTOMATIC SECRETARY to-day, to the Sole Makers:—

TAPP & TOOTHILL, LTD.,
27, WARWICK LANE, LONDON, E.C.

THE FEBRUARY MAGAZINES

I.

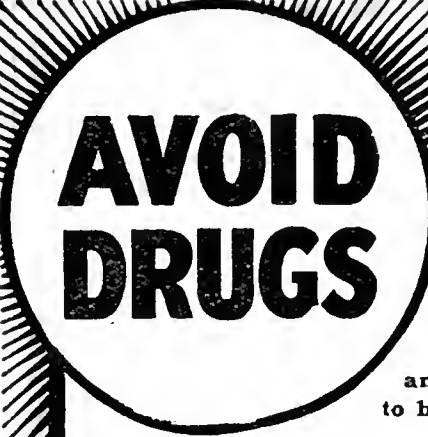

THE new President of the United States has a combative personality—at least, this is the impression conveyed by his remarkable article in the Fortnightly Review, entitled "Freemen Need no Guardians." It is an indictment of the recent Government of the United States characterised by amazing candour, one might almost say indiscretion, for it is surely bad tactics on the part of Dr. Woodrow Wilson to arraign, on the eve of taking office, his two immediate predecessors. Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft, we are told, are incapable of looking at the affairs of the country with a view of the new age and of a changed set of circumstances. The flaw in the government of the United States is that it does not rely upon the average integrity and intelligence of the common people, but is controlled by "big bankers, big masters of commerce, the heads of railroad corporations, and of steamship corporations." But Dr. Woodrow Wilson will not live under trustees if he can help it. He intends "to be President of the people of the United States." Of several articles dealing with questions of defence and foreign politics we would specially note "Great Britain and the Next War," wherein Sir A. Conan Doyle records his impressions of General von Bernhardi's "Germany and the Next War." Hitherto, Sir Arthur has never believed in the German menace, but he is now convinced of the possibility of such an attack as the result of reading this book. In the latter part of his article he gives his views on defence, and says the Channel Tunnel is essential to Great Britain's safety. Equally interesting, from the point of view of defence, is Mr. Archibald Hurd's plea for a War-Book of the Empire.

II.

The new number of the National Review is rather below the average. There is a lack of important subjects, and those treated are not particularly interesting. Moreover, we very much doubt the wisdom of giving the place of honour to a speech of Mr. Austen Chamberlain which has been fully reported in the daily press. The editor (Mr. L. J. Maxse) modestly puts his own article, "A Radical 'Panama,'" last, but as it is by far the most readable it might well have been given the premier position. Whether one agrees with Mr. Maxse or not, he is always lively and at his best when laying bare what he conceives to be the hopeless incompetency of the Government. "Our Coming Danger-Period" is the title of a somewhat hysterical article by "Navalis," in which he denounces "the passivity of the British Admiralty" in view of the German menace. He considers the situation so grave as to warrant the early return of the New Zealand. He also suggests that the fourth battle squadron should be kept in home waters during the autumn, and that the Home Fleet should be as far as possible concentrated and maintained at its maximum strength during the second half of the year.

III.

We congratulate the editor of The British Review upon his second number, which is quite up to the level of his first. There is plenty of variety and abundance of good writing, with the result that the dull pages are few and far between. Mr. Hilaire Belloc contributes the first instalment of a suggestive article on "Fiscal Reform," which he regards as "a necessary result of the conditions, external and domestic, under which modern England lies." Mr. Francis McCullagh records his experiences as "A Prisoner of the Bul-

AVOID DRUGS

If taken frequently drugs lose their power and doses have to be increased.

For the safe and certain relief and cure of . . .

INDIGESTION, ACIDITY, FLATULENCY, HEARTBURN, and IMPURE BREATH,

Bragg's Pure Vegetable Charcoal has never yet been equalled. It absorbs the impure gases generated in the stomach and bowels and carries them out of the system, thus removing the CAUSE of digestive disturbance and at the same time cleansing the blood.

BRAGG'S CHARCOAL

may be taken regularly with constant benefit by young or old. It is invaluable also in Diarrhoea and Fever. Doctors largely recommend it and use it in their own families.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores. Biscuits, 1/-, 2/- and 4/- per tin; Powder, 2/- per bottle; Lozenges, 1/1½ per tin; Chocolates, 1/- per tin; Capsules, 2/- per box.

FREE SAMPLES sent to anyone mentioning this Journal and enclosing 3d. stamps for postage in the British Empire and U.S.A.

J. L. BRAGG'S, Ltd., 14, WIGMORE ST., LONDON, W.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount price from Hunter & Loughurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. New Catalogue, just ready, sent post free.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

PRINT YOUR OWN CIRCULARS, Cards, etc.—Printing Presses complete from 10s. to £5. "Printing Made Easy," 6d.—Adams Bros., Daventry.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.

A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

Larger Income. Longer Life.

A Canada Life Annuity offers to the prudent investor the highest possible return coupled with complete security.

£1,000 invested by a man of 69 in a Canada Life Annuity yields over 13% per annum. He receives an income of £132 16s. 0d. for the rest of his life.

His capital, in common with the whole of the funds of the Canada Life, is under the direct control of the Canadian Government. The regular payment of his income is guaranteed by the assets of the Company—£10,000,000—and further by the high standing and integrity of the Oldest and Strongest Colonial Assurance Office. The increased comfort and entire freedom from all financial anxiety which it carries add many years to life.

Write for Special Annuity Booklet, stating age.

Canada Life Assurance Company

CANADA LIFE BUILDING,

15, KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON, E.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed at home (Remington Brief), 7d. per thousand. Duplicating and Copying. Translations. Shorthand. Cambridge Local.—Miss NACNY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws"; in a Nutshell, on Card. Teaches the new way to acquire Knowledge. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., Plays and General MSS., 8d. per 1,000 words; with free carbon-copy. Over 5 years' experience.—C. Girton, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

BOOKS.—Wanted, last edition Encyclopædia Britannica. Bargains: Sherard's Oscar Wilde (12/6), 5/-; Hegel's Philosophy of Religion (56/-), 12/6. State wants.—Galloway & Porter, Booksellers, Cambridge.

SCALE OF RATES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS IN

EVERYMAN

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY. 1d. PRESS DAY—TUESDAY.

	Whole Page	Half Page	¼ Page	¼th Page
FIRST THREE RIGHT HAND PAGES ...	£22 10 0	£11 5 0	£5 12 6	—
ORDINARY POSITIONS—Facing not less than Half a page of matter.	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
BACK PAGE	£20 0 0	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	—

PER INCH (2 columns to the Page, 3 inches wide), 21s.
Depth of Page, 10½ inches.

ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
Telephone: 2452 Central. Telegrams: "Templarian, London."

gars"; Father Joseph Keating writes of "The Ethics of Resistance to Law" according to the teaching of the Church of Rome; and Mr. J. Godfrey Raupert, in an article entitled "Some Light on the Mystery of Evil," gives interesting extracts from the private letters of a Catholic priest who, for many years, was subject to extraordinary psychical experiences. Two papers discuss the Irish question. "A Child of Ulster" drives home "the fact that Ulster means to resist," and Mr. Richard Fitzwalter pleads for a parley.

IV.

In the Westminster Review we miss the sprightliness of its younger contemporaries. It has respect for tradition; and as we turn over its pages we have more than a suggestion of that strict sobriety of thought and expression so characteristic of the days when John Stuart Mill and "George Eliot" were among its chief contributors. A little humour and more "humanness" would certainly brighten this magazine. The current number opens with an article on "Goethe and the Prometheus Legend," and closes with one on "Woman Labour and Moral Strength"—two rather unattractive subjects. Then we have Mr. R. H. Bradley discoursing on "Aristotle's Views on Music," and Mr. Elijah Greenleaf raising the question as to whether the Last Supper was a Passover. Coming to mundane topics, Mr. W. Turner writes on "Commerce and Party Politics," Mr. Griffith Jones contributes the last of a series of papers on the Welsh Church Bill, Mr. Ernest F. Allnutt says some sensible things regarding "Private and Public Liberty," and Dr. F. D. W. Bates treats us to somewhat belated views on the Divorce Commission report. An article in the lighter vein is Mr. F. W. Orde Ward's, on "Quotations and Misquotations."

V.

Under its new editor, Mr. Harold Cox, the Edinburgh Review seems to be renewing its youth. Not only is Mr. Cox enlisting the services of fresh and talented writers who are intimately in touch with the problems of to-day, but he is drawing upon a wider range of subjects than used to be the case. In the new number two articles only are unsigned. The first, with which the volume opens, comments cautiously on the findings of the Divorce Commission, and suggests that if legislation could be passed incorporating the points of agreement between the Majority and Minority Commissioners, we should make an immense step forward. The other unsigned article deals sagaciously with what should be Britain's attitude towards the rearrangement of European territory and the readjustment of European relationships. "The Englishman's Dilemma" is the title of a weighty criticism by Mr. Cox of the British party system, under which he thinks there is no relation of any kind between the public interest of the nation and the private interest of the politician. Among other articles we would note Mr. Francis Gribble's, on "The Destiny of Switzerland."

VI.

Literature figures prominently in the current number of the Quarterly Review. Mr. Henry Cloriston writes on "Some of New Versions of Leopardi," Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole on "Swift's Correspondence," Mr. Francis Bickley on "New Facts About Matthew Prior," and Mr. Algernon Cecil on "Disraeli: The First Two Phases." Religion is represented by a searching review of the life-work of Father Tyrrell, from the pen of the Rev. Alfred Fawkes. The writer thinks that Tyrrell's natural home was in the English Church. Theologically, "he was constructive in aim, and conservative in method."

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MR. DESMOND COKE has given us a realistic study of the novelist who can only write "with a lobelia on the table before him," and makes his entire household writhe in misery when he cannot find the exact word! We have met the character before in fiction; but Hubert, in HELENA BRETT'S CAREER (Chapman and Hall, 6s.), is drawn with a fidelity lacking in his prototypes, and while we despise him wholeheartedly for his miserable selfishness, we sympathise with his childish vanity and good nature. The story opens with an old friend advising him to marry. The occasion of the counsel was a particularly distressing scene that had occurred between the novelist and his sister Ruth. The latter is most admirably drawn, and the quarrel that perpetually recurs is quite one of the best things in the book. "Ruth was always claiming to have sacrificed herself. She didn't matter. . . . No one must consider her. She hadn't married, she gave up her life willingly to her dear brother. . . . When all the while she never did a single thing he wanted, but in the most selfish way made everything as hard as it could be for his work, when she herself was doing nothing!"

You feel Ruth is an unspeakable person till, with an adroit touch, Mr. Coke turns the light on to the other side, and you learn that "she always went abruptly, never said good-night. He had told her long ago that those words broke up his evening and made him think of bed instead of work." Hubert takes his friend's advice, marries, and Helena, the lady of his choice, learns "the whole duty of an author's wife," and arranges his writing-table with flowers and candlesticks, tactfully removes unfavorable reviews from his notice, and listens to his grumblings when his story will not move. The author is, we think, a little unfair to the wretched man when he endows Helena, not only with literary genius, but sells thirty thousand of her first book. The account of the boom attendant on Zoe Baskerville's great work—Helena's pseudonym—is immense. The publisher, Mr. Blatchley, who prided himself on not being old-fashioned, worked the Press magnificently. Flaring headlines appear in the evening papers, and a controversy rages as to who wrote "The Confessions of an Author's Wife."

Cleverly written, with an underlying sense of humour, Mr. Coke has achieved a merited success.

THE HARVEST MOON (Ward, Lock and Co., 6s.) is a collection of short stories centring round a pearl, with which tradition associates tragedy. Whoever has possession of the gem, or in any way concerns himself with its discovery, is made the victim of a series of terrible events, culminating in bloodshed, murder, and death. Mr. Justus Miles Forman possesses the art of telling a startling story in an agreeable, almost colloquial style that shades the suggestion of improbability and creates an atmosphere of verisimilitude. A tale told in the chimney corner full of wild adventures, hairbreadth escapes, carries conviction. And the tales of the "Harvest Moon," with their swift touches of drama and sudden gusts of passion, carry the reader on a surge of expectation beyond the standpoint of criticism. The volume opens with "Hayes." The scene is laid in a South Sea island, and the vivid colour, the greens and blue and gold of the Tropics, make an admirable background for the swift-moving drama. Hayes is a derelict Englishman, six foot tall, with a temperament and a past. A schooner, owned by Mr. and Lady Evelyn Rede-Barnes, touches at the island, and Lady Evelyn goes

A Magnificent Engraving after

LORD LEIGHTON

A FREE GIFT TO PICTURE-LOVING READERS.

Never before has such an offer been made to "Everyman" Readers.

As all the world knows, Lord Leighton was one of the greatest artists of the 19th Century, and his beautiful painting of "Wedded," which was exhibited at the Royal Academy, London, always attracted crowds of delighted admirers to this—one of his greatest masterpieces.

"WEDDED."
By LORD LEIGHTON,
President of the Royal Academy

A Beautiful Engraving as a Gift.

This picture has been selected as a Special Gift for those readers who would like to have it for the embellishment of their homes. It is a fine engraving, produced by hand direct from the engraved plate, on fine quality plate paper, measuring 22 by 15 inches, that is now offered.

Originally Published at One Guinea.

Great interest and enthusiasm has been aroused by this unique offer, and already many letters have been received from delighted recipients of these choice hand-printed Engravings, who until recently were unable to obtain one at less than 21s. per copy.

No Competition to Enter.

In applying for one of these free Engravings, you are under no obligation to purchase any pictures or frames, neither is there any competition to enter—all you have to do is to fill up the coupon at foot and send it to the Secretary, Oxford Fine Art Gallery, 63, Baker Street, London, W. (a firm established 32 years and enjoying Royal patronage), with a registration fee of 6d. in stamps or Postal Order to defray the cost of box and postage per Parcel Post, on receipt of which the Engraving will be carefully packed and despatched at once to your home.

LET IT BE CLEARLY UNDERSTOOD

that the presentation of these delightful examples of the Painter's and Engraver's Art is being made at an enormous expense, and solely for the purpose of introducing the Illustrated Catalogue, wherein an important offer is made of copy-right Engravings and other pictures at specially reduced prices, and to bring the quality of the work to the notice of readers;

Under Royal Patronage. Est. 32 years. Tel. 3727 Mayfair.

COUPON FOR FREE ENGRAVING OF LORD LEIGHTON'S "WEDDED."

To THE OXFORD FINE ART GALLERY, 63, Baker St., London, W.

Sirs,—I accept your offer of a free Engraving of LORD LEIGHTON'S famous picture, "WEDDED." I enclose Registration Fee of 6d. to defray cost of box and postage per Parcel Post, and request that the Engraving and your Illustrated Catalogue be sent to me, gratis and post free.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

N.B.—If the Illustrated Catalogue only is required, no stamps need be sent.
E.M.14.2.13.

for a walk of exploration. She discovers the derelict "on a lonely beach," and the two, mutually attracted, become confidential and exchange reminiscences. He shows her the Harvest Moon, and she falls under its magic spell. There is not lacking a spice of danger to cement the attraction. The natives on the track of the gem attack Hayes, who, with Lady Evelyn's assistance—she carries a revolver—beats them off. He realises she is not happy with Rede-Barnes, and implores her to elope with him. He even goes so far as to pursue her to the schooner. She declines the proposal, in spite of his attraction. Ultimately, Hayes is shot dead in a mélée with the police. Lady Evelyn shoots herself, and falls dead over his body. The climax is treated in a simple yet forceful style that divests it of improbability. We read the story as we listen to the telling of a tale, full of belief. The other numbers in the volume are well up to the same level. Mr. Forman has given us a delightful book.

Mrs. Fred Reynolds has written a powerful novel about Cornish folk. THE GRANITE CROSS (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) is remarkable for its strength of characterisation and its simple and convincing style. No one knows how the Granite Cross came to be there, no one knows who erected it, for what purpose or memorial it stood. But the fisher-folk, all unconsciously, regarded it as a symbol, and that it had its influence upon their lives it is the author's purpose to show. Mrs. Reynolds gives us some vivid scene-painting. The soft greens and greys of Cornwall fill the book, serving as an admirable background for the vivid personality of Judith Marston. Restless and ambitious, dissatisfied with society life, yet lacking the depth of character to find a lasting satisfaction in more simple things, she surrenders for a time to the influence of Matthew Treen, an artist. Simple as most painters are, Matthew falls head over ears in love with the brilliant woman; but after a while the very simplicity and strength that first attracted her palls on Judith. She breaks with Matthew, unconsciously, almost indifferent that she is twisting his soul, and returns to her brilliant circle in London.

The book sustains the same note of power throughout. Illuminative and compelling. Mrs. Reynolds is to be congratulated on her achievement.

Mr. Compton-Mackenzie's CARNIVAL (Martin Secker, 6s.) is a wonderful study of the lower middle class. His portrayal of the Islington ménage is inimitable. The forlorn fashion in which Mrs. Raeburn clings to the tattered remnant of gentility bequeathed by her grandfather, the chemist; the manner in which his reputation is thrust forward on every occasion of domestic dispute, makes delicious reading. Mrs. Raeburn did not know why she married, unless it was that she felt a working plumber was a more satisfactory refuge than a home with her austere aunts. The book opens with her thoughts and reflections; one gets a wonderful glimpse of a woman's imagination. Up to the present she feels life has brought her but few compensations. It has lost the faintest flush of roseate romance with which it was clothed in her girlhood's days. Her husband is an unmitigated failure, and addicted in a marked degree to insobriety. Her children, though she loves them dearly, are eminently commonplace, painfully matter of fact. She is about to have a third child, and almost prays that the new baby may possess something of that attraction she has always felt lacking in herself. Jenny more than gratifies her mother's longing. She was born laughing, and smiled and danced her way through life. She is speedily discontented with the Islington ménage, and somewhat alarms her mother by her desire to become a dancer. Jenny has a drastic method of obtaining her own way. When she was refused, she declined to eat, and resolutely starved herself until her parents gave way. In the ultimate she achieves her desire, and then finds that the expectation brought her more keen delight than the realisation. She is inevitably attractive, and dances lightly among her many admirers, playing fast and loose with innumerable hearts, until, her brother warns her, she will one day be shot. The end of "Carnival" is disappointing. There was, we feel, no adequate reason for the tragedy. Jenny, as the author paints her, was not the stuff of which victims were made, and the man whom, in a fit of almost inexplicable depression, she chooses for her husband would, we feel, not have been able to hold her against her will for a day. Maurice Castleton, the man who captured her fancy, if not her love, is a clever study of selfishness and irresponsibility. "Carnival" is finely written, with vivid touches of humour and dramatic power.

Miss Constance Smedley has a light, bright touch, is eminently readable, and sometimes distinguished in her style. NEW WINE AND OLD BOTTLES (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.) is centred round a country town. New End is admirably described: "But little traffic came through New End; a row of empty shops across the way presented mournful testimony of its dullness. Glaringly large and new, their stucco fronts and white-washed windows seemed an excrescence on the dignified little town. Now and again a deluded optimist had filled a window with his wares, but whether these shops were too big for Scroose, too ostentatious, or too generally cavernous and yawning, up to the present trade refused to come." Mr. Griggs, the tailor, brought a new spirit of enterprise into the town. He is an artist in advertisement, and proceeds by slow and careful degrees to revolutionise the shopkeeping element. Griggs dominates the story, seen or unseen, but other characters are ably portrayed. The dissemination of new ideas—Socialism is in the air, and the results on the small shopkeeping elements of its discussion are amusingly related. In an age when authors seem impelled to write long dissertations on problems Miss Constance Smedley is to be congratulated on having given us a bright, refreshing, clever picture of a country town.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

CLOTH
1/- NET
PER VOL.

TO BE COMPLETED
IN 12 VOLS.

LEATHER
2/- NET
PER VOL.

The ideal Encyclopædia is one which with the minimum of trouble provides you with the maximum of information. "Everyman" does that. It is the most convenient Encyclopædia in existence, for its 12 vols., with their 6,000,000 words, will stand within a single foot of shelf space.

WHAT THE PRESS THINKS.

DAILY NEWS.—"No stately folio opens more uncompromisingly flat, the thin page making no unseemly attempt at independence; and although 600 such pages lie within a breadth of a bare three-quarters of an inch, the indispensable opacity is much more perfectly preserved than in some much more grandiose works which have sought to compress the full quart of learning into the pint pot of portability."

MANCHESTER COURIER.—"There can be little doubt that countless readers, hitherto prevented only by considerations of cost from acquiring what has become an indispensable part of every household, will be quick to take advantage of this golden opportunity of possessing an encyclopædia which not only answers all their everyday needs, but also makes a handsome addition to any library."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"It is not easy to know who should be congratulated most; the editor, Mr. Andrew Boyle, on so admirable an achievement, the publishers on so courageous an undertaking, or the public on the prospect of being able to purchase for twelve monthly shillings a complete encyclopædia of knowledge."

VOL. I. NOW ON SALE AND TO BE SEEN AT ALL BOOKSHOPS.

VOL. II. READY NEXT WEEK.

Send a Postcard for 8-page Prospectus.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, LONDON, W.C.

How to Raise Yourself Above the 'SMALL PAY' Crowd

THE people in the "small pay" crowd face a routine of monotonous, hopeless toil. They labour long hours for poor pay; have no responsibility; no freedom.

ARE you one of the men in that crowd? Are you anxious for higher pay, more responsibility, and more congenial work?

YOU can raise yourself above the crowd if you will. Thousands have done it; so can you. Are you not as good as they? If you lack anything essential to success, is it TRAINING?

TO-DAY it is the trained man who wins, always. But it is no longer necessary to go to school to be trained for a first-class post. Thousands who to-day hold high positions trained themselves by the I.C.S. way.

THE International Correspondence Schools show splendid results in this matter of raising men above the crowd. They give a man a practical, profitable training in his own home at small cost. The I.C.S. have already helped thousands of men and women to raise themselves above the crowd. They can help you.

THE proof of the value of the I.C.S. system of Training is found in the attitude of employers toward I.C.S. students. Employers everywhere are on the look-out for I.C.S. Trained Men. Every day the I.C.S. Students' Aid Department receives applications for I.C.S. Trained Men to fill well-paid positions; more such applications indeed than they can fill.

WHAT is to prevent YOU from qualifying yourself for better pay by aid of the I.C.S.? Doubling, perhaps trebling, your earnings in the immediate future? £1, or £2, or £3, or £4 more a week? Would not that be useful to you?

IN any case, you must admit that I.C.S. Training is worth enquiring about. Such an enquiry has been for thousands the first step to promotion and better pay. Take your first step on the way to Better Pay TO-DAY.

SUCCESS ENQUIRY COUPON.

International Correspondence Schools Ltd., 44b, International Buildings Kingsway, London, W.C.

Please explain, without any obligation on my part, how I can qualify for Better Pay in the position, trade or profession, or gain a knowledge of the subject before which I have marked X.

- | | |
|-------------------------|---------------------------------------|
| — Commercial Training | — Mechanical Engineering |
| — Advertising | — Electrical Engineering |
| — Illustrating | — Architecture |
| — Designing | — Contracting and Building |
| — Marine Engineering | — Structural Engineering |
| — Gas-Power Engineering | — Concrete Engineering |
| — Motor Engineering | — Chemistry |
| — Cotton Manufacturing | — French, German, Spanish,
Italian |
| — Woollen Manufacturing | — Agriculture, Poultry Farming |
| — Refrigeration | |
| — Steam Engineering | |

Over 180 Courses to choose from.

Name.....

Address.....

Please use full address.

Do not postpone your first step toward joining the "BIG PAY" Crowd. Enquire TO-DAY.

Mr. Secker, 6 class. His inimitable. I burn clings to. queathed by her in which his reputation of domestic dis. Mrs. Raeburn did not it was that she felt a satisfactory refuge than aunts. The book opens with reflections; one gets a wonderful imagination. Up to the present brought her but few compensations. faintest flush of roseate romance with clothed in her girlhood's days. Her unmitigated failure, and addicted in a marriage to insobriety. Her children, though she dearly, are eminently commonplace, painful of fact. She is about to have a third child, and prays that the new baby may possess some that attraction she has always felt lacking in Jenny more than gratifies her mother's longi-

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 19. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1913

One Penny.

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	581
Women at Work—I. The Shop Girl—
By Margaret Hamilton	582
The Hospital Nurse—Poem	583
Countries of the World—By the Editor
—VII. Holland	584
Should Lloyd George Imitate Napoleon?—By Emile Vandervelde	586
Silhouettes	587
Dostoeffski and the Religion of Human
Suffering	588
Portrait of Feodor Dostoeffski	589
Literary Notes	590

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

EMILE
VANDERVELDE
PROF. SAINTSBURY
NORMAN MACLEAN
MARGARET
HAMILTON

Masterpiece of the Week—Ruskin's	PAGE
"The Crown of Wild Olive"—By
Prof. Saintsbury	591
Unseen Literary Friends	592
In Arcady—Poem	592
The House Invisible—A Short Story—
By Allan Sullivan	593
The Beauty of Life	595
Main Currents of Modern Thought—
By Rudolf Eucken	596
A Great Ecclesiastic and a Great
Preacher—By Norman Maclean	597
Correspondence	598
The Day's Burden	604
Books of the Week	604
List of Books Received	610

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE being little authentic news from the Balkans, it is impossible to give even an outline of the progress of events. According to the Turkish official reports, all is going well with the Ottoman arms. On the other hand, unofficial messages sent from Constantinople by an indirect route announce that a portion of Adrianople is in flames and that the Turkish position is almost hopeless. And this would seem to be confirmed by the fact that Turkey has again requested the intervention of the Powers.

France, according to the Temps, proposes to spend many millions in increasing her military strength. This step is intended to be a prompt response to Germany's increased armaments. Three important schemes for the augmentation of the Army have recently been under consideration, and details of these will, it is expected, be announced by the Government next week.

An internecine war has broken out in Mexico, President Madero and his Government having become unpopular. The rebel army, headed by General Diaz, nephew of the late President, have had several fierce encounters with the Government troops, and hundreds are reported to have been killed. So far, the insurgents appear to have had most success. On Monday it was announced that a day's armistice had been concluded in order to arrange a neutral zone where foreigners might take refuge. President Madero has been asked to resign in the interests of peace, but this he declines to do.

The Antarctic disaster still continues to overshadow all other matters of public interest. Captain Scott's pathetic appeal on behalf of the wives and children of the dead heroes has not been in vain, for the Government have announced that ample provision will be made, and that a public appeal will not be necessary. A Mansion House Fund has been opened for a national memorial of Captain Scott and the members of the South Polar party.

The Welsh Disestablishment Bill was discussed for three days in the House of Lords, and was rejected by a majority of 201. No new points emerged in the debate, which derived its chief interest from the fact that the Bishops of Hereford and Oxford both supported the Bill. The former regarded it as a measure of justice long delayed, and the latter (Dr. Gore) could not conceive any justification for a religious Establishment which had ceased to commend itself to the majority of the people.

A sensational development in connection with the Select Committee on the Marconi Contract occurred on Wednesday week, when Mr. Maxse, editor of the National Review, who was called as a witness, attempted to justify his position in relation to the contract, but refused to disclose the names of persons with whom he had, as an editor, been in confidential communication. The Committee thereupon reported him to the Speaker, but the latter declined to take action except on the responsibility of the House. The matter is now postponed till the beginning of the new Session.

The obituary of the week includes Mr. Robert Cameron, who since 1895 represented in Parliament the Houghton-le-Spring Division of Durham in the Liberal interest; Sir John Worrell Carrington, for six years Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Hong-Kong; Mr. G. A. Hutchison, the first editor of the successful Boy's Own Paper; and Lord Macnaghten, a Lord of Appeal-in-Ordinary and chairman of the Legal Council of Education.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

I.—THE SHOP-GIRL

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire country. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

THE contrast between the life of the actress on and off the stage, the laughing lips and the aching heart, has been the subject of considerable fine writing. Light and shade are as conspicuously present in the quieter avenues of women's work, and the difference between the two sides of the counter is every whit as poignant as the gulf that separates the footlights from the stalls.

The employee at the big West End establishment, or at the small draper's in the suburbs, where one goes for a yard of ribbon or a pennyworth of tape; the tall, smart-looking "sales lady" who hypnotises you into buying blouses, or creates a longing for a tubular skirt by the elegance of her proportions; and the little girl in the shabby frock, who, from nine in the morning till nine at night, with short intervals for meals, serves customers with anything and everything, from red flannel to fancy pocket-handkerchiefs—each hides her joys and sorrows, secret hopes and shrinking fears behind the rampart of a smile. And from the other side, who cares to read the story of the girl behind the counter?

The shop-girl—there are some 180,000 of them in London alone—is on duty every day, and all day long, save for the brief respite of the weekly half-holiday vouchsafed by Parliament. Bright and alert, neatly dressed, and watchful-eyed, she must adapt herself to an endless variety of temperaments, gratify the vanity, humour the whims of innumerable people. The old lady who clings to the sartorial fashions of her youth and demands a violent shade of purple ribbon has to be gently led in the direction of a subdued mauve. The would-be fashionable young woman who insists on the latest thing in veils for 4³/₄d. must be coaxed into paying 6³/₄d. at the least. Then there is the mother of a family, who takes the shopgirl into her confidence respecting her husband's peccadilloes—what he earns, how much he gives her, and why she takes in lodgers or does washing. Fashionable ladies litter the counter with goods spread out for their inspection, careless and indifferent of the assistant's time and trouble as of the fact that if a sale is not effected she is fined.

Shop assistants live under the black shadow of this monstrous imposition. Fines and fines and fines again harry their nerves and deplete their scanty earnings. If a girl is late for breakfast, or in the shop, 6d. is the fine. If the details of her toilet affect the æsthetic taste of the shopwalker, 6d. is the fine. If a hook or eye be fastened out of place, the buckle of her belt ill-adjusted, the design of her gown grate upon his eye, the poor girl has to pay! Sixpence is the amount charged for showing any apparent lack of attention to a customer, or failing to sell the article required.

Have you ever wondered why the girl behind the counter strenuously calls for "Sign" when she cannot produce the goods you ask for? You are quite satisfied that particular shop does not stock what you require, and are anxious to get on to the next. Time presses, and, if possible, you evade the genius in a frock coat bearing down upon you. If you succeed in escaping, and "Sign" does not hear you state that you will not accept a blue merino for a green, the girl is judged guilty of neglect, and—"another sixpence, please, miss."

The number and variety of fines vary in each particular establishment. Some shops allow their assistants to use sliding seats, fitted to the back of the counter, when "off duty." Others effectively discourage any desire for rest, and promptly fine a girl who shows the smallest sign of slacking. She must stand upright and ready; the flesh may be very weary, but, whether serving or not serving, she must be erect.

What happens to these fines, and who benefits by them?

But life has a worse terror for these victims of an ill-organised routine than petty punishments like these. They live under the ban of a system repellent to Englishwomen—espionage! The spies and detectives—exquisitely gowned ladies for the most part—watch not only for the shop-thief, but seek to catch the poor assistant tripping. In a restaurant attached to one establishment up West, where no tipping was the rule, one of the most industrious of these agents provocateur offered a tip of twopence six times vainly to a waitress in a dining-room, and then in triumph secured its acceptance and the girl's dismissal.

What do they eat, these slaves of the counter? In the small shops the fare is unsavoury, not to say coarse. Breakfast, at eight, consists usually of tea, bread-and-butter, and an occasional relish; in the larger establishments cold bacon or an egg, with a choice of tea or coffee, is provided. But if the meal is slight, little time is wasted on it. The assistant must be early on guard, uncovering the goods, dusting counters, polishing glass, or arranging finery. The mid-day meal is usually from half-past twelve to two. Cheap meat predominates, sinewy beef, sickly stews, uninviting mutton, though the menu in the more prosperous houses is more varied and ample. Tea starts about half-past four, and in the West is the herald of the coming release.

Sometimes the shop-girl dines in a more alluring fashion. Within the walls of the mammoth shop, day in, day out, she ministers to the whims and fancies of her fellow-women in a deadly and monotonous grind. Outside is the life and colour, the gaiety and laughter of the West. At the closing hour, when the great shops have put up their shutters, fashionable restaurants are crowded with well-gowned women and men about town, irreproachably dressed. Dainty fare, cooked in appetising fashion, is served to the strains of a delectable band—it is a world of softly shaded lights, choice flowers; and to this land of pleasure the shop-girl sometimes comes. The world is not yet grown so grey that youth no longer turns to youth, and of the myriad customers she has to serve some small proportion are young men, who know a pretty face when they see one, and lose no opportunity of improving its acquaintance, like the youth in "The Mikado," who cast a roving eye, and heaved a non-conjugal sigh.

When the shop-girl dines out alone she is more economical—indeed, she must be. One alert restaurateur is alleged to have reaped a fortune by opening excellently managed establishments, not a thousand miles from Oxford Street, where, at astonishingly cheap rates, one can get admirable food. Shop assistants are the bulk of his customers.

Frequently in the West End the dining-rooms for the staff are commodious and well-arranged. But things are very different in the suburbs. Too often the girls eat in an underground basement, where the gas-jets poison the atmosphere, and their bedrooms, overcrowded and stifling, are the only place where they can sit after the day's work. Often it is nine, half-past nine, aye, sometimes ten strikes before that day is ended. On Saturday night the shutters are not put up till past eleven, and the girls do not get to bed till twelve. The one respite in the weary grind is the half-holiday. In the suburbs the shops close on Wednesdays or Thursdays; in the West End Saturday is early closing day.

And this brings us to a very serious question of the shop-girl's life, especially the assistants in some of the great West End establishments. It has been asserted over and over again that the girls are practically driven away at the week-end, as no adequate arrangements for their comfort are made, and in cases where their homes are at a distance the consequences are obvious and appalling.

Most large establishments close at six, but the assistants have to dismantle the departments after the doors are shut; the goods have to be folded away in drawers, shut up in glass cases, covered with dust-sheets. By the time everything is ready for the night, and the shop is ready for the cleaners, it is close on seven. Assistants are expected to be in by eleven, and failure to comply with this rule has cost many a girl her position. Some houses, to their eternal shame, refuse their women employées admission if they return late; but, for the most part, unpunctuality is visited by dismissal. They realise that the next morning they will be turned off. Even their scanty leisure cannot be enjoyed in peace. The iron hand of the employer grinds down their meagre pleasures, and they must think with envy of their more fortunate fellows, who are permitted to stay in the theatre till they have seen the close of the performance. One is reminded of Dickens' inimitable porter in one of the Christmas numbers of Household Words; he was regarded by the assistants in a big business house as "a great man—he had seen the end of a play!"

As we have seen, the food, the hours, the accommodation of the shopgirl vary much; not so the rate of pay. The wage of an assistant living in averages from 4s. to 13s. Those who sleep out earn 8s. to 15s., with their food, while the apprentices get 2s. 6d. Bearing in mind their long, arduous days, their unremitting attention to business, their ubiquity, smartness, and general high level of service—to say nothing of the huge dividends earned by the larger establishments—the conclusion is forced on one that the wages paid are scandalously inadequate; and one notes with sorrow that only five per cent. of the assistants have joined the Union, which, were it more strongly equipped and better supported, would, as in other trades, win better conditions and higher rates for its members.

As a partial set-off to these low wages, it must be remembered that the "first hands" get a small commission on sales; but this leaves the large majority of assistants unincorporated. A junior rarely gets a chance of booking orders of any value.

These figures do not take into account the head saleswomen of the department, or of certain branches of business which receive special payment—the "showroom girl," who tries on coats and costumes; the mannequin, who shows off Paris models and deludes you into the belief that you will look like a dream in the confection she wears so well. A clever mannequin receives from a pound a week to twenty-five shillings. She must be tall, slim, and possessed of the indefinable quality of style. She wears, for the present fashion, a sheath-like garment of black satin, fitting like a skin, over which the models are slipped on. A good carriage is a necessity, and she must have acquired the art of walking gracefully in the narrowest of skirts. Her duties are not so arduous as the girl behind the counter, or so strenuous as the "sales lady," who guides your choice in the selection of frocks and furs, etc.; but think of the self-control, the discipline necessary to endure the impertinent stare of a portly matron, opulent in silk and velvet, who orders her to stand "like this," and look "like that," and considers her a very disobliging young person after an hour of posturing and posing!

Women of the moneyed class show little charity to their sisters, whether behind the counter or in the showroom. They complain easily and loudly of a lack of attention when none exists, and will turn over box after box of goods, if it so please them, without spending a penny. If the shopwalker is fair, the girl escapes censure. If, on the other hand, "Sign" is feeling tired, overworked, or over-worried, number so-and-so is fined, severely reprimanded, and threatened with dismissal. And the woman who has caused the trouble drives off contentedly, careless of the suffering she has caused.

For the girl behind the counter must smile and serve, though her head throbs and her back aches, and her legs are swollen from the unnatural strain of long-continued hours of standing. Varicose veins are a common complaint among shop-girls, and a heavy percentage suffer from internal troubles, the direct result of the long days spent upon the feet.

We hear much in praise of the life of a shop assistant. We read of the libraries, the gymnasia, the roof gardens, and of the entertainments provided for them. Somehow I shudder when I hear these mentioned, for they recall to me a certain apartment reserved for lady shop assistants, and much in request at sale times. I was being shown over a famous emporium, where some of these things are greatly in evidence. I had duly admired the pictures, and envied the assistants the grand pianos and canaries in the spacious saloon, when suddenly I caught a glimpse, through a half-opened door, of another room, a room that chilled me. The walls and the floor were "padded." It was "the rest-room—for the girls when they become hysterical."

THE HOSPITAL NURSE

SHE must be alert and wise and free from fears,
 And very softly must her footfall sound,
 And ever at her post she must be found
 An angel sentry at the gate of tears.
 She must not overweighted be with years,
 Nor careless with the flying feet of youth,
 But sweetly serious, seeking after truth.
 Her brow the dignity of service wears,
 Her long hands, sinuous, with nervous skill
 Must scatter where she binds the gaping pain,
 Returning at the pceevish sufferer's will
 To minister anew, to soothe again.
 And, when the lonesome winepress must be trod,
 Her lips, encouraging, shall speak of GOD.

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD BY THE EDITOR VII.—HOLLAND

I.

THE days of Dutch greatness are long past, and the wonder is not that the greatness of Holland should have departed, but that it should have lasted so long—from the time when the Dutch people drove back, almost unaided, the tyranny of Spain, to the time when a Dutch fleet sailed up the Thames and threatened the English people in their capital, down to the beginning of the eighteenth century, when the Dutch Republic held in check the armies of Louis XIV.

A small nation could not thus indefinitely hold her own against the great empires of Europe. Her political greatness almost entirely depended on the mastery of the sea, and that mastery was taken from her by her English rivals.

But although the Dutch have long ceased to be a political power, they continue to be ranked amongst the most prosperous and best governed nations of the Continent. They certainly are not the decadent and uninteresting people which Mr. Lucas represents them to be in his delightful but fanciful book, "A Wanderer in Holland" (Methuen, 6s.). They are bent on something higher than "the profits of the day and the pleasures of next Sunday," and they are not yet to be used, for didactic purposes, as a solemn warning of the decadence that may be in store for this country.

II.

The very existence of Holland is a perpetual miracle. Living in a country part of which lies below the level of the ocean, the Dutch are an amphibious people, and they are only secure from inundation behind the protection of their dykes. Those dykes have to be kept in constant repair. An army of watchmen have to be ever on the alert. Another army of hydraulic windmills, which form one of the features of the Dutch landscape, are perpetually draining the water off the fields and meadows, and a network of canals distribute and regulate it. If the vigilance of the watchmen of the "waterstaat" were to be relaxed for one moment, the sea would at once sweep over the land. And the destructive energies of the ocean act more rapidly than the constructive energies of man. It took the Dutch a whole generation to drain the small Lake of Haarlem, whilst a few minutes submerged and wiped out, in the thirteenth century, the fertile provinces and populous cities which to-day are covered by the Zuider Zee.

III.

As, physically, Holland owes her existence to the eternal struggle with the elemental forces of nature, so the Dutch people owe their political existence and the virtues of the national character to their heroic struggle against Spanish tyranny. No modern nation has a more august origin. The Rise of the Dutch Republic, narrated in Motley's "History," one of the classics of English literature, will be for all times to come one of the most inspiring epics of our race. No modern nation has done more for European liberty and modern democracy. Nor can it be too often and too gratefully remembered that all through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Low Countries were the refuge of independent thought as well as a radiating centre of art and science—the country of Spinoza, Swammerdam, as well as the country of Grotius and van Barneveld.

IV.

Economic prosperity does not necessarily, in the twentieth century, follow a successful war, but in the case of Holland, and in the sixteenth century, it certainly did, and I do not think that even Mr. Norman Angell would deny it. For after the war of independence Holland rapidly rose from being one of the poorest to being one of the richest countries of the Continent. In the seventeenth century Holland occupied the position which Great Britain occupies to-day. She became the leading commercial power of Europe, building up both a flourishing oversea trade and a worldwide colonial empire. Of that empire—the creation of the mighty Dutch Company of the Great Indies—the present Dutch Indies still remain. Forty millions of Javanese are still subjects of the Queen of the Netherlands. All the other Dutch colonies, in India and South Africa, have passed under British control. But long before Great Britain took possession of them the art of navigation and the rise of a British merchant navy were gradually destroying Dutch international commerce.

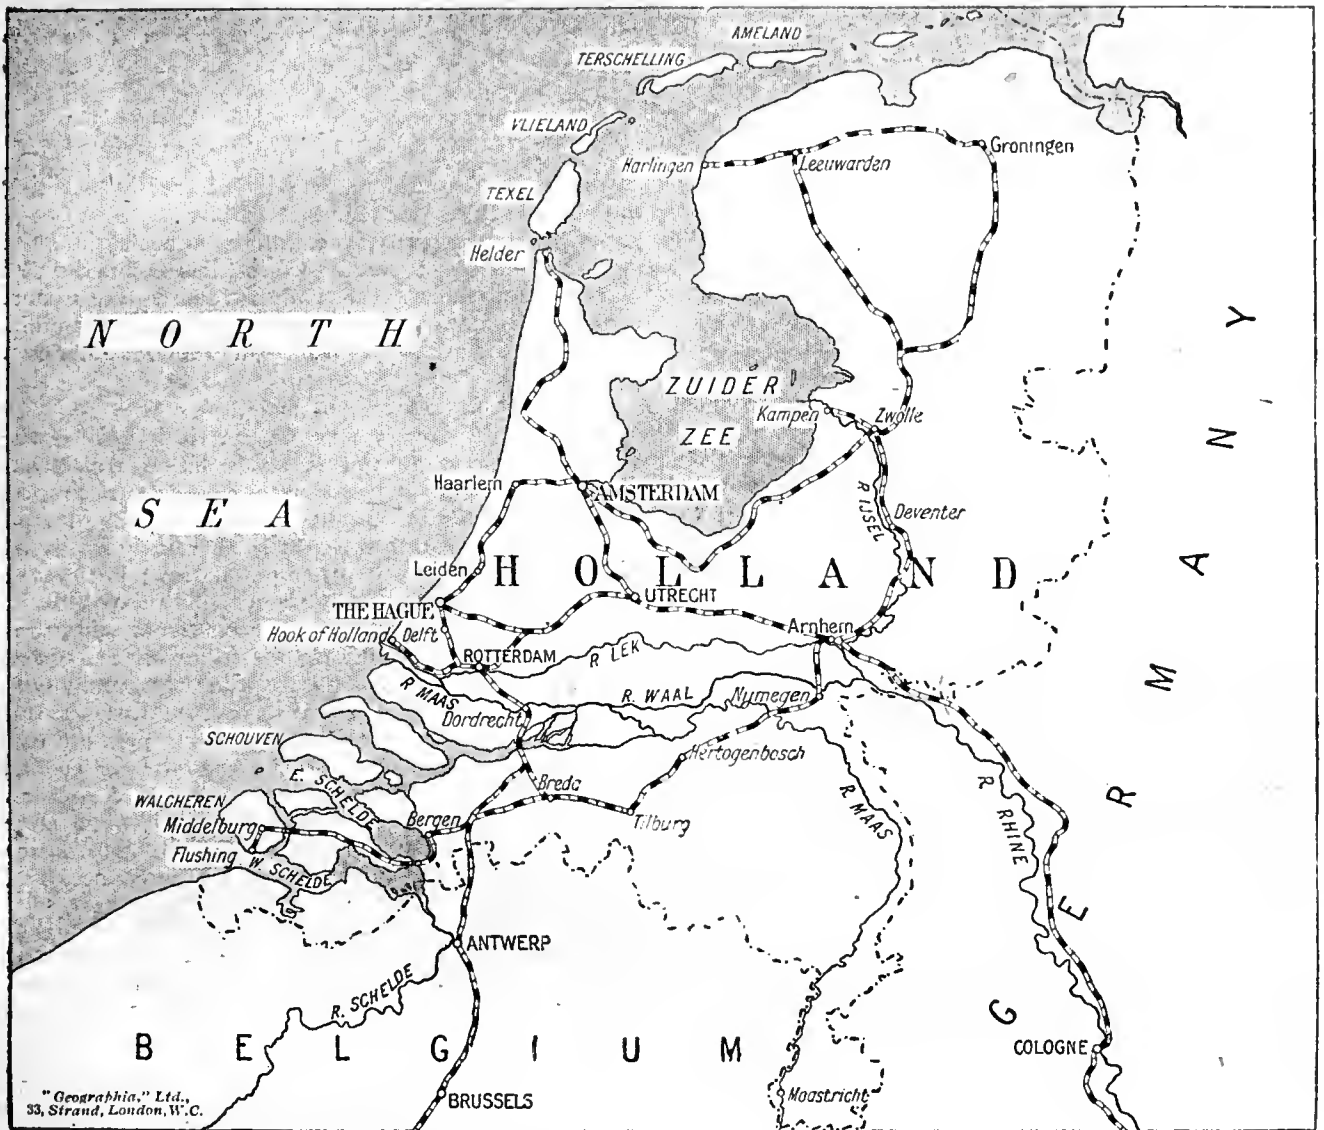

That international commerce has revived in our days, but it has entirely changed its character. It is still concentrated in Amsterdam and Rotterdam, as in the days of Rembrandt and de Witt, but Amsterdam and Rotterdam have ceased to be typical Dutch cities. Both have become more and more outlets for the German transit trade, and the profits of that trade are more and more diverted by Teutonic and Jewish merchants and bankers.

V.

Although still a commercial power, Holland to-day has become mainly an agricultural country—a country of peasants. Four millions out of six live on the land, and the Boers of the Transvaal still testify of what stuff are made the peasants, or "Boeren," of the Netherlands. The land is largely in the possession of those who work it. Even more than France, Holland is a country of small holdings. There is a diminishing number of squires or Jonkheeren: Jonkheer is the same word as Junker; but the Dutch Jonkheer has nothing in common with his German cousin. Those Jonkheers possess moderate estates and a good deal of political and social consequence; but the small farmer dominates, and it is the small farmer who has carried Dutch agriculture and horticulture to the high degree of perfection which it has reached, and which is only surpassed in Denmark. It is the small farmer who, by his unremitting toil, has transformed the Dutch sands into vast fields of tulips, into flourishing market gardens and smiling pastures.

VI.

The economic change has brought about a remarkable political and religious change. An agricultural country is generally a Conservative country, and Holland is no exception to the rule. It has become a Conservative stronghold, and has also become increasingly Catholic. The Catholics are only one-third (about two millions) of the population, concentrated mainly in the south—in Limburg and Brabant; but, as in Germany, they are the ruling power in politics, and they are also growing in numbers. Owing to the stringent Papal decrees on mixed marriages, every union of a Protestant with a Catholic is a gain to Catholicism. The Dutch people have always been keenly interested in religious controversy, and there are no signs that that interest is on the wane. Although Mr. Lucas tells us that the Dutch are only intent upon material gain, as a matter of fact, politics, which in England centre round Tariff Reform or Home Rule, in Holland almost entirely revolve around religious disputes, as in the good old days of the Arminians and Gomarists. Strange things are happening to-day in the religious sphere which would have caused the indignation of old Dutch Protestants, and which would stagger the Nonconformists of Great Britain. Extreme Calvinists, under the leadership of Dr. Kuyper, have joined hands with the Ultramontanes, under the leadership of Monsignor Schaepman, to drive back the Liberals. And to-day it is this Protestant-Catholic clerical coalition which is ruling the country—a dramatic change in a country which once was the controlling Protestant power in Europe.

VII.

But the triumph of Catholicism does not mean Obscurantism. The Dutch remain a highly educated people. Mr. Lucas informs us that they are not a reading people. It is true that the Dutch peasant is not a bookworm, but then in no country are the peasantry addicted to book-learning. As for the Dutch middle classes, they read at least as much as the British middle classes. In Great Britain educationists are still fighting as to which foreign language boys and girls should learn at school. In Holland every educated man, in addition to his native language, knows three other foreign languages, and the Dutchman is really a "quadri-linguist." Of the three foreign languages whose study forms an integral part of the Dutch curriculum French is the one which is best liked. On the other hand, German is the most useful language, for it is the language of the formidable neighbouring power, which is rapidly absorbing Holland economically, and which may in the near future threaten her political independence.

VIII.

The Dutch people possess some of the characteristics of their landscape. They are restful, like their verdant meadows; they are slow, like their winding rivers; and they seem to be sleepy, like their dormant waters. But behind that slow, quiet, and stolid exterior there is an inexhaustible reserve of vital energy. There is intense earnestness and a keen sense of natural beauty. Although the glories of the golden age of national history have vanished, the moral qualities which made it still subsist. The art of Rembrandt has survived in the modern painters, like Israels, Mauve, and Maris. The spirit of Orange has survived in the modern Dutch statesmen, like Thorbecke, Kuyper, and Schaepman. Should necessity arise, the Dutch people would still be ready to defend against a foreign invader that national inheritance of which they are justly proud, and which their fathers bought so dearly with their blood.

"Geographia," Ltd., 33, Strand, London, W.C.

SHOULD LLOYD GEORGE IMITATE NAPOLEON? BY EMILE VANDERVELDE (Leader of the Belgian Socialist Party)

SHOULD Lloyd George imitate Napoleon? My friend Charles Sarolea advises it. He believes he has found the way to an immediate settlement of the problem of landed property in England. The English legislator, taking his inspiration from the examples afforded by the French Revolution, is to bring the "Civil Code" across the Channel, to substitute for the antiquated law of entail the system of equal and compulsory division of property between the heirs in the direct line, and in a few years, without upheaval, without violence, and without any overwhelming dispossession of owners, by the automatic working of the laws of inheritance, the land of Great Britain, freed from the parasite growth of feudalism, will become the Promised Land of small holdings, of peasant proprietors.

I must confess that I find it absolutely impossible to agree with Sarolea. I am ready to admit that the distribution of property is not as monstrously unfair in France as in England. I will go so far as to say that if the only possible choice lay between capitalist property and peasant property, I should make up my mind in favour of peasant property. But if the example afforded by England convinces me that the system of landed property in that country must be revolutionised from top to bottom, the example of France and of other countries with a Civil Code convinces me no less firmly that the solution suggested by Sarolea would not be in the least efficacious, even if it were desirable.

To begin with, the question arises whether, from the point of view of the public interest, any advantage would result from replacing thousands of landlords, who would be relatively easy to dispossess, by a host of those peasant proprietors, greedy of gain, fiercely conservative, systematic neo-malthusians, of whom Emile Zola gives so harsh a portrait in "La Terre." Chesterton answers in the affirmative, Shaw in the negative. I myself am inclined to think with Bernard Shaw.

But I realise that these are personal estimates, and there is no doubt that those Conservatives who have been able to appreciate the element of immutability in the conservatism of "radical" French peasants will continue to hope that the land reform will tend to create in England, as in France, a numerous class of small proprietors, with three acres and a cow. But it is not enough merely to entertain this hope: it must also be capable of realisation.

Now, I personally have not the slightest belief that if Lloyd George, breaking with the traditions of centuries past, resolved to bring forward the law of inheritance of the "Napoleonic Code" and succeeded in introducing it into England, his reform would finally result in bringing about the distribution of English land among peasant proprietors enjoying approximate equality.

The example of France and of other countries— notably Belgium—which have adopted the "Napoleonic Code" shows indeed:

1. That in countries where peasant proprietorship is very widespread, the subdivision of land already existed before the law of inheritance of the Civil Code was introduced.

2. That the application of the "Napoleonic Code" has not in any way had the result of bringing about in France the disappearance of really striking inequalities in the distribution of land.

3. That in industrial countries like Belgium the system of the "Napoleonic Code" has not prevented—if, indeed, it has not actually favoured—the almost complete disappearance of peasant proprietors, cultivating for their own profit land which is their own property.

I.

In the first place, we assert that it is neither the "Napoleonic Code" nor the Revolution which has produced the small agricultural holding in France. Under the old constitution the sub-division of land was already very extensive. It has certainly increased since then with the growth of population; but on the whole, the situation at the end of the eighteenth century was not essentially different from what it is to-day, and we may endorse the following statement of M. Flour de Saint-Genis: "The Revolution only set the peasant free from hypocrisy towards his master and towards the State treasury; it did not promote him to the position of proprietor, for he had already been that for centuries past, but it restored his personal dignity by making him a citizen. The laws of the Constituent Assembly, the Legislative Assembly, and the Convention freed the country and the individual at the same time by decreeing the suppression of feudal serfdom. . . ."

Obviously no one can fail to recognise the capital importance of such an achievement. We only mean to point out that the subdivision of property in France was the result of economic causes previous and foreign to legislation on the subject of inheritance. The latter may have hastened this subdivision, may have been favourable to the spread of the small holding. But its influence must not be exaggerated, and it would be a monstrous illusion to believe that the "Napoleonisation" of the English law of inheritance would suffice to resuscitate, by a magic wave of the wand, the yeoman, the free peasantry, which the industrial revolution has caused to disappear.

II.

On the other hand, it must not be supposed that the distribution of landed property in France is as equally proportioned as the admirers of the "Napoleonic Code" are pleased to assert.

In fact, according to a statistical return of assessments on landed property made in 1884 by the "Office of Direct Taxation," French land was then divided as follows—and the state of affairs has changed but little since then—between the small holding (of less than 10 hectares, or 25 acres), the medium-sized property (of from 10 to 40 hectares, or 25 to 100 acres), and the large property (of over 40 hectares, or 100 acres).

Categories of Assessed Properties.	Number of Assessed Properties.	Size in Hectares.	Proportion per cent.
			By Number.	By Size.
Small Holding	13,213,383	17,476,445	93.92	35.36
Medium-sized Property	698,326	12,700,087	4.95	25.73
Large Property	163,092	19,211,772	1.13	38.91
Total	14,074,801	49,388,304	100.00	100.00

Obviously, then, a full third of French land (38.91 per cent.) belongs to an infinitesimal minority of large land-owners (1.13 per cent. of the total number of properties), who alone possess more than the 13,000,000 owners of small holdings. And if the reader would form an idea of the real position of the majority of the latter, I would refer him to the chapters I have devoted to the question in my book on Agrarian Socialism.* He will find there suggestive evidence, gathered from political writers who cannot be suspected of subversive tendencies, such as Flour de Saint-Genis, who points out that "if 1790 set the French peasant free from feudal serfdom, in 1900 we see him loaded with mortgages"; and, again, Claudio Jannet, in his book on State Socialism, recognising that "half the landowners of France only have an income of below 82 francs!" and that, on the other hand, "three millions of them are exempted from income-tax as being in a position bordering on indigence."

* "La Propriété Rurale en France." Flour de Saint-Genis. P. 195. (Paris: Colin. 1902.)

III.

That the system of landed property in France is not ideal is, I think, sufficiently shown by these references, summary though they be.

But supposing that this is not the case; admitting even that, after all, the average position of the French peasant is better than that of the English agricultural labourer, does it follow that, if Lloyd George imitated Napoleon, peasant-proprietorship would develop to the same extent in England as in France?

We are under the "Napoleonic Code" in Belgium. By virtue of the law of inheritance we follow the system of equal and compulsory division of property. We ought then, if Sarolea's theory were correct, to possess, like France, a large class of peasant-proprietors, cultivating for their immediate profit land which is their own property. But there are few countries in Europe where, in spite of the Civil Code, peasant-proprietorship has maintained less hold than in Belgium.

Indeed, according to our last agricultural returns, out of 100 hectares of land in ordinary cultivation only 31 are worked for immediate profit; 69 are worked by tenant-farmers. And even so, as I have shown in my book, the system of immediate profit has only remained really important in districts where the soil is poor, the land of little value, and "intensive cultivation" not much developed.

On the other hand, wherever the soil is fertile, where the influence of towns and industrial centres favours the progress of "intensive cultivation," and where the land has considerable value, the system of renting land prevails, and while small tenant-farmers are the rule, peasant-proprietors are the exception.

* * * * *

From all that has been said, the conclusion follows of itself.

Possibly, nay, probably, Sarolea is right in thinking that the introduction into England of a law of inheritance similar to the French one would be a relative progress. But it would most certainly not be a solution of the land problem, the agrarian question. The transformation of feudal property into private property, capitalist property, would still be accomplished. But the agricultural proletariat would remain an agricultural proletariat, and even supposing it were desirable to restore the class of peasant-proprietors, it is not by so-called "Napoleonic Socialism" that its revival would be achieved.

And so some other means must be sought, and this, in our opinion, can only be a movement towards the socialisation of land, by the expropriation of large estates, and the collective appropriation of the unearned increment, of the increased values resulting from the collective efforts of the community.

* "Le Socialisme Agraire ou le Collectivisme et l'Evolution Agricole." Emile Vanderveelde. Pp. 35 et seq.; 175 et seq.; 300 et seq. (Paris: Giard et Brien. 1908.)

SILHOUETTES

From the gallery of memory, mutascopia and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

THE house was very still; only the sound of the sick man's breathing broke the silence. He slept for the first time for many weary days and nights, and the eyes of the woman, watching in the gloaming, filled with tears.

Upon her consciousness, busy with thoughts of him, there broke a faint persistent noise. Memory, quickened by fear, realised its source—it was the sound of a file biting its way through resisting metal, and imagination conjured up the rest. There was a thief in the room below, a thief at work against the safe that held her husband's savings. The money he had hoarded for her sake and her child's, the money he had brought to her on the night that he had fallen ill. Fear clutched at her heart and turned her dizzy. The sick man stirred uneasily, the grating of the file grew louder—it seemed to grind into her brain. Slowly and with infinite caution she stole across the floor, out of the room and down the stairs. A child's hat was hanging in the hall; a broken doll, propped up against a chair, stared at her wooden eyed. . . . Her baby's doll—her little child. The woman's lips twitched. She faltered, shrinking in very terror. Suppose she never saw the chubby face again, suppose the little one were left without a mother? . . . The noise had stopped, the file had done its work, the safe was open. In another minute it would be too late, the money would be stolen, the thief escaped, the bright future Jim had planned for ever over—his golden dreams come toppling to the ground! She fumbled blindly for the handle of the door, and entered velvet footed, reaching to find the pistol that her husband kept in his desk drawer, "for fear of tramps—when he was not at home." She could hear his dear voice say the words, and the memory gave her courage. . . .

The thief found himself covered, and for a moment lost his nerve.

"Go at once and I won't hurt you." She spoke in a strained whisper; her senses, sharpened to the seventh power, felt that the sick man in the room above was troubled.

"Put that money down." He held a bag of notes and gold. "I won't send for the police, and I won't hurt you, if you'll go. . . . My husband's ill; if he wakes—" she broke off, the words wiped from her lips. The thief had seized a ledger from the safe and was holding it above his head.

"Put the pistol on the table," he said hoarsely, "or I throw down the book, and your husband—"

He did not finish. The timid little woman, who fainted at the sight of blood, trembled at the thought of danger, was transformed into an avenging goddess, before whose blazing eyes and upraised pistol the thief fled, jumping through the window.

"She'd have fired, noise or no noise," he remarked to a companion in crime; "a white-faced bit of a thing that I could settle with a flick of my fist."

* * * * *

"And to think," said the woman, sobbing in the arms of the nurse, who, late returning, found her huddled on the floor, "to think the pistol wasn't loaded after all!"

DOSTOIEFFSKI AND THE RELIGION OF HUMAN SUFFERING

It is one of the favourite methods of modern criticism which explains a writer's work and personality by his circumstances and surroundings. But there are some literary miracles which refuse to be explained. There are some writers who rise superior to circumstances, and who challenge their surroundings. The subject of the present sketch was pre-eminently such a writer. Dostoeffski seems to have been sent into the world by a special decree of Providence to assert the supremacy of the indomitable human spirit over adverse fate. Small and frail and haggard and miserably poor, he yet accomplished prodigies of labour. Diseased in mind and body, a bundle of twitching nerves, suffering from epilepsy, he yet preserved balance of judgment and sanity of doctrine. Sentenced to death, and the victim of a monstrous miscarriage of justice, he yet bore no ill-will against his judges, and he consistently vindicated the cause of law and order against revolution. Ill-used by his own country, he yet repaid that ill-usage with the most passionate tenderness. A martyr who endured every extremity of human suffering, he yet remained a cheerful and confirmed optimist. Take him all in all, Feodor Michaelovitch Dostoeffski, the gambler, the epileptic, the convict, stands out as the most pathetic and the most Christlike figure in Russian letters.

He was born in a Moscow hospital in 1821—the year of Napoleon's death—the son of a retired army doctor. Belonging to the impoverished nobility from whose ranks the Russian aristocracy are recruited, he was from his childhood inured to privation. He fought his way through the University, and he knew from personal experience the dire straits which he describes in "Crime and Punishment." At twenty-one years of age he emerged as a lieutenant of engineers, but only to resign his commission: he had already discovered his literary vocation. At twenty-three he wrote his first novel, "Poor Folk," which remains one of his best. In 1849, on the morrow of the Social Revolution which shook every throne of Europe, when Russia was in the clutches of the iron despotism of Nicholas I., he joined a debating club of political reformers. His adherence was purely platonic. He never took part in any plot, for there never was a less revolutionary temperament. Yet, through a grim irony of fate, he was implicated with thirty-six of his companions in a charge of conspiracy and sentenced to death. He was taken to the place of execution on a chill December morning. Standing on a raised platform with twenty-one fellow-prisoners, stripped to his shirt, with twenty-one degrees of frost, he had to listen for twenty minutes to the reading of the death sentence, with the soldiers lined in front of him and ready to shoot. At the last moment he was relieved; but that cruel scene on that chill December morning remained a haunting obsession and coloured his imagination ever after.

The death sentence had been commuted into four years of hard labour in a Siberian convict station (described in the "House of the Dead"). He spent three more years in exile and three years as a private soldier, having married, in the meantime, the widow of one of his fellow-prisoners.

When he returned, in 1859, after ten years, his deliverance was but the beginning of a new life of ceaseless privation and suffering. Unpractical, improvident, generous, ruined by journalistic ventures, in the grip of epilepsy and of the moneylender, not a single day was he free from harassing cares, and twice he had to fly abroad to escape imprisonment for debt. When national recognition came at last, when his later books had made him the cynosure of the younger generation, it was too late. His constitution was irretrievably shattered. He died in 1881, one month before the assassination of the Czar—a turning-point in Russian history. The funeral of Dostoeffski was the occasion of a demonstration unique perhaps in the history of literature. A procession of a hundred thousand mourners and spectators, princes of the Imperial Court, Cabinet Ministers, students, tradesmen, and artisans conducted to his last resting-place the former Siberian convict, the bankrupt journalist, the idol of the Russian people.

It is under such circumstances that Dostoeffski's novels were composed. An existence such as his would have broken the spirit of a Berserker, but Dostoeffski (to use his own expression) had the "vitality of a cat." We admire Charles Lamb, Robert Louis Stevenson, and Sir Walter Scott for their gallant struggle with destiny; but what are the tragic episodes in their life's drama as compared with the lifelong tragedy of the Russian writer?

Yet, through twenty-five years of distress and disease, his literary activity continued unrelaxed. One novel succeeded another, all of them overloaded with human documents, some of them a thousand pages long, a thousand pages to be slowly pondered over during the interminable Russian winter evenings. And all those novels strike the same keynote of human misery. A martyr himself, he is the voice of Russian martyrs. The mere titles of his books—"Poor Folk," "Humiliated and Insulted," "The Idiot," "The Demons"—reveal the dreary monotony of the subject matter!

Yet Dostoeffski had not abandoned hope, for the depths of misery and degradation are illumined by faith in Christ and faith in humanity.

Even as his physical vitality resisted the onslaught of poverty and imprisonment, so did his moral vitality resist the onslaught of scepticism and rebellion. Again and again he repeated that his death sentence was the greatest blessing of his life; that it made him what he was, both as a man and as a writer. Dostoeffski, in the book in which he records his prison experiences, "Memories from the House of the Dead" (Everyman's Library), has no word of bitterness against those who condemned him. It is difficult for an Anglo-Saxon to understand such meekness in the face of such oppression; but Dostoeffski was not an Anglo-Saxon—he was a Russian of the Russians. He did not believe in the West. Whereas Turgenev and the Liberals held that the only salvation for Russia was by imitation of European ideas, Dostoeffski believed that Russia had a future of her own, and that this future could only be reached by following her own traditions. He was convinced that it was the shipwrecked and the oppressed, it was the convict and the tramp, who alone possessed the secret of Divine wisdom. It was the meek and the humble who were to inherit the earth.

FEODOR DOSTOIEFFSKI, NATUS 1821, OBIT 1881

LITERARY NOTES

LITERATURE as well as Science has suffered a heavy loss by Captain R. F. Scott's death. I well remember the chorus of praise with which his "Voyage of the Discovery" was greeted on its first appearance. The influential journals without exception reviewed it in the most enthusiastic terms, Punch's testimony that no more glowing narrative of adventure was to be met with in the English language being typical of the rest. And the book is all the more amazing when one remembers that Captain Scott had no literary training and was devoid of literary ambition, for, as he tells us in his preface, it was only after the greater part of his story had been enacted that he realised that it would devolve on him to narrate it in book form.

* * * * *

I observe that Captain Scott's publisher has been confiding to an interviewer that the late explorer "wrote extraordinarily well, his style being most clear, picturesque, and graphic." This, it seems to me, sums up admirably Captain Scott's literary attainments. Every reader of "The Voyage of the Discovery" will deeply regret the fact that its author has not been spared to write the full account of his heroic journey to and from the South Pole, but it is gratifying to learn that he has left materials for such a work in a fairly complete state, and that Commander Evans will revise and supplement these. At no distant date, therefore, we may expect to be in possession of perhaps the most thrilling tale in the annals of Polar exploration.

* * * * *

Prize competitions organised by publishers are becoming fashionable. If I mistake not, Mr. Fisher Unwin was the first to adopt this means with a view to discovering latent talent, and he was quickly followed by Mr. Melrose. Now comes the announcement that Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have organised an All-British £1,000 Competition. Only Colonial authors (native or resident) are eligible, and four prizes of £250 each will be awarded for the best novel the scene of which is laid in one of the Colonies or Dependencies. Sir Gilbert Parker is to adjudicate for Canada, Mr. Charles Garvice for Australasia, Mr. A. E. W. Mason for India, and Sir H. Rider Haggard for Africa, etc.

* * * * *

I hope we shall have more of these competitions, for they afford an excellent opportunity to the unknown writer who usually finds it the hardest thing in the world to get a market for his work. There are hundreds of manuscripts of undeniable merit offered to publishers every year, but which are rejected simply because the latter cannot afford to take the financial risk of issuing a work by an obscure writer. The value of the prize competition lies in the fact that merit is the sole condition of success.

* * * * *

There has been much speculation as to who is to complete the late Mr. Monypenny's biography of Disraeli, of which two volumes have been issued by Mr. John Murray. Uniformity of execution must, as far as possible, be maintained, and it will assuredly be no easy task to follow in the footsteps of Mr. Monypenny. The first name to be mentioned was that of Mr. Sidney Low, who, as the joint author of the Victorian volume in Messrs. Longman's "Political History of England," would have written the political portion of Disraeli's career with insight and learning.

But it is now stated that the task has been offered and accepted by Mr. George Earle Buckle, the late editor of the Times.

* * * * *

I was rather surprised that most of the obituaries of the late Lord Crawford contained little or no mention of the renowned Lindsay library at Haigh Hall, which is said to be the richest private collection in the world. The late Lord Acton's library, which has now found a permanent home in Cambridge, was a noble monument to his scholarship and industry; but the library at Haigh Hall surpasses it both in extent and variety. The most interesting features of Lord Crawford's library were described in a brief article in last week's issue of the Sphere. As the writer pointed out, it is really an heirloom, and not so much a collection as a collection of collections, comprising books, incunabula, manuscripts, journals, pamphlets, tracts, broadsides, engravings, caricatures, etc. Though the late Earl was not the founder of the library, the enormous dimensions to which it has now grown was largely due to his indefatigable and life-long labours.

* * * * *

Many readers of EVERYMAN will be interested to learn that a new volume of poems for children by Robert Louis Stevenson has just been privately printed in New York. Why "privately," I am at a loss to know. I should have thought that anything on the subject of childhood by the author of "A Child's Garden of Verse" would on every ground have merited the widest publicity. Admirers of Stevenson on this side of the Atlantic will live in hope that this fresh volume will not continue the monopoly of a select few for long.

* * * * *

Mr. John M. Robertson, M.P., who has now a fairly long list of notable books to his credit, is finishing a work which is intended to be a systematic study and refutation of the theory that "Shakespeare" must have been written by a lawyer and a classical scholar. It will bear the title "The Baconian Heresy; a Confutation." These problems have already been ably handled by the late Professor Churton Collins in his "Studies in Shakespeare," in which he endeavours to show, among other things, that the dramatist's knowledge of the classics of Greece and Rome was wonderfully extensive. Of course, Professor Churton Collins starts with the assumption that Shakespeare really wrote the plays commonly attributed to him, whereas Mr. Robertson has the Baconian theory in view.

* * * * *

I still continue to receive letters regarding the Canadian Boat-Song. One correspondent suggests that I should reprint the poem for the benefit of those who have not access to the volumes containing it. Unfortunately, the poem is too long for the space at my disposal. I would point out, however, to those who are curious about this much-discussed poem that Sir Henry Lucy had an interesting article on the subject in the Cornhill Magazine for December, 1909, under the title of "A Haunting Verse." He prints the whole poem, and says its resuscitation is due to Mr. Joseph Chamberlain.

* * * * *

Messrs. Ouseley announce for early publication a "History of Oratory in Parliament, 1213-1913," from the pen of Professor Craig, of Edinburgh. The author has a fascinating subject, of which a great deal might be made. Moreover, it has the charm of novelty, for, so far as I am aware, there is no other book which recounts the story of English oratory.

X. Y. Z.

MASTERPIECE OF THE WEEK

RUSKIN'S "THE CROWN OF WILD OLIVE." BY PROF. SAINTSBURY

THE difference of the sensations experienced on first reading books, and on reading them again after a long interval, may appear a trite enough subject; but, like other trite subjects, it has a capacity of suggestion and variation which entirely "new and original" things somehow seldom possess. There are the books—not, alas! too numerous—between whom and the reader c'est pour toujours—not in the ironical sense of the French saynète, in which a certain Sidonie and her lover were (on the same stage and at the same moment, but with a screen between their representatives in the two scenes) represented as uttering this satisfactory declaration, and as parting on the other side with execrations of disgust. There are those—perhaps even fewer and perhaps even greater—which do not, or do not wholly, please at first, but which increase and settle their grasp till it becomes more or less absolute. There are those which attract and please at first, but which (one can hardly tell how or why in some cases) lose all, or nearly all, attraction and power of pleasing when tried again. And not lastly (but "to conclude" for this occasion) there are those which, from the first and to the last, one regards with mixed feelings, perhaps becoming a little more clearly and critically separated by time, but not altering much in general effect.

Of these last, to the present writer, Mr. Ruskin's books have always been, especially those of his second period, when, instead of making mere raids and forays from his own special territory of criticism of art and nature, he issued forth to cover the earth with a mixed multitude of forces—æsthetic, literary, ethical, political, economic, and what you please—or, as it was early and sardonically travestied, especially what you don't please. "The Crown of Wild Olive" occupies, of course, a place among the earlier utterances of the new mode; it may be almost said to be of the period of transition. For though it is some years younger than the dividing line of "Unto This Last," it, especially at its first appearance in 1866, anticipated the time of the later and more Delphic deliverances, as from perambulating tripods, which Mr. Ruskin took about with him in field and town, in garden and wilderness. Many years, too, have passed since this particular reader read this particular book, and the effect produced may not be utterly valueless if analysed.

Almost any reader will see at once, even if he does not know or remember it as a fact, that the book dates from the time when Ruskin was most strongly under the influence of Carlyle. The style is neither the gorgeous mosaic-lava—with the variety and beauty in form of the one, the glow and flow of the other—that forms the body of the earlier books, nor the occasionally rather disjointed talk of the later. There are here and there solid citations from Carlyle himself: and there is much more Carlylese. It is true that there is one splendidly rhetorical passage—perhaps the finest of the kind in Ruskin, and strikingly different both from Carlyle's and from his own best known manner—in the address to the youthful gunners at Woolwich. It is, in fact, more like nineteenth century Burke than anything else in its cadence, in its great historic sweep, in its brilliant imagery ["The Wars of the Roses, which are as a fearful crimson shadow on our land, represent the normal condition of other nations"], is its passionate sentiment. But most of the rest is so admittedly "after" Carlyle that there the author to be added a long appendix of boiled-down Friedrich.

The temper, however, is not really Carlylian; and it need hardly be said that it is, except in the point of sentiment, still less like Burke. Written mostly in the later sixties, and completed and touched up even after the Année Terrible, it comes nearer to Mr. Arnold than to either in its peculiar dissatisfaction with the condition of England, though, of course, the symptoms selected, and the cure suggested, are very different things from "more secondary schools" in the concrete, and an atmosphere of culture in the abstract.

Of the matter which this style enshrines and this temper animates, there is certainly no out-of-dateness in speaking to-day. It has long been recognised by persons of some acuteness and some political knowledge that Mr. Ruskin's influence on the social side of modern politics is a thing that has got to be reckoned with very seriously indeed. When it began to be exercised a very common mistake was once more made—the mistake of simply pooch-pooching it. The fallacies and fantasticalities of the Ruskinian sociology were, of course, at once perceptible to those who had eyes to see, and lay open to endless satirising by those who had pens to write. But it was forgotten that they were addressed to an increasing number of persons who had neither. There is in the later editions of this very book an exquisitely characteristic note in which Mr. Ruskin ingenuously admits, "I have not yet properly stated the other side of the question." Unfortunately that was what he generally "did not yet do," and too often never did at any future time. Now, an extremely persuasive speaker who puts before somewhat raw judgments things mostly attractive to their wishes, and "does not yet properly state" the opposite side of the question, is a dangerous person.

And, as one looks back, how cutting is the irony! A finer passage than that in the section on "Work" there is hardly of its kind to be found anywhere, with its doctrine, rightly selected and nobly phrased—that "the work is always to be first, the fee second." Is this exactly the principle upon which those classes whom Mr. Ruskin was more specially addressing, and of whose benefit, when not addressing them, he was thinking mainly throughout the book—the so-called working classes—is this the principle they go on now? Do they not go on exactly the contrary principle of "fee first and work second"? of constantly more fee and less work? even sometimes definitely and principally of scamped work, or no work, that more fee may be obtained? Or again, "Some day we shall pay people not quite so much for talking in Parliament and doing nothing." "Some day" is a long day, but somehow fifty years is not a short one—and this sees us paying people more than ever (indeed, mostly for the first time) for holding their tongues in Parliament, and doing nothing, in or out of it, but vote. Enough of this perhaps: but if anybody wants more he will find it in plenty, very particularly in the lecture on "Traffic," and in a large part of that on "The Future of England," where certain qualms seem, even at the distance of this half-century, to have entered the lecturer's mind—"undoubting," usually as that which Collins assigned to Fairfax.

How much of the charm as well as how much of the provokingness of that mind was due to this absence of doubt it can hardly be necessary to urge. Mr. Ruskin will, for what reason Heaven only knows, spell what everybody else spells "Wharnside" "Wharnside," possibly out of a muddle with "Wharncliffe," and in the same context indignantly assert it as a generally known thing that the churches of the Church of England are not "temples," though he knows perfectly well that the formularies of that Church implicitly, and its greatest authorities explicitly, affirm them to be so. But if we got rid of these things we should get rid of our Ruskin with them. He might have addressed his pensive public thus—

"I could not give thee, dear, so much, Gave I not Crotchet more."

It is the heating and driving power of his eloquence—the seed and the manuring of his splendid flowers of speech and thought—this intellectual and emotional waywardness which distinguishes him, in a way perhaps feminine rather than masculine, charming rather than convincing, but indispensable for all that. Take Ruskin for your guide, and unless you have yourself a double portion of that critical power which he almost wholly lacked, you will go into the ditch. Use some critical power of your own to tame and guide his waywardness, as Gautier's poet did that of his "young Chimaera," and he will take you into all sorts of delightful places, and into some that are no less profitable than they are pleasant.

UNSEEN LITERARY FRIENDS

THE "Unseen Friends" (Longmans, 6s. 6d. net), to whom the reader of Mrs. William O'Brien's delightful book is introduced, are all women. Moreover, they are mostly literary friends in whose writings Mrs. O'Brien has found both pleasure and inspiration. Catholic readers, however, will be grateful that she has supplemented these by vivid word-portraits of several notable Irish, French, and Belgian nuns.

What has impressed us most in reading these essays is the range and the warmth of Mrs. O'Brien's literary sympathies. Her judgments are always strong and masculine, but they exhibit an innate kindness and charity, the absence of which mars some of the best literary criticism of to-day. Catholic in her religious standpoint, she is also markedly catholic in her choice of friends in the republic of letters. A devout member of the Roman communion, she has a warm place in her affections for fervid Protestants like Christina Rossetti and that "retiring poetess and gentle writer" Jean Ingelow, who abhorred the Roman Catholic Church as she abhorred the devil. The tone of the whole book may be judged by this confession:

"I have a regretful anguish in my heart when reading some of Christina Rossetti's poems, that, exquisitely as she wrote, more exquisite still was the mind of the writer. An hour with Christina Rossetti in a quiet garden, an hour with Eugénie de Guérin in her chambrette, an hour with Charlotte Brontë pacing up and down the lonely room, where her dear ones used to plan with her, what years of life would one not give for such an hour and such a talk!"

Charlotte Brontë is a special favourite of Mrs. O'Brien, and, in her longest and best essay, she presents a finished picture of the home life of the author of "Jane Eyre." "It is to Charlotte," writes our authoress, "I owe my deep resentment of any unfair treatment of women by other women." It may surprise some readers to find that "George Eliot" is not included in this gallery of literary portraits. But Mrs. O'Brien has her reasons. She admires "George Eliot's" books, but finds her personality somewhat forbidding.

"I have never felt a pang at not having met George Eliot. . . . Her individual self, as pictured in her life and in her letters, proves her to have been, as one of her contemporaries said, 'a dull woman, with a great genius, distinct from herself.'"

Mrs. Browning is also excluded for pretty much the same reason. "Somehow," Mrs. O'Brien writes, "I feel I would rather read over the Portuguese Sonnets than have met the writer of them." It would appear, therefore, that Mrs. O'Brien's literary preferences are dominated by the sound principle that literature shall not be divorced from life. In other words, the women writers who would obtain a passport to her friendship must not only be attractive in their books, but in their lives.

Mrs. O'Brien gives us light, gossipy sketches of a number of notable women—Mrs. Oliphant, Charlotte Brontë, Jean Ingelow, Christina Rossetti, and others—who, while they differed much in their outlook upon literature and upon life, had one thing in common—a personality that was eminently lovable. We are inclined, however, to demur to the inclusion of Mrs. Oliphant. Our authoress has been captivated by the Scottish novelist's "Autobiography and Letters," which she has found more entrancing than any novel. No doubt that work reveals much that was heroic in Mrs. Oliphant's character, but in real life she did not appear in the attractive light in which Mrs. O'Brien represents her. True, her trials were neither few nor light, but she did not bear them altogether uncomplainingly. It would be truer to say that Mrs. Oliphant is admired rather than loved.

We are grateful to Mrs. O'Brien for the interesting sketch of Felicia Skene, whose philanthropic and religious labours deserve to be more widely known. Miss Skene, who was the daughter of John Skene, of Rubislaw, the friend to whom Sir Walter Scott touchingly alludes in "Marmion," was the first lady in England to receive official permission from the Government to become a regular visitor in one of the public prisons.

IN ARCADY

IN Arcady the daffodils are blowing,
Though gloomy Winter holds us in his sway;
To Arcady—O thither I'd be going—
To change my drear December into May.

IN Arcady the birds are always singing,
The breeze is gentle and the sky's all blue;
To Arcady come perfect lovers, bringing
Their dreams, and every dream is true.

O ye who wander in Arcady, dreaming,
Spare but one dream for us who are outside;
For weary are our hearts, and tears are streaming Down cheeks grown pale and wan with hope denied.

ERIC LYALL

THE HOUSE INVISIBLE * * * BY ALAN SULLIVAN

THE great plain stretched before me, vast and untenanted, splashed with odorous flower spaces, wrinkled and alive with the lift of morning winds. To all these I had escaped at the bidding of a new strange instinct, suggestive perhaps rather than dominant, but impellent enough to thrust its delicate pressure through the hardening crust of my own self-approving personality. It was not beauty that had brought me there. I sought nothing that dwelt on the gemmed sod or in the hollow caverns of the wind, nor was I conscious that I evaded anything. A sudden spiritual wander-lust was over me.

Nor had forgetfulness aught to offer. I had borne my years bravely, and the world knew with what measure of success; something of honour had been earned, and riches came with it. I had not stooped to the unclean thing. I loved, and was beloved. But, for all of this, I had become, in a flash, conscious that there was that I knew not of, a deeper insight which I had never attained, but which might perchance stoop to me, and so I walked abroad in solitude, with every barrier of time and circumstance dismantled.

I knew the plain, for it was my own. From the mansion windows its spherical undulations rippled out and lost themselves in the wideness of that world against which it was a fragrant barricade. In the midst of it the house reposed, and, whatever winds blew, only the breath of wild thyme and clover, of gorse and honeysuckle, traversed the sentinel ranks of my memorial trees. Southward lay the sea, to which the sweet land leaned, and that way I walked.

But half-way between the mansion and the shore I stopped on the brink of a cleft ravine that stretched at my feet, and, most strangely, however well I knew my land, I knew not this ravine. Just as the mind stops, startled at undreamed depths of thought suddenly discovered, so I halted at this rift that dipped sharply seaward. It was, perhaps, half a mile wide and a mile long. At the bottom was a tarn of still black water, ringed with a fringe of sand, and to this the hillsides descended smoothly with green encircling slopes. Opposite, within grey stone boundaries, an old house faced the lake, and at the sight I stared round-eyed and turned till I caught, in the blue distance, the comforting mound of trees around my own mansion. For this old, and yet new, house was indeed the brother of my own in shape and size and proportion, and it looked also as my own would look should a hundred years of forgetfulness enshroud it. Stone for stone, window for window, walk for walk, but devoid of sound and life and any breath of humanity, this strange place lay beneath me, and, gazing, I heard its call.

Approaching the great iron gates, again the replica of my own, I searched in vain for any late intimate or humanising touch; and, forcing them, the rusty hinges creaked stiffly in the motionless air. At once I knew, in some subjective fashion, that I was no stranger here. Across the long, straight garden walk tangled rose bushes enmeshed themselves into an interlacing network, and there was that in the rose bushes, in the long walk, in the great gates, and, lastly, in the dead walls facing me, that was eloquent of myself alone. There was, there could be, no asking of where or when. These things were endowed with their own dominant entity—a peculiar individuality which silenced the question before it found expression. The visual confounded the intellectual. I was not breathless or fearful, I seemed only to have turned into a remote by-way that spoke with almost audible emphasis to some long dormant brain-cell just awakened to revive its ancient memories. And, realising this, there was nothing but to go on and break the silence of this mysterious estate.

Ere I gained the door and reached for the corroded knocker I became conscious that my mind was operating with an extraordinarily rapid introspection. This that I was about to discover seemed more nearly, more purely personal, with all its uncertainty, than every intimate and personal relationship I had ever formed. So now, with an absolute abandonment to all that the time and place might yield, I knocked thrice.

The dull clangour filled the house. I could hear it booming through the halls till its reverberations smoothed out into the hollow silences that brooded everywhere. Then, with an insistence that defied the unreality of its own conception, I knocked again and waited, my eyes fixed on that door I knew must open.

There came presently a sound from within: I remember it as being not so much sound itself as a promise of sound, whispering from distances infinitely more remote than those compassed by the house walls. It was as if something were getting ready to begin to move, something that stretched and stirred in doubt ere its aged sinews were trusted to perform their office.

Again, as the door yielded, I felt no fear. I was staring at a man old beyond understanding, so old that the whiteness of his brows curved down over the brilliancy of eyes that mocked at his own antiquity. His dress was a long tunic, half hidden by the winter of his beard; his shoulders were bent as from the weight of immemorial time, and the hand that trembled on the latch was waxen and shrivelled. He seemed, indeed, the epitome of a senescent humanity, the cycle of whose years rivalled that of the stars in their courses.

The bent figure inclined still further. "You are expected," he said; and, at the words, I could almost hear centuries slipping into indistinction.

He turned into the long hall, and I followed. On the floor I could see his footmarks in the dust. To right and left stood armour, even as other armour I knew; but this was covered with dust: gorget, brassard, pauldron, and greave; defiled, neglected, and forgotten. Above there were pictures, once more the parallel; but these were lost in the film that had settled on them from the breathless atmosphere. I had been sleeping, sleeping for years, and now returned to my own, to find it mute and wellnigh obliterated, and barren of all attributes save only memories.

Behind the shuffling feet I mounted the great stairway—till the ancient servitor pointed to a closed door, and there he left me. I was conscious, for a moment, of his uncertain footsteps, and when they ceased he had vanished into the void of that Nirvana from which he came.

Then, from the invisible room, a woman's voice called, a voice unclouded by threat, unsoftened by supplication; and, at the sound of it, the latch yielded and I entered.

There stood the Presence, and instantly my eyes

Larger Income. Longer Life.

A Canada Life Annuity offers to the prudent investor the highest possible return coupled with complete security.

£1,000 invested by a man of 69 in a Canada Life Annuity yields over 13% per annum. He receives an income of £132 16s. 0d. for the rest of his life.

His capital, in common with the whole of the funds of the Canada Life, is under the direct control of the Canadian Government. The regular payment of his income is guaranteed by the assets of the Company—£10,000,000—and further by the high standing and integrity of the Oldest and Strongest Colonial Assurance Office. The increased comfort and entire freedom from all financial anxiety which it carries add many years to life.

Write for Special Annuity Booklet, stating age.

Canada Life Assurance Company

CANADA LIFE BUILDING,

15, KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON, E.C.

Swift

Sure.

Join the army of well-dressed men who "swear by" Achille Serre

The quickest service and the finest results are ensured by having your clothes cleaned and pressed by Achille Serre. Soiled and shabby suits made like new in Four Days — for 3/9.

We collect free from nearest Branch or pay carriage one way on all orders sent direct. Ask for Illustrated Booklet and List of Branches.

Achille Serre Ltd

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3710 East.

A3.

were unsealed. She was not a Deity, but an embodiment of whatever of the Divine was harboured in myself. Each year of my life yielded its memories toward this recognition, and my understanding slowly built itself up to speak.

No man shall describe the Presence. In dreams we may glimpse her. Sometimes when we sound the depths or scale the heights the momentary gleam of her robe appears to the vision that has been cleansed by suffering or joy. But always the vision is measured by our weakness.

This knowledge came to me at that instant. "Your name?" I said with reverence.

"I am nameless until I join that other self, whom I know not," came the reply.

"And this house?" I ventured, breathless with mystery.

"Is the house that he has builded for me?"

My mind flashed back to the mansion on the scented plain.

"This dust?" I said, wonderingly.

"Listen," she answered; and my consciousness went out to meet her beneath the lifting veil. "All the world over men build houses for the body and the mind, but what man has guessed that then also is builded the house of the Spirit? Stone for stone, window for window, the one rises with the other. And when all is done and the hearth fire gleams, then the Spirit takes her habitation."

Her voice ceased. The blank deserted silence of the ghostly place closed in, till, through it, I heard my own utterance—small, thin, and seeming infinitely remote. "There is death here."

"The house of the body speaks of that which is gained," replied the Presence, "but the home of the Spirit of that which is lost."

Vainly I fought for words. Dust, dust! I could think of nothing but dust.

"The armour is stained," went on the gentle voice, "and the roses have closed the paths where I would walk. My house is cold and desolate, and there is only one room left."

"And that room?" I said fearfully.

"Is the time that is left," she whispered.

My soul turned to assail me. Blindly I groped for one ray of light in this darkness of my own creation, in this gloom in which my own impotent Spirit was enshrouded. It was only a little room that remained for her to inhabit. It was my own study. A few intimate things were there. I remembered choosing them because they were fraught with attributes of which I could never tire.

"You know not this man?" I said, marvelling.

"Only when my house is pure and fragrant shall I know him." She turned to the window: "Look!"

Beneath it smiled my gardener's cottage, just as I had left it, on the edge of the moorland. It was alive with light, beautiful with love and care, bedded in roses and the songs of birds. As I looked it seemed that the old man himself passed down the trim walks, and the flowers nodded after him.

"He builded better than he knew," I whispered.

"Men call him a simpleton."

"What man shall judge another? I would that his house were mine. His Spirit has never wandered from home, and dwells not in one room." Mystical and transcendent sounded the voice of the Presence. "Man has many habitations, but only one house invisible. Its dust is man's pride, its solitude is man's selfishness, and that which he sometimes counts as lost is its beauty. As he gives, so it is glorified; and when he is humble the house is filled with music."

I gazed at the vision of the gardener, framed into the riot of his lovely blooms. Softly came the answer to the question that trembled on my lips.

"The great ones of the earth can build spiritual hovels, but the labourer can rear a palace for his soul."

The film that all my life had obscured my sight suddenly rolled back. All those garments of satisfaction and self-esteem that had for years enveloped me were clean stripped away. In one terrible instant I saw myself naked and utterly revealed. What man, seeing this, shall not tremble?

I knelt, abased in supplication. I gazed, but my eyes faltered before the essence suddenly radiating from the transfigured Presence. The mortal in me recoiled from this embodiment of immortality. The glory and the dream had visited me.

Thus, for a long time, sightless and silent, till a breath of fragrance reached me and a delicate wind kissed my trembling lids.

In fear and wonderment I looked again and saw—the soft undulations of the flower-strewn plain, stretching to the sea. The long rift, the black tarn, that ancient house, the dust and desolation—all had vanished.

Slowly, almost unconsciously, my steps were retraced, like those of a man "moving about in worlds half realised." I was still suspended somewhere between this solid infrangible earth and one more tenuous, more elusive, and yet not less real; and it was the gardener who greeted me as he leaned lovingly over his roses.

"They're wunnerful, maister, they're wunnerful," he said, with a pink bud lying like a fairy shell in the cup of his wrinkled hand. "An', ye know, maister, summatt tells me they're even more than that."

I caught the quiet sunshine of his mild blue eye, the eye of a Spirit that had never wandered far from home. "Yes," I muttered, staring at him with a sudden, strange, breathless interest, "I think they're more than that."

THE BEAUTY OF LIFE

MR. BENSON'S work (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) lends itself to the processes of selection. It must have been a more interesting than onerous task to find a suitable page in his writings for every day of the year. We do not suppose that many readers will take this book of Elegant Extracts at the strict page a day, with a supplementary reading thrown in on February 29th, 1916; that seems indicated, but there is a certain attraction in a volume that is not destined for summary consumption. And if this is not a continuous book, it at all events serves to conduct the outpourings of a consistent philosophy. It is, we think, a somewhat unsatisfying philosophy, depending apparently on the absence of shocks, save those of a Providential order; but it is most certainly consistent. Beauty is to be sought in everything, and, if sought patiently and earnestly, will be found. After all, Browning and Keats, to name but two of the poets who have been especially articulate on the subject, have cherished a very similar philosophy. But we cannot avoid the feeling that, in Mr. Benson's case, cathedrals, cloisters, and colleges, beautiful books, and an infinite variety of country walks are indispensable daily ingredients in his ideal; if these were inaccessible, the whole theory of life would have to be re-shaped. But, if we simply accept Mr. Benson at the estimate he gives of himself in his own preface, we can give ourselves over to the enjoyment of a number of beautiful pages on many delightful themes.

TURKISH BATHS AT HOME

No form of bathing accomplishes such perfect cleanliness as the combined HOT-AIR and VAPOUR BATH. It not only cleanses the outer surface, but also opens the pores, eliminates impure matters, and stimulates a healthful flow of—life's principal—the blood, clears the skin, recuperates the body, quiets the nerves, rests the tired, and creates that delightful feeling of invigorated health and strength.

PHYSICIANS AGREE THAT "FOOT'S" IS THE BEST CABINET and recommend its use for the prevention and cure of Colds, Influenza, Rheumatism, Kidney and Liver Troubles, Skin Diseases, &c. A FOOT'S Cabinet possesses every desirable feature of efficiency, and has several exclusive advantages, including Improved Outside Heat and Vapour Generator, Adjustable Seat, and Heat Regulator. The Bather is not fastened to the Cabinet; Exit is Easy and Immediate; No Assistant required. Can be used in any room, and folds into a small compact space.

Our "Bath Book," No. 30, contains much interesting information not generally known about Thermal Bathing, and illustrates and describes our Cabinets in various qualities. Sent Free on request.

FOOT'S

(Dept. B. 30),

171, New

Bond St., London, W.

A Unique Barless Fire

The Hue Patent Fire is unique in this respect, that it can be adapted to any existing stove in a very short time without removing the old stove or mantelpiece. The Hue Fire gives a cheerful hearth-fire, warms the room and not the chimney, and consumes only HALF the amount of coal, thus actually

A "HUE" IN EVERY HOME
 CHEERFUL HEARTH-FIRE HEAT UTILITY ECONOMY
 MODERNIZES INEXPENSIVELY OUT-OF-DATE GRATES.

saving its cost in a few weeks. This fire is not a makeshift, and there is absolutely no danger of floor-fires. Hundreds of users have written us saying how delighted they are, and we want you, in the interests of warmth, comfort, and economy, to know more about this wonderful Barless Fire. Therefore send a post card now for our illustrated leaflet, giving full details of the Hue Fire. Used in many Public Institutions and Hospitals, and also by the principal Railway Companies. Your local decorator can supply and fix them from 15/- upwards.

Insist upon having a "Hue."

Send a post card to-day for Illustrated Leaflet to Sole Patentees—

YOUNG & MARTEN, Ltd.,
 (Dept. E) Stratford, London, E.

MAIN CURRENTS OF MODERN THOUGHT*

BY RUDOLF EUCKEN

THE ETERNAL ELEMENT IN HUMAN PROGRESS.

DOWN to its most elementary basic forms spiritual life demands and exhibits a permanent character, a permanence not within time, but in opposition to it. A truth valid only for to-day or to-morrow is an absurdity. What is true at all is true for all time—or, better still, it is true irrespective of time. Although the statement, under particular circumstances, may be for a period of time only, the manner in which it is expressed is always timeless. As spiritual experience, all truth involves a liberation from all time. Moreover, that which we value and recognise as good derives its value, not from the point of view of a particular epoch, but independently of all time. It derives it from a timeless order of things. Certain as it is that the concepts of good obtaining in various ages alter with the age in question, it is none the less certain that whatever any given epoch apprehends as good is taken to be absolutely and permanently valid. No alteration of human circumstance is able to destroy this inner superiority of spiritual life to time. Further, concepts like personality, character, spiritual individuality, also proclaim this supra-temporal quality of spiritual life, for they demand the formation of a permanent type and its consistent retention in the face of all movement. Conduct in all its various phases aims at bringing this type to expression and at promoting its welfare. Thus, to convert spiritual life entirely into movement is to destroy its very foundations.

Nay, movement itself, regarded inwardly, bears witness to the indispensability of permanence. It cannot be reviewed, gathered together into a whole, or experienced as a whole in the absence of a standpoint superior to itself and a synthesis effected from thence. Otherwise it becomes split up into numerous separate states, which may, indeed, occupy and entertain the soul with kaleidoscopic changing impressions, but cannot provide it with a whole and a content. Therefore, the more a force superior to movement disappears, the more does life tend to become superficial and to lose all spiritual freedom.

This quality of spiritual life, by which it is raised above time, is peculiarly well illustrated by the construction of a history, in so far as it is a characteristically human and spiritual history. For history, in the human sense, is by no means a mere succession of events, a mere floating of humanity down the stream of time; that would never lead beyond an accumulation of outward effects, such as nature shows us in the formation of the earth's crust. All human history is far rather a resistance to the mere flux of phenomena, some kind of an attempt to bring the current to a standstill, a struggle against mere time. Even the most primitive attempt to preserve customs, deeds, etc., in the memory of succeeding generations, and thus retain them in the consciousness of humanity, shows such a resistance to time. The more, however, history is to mean for man, the more it is to bring him, not merely an enlargement of knowledge, but an elevation of life, the more self-activity must he put forth. This demands, of necessity, a standpoint superior to time. To experience the past inwardly we must liberate ourselves from the accidental character of the present, or at the least strive towards such a liberation. Otherwise, in everything earlier we should see solely a projection of the present type, and in the midst of all outward enlargement remain, inwardly, just as we are. An understanding of other epochs according to their own distinctive relationships would be totally denied to us. To gain such insight we should not merely know the past, but relate it to our own life, convert its wealth into our own property, raise ourselves to the level of what is great in it. With this object it becomes necessary, not only to acquire an understanding of previous ages, but without transferring the sphere of activity to a timeless standpoint. Finally, history is valuable to us only in so far as we are able to convert it into a timeless present. Its main function is to lead us out of the narrowness of poverty of the merely momentary present into a wider present, superior to, and encompassing, time. There is no more dangerous enemy of a real present than devotion to the mere moment.

RELIGION.

In the midst of all the passionate attacks upon religion the religious problem is again coming to the front. The denial of religion is becoming more and more popular among the masses, but that does not prevent religion arousing a greatly increased amount of thought and passion on the highest level of spiritual and intellectual life. It is a fact that, at a given period, different movements may cut across or oppose one another, and the tendency of the surface-movement may be directly contrary to that of the under-current. In order to assure ourselves of the re-ascent of religion we need only compare our age with the German Classical Period. Religion was then no more than an agreeable adjunct to life; to-day it stands in the very centre of life, produces differences of opinion to the point of the bitterest conflict, makes its voice heard in the treatment of every circumstance, and exerts an immense power alike in affirmation and negation. For the modern denial is not of the kind which calmly shelves religion as something decayed and obsolete; on the contrary, the violently passionate nature of the attack shows clearly enough that religion is still something very real, powerful, and effective. Perhaps even the denial itself frequently signifies not so much a complete rejection of religion as a desire for another and simpler type of religion, more adapted to the needs of the day. At any rate, religion cannot be regarded as a slowly dying light.

To what are we to attribute this sudden change? It can hardly be the fruit of apologetic work, for this is usually preaching to the converted. It may confirm and consolidate, but it is not in its nature to press forward. In reality, the movement is rooted in a reaction on the part of modern life itself. Just because this life, with its delight in the world, has been able to develop itself freely and put forth all its capacity, its limitations—nay, its helplessness—with regard to ultimate questions has become clear. It is another case of that indirect method of proof of which the history of humanity provides us with so many examples, a method according to which the indispensability of an assertion is convincingly demonstrated as the result of a negation, of the unrestricted expansion of the opposite assertion. The direction of life towards immediate existence has dispelled much illusion and superstition, awakened much otherwise latent forces, and advanced and developed this existence in the most manifold fashion. But that which has been accomplished in this direction is predominantly of a peripheral nature. It has improved the conditions of our life, but has not deepened life itself. An inward emptiness is thus the final result of all this immeasurable work and we cannot but look upon all the labour and endeavour as inadequate. The rejection of each and every invisible relationship reduced culture more and more to a merely human culture. This was able to avoid objection so long as a high ideal value was attached to the concept of human being itself, and the latter was viewed in a transfigured form.* This, however, took place under the influence of that very mode of thought which is now rejected as a falsification of reality. With its disappearance the transfiguration must also cease. Man must appear in his natural condition without wrapping or adornment and become the sole standard of all truth and goodness. Now, modern life in particular, with its liberation of every force, has brought to the surface so much that is impure, unedifying, and unworthy, and has placed so clearly before our eyes the pettiness and unreality of a merely human culture, that it becomes continually more and more hopeless to obtain a satisfying type of life upon this basis, and to provide human existence with a meaning and a value. It is being increasingly felt that there is something in man which this imminent type of life does not bring out, and that this undeveloped element is something indispensable, perhaps the best of all!

* These extracts, kindly chosen by Professor Eucken from his "Main Currents of Modern Thought" (Unwin, 12s. 6d. net), embody the essence of his philosophy.

Thus there grows up a desire for an inner transformation of man for a liberation from the pettiness which fetters and oppresses him. A new age is at hand. The trend is again from a merely humanistic culture to a transforming spiritual culture, elevating man's essential being. This necessarily leads to the demand for a new reality, and hence towards religion.

A GREAT ECCLESIASTIC AND A GREAT PREACHER†

BY NORMAN MACLEAN.

THE ecclesiastical history of Scotland is sad and painful reading. It is the record of how a nation rent and re-rent the Church of Christ because men differed regarding a diphthong. After Voltaire had described the tyrannical intolerance of the Anglicans and the fanatical intolerance of the Scottish Presbyterians, he exclaimed: "If there were one religion in England its despotism would be terrible; if there were two, they would destroy each other; but there are thirty, and therefore they live in peace and happiness." In Scotland, after 1843, there were three powerful Presbyterian Churches, but they devoured one another. When Polycarp met Marcion in Rome, and the latter sought recognition, Polycarp greeted him thus, "I recognise the first-born of Satan." That was the language used by the Scottish Presbyterians to each other for half a century. As the one saw the other they saw the "Synagogue of Satan," a "mere negation of Christianity." There is perhaps a

* Herder, for example, made of "humanity" an all-embracing, lofty ideal: "Man has no nobler word for his destiny than that which describes himself."

† "Life of Professor Charteris." By Rev. and Hon. Arthur Gordon. 10s. 6d. "Life of Dr. MacGregor." By Lady Frances Balfour. 12s. 6d. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

racial explanation of the ferocity of the language. It can be traced to the "perfervidum ingenium Scotorum"—a phrase which Dr. MacGregor, of St. Cuthbert's, translated "Scottish dourness."

I.

It is the record of the lives of men which is the true mirror of the past. To the students of Scottish Church history two biographies, recently published, will be invaluable. In his "Life of Professor Charteris" the Rev. and Hon. Arthur Gordon has depicted, with the pen of a true historian, a great ecclesiastic and organiser; and Lady Frances Balfour has, in her "Life of Dr. James MacGregor," drawn with rare literary skill the portrait of a great preacher in all his strength and weakness. Both men sprang from the people; both wielded an enormous power in their day; and both were friends of all classes, from the Queen to the peasant. These books, therefore, present a picture of Scottish life in all the rich variety of the nineteenth century.

II.

To the historian Mr. Gordon's book will be a rich storehouse. Dr. Charteris was an ecclesiastical statesman. He had a part in all the movements which transformed the Church of Scotland. Chief among these was the abolition of patronage. Basic motives have been imputed to the men who wrought that deliverance. Dr. Carnegie Simpson, in his "Life of Principal Rainy," shows that their one aim was to triumph over the Free Churches. Mr. Gordon proves from the written word that these men were patriots, whose one desire was the re-uniting of the Scottish Presbyterians and the welfare of the nation. Dr. Charteris' letter to Taylor Innes is as a cry out of the depths: "My heart is nearly broken by the style in which the Free Church is again treating the subject. What do you propose? What do you want?" That is the terrible fruit of Church divisions—it makes it so difficult for the one Church to believe in the sincerity and the truth of the Church on the other side of the wall. To-day, as a result of the labours of these men, the Presbyterian churches are on the eve of levelling the dividing wall. It is for that consummation Dr. Charteris laboured. Mr. Gordon's biography is a sincere record of a sincere soul.

III.

Dr. MacGregor, of St. Cuthbert's, belonged to another category. He was no lover of Church Courts. Regarding them he declared that he entered a Presbytery meeting a humble and loving Christian, and left it possessed with seven devils! The power of the man was mesmeric. He had only to open his lips and men could not but listen. To A. K. H. B. we owe the anecdote of how Stanley went round Westminster Abbey with Dr. MacGregor and Dean Edwards. Edwards was disappointed in MacGregor's appearance. Whereupon Stanley said to Edwards: "He is a great orator. You can no more judge what he is in the pulpit from seeing him waddling about Westminster Abbey than you can judge of St. Paul from his Epistles." And yet it was not what he said that made MacGregor the greatest preacher of his day. Others could speak with greater knowledge and sound greater depths. It was the indefinable something behind the spoken word—the something which cannot be accounted for by earthly categories. It was the living personality tingling with dynamic force, all aglow with the radiance which can only be described as divine. There is one illustration of the power of the man. In a crowded church MacGregor

Notable Publications from THE HOUSE OF CASSELL.

A History of England.

By Rt. Hon. H. O. ARNOLD FORSTER, M.A. New and Enlarged Edition. Revised by Mrs. ARNOLD FORSTER. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. Ex. crown 8vo, 5s. No better piece of popular educative work, in the domain of history, has been done in the last quarter-century than this volume.

The Story of the Renaissance.

By WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON. The author, well known as Staff Lecturer on Literature to the University Extension Board of the University of London, has attempted in this volume to re-create the spirit of emancipation which manifested itself in the Middle Ages. With 8 full-page illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 272 pages, cloth gilt, 5s. net. "We can confidently recommend his book to all who wish to get some real understanding of the most important and one of the most fascinating periods in all history."—The Globe.

A First Sketch of English Literature.

By Prof. HENRY MORLEY, LL.D. New and Revised Edition, containing a Comprehensive Supplement by E. W. EDMUNDS, M.A., B.Sc., bringing the work down to the deaths of Swinburne and Meredith. Crown 8vo, 1,192 pages, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d. net.

Two Successful Novels Just Published at 6s.

CHILD OF STORM. By H. RIDER HAGGARD. 3rd Ed.
"One of Sir Rider Haggard's most notable productions."—Everyman.

RED HARVEST. By NEWMAN FLOWER. 4th Ed.

SENT FREE. An attractive brochure of biographies of the authors in Cassell's People's Library (price, in attractive cloth binding, 8d. net). This booklet forms an interesting and indeed valuable reference guide to the most noted contributors to the world's literature.

CASSELL & CO., Ltd., LA BELLE SAUVAGE, LONDON, E.C.

THE LIFE OF THE BEE.

By MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

Translated by ALFRED SUTRO. Illustrated in Colour by E. J. DETMOLD
Special Edition on Arnold Paper.

DEMY 4to. JAPANESE VELLUM. DESIGNED COVER. 21/- NET.

M. MAETERLINCK writes: "All Detmold's plates which represent bees are real, incontestable CHEFS D'ŒUVRES, and as fine as a Rembrandt. The interiors of the hives seem works of genius."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"The feature of this sumptuous reprint is its beauty of form, and a series of lovely colour reproductions."

HOURS OF GLADNESS.

EIGHT NATURE ESSAYS. By M. MAETERLINCK.

With a NEW ESSAY on "Our City Gardens."

Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS.

With 20 full-page Plates in Colour, Designed Cover and Title Page by EDWARD J. DETMOLD.

Special Edition on Arnold Paper.

DEMY 4to. 21/- NET.

STANDARD.—"An extremely beautiful edition, and the illustrations in colour leave nothing to be desired."

ATHENÆUM.—"The technical perfection with which these drawings have been reproduced is remarkable."

THE POCKET EDITION OF MAETERLINCK'S WORKS.

Fcap. 8vo. Designed Cover. Cloth, 2/6 net; leather, 3/6 net per vol.

Translated by ALFRED SUTRO.

THE BURIED TEMPLE (6th Thousand).

THE LIFE OF THE BEE (41st Thousand).

THE TREASURE OF THE HUMBLE (23rd Thousand).

WISDOM AND DESTINY (17th Thousand).

Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS.

THE DOUBLE GARDEN (10th Thousand).

LIFE AND FLOWERS (9th Thousand).

AND FOUR VOLUMES OF PLAYS.

London: GEORGE ALLEN & CO., Ltd., 44 & 45, RATHBONE PLACE.

referred with intense feeling to the letter of Emperor William to President Kruger. "That unworthy letter of the German Emperor to President Kruger" were the words. But all through the pews of the crowded church there was a movement, a stirring of feet, a low, hoarse murmur from the awakened passions of men.

That shows the power of the man. A million men could have spoken these words and they would be as the wind only. MacGregor spoke them, and a mighty multitude were filled with the passion of battle. The great preacher is not man-made; he is God-made. I remember hearing Dr. MacGregor preach on a dull winter afternoon long ago, and his subject was Judgment. The vividness of the imagery and the power of the personality were such that when I came out the city lying round about seemed unreal. The subject did not matter much. Often his subjects were strange. He had a course of sermons on the "Trees of the Lord," and Sir William Muir, coming to the church at that time, asked if Dr. MacGregor was out of the wood yet!

IV.

There is no book so good as a good biography. In reading such we are "eavesdropping at the door of the heart." And these biographies are good. We hear the voices of a vanished day, the strivings of noble men for noble ends. And if the future has great things in store for the churches in Scotland, it is because men such as these laid the foundations. Because of them an atmosphere of Christian love and hope has displaced the atmosphere of hate and suspicion.

CORRESPONDENCE

MINERS AND EDUCATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read Mr. Macpherson's article on "The Cult of Pleasure" in your issue of January 31st, and wish to take exception to the impression he gives of the moral and intellectual condition of the Northumberland and Durham mining population. As an Extension lecturer and a tutor of the Workers' Educational Association, working entirely in the North, I have peculiar opportunities of seeing and hearing the best and the worst of the miners' characteristics.

Let me admit at once that the miners are extravagant, and much given to gambling and drinking, and that their wives are not immaculate. It is patent, too, that they have not failed to share with their richer brethren the prevailing lust for pleasure, most forms of which can now be purchased in some degree for a few pence. But your contributor and the authorities he quotes are sadly misleading in inferring that all educational activity and intellectual life are at a low ebb in mining centres; and to say that secondary schools are scouted by most young men is false. It will be readily admitted that, ever since the introduction of compulsory education, the miners have suffered peculiar disadvantages in the acquisition of knowledge, yet to-day there is no more intelligent, hard-thinking and industrious class in the community. Till recently, the isolation of mining villages has had two main effects—one bad, one good; first, the other absence of amusement and relief to their lives of hard toil has made drinking and low forms of sport rife amongst them; secondly, as soon as the tide turned in their favour and brought them the higher pleasures of University lectures, reading-rooms, and so on, they have in most cases seized on these with avidity and intelligence. Those who point to drunkenness and betting as the cause of declining demand for Extension lectures offer a particular explanation of a general phenomenon.

The Extension movement has inevitably suffered from the immense increase in facilities for higher education and alternative leisure occupations of recent years. Secondary and elementary education, cheap classics and technical works, libraries, popular educators and encyclopædias have for years past been furnishing the workers with what before was the exclusive possession of the University man. The Extension movement is, therefore, and rightly, modifying its methods and supplying fresh spheres of usefulness. Not that it is not lamentable that miners do not now greatly demand such lectures; but there are other explanations than the very partial one offered by your contributor.

Further developments have put within the miner's reach the wonderful cinematograph, the great football match, hitherto beyond his reach, and a thousand and one luxurious amusements of our century. While all this has deplorable effects, is it to be wondered at that he flees his dull village, with its shameful back-to-back houses, its ill-lighted streets and stinking alleys, and seeks the gaudy pleasures of the city and the picture-hall?

Yet, amid all these distractions, the miner preserves his belief in education, and shows it in many ways. Miners are notoriously fond of and ambitious for their children. I could tell dozens of stories of the painful anxiety of uneducated miners to gain for their children the benefits of secondary education. Moreover, most southerners would be astounded to find in a great number of miners' homes libraries of sociology, ethics, philosophy, and economics that would put many an undergraduate to shame.

I would gladly take on a tour of inspection any who earnestly desire to know the truth about these men. It is proved beyond doubt that when the right sort of educational appeal is made to them the miners eagerly respond. Their co-operative societies and workmen's clubs arrange scores of lectures, by the best men, every winter. Though these courses have certainly suffered from the picture-hall craze, the fact that they go on in spite of it is a great tribute to the miner's intelligence.

Last, but not least, must be mentioned the success of the Workers' Educational Association in arranging University courses of study, up to a high honours standard, as well as courses of public lectures, in mining centres. It is a privilege to deliver these courses, as I am continually doing, and be met with the keenest and most critical interrogatories that can be made by any students. It is easy for Mr. Macpherson to quote statements such as those contained in his article, but he would receive a most salutary shock if he could realise the comparatively large number of miners who are capable of taking high honours at Oxford or Cambridge, and can discuss with acumen the problems of Greek philosophy or modern economics. I could give the names of a dozen University professors who have lectured to the miners in the last three years, and their tributes to the intelligence and wide reading exhibited.—I am, sir, etc.,

"UNIVERSITAS."

THE SAD LOT OF THE SCHOOLMASTER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am extremely glad to see your columns opened to the question of National Education. The

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN" ON THE
HOME UNIVERSITY

LIBRARY. "I should attribute the success of this Library to the extraordinary good fortune of the Editors in enlisting the services of the right men. . . . Never before have the salient features of the most important fields of human knowledge been brought before the average reader with such compactness, lucidity and charm of presentation."

Cloth
1/6 net
256
Pages

HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE

Leather
2/6 net
256
Pages

7TH TEN VOLUMES NOW READY

- 61 NAPOLEON (Illustrated) Herbert Fisher, MA, F.R.S.
- 62 THE ORIGIN AND NATURE OF LIFE Prof. Benjamin Moore
- 63 PAINTERS AND PAINTING (Illustrated) Sir Frederick Wedmore.
- 64 DR JOHNSON AND HIS CIRCLE John Bailey, M.A.
- 65 THE LITERATURE OF GERMANY Prof. J. G. Robertson
- 66 THE NAVY AND SEA POWER David Hannay.
- 67 CHEMISTRY Prof. Raphael Meldola.
- 68 COMPARATIVE RELIGION Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter
- 69 THE NEWSPAPER (Illustrated) G. Binney Dibblee, M.A.
- 70 THE VICTORIAN AGE IN LITERATURE G. K. Chesterton

Edited by Prof. Gilbert Murray, of Oxford, Mr. Herbert Fisher, Vice-Chancellor of Sheffield University, Prof. J. Arthur Thomson, of Aberdeen, and Prof. W. T. Brewster, of New York.

Obtainable at all leading bookshops and bookstalls. A full descriptive & illustrated list post free upon application.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, HENRIETTA ST. LONDON, W.C.

THE BEST—AND ONLY THE BEST

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30, 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, High Holboro, London, W.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

"CONCENTRATION: Its Ten Laws"; in a Nutshell, on Card. Teaches the new way to acquire Knowledge. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

writer of your article considers that the poor social status of the elementary school teacher deters many good men from entering the profession. I agree with him; but would point out that the social standing of a fairly educated man depends upon his income. Examine the advertisement columns of the Schoolmaster week by week, and you will find that most of the advertisements ask for unqualified (uncertificated) teachers, at "salaries" of £1 or so a week. I see this week that the Somersetshire Education Committee recommends a salary of 25s. a week for certificated assistant masters!

The London service is the best-paid in the country. After fourteen years' service, a master may get a maximum of £200 a year. This is a small income in London, and, in the majority of cases, has to be supplemented by arduous and ill-paid evening school work.

Now, sir, the teaching of our youth is splendid and inspiring work. It demands every ounce of energy that a man can put forth. Optimism, buoyancy, and, therefore, freedom from care are essential to success. But who is optimistic on an inadequate salary? Thanks to good chance, I have reached a more comfortable income than many teachers; but, in common with every schoolmaster that I know, I would not dream of putting my own son into the profession. I have lived a strenuous, laborious life, absorbed in my work, just as most other teachers. But there is no fair reward. I cannot keep in touch with modern thought; for I cannot buy books; my studies are hampered for the want of pence for apparatus, etc.; social intercourse I must keep at a minimum; and so on and so on. I am convinced that the key to our educational problem lies in the remuneration of the teacher. Schools may be secularised; homilies, memoranda, and codes written by the gross; but no advance will be made till the workmen are in better circumstances.—I am, sir, etc.,
T. B.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—All teachers in the nation's schools will agree with the remarks of your contributor on "Caste" in Education; but he has not touched—nay, rather has denied the greater evil—i.e., the full and adequate recompense of the teacher for work which, too often, leaves him or her a nervous wreck at a comparatively early age, yet forces him or her to struggle on till the age of sixty or sixty-five.

"The problem of securing the best teachers is mainly a financial problem, not a moral one." Surely your correspondent knows that the Education Department can, and has in the past varied its standard of examination for the teachers' certificate some 45 per cent.—i.e., allowed, roughly, double the number of teachers to qualify, so as to obtain an ample supply of cheap teachers.

Matters are better now. The Education Department has, in the past three years, realised that cheap certified teachers, at a commencing salary of £40 per annum, soon realise that they are too cheap, and migrate to other and better-paid callings.

Can it be possible that the writer does not know that there are 61,000 uncertificated teachers, with an average salary well below £1 per week; that 18,000 supplementary teachers, persons whose qualification is that they are over eighteen years of age and vaccinated, are working in the poorer schools? Sir John Gorst called them "animated broomsticks"; yet the provincial education committees are advertising for them in hundreds, simply because they are cheap.

Yet we are told this is a moral question, not financial.

Again, the question of numbers taught is entirely overlooked.—Does not the fact that classes of sixty children in our elementary schools explain the dissatisfaction with the results of our education system? Is there likely to be even an approach to true education with such numbers? Place even a heaven-born teacher in a poor, badly lighted building, children badly fed and clothed, and little progress will be made; but if the teacher is only half-educated, and weighed down with the worry of making both ends meet, "anarchy" must eventuate.—I am, sir, etc.,

F. H. W.

THE DOWRY QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Will you allow a dowerless young French girl who has for some years lived, and is still living, a part of the year in England and the other in France, and who, owing to the situation her father occupies, is able to see and appreciate much of all classes of society in both countries, and who, finally, is a great lover of England, to say a few words in answer to Mme. Geoffrey's letter?

If it is true that many young men, for reasons too long to consider here, but not always blameworthy, wish to marry a girl with a dowry, it is quite as true, on the other hand, that in all families the former life of a suitor is carefully inquired into before the parents of the girl allow the match; and, with a few exceptions, which go to prove the rule, parents do not let their daughter marry a man who has no employment or occupation. Few French girls indeed would accept such a man as a husband!

The young men "who have learned to rely upon a good match to get a living," and "marry for life," are met with only in a certain class of society, that of the wealthy and leisurely, and even there as an exception. In this respect, everyone will recognise that England is not more favoured than France. I cannot refrain from adding that in my own family and among my friends there are several instances of dowerless girls who are not engaged but married to "nice men who are working hard," not to get a position, but to keep up their family, while I know girls with a dowry of £4,000 to £12,000 who cannot find a husband.

I would not trouble you with this matter if your paper was not an English one, and widely circulated, but it seems to me a great shame that a letter so deliberately showing one side of the question, and the exceptional one, should remain unanswered by a person very interested in the marriage question in both countries, and one whose lack of dowry renders unsuspecting of esprit de parti.—I am, sir, etc.,

A FRENCH GIRL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In his letter appearing in EVERYMAN of January 31st Mr. Salmon states that the question of the French dowry is nearly always misinterpreted in England, and I think his remarks are convincing evidence of the fact. I trust that he, and, in fact, all you readers, will peruse Mrs. Geofroy's letter of this week, which is a clear statement of the facts.

Mr. Salmon implies that the French girl of whom a "dot" would be expected corresponds to the English girl who stipulates that her husband should have an income of £350 to £400. May I point out that a Frenchman earning from 30s. to £2 per week marries

(Continued on page 602.)

RYDERS

P.P. SEEDS

To all garden lovers, "What shall we sow?" is the great consideration. Ryders relieve everyone's perplexity, for their wonderful penny packet seeds set the standard to the world. Gathered from the finest harvests with infinite care, they are of irreproachable quality and produce unequalled results. Millions of gardeners have proved this—why not you?

All Seeds in PENNY PACKETS from Orchids to Mustard & Cress.
RYDERS 1913 CATALOGUE FREE

awaits you. "A record production" will be everyone's verdict. You can select from its lists every seed you need for flower and kitchen garden. Splendidly illustrated with coloured plates, photo blocks, and engravings.

Your copy will be sent free and post paid on request. Send at once and begin your seed selection. Ryders have but one address and no agents.

RYDER & SONS, Ltd.,
 Seed Specialists,
ST. ALBANS.

"Imitated but Unequalled."

Altho' deaf.

There is now no reason why you should not enjoy the pleasures of perfect hearing. The DANHILL EARPHONE gives perfect hearing and will enable you to once more enjoy the pleasures of conversation, music, Church and Theatre. It places you on an equal footing with those with perfect hearing.

It is the lightest, cheapest, and most perfect instrument for the deaf. Supplied on trial. Write for particulars to-day.

Danhill
EARPHONE
 GIVES PERFECT HEARING

D. & J. R. HILL, 58, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON.

PLAYER'S Navy Mixture

Out of the sweetest and ripest leaves of the tobacco plant "pipe perfect" Player's Navy Mixture is made.

Player's Navy Mixture is everything that a tobacco can be.

It is cool and even burning, with a bouquet as distinct and delicate as that of some rare vintage wine.

Then fill your pipe with this best of Mixtures and know all the joy that a perfect tobacco can bring.

IN THREE STRENGTHS:

Mild 5^{D.} per oz. Medium 5^{D.} per oz.
 White Label 4¹/₂ D. per oz.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

AUSTRALIA'S PROMINENT MEN. Their biographical records are given in "Fred Johns's Annual," the standard Australasian work. 6s. 6d.; posted to England, 6d. extra. Obtainable from the Author, Fred Johns, Rose Park, Adelaide, Australia.

A GUINEA AN HOUR for simple talks. See "Public Speaking for Pay and Pleasure" (Special Section: How to Get Engagements), 1s., post free.—Morgan, Poulner, Ringwood.

ALL Literary MSS. must be typewritten. We do it under expert literary supervision, neatly, accurately, quickly, and cheaply. Work can be sent out the same day as it is received.—Mr. W. B. Bridges, 70, Rutland Street, Leicester.

WOMAN AND MARRIAGE. A Handbook. By Margaret Stephens. Cloth, 3/6 net (Post free 3/10). "All the difficulties of the subject are handled fearlessly, gravely and reverently in this book," says The Spectator. On sale at all Booksellers'.—T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London, Eng.

RARE BOOKS.—A Collector wishes to sell privately his remaining First Edition and other Choice Editions. Low prices to clear. Includes R. L. Stevenson, Dickens, Gray, Milton, Roycroft Press, Bunyan, etc. List on application.—H. M. C., c/o Dawson's, 121, Cannon Street, E.C.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper

SCIENTIFIC CONCENTRATION

Is the Finest All-round Mental Training in Existence.

The man or woman who undertakes this training rapidly increases their powers of Attention, Observation, Memory, Thinking, and Speaking. It enormously increases their Will-power, Self-Control, Self-Reliance, and Initiative. It enables them to cure Worry, Mind-Wandering, Bad Habits, and to inhibit distracting Influences. It gives them a powerful personality, greater working efficiency, and a new and broader outlook on life.

AUTHORITATIVE TESTIMONY.

The Late Mr. W. T. Stead, Editor of the "Review of Reviews," having seen treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration, and wish it every success."

"Great Thoughts" says:—"The Booklets and Lessons of the Concentro Course are admirable, marked by common sense, practical experience, wide reading in psychology, and are thoroughly scientific."

"The Guardian" says:—"The principles therein laid down are unquestionably sound. A person who lacked the capacity of concentration and desired to possess it could not do better than follow a course of the instruction here offered him."

"Christian Commonwealth" says:—"The cure of mind-wandering—the student's greatest bane—the acquirement of resolution, the right attitude of mind, the ability to concentrate the powers of both mind and body, and to direct them to the best advantage, are ably taught by the Concentro Co."

"John Bull" says:—"Those whose control of their thoughts is hampered by the distractions of latter-day civilisation would do well to write to the Concentro Co."

"Public Opinion" says:—"The Concentro Co. are really giving one a splendid all-round mental training—one that will be eminently useful in any department of life."

Every reader of "Everyman" should get acquainted with this splendid Course, which is being practised in every part of the civilised world. Send to day for Free Descriptive Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46, Central Buildings, Wallsend, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

REMAINDER BOOKS.—February Catalogue of Publishers' Reminders Now Ready. Gratis and Post Free.—WM. GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London, and at 14, George Street, Croydon.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

STAMMERING AND ILL-DEVELOPED SPEECH. Mr. Herbert Miall, whose exposition created so much interest at The Children's Welfare Exhibition, can take a few more cases at any age, personally or by correspondence. Home or school visited; clientele at Rugby, Uppingham, and Christ's Hospital Schools. This reformed method of instruction is guaranteed.—Address 8, Argyll Place, London, W.

AUTHORS should forward MSS. (Stories, Poems, Essays, Novels, etc.) to Mr. Arthur Stockwell, Publisher, 29, Ludgate Hill, London. Advice re publication free. Typewriting unnecessary. New Authors fully and frankly helped.

SHORT STORIES, Articles, Novels, placed with 179 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices and fairest terms. 16pp. Prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

LITTLE SALON SOCIAL-LITERARY CIRCLES.—For Men and Women of Culture (Speakers and Non-Speakers); include Drama, and Open Discussions of Questions of the Day. New Books, etc. Sub. Mod.—Write, M. L. B., Salon Secretary, 24, Bloomsbury Square, London, W.C.

LONDON AMATEUR PRESS CLUB: A Society for the Encouragement and Assistance of Amateur Journalists. Monthly meetings; Correspondence Circle.—Apply to Secretary, 5, The Broadway, Station Road, Harrow, for particulars.

FOREIGN LANGUAGES BY POST.

MODERN LANGUAGES, LATIN and GREEK.

DIRECTOR, EVERSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE,
43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

the girl with a dowry. If he agrees to forgo the "dot" it is on the understanding that the girl continue to earn her living after marriage.

Your contributor adds that "it is quite certain that a girl without money has just as many chances of marrying in France as in England." Without a dot the French girl has very little prospects of marriage, and that is the raison d'être of the French dowry system.—I am, sir, etc.,
W. H. WILLIAMS.

Paris, February.

THE MORAL PROGRESS OF THE SWISS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—After a stay of two years in Lausanne, I am quite convinced that the moral progress of the Swiss people has not kept pace with its intellectual progress.

This I put down to two causes: firstly, the influences of a cosmopolitan crowd, which is always to be found in Switzerland; and, secondly, to the fact that, generally speaking, the education given in the State schools is strictly utilitarian.

I am aware that there is a Collège Classique in Lausanne, but the number of pupils attending the Collège Scientifique there is four times that of the other.

There is, too, a very popular Ecole de Commerce.

I have no doubt that this is the case in every fair-sized town in Switzerland.

The Swiss have realised that their chief business is, and must be, to prey on the foreigner who visits their country.

A very large proportion of these foreigners is composed of South Americans.

They have plenty of money, and therefore pay any price demanded.

Their morals, too, are—well, South American!

If I had not had the good fortune to meet with one or two Swiss of the older type I should have left the country with an impression of its inhabitants much more unpleasant than I now have.

The country appears, too, to have been taken in hand by foreign business men, chiefly Germans and Italians from the North of Italy.

The old spirit and the old ideas are rapidly dying out under the influence of these "entrepreneurs" and the South American "rastaquonaire."—I am, sir, etc.,
ENGLISHMAN.

THE PRACTICAL TEACHING OF LITERATURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Referring to the review of Motley's "Dutch Republic," "Sigma" suggests, as a subject for discussion, the impartiality or otherwise of the author. The review itself provokes a wider question: Are there "cases where impartiality is both impossible and undesirable"? The reviewer indicates clearly that Motley, being "on the side of the angels," is praiseworthy rather than otherwise, for that "he is not fair to Charles V. He does not do justice to Balthasar Gerard." Apart from ethics, why thus weaken an overwhelming case? Surely the most effective devil's advocate is he who does not give that personage his due.—I am, sir, etc.,
J. W. EMPTY.

WHY GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS ARE UNPOPULAR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—An article on the Nationalisation of Education in your issue of February 7th ends with these words: "Schools will only cease to be run on class lines when a truly democratic spirit will have taken the place of the snobbism and flunkeyism which is so characteristic of the middle classes of Great Britain."

Now, sir, these words are not written by an irresponsible correspondent, but occur in an article in your paper, and it does not seem worthy of EVERYMAN to fall into the trick—too common among a certain sort of politician—of imputing vile motives to all who do not agree with the views expressed. Middle-class people dislike Government schools for their children, in spite of the money which is lavished upon them, and prefer to send their children to less efficiently equipped private institutions, at great personal sacrifice, because they believe sincerely that it will be better for their children.

Parents know that the instruction which can be given in great classes of sixty or eighty is valueless. Parents realise the grave exposure to infectious diseases and also to contamination with dirty children that attendance at a Government school exposes their children to of necessity. Parents also dread—rightly or wrongly—moral contamination for their children in these schools, where they must perforce associate with the children of the roughest and most degraded of the community. This feeling may perhaps be called "caste," but not, I think, "snobbism."

Finally, some parents feel that at a private institution they still retain control of their children; while once the children are swallowed up in a Government school they cannot be taken away or their curriculum altered: they become mere pawns and "grant-earners" in the hands of an Education Committee.

Also there are parents who are religious people, who wish their children educated in their own religion, which may not be the official thing known as "undenominationalism," and who do not wish their children, especially as they get older, to be imbued with the Socialistic views which seem to exude from the larger number of Government schoolmasters.

The same article also states that the Government schoolmaster is held as an inferior being beside the private schoolmaster. If this is true, it is not from "snobbism," but because the Government man has parted with his birthright as a teacher for a mess (a very great mess) of Board of Education pottage. He is to teach impossible things under impossible conditions, and his efforts end in being "bright" and trying to enforce some sort of "discipline."

These are the reasons why Government schools are unpopular, and in these directions reform must be sought if they are to be made popular.—I am, sir, etc.,
E. C. FREEMAN.

MR. WELLS AND THE LABOUR REVOLT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In his article on the "Labour Revolt" Mr. Wells looks forward to a time "when the work of a few years will purchase the independence of the rest of a lifetime."

It is perhaps natural for a man like Mr. Wells, whose life has been spent in the drudgery of reading, talking, and thinking, and in racking his brains to put into saleable print the ideas so acquired, to think of leisure as the millennium.

But leisure and idleness are not happiness. The secret of happiness and contentment is continual occupation in congenial work. I look forward to the time when every man will enjoy his work and will be miserable when he is not employed.—I am, sir, etc.,
Carlisle.

G. D. L.

POPULAR BOOKS

English and Foreign, both
New and Secondhand, in
All Classes of Literature

—OFFERED AT—

GREAT REDUCTIONS

from the Published Prices.

CARRIAGE PAID WITHIN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

CATALOGUE of 10,000 Book Bargains, and List of Novels at Reduced Prices, Post Free on receipt of postcard mentioning "Everyman."

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

THE LARGEST BOOKSHOP in the WORLD.

Reduce your Weight without Drugs or Starvation

By taking KALARI BISCUITS or CASOID BREAD at all meals instead of bread and toast. They are palatable and nutritious. Being free from drugs they are harmless, though effective. Write for Free Sample and Booklet on "The Toast Fallacy" to the only Manufacturers:

CALLARD & CO.,

FOOD SPECIALISTS,

104, REGENT ST. (The Quadrant),
LONDON, ENGLAND.

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Wells's article on the "Labour Revolt," I believe there is nothing incompatible in the high ideal of Socialism which that writer holds with that lofty conception of individualism which is only to be found in the opportunity to every man to fulfil himself. Such danger as is to be apprehended from the present trend of the Labour movement will disappear with the wider recognition that in unselfishness is to be found the salvation of society. When the strong stand together, shoulder to shoulder, to protect the weak, and each man's interests are those of his fellow-man, then shall we have the self-governing State and the dream of real Socialism be fulfilled.—I am, sir, etc.,

Liscard, Cheshire.

A. C. TENNANT.

IN DEFENCE OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—While agreeing in the main with the views expressed in your article on "The Nationalisation of Education," I should like to say a word on behalf of that much maligned body, the Board of Education. I think most assistant masters in secondary schools will agree with me that in the last few years, under Board of Education supervision and inspection, the grammar schools of the country have improved almost out of recognition. I have never known inspectors to interfere with a teacher's freedom, and for myself I must say that I have never received anything from them but sympathy and encouragement. Again, the Board of Education's circulars convey not definite instruction, but only hints and suggestions, and they are admittedly quite abreast of current educational thought.

What's wrong with secondary education is national apathy. The Government grant for this purpose is the pittance of some £800,000 a year—about half the price of a Dreadnought. And there is no popular outcry for a two-power standard in education!—I am, sir, etc.,

R. C. W.

LAMB AND BURNS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Charles Lamb's admiration for Burns is well known to students of the former. In a letter to Coleridge, dated December 10th, 1791, Lamb writes: "Burns was the god of my idolatry as Bowles of yours. I am jealous of your fraternising with Bowles when I think you relish him more than Burns or my old favourite Cowper."

The writer of the article on Burns referred to by Mr. H. M. Charteris Macpherson is, however, at fault in his statement that "Lamb would kiss his copy of Burns as he put it back on the shelf." It was Chapman's Homer which was so treated, and the incident is related by Leigh Hunt, who "thought how natural it was in C. L. to give a kiss to an old folio, as I once saw him do to Chapman's Homer." Mr. Lucas refers to it in his two-volume edition of the "Life of Charles Lamb" (vol. ii, p. 312). I expect Mr. Macpherson must have looked up the index of the one-volume edition of the work, which does not contain the four appendixes of the former, in one of which the transcript is printed from Leigh Hunt's article, "My Books," in the first number of the Literary Examiner (July 5th, 1823).—I am, sir, etc.,

S. BUTTERWORTH, MAJOR.
(Late R.A.M.C.).

Carlisle.

THE DAY'S BURDEN*

PROFESSOR KETTLE says of himself that "originality is a toy that no goddess left in my cradle." That may be so; but his presentation of old problems in "The Day's Burden" is so fresh and so vital, so entirely his own, that we are inclined to doubt the author's view of the case. The book is a collection of essays on subjects as varying as "Anatole France," "Reason in Rhyme," "Young Egypt," and "On Misunderstanding Hamlet." Throughout the book a humour wholly delightful and wholly satisfying makes the reader pause and re-read the passage.

It is in the chapter headed "The Crossing of the Irish Sea" that we find the following:—

"Ireland is a small but insuppressible island, half an hour nearer the sunset than Great Britain. From Great Britain it is separated by the Irish Sea, the Act of Union, and the perorations of the Tory party." Or, again: "Ireland is admitted to be unprogressive, as witness, when it is half-past twelve in London, it is only five minutes past twelve in Dublin."

Some kindly goddess left in Professor Kettle's cradle the supreme gift of humour, and with it the sister gift of insight. Whether he is speaking of the Philosophy of Politics, or of the Socialism of Otto Effertz, or of the writings of Francis Thompson, he is always at the heart of his subject. He says of "Health and Holiness" that "it shows us the supreme reasonableness, the gross common-sense of mysticism." There is food for thought in the phrase. He calls Dicey's "Law of the Constitution" "a masterpiece of romance," and somehow the appellation sticks. In describing the orthodox view of Hamlet he says, "The removal of an uncle without due process of law, and on the unsupported statement of an unsubornable ghost, the widowing of a mother, and her casting off as unspeakably vile, are treated as enterprises about which a man has no right to hesitate or even to feel unhappy." Again we are arrested, and fumble in our minds for the usual platitudes about Hamlet, only to find them strangely unsatisfying. But get the book and judge it on its own merits.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, by Hilda Skae (5s.), has been added to Messrs. T. N. Foulis' delightful series, Romantic Lives. On the whole, however, we feel the publication of a Life of Mary Queen of Scots in such a series is a mistake. The facts of her career, her childhood in France, her alliance with the Dauphin, her rule in Scotland, and, finally, her captivity under Elizabeth, are too well known to require repetition, and within the limits of Messrs. Foulis' series there is room for little else. The great and standard Life of Mary has still to be written, and, till it appears, we are inclined to cry "Enough!" to the somewhat unconvincing monographs to be found on every bookstall.

NERVATION OF PLANTS, by Francis George Heath (Williams, 3s. 6d. net), fills a gap in botanical literature. It is a little curious that a subject of such deep and absorbing interest to all nature lovers should not ere now have received full and adequate treatment. It is true, as Mr. Heath points out, that something about the nervation of plants is to be found in most botanical works, "but its discussion is seldom, if ever, dis-

(Continued on page 606.)

* "The Day's Burden." By Prof. Kettle. (Maunsel.)

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

To be completed in 12 Volumes, issued at the rate of one a month.

VOLUME 2 READY ON MONDAY, FEB. 24th.

THE PUBLISHERS are glad to state that the demand for Volume 1 has been greater than they had anticipated. Even now, on the eve of the publication of Volume 2, the first Volume is still creating an ever widening and increasing circulation.

PRESS OPINIONS.

DAILY NEWS.—"No stately folio opens more uncompromisingly flat, the thin page making no unseemly attempt at independence; and although 600 such pages lie within a breadth of a bare three-quarters of an inch, the indispensable opacity is much more perfectly preserved than in some much more grandiose works which have sought to compress the full quart of learning into the pint pot of portability."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"It is not easy to know who should be congratulated most; the editor, Mr. Andrew Boyle, on so admirable an achievement, the publishers on so courageous an undertaking, or the public on the prospect of being able to purchase for twelve monthly shillings a complete encyclopædia of knowledge."

MANCHESTER COURIER.—"There can be little doubt that countless readers, hitherto prevented only by considerations of cost from acquiring what has become an indispensable part of every household, will be quick to take advantage of this golden opportunity of possessing an encyclopædia which not only answers all their everyday needs, but also makes a handsome addition to any library."

DUNDEE ADVERTISER.—"This volume is a triumph of practical bookmaking. The paper is of excellent quality, and in 628 pages we have a million words set in clear, broad type . . . The volume opens perfectly flat, and, in short, is the most marvellous shilling book of reference on the market."

WORLD.—" . . . The result is eminently satisfactory, and great popularity may be anticipated for one of the handiest and most correct little reference books ever published."

CLOTH
1/- NET
PER VOL.

Please send for Special Prospectus.

LEATHER
2/- NET
PER VOL.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.; 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes
of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolcap size, 15/- complete.
Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free.

A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

NEW MUSIC. "Euterpe Waltz." Pretty and brilliant. A beautiful melody, enriched by sparkling ornamentation. Price 1s. 6d., post free. Postal order or English penny stamps to Llewellyn Owen, Arcade Chambers, Ashburton, New Zealand.

SHORTHAND.—ROOSEVELT, for his hurricane Presidential campaign, specially selected Jack McGrath, a Sloan-Duployan writer, as the best stenographer he could find in the States. Learn Sloan-Duployan, the rapidly spreading British system, which saves a year's study. Illustrated handbook with specimen lesson, free.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

AUTHORS wanted, known and unknown, to communicate. Every description of literary work required. No fees whatever.—Write for particulars, in first instance, to "Publishers," 2238, Sell's Advertising Offices, Fleet Street, London, E.C. Special attention to new writers.

TYPEWRITING of all kinds undertaken by Miss Lily Somers. Work guaranteed to be efficiently executed and promptly returned. Moderate charges.—Please apply 323a, Upland Road, E. Dulwich.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Short-hand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

ART HOW TO MAKE MONEY IF YOU CAN SKETCH.
A Free Booklet sent to all enclosing stamped envelope.
A. SEYMOUR, Secretary, DEPT. 21, 114, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES. New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 83 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

IT PAYS TO STUDY YOUR APPEARANCE

Your appearance is enormously improved by wearing my Superior and Handsome Rimless Glasses.

SPECIAL OFFER:—Upon receipt of 10/6 and your usual glasses (or prescription) I will send you the BEST RIMLESS GLASSES (finest gold-filled mount) made. (Guaranteed to be sold elsewhere at 25/-) This low price is possible through sole agency. Superior Glasses of every variety at half usual prices. Money returned if not satisfied.

Mr. BEST, B.Sc. (Lond.),
236, BATTERSEA PARK RD., LONDON, S.W.

entangled from the usual too commonly puzzling, if not incomprehensible, mass of scientific terminology." Mr. Heath's book does not pretend to be an exhaustive treatise, but it aims at being a useful introductory manual of a most fascinating study. Whilst written more from the nature than from the scientific standpoint, it should interest a wide circle of readers, including those who have received a strictly scientific training. The book is copiously illustrated, and there is an excellent index.

A recently published book, which we have read with great interest, is Mr. Gouldsbury's LIFE IN THE INDIAN POLICE (Chapman and Hall). The title is perhaps slightly misleading, for we hear more of tigers than of "dacoits," more of tracking elephants than of tracking crime. But the book is so full of thrilling adventures, and so delightfully told, that we cannot quibble at a title. The author has felt the call of the wild, the joy that nature only gives to those who meet her face to face, and in his latest publication he brings vividly before the reader's mind the fascination of the jungle, the delight of the chase, and the sadness of encroaching civilisation.

So many admirable expositions of the "Pilgrim's Progress" exist that he who essays the task of adding to their number would do well to make perfectly sure that he has something fresh to say, and that he is able to say it impressively. In THE ROAD: A STUDY OF JOHN BUNYAN'S "PILGRIM'S PROGRESS," by John Kelman (Vols. I. and II., Oliphant, 3s. 6d. net each), both those claims are established. The author is one of the foremost of the younger generation of Scottish preachers whose influence rests largely on his clear, vigorous, and original thought. The series of studies contained in this work, we learn, is based on notes given to Bible classes and subsequently printed in shorter form in a theological magazine. The volumes now before us are intended as a commentary or textbook upon the "Pilgrim's Progress," to be read point by point along with the original. They are composed of notes derived from existing commentaries, and "references to cognate thoughts and passages in other literature," the whole being woven into a continuous narrative, in which Dr. Kelman's personal standpoint finds full and free expression. Deep spiritual insight, sound judgment, and epigrammatic terseness are the distinctive features of these studies, and we promise those who turn to them for religious guidance a feast of good things. This notable addition to the literature dealing with Bunyan's immortal allegory is admirably illustrated from photographs taken by the author while sojourning in the Bunyan country. We may add that a third and concluding volume, now in course of preparation, will consist of essays on various biographical and literary subjects connected with the author of "The Pilgrim's Progress" and his work.

A stirring novel, dealing with the fortunes of a German soldier who betakes himself to England and fights on the Parliamentary side in the Civil War, is to be found in THE FIGHTING BLADE, by Beulah Marie Dix (Henry Holt, 6s.). The hero's fortunes in love are told with a vigour and a human interest far removed from the archaic methods of many historical novelists. "The Fighting Blade" would lend itself admirably to dramatisation. We are glad to notice that no English publisher is responsible for the printing of the book. The misprints that occur on every page are extraordinarily irritating, and might have ruined a less attractive book.

There is nothing convincingly "Yorkshire" about THE ROSE OF NIDDERDALE (Chorley and Pickersgill, Leeds, 1s.). The stories might equally well have been placed in the rural parts of Middlesex. The characterisation is not distinctive, nor has the dialogue a touch of that raciness which we associate with the West Riding. For the rest, the tales are simple, and, to a certain type of reader, not unpleasing. Mr. Firth Crossley has given us a description of the valley of Nidderdale that is in parts effective, though somewhat stereotyped.

For those who wish a readable novel, we can heartily recommend THE SPORTING INSTINCT, by Martin Swayne (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). The story deals with a woman who, through sheer force of will, changes herself from a social failure ("I used to pray before I went out to a dinner party, Jack," she says) into a brilliant success. "A woman can think herself into another character. . . . I created a character, and without character one is as useless as a railway without rails." Just when the heroine is at the height of her self-won distinction, when she has altered the world's view of herself, and her own view of the world, her husband loses his money through speculation, and thereon hangs the tale.

A PRINCE OF ROMANCE (Grant Richards, 6s.) goes with a swing from start to finish. The action takes place in a small Scottish village a hundred years ago, and the plot is ingenious and well carried out. A Jacobite spirit still lingered in the place, carefully nurtured by James Dagleish, the schoolmaster. The Old Pretender had paid a visit at the house where the schoolmaster lived, and the glory of the legend still glowed in the Dominie. To this hot-bed of Jacobite tradition there comes a young man, cast up on the shore from a wreck, the living image of the Pretender's portrait that hung in the schoolmaster's study. The old prophecy seemed to have come true:

"Charlie will come again some day
Over the sea to Skye," and when, on recovering consciousness, he murmurs that his name is Charles Edward, conviction crashes home that he must be in very deed a lineal descendant of the Stuarts. Who and what he is it would not be fair to say. The tale is cleverly told, with a genuine sense of adventure; Margaret, the girl that "Charlie" loves, is well sketched, and the schoolmaster is a clever study. Mr. Stephen Chalmers is to be congratulated on a stirring and picturesque story.

Mr. Robert W. Service has been called the Kipling of Canada. His poems deal with the scenes and the problems confronting the pioneer settler in a new country. His verses, rugged in parts, succeed at times in conveying the spirit of "Our Lady of the Snows." Characterised by a certain vigour and power, they present to us difficulties and dangers encountered by the settler, and place on record the invincible determination by which these perils are overcome. RHYMES OF A ROLLING STONE (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.) are well worth reading.

The marvellous adventures of the soul of a company promoter after the death of the notorious Alvo Whetstone is set forth in terrifying and somewhat humorous fashion in POSSESSED (William Rider and Son, 2s. net). The soul, for reasons best known to itself, selects the meagre body of Charles Mordant for its next tenement. "He was a pale, thin, red-haired

GUNN SECTIONAL BOOKCASE

In a "Gunn" your books are cared for as such valued friends should be. It matters not the shape of room, its height or size, the sections of the "Gunn" can be arranged just as you wish, and all the time, at whatever stage of growth, the "Gunn" looks solid, uniform, complete.

BEST IN APPEARANCE AND IN USE.

Each "Gunn" Section is an example of perfect workmanship. There are no visible staples or bars, yet the sections fit together so accurately that a "Gunn" Bookcase at any stage of growth is to all intent and purpose a solid piece of furniture.

REAL PROTECTION. REAL CONVENIENCE.

The "Gunn" Glass doors slide back on invisible roller bearings above the books, but can be unhooked for cleaning by a single simple movement. "Gunn" Sections are close-fitting and dust-resisting, and may be obtained in a range of standardized sizes. There are sections partitionable for very small books, also drawer and desk sections.

Book Section Fig. 1.
A Popular Stack, in Plain Oak.

S. Top Section	£0 8 6
O. 9½-inch Book Section,	13/6	two	1 7 0
P. 11½-inch Book Section	0 14 6
Q. 13½-inch Reducing Book Section	0 19 6
R. 13½-inch Deep Book Section	0 18 6
W. Deep Base	0 9 0
Total	...	£4 17 0

- The glass doors of the "Gunn" are easily unhooked for cleaning.
- All "Gunn" materials used are of the finest possible quality.
- The lasting wear of the "Gunn" Bookcase is guaranteed.

This illustrates one of the "Gunn" styles in Figured Oak or Birch.

D. Top Section	£0 12 0
A. 9½-in. Book Section	0 18 0
B. 11½-in. Book Section	0 18 0
C. 13½-in. Book Section	1 0 0
F. Base Section	0 10 6
Total	...	£3 16 6

"GUNN" BOOK FREE ON APPLICATION.

Please send me, without cost or obligation of any kind, your illustrated Booklet (No. 10) of the "Gunn" Sectional Bookcase.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Post this coupon to-day to W. ANGUS & CO., LTD., 52, Paul St., Finsbury, London.

youth, with weak, formless lips and receding chin. Dominated by this masterful spirit, the office boy, in magical fashion, sweeps every obstacle from his path, and marches on to the position vacated by the deceased company promoter—that of chairman of the Fortunatus Assurance Company. In a truly immense scene the soul is wrested from the body of Charles Mordant. "The servant left the room, but scarcely was the door closed when it was flung open and a loud voice roared, 'Beasts of Belial, I command you, come out of him!'" The Beasts of Belial finally obey, and the body of Mordant, though rent and racked, is conserved in its entirety. The spirit of the deceased company promoter departs to realms unknown, and everybody concerned in Mr. Firth Scott's story settles down into a comfortable routine.

• • •

Messrs. Frowde have issued the poems of James Russell Lowell at the moderate price of 2s. They are to be congratulated on this edition, including, as it does, the Biglow Papers. Most inimitable of satires, we cannot resist quoting the first verse of what Mr. Robinson thinks:—

Guvener B. is a sensible man;
He stays to his home an' looks arter his folks;
He draws his furrer ez straight ez he can,
An' into nobody's tater-patch pokes;
But John P.
Robinson he

Sez he wunt vote fer Guvener B.

And the final stanza:—

Wal, it's a marcy we've got folks to tell us
The rights and the wrongs o' these matters, I vow.
God sends country lawyers, an' other wise fellers
To start the world's team wen it gits in a slough;
Fer John P.
Robinson he

Sez the world'll go right, ef he hollers out Gee!

• • •

THE ROAD TO FREEDOM, by Josiah and Ethel Wedgwood, is a thoughtful and valuable contribution to the question of social reformation. Pre-eminently an attack upon the evils of the land monopoly, it demonstrates how closely it is connected with the evil problems of modern civilisation. The authors contend that the structure of present-day society is founded on slave labour, and that this rests on the individual ownership of land; they reason that in trying to mitigate the crying evils of this slavery, reformers are making for a slave state. The book aims at convincing students of social economics that though a new and free society might be quite unlike the one we are accustomed to, it would inevitably be a better one. The necessary condition for a perfectly free society, according to the authors, is free land. The case for the single tax is admirably stated, with a wealth of detail and lucidity of argument incomparable in its force and logic. Mr. Wedgwood, member for Newcastle-under-Lyme, is remarkable for his championship of the cause of the workers, and is well qualified to speak on all matters connected with the betterment of their condition. We commend this book (C. W. Daniel, 1s.) to all those concerned in the complex problem of the land monopoly.

• • •

Messrs. Jarrold have issued a second edition of that illuminative book, SUN YAT SEN AND THE AWAKENING OF CHINA (6s. net). Interest is attached to this edition by reason of the special preface by Dr. James Cantlie, who, with Mr. C. Sheridan Jones, is joint author of the book. Dr. Cantlie says: "The prophesies of disaster, which amounted, and still amount in some quarters, to almost a fetish, have proved false; nothing the would-be 'authorities' can say or do will serve to put back the clock in China." Dr. Cantlie points out that Sun is still the bête-noir to many who knew China in the old days, who regard him as an idealist, and therefore to be considered as a man of no consequence; but with eloquence and insistence shows us that by the populace in China, Sun is regarded as a deliverer. "His head is impressed on the coinage of the country and on the commemoration stamps of the foundation of the Republic." Sun pays an eloquent tribute to the loyalty and devotion of his English friends, first and foremost among whom is the writer of the preface. The coinage of the Republic of China, showing the embossed head of Sun Yat Sen, bears on the reverse the inscription in English—the first language in which he heard the accents of liberty. The book, which has achieved a marked success, contains an eloquent plea for the Republic by the great Powers. Mr. Sheridan Jones's resumé of the causes that led to the upheaval of the Manchu Dynasty is beyond all praise. Written in incisive, trenchant English, he carries conviction in every phrase. Dr. Cantlie's reminiscences of Sun, the great reformer, and his accounts of the hairbreadth escapes suffered by that ardent and devoted spirit make extraordinary good reading, while the chapters devoted to the future of China deserve the attention of all concerned with the problem of the East. Mr. Sheridan Jones shows that, the Manchu despotism once abolished, there are men ready "for all the positions of trust and danger on whose fitness the State must depend." China, when weak and decadent, accepted abuses only under pressure. "China, conscious of her own immense reserves of strength, is not in the least likely to suffer them a day longer than she can help." Now that the way is open for the industrial development of the great empire of the East there is no limit to the influence China will exert in the destiny of the proletarian population. "Think of the influence, not only upon the Chinese, but the whole world, when railways not only carry the corn of Hunan to the famine sufferers in Shantung, but when they bring coal, iron, and other products of Chinese soil and industry within reach of steamship lines running to Europe and America."

With this forceful and convincing picture the book closes, and to those who read "Sun Yat Sen" with the interest and attention it commands the prophecy will carry conviction.

• • •

THE GATE OF TO-MORROW (Cassell and Co. 6s.) is a powerful story, written with a simplicity of style that is effective and at times dramatic. The story opens in an Australian mining camp, and Mr. Norman McKeown paints for us the picture in vivid fashion. "It is noonday, and on the plains, where the sun blazes in a brazen sky, even the trees, with listless leaves, appear to sleep, and every moving thing that breathes has gone to rest. In the hills a restless iguana may be still abroad, or curreequinquin, suddenly startled, may scold noisily, jumping with ruffled plumes from branch to branch; but, for the most part, even here is found the hush of deep repose." It may be as well to inform the reader that curreequinquin is the native name for the soldier-bird. "In the hill, on the farther side of the creek, some two hundred yards from the tents, is an ugly wedge of raw new earth, pierced in three separate places. Below, the stream has been dammed to form a wide pool, and from the three tunnels . . . there comes very faintly the sound of tapping." To the mining camp, formed

(Continued on page 610.)

THE CURE OF CANCER

The only Hope the Orthodox Medical Practitioner has for the cure of Cancer is the manipulation of the cruel knife. Your Doctor cannot deny this. The Doctors had hope that X Rays and Radium would work wonders, but these have absolutely failed. The first will give the disease they hoped to cure, while the latter, with the exception of affecting very mild surface cases, is simply worthless.

After years of research, involving the torture of myriads of animals, and years of experimental practice upon a vast army, consisting of Millions of Sufferers from this Awful Disease, who, with their relatives, involving millions more, have lived under the dread of the descent of the horrid knife, we now stand upon the threshold of the future with no established remedy upon which to rest.

It is terrible to think about, but it must be faced and something must be done, and that right quickly, to save mankind from this Overwhelming Scourge. Thirty thousand people, in England and Wales alone, die every year of Cancer, and over 40 years of age one in twelve may expect to be smitten with it. The Night is very dark indeed, but it may be that darkness which ushers in the radiant dawn, for even now two Eminent Doctors, namely—Dr. Robert Bell, the Successful Plaintiff in the Famous Libel Case, and Dr. Forbes Ross, are inspiring hope that they have discovered the cause of this dire disease, and that soon we shall know how to deal with it and destroy it.

These men, as far as we can ascertain in no way associated, have arrived, through independent study and research, to very much the same conclusion—that the chief cause of Cancer is owing to errors in diet.

Dr. Forbes Ross, in his recently published book, entitled: "Cancer, The Problem of its Genesis and Treatment," maintains and produces evidence that appears to be indisputable, that the cause at the root of the whole matter is owing to a DEFICIENCY OF POTASSIUM in the system. Potassium being one of the most important Salts of which our bodies are composed. This Doctor, however, while he laments the madness of people eating Vegetables, &c., from which the Salts have been extracted by boiling or otherwise, Violates the Laws of Nature by going direct to the Mineral Kingdom to obtain the Potassium which he regards so valuable. God never intended that we should derive benefit thus, for He has ordained that nature shall chemically prepare these Salts in her Wondrous Laboratory, so that they shall be easily digested and assimilated by Mankind. Besides this, in Vegetables, &c., one Salt is so harmonized with other Salts, that it is imperative that we should partake of them thus, or else a Violation of the Laws of Nature in this respect may involve a terrible penalty, for what God has joined together, man cannot with impunity rend asunder.

Bear in mind that Vegetables and other articles of diet are rich in Valuable Organic Salts, more especially the Vegetables. These Salts, consisting of Potassium, Sodium, Calcium, Magnesium, Iron, Phosphorus, Sulphur, Silicon and Chlorine, are wondrously blended together, so that they shall ensure a perfect balance, and supply fresh Life and Energy to Body, Blood and Brain.

Men and Women must be under some Diabolical Delusion when they wilfully persist in wickedly washing out and wasting these precious elements of the food we eat. When they realize that it is the cause of the wholesale slaying of thousands and that their turn may come next, we sincerely hope that it will check them in this Mad Career of Monstrous Folly.

From the Conclusions arrived at by the above Doctors and others, also from our own observations, experiments and experience, we are convinced that if Men and Women will eat such foods that are rich in these valuable Salts, and will be determined that henceforth they will cook all Vegetables so that these Salts shall be fully conserved, then, and not till then this dread disease, like Small-pox and Cholera, will vanish like some Foul Fiend into the Dim Shadows of the Past.

The Question will arise, but how are we to cook so that all these Life-giving Salts shall be fully conserved? To such a question, upon enquiry, there can only be one satisfactory answer, and that will be—you must cook in the Simple Scientific Cooker, called

WELBANK'S BOILERETTE

VISIT OUR LONDON DEPÔT:
105, NEWGATE ST., E.C.

THIS WONDER-WORKING INVENTION

Gets intensely hot (above 212 deg.), yet never burns the food. As it is self-acting it requires no attention and can be left for hours to "look after itself."

"THE IDEAL COOKER"—Hospital.

Perfect for Porridge, Milk Foods, Soups, Stews, Jellies, Custards, Sauces, Jams and Marmalade Making, Potted Meats, Meat Extracts. A Speciality for Infants', Invalid and Vegetarian Cookery.

COOKS MEAT, POULTRY AND VEGETABLES IN OWN JUICES

by which means all the Valuable Salts, Tonics, Natural Aperients, and life-giving properties of Meat and Vegetables, which are usually washed away, are fully conserved.

VEGETABLES COOKED IN THEIR NATURAL MOISTURE are simply delicious and can be relied upon to put fresh life and energy into body, blood, and brain.

"CONVERTS THE OLD INTO YOUNG."

The Boilerette will make Tough Meat dainty, delicious and digestible, and Old and Cheap Fowls more tender and delicious than Young and Expensive Chickens cooked in the ordinary way.

All sizes from 1½ pints up to 12 gallons. Full particulars post free.

E. A. WELBANK, Duplex Works, near BANBURY.

LONDON DEPOT: 105, NEWGATE STREET, E.C.

Tel.: 5796 City.

by four comrades, there comes a woman. She is discovered by Hoppy lying unconscious by the wayside. So wizened is she, so dried-up from exposure to the sun, that she is taken for an old man. Care and nursing restore her to womanly charm; and the trouble begins. Peter, the cleverest and best-looking of the four miners, falls desperately in love with her, and she tells him her story. She was decoyed from her father's home by a man named Lee, who induced her to come to Australia on a promise of marriage. That marriage never took place, and finally, outraged by the suggestion that she should discharge a debt of Lee's by transferring herself and her affection to his creditor, she shoots him, wounding him in the arm. Close on the story Lee himself arrives at the camp, and Peter announces his intention of killing him. The dramatic dénouement of the story lies in the ultimate confession of Margot. She makes the astonishing statement that her story is a lie, that from the first she has led a loose life, and that Lee is but one of many others. The situation is handled with consummate skill, and Margot convinces one of her reality. The men are not so well portrayed. They are, in fact, with the exception of Peter, almost too good and too forgiving. The book is remarkable for its fearlessness and the cleanness with which the theme is handled. Mr. McKeown has achieved a triumph in his remarkable book.

Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe has written many romances. For the most part his stories amble along the high road of commonplace, undistinguished by characterisation or style. In A MAN OF THE MOORS (T. Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.) he has made a notable departure, and in place of the easy stream of platitudes, conventional hero and the amiable heroine, he has drawn a strong man and a woman of flesh and blood, quick to feel and to endure. Against the background of the moors, potent with the suggestion of tragedy, a curious fatalism that leaves its mark upon the people of the country, the author shows us the workings of a drama, complete and inevitable as a Greek play. Mrs. Lomax, the Lady Bountiful of Marshcoates, is inimitably portrayed. Over sixty years of age and infirm of body, she rules the village by sheer force of character. Large hearted and benevolent, she possesses the saving grace of humour, and keeps Joe Strangeways, the drunkard of the parish, in order with the lash of her tongue. Kate Strangeways, the handsome wife of Joe, is a great favourite with the old lady, who takes an ardent interest in her protégée. Throughout the countryside Mrs. Lomax is regarded with superstitious awe. All the legends of the moorland centre round her frail, slight figure, and popular report invests her with almost supernatural powers. How her son, Griff, comes home from London, where he has been studying art and, incidentally, prosecuting a flirtation with a married woman, is told forcefully and with realistic touches. Hungry for the moors, he falls readily under the spell of the vast expanse of heather-covered hills and dales. "And all the while the woman across the moor grew dearer to him; she was part and parcel of the heath he loved, the sunsets that fired him to endeavour, the wind that made him drunker than wine could ever do." And the woman—one foretells the tragic note is Kate Strangeways. The tragedy sweeps on in its appointed course, but what befalls Griff and the woman he so passionately loves the reader must learn from the pages of Mr. Sutcliffe's vividly arresting book, one of the most dramatic and powerful narratives we have read for some considerable time.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Ashmead-Bartlett, E. "With the Turks in Thrace." (Heinemann, 10s.)
- Anderson. Later Poems of Alex. Anderson ("Surfaceman"). Edited by Alexander Brown. (Fraser, Asher and Co., 10s.)
- Berger, Francesco. "Reminiscences, Impressions, and Anecdotes." (Sampson, Low, 10s. 6d.)
- Bunston, Anna (Mrs. de Bary). "Songs of God and Man." (Herbert and Daniel, 3s. 6d.)
- Bailey, John. "Dr. Johnson and his Circle." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
- Bryce, James. "South America." (Macmillan, 8s. 6d.)
- Balfour, Lady Frances. "Life and Letters of Rev. James MacGregor." (Hodder and Stoughton, 12s.)
- Crossley, Firth. "The Rose of Nidderdale." (The Electric Press, Leeds, 1s.)
- Crotch, W. W. "Charles Dickens, Social Reformer." (Chapman and Hall, 7s. 6d.)
- Chalmers, Stephen. "A Prince of Romance." (Grant Richards, 6s.)
- Clark, W. F. "Shetland Nights." (Oliver and Boyd, 2s.)
- Cripps, A. S. "Pilgrimage of Grace." (Blackwell.)
- "Concerning Religious Education." (Headley, 1s.)
- Chesterton, G. K. "The Victorian Age in Literature." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
- Carpenter, Prof. J. Estlin. "Comparative Religion." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
- Cullum, Ridgwell. "The Golden Woman." (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)
- Cornford, Frances. "Death and the Princess: A Morality." (Bowes and Bowes, 2s.)
- Dearmer, Percy. "The Dragon of Wessex." (Mowbray, 3s. 6d.)
- Daniel, Charles. "Instead of Socialism." (Daniel, 1s.)
- Fletcher, R. A. "Steamships and their Story." (Sidgwick and Jackson, 16s.)
- Field, Mildred F. "Method and Religious Education." (Headley, 1s.)
- France, Anatole. "My Friend's Book." (Lane.)
- Graham, R. B. Cunningham. "Faith." (Duckworth, 2s. 6d.)
- George, W. L. "Israel Palisch." (Constable.)
- Garcia-Calderon, F. "Latin America." (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d.)
- Gordon, Rev. the Hon. Arthur. "The Life of Archibald Hamilton Charteris." (Hodder and Stoughton, 10s. 6d.)
- Gaskell, Mrs. "Lizzie Leigh, the Grey Woman, and Other Stories." (Oxford University Press, 1s.)
- Haggard, H. Rider. "Child of Storm." (Cassell, 6s.)
- Harrison, Chas., M.A. "Legal Levities and Brevities." (Hueffer, 3s. 6d.)
- Hooper, W. G. "The Universe of Ether and Spirit." (Theosophical Publishing Society.)
- Hannay, David. "The Navy and Sea Power." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
- Hauptmann, Gerhardt. "The Fool in Christ." (Methuen, 6s.)
- Hudson, W. H. "A Crystal Age." (Duckworth, 2s. 6d.)
- Johnston, Sir Harry. "Common Sense in Foreign Policy." (Smith, Elder.)
- Kropotkin, P. "Modern Science and Anarchism." (Freedom Press, 1s. 6d.)
- Legouis, Emile. "Geoffrey Chaucer." (Dent, 5s.)
- McKeown, Norman. "The Gate of To-morrow." (Cassell, 6s.)
- Mannis, J. Bernard. "Mines and their Story." (Sidgwick and Jackson, 16s.)
- Macgill, Patrick. "Songs of the Dead End." (The Year-Book Press, 3s. 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

1913 NEW LITERATURE 1913

CHAUCER. By EMILE LEGOUIS.
Translated by L. LAILAVOIX.
Large crown 8vo, 5/- net.

Bookman.—"Learned and full, yet lucid and well proportioned, it leaves us with a most satisfactory impression of thoroughness and balance; the writer's touch is as light as it is sure, and precision of statement is combined with felicity of expression."

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS.

By E. G. GARDNER, M.A.
Demy 8vo, 7/6 net.

Daily News.—"A deep and sympathetic student both of Dante and the mediæval mystics, he brings to this enquiry the rare combination of qualities that it demands, vision and scholarship, and that extreme delicacy of touch which makes possible an orderly marshalling and presentation of almost intangible things, whilst avoiding the two great dangers of such an enterprise."

WINDS OF DOCTRINE.

STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY OPINION.
By PROF. G. SANTAYANA.
Small demy 8vo, 6/- net.

The Author's general view is that the convictions and ideals of Christendom are in a state of disintegration and anarchy, in which the beginnings of a theoretical reconstruction are barely perceptible, although in practice and in honest feeling new principles are already largely dominant.

DANTE AND AQUINAS.

By REV. P. H. WICKSTEED.
Crown 8vo, 6/- net.

The book aims at giving the student a connected idea of the general Theological and Philosophical background of the "Comedy," and therefore a keen appreciation of those distinctive features in which Dante's own personality more especially reveals itself.

SONGS AND BALLADS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Compiled by E. A. HELPS. Crown 8vo, 4/6 net.

This anthology brings together poetry from Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and other parts of the Empire.

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A.

Large crown 8vo, 5s. net each volume.

A series designed to trace the genesis and evolution of the various departments of English literature and English thought. A second aim that has been kept in view in designing the series is to afford those who might wish to devote themselves to one special type or form of composition the materials for accomplishing their desire.

NEW VOLUMES.

ENGLISH LYRIC POETRY.

By ERNEST RHYS, M.A.

THE ENGLISH NOVEL.

By PROF. GEORGE SAINTSBURY, LL.D.,
University of Edinburgh.

PREVIOUSLY ISSUED.

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHY.

By Professor JAMES SETH, M.A.

ENGLISH EPIC AND HEROIC POETRY.

By Professor W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A., University, Glasgow.

A Prospectus relating to any of the above books will be sent immediately upon receipt of application.

The MEDIÆVAL TOWN SERIES.

Each town is treated by one who not only is conversant with its historical associations and topographical interests, but whose inner consciousness has conceived the true spirit of the place. Throughout the pages of the book one realises that the author's successful aim has been, not merely to portray a town or city recognisable only by distinguishing landmarks, but to open up to the reader a vista of scenes and incidents which, taken collectively and connectedly, blend themselves into unmistakable and inimitable individuality.

Fcap. 8vo in two styles of binding. Illustrated.

JUST ISSUED.

- COVENTRY - - By Mary Dormer Harris.
- JERUSALEM By Col. Sir C. M. Watson, K.C.M.G.
- LUCCA - - By Janet Ross & Nelly Erichsen, and Illustrated by Nelly Erichsen.
- SANTIAGO - - By C. Gascoigne Hartley.

PREVIOUSLY ISSUED.

ASSISI, AVIGNON, BRUGES, BRUSSELS, CAMBRIDGE, CAIRO, CANTERBURY, CHARTRES, CONSTANTINOPLE, DUBLIN, EDINBURGH, FERRARA, FLORENCE, LONDON, MILAN, NUREMBERG, OXFORD, PADUA, PERUGIA, PRAGUE, PARIS, PISA, ROME, ROUEN, SEVILLE, SIENA, TOLEDA, VENICE, VERONA.

IN TWO DIFFERENT STYLES OF BINDING.

Cloth, 3/6 net—4/6 net. Leather, 4/6 net—5/6 net.

ATHENÆUM: (Lucca) "Mrs. Ross steers very cleverly through the trivial intricate history of the little Tuscan republic. . . . She gives delightful accounts of the Volto Santo and other legends. . . . It is illustrated by some apt and clever line drawings by Miss Erichsen. . . ."

SPHERE: "Who can travel throughout Europe to-day, or for that matter throughout England, without one or another volume of this delightful series?"

Please send for detailed Prospectus of this Series.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

50 Special Scholarships for Readers of EVERYMAN.

No Entrance Fee. No Specialised Knowledge Required.

Acting upon the suggestion of many readers, the Practical Correspondence College have decided to issue a further fifty scholarships in connection with their well-known all-British Course of Instruction in Practical Advertisement Writing. These Scholarships will be awarded to the fifty readers of EVERYMAN whose answers to the test questions indicate particular aptitude for the work.

Common-sense Training.

To write advertisements needs knowledge of the use of words and technical training. Finding things out oneself is a slow and disheartening method of learning a business. With training a man can at once begin to turn his talents to practical account. No matter where he lives, he can earn money by writing advertisements, because most advertising work is done by post.

Earning While Learning.

The College has arranged to offer the scholarships in advertisement writing to readers upon the following remarkable and unprecedented terms:—

The fifty candidates who send in the best answers to the test questions will receive the full course of postal tuition at half the regular fees, the remaining half to be paid only when the student has earned at least £10 by advertisement writings as the result of the tuition, within six months of completing the course.

There is no entrance fee—it costs a halfpenny stamp to write for gratis examination paper, and a penny to return it filled up. You are under no further liability whatever.

The successful students will not only earn back much more than the fees paid, and incidentally receive a first-class practical training free, but will acquire proficiency that may be worth from 15s. to £10 a week to them.

Clever and Enthusiastic.

The scholarships will enable the P.C.C. to secure fifty of the brainiest readers of EVERYMAN—clever, enterprising, and enthusiastic men and women whom it will be a personal pleasure to teach, and who will eventually be numbered amongst the College's most successful students.

Every reader stands a chance of succeeding.

Many who are not considered clever at figures, office routine, or ordinary work at which they are employed for want of better openings, are full of bright ideas which, turned to account in advertisement writing, would earn guineas. Clerks, salesmen, travellers, and others, by studying advertisement writing in their spare time, have been able to add considerably to their regular salaries, while others have secured well-paid positions as advertisement writers.

Many P.C.C. students earn more than the amount of fees paid before completing the course.

The Fortunate Fifty.

The P.C.C. scholarships are only intended for those students who will be a credit to the College.

Every successful P.C.C. student, by his or her achievement and personal influence, becomes a valuable recommendation for the P.C.C. Successful P.C.C. students never tire of recommending the College which helped them to their success.

The winners of the scholarships are under no liability to pay the balance of fees unless he or she earns at least £10.

No examination papers can be received after March 7th; no more than 50 scholarships can be awarded. Applications will be dealt with in strict rotation, and notified immediately all the fifty scholarships have been awarded.

A Little Spare Time and Thought.

It is essential that you send the coupon at once for the examination form, so that you can devote a little spare time and thought to answering the test questions. Remember, this is a golden opportunity which may make all the difference to your future success. You may have missed chances before; don't miss this one. Send off the coupon now before you forget it.

In addition to the Examination Paper, the College will send gratis a copy of a useful little book, "Brains and Ink," and fullest particulars of the Course and the Scholarships.

It costs nothing to enter; you risk nothing more than three halfpence for postage. You commit yourself to nothing, and you stand a good chance of success.

The act of writing for particulars to-day may prove to be the turning point in your career.

TERMS AT A GLANCE.

Successful candidates will be entitled to receive the complete Course of Instruction in Advertisement Writing at half fees, balance payable only if the student earns

3 TIMES AMOUNT OF FEE

by Advt. Writing within six months of completion of the Course.

No coupons, no entrance fee, no liability of any kind incurred by entering for preliminary test.

Read carefully and send to-day for full particulars.

SCHOLARSHIP COUPON.

The SECRETARY,
Practical Correspondence College,
77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

Please send me your Scholarship Examination Form Post Free.

Signed.....

Address

Date.....

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 20. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1913

One Penny.

History in the Making— Notes of the Week	PAGE 613
The Church and Social Problems—By Hector Macpherson	614
Out of Work—By Dr. Percy Dearmer	615
Women at Work—II. The Girl Behind the Bar—By Margaret Hamilton	616
Countries of the World—VIII. China —By the Editor	618
Henrik Ibsen	620
Portrait of Henrik Ibsen	621
Literary Notes	622
Masterpiece of the Week—Walt Whit- man's "Leaves of Grass"—By Ernest Rhys	623

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

DR. PERCY DEARMER

ERNEST RHYS

PROF. JOHN ADAMS

MARGARET

HAMILTON

"The Pretenders," by Henrik Ibsen, at the Haymarket Theatre—By C. B. Purdom	PAGE 624
Educational Reform—By Prof. John Adams	625
Fantasy—Poem	626
New Light on Early English History	626
London's Saturday Night	627
Queen Hortense—Short Story—By Guy de Maupassant	628
Correspondence	630
Reviews— The Story of the King's Highway	638
The Bloodhound of the Press	638
English Musical Reminiscences	640
Books of the Week	642
List of Books Received	642

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE fortunes of the war in the Balkans are pretty much what they were on the resumption of hostilities fully three weeks ago. The fact is, the winter is militating against operations to an extent that was not anticipated. Diplomatically, the situation has changed somewhat. Bulgaria demands the payment of an indemnity by Turkey as an essential condition of peace. On the other hand, Bulgaria and Roumania have agreed to their dispute being submitted to the mediation of the Powers.

M. Poincaré's first presidential message was read on Thursday week in the French Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. The message was an eloquent appeal to patriotism. While "Peace" was its keynote, it laid stress upon the fact that "it is only possible for a nation to be effectively pacific if it is always prepared for war." Every effort would therefore be made to consolidate and strengthen the Army and Navy. The message also outlined an attractive programme of reforms, including the more equitable allocation of taxation and the perfecting of the electoral system.

The interesting announcement was also made that M. Delcassé had been appointed French Ambassador to St. Petersburg. In Russia M. Delcassé is generally popular, and it is understood that the Czar warmly approves of the appointment. With the exception of the Socialists, the choice is also cordially approved in France. It is felt that an important step has been taken towards strengthening the bonds which unite the two countries.

A situation full of tragical significance has arisen in Mexico. When we wrote last week President

Madero had been asked to resign in the interests of peace, but had declined to do so. Thereupon he was arrested and deposed by the revolutionaries. Swift and dramatic changes ensued. On Saturday the ex-President and Señor Suarez, former Vice-President, were shot dead in Mexico City while being removed from the National Palace to the penitentiary. The ascendancy of General Huerta is now complete. He has been acclaimed as a hero by the populace, it being understood that he desires to end the rebellion, and to bring about a speedy resumption of business.

While members of the House of Commons have been enjoying a brief respite from their arduous labours, the Peers have been busy. The Trade Unions Bill was passed through its Committee stage. On Wednesday week the alleged atrocities by the Balkan Allies were made the subject of an interesting debate, in the course of which Lord Cromer paid a glowing tribute to the late Nazim Pasha. He spoke of the dead chief of the Turkish Army as an earnest and sincere Liberal, and maintained that by his death Turkey had lost one of its most valuable assets.

On Wednesday week consternation was caused throughout the country by the blowing up of Mr. Lloyd George's house at Walton-on-the-Hill. The outrage was thought to be the work of militant suffragettes, and suspicions were fully confirmed later. On Monday afternoon Mrs. Pankhurst was arrested in London in connection with the outrage.

The obituary of the week includes Sir William Arrol, the world's greatest bridge-builder; the Dowager-Empress of China; Admiral F. S. VanderMeulen, who witnessed the disaster to the battleship Victoria in June, 1893; Mr. E. A. W. Clarke, British Diplomatic Agent and Consul-General at Zanzibar; and Mr. Louis Becke, F.R.G.S., a well-known Australian author.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS

"EVERY political question," remarked Mazzini, "is rapidly becoming a social question, and every social question a religious question." In Mazzini's day the truth of this remark was not so obvious as it is in our time. Then, the Church, if not indifferent to social questions, was at least suspected of being opposed to the party of reform. The revolutionary parties, particularly in Germany and Italy, looked upon the Church as an obstacle to progress—a fact which explains the close connection early in the nineteenth century between the Socialistic and the Atheistic movements. The somewhat frigid attitude of the Church was due, not so much to indifference as to a narrow conception of its mission. Man's chief concern was to flee from the City of Destruction and start on a pilgrimage to the Celestial City. The world was conceived, after the manner of Bunyan, as a kind of Vanity Fair, and the chief duty of the Church was to warn the pilgrim against the entanglements of Satanic allurements. Other-worldliness, to quote George Eliot's phrase, was the dominant note in the teaching of the Church, with the result that, compared with the salvation of the individual, social reform sank into insignificance. In all the Churches were to be found men of wider outlook and great influence, who brought religion into the political and social arena when great issues were at stake, such as the abolition of slavery and the like. In the main, however, the evangelical theory of man and his destiny left little or no room for a scientific conception of society. Theology and Sociology had nothing in common. In Scotland Dr. Chalmers laboured hard to bring the two into harmony. In his view Christianity was a message of salvation to Society as well as to the individual; and to this end were his writings on Political Economy and his well-known experiment in Glasgow to solve the problem of pauperism on religious lines. His great work was abruptly stopped by the Disruption, which diverted his energies into the politico-ecclesiastical sphere. For years the public mind of Scotland was absorbed in the problem of the relations between Church and State, to the neglect of the pressing problem of the relations between Church and Society.

I.

Meanwhile the extension of the franchise and the formation of a Labour party turned public attention to social and economic questions, which are now engaging the anxious attention of all the Churches. Anglicans, Congregationalists, Methodists, Presbyterians, are energetically striving to apply Christianity to social problems. How great is the advance in this direction is seen in the remarks of Bishop Gore that he "sat down bewildered before the blank and stupid refusal of the mass of Church people to recognise their social duties." The progressive movement within the Churches has been aided by a wider interpretation of the Christian doctrine of salvation. Salvation is no longer viewed as a mystical something which could be possessed by the individual apart from social institutions and social influences. The individual is no longer viewed as a self-centred unit whose chief business is to "flee from the wrath to come." As Professor Adams Bruce, in his "Christian Theology in Outline," puts it, "The true end is neither the individual alone nor Society alone, but the full development and realisation of the individual in Society. . . That which gives worth to Society is that it is the training school of individual character." In this way the old, hard antithesis between Individualism and Collectivism disappears. An improved social environment is necessary for individual improvement, which, in its turn, reacts beneficially on the social environment. Thus it comes about that the Church, in the interest of the individual, is compelled to admit the gravity of the social problem.

II.

But we are faced with the question, What can the Church do? What is its sociological mission? Labour leaders speak as if it were the duty of the Church to take its stand upon the Labour programme, even to the adoption of the creed of Socialism. The Founder of Christianity is claimed as a Socialist, and the clergy are told that, to be true to the example of the Master, they must side with the poor against the rich. Professor Harnack warns us against transferring our modern categories, "rich" and "poor," unreservedly to the time of Christ; and if looked into it will be found that Christ was more concerned with men's duties than their rights. Along this line lies the social mission of the Church. It would be an evil day for the Church when it entangled itself in political, social, and economic controversies. Its place to-day is that occupied by the Hebrew prophets. We do not find them taking sides with the poor in the assertion of their rights; what we find is the setting up of the moral law as the standard of national life. Elijah dealt pretty effectively with Ahab in the matter of Naboth's vineyard on the basis of ethics, without initiating a class war on the basis of the socialisation of property. Isaiah, Amos, and their brethren were loud in their denunciation of injustice. They emphasised the national importance of duty. They were on the side of the poor because they were the victims of injustice, not because they believed that better results would flow from a community of property. In this, as in other matters, there must be division of functions. It is the mission of the Church to hold before the public mind the ideal of the Kingdom of God upon earth, and so to impregnate the public conscience with ethical impulses that, as the outcome of an enlightened and sensitive public opinion, moral forces will get incarnated in legislative statutes. To foment class hatred is no part of the Church's mission.

The cause of social reform is not helped by indiscriminate denunciation of the rich or indiscriminate adulation of the poor. It may be easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven, but we need not thereby infer that, on the plea of poverty, the poor will crowd into the Celestial City. In his "Christianity and the Social Crisis," Professor Rauschenbusch has some wise words on this subject which church leaders would do well to ponder. He says: "The force of religion can best be applied to social renewal by sending its spiritual power along the existing and natural relations of men, to direct them to truer ends and govern them by higher motives. . . The ministry in particular must apply the teaching functions of the pulpit to the pressing questions of public morality. It must collectively learn not to speak without adequate information; not to charge individuals with guilt which all society shares; not to be partial, and yet to hear the side of the lost; not to yield to political partisanship, but to deal with moral questions before they become political issues, and with those questions of public welfare which never do become political issues. They must lift the social questions to a religious level by faith and spiritual insight."

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

OUT OF WORK . . . BY DR. PERCY DEARMER

THE evil of unemployment is chronic; we hear of it most in the winter, but it continues through the summer. The extent of unemployment is enormous; it fluctuates with the fat and lean years, but its victims do not average less than about a million persons. It brings no compensating good in its train, as do some bad things, but is the fertile parent of evil children—of disease and degradation, of incapacity and further unemployment.

Now there are some common remarks upon the subject which are not true. It is not true that there is not enough money. There is plenty of money, and many millions of pounds are wasted in demoralising luxuries every year, as EVERYMAN reminded us the other day. Moreover, of all "luxuries," unemployment is the most costly; millions of days' work are annually lost and millions of pounds of capital are thrown into idleness. Suppose, for instance, that the million unemployed could be set to work at land reclamation, and that they earned each a pound a week: in one year the money spent in their wages would have gained for the nation fifty-three million pounds' worth of productive land, the vast waste of physical degradation would have been saved, and a great reduction effected in Poor Law and Prison expenditure, and in charitable agencies. Of course, the whole problem cannot be dealt with in this way, and therefore this is only a rough illustration to show that unemployment is a form of national wastefulness; though indeed both land reclamation and afforestation are among the remedies for unemployment.

It is not true, then, that there is not enough money. Nor is it true that there are too many men. On the contrary, there is grave danger in England, as in some other white countries, of there being too few. The population of the United Kingdom is, in fact, coming to a standstill, and we may soon have to face the problem of a decline. Yet the need of white men was never so great as at the present time, and there was never so much work for Britons to do; the whole Empire is crying out for more of us. In the British Empire there are only sixty million white men, as against 354½ millions of other races, and of these white men not all are British subjects. There are not too many men of the right sort.

And this brings us to a third statement. It is not true that the unemployment of so many men is "their own fault." We cannot shift the responsibility off our own shoulders in that way. There are many kinds of unemployed: many are among the best, thrown out through sickness or infirmity or some dislocation of trade; many are drunkards and ne'er-do-weels, whose own fault it is that they are out of work; many are more or less unemployable—men physically and mentally inadequate, whose day's work is not worth a day's wages.

We will consider what is more important than remedies—preventatives. These physically unfit, these puny-bodied, slow-witted creatures, whose enormous numbers came as a shock to the British public at the time of the Boer War—even these drunken, semi-criminal people, and the men who will do anything rather than work—how about them? How came they into existence? How is it that human beings have such a large proportion of degenerates, when brute beasts enjoy an almost perfect standard of health and efficiency?

They are caused by evil conditions of society; unemployment creates unfitness for employment, disease spreads disease, crime begets crime, and deterioration multiplies deterioration. And certain conditions of modern society create the unemployment which is the parent and grandparent of so many more evils. These conditions are actually increasing at the present day. To stem the increase is the first step in preventing unemployment and the evils that make men unemployable.

Three modern conditions in especial are creating unemployment:

1. The "Blind Alley" Occupations for Boys.—Boys are in great demand; they find work at once, and get what are for them good wages. Employers find it cheaper to use a boy at six or seven shillings a week than a man; and many mechanical improvements make it possible for boys to do what men formerly did. So the boys prosper, and their parents are glad. But when they cease to be boys, they have to make way for others; they are thrown on the world, knowing no trade; they find it no longer easy to get work, and great numbers pass the rest of their lives as casuals.

This displacement of men by boys is increasing every year. How can it be prevented? There seems to be only one way. The raising of the school age to sixteen (at first to fifteen); the establishment for boys and girls after that age of a two or three years' half-time system. While they were half-timers they would not be allowed to work more than thirty hours a week at a trade, the other thirty hours being devoted to technical and other education. The principal effect of this would be that no normal children would grow up unemployable.

2. The Employment of Mothers.—A large number of women with young children go out to work, with the result that their children are not properly tended, trained, or nourished, and do not start as normal children at all. All these evils work in a vicious circle; a man is out of work or under-employed because he has not been properly brought up; because he is out of work, his wife has to earn a miserable living at some trade; and because his wife is away at work, their children are not properly trained, and grow up unemployable. Society will have in the future to succour the mother in its own interest, if not in hers.

3. Overwork.—The vicious circle works in other ways also. Because the mother goes out to work, she displaces childless women, who thus become unemployed; and she displaces men too. If mothers could mind their children, if young people did not go to full work till they were eighteen, then a great number of men who have been squeezed out by their cheaper labour would find work again.

And the same applies to the reduction of the actual hours of work in time-work occupations—not in all trades, for it has been shown that men do as much work in an eight-hour day as in a day of ten hours. But in such occupations as those of railway men, and tramway men, and policemen, the establishment of decent human conditions would at once absorb many thousands of men. Railway men very largely work twelve hours a day, and seventy or eighty hours a week; omnibus men eighty and as much as ninety hours a week; and the picked men of the police force are not allowed to obey the Fourth Commandment. Thus it is that many are grossly overworked, in order that others may be unemployed. Justice to the one class would be mercy to the other.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

II.—THE GIRL BEHIND THE BAR

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

As we see them, they are tall, stately, self-possessed, good-looking and efficient, smartly gowned, well groomed, with an enviable air of detachment.

As they see us, we are too often a clamorous, insistent, hurried mass of humanity, many of whom have rushed in and, eager to be off, demand instant attention. Neat-handed and deft, the "girl behind the bar" serves ten customers at once, talks to as many and smiles at all. One envies her dexterity, the quiet manner, without a trace of fluster, a suggestion of worry. She remembers her customers' names, their idiosyncrasies and calling, to say nothing of their favourite refreshment, and has a pleasant word for each.

No woman worker sees a greater variety of men, and none know better how to handle them. A girl employed in a riverside hotel will learn to interest herself in rowing gossip, and to discuss the "form" of rival eights. Take her to a Fleet Street hostelry and she will display the same quickness, and listen to the poem of a minor poet or the account of a wrestling match by a sporting expert with equal sympathy.

Where do they come from, these women for whom every man has a kindly feeling? Some are connected by family ties with the trade, others force their way from the country. The daughters of small farmers, market gardeners, and small shopkeepers. Employed first of all at the local inn or railway station, they migrate by easy stages to the great city that to the village damsel is still paved with shining gold. Others start from the very bottom of the ladder and take a "learner's" place, until such time as they are initiated into the mysteries of the glass bottles that are kept so sparkling and bright.

More than once the "girl behind the bar" has been faced with the possibility of painless extinction by the law. The unco' guid have frowned on her devoted head with its auburn tresses and amber comb. But the threatened barmaid has lived long. The clause in the last Licensing Bill, putting a time limit on her existence, was withdrawn amid a storm of criticism and protest. On the whole, one is not surprised. There are few places where a woman's presence does not refine even the very coarsest and most depraved of men, and those who use bars are not exactly that. In Glasgow, where the barmaids are abolished, drunkenness has not diminished, and in those establishments in London where one is served by men only, the language of the customers is, to put it mildly, by no means so restrained. The idea that barmaids are women who may be insulted with impunity has long passed away, and though "cads will be cads" anyhow, yet the level of conduct in the ordinary saloon is all the better because a woman is present. One recalls the immortal barmaid, Abbey Potterson—one of the greatest of Dickens' creations—who rules the bar of the "Six Jolly Fellowship Porters" with an iron hand, sternly exacting good conduct from the rough characters of the waterside. Miss Potterson, in fact, partook of the character of a Begum. "Being known, on her own authority, as Miss Abbey Potterson, some waterside heads, which (like the water) were none of the clearest, harboured bemuddled notions that, because of her dignity and firmness, she was named after, or in some sort related to, the Abbey at Westminster. But Abbey was only short for Abigail, by which name Miss Potterson had been christened at Limehouse Church, some sixty and odd years before."

One feels that if women had been driven out of the bar in those days the "Six Jolly Fellowship Porters" would have been no jollier, and probably far worse conducted, and to-day, without going to Limehouse, not a few establishments have gained in good management and efficiency because the presiding genius is of the fair sex.

The best of good comrades, she has lent a helping hand to many a man down on his luck. The depository of innumerable confidences, the keeper of strange secrets, if her lips were but unlocked she could tell you curious stories of the customers she knows and serves. But her loyalty, for the most part, is stable, and she does not give her friends away. This reticence, a noticeable feature among women of her calling, in some part accounts for the mystery surrounding the death of poor Miss Camp, who, it will be remembered, was discovered murdered in the train between Vauxhall and Waterloo. Whether or no her associates had knowledge of the man with whom she was going out will never be known. In any case, no word of her confidences passed their lips.

There is a tale on record of a young City clerk, in fierce rebellion against the social system, who, overworked and underpaid, robbed his employer. One evening he came in swaggering with a bunch of roses for the "girl behind the bar." It was mid-winter, and she suspected his ability to pay for them. With a woman's tact and cleverness, she won the truth from him, borrowed such part of the money as he had already spent from a rich customer, insisted on his replacing the whole amount, and finally convinced him of the error of his ways. This is only one of many stories in which a barmaid has played Providence.

Not infrequently she is entrusted not only with the confidences of her customers, but with their belongings also. A man will hand his purse, or a roll of bank-notes, or even gold, to the "girl behind the bar." He thinks his wealth is safer in her keeping than his own. Rarely, if ever, is he disappointed.

The barmaids' hours are long. They vary to some extent with the class and kind of establishment they serve. But, as a rule, the following is fairly typical of the day's work. They are down in the bar at 8:30 or 9 o'clock. At eleven they are allowed half an hour to three-quarters to dress. They are on again till lunch-time, for which they take an hour—unless a rush is on. Later in the afternoon they get a blessed rest of some two hours, and then, with a short interval for supper, they go right on till half-past twelve o'clock. One Sunday in four they are allowed out till eight, and as a rule they get also one evening a week. In the City, of course, which is the Mecca of barmaids, Sunday is a day of rest, and the evening is theirs also. If the house does a quick luncheon trade, served on the counter, the tips go to swell their pay, which, little enough, ranges from 10s. to 14s. a week when they live in, to £1 when they sleep out. It is difficult to appraise the cash value of this living in. Both the food and the sleeping accommodation vary enormously. In the smaller suburban houses, the food is generally good and the sleeping accommodation excellent. The proprietor and his wife share their meals with the staff, and where there are only two barmaids there is food enough and to spare, and no lack of suitable sleeping accommodation. But in the big or middle-sized hotel, with a manager watching costs and with little space available, things are apt to be different.

It has been said that one never sees a grey-haired barmaid. The reason is not far to seek. They marry young, and marry well. They have a varied knowledge of masculine foibles and a kindly toleration for them. Self-respecting, with a knowledge of good and evil denied to many of their sister workers, it is to the credit of these hard-working women that their general average of conduct is of a high level, and that no man dares to treat them twice with disrespect.

The barmaid sees life at many angles. In some houses she meets prosperous, well-fed customers; in others the flotsam and jetsam of the great city drifts to her bar. In the East End she comes to close grips with destitution, and learns some of the tragedies of the poor; and the knowledge thus gained is not unused. At this moment a barmaid employed at a hotel in the Borough serves on the committee of a notable social experiment initiated by a well-known novelist for helping working mothers, and she is not a single example. The generosity of the barmaid is spontaneous and ungrudging. In more than one instance the female staff have subscribed among themselves to assist a fellow-worker laid up with illness; and at one particular hotel, for a period extending over some months, the barmaids, three in number, sent three shillings a week each from their small salary to the wife of the porter employed at the establishment, suffering from rheumatic fever.

It is a striking and significant fact that whereas, as we have seen, the abolition of the barmaid has been frequently and insistently demanded by social reformers, no one has urged a like step in relation to the waitress, though she is infinitely worse paid, harder worked, with longer hours, and is more subjected to temptation. The majority of girls in tea-shops work from eight in the morning till eight at night. They must leave their homes a little after seven, with only a hurried breakfast to sustain them for the arduous labours of the day—labours which include an itinerary of many miles to and from the counter, a trial from which the barmaid, be it noted, is exempt. She has to prepare the service for her tables—filling cruets, sugar basins, etc., cleaning silver and polishing trays, so as to be ready for the midday rush.

Lunch commences at twelve, and it is safe to say that the strain on the girl's energies, on her memory, as well as on her physical resources is severe in the extreme. She takes no notes of her orders, and must remember and reproduce without hesitation and in absolute accuracy the most multifarious demands. "Steak and chips—rhubarb tart and small coffee—beef, well done, and two veg.—eggs on toast—chicken croquette and large chocolate" form but a small portion of the customers' requirements. She must remember for whom and by whom these delectable viands have been ordered—no small tax on a mind that has received but rudimentary training. Then, again, she has another series of facts to memorise: the price of every article must be entered on the check at the precise moment or she gets severely reprimanded. After lunch the rush slackens, and the girls get something to eat for themselves. The menu is not generous, a portion only of the cost being defrayed by the management. Tea finds the girls almost as busy as during the luncheon rush, and when eight strikes the hour of release it may be questioned if they are not far more outworn in mind and body than their sisters behind the bar.

And in relation to this, it should be noted that the waitress stands between two fires. On the one hand, the irritation of the customer at being kept waiting; on the other hand, the complaints of the kitchen staff if she unduly hurries any order.

In regard to diet the contrast is again in favour of the barmaid, who receives as a rule good food and a sufficiency, while the waitress is restricted to two meals, made up of the leavings of the dishes on the carte.

The waitress receives on an average some ten shillings weekly, including, as we have shown, two meals. In the majority of cases she sleeps out, and railway fares must be deducted from this scanty sum. In places where a dinner trade exists her wages are higher, ranging from ten to fifteen shillings weekly. It is only in the coffee shops, as a rule, that the waitress sleeps in; these establishments cater chiefly for the working classes, and the conditions are more tolerable than those appertaining to tea-shops. The diet is more generous, though the clientèle is less select. The balance of wages, on the average, is heavily on the side of the barmaid.

It may be urged that the waitress gets her tips, but against this it must be remembered that she has to pay for breakages—customers' as well as her own—and that at most of the depôts of large catering companies the tips are purely nominal. Personal tipping is forbidden, and the share per head of money deposited in the employee's box upon the counter is very small. If we carry the contrast further we find that the brewery companies, who are ultimately the employers of the barmaid, have a struggle to pay five and four per cent. on their debentures, while tea-shops earn dividends on their shares of seventy per cent.!

And, in addition to these facts, we should remember that these giant concerns not only overwork and underpay their girls, but exercise an impertinent and restrictive prohibition on their dress, many insisting on flat heels, flat hair, and tight waistbands!

The life of the waitress in the country, at the small inns and pleasure gardens, at places of popular resort, is that of a slave. As a rule she sleeps upon the premises, and her day's work is arduous in the extreme. She rises at five, and it is often past midnight when she crawls up to bed.

But not thus is the lot of every waitress. There are delectable tea-rooms in the West where the labour is light, the hours easy, and the opportunity for social amenity great. Soho also offers, in some restaurants, at least happier prospects for the girl with the tray. A certain establishment, notable alike for the excellence of its cooking and the perfection of its service, boasts a charming retinue. Built on the lines of an old farmhouse kitchen, French girls in picturesque costumes flit about with cups of coffee and liqueurs. In their hair are silver pins and jewelled combs; they laugh and talk without restraint, with that wealth of gesture and expression that belongs to France, and pick up the ample douceurs left by admiring customers upon the table with deft and twinkling fingers.

It is the fashion for certain unthinking and inconsiderate members of our society to jeer at the "girl behind the bar," to level a sneer against the waitress. I would remind all those who hold lightly the duties of these hard-working women that the importance of their function is expressed in one of the oldest and most honoured mottoes in the world: Ich dien—I serve.

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD BY THE EDITOR

VIII.—CHINA

I.

THE Chinese Revolution, which in a few months swept away an ancient monarchy which had existed for thousands of years, took the Western World by surprise. Although we had been prepared for a change by the universal unrest and fermentation in the East, and by the rise of Young Turkey and of Young Persia, we certainly were not prepared for so dramatic a catastrophe. Hitherto China had seemed impervious to modern ideas. Generations of missionary enterprise had made no impression, and the revolt of the Boxers had been directed, not against the old régime, but against the new régime, which allowed itself to be controlled by the "foreign devils."

But the far-reaching revolution, which Christianity and diplomacy had been powerless to achieve, was precipitated by the crushing defeat of the Russians. Port Arthur, Tsusima, and Mukden were object-lessons which at last opened the eyes even of the Chinese Conservatives. Those disasters revealed that the only way to obtain victory over the "foreign devils" was to adopt their material civilisation, their railways, their armies, and, having got hold of those weapons, to turn them against Europe. From the day of Mukden the triumph of the reformers was a foregone conclusion, and China resolutely started to reconstruct her venerable and crumbling house on Western plans and models.

II.

We still speak of China as the "Far East." We fail to realise that the Trans-Siberian and Manchurian Railways have brought Pekin to within a fortnight's journey of London. Two weeks of comfortable, if monotonous, travelling land us in the capital of the Chinese Empire, and European residents in China are already beginning to arrange to spend their summer holidays in the Mother-country.

But although material distances seem to have been abolished, morally, China is as remote as ever. We are as bewildered as ever by the sight of Chinese civilisation, and by the contradictory accounts which we hear about it. On the one hand we have the evidence of European residents like the eminent French diplomat, Eugene Simon, summing up in his striking book, "Ten Years of Travel and Observation," and glorifying the Chinese people as, politically and morally, superior in culture to ourselves. On the other hand we have Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb expressing nothing but contempt for a people who are living under a régime of State socialism, and who, therefore, ought to commend themselves to Fabian leaders.

When we are face to face with such glaring contradictions we naturally assume that those judgments must apply to two entirely different countries. Is it not that what some travellers are describing is Inland China, which only reveals itself after a protracted residence, and that, on the contrary, what the majority of tourists are describing is the China of the Treaty Ports, Canton and Hong-Kong, Shanghai and Tientsin, which seem to harbour the scum of the Far Eastern Republic, and where the Chinese seem to have lost all their national virtues, and to have assumed all the vices of the West? And is it not unfair to China to describe those Treaty Ports as typically Chinese, considering that they are entirely the outcome of modern conditions and of demoralising intercourse with the West?

III.

But, apart from that fundamental distinction, it must be obvious à priori that no sweeping judgment can be passed on a population of 450,000,000 human beings. What we said about Russia is equally true about China. She is not one homogeneous country, but a heterogeneous continent, extending from the Pacific Ocean to the eternal solitudes of Tibet, from ice-bound Siberia to tropical Cochin-China. And in that Chinese continent everything is on a colossal scale. Time is measured, not by centuries, but by millenniums. Space is measured, not by hundreds, but by thousands of miles. We hear of a particular structure, the Great Wall, erected by human hands, and of a particular canal, the Imperial Canal, dug by human labour, extending for a thousand miles. We hear of plagues destroying millions of human lives. We hear of a wondrous, fertile, yellow earth going down to a depth of two thousand feet. We hear of coal deposits sufficient to supply the whole of the world for a generation to come.

IV.

China may be best described as the alluvial plain of two mighty rivers—the "Yellow" River in the north and the "Blue" River in the centre—the Hoang-ho and the Yang-tse-kiang. Those two rivers have made China in the same sense in which the Nile has made Egypt. But, unlike the Nile, the "Yellow" River is destructive as well as creative. Whereas the inundation of the Nile is gradual and periodical, and proves an unmixed blessing, the inundation of the Chinese rivers, and especially of the "Yellow" River, is sudden and catastrophic, the water rising by two to three hundred feet in a few weeks, and the result is the destruction of thousands of villages and of millions of villagers. Well may the Hoang-ho be described as the incorrigible river, as "China's Sorrow," as the scourge of the children of Ham.

But if the sudden rise of the Hoang-ho nearly always means calamity, the yellow sand, or "loess," which it deposits, and which colours the whole landscape of Northern China, also brings prodigious fertility. And the Chinese have made the most of the fertility of the soil. They are born agriculturalists and market gardeners. China is one huge rice field and tea plantation. There are no forests or pastures. Every square inch seems to be cultivated. Even the boats on the rivers are made into little roof gardens. And as the result of such intensive agriculture, China is able to feed a population of 450,000,000.

Hitherto an agricultural country, China is likely in the near future also to become a mighty industrial power. With the inexhaustible mineral deposits, described by Richthofen, and with an unlimited supply of human labour, all that is wanted is improved means of communication. Hitherto China has been entirely dependent on her waterways. Two gigantic lines of railways are being built, which will traverse the Republic from North to South and from East to West, from Canton to Pekin, and from the east coast to Sze-chuan.

V.

In one sense China is admirably governed. Her statesmen have at least achieved what the statesmen of India never succeeded in accomplishing. They have insured law and order over a huge territory. Chinese government may be misgovernment, but at least it is not Indian anarchy.

In theory—and the Chinese are great theorists—China is one huge family living under the rule of Confucius. Almost alone amongst religious founders, Confucius is exclusively concerned with the affairs of this world. He is a positivist, and his teaching is purely ethical. But if we can trust the majority of missionaries and travellers, it cannot be said that his ethical religion has been more successful than the transcendent morality of other religions. For in practice the Confucian family is described as a tyrannical and corrupt bureaucracy, where ninety-nine per cent. live in a state of practical slavery.

VI.

The national characteristics of the Chinese are a strange mixture of vices and virtues. The Chinaman in the Treaty Ports is certainly not clean, and a Chinese street is a perpetual and nauseating offence to the olfactive nerves. He is said to be cruel, and to have made infanticide into a custom and torture into a science. He is corrupt, and amenable to bribery. Some witnesses say he is dishonest, although others say that, compared with the Japanese, he is a paragon of integrity. On the other hand, he is credited with some of the virtues of a gentleman, and with all the virtues of a perfect slave. He is courteous, and no one can be more blandly mannered than a Chinese mandarin in his blue silk robes. John Chinaman is a pacifist, and his master Confucius is as severe as Mr. Norman Angell in condemnation of war. He is obedient and law-abiding, and he is incredibly industrious. He has infinite capacity for taking pains. Whether the Chinaman migrates to Bangkok or to San Francisco, to the Philippines or to South Africa, he is universally dreaded, not because he is a failure, but because he is more efficient than others, because he can feed on rats and cats and carrion, because he can thrive on a penny a day, and work for sixteen hours out of twenty-four.

VII.

What will be the future of China? The recent history of Japan has shown how dangerous it is to prophesy, and how little even immediate observers know of the inner conditions of the Far East. When we see Great Britain claiming the right to poison the Chinese people and to force opium upon them, when we find all the Western Powers vying with each other in their endeavour to reduce China to industrial subjection, when we find Russia determined on the political annexation of Manchuria, we cannot but look at the near future with serious misgivings. The conquest of Manchuria and the Protectorate over Northern China will make Russia more than ever into an Asiatic power, will confirm her in her Asiatic methods of government, and may indefinitely postpone the emancipation of the Russian people. On the other hand, the industrial exploitation of China may precipitate the "Yellow Peril." It will certainly flood Asia and it may flood Europe with the produce of sweated Chinese labour, and it may thus prevent that economic enfranchisement of the European workers on which the future of civilisation depends.

HENRIK IBSEN

I.

THE growth and blossoming of dramatic literature is generally associated in our minds with wealth and leisure, with the patronage of a Court or a class or a caste, with intellectual freedom, with the stimulus of a capital, or with the inspiration of a great national movement, in short, with all the conditions of a refined and artificial state of society. Such has been the development of the drama in Spain and France, in Elizabethan England and in modern Germany. But very different have been the conditions under which the contemporary Scandinavian drama has evolved. Here we have no aristocracy, but only a petty democracy of shopkeepers and churchmen; here we have no wealthy or leisured class, but only a community engaged in a hard struggle for existence; here we have no intellectual liberty, but only an atmosphere of ignorance and prejudice. And certainly nothing could well be more uninteresting and more depressing than the life-story of the great writer who made that Scandinavian drama into a world force. A miserable and cramped adolescence spent in little Norwegian highland parishes; a long-drawn battle with parsons and prejudices, with shopkeepers and poverty; a chequered career as a chemist's assistant, as a penny-a-line journalist, as theatrical manager; repeated failure, followed by a long exile and a wandering and solitary existence in Germany and Italy; and at last success and recognition, culminating in national hero-worship and universal fame: such, in brief, is the biography of Henrik Ibsen.

II.

The hard and bitter fight which Ibsen had to wage against Norwegian obscurantism might have crushed a weaker personality. It only hardened his temper and added strength and discipline to his genius. It had exactly the same effect on him which it had on a great Scotsman, a kindred genius, nurtured under similar conditions, and who, about the same time, was eating out his own heart in the solitude of Ecclefechan. Without an intimate knowledge of those early struggles, it would certainly be impossible to understand the literary personality of Ibsen and his most striking features: his dourness, his grim satire, his rebellion against social conventions, his hatred of democracy, his fierce individualism, which is the inspiration of "The Enemy of the People" and of "Brand," and, above all, his love of liberty.

There is a striking passage in a letter quoted by Brandes, which throws a vivid light on his character: "What a splendid country Russia is! What a magnificent despotism. Just think of it—what immense love of liberty it must generate! Russia is one of the rare countries on earth where men still love liberty and are ready to sacrifice everything to it. That is why that nation is so great both in Poetry and in Art."

What Russian despotism did for Russian Liberals, the petty persecution of parochial Scandinavian tyrants did for Ibsen. It made him into an uncompromising individualist, into a Nietzschean aristocrat, into a herald of revolt.

III.

But Ibsen owed something more to his native country than the stern discipline of poverty and the indignant protest of an independent mind. There is another Norway very different from the petty Republic in which he spent an unhappy youth. There is the Norway of the Fjords, of the Midnight Sun, the Norway of bold mariners, which even to-day has produced the conquerors of the Pole, a Nansen and an Amundsen. And there is the Norway which in the past has bred a race of vikings and berserkirs. It is this Norway of sublime landscapes and heroic traditions which quickened Ibsen's imagination. It was her sagas which he learned by heart in the long winter nights. It is this land of dreams and cloud-capped mountains which inspired his poetry, and which explains his symbolism and mysticism. It is the spirit of mediæval Norway, it is her ideals, which are revealed in his two great dramatic poems, in "Brand" and "Peer Gynt," so radically different from the realism of the later comedies.

IV.

Those two great dramatic poems, the high-water mark of Scandinavian poetry, are entirely concerned with individual conflicts. "Brand" is the martyr of duty, of the human conscience, of the categorical imperative. "Peer Gynt" is the victim of the artistic impulse, and of the vagaries of a boundless imagination. On the contrary, in the later comedies the inner conflicts of the individual soul become the external conflicts of society. After the publication of the "League of Youth," every one of Ibsen's plays becomes a social "problem play." "The Pillars of Society" exposes the hypocritical exploitation of the parochial politician. "A Doll's House" raises the whole problem of the position of women in modern society. "Ghosts" and "Rosmersholm" are the tragedy of heredity. "The Enemy of the People" shatters the ideals of modern democracy and rails at the tyranny of the majority.

V.

It is probably because every one of Ibsen's comedies is a problem play, and because the solution of every problem is invariably rebellion against authority and tradition, that even the most superficial student is forced into a comparison with the drama of Mr. Bernard Shaw. And no doubt the influence of Ibsen on Bernard Shaw has been profound and lasting. The resemblances between the Norwegian and the Irishman are unmistakable and far-reaching. Both are uncompromisingly sincere. Both are modern with a vengeance: in one sense they are both Puritans, and in another sense they are Pagans and Nietzscheans extolling the joy of life.

But the comparison between Ibsen and Shaw has often been unduly laboured, and has caused us to underrate and to overlook the radical differences which separate them, and the profound originality of both. Shaw is ever and everywhere a realist. Ibsen, even in his social comedies, remains the poet of "Brand" and "Peer Gynt," the mystic and the symbolist. We cannot conceive of Mr. Bernard Shaw writing "The Lady of the Lake," "The Wild Duck," "The Master Builder," or "John Gabriel Borkman."

But the most marked difference between Ibsen and Shaw is in their political and social doctrine. Shaw is at least in theory a systematic Socialist. It may be difficult to reconcile his Fabianism and his State Socialism with his conception of the Superman, but still he claims to be a consistent democrat. On the contrary, Ibsen has a horror of democracy as he has a horror of the State. From his first juvenile attempt in "Catiline" he appears as the aristocrat and the individualist, and the first and last word of his political philosophy is that "the only strong man is the man who stands alone."

HENRIK IBSEN, NATUS 1828, OBIIT 1906

LITERARY NOTES

THE hope I expressed last week that we might soon have a full record of the splendid heroism of Captain Scott and his companions is likely to be amply fulfilled. The proprietors of the Strand Magazine, who have the sole magazine rights in this country of Captain Scott's personal description and photographs of his expedition, have received a cable from Commander Evans to the effect that the former left his diaries in complete form, and that his photographic films turned out excellent. The story in its entirety promises to be a feature unique in its thrilling interest in the magazine literature of the world.

* * * * *

I have been much interested in the recent correspondence in the Athenæum with reference to anonymous criticism. It seems to me that cogent reasons may be adduced both for and against unsigned articles or reviews. The anonymous critic is often taunted with cowardice when in reality he is acting from the best of motives—the exercising of the critical function worthily. I can conceive of many circumstances in which a writer would be justified on the most honourable grounds in refraining from putting his name to an article or a review. Furthermore, I believe that unsigned reviews in many cases acquire a special interest and value simply because they are unsigned. I am not quite sure that I should read the Times Literary Supplement or the Athenæum with the same relish if I knew who wrote this review and who wrote that.

* * * * *

But while admitting that there is much to be said for anonymous criticism, I do not forget that it affords a splendid opportunity for the literary log-roller who, unfortunately, flourishes like a green bay tree. Take the case of the hack reviewer who writes anonymously in different papers about the same book. What happens? The reading public are deluded into thinking that there is a unanimous verdict in favour of or in condemnation of a particular book. No doubt, as has been pointed out, responsible reviewers usually decline to criticise a book for more than one journal, but, alas! they are numerically small compared with the hodmen who make a living by writing cheap reviews about the same book for various papers.

* * * * *

This is the most formidable argument against anonymous reviewing, but how is it to be overcome? I observe that one correspondent suggests that the leading journals should stipulate that any reviewer who writes in more than one paper about the same book should sign each of his reviews of it. Theoretically, the idea is excellent, but in practice it would miserably fail. Such a proposition involves financial considerations, and when these are raised it requires two to settle them. The more one thinks of this problem the more one is impressed by its complexity. But its importance cannot be doubted, and I shall welcome any opinions from readers of EVERYMAN that are likely to help in its solution.

* * * * *

"Half Lengths" is a somewhat enigmatical title for a book, but it is to adorn the title-page of a new volume which Mr. G. W. E. Russell is publishing shortly through Messrs. Grant Richards. Mr. Russell has written a few books in his time, all of them most readable, but I always associate him with those delightful essayettes which were written at the suggestion of James Payn, and published rather more than a dozen years ago, under the title "Collections and Recollections." I am glad, therefore, to learn that his new volume is to be on the same lines. It will deal with many interesting personalities of recent years, and there will also be essays on Oxford, Cambridge, and "John Inglesant."

* * * * *

Ibsen literature grows apace. Few "foreign" authors of so recent a date have had so much attention bestowed upon them by English critics. Mr. Bernard Shaw's "Quintessence of Ibsenism" is a brilliant study, and I wish it could be reprinted. Then there is Mr. Haldane Macfall's "Ibsen the Man: His Art and His Significance," which affords a good epitome of the dramatist's life and work. Last year Mr. R. E. Roberts brought out a critical study, which the Times described as "just, lofty, and penetrating." The latest book appears in Mr. Fifield's spring announcements. The author is Mr. Henry Rose, who discusses the symbolical and mystical features of each of Ibsen's social and psychological plays, and shows the growth and consistency of the dramatist's thought.

* * * * *

Captain Granville Baker's new book, "The Passing of the Turkish Empire in Europe," comes most opportunely at an hour when the Balkan question is uppermost in our political thoughts. The author has just returned from Turkey, where he had exceptional opportunities of getting behind the diplomatic scenes. He describes how the power of the Turk waxed and grew great so as to prove a menace to Europe, and how all the neighbouring States were absorbed and became integral portions of the Ottoman Empire. The origin, growth, and racial characteristics of the Balkan States are described. Captain Baker has also enlivened his pages by a number of spirited sketches. The book is published by Messrs. Seeley.

* * * * *

Messrs. Chapman and Hall are publishing this week the second and completing volume of the Rev. Henry W. Clark's "History of English Nonconformity," carrying the narrative from the Restoration to the close of the nineteenth century. Mr. Clark's first volume, though it naturally cannot claim to be strictly impartial, is an able vindication of the successive Nonconformist movements within the Church of England and outside it. The author is a Congregational minister who has of late years acquired considerable reputation as a theological writer. He is now editing Messrs. Chapman and Hall's new series of volumes, entitled "The Great Christian Theologies."

* * * * *

Professor Bury's scholarly edition of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," upon which he has been working for several years, is now complete. The seventh and concluding volume will be published by Messrs. Methuen next week. There is no edition of Gibbon to compare with Professor Bury's in point of insight and learning, and I hope the publishers may see their way in due time to bring out a cheap edition. At present the work costs half a guinea a volume, a prohibitive price for the average reader.

* * * * *

Several interesting psychological problems are raised by Mrs. Humphry Ward's new novel, entitled "The Mating of Lydia," which Messrs. Smith, Elder are to publish in a few days. X. Y. Z.

MASTERPIECE OF THE WEEK

WALT WHITMAN'S "LEAVES OF GRASS" * * * BY ERNEST RHYS

I.

SOME drawings made by an Edinburgh artist, Miss Cook, to illustrate Walt Whitman, were seen in London lately, and they served to call up afresh the hardly explainable power of his writing. Wrought in translucent colours, and nobly designed, they left one reflecting on the old complaint over his want of grace, and trying to estimate afresh where his real strength lay. In the winter of 1888-89 it was my good fortune to visit America and to pay him sundry visits; and as the man in the book, and the book in the man, counted indispensably in his estimate, it may be well to begin there, and call him up as he was in his later days—a prisoner to paralysis in his own walls.

It was after dark one December evening when I crossed from Philadelphia by ferry to Camden by one of those unwieldy paddle-boats in which he took to the last a boyish delight. Snow was in the air and on the ground, and in the dark street where he lived the small wooden-framed houses looked to a stranger cold and inhospitable. The fates were surely not propitious, and a first knock on the door of his house brought no reply. However, it opened at length, and a friendly housekeeper appeared, and a blaze of lamplight broke the evil spell. Within a room of no great size, before a closed American stove—how unlike our English open fires!—the old man sat, great of form, in his great chair; grave, self-absorbed, motionless as an Indian rishi; and slowly roused himself to welcome his visitor.

If the surroundings were not of a build to express the individuality of a poet of the open air and all the Americas, his massive frame, erect head, and large and unusual proportions soon made one forget them. He gave one the impression of some wise, mighty old peasant, akin to Ivan Tourgueniev's "King Lear of the Steppes," withdrawn from the fields he had tilled; sitting solitary in a mountain hut and turning over in his mind the kindred elements, the stars, winds and waters, men and beasts, he had known.

II.

'At that time Walt Whitman was sixty-seven or sixty-eight years old, and a whole generation has gone by since he began to write "Leaves of Grass." He looked much older than his years, for the experiences he had gone through in the Civil War, reflected in the series of war poems he called "Drum Taps," had proved a heavy drain upon his robust constitution. The illness that followed affected his limbs—a hard visitation for a man of his build and temper, who loved to be in the open and follow a wandering life when the whim seized him. His consolation was, I gathered, to summon up the events and the stirring days that had been his when he was in his prime. He told me once he wished he had learnt in his younger days to smoke a pipe, because it would have helped him to pass the time and induce the flow of congenial excogitation. But he had always had a dread of anything that could in any degree, by either its narcotic or nervous effect, destroy the normal state of a man. One of his resources was to watch (as if he were in some degree still the world's imaginative historiographer) the course of human affairs in the newspapers on both sides the Atlantic. At times, indeed, he appeared to be sitting almost knee-deep in a litter of papers, periodicals, and books. Out of this sea it was that he fished up the copy of his works in two volumes, that now lies on the table here—a copy that he had used himself from time to time, and made thereby the more precious; whose pages still seem to breathe an air of his immediate presence, grave and kind, stately and retrospective.

III.

This is the "author's edition," that he published himself at Camden in 1876, with portraits from the life, and many fond personal touches to give it actuality. The title-page of the first volume itself bears a remarkable inscription, followed by his autograph, which commits him, as it were, to be the attendant spirit or genii of his book. A set of inscriptions follows, and the first of them contains in its three last lines the key to the special message of "Leaves of Grass":—

"Of life immense in passion, pulse, and power,
Cheerful—for freest action form'd, under the laws divine,
The modern man I sing!"

To a visitor from the Old World, anxious to believe that it, too, was potential, the old poet was, in expounding the idea laid down in this and other "Inscriptions," less uncompromising than might have been expected. Originally he had felt, no doubt, that America, to attain its spiritual freedom, and to find its own mark in poetry, would have to make a complete break with the past. These convictions came to be tempered afterwards, as he said, though he thought that they might be the "results of advancing age" or the reflections of an invalided soldier. "I see that this world of the West, as part of all, fuses inseparably with the East, and with all that went before, just as time does, and the ever-new and ever-old human race." But no doubt it was well for his work and for the expression of what he saw in American life with his own eyes, uttered in an idiom that was strenuously and even crudely his own, that he had not learnt to defer to other and foreign modes when he first set out to deliver his original message:—

"I am the poet of the Body;
And I am the poet of the Soul."

"The pleasures of heaven are with me, and the pains of hell are with me;
The first I graft and increase upon myself—the latter I translate into a new tongue."

"I am the poet of the woman the same as the man,
And I say it is as great to be a woman as to be a man,
And I say there is nothing greater than the mother of men. . . ."

This occurs in the poem which he calls Walt Whitman, which is the most daring testament of a man's personality, his passions, appetites, hopes, desires, and physical conditions ever set down in a book. No one but he who made it could explain the way in which it was made. But the cumulative power of its fifty-two cantos is great and undeniable. It is a document from a life in which the civil refinements, the niceties and beauties of language, are flagrantly and almost brutally ignored. To revert to the idea of the inspired son of earth, one pictures him as one who has his feet on the earth, and who is not ashamed of the things of the earth; one who is going to use his animal instincts and his crudest powers to enable him to seize upon reality and to make that reality the door of his approach to the house of the spirit and to the Mount of Vision.

"THE PRETENDERS," BY HENRIK IBSEN, AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE

It was a bold and worthy thing on the part of Mr. Frederick Harrison to give us "The Pretenders" at his theatre. Bold, because the drama is on so great a scale that its production was a tremendous undertaking; worthy, because the work is so great an achievement of so great a man that, as Mr. William Archer says in his note in the programme, its production relieves "the English stage of a long-standing reproach." Every lover of noble art will be glad that, at last, someone has had the courage to attempt it, for in its profound searching of the human soul, in its wide emotional range, in depth of passion as well as in mere craftsmanship, it is one of the masterpieces of the last century. It was written in 1863, when Ibsen was still a young man, when he was suffering poverty, disappointment, and every extreme hardship, and when the lyrical poet that he was by gift of nature was being destroyed within him, or, if not destroyed, yet embittered and turned out of the proper course. If this play be, as some say, the outcome of his own sad experiences at the time, it is none the worse for that. It may be that in the Earl Skule we can see Ibsen himself, conscious of his great gifts, yet consumed with doubts and hesitations as to his own calling, and jealous of the amazing success of his friend and rival Bjornsen. It may be; but the play is great not because of what we can read into it, but because it has a great subject.

The action of the play is set in Norway of the thirteenth century, in a heroic age, in which the primitive and essential qualities of the soul are more easily discerned than they are amid the complexities of modern life. The chief characters are men, and two of them are among the supreme creations of the human mind. The women are of minor importance, though not devoid of interest, and have little in common with the characters in his later plays that have made Ibsen a questionable name in the suburbs.

The study of Earl Skule is that of a man with "wisdom and courage and all noble gifts of the mind," whose life was laid waste by doubt. He was the unsuccessful Pretender; but could he have believed in himself with that "firm and unswerving faith in himself" that he admired so much in the successful Hakon, he might still have been a king; or could he have believed in the undoubted "right" of this rival to the kingship, his restless soul would have been quiet, he would have bowed his head and served him, "In God's name—king he should remain." The self-torturing of the man and the manner in which he endeavours to overcome his evil doubts make a character study of the highest quality. He is urged by the Bishop to act as though he had faith in himself: "Speak as though you had it, swear great oaths that you have it." But no! it is useless, he must convince himself first. He sees how it is with the fortunate man, his rival: "Ay, does not everything thrive with him? Does not everything shape itself for the best when he is concerned? Even the peasants note it; they say the trees bear fruit twice, and the fowls hatch out two broods every summer, whilst Hakon is king." This Hakon is, indeed, doing good service for Norway; the land, harried by rebellious factions, is being restored to peace. The realm is becoming united. But he has greater ideas. Norway is like a church that stands as yet unconsecrated. He will consecrate it. "Norway has been a kingdom, it shall become a people. . . . That is the task which God has laid on my shoulders; that is the work which now lies before the King of Norway." Skule, when he hears that, is overwhelmed by the idea.

SKULE: To unite . . . all Norway? 'Tis impossible! Norway's saga tells of no such thing!

HAKON: For you 'tis impossible, for you can but work out the old saga afresh; for me 'tis as easy as for the falcon to cleave the clouds.

SKULE (in uneasy agitation): To unite the whole people—to awaken it so that it shall know itself one! Whence got you so strange a thought? It runs through me like ice and fire.

Then a mad idea comes to the Earl: can he steal the king's thought? can that thought become his own? will a thought like that make men believe in him and make him believe in himself? "Can one man take God's calling from another, as he takes weapons and gold from his fallen foe? Can a Pretender clothe himself in a king's life-task, as he can put on the kingly mantle?" A barren woman, he has heard, may adopt a child, and love it until it becomes as her very own. "I am as a barren woman. Therefore I love Hakon's kingly thought-child, love it with the warmest passion of my soul. Oh, that I could but adopt it!" He wrecks his life over this idea, and discovers in the end the truth of what a poet told him at the beginning: "A man can die for another's life-work; but if he go on living, he must live for his own." And at last, when, defeated and alone, he seeks sanctuary at Elgesøeter Convent from the swords of his enemies, he sees the path clear; at last all doubts vanish from him, and he goes out with a quiet heart, though with a broken spirit, to meet his death: "Not in the sanctuary of Elgesøeter will I cast me down and beg for grace of an earthly king. I must into the mighty church roofed with the vault of stars, and 'tis the King of kings I must implore for grace and mercy over all my life-work." Mr. Laurence Irving played the part with rare ability. He has a genius for characters in which the soul is at war with itself, and his face, so much like a mask, can express every fine shade of the subtle workings of the mind. He upheld the nobility of the character even in its deepest anguish, so that it never once became mean. It was an admirable piece of work in every respect.

If Skule is far and away the character of chief interest in the play, Bishop Nicholas is created with an equal perfection of art. He is a consummate scoundrel, whose scoundrelism is as deep as his nature. A soldier who could not fight because he lacked courage, a sensual man without physical powers, he became a priest, for "king or priest must that man be who would have all might in his hands." He has no capacity but for wickedness, and his life was spent in plotting in the State and in ministering to the evil spirit of man. There shall be no fine men, "here shall no giant be; for I was never a giant!"

I have said little about the Haymarket production, because, although it has more than a little merit, it is not so much to my mind that I can praise it without qualification. But for all that, after all only a matter of mere personal taste, I would urge all who have any care for the literary quality of the theatre to give this play their support. They will surely not regret it. To come into contact with so rare a work is to experience an enlargement of the spirit.

C. B. PURDOM.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM * * * BY PROF. JOHN ADAMS

HUXLEY'S figure of the educational ladder, with one end in the university and the other in the gutter, has gripped the imagination of the English people, and has very definitely influenced Lord Haldane in his recent speech at Manchester. He desires to organise our education so that it may form a whole, and not, as at present, a group of more or less independent systems. He believes that our university centres are in a sufficiently healthy state to enable us to work from them downwards in our efforts to unify our system. But there are those who think that, so far as efficiency is concerned, the movement should rather come from below upwards. Amid the general gloom about our education it is pleasant to read the handsome certificate of an American writer (Dr. A. C. Perry), who, in his "Outlines of School Administration," published last year, tells us "England is the foremost nation in the world in its provision of educational facilities of preliminary grade." Our elementary schools are, perhaps, not so good as they will be when they have quite recovered from the paralysis caused by the old system of payment by the results of individual examination, but they can at least stand comparison with those of any of the other great countries.

If, then, we are sound at the top and at the bottom, the trouble must be sought in the intermediate stages. But here, again, curiously enough, we find that foreigners are not quite sure that our secondary schools, though sadly lacking in the symmetrical organisation that marks the Continental systems, may not be, after all, in at least some respects, superior to anything to be found elsewhere. The healthy, open-air element in our scheme certainly appeals to those who see the evils of a too exclusively academic system; and in France, at any rate, we have our imitators, while the Germans undoubtedly have a certain envy of our more elastic arrangements. What is wanted with us is, not so much the introduction of a system that will reduce all our schools to the same type as the establishment of such a form of organisation as shall preserve the present variety of schools and yet give every child in the country the opportunity of obtaining the best education he is able to receive.

I.

To begin with, we cannot be content with one educational ladder; we want several. It should not be necessary to proceed to the university by way of the gutter. Again, the great mass of the pupils in our elementary schools have neither the ability nor the desire to go on to a higher academic course. For them the elementary school should provide a training complete in itself, and having no necessary reference to secondary or university work. Somewhat the same thing may be said about the great majority of those who attend secondary schools. Hitherto the needs of the pupils who were to proceed to the university have in too many cases determined the course of those (the vast majority) who had no thought of a university career. In America it is said that every boy has to be educated as a potential President of the United States, and in England it might almost as truly be said that every boy at a secondary school must be educated as a potential college don. Arrangements must be made to keep open the passage to the White House and the university, but these little side ladders must not monopolise the space that ought to be filled with ladders leading direct to various other departments of social activity. This contention does not necessarily lead to vocational education. The work in schools may be of a purely general character, and yet have a certain bearing on the kind of life the pupil is likely to lead afterwards.

II.

From the teacher's point of view there is here a great difficulty. Many maintain that, if a pupil is to enter upon a secondary course, the sooner he starts upon it the better. If they are to have them at all, secondary schoolmasters are always keen to get recruits from the elementary schools at the earliest possible age. Probably the need for this early transfer from elementary to secondary schools will be less urgent as the elementary curriculum is improved. There is a very general belief now, among those who have studied the subject with some care, that a great deal too much time has hitherto been spent on the mere instrumental subjects, the so-called three R.'s, and that these would be all the better taught if they were treated more as the instrumental subjects they really are. If this view gains ground, there is nothing to hinder the elementary stages at a primary school closely resembling those at a secondary school, so that pupils might pass easily from the one to the other. In certain parts of Germany at the present moment there is an outcry for what is called the Einheitsschule, that is, a school that is common to all, and is suitable for the preliminary training of all the pupils of a country, whatever their later and higher education may be. The Americans actually have the Einheitsschule as an integral part of their system, and of late it almost appears as if they are not quite sure that they altogether like it. In any case, however, the elementary schools of this country ought certainly to be worked on the principle of the Einheitsschule. After completing the course there, the pupils ought to be qualified by their training to proceed to any higher course for which they are fitted.

III.

But the social question has also to be faced. After a democratic Government has done everything to secure equal opportunities for acquiring intellectual training, there will remain the social disqualifications of accent, manner, and other less patent results of a narrow home-life. Only the very best pupils will be able to rise above these disadvantages, and many will be content that this should be so. Removal from the family circle may seem too high a price to pay for a somewhat ill-defined advantage. The civic universities will, no doubt, do their share on the social side, though they will necessarily come short of the possibilities of the older universities. But, after all, the relative lack of polish in the produce of the Scottish universities and their younger English equivalents is compensated by a certain rugged strength that very usually accompanies it.

By the way, Lord Haldane is to be thanked for the name he has applied to our newer universities. These object strongly to the term "provincial," while "municipal" smacks too much of a Town Council institution. "Modern" is too vague, but now "civic" fills the gap. It suggests Rome and Venice at their best, so Lord Haldane has deserved well of the universities of this type. His plan of increasing the number of these universities and of making them the centres of educational organisation throughout the country, somewhat after the French pattern, without its centralisation, should prove very satisfactory. It has been tried in Scotland in the somewhat limited field of the training of teachers, and is still on its trial there. In its wider application it must be worked on generous lines. The universities must guide, but they must not dominate. The teachers and the educated public must have their share in the control. At the present moment there is in existence a newly constituted body, called the Teachers' Registration Council, which is made up of forty-four representative persons. The main function of this body is to draw up and maintain a register of teachers. But, in the official order which called it into being, there is at least a suggestion that it may proceed to exercise wider functions, and become, in fact, the body representing all the teaching interests of the country. It has eleven representatives from the universities, eleven from the secondary schools, and eleven from the primary. The remaining eleven represent all the more or less technical kinds of teaching, such as art, music, manual work. This body would very naturally find its place as a unifying element in the proposed organisation. The elements of a successful scheme are all there. Lord Haldane has the necessary organising skill and experience; the one thing now needful is money. Many millions must be spent, and there will be a temptation to spend them in the way that will produce the most dramatic effects. Fine buildings are the most fatal lure; they always appear to show value for the money. But certain vital improvements can be procured only at a great outlay, with no compensating display. For example, the most urgent need of popular education at present is the reduction in the size of classes in the elementary schools. For the democracy nothing in educational organisation is so important as this. The change will swallow up millions, and will have no dramatic effect. But if the people are wise they will see to it that this reform has at least its fair share of the millions Lord Haldane hopes to handle.

FANTASY

(From the French of Gerard de Nerval.)

IT is an air for which I'd give unsought,
The best that Mozart or Rossini wrote,
An old-time melody, whose sweet, sad note
Comes to my heart with subtle meanings fraught.

So, oft-times when I hear its tender strain,
I seem to live two hundred years ago,
When Louis treize was king . . . I see again,
Behind a verdant slope, the sun sink low.

And then, within a park whose silver stream
Wanders among the flowers that thread its brink,
Is builded from the substance of my dream,
A house with casements glowing softly pink.

And, at her window high a lady leans,
A lady fair, in gown of long ago,
Whom, in some other life, amid such scenes,
I loved, maybe—a lady whom I know!

N. S. M.

NEW LIGHT ON EARLY ENGLISH HISTORY*

THIS is a book which would have gladdened the heart of Stubbs. It is an eloquent protest against the perfunctory and slipshod manner in which many historians have treated the early history of our islands no less than a rousing appeal for a more thoroughgoing study of contemporary sources. The writer, a laborious student with critical insight, spacious knowledge, and a close acquaintance with scientific methods of research, says quite bluntly that the first twelve centuries of British history have, "through the neglect of authorities, become such a muddle that all historians, hopeless of making any sense of it, skip over it as quickly as possible."

When we came across this statement in the introductory chapter we were inclined to regard it as very wide of the mark, but as we read on we found there was more truth in it than we had supposed. Mr. Jeudwine brings forward convincing proof to show that there can be no adequate appreciation of early British history without treating the islands as a whole in the light of an enormous number of original authorities, of which the average British reader knows little or nothing.

In confining their attention for the most part to the monastic records of England, writers on this period have, our author maintains, neglected two-thirds of the materials available. He is of opinion that the monastic writings, taken by themselves, give a very one-sided view of the beginnings of British history, whereas when supplemented by the Scandinavian Sagas, the Irish Annals, and the records of other parts, they form a fairly complete story. Most historians, we are also asked to believe, have committed the unpardonable sin in neglecting the Scandinavian Sagas, records founded on oral tradition, and the Irish Annals, "compiled from undoubtedly ancient sources no longer existing."

"Without the light thrown on the subject in records from without England, the story of the Scandinavian invasion of the ninth to the eleventh centuries, which affected every part of all the islands, becomes a dry and misleading tale of isolated encounters and treacheries."

Mr. Jeudwine's book, then, is nothing short of an attempt to rewrite the story of the British islands as a whole down to the accession of Henry II. in 1154, the facts being drawn largely from a mass of contemporary evidence which previous historians have not sifted. We cannot here follow Mr. Jeudwine in his sketch and criticism of the social and political conditions of this complicated and difficult period. Suffice it to say that he has made a contribution to historical scholarship which no future historian of the first twelve centuries of our story can ignore. The introductory chapter takes the form of a bibliography.

But while praising Mr. Jeudwine's diligence in research, we cannot say that his narrative is particularly readable. He has not the talent for picturesque writing of a Green, and he does not marshal his facts in the most effective manner. The result is that there are occasional lapses into dullness, while obscure passages are not infrequent. In the main details he is usually accurate. His knowledge of Scotland, however, is capable of improvement. At page 301 we are informed that St. Margaret established a ferry to take pilgrims across the Forth to the abbey of St. Andrews. It ought, of course, to be the abbey of Dunfermline. Again, Iona is described (page 45) as a "now barren little island."

* "The First Twelve Centuries of British Story." By J. W. Jeudwine. 12s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

LONDON'S SATURDAY NIGHT

THE mammoth crowds have come home, hoarse but happy, from the great football matches at Tottenham, the Palace, or Stamford Bridge—have come home, and gone out again—and the streets are thronged now with a mighty concourse that streams into picture palaces, restaurants, bars, and music-halls. In a hundred small houses, in as many mean streets, a tired mother has laboriously heated water and bathed her numerous and begrimed offspring, and now puts on her bonnet and shawl and takes her basket to do the Saturday night's shopping in one of London's many street-markets. Here all is light and cheer. The stalls, brilliant with gas-flares, illuminate the sky, and everything, from a bunch of violets to a stewed eel, can be purchased for a modest sum. "Hall fresh from our own farm ter day, me dears," shouts a burly greengrocer; "Hall alive and caught this morning," yells the fishmonger. "Hullo, ole dear," says a robust matron to a little pale-faced woman, "'ow goes it? Bad? Never mind, ole pet, things is dear, but were still alive an' kicking." The London street stalls are a wonderful sight. The poor shop at them for their Sunday dinner and buy their vegetables for the week. Good temper reigns supreme. Now and again the stall-keeper waxes sarcastic at the expense of a too particular customer. "Wants 'em all picked art and tested fer nix a pouns, she do," or "Ho, never mind me, I ain't serposed ter be on the earf, I ain't. I gives 'em away wif overweight, I do, and lives on hair, I don't fink." A little rough, a trifle sordid, perhaps, but the lights and shouting, the good humour and the keen bargaining, make the street-markets withal one of the most fascinating scenes in the life of the most fascinating and delightful city that this tired old world knows.

* * *

In the workmen's clubs, the entertainment halls are densely packed with a perspiring audience, who listen intently to a variety entertainment or watch delightedly a company of amateurs wrestling with a Pinero play or a comedy of manners. These "side-shows"—unsuspected of the ordinary man—account for many thousands of pleasure-seekers, but they are as but a drop in the ocean to the myriads who throng the halls—the gorgeous suburban "Empires" that have sprung up like mushrooms in the last ten years—and who sit drinking in greedily every word of the entertainment, straining their ears so that they do not miss a note of the music. There is something almost feverish in the intensity with which they watch the show—the one little patch of colour and movement in the whole of their parched, drab lives. They take their pleasure fiercely, as though each moment might be their last, in strange contrast, indeed, to the painfully bored youths, immaculately flannelled, whom summer and Saturday find with a perfectly gowned damsel in a smart punt up the river—often, alas! to get entangled with pleasure steamers and to be ordered to go home "to mother."

* * *

All sorts of strange old-world survivals are to be found on Saturday in London if you only know where to look for them. For instance, in one of those quaint courts that are to be found to right and left of Fleet Street, there meet in a hall at the back of a Bohemian tavern the "Ancient and Honourable Society of Cogers." There is a delightful informality about the proceedings, for the society is one of the few, the very few, old-fashioned debating clubs left in our midst, where for a modest sum a man may obtain entrance and something to drink. Charles, the waiter, who has been here one does not know how many years, can remember all sorts of distinguished men coming down to the "Barley Mow" to practise speaking and to perfect impromptus. The tall, saturnine form of Parnell has, it is said, stalked up the hall, where the members still sit smoking the old churchwardens of a former generation, interrupting and dissenting freely, or rising to imaginary points of order, what time the Opener deals with the one and only subject permitted, "The Events of the Week," in which he surveys mankind from China to Peru—to be followed by a host of ruthless critics, who riddle his arguments from every standpoint, till at last Charles and the Licensing Act cry halt!

* * *

But the Cogers would seem quite a dreary place to the hundreds and thousands of men and women, boys and girls, who, cooped up in the City all the week, hear the country calling on Saturday, and turn with devout thankfulness to the blessed relief which it gives them from the roar and fret and bustle of the town. The typist loses the strained, hard expression she wears as a rule, and her eyes become soft and limpid, her lips tremulous and womanly. She dons her freshest blouse and shadiest hat, and with her girl friend tubes it to Hampstead or trams it to Kew, there to forget for a while the carking cares of business; to take tea, perhaps, in the gardens—and to feel young again. Her father, one is pretty certain, is at work in a garden of his own, if he has one—for, from the bank manager at Muswell Hill to the workman at Stepney, Saturday means a long afternoon in the garden—and pathetic indeed it is to see the man who, really loving flowers and to rear them, tends with gentle care the few sickly shoots that have forced their way through the black soil.

* * *

The restaurants are crowded up West on Saturday night. From Mayfair comes a stream of cabs, motors, taxis, with beautifully gowned women and well-groomed men. Shoals of young Jewish tailors and tailoresses stream in from the East and fill the Italian cafés. The band at the Trocadero are surrounded, and urged not to stop playing. At the Corner House there is standing room only, and Gambrinis is full up. Outside, the streets are thronged with pleasure-seekers, who watch the exteriors of the great theatres, fascinated with their light and colour. But these fade away, the restaurants empty, and the little groups, who return from watching the star actor or actress leave the stage door, find the multitude on the main street hurrying home.

* * *

Gradually quietude steals over the city. The roar of the traffic ceases to reverberate. Down the dark river the tugs slacken and heave to. A hush has settled on the park, where the orators have thundered all day. The wearied commercial, home from the North after a hard week, falls asleep in the last Tube to the Bush, and the policeman patrolling the silent corridor of the empty Law Courts wonders if anywhere in the world a deeper peace can be found than that which has descended on the temple of confusion. The last 'buses have ceased speeding through the streets at breakneck pace. At the clubs James is putting out the lights. A calm has fallen on the city and enveloped it like a mantle; for London is asleep.

QUEEN HORTENSE * * BY GUY DE MAUPASSANT

SHE was known as Queen Hortense to the people of Argenteuil. No one knew why. Perhaps it was because she spoke in the peremptory tones of a drill-sergeant; perhaps because in appearance she was an aggressive, hard-featured, dictatorial woman; perhaps because she ruled a veritable kingdom of domestic pets, dogs, cats and poultry, parrots and canaries, and all such animals as are dear to an old maid's heart. However, she lavished no foolish fondness on her pets, no endearing names, no loving kisses, such as one sometimes sees a woman press to the velvet coat of a purring pussy. Rather she ruled her pets with a rod of iron; she was, indeed, their sovereign lord and master. When any of them met with an accidental death or died of old age she would replace them at once without a tear or a sigh of regret, and would bury the departed pet in one of her flower-beds. She would dig the grave herself, and heap the earth above it with a contemptuous thrust of her foot.

For thirty years she had occupied the same tiny house, with its narrow strip of garden stretching to the street in front. During that space of time she had never once altered her habits or mode of life. The only change observable was in the matter of her maids, who, one and all, she ruthlessly discharged when they had attained their twenty-first year. She would spend whole days doing a man's work, either at gardening, carpentering, sawing or chopping wood. She would even plaster her somewhat dilapidated dwelling when it got out of repair.

She possessed a few acquaintances in Argenteuil, civil service clerks' wives, mostly, whose husbands used to go up to Paris every day. Occasionally she was invited out to their parties; but invariably fell asleep at these functions, and had to be forcibly awakened when it was time to go home. She would never consent to an escort, either, for she feared nothing in this world.

She was a typical old maid, in fact, with her abrupt manner and ugly, grating voice. Her very soul seemed withered. Curt and decisive in speech, she never showed hesitation or indifference, listlessness or fatigue. She had never been heard to complain or rail against the decrees of fate, and often declared in the most fatalistic manner that each one of us fills his own particular place in the world. She never went inside a church, and had no love for the priesthood. In fact, she scarcely believed in the existence of a God, and religious objects were her pet abhorrence. She never appeared to have any especial fondness for children, either.

She had two sisters, who came to see her twice a year, Mme. Cimme and Mme. Colombel. The former was married to a teacher of botany; the latter to a man of small, independent means. The Cimmes had no children; the Colombels had three, Henry, Pauline, and Joseph. Henry was twenty years of age, Pauline was eighteen, and Joseph only three. The old maid, however, showed no fondness for her relatives.

In the spring of 1882 Queen Hortense suddenly fell ill. The neighbours hurriedly sent for a doctor, whom she promptly sent about his business. A priest, who hastily arrived on the scene, was accorded a similar welcome. Her little maid-of-all-work, driven to distraction, kept bringing her hot drinks. After three days the case became so serious that a working man in the neighbourhood, acting on the doctor's instructions—the latter had forcibly installed himself—hastened to bring the news to her relatives. About ten o'clock the following morning her two sisters arrived by the same train. The Colombels brought with them their baby son, Joseph.

When they reached the garden gate the first thing they saw was the maid weeping copiously. A dog was sleeping on the hall mat. Two cats dozed on the window-sill, tails and paws extended. A fat, clucking hen was conducting her fluffy, yellow brood through the garden, and an immense cage, adorned with chickweed, was nailed to the wall, and contained a regular colony of birds, that were screaming themselves hoarse in the dazzling sunlight of a spring morning. In an adjacent cage, built in the form of a chalet, a pair of gentle lovebirds seemed glued to their perch, so motionless were they.

M. Cimme, a stout, blustering fellow, who invariably pushed himself forward wherever he went, exclaimed at sight of the maid:

"Come, come, Celeste, this will never do!"

The little handmaiden groaned through her tears: "She no longer recognises me! The doctor says it is the end."

The relatives glanced at each other on hearing this. Mmes. Cimme and Colombel silently embraced. These two sisters were very much alike in appearance. They had always cultivated straight fringes, and had a decided fondness for bright red cashmere shawls of a most vivid hue. Cimme turned to his brother-in-law—a lean, pallid individual, dyspeptic and a cripple—and said, in a decided tone of voice:

"My word! It was high time!"

None of them had the courage to enter the sick room. Even Cimme held back, and it was Colombel who eventually decided to do so. Leaning heavily on his stick, he hobbled across the hall to the bedroom on the ground floor. The ladies then followed, and Cimme brought up the rear. The youngster, Joseph, fascinated by the sight of the dog, remained outside.

Within, the sun shone full on the bed, and lit upon the nervous, restless hands, whose twitching seemed to speak of an uneasy mind within, a fevered, troubled spirit. The angular lines of her figure showed beneath the coverlet, quite still and motionless. Her eyes remained fast closed.

The visitors gathered round the bed in silence, and prepared to spend some time waiting. The little servant stood in the background, still weeping copiously. Cimme asked her what verdict precisely the doctor had given. Falteringly she replied that he had given strict orders that the patient was to be kept perfectly quiet, as nothing more could be done.

Soon the old maid's lips were seen to move. She appeared to be voicelessly forming certain words and disconnected phrases. Her hands began to twitch even more excitedly. At length, in a thin, quavering voice, she spoke, a voice they scarcely recognised as hers, a voice that seemed to come from afar—from the depths of a long pent-up heart, perchance. . . .

Cimme hastily tiptoed out of the room. The situation was becoming too painful for him. Colombel, whose lameness had wearied him out, took a seat. The two ladies remained standing.

Meanwhile Queen Hortense still prattled on rapidly and unintelligibly. She uttered some names, a great many names, and lovingly spoke to several imaginary people. . . . "Come here, little Philip! Give mother a kiss! You're fond of mammy, aren't you? And Rose! Be sure and look after your little sister when I'm out. Don't leave her alone, you understand? Remember, too, you're not to touch the matches." . . . She became silent again for a while, and then in louder tones called "Henriette!" She waited a little before resuming. . . . "Tell your father to come to me before he goes to the office." . . . Then, "I am feeling ill to-day, dear; don't be late coming home. Tell the chief I'm ill. You know it's not safe to leave the children by themselves when I'm not about. I will make a rice pudding for dinner. The children love it. Won't Claire be delighted!" . . . She began to laugh, a gay, infectious laugh, a laugh she had never known in her life. . . . "Do look at Jean! How funny he looks with his face all jammy, the grubby little atom! Look, dear, how quaint he is!" . . .

Colombel, who kept shifting uneasily in his chair, for his lame leg had grown stiff after the journey, whispered:

"She fancies she has children and a husband. The end is near at hand now!"

Her two sisters, paralysed with astonishment, did not stir from their places at the bedside. The servant murmured timidly:

"Won't you take off your bonnets and shawls and come into the parlour?"

They nodded assent, and left the room silently. Colombel followed, and once more the sick woman was left alone. Her voice was still audible. She seemed to be living at this, her last hour, the life she must have been awaiting always. She was saying good-bye to her happy fancies, her fond day-dreams, for now the time was at hand when hope and desire must cease.

Meanwhile Cimme romped in the garden with little Joseph and the dog, with all the boisterous hilarity of a tripper out for the day and without a single thought for the unhappy woman who lay at death's door. However, he soon tired of this, and, coming into the house, called to the maid:

"Aren't we going to get anything to eat, girl? Ladies! what would you like?"

They eventually decided on an omelet, some cutlets, with new potatoes, cheese, and coffee. Mme. Cimme fumbled in her pocket for her purse, but Cimme stopped her, and, turning to the maid, said:

"You have money, haven't you?"

"Yes, sir."

"How much?"

"Fifteen francs, sir."

"That is enough, then. Make haste, for I'm hungry."

Mme. Cimme pensively contemplated a pair of amorous doves on the roof opposite, and, gazing wistfully at the creepers outside glistening in the sunshine, remarked in depressed tones:

"What a pity we came down on such a gloomy business! It would have been so nice to have spent the day in the country."

Her sister sighed, but made no response. Colombel, whose lameness annoyed him greatly, started grumbling:

"My leg plagues me infernally."

Little Joseph and the dog were making a tremendous uproar outside, the child yelling with glee, whilst the dog barked madly as they scampered round the flower-beds playing hide-and-seek.

Queen Hortense continued to address her imaginary children, chatting to each in turn, imagining that she was scolding them, dressing them, or teaching them to read. . . . "Now, Simon, repeat A, B, C, D. You don't say the D properly. D, D, D! Now, say it again. . . ."

Cimme remarked, "It is strange what fancies one has at such a time."

Mme. Colombel asked if they had not better go back to the sickroom. But Mme. Cimme dissuaded her.

"What for? You can't do anything for her. We might as well stay where we are."

No one seemed anxious to press the matter. Mme. Cimme turned aside to inspect a pair of lovebirds. She drew attention to their singular fidelity in the most praiseworthy terms, and made scathing remarks at the expense of men in general, so different in this respect. Cimme guffawed at this, as if admitting his own discrepancies to be no small matter. Colombel tapped the ground with his stick, for just then he was seized with a bad attack of cramp.

At one o'clock they sat down to lunch. When he had tasted the wine, Colombel, who, on account of his health, was recommended to drink Burgundy, rang for the maid, and said:

"Is there no better wine than this in the house, girl?"

"Yes, sir; there is a special brand which the mistress would open if you were coming here on a visit."

"Good. Go and fetch three bottles of it."

This wine, when brought, pleased their palates mightily, not that it was of any special vintage, but it had been bottled fifteen years. Cimme declared it to be the ideal wine for an invalid, and Colombel, seized with a burning desire to possess this treasure, inquired of the maid:

"How much of it is left?"

"Nearly all, sir," she replied. "Mam'zelle never drank any of it."

He at once turned to his brother-in-law and offered him anything he liked in exchange for the lot, "for," said he, "it agrees with me beautifully."

Meanwhile the two ladies amused themselves throwing crumbs at a hen that had marched into the room at the head of her chickens. Joseph and the dog, who had both had enough to eat, were sent out again to the garden. Queen Hortense still babbled on incessantly, but in such a low voice that it was impossible to catch what she said.

They waited till they had finished coffee before they went in again to ascertain the sick woman's condition. As she seemed calm once more, they all went out into the garden again, and settled themselves comfortably to digest their meal. The dog started scampering around, carrying something in his mouth. Little Joseph chased him wildly, and they both disappeared into the house. Cimme lay on his back on the grass, dozing in the drowsy afternoon heat.

Suddenly Queen Hortense was heard to raise her voice, calling aloud on someone. Then she started shrieking in a manner that brought the ladies, accompanied by Colombel, in from the garden in all haste. Cimme, though thoroughly aroused from his slumbers, did not seek to put himself about. He did not care for scenes.

They found Queen Hortense sitting up in bed, wild-eyed and haggard. In order to escape from the pursuit of little Joseph, her dog had leaped on to the bed, jumped across his dying mistress, and now, entrenched behind her pillow, eyed his pursuer with glistening eyes, ready to recommence the game. In his mouth he held his mistress's slipper, tattered and torn into shreds—his plaything of an hour. Her nephew, Joseph, frightened to see her sitting up so stiff and straight, stood paralysed with terror by the bedside.

Suddenly Queen Hortense shrieked:

"No, no, I won't die! I won't die! Who will bring up my children? Who'll look after them? Who is there to love them? No, I don't want to die! I don't want to die!"

She fell back. All was over.

FOOT'S

ADJUSTABLE REST-CHAIRS.

Automatic Adjustable Back.

"THE BURLINGTON" (Patented).

Simply press a button and the back declines, or automatically rises, to any position desired by the occupant. Release the button and the back is locked.

The arms open outwards, affording easy access and exit. The Leg Rest is adjustable to various inclinations, and can be used as a footstool. When not in use it slides under the seat.

The Front Table, Electric Light Attachment, Reading Desk and Side Tray are adjustable and removable. The only chair combining these conveniences, or that is so easily adjusted.

The Upholstery is exceptionally deep, with spring elastic edges.

Catalogue C 30 of Adjustable Chairs, Free.
171, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

Swift

Sure.

Have your suit made smart for EASTER by "Achille Serre."

In Four Days we will clean it thoroughly, removing all spots and stains, and tailor-press it so that it will look as good as new—for 3/9 inclusive.

Free collection and delivery by nearest Branch or Agent, or carriage paid one way if sent direct. Write for Illustrated Booklet. A postcard will do.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

16.

CORRESPONDENCE

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The article by Prof. Eucken on "The Improvement of Anglo-German Relations," while presenting no new aspect, is stimulating and inspiring.

I am democratic enough to believe that, in Britain at any rate, the power for future good or evil, for peace or war, is held by the mass of the people rather than by the "upper tens" of the political, economic, or academic worlds. I am glad, therefore, when Prof. Eucken lays emphasis upon the "tongue and pen." I would be the last to discredit the effectiveness of the bonds which the interaction of philosophic thought and higher culture has laid upon the souls of the two peoples, but I look eagerly amongst the millions who are but distantly and indirectly touched by these bonds for a sign of the awakening sense of common interest, common aspiration, and cousinship.

Fourteen or fifteen years ago the interest in the study of the German language in the secondary schools and academies of Scotland was at high-tide mark, such as had not been seen before, nor has been seen since. In a large industrial town, I was privileged at that time to know the glamour of a new and priceless literature, feeding hungry young minds like my own with a living interest in a great people, wonderfully new, yet wonderfully near. The interest in German was such that almost every educational centre was called upon to afford room and shelter for the coteries of young men, who, banded together in more or less recognised circles, gave their evening hours to the earnest purpose of getting at the heart of the German language, literature, and everything German. These circles were auxiliaries to the actual classes carried on in every school, academy, and college, daytime and evening-time, and if the mental discipline observed came short of the purely academic standard, the more lasting attainment of a broad outlook and versatile interest was achieved.

Nor was the energy of these circles entirely absorptive; in the fullness of our enthusiasm much was done in the way of the popular lecture, the literary society paper, the local journal reviews and translations. The German community in the town, hitherto so conservative, came out in full cordiality to meet and reciprocate our interrogative interests. There is an Anglo-German intercourse in that northern town to-day freer and higher than I have witnessed anywhere else in the country. The suggestion of hostility (and here is my lesson) towards the nation which added so richly to our homely interests in poetry and prose, art and drama, became an unspeakable absurdity. Of the score or so of associates then in my own particular circle I cannot to-day think of one whose outlook on the Anglo-German relationship has been perverted or even dimmed by this whole pageant of warlike attitudes.

Is a revival of such interest as I have briefly indicated beyond the scope of organisation? To be of any immediate use I consider that it should be made primarily a matter of local organisation, partaking, as far as possible, of a popular nature. Twenty young men in a town, with a definite and vigorous propaganda, can make more impression for good on the minds of the public than half a dozen academic societies. I am certain of it, because I have worked for both.

The public owe you a debt, sir, for your obvious intention to exert your influence in this matter of Anglo-German relations.—I am, sir, etc., SCOT.

CHILDREN AND MUSIC-HALLS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Macpherson's article on the problem of the child has brought to my mind a very great hindrance in connection with the education of children in poor districts, namely, the third-rate music-hall.

The theatre is generally admitted to be a legitimate source of amusement to adults, and even in some cases to children, but it is very questionable whether the music-hall, especially of the suburban third-rate type, has the slightest influence for good, even to adults.

I happen to be a teacher at a school in Canning Town, one of the poorest districts in East London, and I discovered that sixty per cent. of the children in Standards 3 and 4 (average age, nine years) are frequenters of music-halls of a type which I am convinced can only tend to demoralise even those who have come to the years of discretion. These boys, during their childhood, develop a permanent taste for what is vulgar, despite all the teacher may do to direct their mental energy into more wholesome paths.

This is by no means an isolated case—the evil exists in most poor districts. Can nothing be done to arrest this degenerating influence?—I am, sir, etc.,

East Ham.

CHARLES JONES.

DOWRY QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The custom of a bride bringing a dowry to her husband at marriage is prevalent not only in France, but on the Continent generally, and among all classes. In most Continental countries the dowry generally becomes the property of the husband, or is administered by him, he having a right to use the interest. The chief advantages and disadvantages of the custom may be stated briefly, my observations being drawn from the effects in German life.

The advantages are: (1) The danger of early and improvident marriages among the poor is lessened, even servant girls often bringing a decent sum to contribute to the setting up of the home. (2) The struggle to acquire sufficient means to marry is lightened for men of the middle classes without private means. They are not condemned to long years of engagement, and, in so far as happy marriage is a deterrent to vice, morality is raised. (3) Habits of thrift are encouraged among women who provide their dowries from the fruit of their own labour. (4) The idea of mutual responsibility in marriage is encouraged.

The disadvantages are: (1) The dowry comes to be looked upon as one of the chief considerations in seeking a wife. (2) The burden of providing dowries for their daughters falls heavily on middle-class fathers of limited means, where it is not considered genteel for the girls to earn their own living. (3) Improvidence is encouraged among young men. The money that should be saved to found a home is wasted in various forms of dissipation, the future wife's dowry always being counted upon.

In England, where marriage does not cancel a woman's complete control of her own money, it might be that the disadvantages mentioned might be modified, and the advantages increased, should the dowry custom be introduced.—I am, sir, etc.,

Austria.

ELLIS ALDON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am afraid that your lady contributor, Mme. Geofroy, is somewhat prejudiced in her statements about the "Dowry Question in France."

There is no denying that some men marry for the

MARK TWAIN AND BAD HAND-WRITING.

WONDERFUL ALUMINIUM TYPEWRITER.

A WEEK'S FREE TRIAL AT YOUR HOME.

The late Mark Twain said, when he was shown the handwriting of Christopher Columbus, "I don't think much of it; besides, I can't read it."

We can all say this of 90 per cent. of the handwriting we have to read daily. Most of it is decidedly a "Bother" and a "Bore" to read, and perhaps it is for this reason why many gain the reputation of being "bad correspondents."

Lately there has been placed on the market a typewriting machine called the "Aluminium Blick," and the great number of these machines that have been sold to Clergymen, Authors, Journalists, Army and Navy men, War Correspondents, Society ladies and gentlemen for their secretaries, and to Travellers, commercial and otherwise, proves conclusively not only the merits of the machine, but the ever-growing demand for the typewriter in the home, which is a blessing to many and a boon to all whose writing resembles even remotely that of Christopher Columbus.

The "Aluminium Blick" is not a common, everyday, cumbersome typewriter usually associated with offices. On the contrary, it shines like silver, weighs but 5 lbs., and is therefore very portable. The writing is visible, clean, and clear, exactly like all other typewriters. It has no ribbon to tear and tangle. It is strong and durable; in fact, it is guaranteed to last as long and wear better than the ordinary Office Typewriter that cost twice and thrice as much.

You can write on the "Blick" in English and any European language, Hebrew, and in many Oriental characters. You can have small or large size type, the former, of course, preferable for ministers or public speakers, but you can use them all on the same machine, changing at will from one to the other, and in an instant. Besides, every "Blick" has its handy travelling case, either a handsome leather case, with compartments for stationery, or its polished oak case.

With the "Blick" you can take as many copies of what you write as you desire, for the machine is a strong, excellent manifold, with perfect alignment, and it never gets out of order.

Few can realise what a wonderful and useful little machine the "Blick" really is. Free from superfluous metal, and being made of polished aluminium, it is aptly described as the "Featherweight Blick." You can take it from place to place as easily as you would a book; consequently you can use your "Blick" at your office, and when that is closed you can put it in its case and take it home, where you have it handy for further use, or in order that someone at home may assist you.

To learn how to operate and master the "Blick" is simplicity itself. Anyone and everyone can learn its keyboard and mechanism in an hour, it is so very simple.

Those who travel will quickly learn to appreciate the usefulness of the "Blick." Often have we seen an important and busy traveller with his "Blick" on his knees typing his correspondence, realising that it is impossible to write with pen or pencil in a rapidly moving train, but with the "Blick" such correspondence is quickly over, with the satisfaction that the tedious operation has been done during moments of leisure.

For the free loan of a machine at your home for a week, write to the makers, The Blick Typewriter Co., Ltd., 9 and 10, Cheapside, London, E.C., or to the West End Branch, 369, Oxford Street, and one of these bright Aluminium "Blicks" will be sent you carriage paid by return. An Illustrated Booklet, No. 10, telling all about the machine, will be sent on request.

GEORGE MEREDITH FREETHINKER

By G. W. Foote

A NEW POET (a working mechanic)

John Helston

A Stirring Article by

LORD ROBERTS

and Contributions by

MAURICE HEWLETT

GILBERT CANNAN

RICHARD WHITEING

are a FEW of the contents of the MARCH Number of the ENGLISH Review.

One Shilling.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS, comprising Books on Travel, Art, Biography, History, Antiquities, Exploration, Theology, &c., &c. All quite New as when originally published, but now offered at GREAT REDUCTION IN PRICE. MARCH CATALOGUE NOW READY, POST FREE ON APPLICATION.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD., Remainder and Discount Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Short-hand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

UNITARIAN PUBLICATIONS FREE.

"CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS."

Rev. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

"FIVE POINTS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH."

Dr. MARTINEAU.

These publications sent free, also information on Unitarianism. Apply by letter to Miss F. HILL, 36, Heath Street, Hampstead, London, N.W.

sake of their bride's dowry. But will the whole system be doomed to destruction owing to the mischief it works in the hands of a few scoundrels, regardless of the thousands to whom it affords happiness and prosperity? I venture to say that there are very few indeed who enter into matrimony with the sole and deliberate purpose of making a bargain. As a rule, young folk marry in their own social sphere; and, from their point of view, the money-question (which is generally settled by the parents) remains of minor importance. That kind of financial arrangement is purposed to ensure the material well-being and comfort of the young couple after marriage. At least ninety times out of a hundred it is by no means a sordid, miserly higgling, but a friendly discussion between the elders, who, in a conciliatory spirit, strive their utmost to reach a solution most beneficial to their children; generally, mutual love between the betrothed is, as it must be, the underlying basis of these family negotiations.

It is among the narrow-minded French "bourgeois," who identify riches with felicity, that the prejudice of the dowry is to be found at its worst; but it is practically non-existent among the people at large, as contrasted to the middle-class moneyed men.

On the other hand, it is not fair to throw (as Mme. Geofroy does) all the blame and responsibility of mis-using a thing good in itself on the shoulders of the man alone. There are female dowry-hunters as well, who pitilessly reject all suitors "too poor" ever to have a right to aspire to their hand.

If the dowry was to be suppressed, the subsequent evils of the measure would much outweigh its advantages; it would put a stop to dowry-hunting, no doubt; but would it "prevent the decay of the race"? That is much more dubious. Spinsters and bachelors would accumulate in the land. Many men, being unable to keep a wife and children merely upon their private means, would be compelled to shun matrimony until they are too old to enjoy it, and to fulfil adequately the duties thereof. Would this be the means of raising the falling birth-rates in our depopulated country?—I am, sir, etc.,

E. SIMON,

Licencié-ès-lettres.

Aylesbeare, Exeter,

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—One is fain to gather, after Mme. L. Geofroy's letter in your issue of Feb. 7th, that Frenchmen must be happy to have staunch friends in this country since they have such slandering enemies amongst their own countrywomen. I am afraid Mme. Geofroy has read too much of suffragist papers, and her mind is poisoned for ever. Because, in her small circle, some churlish youngsters solemnly declare that they will never marry a girl who cannot keep herself, she concludes, with the generalising mind which is a special feature of female intelligence, that "everybody is doing the same thing."

Your previous correspondent very neatly and very fairly told the truth about the dowry system, and he let intelligent people understand that there are no rules without exceptions. May I tell you, for Mme. Geofroy's benefit, some words a very militant English suffragist told me some days ago? "There are no suffragettes in France, because French husbands care for their wives and love them. Here in England men go and play at cricket during their honeymoon."

Men of England and France, let us woo and marry who we love, without heeding English or French suffragettes. May we never marry suffragettes!—I am, sir, etc.,

PAUL COURRAY.

Oxford, February, 1913.

THE SAD LOT OF THE SCHOOLMASTER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I was pleased to see the remarks of "M. A." in your issue of February 14th; but equally deplorable is the lot of the certificated assistant master in the primary or elementary school, for after a five or six years' course of training he usually commences with a salary of less than £100 per annum, and when he has completed several years of service must "mark time" at £120 or £130 per annum. Surely the nation should undertake to see that ample remuneration is given to a class who have the moulding of the characters of the future generation.—I am, sir, etc.,

Notts, February 17th, 1913. A HEADMASTER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—For several months I have read EVERYMAN with deep interest and avidity, but more personally so the letters of "Student" and "M. A.," advocating Civil Service for teachers, so as to improve the deplorable condition of English education and the "sad lot of the schoolmaster," especially those in public schools and villages. I strongly endorse the opinions of both your correspondents, after an experience of thirty years as a college-trained, certificated headmaster in various parts—no less than five counties.

Like "Student," I can give numerous instances of teachers leaving the profession and bettering themselves in business or otherwise; one becoming a mayor of an ancient town, another a prosperous athletic outfitter, others as a doctor, clergyman, etc., each of whom was my own (not superior) colleague at college; while I remain a village schoolmaster, whose diploma, experience, and certificate go for nothing, but am receiving my small salary, am inspected and reported upon, annoyed with the questionable and un-English communications about, or the secret inquisition into, one's character and ability, a prey for village plotters or offended parents whose influential relatives are on the Education Committee, and altogether uncomfortable environments which have to be found out by those entering the profession.

There is a dearth of teachers, but there will be a greater. In vain you may patch as much as you like with Education Bills, till you place the educator in a better position, commanding respect, better surroundings, pay, and security; and the best proposed plan is to make teachers Civil Servants. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain said years ago: "I can't for the life of me see why teachers are not Civil Servants."—I am, sir, etc.,

C. S.

February 17th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your contributor's remarks (in your issue of January 31st) regarding the attitude of the public towards education strike me as very apt. People are always telling us what a noble work we schoolmasters are doing; few inquire into the conditions under which our work is done, nor do they measure the results by any rational and sympathetic standard. Sometimes they take up another position. "Of course," we are told, "the pay of a schoolmaster is poor; but then, he has no responsibilities!" Truly, for the average Englishman, the ills of the body, commercial success, and the jealousies of nations matter infinitely more than the health of the mind.

Many schoolmasters will thank "M. A." for his admirable letter to your issue of February 14th. But is he not a little hard on the headmasters? It is they every reader of "Everyman" has the opportunity of competing for one of the 50 Scholarships in ADVERTISEMENT WRITING.

UNTIL MARCH 7

Full particulars of which were given in last week's issue.

DO NOT LET THE OPPORTUNITY SLIP.

Earning While Learning.

The College has arranged to offer the scholarships in advertisement writing to readers upon the following remarkable and unprecedented terms:—

The fifty candidates who send in the best answers to the test questions will receive the full course of postal tuition at half the regular fees, the remaining half to be paid only when the student has earned at least £10 by advertisement writing as the result of the tuition, within six months of completing the course.

There is no entrance fee—it costs a halfpenny stamp to write for gratis examination paper, and a penny to return it filled up. You are under no further liability whatsoever.

The successful students will not only earn back much more than the fees paid, and incidentally receive a first-class practical training free, but will acquire proficiency that may be worth from 15s. to £10 a week to them.

Clever and Enthusiastic.

The Scholarships will enable the P.C.C. to secure fifty of the brainiest readers of EVERYMAN—clever, enterprising, and enthusiastic men and women whom it will be a personal pleasure to teach, and who will eventually be numbered amongst the College's most successful students. Every reader stands a chance of succeeding.

The Fortunate Fifty.

The P.C.C. scholarships are only intended for those students who will be a credit to the College.

Every successful P.C.C. student, by his or her achievement and personal influence, becomes a valuable advertisement for the P.C.C. Successful P.C.C. students never tire of recommending the College which helped them to their success.

The winners of the scholarships are under no liability to pay the balance of fees unless he or she earns at least £10.

No examination papers can be received after March 7th; no more than 50 scholarships can be awarded. Applications will be dealt with in strict rotation, and notified immediately all the fifty scholarships have been awarded.

A Little Spare Time and Thought.

It is essential that you send at once for the examination form, so that you can devote a little spare time and thought to answering the test questions. Remember, this is a golden opportunity which may make all the difference to your future success. You may have missed chances before; don't miss this one. Send now before you forget it.

In addition to the Examination Paper, the College will send gratis a copy of a useful little book, "Brains and Ink," and fullest particulars of the Course and the Scholarships.

It costs nothing to enter; you risk nothing more than three-halfpence for postage. You commit yourself to nothing, and you stand a good chance of success.

The act of writing for particulars to-day may prove to be the turning point in your career.

PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
77, THANET HOUSE, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

A DAINTY
AND

INEX-
PENSIVE

LUXURY.

FOR MUSIC.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,

4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 179 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. 16-pp. prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

THE MONTAGUE AUTOMATIC SECRETARY

It is often too much trouble to write out cards for a "Follow-up" system of correspondence, Accounts Due, Freight Claims, Advertisement Replies, Enquiries, etc. Moreover, documents should not be permanently filed until fully dealt with, otherwise it is difficult to keep together all papers on one subject. The illustration shows exactly what the MONTAGUE AUTOMATIC SECRETARY is.

Each day the contents of that day's folder are attended to, and the empty folder is then placed at the back of the guide marked "Next Month." It is not necessary for the user to keep the file, the Typist or Confidential Clerk can bring in the day's folder, take necessary particulars and refile the documents according to how they are dealt with.

Send for the MONTAGUE AUTOMATIC SECRETARY to-day, to the Sole Makers—

TAPP & TOOTHILL, LTD.,
27, WARWICK LANE, LONDON, E.C.

who have to bear the brunt of the blame when things go wrong, and it is they who discharge the difficult and responsible work of organisation. This is especially the case in a "secondary school," where, moreover, the salary even of the headmaster is distinctly meagre.

It must be owned that assistant masters themselves are, to some extent, to blame for the present state and status of the profession. There is still a deplorable lack of unity in their ranks, although of late they have begun to realise the truth of an ancient and oft-cited fable.—I am, sir, etc.,

B.A. OXON.

February 17th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I should like to add my testimony in support of what has already been written by "Student" and "M. A." concerning the unfortunate lot of assistant masters in secondary schools.

Six years ago I was notified that I was a successful candidate at a Civil Service examination, thereby qualifying for an appointment leading to a salary of £350 per annum, with the certainty of a generous pension at the age of fifty-five. Actuated by some Quixotic impulse, I declined the appointment, and decided to enter the scholastic profession. After staying two years longer at school and spending three years at a University, I obtained a post as assistant master. It now appears that there is only the faintest possibility of my ever receiving a salary of even £200 a year. I dare not think of marriage, nor can I look forward with anything but despair to the time when I shall have passed into the "fifties."

My own case is only one among many. Surely the work in which we are engaged is as fully national and deserving of as great a remuneration as that of a Government clerk!—I am, sir, etc.,

B.A., L.C.P.

February 15th, 1913.

THE CULT OF PLEASURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Possibly the opinion of an Englishman who has not long returned to this country, after a long residence in Germany, may possess some interest for your readers. I have been very powerfully impressed by the general atmosphere of pleasure seeking, more especially in the middle classes—who seem, indeed, to live for nothing else. Of the intense, earnest, and idealistic devotion to work and duty, which is so conspicuous a feature of Teutonic life, there is but little trace in this country. There are multitudes of German men who will work with complete devotion, quite apart from all personal interest. The German loves work, almost as much as the Englishman loves amusement.

In my opinion, the English are threatened, as a nation, by several most serious dangers:

(1) The unceasing growth of luxury, which is quite undoubtedly accompanied by a weakening of character. (2) The decay of fixed moral standards. There is no longer the old certainty of conviction. (3) The lack of attention to proper technical (and moral) training of the young, with its consequent unemployment, etc. (4) The enormous decline in the birth-rate, which will soon very deeply injure the nation—not only numerically, but morally and physically. (5) The general decay of home life.—I am, sir, etc.,

GERMANICUS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Norman Ellis, is in error in stating, in reference to the "lavish expenditure of the rich," that "the pity of it is that their pleasure is so necessary to the livelihood of the working classes."

This is a fallacy. By such expenditure wealth is destroyed, and the destruction of wealth cannot be beneficial to any class. It is the creation of wealth upon which we all depend, rich and poor alike. Wealth is created by the co-operation of three factors, viz., Land, Labour, and Capital. Unnecessary expenditure depletes capital, and thus hinders the production of wealth, and so increases poverty.

Were such expenditure to suddenly cease, a certain amount of unemployment—of a temporary nature—would be inevitable; but as such cessation would rapidly increase the aggregate wealth of the community, other and better forms of employment would soon be open.—I am, sir, etc., L. H. SHEAVES.

Alexandra Park, N., February 17th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Macpherson's adverse critics seem to take a more despondent view of the future of the working man than does Mr. Macpherson himself. I agreed with the original article because in it the writer hoped for improvement in the working man's position, while he pointed out that drinking and gambling effectually prevented that improvement. We must remember that the riches of the prosperous classes ensued from the hard work, whether mental or physical, of their present possessors or of their forefathers. Drinking and gambling, in an economic sense, do not matter so much in the case of the wealthy as in the case of those trying to attain wealth and position. Duties should most certainly rank before rights, as the former lie in our power and the latter do not.

Grumbling at the rich will never help a man to escape out of poverty. Much better teach the poor man to use his time after work and not abuse it. I have found in my work among the poor that novel-reading, looking on at professional football matches, playing golf or cricket (on Sundays even!), all help to keep them from drink and gambling. I have especially mentioned these pursuits as they so often meet with adverse criticism. Politics and elections encourage the working man's lowest appetites and inclinations.—I am, sir, etc.,

GLENN DALRYMPLE.
Ashbourne.

THE GOVERNMENT AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is perfectly clear, from the article in your issue of February 7th, that the women's suffrage movement is most unreasonably prejudiced against the Government. It is most annoying to those still amenable to conversion to witness such exhibitions of bigotry. To those who profess the slightest knowledge whatever of the present political situation it is beyond doubt that the Government has done everything in its power to give the women fair play, even going so far as to endanger its own safety. By way of recognition they receive copious outpourings of abuse. Not only does Mrs. Fawcett approve of such conduct, but she actually describes one of the most unreasonable exhibitions of "pig-headedness" in recent times (the Labour Conference resolution) as "one of the most generous political actions on record." One would expect something totally different from a woman of Mrs. Fawcett's perspicuity; but it appears to me that the whole atmosphere of women's suffrage is polluted by party hatred. The sooner the suffra-

POPULAR BOOKS

English and Foreign, both
New and Secondhand, in
All Classes of Literature

—OFFERED AT—

GREAT REDUCTIONS

from the Published Prices.

CARRIAGE PAID WITHIN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

NEW CATALOGUE of 10,000 Book Bargains, and List of Novels at Reduced Prices, Post Free on receipt of postcard mentioning "Everyman."

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

THE LARGEST BOOKSHOP in the WORLD.

Mr. Heinemann has pleasure in announcing the publication of E. F. BENSON'S new novel, "The Weaker Vessel."

MR. HEINEMANN'S New 6s. Novels

THE WEAKER VESSEL . . . E. F. BENSON
JOURNEY'S END (John Christopher IV.) R. ROLLAND
MINNA KARL GJELLERUP
GUTTER BABIES (Illustrated by Lady Stanley)
DOROTHEA SLADE
THE HIPPODROME . . . RACHEL HAYWARD
FRONTIERS OF THE HEART
VICTOR MARGUERITTE
WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO?
ELIZABETH ROBINS
THE STORY OF STEPHEN COMPTON
J. E. PATTERSON
A RUNAWAY RING . . . MRS. HENRY DUDENEY
KING ERRANT FLORA A. STEEL
ADNAM'S ORCHARD . . . SARAH GRAND
BETWEEN TWO THIEVES RICHARD DEHAN
UNDER THE YOKE (The Great Bulgarian Romance)
IVAN VAZOFF

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF

IBSEN

Entirely Revised and Edited by WM. ARCHER.
In 13 vols., each Cr. 8vo, 4s.

A New Edition.

THE PRETENDERS.

By H. IBSEN. Translated by Wm. Archer. Cr. 8vo, paper, 1s. 6d.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

gettes give up these mad tactics and set themselves to convince the public by means of logic, the sooner will their cause make headway.—I am, sir, etc.,

CONFIRMED ANTI-SUFFRAGETTE.

Rock Ferry, Cheshire.

SHOULD TEACHERS BECOME CIVIL SERVANTS?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been very interested in the correspondence that has been going on in these columns over the question of "Shall Teachers Become Civil Servants?"

After careful and thoughtful consideration of the subject, I should like to go one step further than your correspondent "Student" does, viz., that all municipal officials should become civil servants, including teachers, or, if this is impracticable, have security of tenure, i.e., the appointments and dismissals should be made by the Civil Service Commission or any other similar body.

An objection will at once be raised—that examinations are not generally the means by which the posts under the municipalities are obtained, and therefore it would be unwise for a Government department to appoint or revoke the appointment of municipal officers.

To meet this and other objections several points have to be considered, viz. :—

(1) It is generally admitted that the work done by municipal officers is equal, if not greater in importance, to that done by civil servants.

(2) That if this work is to be thoroughly carried out, the officers must have security of tenure.

The surveyor of taxes is a Government servant, and has to pass an examination before being appointed. He is responsible for the valuation of property and the collection of the taxes from same within his district. The assistant overseer and rate-collector is appointed by the municipality, and very seldom is a competitive examination held in order to fill this post. He is responsible for the valuation of the property for parochial purposes and the collection of the rates, etc., from same. Now, where is the consistency? In both cases the work is practically identical, and both equally important.

Upon investigation, I find that, besides the Bar, Law Society, Medical Association, Institute of Accountants, etc., there are now the National Association of Local Government Officers (having a membership of over 33,000), the Association of Rate-Collectors and Assistant Overseers, the Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, the Poor-Law Officers' Association, and the several engineering and sanitary associations holding examinations expressly for local government officers. Many of the officers also hold University degrees in law, arts, and economics. I often wonder if there is another class of servants in the world with such a variety of professional associations.

A large number of local government officers have obtained appointments under the Insurance Commissioners. This testifies to their capabilities. With these several examinations existing, how easy it would be to co-operate them and make all municipal appointments obtainable only by competitive examination!

With this rather lengthy letter I must conclude by remarking that, if the teachers ever become civil servants, other local government servants must also be included.—I am, sir, etc.,

PAROCHIAL.

THE TRIAL OF JOAN OF ARC.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Two points in M. Mazel's article on the Maid of France seem to call for criticism. In his eloquent account of the unjust and irregular trial of Joan he makes the remarkable statement that Loyseleur betrayed her confessions, being sent as her confessor by Cauchon.

There is no evidence for this. Loyseleur, indeed, gained her confidence, and used the information thus acquired against her, but it was in the guise of a shoemaker from Lorraine that he did so. Anatole France, whom we should expect to make the most of this point, is careful to distinguish the statement that Loyseleur deceived her, from a further statement that at a later period he attended in clerical attire and received her confession (vol. ii, p. 246).

Andrew Lang, on the other hand, says "Jeanne does not seem to have had a confessor" until the end (p. 256).

The second point is the slight he puts on the Papacy for its non-intervention. The Pope was fully occupied, then and for many years afterwards, by the turmoils centering round Basel, and may well have been ignorant of the black injustice of the trial, as he certainly was of Joan's appeal to him, suppressed by Cauchon. Unless we are to fall into the error of "reading history backwards," I do not see how the Pope can be arraigned in this matter. It is much more important, historically, to note that Calixtus III. annulled the sentence after a full inquiry, which took place immediately the Basel preoccupations were removed.—I am, sir, etc.,

H. ROBBINS.

Birmingham.

PROFESSOR SAINTSBURY AND RUSKIN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Under your curiously entitled "Masterpiece of the Week"—most of the masterpieces having been written before some of your readers were born—there is a sketchy review by Prof. Saintsbury in this week's EVERYMAN of Ruskin's "The Crown of Wild Olive." I will only trouble your readers with two quotations; but the first is one which, in my humble opinion, is as far from the truth as one Pole from the other.

"Take Ruskin for your guide," says the Professor, "and unless you have yourself a double portion of that critical power which he almost wholly lacked, you will go into the ditch." The italics are mine.

If John Ruskin had two faculties—not one—developed, as few other writers had or have, they were the critical and analytical. Ruskin tore the wrappings from the half-truths of Adam Smith, Ricardo, and Mills, and gave to his readers basic and eternal truths which they, to pander to a rich, idle class, had not the courage to enunciate. How curious that the Professor should look upon Ruskin as the blind leading the blind! He led me and thousands of thoughtful men into the light of Truth; certainly not into the ditch of Darkness, which former economists had done.

Professor Saintsbury also says: "It has long been recognised by persons of some acuteness and some political knowledge that Mr. Ruskin's influence on the social side of modern politics is a thing that has got to be reckoned with very seriously indeed." The day when Ruskin's humane politics leaven England will be a test whether he really did lack the critical power of which the Professor says he was destitute. I do not fear the result.—I am, sir, etc.,

FRANK WEAVER.

London, N.W., February 20th, 1913.

THE
ART TREASURES
of GREAT BRITAIN

A NEW MONTHLY SERIES EDITED BY C. H. COLLINS-BAKER,
 DESIGNED WITH A VIEW TO PROVIDING THE ART-LOVER
 WITH A REPRESENTATIVE COLLECTION OF REPRODUCTIONS
 OF THE MASTERPIECES OF ART IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

Each number will contain Four or Five Photogravures, one colour, and one monotone, reproductions of the Treasures of

PAINTING, DRAWING, SCULPTURE,
 POTTERY, CHINA, IVORIES,
 METAL WORK, Etc.

SIZE OF PAGE
 12 in. x 9 in.

No. 2
NOW READY.

PRICE
1/-
 NET.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE:—

"IT GOES WITHOUT SAYING THAT THE
 PICTURES HAVE BEEN ADMIRABLY REPRO-DUCED, AND THE PRINTING AND GENERAL
 GET-UP OF THE WORK MAINTAIN THE
 WELL-KNOWN TRADITIONS OF THE PUBLISH-ING HOUSE FROM WHICH IT COMES."

NUMBER TWO CONTAINS:—

Derick Born Holbein	L'Idole Eternelle Rodin
Landscape Titian	Chinese Vase Black Kang H'si
The Intrusion Metsu	Drawing Alfred Stevens or Michelangelo
A Rake's Progress Hogarth

Please send for Detailed Prospectus.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

THE STORY OF THE KING'S HIGHWAY*

THIS book constitutes a further instalment of the study of English local government which Mr. and Mrs. Webb began in 1899, and of which the first considerable portions were published as "The Parish and the County" in 1906, and "The Manor and the Borough" in 1908. It tells graphically and with full knowledge the story of the making and management of roads in England and Wales from the earliest times down to the present day, i.e., from the war-chariot of Boadicea to the motor omnibus. There are numerous books dealing with the romantic and picturesque aspects of the King's highway, but this is the first attempt, so far as we are aware, to trace the evolution of road administration throughout the centuries in a broad and comprehensive manner. It seems a prosaic task to have undertaken, and certainly in the hands of Blue Book writers it would inevitably become so, but Mr. and Mrs. Webb, within the limits of a volume of 280 pages, have contrived to pack an enormous mass of interesting as well as valuable information, so that the work appeals to the general reader no less than to the student who specialises in problems of local government.

The survey passes rapidly over the first fourteen hundred years, during which, of the actual management and maintenance of roads, almost nothing is known. The earliest roads were mere trackways, frequently first marked out by passing animals. The Romans inaugurated a new era by constructing four great roads across the island, the remains of which are still visible, and are, here and there, the basis of existing thoroughfares. In the Middle Ages the term "road" was a mere abstraction, amounting, in legal phraseology, to nothing more than "a perpetual right of passage in the sovereign, for himself and his subjects, over another's land." Anything in the nature of a special road surface was undreamt of. At first the inhabitants of each manor were responsible for the upkeep of the public highway within their own territory, but with agriculture in revolution, and the manorial courts in decay, Parliament in 1555 created new social machinery for the administration, all over England and Wales, of what was deemed an entirely local service.

The middle and later chapters furnish much curious and interesting lore regarding the methods employed by our ancestors to keep the roads in repair, as well as a good deal of little known information about the later developments of our road system. The reader will learn much about

* The King's Loiterers, who asked for 'largess'; the curious idea of mending the roads by criminal indictment of the parish; the yet untold history of the rise and fall of the Turnpike Trusts; the frauds of the 'pikemen'; the glories of the stage-coach; the 'calamity of railways'; the spectacle of the nineteenth-century statesmen being utterly baffled by the problem of the proper unit of road administration."

Of course, the labours of "Pontifex Maximus Telford" and "Macadam the Magician" receive adequate treatment. To Macadam we owe the conception that roads must be made to accommodate the traffic, not the traffic regulated to preserve the roads, which had been the prevailing idea hitherto.

To many readers the most interesting chapter will be the concluding one, which treats of road maintenance and administration at the present day. Mr. and Mrs. Webb pay a tribute to the bicyclist. It was he who brought the road once more into popular use for pleasure-riding, and who caused us "to realise that the administration, even of local byways, was not a matter that concerned each locality only, but one in which the whole nation had an abiding interest." With the advent of the automobile new and important issues arose. Some of the road problems of to-day are suggestively dealt with, and Mr. and Mrs. Webb are unsparing in their criticism of the Local Government Board, which, in their opinion, has done nothing to secure either the efficiency or the improvement of this particular branch of its labours. The most pressing problem awaiting solution is the old one of how to make the roads "to accommodate the traffic, even the motor omnibus traffic; not the traffic constrained to suit the roads."

Appended to each chapter are extremely useful notes and references, and there is a good index.

THE BLOODHOUND OF THE PRESS*

IN English literature Sir Roger L'Estrange is a star of no great brilliance. Indeed, his claim to be considered a writer at all has been keenly contested. Macaulay characterised his style as "a mean and flippant jargon," and Hallam regarded it as "the pattern of bad writing." A generation ago, however, Professor Earle made a valiant attempt to rescue L'Estrange from the stigma of being "a wanton corrupter of English." His view was that he heralded a new style which, while priding itself upon "a wanton affection of slovenliness," was nevertheless the true parent "of all that is most firm and valuable in the present prose." Be that as it may, the fact remains that L'Estrange's influence upon English literature is a negligible quantity.

The truth is, L'Estrange is remembered not because of any notable contribution to pure literature, but mainly by virtue of his conspicuous, though ignoble, connection with the history of English journalism. Unlike Defoe, he lives not by the brilliant quality of his journalistic work, but by his whole-hearted and unceasing efforts to muzzle the Press in the reign of Charles II. L'Estrange gained notoriety as a Tory pamphleteer. He was amazingly industrious; he was also thoroughly unprincipled, and had at his command an exceptionally rich vocabulary of abuse. Johnson said he was the first writer who regularly engaged himself to support a party, right or wrong. And in the days of the Merry Monarch such attainments were not allowed to go unrecognised.

Shortly after Charles II. came to the throne there were circulated innumerable seditious tracts with the object of bringing about the assassination of his Majesty. L'Estrange set himself to hunt down and track the publishers and vendors of this objectionable literature, and his success brought him under the notice of the King, who, in 1663, appointed him Surveyor of the Presses. This newly created office conferred upon L'Estrange the right to a general Search Warrant and warrant to arrest; also the sole right of writing the newsbooks, and of printing and publishing advertisements. How he discharged the duties of this autocratic office is the main theme of Mr. Kitchin's book.

We have here unfolded for the first time the whole story of the attempt to "gag the Press" generally in the seventeenth century. The tortuous workings of the Stuart mind as to the matter and method of the

* "Sir Roger L'Estrange: A Contribution to the History of the Press in the Seventeenth Century." By George Kitchin. 10s. 6d. net. (Kegan Paul.)

* "English Local Government: The Story of the King's Highway." By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. 7s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

The most Powerful, Practical, Scientific Means of TRAINING YOUR MIND

Is undoubtedly the World-famous Concentro Course, "Scientific Concentration." The man or woman who undertakes this training rapidly increases their powers of Attention, Observation, Memory, Thinking, and Speaking. It enormously increases their Will-Power, Self-Reliance, Self-Control, and Initiative. It enables them to cure Worry, Mind-Wandering, Bad Habits, and to inhibit distracting influences. It gives them a powerful personality, greater working efficiency, and a new and broader outlook on life. "Scientific Concentration" is being practised in every part of the civilised world by Professional Men, Business Men, and men and women in every sphere of work. We want you to join this band of keen, well-equipped workers. There is no training like "Scientific Concentration" for helping you to develop those qualities and faculties of mind necessary for the surmounting of obstacles, and the overcoming of difficulties peculiar to modern conditions.

AUTHORITATIVE TESTIMONY.

The Late Mr. W. T. Stead, Editor of the "Review of Reviews," said: "I do not remember ever having seen treatises which are at once so simple, so practical, and so detailed. I cordially commend the Concentro Course, Scientific Concentration, and wish it every success."

"Great Thoughts" says:—"The Booklets and Lessons of the Concentro Course are admirable, marked by common sense, practical experience, wide reading in psychology, and are thoroughly scientific."

"The Guardian" says:—"The principles therein laid down are unquestionably sound. A person who lacked the capacity of concentration and desired to possess it could not do better than follow a course of the instruction here offered him."

"Christian Commonwealth" says:—"The cure of mind-wandering—the student's greatest bane—the acquirement of resolution, the right attitude of mind, the ability to concentrate the powers of both mind and body, and to direct them to the best advantage, are ably taught by the Concentro Co."

"John Bull" says:—"Those whose control of their thoughts is hampered by the distractions of latter-day civilisation would do well to write to the Concentro Co."

"Public Opinion" says:—"The Concentro Co. are really giving one a splendid all-round mental training—one that will be eminently useful in any department of life."

Send To-day for Free Booklet, and learn what Scientific Concentration will do for YOU, to the CONCENTRO CO., (46), CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

MAIL ORDER BUSINESS LESSONS by POST.—To prove that my Course can benefit people, I am offering to accept 10/- down and the balance only when you have made a handsome profit. Particulars free.—Napier, "Avoca," Flamstead, Dunstable.

PLANT Now.—The Blue Rose (Veilchenblau). The latest garden wonder; a robust and free-flowering climber; very strong 4-year-old trees, 1s. each, carr. free, with instructions.—J. E. Rayner, F.R.H.S., Highfield, Southampton (31st season).

PLANT Now.—The Green Rose, the Black Rose, the Orange Rose; novel, striking, easily grown; good bushes, 1s. 9d. the set, or extra strong, selected, 2s. 6d.; free, with instructions.—Rayner, as above.

PLANT Now.—THE QUEEN OF HARDY CLIMBERS.—THE FLAME FLOWER; garlands of dazzling fiery scarlet blossoms; rapidly covers trellises, verandahs, balconies, etc.; once planted grows grander every year; two good roots, 1s., free, with instructions.—Rayner, as above. Send for my Novelty List.

THE MAGNETIC PERSONALITY: Studies in The New Magic, just out, 2s. 8d., opens up unsuspected powers of memory, concentration, extension of consciousness, will force, &c.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

STAMMERING AND ILL-DEVELOPED SPEECH. The London Specialist, whose exposition created so much interest at The Children's Welfare Exhibition, can take a few more cases at any age, personally or by correspondence. Home or school visited; clientele at Rugby, Uppingham, and Christ's Hospital Schools. Results guaranteed.—Mr. Miall, 8, Argyll Place, London, W.

GENTLEMEN specially invited to join the Correspondence section of ROUND-ABOUT-CLUB, 350, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.; also Ladies. Social Gatherings on Wednesdays. Annual Subscription, £1 1s. inland; 10s. 6d. Abroad.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

NEW GEORGIAN CLUB: The White House, Randolph Crescent, W.—A quiet, comfortable Residence for Women of good social status. Large house. Access to gardens. Rooms from 25s. weekly, including baths, breakfast, and dinner. Non-members received at special rates.—Apply Secretary.

PRINT YOUR OWN CIRCULARS, Cards, etc.—Printing Presses complete from 10s. to £5. "Printing Made Easy," 6d.—Adams Bros., Daventry.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, High Holborn, London, W.C.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

WOMAN AND MARRIAGE. A Handbook. By Margaret Stephens. Cloth, 3/6 net (Post free 3/10). The Times says: "If more such books were written and more such knowledge disseminated, it would be a good thing for the wives and mothers of the present day." At all Booksellers'.—T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

FOREIGN Circulating LIBRARY of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN and SPANISH books; cheap rates; no restrictions as to changing of books; prospectus free.—Siegle and Co., Ltd., 2, Langham Place, W.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount price from Hunter & Longhurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. New Catalogue, just ready, sent post free.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE OF MODERN SOCIALISM, by John Spargo, 1s. 6d. net, post free 1s. 8d.—Arthur P. Bird, 22, Bedford Street, Strand. Agency for American Books.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any aovlce, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatine, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.

A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

restraint of the Press are clearly revealed, and a flood of light is shed upon the condition of the printing trades of that day. Mr. Kitchin has spared no pains to get at the salient facts of an obscure but, to the student of literary history, important subject. Every page exhibits minute and exact research, and, by reason of its thoroughness and critical acumen, the book is bound to take its place as the standard authority on the early history of the British Press.

The net result of Mr. Kitchin's investigations goes to show that L'Estrange is even blacker than he is usually painted. We read:—

"So far as this Life presents new documentary evidence, or attempts a new reading of the hitherto known facts, it will be found that his fame rather suffers, if that were possible, than recovers. That is, of course, entirely in the region of political life."

Mr. Kitchin is convinced that the true L'Estrange lies somewhere between Macaulay's black portrait and the view of what he terms "the new school of Tory Absolutism," which asserts that he was a high-minded English gentleman, incapable of fraud or disloyalty. While admitting that there were redeeming traits in his character, Mr. Kitchin shows him to have been mean-spirited, truculent, and revengeful to an unwonted degree.

Armed with autocratic powers, he used them as only an unscrupulous person can. He regarded the Press as "Crown property, distributed and delegated to the care of loyal gentlemen." In his pamphlet, "Considerations and Proposals for the Regulation of the Press," L'Estrange, as Mr. Kitchin points out, accepts unhesitatingly the view that the Press is a dubious blessing, a thing to be referred continually to a Government department—in large part, a branch of sedition. "Freedom of the Press" was to him simply meaningless. Accordingly, he strove with might and main to keep the Press in order; in other words, he attempted to make it a pliable instrument in the interests of the Cavalier cause. It is curious to note that this was happening when the trumpet notes of Milton's "Areopagitica"—the most eloquent plea for the liberty of the Press in the English tongue—were reverberating throughout the land. But L'Estrange, undeterred by Milton's tract, pursued his avocation as "bloodhound of the Press," and for a time Fortune smiled upon him.

It only remains to add that the book has eleven full-page plates, and that lists of L'Estrange's political works and of the chief sources of the Life are given.

ENGLISH MUSICAL REMINISCENCES*

PROFESSOR BERGER needs no introduction to the musical public of this country. For more than half a century his name has been synonymous with all that is best and highest in English musical culture. As Professor of Pianoforte at the Royal Academy of Music and at the Guildhall School of Music he has proved himself not only an accomplished pianist and composer, but a born instructor; while, in the capacity of secretary of the Philharmonic Society, he laboured indefatigably for twenty-seven years to raise the standard of musical taste in our midst. To crown all, he has known everybody worth knowing in the musical world during the last half century, which is saying much.

With such a lengthy, varied, and withal distinguished career, and so rich a store of musical reminiscence, Professor Berger might have written a better book. His narrative is gossipy and entertaining, no doubt, but it is discursive, badly arranged, and (if the word may be permitted) "snippetty." Critically the book is of little value, which is regrettable, as a musician of Professor Berger's eminence and experience is well qualified to throw light upon many difficult musical problems.

Professor Berger's recollections go back to Early Victorian days. One of the best chapters in his book is that in which he recounts his memories of Dickens. A personal friend of the novelist, he composed the overtures and incidental music to "The Lighthouse" and "The Frozen Deep," plays written by Wilkie Collins and acted by Dickens and his friends. Chapter V. consists of a catalogue of Professor Berger's published works. These cover fully six pages of small type, and exhibit a musical fertility which is astonishing. After that he tells of the career of the talented contralto, Miss Annie Lascelles, who became his wife in 1864, and died in 1905.

Then follows a chapter on the Philharmonic Society, and another on the musical celebrities he has known. To many readers this portion of the book will prove the most interesting. Forty-two celebrities of European reputation come under review, and though the sketches are extremely short (not exceeding a few hundred words in most cases), they are invariably illuminating. Professor Berger's impressions (they can hardly be regarded as carefully considered judgments) are not always conventional. It is rather disconcerting to be told that much of Brahms' piano music is "laboured and uninspired"; that Berlioz's music suggests "a dish of yesterday's whitebait, all heads and tails and fragments, and very little body"; and that Saint-Saëns is "a musician of varied eminence," without a rival in modern times, Mendelssohn only excepted. What about Saint-Saëns' countryman and contemporary, Gounod?

We could have wished that Professor Berger had amplified his remarks on musical conducting, a difficult art that has developed enormously of recent years. We are quite at one with him, however, in deprecating the "showy gestures" of many conductors. Perhaps it would be beneficial in more ways than one if, as our author suggests, conducting could be done behind a screen.

As regards the fashion of playing from memory, Professor Berger says, "It is an exhibition of a kind of virtuosity which should not be encouraged." This statement, it seems to us, needs qualifying. It is true that playing from memory often leads to inaccuracy of detail, slovenliness, and a hurrying of tempo, but we cannot conceive of such a thing happening in the case of a great artiste. What he plays must be regarded in the light of an intellectual possession; the music has become part of himself, and the presence of notes, so far from perfecting his skill as an executant, would have quite the reverse effect. Think of Paderewski, or any other pianist of the first magnitude, turning over the pages of a score!

Professor Berger, we are glad to learn, thinks that the average piano playing is much higher than formerly. This is one result of the marvellous growth of musical education during the last thirty years. Another is the enormous development amongst us of purely orchestral music. In the early years of Professor Berger's career there was hardly an English composer who wrote concert music for an orchestra; now we have quite a number of composers whose orchestral works compare favourably with those of foreign writers.

The volume contains numerous portraits and facsimiles.

* "Reminiscences, Impressions, and Anecdotes." By Francesco Berger. 20s. 6d. net. (Sampson Low.)

Special Offer to Readers of "Everyman" (See Footnote.)

THE ASSOCIATED COAL CONSUMERS

LIMITED,
19, 21, 23, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

CAPITAL - - £50,050.

A Few of the Members:

- DOWAGER DUCHESS OF ROXBURGHE
- MARCHIONESS OF QUEENSBERRY
- MARCHIONESS OF ORMONDE
- MARQUIS OF BREADALBANE
- HIS EXCELLENCY THE NORWEGIAN MINISTER
- EARL OF DARTREY
- EARL OF DONOUGHMORE
- COUNTESS DYSART
- COUNTESS ROBERTS
- LORD EUSTON
- LORD HENRY GROSVENOR
- LORD HADDO
- LORD GUERNSEY
- LORD HYDE, M.V.O.
- VISCOUNT NEWPORT
- LADY EDITH FOX PITT
- RT. REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF CHICHESTER
- LORD ELIBANK
- LADY RODNEY
- LORD LEONFIELD
- DOWAGER LADY O'HAGAN
- LADY SACKVILLE
- LORD CHEYLESMORE, K.C.V.O.
- LORD AVEBURY
- LORD BLYTH
- LORD LUCAS AND DINGWALL
- HON. MRS. CYRIL PONSONBY
- HON. MRS. STANLEY
- HON. MRS. VICTOR STANLEY
- HON. ERIC DRUMMOND
- CAPT. THE HON. H. A. STANHOPE, R.N.
- LADY VIOLET HENDERSON
- LADY MARIA FITZCLARENCE
- GEN. THE HON. C. BINGHAM, C.V.O.
- HON. MRS. ELIOT
- HON. MRS. LEVESON-GOWER
- HON. SCHOMBERG BYNG
- MAJOR THE HON. C. SACKVILLE WEST
- RIGHT HON. SIR J. W. BONSER
- RT. HON. SIR CHAS. SCHWANN, BART., P.C., M.P.
- HON. MRS. O. PARTINGTON
- HON. C. B. BARING

Directors:
 LT.-COLONEL CECIL DU PRE PENTON POWNEY, J.P. (Chairman).
 Chairman Liberator Development Co. (Chartered and Limited).
 COLONEL THE HONOURABLE A. E. DALZELL, C.B.
 W. SELBY LOWNDES, Esq., J.P. (Director of the West End Branch of the Royal Insurance Co.).
 SIR CAPEL CHARLES WOLSELEY, Baronet.
 F. MONTAGUE SMITH, Esq. (Managing Director).

Bankers:
 PARR'S BANK, LIMITED, 4, Bartholomew Lane, London, E.C.

Secretary and Registered Offices:
 EDWARD LARKIN, 19, 21, 23, Oxford Street, London, W.
 (Adjoining Tottenham Court Road Underground Station).

A COMBINE of the public to supply themselves with coal on the most economical basis, eliminating intermediate profits and expenses. It is obvious that if a large number of consumers combine to buy coal in large quantities direct from collieries under competitive contracts, and divide it up amongst themselves afterwards, they are in a position to secure coal of good quality at lowest possible prices.

Some of the advantages offered by the Association are:—

- (a) Coal at lowest possible price.
- (b) Guaranteed fresh wrought coal.
- (c) Expert advice upon qualities.
- (d) Security against mixing.
- (e) PRICES FIXED FOR THE YEAR, and not subject to arbitrary advances.

We maintained a supply to members throughout the strike and at fixed prices.

During the first year's operations, to members who made their reserves, the difference between the Association's and trade prices reached a saving of 5/4 per ton; during the second year (a year of labour troubles) 12/7, and during the strike 21/7.

In normal times (as to-day) the saving is from 2/- to 3/- per ton.

LONDON PRICES, including Carting and Delivery.

All descriptions guaranteed to be of the highest standard, no quality containing a greater percentage of ash than 3.74 per cent.	ASSOCIATION CURRENT PRICES.*	LEADING LONDON MERCHANTS' CURRENT PRICES
BEST YORKSHIRE SELECTED (large)	27/2	29/-
BEST YORKSHIRE COBBLES	26/2	—
BEST SELECTED HOUSE	25.9	29/-
BEST MAIN BRIGHTS	24/11	27/-
BEST MAIN BRIGHT NUTS	23/11	26/-
BEST HARD BRIGHTS	24/6	27/-
DERBY BEST HARD COBBLES	24/3	27/-
HARD KITCHEN COBBLES	21/10	25/-
ANTHRACITE M.M. BEST WASHED STOVE NUTS	39/9	—
ANTHRACITE COBBLES, for Horticultural purposes, Ideal Boilers, etc.	28/6	—

* These are "Intermediate Prices" as explained in Association Booklet. Members who made reserves last summer have lower prices.

Deliveries in half sacks, 1/3 per ton extra.

Prices quoted for truckloads to any country station upon application; carting and delivery to residence can also be arranged if desired.

Cut this Coupon out and forward to the Associated Coal Consumers, Ltd., as above, with your order for sample delivery of coal, when 1/- per ton special discount will be allowed.

A booklet will also be forwarded you gratis, fully explaining the constitution and working of the Association, and containing useful information for the householder.

Everyman

COAL COUPON.

1/- per ton discount.

Available during March, 1913.

A. C. C. Ltd.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MR. EDEN PHILLPOTTS, in ending his epic on Dartmoor (WIDDICOMBE FAIR, John Murray, 6s.), tells us he hopes to extend the limits of his art, and that he sees no reason why nature, as expressed by a landscape, a river, or a forest, should not provide as vivid a drama as the story of a human being! The story, told in the author's inimitable fashion, centres round the village of Widdicombe, peopled by rustics of the Shakespearean type. It is a tale of marrying and giving in marriage, and one after the other throughout the book the couples pair off. Mr. Phillpotts's humour is at its best in painting the Widow Windeatt, who bought a husband for some old silver and a ghost! The characters live before us. We become intimately acquainted with their love affairs, their hopes, and their ambitions, thrown up against the background of the moor. So vivid is his portrayal of the sons and daughters of Adam that we may be forgiven for the hope that the day will be long distant when he turns his attention to chronicling the emotions of the vegetable world.

Mr. Ridgwell Cullum has written a strong story in THE GOLDEN WOMAN (Chapman and Hall, 6s.). The plot is ingenious, and lies in the suggestion of the power of a curse. The heroine, Joan Stanmore, is a beautiful girl with many suitors. One after the other they propose marriage, and, by a series of extraordinary fatalities, lose their lives after their rejection by "The Golden Woman." Her father gave her the name as a baby; she brought him luck, and close on the luck followed disaster. And this, says her Aunt Mercy, will be the story of her life throughout. What happens to Joan, and how the curse is broken, the author tells in a convincing fashion. The drama moves swiftly, working up to a fine climax. His characterisation is careful, and, in the case of Mercy—the crystal-gazer—undeniably powerful. There is a freshness and vividity about the book that promises well for future achievements. Mr. Cullum is to be congratulated on his success.

THE MESH (Sampson Low, 6s.) is a most arresting book. There is an entirely delightful President of a South American Republic, who robs and murders with the greatest sang-froid, and in the most polished manner. The unfortunate bank manager who falls a victim to his wiles is inevitably a brainless simpleton, and the American detective who comes to the rescue is stereotyped. The fact remains, however, that Mr. Haslette has given us a volume that goes with a rush from start to finish. There is not a dull moment throughout.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Benson, A. C. "Along the Road." (Nisbet, 7s. 6d.)
 Chapman, S. J. "Elementary Economics." (Longmans, Green, 3s.)
 Cripps, A. S. "Baytree Country." (B. H. Blackwell, 1s.)
 Darter, Adrian. "For the Love of Gyp." (Murray and Eviden.)
 De Groot. "Religion in China." (Putnam, 6s.)
 Figgis, Darrell. "Queen Tara." (Dent, 1s.)
 Falls, J. C. Edward. "Three Years in the Lybian Desert." (Fisher Unwin, 15s.)
 Guérard, Albert L. "French Prophets of Yesterday." (Fisher Unwin, 12s. 6d.)

- Hay, William. "Thomas Pringle: Life and Poems." (Juta, Cape Town, 5s.)
 Hewlett, Maurice. "Helen Redeemed, and Other Poems." (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.)
 Hamoum, Zeyneb. "A Turkish Woman's European Impressions." (Seeley, 6s.)
 Kerr, Caroline. "The Bayreuth Letters of Richard Wagner." (Nisbet, 6s.)
 Lewis, C. King. "John Greenleaf Whittier." (Headley, 3s. 6d.)
 London County Council. "Housing of the Working Class, 1855-1912." (1s.)
 Meldola, Prof. Raphael. "Chemistry." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Moore, Prof. Benjamin. "The Origin and Nature of Life." (Williams and Norgate, 16s.)
 McCormick, Andrew. "Words from the Wild-wood." (Fraser, Asher and Co., 6s.)
 Pemberton, Max. "White Motley." (Cassell, 6s.)
 Reynolds, Rothay. "My Russian Year." (Mills and Boon.)
 Rousseau, J. J. "L'Emile Taine III." (Dent, 1s.)
 Ryven, George. "The Shining Doors." (Griffiths, 6s.)
 Robertson, Prof. J. G. "The Literature of Germany." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Robins, Elizabeth. "Where are you Going To?" (Heinemann, 6s.)
 Rolland, Romain. "John Christopher—I. Dawn and Morning." (Heinemann, 6s.)
 Rolland, Romain. "John Christopher—II. Storm and Stress." (Heinemann, 6s.)
 Rolland, Romain. "John Christopher—III. In Paris." (Heinemann, 6s.)
 Reynolds, Mrs. Fred. "The Granite Cross." (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)
 Seven Oxford Men. "Foundations." (Macmillan, 10s. 6d.)
 Strauss, Joseph. "Essays." (Scott Publishing Co.)
 Service, Robert W. "Rhymes of a Rolling Stone." (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.)
 Saintsbury, Geo. "The Later Nineteenth Century." (Blackwood.)
 Sutcliffe, Halliwell. "The Lone Adventure." (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.)
 Sutcliffe, Halliwell. "A Man of the Moors." (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.)
 Vollmoeller, Karl. "Twilandot, Princess of Anna." (Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d.)
 Wryde, J. Saxby. "British Lighthouses." (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d.)
 Warner, G. Allen. "The Period of the Exodus." (Headley, 1s.)
 Wedgewood, J. and E. "The Road to Freedom." (Daniel, 1s.)
 Wedmore, Sir Frederick. "Painters and Painting." (Williams and Norgate, 1s.)
 Worsley, F. W. "The Theology of the Church of England." (Chapman and Hall, 7s. 6d.)
 Wilson, David Alec. "The Truth about Carlyle." (Alston Rivers, 1s. 6d.)
 Wilson, Dr. Woodrow. "The New Freedom." (Chapman and Hall, 7s. 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
 21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
 THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
 Telephone No. 2542 Central, Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
 THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
 Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

Here's MY Barber

I don't have to wait for him
—he waits for me—always ready to give me a surpassingly smooth, comfortable shave, at any time of the day or night.

ONE OUTFIT WILL LAST A LIFETIME. THERE IS NO CONSTANT EXPENSE FOR NEW BLADES—THERE IS NO GRINDING OR HONING EXPENSE EITHER

ITS SHAVING EASE.

The CLEMAK is the simplest and most perfect shaving device known to civilisation. There is nothing to get out of order—no screwing, fixing or adjusting to waste your time. The blade is adjusted at the only right angle automatically. You simply press the knob and this fine, smooth, sure, safe, speedy, clean "barber" is ready to give you the best shave—not once but every day of the year.

THE PERFECT BLADE.

CLEMAK Blades retain their exceptionally keen shaving edges because they are manufactured from the finest quality Sheffield Razor Steel, hardened and tempered by our new secret electrical process.

The CLEMAK Stropping Machine (price 3/6, including good leather strop) compels you to strop at the correct angle and pressure and ensures a clean blade for every shave.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/-

EVERYBODY'S USING IT.

- CLEMAK Razor and Seven Blades 5/-
- NEW MODEL SET & Twelve Blades 7/6
- COMBINATION OUTFIT, Stropping Machine, Velvet Hide Strop, Clemak and Twelve Blades 10/6

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

OF ALL STORES, CUTLERS, etc.,

or post free from the
CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street,
LONDON..

POST IT NOW
GET THE BOOK.

Please post free your revised edition of "His First Shave," the humorous booklet illustrating in colours the most popular Clemak Outfits and useful Hints on Shaving.

CUT THIS CORNER — POST TO US —

Name _____

Address _____

POST IT NOW

BOOKS FOR EVERY MAN

Messrs. Methuen's New Illustrated Announcement List of Spring Books is now ready. Kindly write for a copy.

THE POEMS OF RUDYARD KIPLING. Crown 8vo, 6s.; fcap. 8vo, 5s. net; fcap. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.
Barrack Room Ballads The Seven Seas The Five Nations Departmental Ditties

THE LETTERS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON TO HIS FAMILY AND FRIENDS.
Selected and Edited by Sir SIDNEY COLVIN. A New and Enlarged Edition. 4 volumes. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. each; leather, 5s. net each.

BOOKS BY W. W. JACOBS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

*Many Cargoes	Sea Urchins	A Master of Craft
Light Freights (Also fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.)	The Skipper's Wooling	At Sunwch Port
Dialstone Lane	Odd Craft	The Lady of the Barge
Salthaven	Sailors' Knots	Short Cruises

* Also with 16 Coloured Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

BOOKS BY E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. each.

The Open Road	*The Friendly Town	*Fireside and Sunshine
*Character and Comedy	*One Day and Another	The Gentlest Art
*The Second Post	*Her Infinite Variety	*Good Company
Old Lamps for New	Listener's Lure	Over Bemerton's
Mr. Ingleside	A Wanderer in Paris	* Also fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

A Wanderer in Holland	A Wanderer in London	A Wanderer in Florence
Mr. Ingleside	London Lavender

A Little of Everything (Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.)	The Works of Charles and Mary Lamb (Seven Volumes, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net each.)
The British School (Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.)
The Pocket Edition of the Works of Charles and Mary Lamb (Six volumes, fcap. 8vo, 5s. each.)

THE WORKS OF OSCAR WILDE.

A Uniform Edition in 12 volumes. Fcap. 8vo. Gilt top. Each volume 5s. net.

*Lord Arthur Savile's Crime	The Duchess of Padua	*An Ideal Husband
*Lady Windermere's Fan	A Woman of No Importance	*Intentions
The Importance of Being Earnest	A House of Pomegranates	Salome
*De Profundis	Essays and Lectures	Selected Poems (Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.)
	Poems

* Also fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

BOOKS BY SIR OLIVER LODGE.

The Substance of Faith (2s. net.)	The Survival of Man (5s. net.)	Modern Problems (5s. net.)
*Man and the Universe (5s. net.)	Reason and Belief (3s. 6d. net.)	* Also fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

BOOKS BY F. W. BAIN. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A Digit of the Moon	The Descent of the Sun	An Incarnation of the Snow
A Mine of Faults	The Ashes of a God	Bubbles of the Foam

Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

A Helper of the Dawn	In the Great God's Hair	A Draught of the Blue
An Essence of the Dusk.

THE COMPLETE SERIES. Demy 8vo. Fully Illustrated.

The Complete Billiard Player (10s. 6d. net.)	The Complete Oarsman (10s. 6d. net.)
The Complete Golfer (10s. 6d. net.)	The Complete Cook (7s. 6d. net.)
The Complete Association Footballer (5s. net.)	The Complete Foxhunter (12s. 6d. net.)
The Complete Cricketer (7s. 6d. net.)	The Complete Motorist (12s. 6d. net.)
The Complete Hockey Player (5s. net.)	The Complete Photographer (10s. 6d. net.)
The Complete Mountaineer (15s. net.)	The Complete Shot (12s. 6d. net.)
The Complete Rugby Footballer (10s. 6d. net.)	The Complete Yachtsman (15s. net.)
The Complete Swimmer (7s. 6d. net.)	The Complete Horseman (10s. 6d. net.)
The Complete Lawn Tennis Player (10s. 6d. net.)

METHUEN'S SHILLING LIBRARY.

 Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

Messrs. Methuen's New Shilling Library has been an instantaneous success. Write for a complete list. The latest volumes are:—

DAN RUSSEL THE FOX (March 6)	OLD COUNTRY LIFE	S. BARING-GOULD
FIRE IN STUBBLE	THE VICAR OF MORWENSTOW	S. BARING-GOULD
SPLENDID BROTHER	JIMMY GLOVER—HIS BOOK	JAMES M. GLOVER

METHUEN'S SEVENPENNY NOVELS. Fcap. 8vo, 7d. net.

Messrs. Methuen have much pleasure in announcing that they will publish on March 11th next the first four volumes in the above series. The books are—

ANGEL	B. M. CROKER	I CROWN THREE KING	MAX PEMBERTON
PRINCE RUPERT THE BUCCANEER	C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNÉ	THE BROOM SQUIRE	S. BARING-GOULD

Write for a prospectus of the series.

Please write to Messrs. Methuen for prospectuses of "The Connoisseur's Library," "Classics of Art," "Little Books on Art," "Little Guides."

METHUEN & CO., LTD., 36, ESSEX STREET, LONDON, W.C.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 21. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, MARCH 7, 1913

One Penny.

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	645
West or East? —By Austin Harrison, Editor of the "English Review"	646
Facts and Suggestions Concerning Im- prisonment —By Thomas Holmes	647
Women at Work —III. The Chorus Girl —By Margaret Hamilton	648
Countries of the World —IX. Spain— By the Editor	650
The French Philosopher, Bergson —By Henri Mazel	652
Portrait of Henri Bergson	653
The Invasion —Poem—By Ella E. Walters	654
"John Bull's Other Island" at the Kingsway Theatre —By E. Hermann	654

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

AUSTIN HARRISON

THOMAS HOLMES

HENRI MAZEL

W. S. LILLY

ERNEST RHYS

Literary Notes	PAGE
655
Masterpiece of the Week —Walt Whit- man's "Leaves of Grass" (Second Article)—By Ernest Rhys	656
The Masque of Learning	657
A Defence of Cardinal Newman —By W. S. Lilly	658
Recent European History	659
The Sultana's Head —By François Coppée, of the French Academy	660
Correspondence	662
Reviews —
Dante and the Mystics	670
The Theology of the Church of England	670
Along the Road	672
Books of the Week	673

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE is a distinct note of buoyancy about the situation in the Balkans this week. It is true that the military operations drag on wearily, and that there has been no decisive victory. On the other hand, a much more hopeful feeling prevails in diplomatic quarters. It is even rumoured that the war is not likely to be continued beyond another week. Be that as it may, the situation has undergone a marked change for the better, Turkey having announced that she is prepared to place herself unreservedly in the hands of the Powers for the conclusion of peace. Everything now depends upon whether the Balkan Governments are willing to do likewise.

Another impressive reminder of the perils attending Antarctic exploration is furnished by a cablegram with regard to the Mawson Expedition. Following close on the news of the Scott tragedy, its significance is a striking testimony to the risks attendant on these journeyings to the Far South, and, despite the reassuring cables as to the supply of food for the forthcoming winter, a certain amount of apprehension still remains. Nor can this be wondered at, remembering the heavy odds that are against the enterprise. Two members have perished, while Dr. Mawson and his companions, having failed to reach the Aurora before she left, are forced to spend another winter in the Antarctic. Moreover, as the remaining members of the expedition appear to be well equipped in other respects, there is every reason for believing that they will withstand the rigours of a Polar winter without serious mishap.

Considerable consternation has been caused by reports from various parts of England of the lights of supposed foreign airships sailing over the country.

Germany has given an emphatic denial to the suggestion that the supposed airships belonged to her country, and has set forth reasons showing that such journeys were highly improbable.

The remarkable Indian murder trial, in which Lieutenant Clark, a Eurasian, and Mrs. Fulham were charged with the murder of the latter's husband, had a sensational ending on Saturday, when Clark made a full confession of his guilt. "I am wholly and solely to blame," he said. "Mrs. Fulham was acting under my directions. I sent the drugs, and she gave them. She acted under my influence. She is not to blame." The jury returned a unanimous verdict against both prisoners. The Chief Justice, however, deferred sentence.

By the death of Sir William White, Britain loses its foremost naval architect and consultant. Though he retired from the post of Chief Constructor of the Navy some ten years ago, owing to ill-health, Sir William continued to the last to transact a fairly large amount of professional business. At the height of his career he was responsible for a public expenditure which ran into a hundred millions sterling. Such, however, is the progress of naval construction that his most recent battleships, which were those of the King Edward class, are already superseded.

The number of notables who have passed away during the past week is decidedly above the average. The obituary includes, in addition to Sir William White, already mentioned, Earl Nelson, great-nephew of the naval hero; the Marquess of Sligo, the Dowager-Countess of Kenmare, Sir Robert Hamilton Lang, the distinguished banker and financier and a director of the Imperial Ottoman Bank; Lieutenant-Colonel Sir J. F. Bagot, M.P. for the Kendal Division of Westmorland; and Mr. William Gilliland, for twenty years assistant managing editor of the Daily Telegraph.

WEST OR EAST ?

BY AUSTIN HARRISON, Editor of the "English Review"

It was some years ago, at the Kiel Regatta, and we were festively pressing round the Royal yacht Hohenzollern, trying to come within snapshot view of the Kaiser, when suddenly the Emperor's voice rang out, like a drill sergeant's, across the waters:—

"Zurück! Zurück! Zurück mit den Kleinen Booten!"

Instantly the merry scene changed into one of chaos and pandemonium. Quite ruthlessly the water police pushed into the crowd of boats packed with women, children and holiday-makers; girls shrieked; babies cried; one or two boats upset; for five minutes some 200 people were in serious danger of being drowned, and there stood His Majesty surveying the panic, two of the ladies at his side looking very uncomfortable lest a dreadful accident should take place "before their very eyes."

Back! Back! The Kaiser's words, his attitude, the suddenness of the change—on the last day of 1912, I cannot help thinking of them; for Germany stands to-day in a position not unlike that of the Hohenzollern, with the small boats and the jolly-boats pressing around her.

The defeat of the Turks and the rise of the Balkan League have not only changed the face of Europe; they have given her a new meaning, a new course, and redressed the whole balance of military power. To understand the significance of this sudden renaissance of Slav strength and interest, which will now stretch at the base of Germany and Austria from the Adriatic to the Black Sea and, it may yet be, to the very gates of Constantinople, we have yet to pass in review the main results of the Emperor's forward policy since the Imperial plunge into history with the Kruger telegram.

(1) The direct result of that missive was the growth of the German Navy, of Anglophobia, of the Pan-German direction of affairs which was to secure colonies for the Empire, and ultimately to make Germany mistress of the seas.

(2) The next steps were Germany's Chinese policy; the Emperor's patronage of Mahomedanism—in Turkey and Morocco; his policy of "petits soins" towards France; the German hostile attitude to us during the Boer War; towards France in Morocco, which led to Algenciras and the silly business at Agadir, and so to the direct formation of the Anglo-French entente, with Russia as the other friend; in a word, to Teutonism versus Russia and the Western civilisation of Europe.

Taking results only, Germany can point to the creation of a fine Navy—the one absolute success of the Pan-German policy. In almost every other political sphere the Emperor has failed.

The Chinese policy has been abandoned. German colonies, even to-day, are not worth the price of a first-class cruiser. The Pan-Germanic South American scheme of colonising Brazil and other parts of South America are no longer even seriously discussed—so effectively the Monroe, plus the new South American "hands off" doctrines, bar the way. Further-German machinations in Morocco would place her inevitably before a fighting issue, in which eventuality she would have to meet the British Navy. The Russian-Persian penetration policy has estranged Berlin seriously, and now there has come the defeat of the Turks, thus barring Germany's land way to Asia Minor, the goal of which has been nationally laid down as the railway line from Hamburg to Salonica, and thence through the Bagdad railway to Kocit on the Persian Gulf. In all directions—rebuff, failure, the one positive achievement being the German Navy, raised not a little at the expense of the Army, which has set Germany in direct and implacable opposition to British interest and sympathy—it being now axiomatic of British policy to retain at all costs our supremacy of the seas, in which determination Britain is one.

Such, coldly reviewed, is the situation. The Teuton interest stands in the centre of Europe, hemmed in, at bay, facing West and East and now the South in a spirit of injured, sullen aggression. And the new Power that has come raises the problem of her relations towards the extremities into the plane of acute and immediate Realpolitik.

Obviously to the West or to the East, Germany must now look. One or the other it will have to be. She cannot afford to continue her attitude of traditional opposition to the Slav and at the same time hope to strike down our naval supremacy. No Power can afford to incur the hostility of the strongest land and the strongest sea Power at one and the same time. The breakdown of European Turkey is the moral breakdown of the Emperor's Treitschkeian policy. The German Foreign Office will have now to make a fresh start. In her own despite Germany will have to consider afresh which is the greater German interest—her power on land, which was Bismarck's policy, or her power on sea, which is the Kaiser's.

That Austria will be allowed to drag Germany into war—for such would inevitably be the result of active Austrian interference in the Balkan settlement—need not be apprehended. The Emperor will not risk the loss of his Navy at present, as, in the event of a general conflagration, it is certain that we would be embroiled in the fray. Such is not the German idea. No doubt Austria will make faces for some time to come. There will be newspaper crises all the time, but so long as Berlin preserves her equilibrium, Austria will hardly dare to act, for the greater and underlying interest to Germany is the potential clash with Britain, with the dire results that may ensue to her.

Already there is a change in the German outlook. The Bulgarian victories in Thrace have placed Germany suddenly before a very serious problem, which is none other than her political relations with Britain.

Our attitude is plain. So long as Germany builds up to our Navy, so long exactly must we regard her as at any moment our deliberate and most dangerous foe. And more. Continuance of a policy of ship-building rivalry must lead to growing vexation, distrust, exasperation on both sides, which, if power has any meaning at all, will as certainly lead to its employment. Any year now a British statesman may arise who will be big enough to cry "Enough!" And if he does, Britain will respond, and there will be one great decisive naval battle the more.

Very well; and what is the other alternative? This—that Germany should realise both condition and position of compromise; should show us that she has abandoned her "destruction of Britain policy"; that, towards France, towards the world generally, she should put on the toga of humanitarian conscience. We cannot ask her to do this. Frankly, there are few signs that the Kaiser is willing, that the Prussian sociocracy is willing, or that the nation itself is strong enough to force its will upon the Government—the will, that is, of German Social Democracy, which is the only constructive party of peace in the Fatherland.

Failing such a cause, Germany will do either of two things: She may abandon all her interests which touch the Slav, and seek to form a definite alliance with Russia at any price while she is preparing to bring about our destruction—a policy which Britons would be quick to understand and frustrate; or she may seek the obvious way, which is friendship with us, based on a shipbuilding arrangement which would allow us our necessary supremacy. The failure of the Turk is Germany's last defeat in world-diplomacy. She must now cut out a new path. And the easiest, certainly, of the two courses open to her is an understanding with Britain.

We would only demand one à priori condition—the regulation of her shipbuilding programme. If the Germans only grasped that point, an understanding between the two peoples would be easy enough. Moreover, the advantages to Germany would be many. Such is the healthy selfish British point of view. And it is as plain as a pikestaff.

It is so obvious and so easy of realisation that failure on the part of Germany to consummate such a pact must be regarded as tantamount to preparation for hostilities. It will mean this. Germany intends to build up to our naval strength. She does not wish to give up her ambition; she does not care that Europe is, for her sake, an armed camp, groaning under the burden of increasing armaments. In a word, Germany perseveres in her policy of "Full steam ahead"; she remains a fighting issue.

This year—1913—will see whether or no Germany intends to alter the course. This year the Britain and Germany question will be decided; that is to say, either Germany will come forward as our friend, and we shall be able to discover what deal we can make with her about boats, or she will not do so, in which case, the Anglo-German war will have become inevitable. Inevitable because, when two great forces prepare to collide, collision ultimately is the only solution, and, from our point of view, the sooner the better.

The longer we allow Germany to prepare, the fiercer will be the struggle, when it comes. If, in the course of the present year, Germany shows no signs of coming to a reasonable understanding with us, then there is but one alternative for this country. We must have a War Loan. We must at once set to work and build so many ships that Germany dare not attack us, and can no longer hope to build up to us. It is our playing with hope that is so dangerous, this constant idea that Germany is "really not strong enough." Who thought the Boers were strong enough? Or the Allies?

Turkey in Europe has gone. And we may go, just as suddenly, just as unexpectedly, if we do not take the full measure of German policy towards us in the next twelve months. The victory of the Allies has made the question of Britain and Germany the all-paramount one to Europe. Failure to bring about friendship will lead to collision at no very distant date, as impact is the law of cosmic, and even of sidereal, life.

FACTS AND SUGGESTIONS CONCERNING IMPRISONMENT

By THOMAS HOLMES

IF facts and figures can prove anything, the facts and figures I have previously given prove that the majority of our prisoners are not in prison because of their criminality, but because of their poverty or because of their afflictions. I now give a few more facts:

Fact 1. During the year ended March 31st, 1912, 12,864 persons who had already served more than twenty terms of imprisonment were again in prison, some of whom had been sentenced more than one hundred times. Also during the same year 8,438 persons who had been in prison more than ten times, but less than twenty times; 5,520 who had been imprisoned more than five times; and 7,232 who had been in prison four times, were again imprisoned.

Fact 2. That for statistical purposes every sentence is counted as a separate individual by the Home Office statisticians and the Prison Commissioners.

Fact 3. That many offenders served four, five, six or more sentences in one year.

Fact 4. That during the same year 54,403 persons were sentenced to one week or under, 40,954 to more than one week but not exceeding two weeks, and 33,182 were sentenced to more than two weeks but not exceeding one month.

Fact 5. That the average length of imprisonment for 80 per cent. of the gross total of prisoners is about fourteen days. In all, 128,539 persons, whose sentences varied from three days to one month, were detained in prison during the year.

Fact 6. That this method of procedure creates a stage army of criminals that constantly appears before the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction and is constantly committed to prison, is repeatedly tabulated as criminal, although many of the offences are of a petty character.

Fact 7. That our prisons are very largely maintained to accommodate the State-created stage army of criminals.

Fact 8. That during the year, 2,866 prisoners were undergoing terms of penal servitude, of whom 1,157 had served previous terms and 2,340 had undergone numerous terms of imprisonment.

I contend that a few sensible, inexpensive reforms would close one-half of our prisons.

Suggestion 1. That every offender who has a settled place of abode or who can find surety shall have the legal right to demand time allowance for the payment of any fine imposed upon him before committal to prison.

Suggestion 2. That youths under the age of twenty-one years shall be allowed to pay their fines by weekly instalments.

This simple reform would probably reduce by 50,000 the number committed to prison each year.

Suggestion 3. That the State establish industrial and reformatory schools for the criminally inclined weaklings who are at present debarred all educational and reformatory treatment.

Suggestion 4. That Borstal institutions be established for young prisoners of inferior physique, who at present are not submitted to any reformatory treatment, but who form a very large majority of our youthful prisoners.

Suggestion 5. That as mental and physical afflictions are great factors in the production of crime, these afflictions must be taken into account when sentence is given, and prisons adapted to their requirements.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

III.—THE CHORUS GIRL

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

WHETHER midway in the teens or well across the thirties, we are all "girls" in the chorus—the ingénue who thinks a brilliant career will follow on her engagement in "The Forty Thieves," or the woman who has played in twenty pantomimes and as many comic operas. She may have left ambition far behind her, but is still attractive, has learnt her business through and through, and knows every trick of stage craft. Above all, she retains her sense of humour and the inexhaustible good nature that is a salient feature among the rank and file of the theatrical profession. The most noticeable thing about the chorus girl is her vitality, the grip she has on life, the interest she retains on men and things, long after the radiance of the footlights has grown dim. She will arrive at a remote town in the North of Scotland in a blinding snowstorm, no lodging to go to, no hot food to eat, and she will laugh and joke and set out for a tramp in the cold without a murmur.

The big companies on tour travel on Sundays, and, arriving, very often, late at night, the chorus girl has to seek out her rooms and be ready to turn up at the theatre the next morning for rehearsal, spick and span, without a trace of fatigue. Generally, rooms are booked in advance, certain landladies laying themselves out to cater for "the" profession; but in the outlying towns there is often difficulty in arranging suitable accommodation, and cases have been known where girls have had to spend the night at the railway station.

The departure of a theatrical train is a notable sight. The platform is crowded with "pros," come to give the company a good "send-off." Friendships formed on other tours that have long since receded into the dim distance are given a temporary fillip by the reappearance of the man or woman you lost sight of years ago. Fond relations, come to see the last, bring offerings of fruit and flowers; young men strain eagerly to catch a glimpse of their goddess of the footlights, and feel a shock when they find her munching a ham sandwich at the buffet. Huge stacks of luggage, piled upon the platform, are stowed in the van, under the direction of the baggage man, who remains unperturbed and immovable under the distracted entreaties of the crowd as to whether or no he collected their baskets and trunks!

The baggage man, for a few pence, will collect the company's luggage and take it to the terminus each week, thus saving trouble and expense.

Economy is an important consideration to the chorus girl. Her salary varies from a pound to thirty shillings a week, increasing to two pounds in special productions, and, considering all she has to do upon this modest sum, it is essential to keep a tight rein on expenditure. She has to find herself in board and lodging, maintain a smart appearance with good clothes, and contrives, in the majority of cases, to send a few shillings home out of the balance! The nomadic nature of her profession of necessity increases the cost of living, and the wear and tear to one's wardrobe is considerable. The majority of chorus girls are very clever with their needles, and make and fit most of their clothes; the popular opinion that the members of the theatrical profession are undomesticated, thriftless, and extravagant housekeepers, unable to cook a joint or darn a stocking, has long been proved a fallacy. It needs practical capacity of a high order to cater for yourself and three or four others at a cost of ten shillings per head, starting each week in a new place; but this is the modest figure at which many girls live, grouping their resources and taking it in turns to buy the food.

The big tours start in the spring and autumn, and, as a rule, are "booked up" six months ahead. The chorus of a pantomime is engaged the previous March, after the close of the shows then running. Most engagements are obtained through theatrical agents, though some few girls contrive to dispense with their assistance. Some of the choristers have played in pantomime and in the same theatre every Christmas for years. They recall the day when their skirts first brushed the scenery in the wings, and annually renew a camaraderie that exists for the run of the piece only. For one of the most surprising things of the chorus girl's life is the fashion in which she finds and loses friends; the exigencies of rehearsals, the fatigue of travelling, the constant and quick succession of new faces and fresh scenes, render it difficult to sustain a long-continued intimacy.

To chance on an old acquaintance in the "Moorish Market" scene or "The Ball Room of the King's Palace" is one of the delights of the stage. It may be that only during those fugitive few minutes you are both "on" at the same time; but it is the one opportunity you have for reminiscence, for when the show is over everyone, eager to get home, wants to leave the theatre behind.

As a general rule, to remain in the chorus for more than a twelvemonth is to stay there altogether. Personality tells behind the footlights as elsewhere, and the brainy woman finds her opportunity and takes it, securing a "small part" over the heads of her more experienced fellows, with increased salary and the chance of making a score. Of jealousy and heart-burning in such cases there is of necessity a considerable amount, but, if the chorus girl is quick to resent, she very easily forgives, and it needs the qualification of "meanness" to ensure lengthened unpopularity in a caste.

It is in the dressing-room that the chorus girl talks most freely. Each calling has its special traditions, and outside the theatre professional folk inevitably elaborate their salaries and their engagements. "Seven pounds a week, darling," you will hear a lady say, "and a three years' agreement!" And her friend, knowing quite well that the amount is less by a matter of five pounds and the contract for the run of the piece, only murmurs congratulations, and announces that she has been retained to play the lead in the forthcoming West End production. The fact that she may have to borrow her fare to Brixton does not derogate from the effect of this announcement, which is received with every appearance of good faith. In the dressing-room, however, during the "waits" between the acts, or when the principals hold the stage, the armoury of bluff is taken off, and confidences of a more intimate character are exchanged. The flaring gas-jets are lowered, the paints and powders, heaped upon the shelf running down the sides and across the end of the room, lie idle. The gorgeous gowns are taken off, the silks and satins and brocades, the shining armour, glittering head-dresses thrown aside, and there is a lull in the excitement. Slipping on a dressing jacket, some of the girls produce needlework; others read; most of them talk; sandwiches are handed round, with other refreshment. The rest is welcome, for it is hard work to dance and sing throughout an act, and the chorus are generally kept very busy. Admirers are freely criticised and discussed in these intervals. It would be an education to some of the latter could they hear the opinion of the exquisite creatures who smile at them across the footlights. Your chorus girl has a quick eye for masculine vanity, and knows just how much, or rather just how little, lies at the back of male infatuation for a pretty face. Some of the offerings left at the stage door are wrapt in mystery. For years a handsome woman with a fine voice received a present every Christmas Eve. A small package in a crumpled piece of newspaper would be left in her name, and its contents were invariably the same—a large and uncut turquoise! No matter where she was playing, her admirer laid this offering on the shrine of his idolatry.

For the most part, men are not so faithful, and presents, as a rule, bear the sender's full name and address, accompanied by an invitation to supper. But there is another side to dressing-room confidences. At times the mask of gaiety is slipped aside, and one hears a story that sets the chorus girl tingling with sympathy and a warm-hearted desire to help. A little woman with two children to support, fearful of losing her engagement, dragged herself to the theatre in the throes of pleurisy. She broke down between the acts, and sobbed out her trouble. Her husband was in hospital; her children had only her to look to. If she did not work, what would become of them? The girls made a speedy and effective reply. They collected a few pounds among themselves, a larger sum from the stars of the company, sent her home in a cab, and took it in turns to sit up with her at night and nurse her during the day.

There is a communism among theatre folk difficult for more reticent people to understand. On tour, money and clothes—one's best hat and new coat—are at the disposal of your fellows. You share your luck and your sorrow, your prospects and your pence. There is no need to worry how you will find the money for your dinner once you can get from the suburbs to the Strand, if you can only meet a friend who is not out of an engagement.

It was Cyril Maude who, in an address to the Rehearsal Club, commented on the fact that most chorus girls seemed to live at Peckham. He had nothing to say against that spot, except that it was a long way off! How long only those who have walked the distance to and from the agents can tell. The Rehearsal Club has proved a boon to hundreds of members of the profession in placing at their disposal a sanctuary, as it were, where they can rest and take their ease between the matinée and the evening performance. Before its inauguration the girls had to spend the intervening two or three hours either in teashops, wine bars, or one or other of those establishments that tradition dedicates to the profession. Those girls who are "resting"—that is to say, those girls who spend hours upon hours calling upon agent after agent—find the Club invaluable. Good food can be obtained at cheap prices, the news of engagements is freely circulated, and the Club forms, in a word, a useful and agreeable rendezvous for those who for too long had no headquarters.

The big agencies up West, crowded with men and women out of work, show how difficult it is to get a living in the profession, already overstocked. The rooms, hung with portraits of present-day stars, bygone celebrities, are filled with an eager and gesticulating throng. The rumour has gone out that a famous impresario is producing a big show, and everyone hastens to apply for an engagement. Pretty débutantes lounge in graceful attitudes and talk of their successes, secure in the belief that later they will catch the agent's eye. Older hands stand near the door, ready to clutch the great man's coat-tails whenever he emerges for a moment from his inner sanctum. "Anything going to-day, Mr. Blank? You won't forget me, will you?"

Everyone is "dear" in the profession, and "love" and "darling" flavour theatrical speech. At the agents one meets the tragedies of the profession—the comedian who used to draw his thirty pounds a week until, somehow or other, the public taste changed; the tenor who has lost his top note and is struggling to-day for a place in the chorus, and five years hence may be singing outside the doors of suburban public-houses the ballads that once brought him hundreds a week. On the whole, however, it is wonderful how tenaciously both actors and actresses preserve their youth, and a cynic has observed that no actress can really play Juliet with effect until she is old enough to be Juliet's mother, and that no man can really play "Juveniles" until he has been on the stage long enough to lose his figure. If he retains it—the figure, that is—he will be worth his weight in gold.

It is, perhaps, this irrepressible vivacity, this eternal youthfulness of the members of the profession, that more than any other quality redeems their faults and foibles. They have grievances enough and to spare. Often they are kept for weeks hard at work rehearsing a piece which may only last a few nights when it is produced. For these weeks of rehearsals they are paid exactly nothing at all. They have to work and keep their spirits up to concert pitch—to keep their shoe polished, as they say, if the sole is through. They have to put aside poignant griefs and dark memories to keep the public amused. One recalls the pierrot's plea in "Pagliacci":—

"Oh! think, then, sweet people,

When we come before you in our Motley and Tinsel,
Ours are human hearts beating with passion."

Nowadays we all take a wiser, saner, healthier view of the human need for recreation than when, as in the days of our forebears, people spoke of young men being led away by the lure of the stage, or thought that everyone on the other side of the footlights stood in grievous peril. But though the old-time Puritan, with his prejudices and prudery, has passed, there are still those left in our midst who frown upon the chorus girl and think of her as something a little less than human, at whom they really must draw the line. To such we commend the words that Charles Dickens, writing to his son, said expressed his own philosophy on the matter. They are from the mouth of Sleary, the poor circus rider, when he is rebuking the great Gradgrind:—

"Squire, shake hands, first and last! Don't be cross with us poor vagabonds. People must be amused. They can't be always a-learning, nor yet they can't be always a-working; they ain't made for it. You must have us, Squire. Do the wise and the kind thing, too, and make the best of us, not the worst."

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD BY THE EDITOR IX.—SPAIN

[A whole library has been written on modern Spain. I would especially recommend Theophile Gautier's "Travels in Spain," which is still fresh after three-quarters of a century; Ford's "Gatherings in Spain" (Everyman's Library); Mr. Havelock's suggestive and sympathetic "Soul of Spain" (Archibald Constable); Mr. Edward Hutton's beautiful impressionist sketches, "The Cities of Spain" (Methuen); and Mr. Calvert's sumptuous volumes, "Spain" (Dent).]

I.

THE greatness and decline of Spain is one of the tragedies and one of the mysteries of history. A great people, the Spaniards are yet a people apparently decadent and sterile. They are a profoundly religious people, yet they have distorted the Catholic religion into the hideous caricature of the Inquisition, and they have made the Catholic Church an object-lesson and a byword to all who hate her. They have produced the noblest types of saints, such as Saint Teresa, and they have also produced the most repellent type of bigots, such as Philip II. and Alva. They are a generous and chivalrous people, yet they are also a cruel people, and they have exalted the torture of the heretic into a sacred duty, and popularised the torture of animals into a national sport. They are a patriotic and proud people, yet all through the nineteenth century they have plunged the country which they love into the chaos and horror of civil war. They are an imperial people, yet they have been unable to govern themselves. They are a conservative people, yet they have made their great cities, and especially Barcelona, into centres of aimless anarchy and of violent outrage. They are a people endowed with wonderful intellectual and artistic gifts, yet they have not produced one single great thinker or great scientist.

II.

The contradictions of modern Spain may to some extent be explained by physical conditions and by the vicissitudes of history. Geographically Spain is both separated from Europe and joined on to Northern Africa. She is divided from Europe by the impassable barrier of the Pyrenees, and she is united to, rather than divided from, Morocco by the Straits of Gibraltar, which can be crossed in a couple of hours. And for a thousand years she has been invaded and occupied by Semitic tribes—in ancient times by the Carthaginians and in modern times by the Moslems.

And even as the geographical position of Spain is unfavourable to intercourse with Europe, so it has been unfavourable to internal unity. Inland Spain is an arid and ardent tableland, broken up into distinct mountain ranges. If you study a population map of the country, you find that it is densely populated only on the circumference, on the Mediterranean shores, and in the valleys of the Ebro and Guadalquivir. By far the greater part is a sunburnt, tawny, and desolate desert. It is so desolate that, according to a Spanish proverb, a bird crossing Old Castile must take its provision of food before starting on its journey. And its climate is so severe and so extreme that, according to a popular saying, Madrid has nine months of winter and three months of hell. "Nueve meses de invierno y tres meses de infierno!"

It is those conditions of climate and physical geography which have kept Aragon, Castile, Galicia, Catalogna, Andalusia, essentially separate. Their nominal political union was the result of a royal marriage, and was postponed till the end of the fifteenth century, but their real divisions continued down to our own time, and at the beginning of the twentieth century we find Catalonia, the most prosperous part of Spain, with the commercial capital, Barcelona, agitating in favour of political separation.

III.

Any moral or political unity which Spain has been able to achieve has been achieved not through peaceful intercourse, but through religious war. The national history of Spain has been the history of a crusade extending over nine hundred years. The first Moslem entered Spain at the beginning of the eighth century (711), and the last Morisco left the enchanted paradise of Andalusia at the beginning of the seventeenth century (1607). This religious war has made the modern Spaniard, has moulded his character, explains his vices and virtues, his heroism and exclusive absorption in religion, his military conception of life, and his aversion to commercial and industrial pursuits, his resignation and his fatalism. The Castilian has become the soldier of orthodoxy. Spain has become a nation of monks and of priests, a country where the Church and State were indissolubly united, where the State insisted on conformity, where the Inquisition became a political institution, perverting the very meaning of Christianity, which is based on a separation between the spiritual and the temporal powers, between what belongs to Cæsar and what appertains to God.

IV.

To the baneful influence of religious persecution there has been added the equally baneful influence of imperialism. It was an evil day for Spain when the heroic Genoese persuaded Ferdinand and Isabella to provide him with a flotilla for the quest and conquest of the New World. It was an ill-fated union, the marriage of a Burgundian prince with the lunatic Johanna, which added the Netherlands and Italy to the Spanish dominions. Under any circumstances, the new imperial tasks would have proved too difficult and too burdensome for the people of Spain; but the Spaniards entered on those tasks with the spirit of the Inquisitor, and with the spirit of the seeker of gold, combining the worst motives of religion with the worst motives of the adventurer. Both motives and methods have been equally fatal to successful colonisation. From the fifteenth century to the end of the nineteenth, Spain sent her best men and spent treasure on the gigantic and impossible task which she had undertaken—forcing a tyrannical régime upon rebellious subjects for the benefit of a handful of officials and "Conquistadores." At the beginning of the nineteenth century all the colonies of South America had broken away from the mother country. Before the end of the same century, Cuba and the Philippines were taken away from her as the spoils of a disastrous war.

V.

But the humiliating defeats of the American campaign proved a blessing in disguise. So far from the war having had a depressing influence on national prosperity, it produced almost immediately an economic revival. Freed from the incubus of Cuba, the Spanish people deliberately set themselves to put their house in order, and devoted their energies and their resources to internal reform. Unfortunately, the people continue to be sadly hampered for lack of enterprise, lack of capital, and lack of education. The iron mines of Bilbao in the north, as well as the copper mines of Andalusia, are almost entirely worked by foreign capital and remain under foreign management.

And even as the Spaniards are hampered in their industries by lack of capital and lack of enterprise, they are also hampered in their agriculture by governmental incapacity and by the land monopoly of the Spanish Grandees. Spain is in chronic terror of drought, and the prosperity of agriculture is largely dependent on efficient irrigation. Yet the irrigation works are to-day almost exactly as the Moors left them four hundred years ago. A proud and effete aristocracy, possessing huge estates, especially in the fertile south, is more concerned to improve the breed of bulls for the corridas in the national amphitheatres than to introduce agricultural reform.

VI.

The history of Spain is often represented as pre-eminently a history of national failure. No judgment could well be more unfair. It is true that Spain has kept aloof from commercial pursuits, that she has shared very little in the intellectual and scientific culture of the modern world, and that she still continues to dream her mediæval dream of an exclusive and intolerant orthodoxy. But to say that Spanish civilisation has been sterile is a travesty of history, and is the basest ingratitude. Has Spain not borne the brunt of the great battles of Christendom? Has she not saved the West from Mohammedan oppression? Has she not saved Europe from the sad fate which has overtaken all the nations that have come under the Crescent? And in days more recent has she not saved Europe from the despotism of the Corsican? But, above all, has she not continued to influence and to enrich the world through her artists and her saints, through that marvellous Society of Jesus, which is entirely a creation of the Spanish genius? And is not the whole continent of South America, which tomorrow will be inhabited by hundreds of millions, in the secure possession of the descendants of the Spanish Conquistadores?

And last, not least, has Spain not made European civilisation her debtor through her splendid language, the language of Cervantes, the noblest language born of Imperial Rome, and has her genius not found imperishable expression in one of the most creative, one of the most original, and one of the most inspiring literatures of all times?

THE plaza is the focus of a fire, which blood alone can extinguish; what . . . reviews and razzias are to Gauls, mass or music to Italians, is this one and absorbing bull-fight to Spaniards of all ranks, sexes, ages, for their happiness is quite catching; and yet a thorn peeps amid these rosebuds; when the dazzling glare and fierce African sun calcining the heavens and earth, fires up man and beast to madness, a raging thirst for blood is seen in flashing eyes and the irritable ready knife, then the passion of the Arab triumphs over the coldness of the Goth.—Richard Ford.

THE FRENCH PHILOSOPHER, BERGSON

BY HENRI MAZEL

I.

MONSIEUR HENRI BERGSON is regarded by many as the greatest of living French philosophers, and it is certain that he is the best known. Even the man in the street has heard of him, and Parisian society women jostle each other at his lectures at the Collège de France. Articles about him abound in reviews, and even in newspapers. Hitherto they have been invariably laudatory, and even enthusiastic; recently there have been some less favourable ones, but these serve only to provoke renewed applause. A book was published a short time ago in English, somewhat severe in tone, which, it appears, is about to draw a decisive answer from one of his disciples. But this, after all, is life, and, for a philosopher, it is better to live in a whirlwind of admiration and criticism than to perish in the silence of indifference. From this point of view no philosopher lives more intensely than M. Bergson, for his philosophy is all the rage.

II.

Only fifty-three years of age, he is therefore still a young man. His hair is just beginning to turn grey; he is well built, and pleasing in appearance; he has a fine, penetrating glance—eagle-eyed one might call him; his forehead is broad, and its beautiful modelling reveals itself, owing to his partial baldness; his somewhat thick black moustache is clipped closely enough to show the subtle curve of the mouth; his slightly heavy underlip, and the horizontal line of the eyes, would denote his Jewish origin if his name did not immediately reveal it. I hasten to add that nothing in his work nor in his mental processes suggests this origin; herein he is very different from Spinoza, the only satisfactory explanation of whose system lies in the Hebrew Kabbalah.

III.

His whole person breathes a fascinating charm. On all those who have been his pupils he has made the deepest impression; and the crowds who faithfully attend his lectures testify to the steady hold which he maintains over his audience. His facility of speech is astonishing; without notes, leaning sometimes on the right elbow, sometimes on the left, he expounds in ever elegant phrasology the most obscure or the most technical problems, in such a manner as, if not to make them clear, at least, to give rise, in those who listen to him, to the illusion that they are clear. And as each of his lectures is well composed and well balanced, and partakes of the nature of a work of art, his audience leaves the lecture-room of the Collège de France ready to endorse the most extreme praises of his admirers.

IV.

Here we must quote a few of these eulogies. M. Edouard le Roy considers that "the revolution produced by M. Bergson is as important as that of Kant, or even as that of Socrates." To M. René Gillouin he is "the only first-rate philosopher whom France has produced since Descartes, or Europe since Kant." M. Georges Sorel recognises in him the thinker who serves to interpret and complete Karl Marx, and who, in consequence, holds in his brain the solution of the modern social problem. Others praise him as an author, a prose poet, and also, above all, as a writer on æsthetics and metaphysics. Europe has had "no greater metaphysician since Hegel, nor France since Malebranche." Others, and these need fear no contradiction, accord to him the credit of having been a marvellous awakener of minds; the initiator of a vast intellectual movement which reaches, as I was saying, even the very man in the street; the restorer of the importance of philosophy, which was in danger of being neglected, and which now, rejuvenated by him, and endowed with new weapons, can aspire to the rôle which belongs to it, that of fighting the new scholasticism and the barbarism of science.

V.

In this chorus of praise there is probably some element of justifiable protest against the unfavourable attitude apparently maintained towards him by the educational authorities. Education in France, as everybody knows, is divided into higher education, provided by the Faculties, and secondary education, which youths who aspire to the diploma of "bachelier" receive in the lycées and colleges. Now, M. Bergson has never been connected with higher education. He has only been a mere assistant lecturer in the Faculty of Letters at Clermont-Ferrand, and it was in the unassuming position of professor at the Collège Rollin and the Lycée Henri IV. that between 1888 and 1898 his value as a philosopher began to claim attention.

VI.

At the present time his contribution to philosophy consists mainly of three great works, "Time and Free Will" (his thesis for the doctorate, written in 1889), "Matter and Memory," an essay on the relation of the body to the mind, and "Creative Evolution," the mere title of which indicates its originality, as compared with the usual conception of Evolution.

All these works emanate from the same philosophic inspiration, but they mark the gradual definition and precision of M. Bergson's system in such manner that one must know them all if one is to be able to give a general opinion on the ideas of this thinker. It would be rash to attempt to express such an opinion in a few lines when the problems dealt with are so difficult, and when the thought informing them is as subtle and varied as his. As one of his disciples says, "There is, perhaps, no philosophy which appears to the superficial reader more open and easy of access, and there is certainly none more baffling and difficult to grasp." Not only would a long article be necessary to give a just appreciation of the Bergsonian conception of the idea of time, and the demonstration that, scientifically, time does not last, but it would also be impossible without much amplification to explain the rôle in consciousness which M. Bergson attributes to intuition, the difference which he establishes between intuition and intelligence, and at the same time the intellectual aspect which he maintains in his theory of consciousness; as he says in his very pictorial style, "Intelligence is the luminous nucleus formed by means of condensation at the expense of that fringe of confused images which constitutes the domain of intuition." We shall, therefore, content ourselves here with attempting to note the general aspect of the Bergsonian system, and the position which it appears to occupy in the life of modern ideas.

VII.

On the whole, M. Bergson's philosophy belongs to the great movement of reaction against the philoso-

(Continued on page 654.)

HENRI BERGSON, NATUS 1860

phies of determinism, realism, and positivism which a quarter of a century ago reigned uncontested. This last philosophy, springing from the powerful brain of Auguste Comte, elucidated by so vigorous a thinker as Taine, and directed by Ribot towards psycho-physiologic studies, had rendered great service to the human mind, but had left unsatisfied many of its most legitimate aspirations. The same movement which was to provoke a renaissance of symbolistic poetry and idealistic art against realistic art and literature was to revive in the realm of philosophy the study of metaphysical and moral problems. To this vast movement are related all the pragmatist tendencies of English and American thinkers, and in France, connected with it in varying degrees, we find the theory of personalism, arrived at by the venerable Renouvier in his old age, Alfred Fouillée's theory of motive-ideas, Boutroux' study of the contingencies of the laws of nature, Tarde's studies, which might all be termed studies of social contingencies, the pluralism of M. Boëx, better known in literature under the name of Rosny senior, and, lastly, M. Bergson's several theses on intuition, on the absolute, on duration, and on liberty.

VIII.

Among this brilliant staff of great thinkers, what exactly is the rank of the last-named? To investigate this question would, perhaps, be somewhat unprofitable.

Time sets most things in their right place, and we shall have to wait a little while to know whether there is nothing but a dark and gaping void between Descartes, or even Kant, and the author of "Creative Evolution." What, at least, is beyond doubt is that the thought of no living French philosopher is so subtle, so varied, expressed in language so elegant and poetical as that of M. Bergson. And this is of no mean importance, even to the foreigner.

THE INVASION

LO, the Springtime's yellow army
Marches out upon the land!
With what silent tread and stealthy
Each division takes its stand.

See the pale primroses scouting,
By the roadside and the banks;
While the daffodils are marshalled
In battalions and in ranks!

Now, their golden trumpets blowing,
All reserves they summon up;
Mark them come through marsh and meadow,
Yellow flag and buttercup.

See them crowding in the copses—
Watch them gathering in the glade—
Even the grim city borders
Are not free from such sweet raid!

With the lark to pipe reveillé,
And the breeze to guide the way,
Rapidly this ruthless army
Captures fresh hearts every day!

ELLA E. WALTERS.

"JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND"

AT THE KINGSWAY THEATRE

THIS admirable performance constitutes one more proof—if proof is still needed—of the thoroughness with which Mr. Shaw has purged our present-day theatre of theatricality. As in the majority of plays at present running, the most striking thing about the acting is its force of conviction and its freedom from the rhetoric of conventional stage-craft—its wonderful naturalness, as the man in the pit would phrase it. Mr. Louis Calvert sets the standard as Broadbent, though there is little to choose in this respect between him and Mr. J. D. Beveridge as Father Dempsey. Mr. Beveridge is at an advantage, however, in a character which is less manipulated by the author, and therefore more palpably alive than any other in the play. The rest—and Broadbent most of all, perhaps—are Shavian editions of humanity. They are human enough, but they are unmistakably "revised" to prove a thesis; for with all its human colour and movement, the play is not so much dramatically interpreted life as dramatically conducted argument.

Yet none of the characters are puppets, least of all the likeably hateful (or should it be hatefully likeable?) Broadbent. An Englishman of the obtusely sentimental kind, most absurd when most in earnest, and most clever when making a fool of himself; fatuous, sententious, addle-brained, hiding some very unlovely qualities beneath a veil of genial stupidity, he is entirely convincing. And he represents the attitude of a certain section of the English mind towards Ireland all the more forcefully because he is a man first and a type afterwards. Nothing could be better than the informal conference in Corney Doyle's garden, where the voluble electioneering babble of the absurdly serious Broadbent is foiled by the dry shrewdness and acute, if narrow, judgment of Father Dempsey and the bitter sarcasm of Larry Doyle. Clever writing and effective acting keep perfect pace in this scene. Miss Ellen O'Malley's Nora is another piece of good acting, with a praiseworthy sense of the author's values; and, indeed, the whole cast is excellent, though one pities Mr. William Poel his task of making the unconvincing real as Peter Keegan.

"John Bull's Other Island" is a full-flavoured exposition of one aspect of Mr. Shaw's philosophy. It is also a vital bit of the real Ireland. And if the author's mordant wit and uncanny cleverness tend to make one forget at times the wood in admiring the trees, the reality of the thing soon recaptures the mind.

Something of the tragic soul of the broken and vanishing Gael is in the play, and the unsentimental treatment spells poignancy where a "Celtic-revival" method would fail. Larry Doyle, the Celtic sleeper who has woken up, turning from dreams to grip reality with naked hands, yet eating his heart out all the time because reality is so brutal and dreams are so unreal, is a bit of Ireland. And Nora and Peter Keegan, yes, and even Mat Haffigan, in his way, stand for another bit. Melancholy as bog-water and as ineffective, devoured by sterile imaginings, blanched with futile brooding—the Ireland that tempts one to say that God wanted to do something with it once and then forgot. The only failure in the play is mad Peter Keegan. He ought to convince us of his sanity; he only succeeds in making us think him a little less mad than the rest.

E. HERMANN.

LITERARY NOTES

THIS month celebrations will take place on a national scale in connection with the birth of David Livingstone, and I doubt not that many readers of EVERYMAN will be anxious to read and, I hope in many cases, re-read the story of the career of the great African missionary and explorer. The question naturally arises, Which is the best biography? Having had occasion to read all the Lives of Livingstone more than once, I venture to say that there is no single work which gives a complete and wholly adequate record of the man and his work.

* * * * *

In order to get a fair idea of Livingstone as missionary, philanthropist, explorer, and scientist, one must read two biographies—Professor Blaikie's and Sir Harry Johnston's, the one being really the complement of the other. Professor Blaikie's, which was first published in 1880, and is now in its sixth edition, is a model of what a popular biography should be. But it has one defect. Its author, who was a Scottish clergyman, magnified, as was perhaps natural, the missionary side of Livingstone's career at the expense of the scientific. It was the character of the man that most interested Blaikie: Livingstone's discoveries and researches he has treated scantily, and, on his own showing, not unintentionally.

* * * * *

Sir Harry Johnston's biography, on the other hand, is wholly unsympathetic to Livingstone as a pioneer of Christian missions in Africa, but is invaluable as a record of his exploring work. Having himself travelled in Livingstone's footsteps and entered minutely into the recorded details of his work in the Dark Continent, Sir Harry writes with unimpeachable authority. Moreover, his book, like Blaikie's, is finely written. The work originally appeared in "The World's Great Explorers" Series, but has now been re-issued in shilling form, a remark which also applies to Blaikie's book: I ought to add that Livingstone's own volumes make profitable reading.

* * * * *

Is the reading of poetry on the decline? The question has been suggested by a perusal of a recent number of the Poetry Review, a shilling monthly imbued with the laudable desire of promoting, in Matthew Arnold's words, "a clearer, deeper sense of the best in poetry and of the strength and joy to be drawn from it." Certainly, no one who scans the publishers' lists week by week can be ignorant of the fact that a large amount of poetry is published. But under what circumstances does it make its appearance, and who buys it?

* * * * *

Except in a few cases, which might almost be numbered on the fingers of one hand, poetry is not a marketable commodity. The bulk of it is published at the author's risk, and, not infrequently, it happens that the poet is compelled to take half of the copies for distribution among his friends, the rest being sold as "remainders." It does not, therefore, follow that, because more poetry is published nowadays than formerly, there is a larger public for it. On the contrary, I should say there is a steady decline in the reading of poetry, and I mention the existence of the Poetry Society in support of this view.

* * * * *

But the point I wish to drive home is that, while there appears to be fewer readers of poetry, and certainly fewer buyers, the number of persons who practise the art of versification is on the increase. How are we to explain this singular phenomenon? There are, it seems to me, a very large number of people who honour the Muse, but honour her in not the most desirable way. They do not read the masterpieces which she has inspired, but take to scribbling verses on their own account. No editor requires to be told that there are an appalling number of "inglorious Miltons." Every poet brings him heaps of unprintable verse. The versifying habit is a harmless one, and, provided the person addicted to it does not rush into print, may even be commendable, but all such versifiers would be better employed in fostering an intelligent interest in, and proper appreciation of, poetry that really counts.

* * * * *

The announcement that the committee of the London Library propose to publish a new Author Catalogue will gladden the heart of many a literary worker. The Catalogue published some ten years ago has proved a valuable work of reference not only on the score of comprehensiveness, but because it revealed for the first time the authorship of many anonymous and pseudo-anonymous publications. The new work will be on a much larger scale. It is expected to run to about 3,000 pages, and will include the eight substantial supplements which have been published since 1903. The work is to appear in two volumes, and will be sold to members at 26s., which is the bare cost of printing and binding.

* * * * *

Some weeks ago, in referring to a costly edition of Mr. Kipling's works which Messrs. Macmillan were proposing to bring out, I ventured the remark that some difficulty might be experienced in disposing of 1,050 sets at twenty-three guineas each. But I was reckoning without my host, for Messrs. Macmillan announce that the whole of the Bombay edition has already been subscribed—two months before the publication of the first volume. Of course, Mr. Kipling's popularity in India, as everybody knows, is very great. Nevertheless, it is amazing to learn that a thousand persons have been found who are prepared to show their admiration to the tune of twenty-three guineas.

* * * * *

As a supplement to the Life of Disraeli, now in course of publication, Mr. Murray has collected, and proposes shortly to publish in one volume, some of the less known of Disraeli's early writings, including much new matter. To these collected papers, which are of historical, biographical, and literary interest, Mr. W. Hutcheon will furnish an introduction and explanatory notes. The volume will be similar in form to the Life.

* * * * *

Mr. Gosse has played so notable a part in literary criticism for many years that there ought to be a big demand for the edition of his collected critical works which Mr. Heinemann has in preparation. The edition is to consist of five uniform volumes—"Seventeenth-Century Studies," "Gossip in a Library," "French Profiles," "Critical Kit-Kats," and "Portraits and Studies." Why, I wonder, is "Questions at Issue" not included? It contains some of Mr. Gosse's best critical work. The essays on "The Tyranny of the Novel," "What is a Great Poet?" "The Limits of Realism in Fiction," "R. L. Stevenson as a Poet," and "Mr. Kipling's Short Stories," one reads again and again. I, for one, hope to see "Questions at Issue" find a place in the collected edition of Mr. Gosse's critical writings.

X. Y. Z.

MASTERPIECE OF THE WEEK

WALT WHITMAN'S "LEAVES OF GRASS" * * * BY ERNEST RHYS

(SECOND ARTICLE)

I.

IN his prose book of 1870 Whitman said that Democracy was "a great word" whose history was still unwritten. It was "in some sort younger brother of another great and often used word, Nature," whose history also waited to be told. He traced there the effect of the world-movements of men, current over the face of this planet, that were on the scale of the impulses of the elements. And then he turned to the part in the human economy of the single individual, the single soul, and to the mystery of that soul's Identity—the "miracle of miracles" he called it. It was out of these two simple ideas of his, the idea of the race and the multitude, and the idea of the individual, that he got the direct impulse for his "Leaves of Grass." The title is the symbol of the multitude and the close association of men. "The prairie-grass dividing," he says,

"I demand of it the spiritual corresponding,
Demand the most copious and close companionship of men,
Demand the blades to rise of words, acts, beings,—
Those of the open atmosphere, coarse, sunlit, fresh, nutritious. . . ."

And, again, in another page, as the old Welsh poet Taliesin turned to sing how, in his spirit's transmigration and development, he had passed from the Vale of Hebron to the war-fields of Alexander, Walt Whitman turns to realise himself as the new "Cursor Mundi":—

"My spirit has pass'd in compassion and determination around the whole earth,
I have look'd for equals and lovers and found them ready for me in all lands,
I think some divine rapport has equalised me with them.

"You vapours, I think I have risen with you, moved away to distant continents, and fallen down there, for reasons,
I think I have blown with you you winds;
You waters I have finger'd every shore with you,
I have run through what any river or strait of the globe has run through,
I have taken my stand on the bases of peninsulas and on the high embedded rocks, to cry thence :

"Salut au monde!
What cities the light or warmth penetrates I penetrate those cities myself,
All islands to which birds wing their way I wing my way myself.

"Toward you all, in America's name,
I raise high the perpendicular hand, I make the signal,
To remain after me in sight forever,
For all the haunts and homes of men."

II.

The American poet's reliance upon the force and validity of his new message gave him the courage to use a form of expression unlike that of any other poet of our time. One cannot read far in his book without becoming aware that he is quite singularly without any sense of the poetic and literary convention, and rather deficient, too, it may be, in the accepted art of words. But, as if becoming aware in himself of the impossibility of finding an equation between the accepted poetic tradition of his time and the need he felt to express himself in his own way, he had the courage to recognise to the full the necessity this put upon him, and to look for a rhythm and an idiom fit for his purpose. As he wished to have the courage to see things with his own eyes, he was determined to find a voice for them and to say them frankly, fearlessly, and even with a certain audacity in his own way. We have to allow for the fact that at the time when he began to write there was much in the popular literary fashion in the United States which was but a poorer imitation of the popular modes on this side of the Atlantic to challenge the fighting spirit in a poet of original power. So it is that here and there one comes upon pages in his work which seem written out of bravado, to break the spell of respectability and the literary proprieties. Moreover, one has to allow for the fact that in many of these poems he was experimenting and seeking to express what had never been expressed before, and what, according to the usual acceptance, was at many points quite inexpressible. Allowing for these difficulties which he undoubtedly felt, we must agree that he did succeed in finding a rude, powerful, and eloquent rhythm, which at its best remarkably conveys his meaning. Try, for instance, the page in which he has the vision of the new city of his spiritual commonwealth:—

"I dream'd in a dream I saw a city invincible to the attacks of the whole of the rest of the earth,
I dream'd that was the new city of Friends,
Nothing was greater there than the quality of robust love,
it led the rest,
It was seen every hour in the actions of the men of that city,
And in all their looks and words."

The pendant to this may be found in the same section of his book, which he calls Calamus, and it touches on that other conception of the real significance of the United States of America as being in some sort predictive of what we may now call the United States of the World:—

"Come, I will make the continent indissoluble,
I will make the most splendid race the sun ever shone upon,
I will make divine magnetic lands,
With the love of comrades,
With the lifelong love of comrades.

"I will plant companionship thick as trees along all the rivers of America, and along the shores of the great lakes, and all over the prairies,
I will make inseparable cities with their arms about each other's necks,
By the love of comrades,
By the manly love of comrades."

III.

In his "Democratic Vistas" he affirms his determination to accept and to face every problem, however counter it may seem to his own idealistic philosophy, which America and the United States thrust upon his consciousness. He writes: "I hail with joy the oceanic, variegated, intense practical energy, the demand for facts, even the business materialism of the current age, Our States. But wo to the age or land in which these things, movements, stopping at themselves, do not tend to ideas. As fuel to flame, and flame to the heavens, so must wealth, science, materialism, unerringly feed the highest mind, the soul." No man or woman, no individual, however mean and despised, however much at odds with fortune and the good things of the world, but, by the divine principle within him or her, and the divine right of a citizen of that republic, can accept the message that Walt Whitman sought to deliver. "Whoever you are," he says,

"The divine ship sails the divine sea for you.

"Whoever you are! you are he or she for whom the earth is solid and liquid,

You are he or she for whom the sun and moon hang in the sky,

For none more than you are the present and the past,
For none more than you is immortality.

"Each man to himself and each woman to herself, is the word of the past and present, and the true word of immortality;

No one can acquire for another—not one,
Not one can grow for another—not one.

"The song is to the singer, and comes back most to him,
The teaching is to the teacher, and comes back most to him,

The murder is to the murderer, and comes back most to him,

The theft is to the thief, and comes back most to him,

The love is to the lover, and comes back most to him,

The gift is to the giver, and comes back most to him—
it cannot fail,

The oration is to the orator, the acting is to the actor and actress, not to the audience,

And no man understands any greatness or goodness but his own, or the indication of his own."

IV.

If it were sought, finally, to give to the reader who does not already know the book some glimpse of the more tender and imaginative of its pages, one might point to the song written at the death of President Lincoln, "When lilacs last in the courtyard bloomed," a part of which has been set to very moving music by Sir C. Villiers Stanford:—

"Prais'd be the fathomless universe,
For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious,
And for love, sweet love—but praise! praise! praise!
For the sure-enwinding arms of cool-enfolding death.

"Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?
Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all,
I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly.

"Approach, strong deliveress,
When it is so, when thou hast taken them I joyously sing
the dead,
Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee,
Laved in the flood of thy bliss, O death."

For the rest, the book can safely be left to speak for itself. It is hardly as a book to be judged among books, but as the living testament of a man who wished to get rid of the bookish tradition altogether, that it ought to be treated. It goes better with the open air and the open road than it does with the library and the indoor life, by which most of us are bound. Years ago a song was written by a fellow-countryman of Walt Whitman's, the late editor of the Century Magazine, Richard Watson Gilder, and it may serve as the envoy to the poet they signal:—

"When the true poet comes, how shall we know him—
By what clear token,—manners, language, dress? . . .

"Thus shall ye know him—this shall be his token:

Manners like other men, an unstrange gear;

His speech not musical, but harsh and broken

Shall sound at first, each line a driven spear;

For he shall sing as in the centuries olden,

Before mankind its earliest fire forgot;

Yet whose listens long hears music golden.

How shall ye know him? ye shall know him not Till ended hate and scorn,

To the grave he's borne."

THE MASQUE OF LEARNING

IN the Great Hall of the University of London a famous play, or pageant, is to be given next week, which, when played at Edinburgh last year, proved a nine days' wonder, and something more. It is cast in the form of a masque on the grand scale, setting forth in picturesque, salient episodes the growth of Learning, mediæval and modern. The whole has been designed by Professor Patrick Geddes, who has always known how to combine imagination with his science and scholarship; and in this spectacle of the ages, led by wisdom, on their march through time, he has given us a new sensation of their human effect and their gradually unfolding intellectual resources. The scenes presented are chosen after a natural plan.

After a brief prologue, the masque opens with the Barbarian celebration of victories over Rome, and thus begins with modern Europe in its infancy. It proceeds to deal with all the significant forces, both internal and external, that have left their mark on Western civilisation. The masque portrays these vividly in its many contrasts of the cloister and the world—hermit, monk, and friar, burgher and knight, wizard and scholar. In it the heart of Mediæval Europe will be seen as its own day saw it: at one time the spectacle and the fun of an old-world fair at Montpelier, where we shall see prelates and knights passing through motley crowds of market women and customers, pedlars, beggars, and children. Abelard appears with his sweet pupil Heloise. Moorish merchants bring strange manuscripts to a Paris fair, and Michael Scot discovers they are Aristotle's. There follows the setting up of colleges at Oxford, Paris, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, after the Dominicans and Franciscans have shown their share in the story of mediæval culture.

The Renaissance is then presented, at first in its small but significant beginnings—in the prison of Roger Bacon, in the laboratory of the alchemist, and with the first printing press. Legend and History walk side by side—Faust will follow Bacon and Michael Schwartz. Faust appears in all his folk aspects, as dreamer and self-deceiver, culture hero and type of science; as alchemist and wizard he seeks the elixir of life and the secret of love; as type of science he is shown as the traditional inventor of printing.

The Renaissance proper appears in all its splendid colour: the stately and cultivated courts of Lorenzo the Magnificent, of Ferdinand and Isabella, whence Columbus sets forth; More presents Erasmus and Holbein to Henry VIII.; the great Elizabethans present themselves in their most characteristic gathering—the Mermaid Tavern: Ben Jonson and Raleigh presiding at the punch bowls, Chapman and Beaumont and Fletcher talking to Ben, and Shakespeare sitting at the middle of the table.

The final act sums up, in spectacular procession and grouping, the Present of University and City. Alma Mater and Mater Civitatis cæ æ in separately upon the stage, but they go out hand in hand, and with this beautiful allegory the masque concludes.

It is a great and splendid undertaking. Professor Geddes brings his masque from Edinburgh to London, where it will undoubtedly repeat its northern success. It will be presented in the Imperial Institute, South Kensington, on the evenings of March 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th, at 8 p.m., with a matinée, Saturday, March 15th. The prices of admission range from two to ten shillings. A thousand performers take part in it, as players, orchestra, and choir. Ten thousand Edinburgh school children witnessed the pageant, and to them History had no finer illustrator.

A DEFENCE OF CARDINAL NEWMAN BY W. S. LILLY

THE Editor of EVERYMAN has asked me to make a few observations upon the estimate of Cardinal Newman recently contributed by M. Houtin to these pages. I have the greater satisfaction in complying with this request because I think few men now living are better qualified than myself for testifying what manner of man Newman was. With his writings I am intimately acquainted, and during the ten years which immediately preceded his elevation to the Sacred College I was in close and constant intercourse with him. That is my warrant for addressing myself to the task of correcting the errors, both of fact and of judgment, into which M. Houtin has fallen.

I.

First, then, let me note some of M. Houtin's errors of fact. He tells us that for Newman "the whole question [between the Anglican and the Roman Church] turned on which of the two was apostolic in its succession and doctrine." That is not so. The matter of episcopal succession was very little in the mind of Newman at the period of his life when he had to make his election between the English and the Catholic Communion, or, indeed, at any other period. We may say the same of questions of the tenableness or untenableness of this or that dogma. The question of questions for him always was Catholicity. The words which gave the death-blow to his Anglicanism were, as we all know, those of St. Augustine: "Securus judicat orbis terrarum." He came to the conclusion, as he puts it in his "Letter to the Duke of Norfolk," that "to believe in a Church was to believe in the Pope." Again: M. Houtin would have us suppose that Newman "paid no attention to the daring speculations" of the higher criticism about the Bible. That even early in his career he did pay attention to these speculations, and fully understood their importance, will be evident to anyone who will read his tractate on "Difficulties of Creed and Canon." Another rash and indefensible statement of M. Houtin's is that the "Essay on the Development of Doctrine" is "very poor from the point of view of learning." I do not know what M. Houtin's pretensions to learning may be. My own opinion—and I believe it to be the opinion of scholars generally in this country—is precisely the reverse of that thus expressed by him. "In 1864," M. Houtin informs us, "Newman was attacked by Charles Kingsley, who cast a doubt upon the sincerity of his conversion." It is quite true that in 1864 Newman was attacked by Charles Kingsley. It is not true that Kingsley cast a doubt upon the sincerity of his conversion. What the charge brought against him by Charles Kingsley was I shall have to note later on. A little further on in M. Houtin's diatribe we are told that Newman "did not preach well"—and this in the face of the Oxford Sermons and the two volumes of Catholic Discourses! It was my privilege to hear Newman preach, on several occasions, in his own church at the Birmingham Oratory, and I never heard words more impressive in their chiseled simplicity than those which fell from him. I remember, too, that there were few dry eyes in the church at Farm Street when he delivered his address at the funeral of Mr. Hope Scott. Finally—not to weary my readers with refutations I pass over other charges—M. Houtin declares that Newman's Essay on Miracles and his Essay in aid of a Grammar of Assent, "are, to minds of a certain order, text-books of scepticism." Well, what of that? Jeremy Taylor, in his "Holy Living," remarks, "If a man will snatch the pure taper from my hand and hold it to the devil, he will only burn his fingers, but shall not rob me of the reward of my care and good intention." To infer from the misuse of some of Newman's writings by "minds of a certain order" that he taught scepticism—which apparently is what M. Houtin asks us to do—is palpably absurd. Where will "minds of a certain order" find a more copious fountain of scepticism than in the Bible itself?

II.

And now to come to M. Houtin's judgment of Newman. He pronounces him to be an artist rather than a thinker or a scholar, and makes merry over his love for the violin, upon which he was a performer of no mean excellence. "It is always a tune upon the violin," is M. Houtin's estimate of Newman's writings in general. He quotes the story—a true one—that Newman, being challenged by an anti-Popery lecturer, a certain Dr. Hugh McNeile, to a public disputation, declined, adding that if Dr. McNeile would open the meeting with a speech, he would respond with a tune on the violin, and the public might judge which was the better man. The notion of the polished and fastidious scholar that Newman was disputing with the Hibernian Boanerges before a mob whose general ignorance should be the arbiter, is as grotesque as the irony of his response is delicious. But M. Houtin cannot leave Newman's violin alone. He describes the most powerful and pathetic paragraph with which the Essay on Development concludes as "nothing more than a tune" on that instrument. The Apologia is for M. Houtin "a splendid tune on the violin." The Essay in aid of a Grammar of Assent, he declares, "is the summing up of all the airs upon the violin by which a man may convince himself of the truth of what he feels to be uncertain, even improbable"; and in the penultimate sentence of his article he has a parting sneer at "the violin melodies."

This alone may suffice to indicate the spirit in which M. Houtin has written. Of course, there is an element of truth in his indictment. Newman was no dry, hard, unemotional thinker. He knew well that logic is not the sufficient guide of life. Music was to him—as he has expressed it in a magnificent passage of his Oxford University Sermons—"an outward and earthly form, or economy, under which great wonders unknown seem to be typified." "Those mysterious stirrings of heart and keen emotions, and strange yearnings after we know not what, and awful impressions from we know not where," he deemed to "have escaped from some higher sphere," to be "the outpourings of eternal harmony in the medium of created sound." Poetry he held, with the old Greek philosopher, to come nearer to vital truth than history—although history, as he tells us, was "the ladder by which he climbed into the Church." He was, in a word, a born Platonist, and I know of no better indication than the epitaph which he wrote for his tomb of the view of life and death which he would sometimes express to those whom he judged to have ears to hear: Ex umbris et imaginibus ad veritatem. Yes, to him the invisible world was more real than the visible, the noumenal order than the phenomenal. And

I suppose no one who knew him well, who was admitted, as was my privilege, into the inner sanctuary of his thoughts, could have helped noticing that often when he spoke of divine things his face, like St. Stephen's, was, as it were, the face of an angel. More than once he made me think of the words of the poet: "Her eyes were awful, for you saw that she saw God."

III.

M. Houtin's attack upon Newman—whatever we may think of its good taste—is, I must admit, intelligible enough. M. Houtin's whole career—I am well acquainted with his writings—since he came before the public has been a defiance of authority. From first to last, submission to authority was the guiding principle of Newman's life. He could find nothing better to say to his Catholic Bishop, after his reception, than that he would endeavour to obey him as well as he had tried to obey his Protestant Bishop. And that Catholic Bishop has testified that no Prelate ever had a more loyal and dutiful subject. Again, M. Houtin and those with whom he is associated—they may roughly be called Modernists—have a special grudge (if I may be allowed the word) against Newman. They speak evil of him because he did not run to the same excess of riot as they have done. This is, indeed, indicated by M. Houtin with a candour which must be allowed to be praiseworthy. After stating that Newman's Essay on the Inspiration of Holy Scripture "quite fell in with the views" of these gentlemen, and that the Essay in aid of a Grammar of Assent "stood them in even better stead," he goes on to confess the truth about the matter. He acknowledges that "the priests who thus exploited Newman's writings"—note the phrase—"knew perfectly well that their conclusions far outran his premises, that the line which they took was altogether different from his, and that had Newman been alive he would have disowned them with horror. But they were in need of a shelter, of a lightning conductor: they found it under the Cardinal's purple." Precisely. That is an exact statement of the proceedings of M. Houtin's Modernist friends. They mendaciously endeavoured to make it appear that Newman was altogether such a one as themselves; and—as M. Houtin goes on to say—"when they were condemned by Pius X. they replied that, with them, he condemned the Cardinal; that they had but followed his lead." M. Houtin calls this "a comedy." I venture to call it a fraud—and, what is worse, a fraud upon a dead man. It was congruous that the most effective vindication of Newman from the charge of Modernism should come from Pius X. himself, in his autograph Brief to the Bishop of Limerick.

IV.

"They daily mistake my words; all that they imagine is to do evil," might well have been Newman's complaint of these false disciples if he had lived to see them. It is a curious reward for his unflinching sympathy for those whom he used to speak of as "the little ones of Christ," a sympathy which was the outcome of his large-mindedness and his unflinching charity. I remember his remarking to me once, "The promises of God are Yea, yea, not Nay, nay." Gentleness was his "strong enforcement." There was nothing about him of the zealot, the heresy hunter, the delator. Thus, his attitude to his separated Anglican brethren always was, "You have come a mile with me: Oh, that you would come twain!" Is there anywhere to be found a kinder and more courteous bit of controversial writing than his "Letter to the Duke of Norfolk"? Even in replying to Charles Kingsley, who had brought against him the terribly wounding and utterly groundless accusation that he thought lightly of the virtue of veracity, he exhibited wonderful self-restraint; and the severer things which he thought it his duty to say when he wrote the Apologia disappeared from subsequent editions. That he was sensitive, even "morbidly sensitive," as M. Houtin delights to repeat, I know well. And he, too, knew it well. Has he not left us the self-accusatory lines—

"I'm ashamed of myself, of my tears and my tongue,
So easily fretted, so often unstrung,
Mad at trifles to which a chance moment gives birth,
Complaining of Heaven, and complaining of earth."

But his faults were ever before him, and his life-long endeavour, as an Oratorian, to correct them by the example of "the Saint of gentleness and meekness," his patron, Philip Neri, to whom he had ever so great a devotion, largely succeeded. As he approached the end of his earthly pilgrimage, he, if I may so speak, mellowed, ceasing to think of "old, unhappy, far-off things, and battles long ago," and accepting gratefully and gladly the reverential regard shown him on all sides. He had gone on his way weeping, and bearing forth good seed. It was given to him to come again with joy, bringing his sheaves with him. It is good to think of him both in his strenuous and suffering manhood and in his sweet, wise old age: good to recall the memory of "A soul supreme in each hard instance tried,

Above all pain, all passion, and all pride,
The rage of power, the blast of public breath,
The lust of lucre and the dread of death."

RECENT EUROPEAN HISTORY *

MR. HAWKESWORTH, in his new volume, has attempted to do for the nineteenth century what Professor Lodge has done for the fifteenth and Mr. Johnson for the sixteenth century—that is to say, to give, within the compass of a small octavo volume, an outline of the chief European events during that century.

The task is no easy one. The reconstruction of Europe after the fall of Napoleon, the revolutions and counter-revolutions in France, the action of the Russian Czars, the struggle in Greece, the conflict between Austria and Germany, later the Franco-Prussian war, the occupation of Egypt, and the troubles in South Africa—these, and more than these, have to be dealt with by any historian of the nineteenth century.

The best chapter in the book is that headed "The Liberation of Italy." Here the subject lends itself to clear and straightforward treatment; there is no anti-climax, no confusion of detail obscuring the dramatic unity of the story. The motive which induced Louis Napoleon to interfere in the affairs of Italy is given in a thrilling paragraph. "The siren voice that lured him on was, appropriately enough, a voice from an island in far-distant seas, the voice of the man of Saint Helena. Little did the fallen Emperor imagine, when he re-edited his career for the benefit of posterity, that his own nephew and destined successor would be the most uncritical of his many dupes." The "Napoleonic Legend" led Napoleon, III. to believe that the motive of the earlier conquests had been the desire to spread the gospel of liberty to an enslaved Europe, and he dreamt that in aiding Cavour to throw off the Austrian yoke he was following in the footsteps of his famous predecessor—with what results we all know.

* "The Last Century in Europe." By C. E. M. Hawkesworth. 5s. (Arnold.)

THE SULTANA'S HEAD

BY FRANÇOIS COPPÉE, of the French Academy

SULTAN MAHMOUD, son of the great Murad,
Waking or sleeping, hungered in his soul
For one thing only, for Byzantium.
Sometimes, reclining in his light caique,
Rowed o'er the tide by twenty stalwart slaves,
With brooding heart he heard across the foam
The city's droning hum, and saw the cross
On San Sophia's still unravished shrine
Hang mirrored in the azure Bosphorus.
The thought tormented him as the gadfly's sting
Torments the courser. Well the sultan knew
His need of soldiers, and he lavished gold
Upon his janissaries; but long peace
Had wasted all their valour, and their greed
No gifts of gold could ever slake or quench,
But ever grew the clamour, "Give, give, give."

Wise was Mahmoud, and knew the ways of men:

One day, with deep intention, wearying
Of all their venal cries, he fiercely smote
Their aga on the mouth, and shut himself
At Broussa, in the walls of his harim.

Then swift to anger was the soldiery:
Soon mutiny with sibilant hiss and hoot
Roared like a sea around the ancient pile
That towered aloft, dumb, blind, and terrible.
The rebel soldiers thronged before the wall
Browned by the blaze of centuries of suns,
To fume and rave in stormy discontent.
For rumour had been busy,—he, their lord,
That cast such scorn upon them, far within,
Deep in the shady coolness of a bower,
Where scarce at noon a sunbeam glimmered, lay,
Lolling on cushions, an effeminate wretch
Drugged by a philtre. Yes, 't was said a girl,
A blue-eyed slave girl from Epirus bought,
Had triumphed over all his old desires
Of battle and of conquest. He, Khalif,
Mahmoud the Second, careless of his fame,
Would henceforth live for nothing but delight
Of sensual ease, and, his guitar in hand,
Trill Persian love songs. As the great sea-tide
Swells to the flood, so swelled their rebel wrath.
"Shame on the lecherous dastard! Shame, shame, shame!"

Their angry murmurs rise on every side,
Like the loud buzzing of the summer flies.
The largesse, late demanded, now no more
Is in their thoughts. "Blood, give us blood," they cry,

"We want red war and battle. Othman's sword
Has rusted in the scabbard. Does he think
To fatten us on rice and flesh for nought!
Three farthings daily would be pay enough,
Had we a chief that dared to draw the sword,
And not this slave of woman's wanton eyes.
Let him come out, for we must speak with him,
By Allah, must we. Nor will we attend
His leisure for our answer. Ho, the gate!
Open this instant ere we burst it in;
We are no dogs, that they should cry, 'Begone!'

The sultan! Ho, the sultan! Have him out!
Thus with clenched hand and mutinous shout they rave.

Nathless the massive golden-studded door
Within its Moorish arch remains fast shut,
And still fast shut is the seraglio.

At last Khalil Pashá, the grand vizier,
The sultan's well-belovéd, who alone
Of all the courtiers durst approach the door
Of that harim and call his master's name,
Knocks without cease and will not be denied.

Stretched on a broad divan luxuriously,
An aigrette gleaming 'mid his turban folds,
In his most secret chamber, where perfumes
On golden tripods steam, he found Mahmoud.
Soft and voluptuous o'er his favourite's lute
His nerveless fingers, idly wandering, strayed,
While she, the queen of him all Islam's lord,
Now cause of such disloyalty to him,
Lay at his feet upon a lion's hide,
With scarce a veil to screen her ivory limbs
Except the masses of her raven hair.
With deep obeisance and submissive hand
Khalil awaited grace vouchsafed of speech.
"What would my faithful vizier?" said the king.
"Ill-chosen is the time to come unbid
And trouble me in this my privacy:
For my sultana's eyes are wondrous fair,
And I was telling o'er her matchless charms
In verses Hafiz' self need not disdain."

"By Allah, noble son of great Murad," Answered Khalil, "worse chosen is the time
For amorous dalliance and for poesy.
Thy rebel troops will burst the palace gates!
Still them, O master, with thy conquering eye.
Show thyself. By thy presence call them back
To duty and obedience. Seeing thee,
They will bethink them of their homage due:
But thou must show thyself, or be undone."
Gravely the old man spoke, but all the while Mahmoud, scarce heeding, smiled upon his slave,
Who, with a shyness that did but enhance
Her beauty, hid herself behind her lord,
Clasping her arms about him, wild affright,
Dilating eyes blue as the violets are,
Her soft throat pressed, regardless of the smart,
Against his caftan's rough embroidery
Crusted with rubies upon cloth of gold.

"Gentle as lambs I'll make these mutineers," Answered the Sultan. "Well I know how true
The love and honour of my janissaries.
It pleased me to be sullen,—nothing more.
They wish to see their Sultan,—that is well."
Then beckoning to the Nubian chamberlain,
To Djem, who tastes each dish before his lord,
Who licks the very stone whereon to spread
His lord's prayer-carpet, gently he unwound
With all a lover's amorous tenderness
Her arms around him lovingly entwined,
And two words whispered in the negro's ear.

Then, followed by his gray-bearded vizier,
With stern and gloomy majesty that seemed
Too proud even to hear the distant roar,
Straight to the danger's front he passes down
The porphyry stair, whose stone-wrought balustrade

Was writhed about with dragons, confident
In his great self and all-sufficing word.

A roar of voices! Lo, the heavy gate
Has turned upon its hinges, and displays,
Resplendent in the sunset's misty gold,
Fezes and turbans surging in the square,
A sea of colour. Mahmoud stood erect.
The archway's shadow framed his jewelled form.
On him ten thousand flashing eyes were fixed,
And myriad voices joined in one acclaim.
Full cautiously Khalif, the old vizier,
Followed his master; then the chamberlain,
Coming a little after, took his place
Behind them gloomily, and in his hand
Was something hidden in a leathern sack.

Three paces to the front the Sultan strode,
And stood upon the threshold, looking round
On the base herd that roared and seethed below,
With such disdain that straight that human tide
Ebbd backward. Curt and terrible his voice,
"What would ye?"

At his word the mutineers
Felt all their high-flown insolence fade away.
Dead silence fell upon them for a space.
Again, his voice now vibrating with wrath,
"What would ye?" asked the padishah.

At length
A veteran soldier, tried in many a fight,
Bearing three poniards girded in his sash,
Trained in the wars of Bajazet Pashá,
Stepped from among the foremost of the crowd,
And came anigh the Sultan where he stood,
And lifting up his face, seamed with old scars,

"Commander of the faithful," he began,
"Head of Islám, both body and soul to thee
We all belong forever. We demand
Nothing; our wages are enough; we hope
Only to win thee glory by our death.
Suffer the oldest of thy father's guard
Who under him, not without honour, fought
Iskander-beg, Hunyadi, and Drakul,
To speak the truth in all-sincerity.
Commander of the faithful, thou art loved,
Thou art revered; and, if thou seest here
All these thy people swept by passion's gust,
It is because they hear that thou art sunk
In wantonness and soft effeminacy,
A woman's slave. Oh, prove to us, my lord,
This rumour but a slander. Mount thy steed;
Put on thy warrior harness once again.
Thy falcons know their quarry. Show it them
In Greece or in Albania. Cast them off,
And they shall stoop and bring thee back the prey.
And here speak I for all thy janissaries,
As true as I am Muslim and Hadgi."

"But for thine honourable scars, ere now
My hand had spilled thy blood upon these stones," Exclaimed Mahmoud. "'Tis true then they believe
A fancy weighs so much with Murad's son.

O fickle mob, to think a woman's kiss
Had sapped the courage of this dauntless heart.
And ye believed it too, O herd of fools!
Brawlers ye are, not soldiers; ye believed
The lion fettered in a flower-twined band.
Good! Ye shall see the mark his talons leave.
Ye dare accuse me, Sultan, me, Khalif,
Me, upon earth the visible image of God!
Ye sons of dogs, take my reply.—Behold!"
He spoke in clarion tones, and as he ceased
He plunged his hand, the white hand of a king,
Into the sack of leather offered him
By Djem, the eunuch, kneeling. Then he drew
Suddenly and brandished at the staring crowd
A bloody head just severed from the trunk.
It was the violet-eyed Sultana's head,
Which in his foul, abominable sack
The obedient eunuch brought to him still warm.
Cut to the neck-bone from the throat across,
Below the masses of the raven hair
Blood-soaked, where toyed a little while ago
Mahmoud's soft hand, the white hand of a king,
That dreadful head, still seeming half alive,
The eyes dilate with fear and lips drawn back,
Dangled in his firm grasp. He held it up,
And hideous drops spotted the marble's white.
And for a moment's space the crowd, struck dumb,
Stared at the monstrous trophy, which distilled
Unceasingly great goutts of crimson blood.
Sudden, the sun slow sinking in the west,
Who from of old beholds the crimes of men,
Flushed to a blood-red crimson in his turn;
Red murder's red reflection lighted up
The waste of waters and the waveworn shore.
His orb seemed like a vision weeping blood;
And straightway all the vast horizon round,
The circling ring of forest-covered hills,
The seaport bristling with a thousand masts,
The minarets whence at eve the praise of God
Resounds, the cupolas of the massive mosques,
The markets and the quarters of the town
Where sounds the hum of toil, the Sultan's self
Before the door of his seraglio,
The horsehair ensign streaming on the wind,
The crowd, the sky, the sea, were all one red,
Presaging hideously the seas of blood
Mahmoud the Second was about to shed.

Small heed of that dread symbol took the herd
Of miserable dastards. With a shout
Of wild enthusiasm and savage love
They cheered the prince who played the headsman's part,
Tickling their mood with such a spectacle.
With shouts of "Allah" and the Prophet's name,
The soldiers grovelled at their Sultan's feet,
Kissing with rapturous lips his caftan's hem,
And fixing eyes of transport on his face.

But when in scorn he would withdraw himself
From the caresses of the ruffian horde,
As one who flings his hounds their carrion raw
To mouth and rend, so Mahmoud flung the head
Far in the midst of that infatuate crowd,
Which took it with a yell of horrid joy.

Well pleased then turned Mahmoud to his vizier,
And pointing with a gesture to the mob
Whom his all-powerful presence and his crime
Had roused to frenzy, "Now," said he, "'tis mine.
Now will those dogs take me Byzantium."

—Translated by R. B. Townshend.

Enormous reductions

Mudie's Sale is full of good bargains—books of permanent value and interest—published within the year—can often be picked up at one-fifth their published price.

There are two hundred thousand volumes in the sale—Novels, History, Travel, Drama—practically every recent work which is worth a place in the library—also many special bargains in pictures, stationery, art-stationery and statuary. If you cannot call, send for the 36 pp. catalogue.

MUDIE'S SALE

March 3rd to 20th.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.
43, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.
132, Kensington High Street, W.

Some Specimen BARGAINS.
Steinhell, Marguerite. My Memoirs. 8vo. (Publ. 10/6 net) Sale Price, 2/8
Oulbert, Yvonne. Struggles and Victories. 8vo. (Publ. 10/6 net) Sale Price, 2/8
Hearn, Lafcadio. The Japanese Letters of 8vo. (Publ. 12/- net) Sale Price, 5/-
Madin, Sven. Trans-Himalaya Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. a vols. (Publ. 30/- net) Sale Price, 5/-
Dumas, Alexandre. My Memoirs. In six vols. Crown 8vo New. (Publ. 36/-) Sale Price, 10/6
Caquet, The Right Rev. A. F. A. The Greater Abbeys of England. Royal 8vo. New (Publ. 20/- net) Sale Price, 3/9

CORRESPONDENCE

PROFESSOR SAINTSBURY AND RUSKIN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I believe that many of your readers who, like myself, trace very much of their interest in the real things of literature and of life to the master-spell of John Ruskin will be heartily sorry to see the article by Professor Saintsbury which appears in your issue of February 21st.

Alike in matter and in tone, I venture to think that it misrepresents not merely the author of "The Crown of Wild Olive," but the noble book itself. Surely, after all the years which have passed, Ruskin can claim fuller consideration than is implied in the colloquial attack represented by "Carlylese" and "fantasticalities of the Ruskinian sociology." It has been my privilege very carefully to study the masterpiece in question, and I am bound to say that Professor Saintsbury's article conveys no impression other than that the book is a miscellaneous collection of perverse and provoking criticism of modern conditions. Surely Professor Saintsbury knows Ruskin better than that! To take but one illustration out of many, I cannot understand how any person can profess to give an account of "The Crown of Wild Olive" without mentioning the amazingly fine introduction to the lectures themselves. I find no reference whatever to this in the article in question, but instead I see a remark ("The Crown of Wild Olive" occupies, of course, a place among the earlier utterances of the new mode") which appears to be a paraphrase of the "New Style" metaphor which certain daily journals hurl at their opponents! I observe further that, although nothing is said concerning the introduction, there is an unfortunate reference to the appendix which contains notes upon Carlyle's "Frederick the Great."

I fear, sir, to trespass further upon your space, but I should like just to inquire the precise meaning of the following sentences: "The fallacies and fantasticalities of the Ruskinian sociology were, of course, at once perceptible to those who had eyes to see and lay open to endless satirising by those who had pens to write. But it was forgotten that they were addressed to an increasing number of persons who had neither." It seems that the suggestion of the latter part of the passage is that the teaching of Ruskin appeals not to those who see and who can express their thoughts in writing, but to those who cannot do the one nor rise to the other. If this be the intentional significance, I feel it necessary to enter an emphatic protest. Ruskin was often partial, often mistaken (as he admitted himself), but surely we can expect a more sympathetic criticism and a more coherent attack—if this last must be—than Professor Saintsbury's.—I am, sir, etc.,

REGINALD C. SIMMONDS.

Gravesend.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I think there must be many readers of Professor Saintsbury's article on "The Crown of Wild Olive" who feel with me a sense of profound disappointment no less with its conclusions than with its pervading "tone." Sociology, whatever we may think of Ruskin's literary labours therein, is clearly not Professor Saintsbury's field, and his criticism of the literature connected with that branch of science suffers in consequence. But, apart from that, surely a responsible critic of a "masterpiece" ought to have

THE

BRITISH REVIEW

ONE SHILLING NET MONTHLY.

FROM MARCH CONTENTS.

Aerial Defence	G. H. Mair
Imperial Co-operation	Lt.-Col. Alsager Pollock
England, Ireland and Rome	Richard Fitzwalter
The Future of Female Suffrage in England	The Rt. Hon. F. E. Smith, K.C., M.P.
Fiscal Reform—II	Hilaire Belloc
The Poet in the Back Streets	J. C. Squire
Poetry	Owen Seaman, Thomas Moulton
The Soul of the Drunkard	Edwin Pugh
More Mediaeval Byways—III	F. L. Salzmann, F.S.A.
Munchausen: The German Comic Giant	W. L. George
Obiter Dicta	The Editor

LONDON: WILLIAMS & NORGATE.

GLAISHER'S PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS. William Glaisher, Ltd., beg to announce that they have just issued a Supplementary List No. 393 to their General Catalogue of Publishers' Remains, comprising all the latest purchases. Post free on request.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD., Remainder and Discount Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London, W.C. Readers residing in Croydon and neighbourhood can view all the books at our Branch shop, No. 14, GEORGE STREET, CROYDON, where complete catalogues can be obtained.

UNITARIAN PUBLICATIONS FREE.

"CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS."
Rev. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

"FIVE POINTS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH."
Dr. MARTINEAU.

These publications sent free, also information on Unitarianism. Apply by letter to Mrs F. HILL, 36, Heath Street, Hampstead, London, N.W.

taken his task more seriously than to be content to give us a so-called "analysis" of the effect produced upon him by the said "masterpiece" when he read it "many years ago"! One would have thought that a "masterpiece" deserved re-reading, not necessarily with a view to any possible modifications of opinion which lapse of years and added experience might have brought, but to secure that a reasonably accurate idea of the work might be given as a result.

Instead of this, however, we are treated to a niggardly note or two about the book itself, a few literary allusions, and some splenetic interrogations for "spice," which serve to disclose at once the questioner's total inability to appraise the merits of the "workers' case, and a morbid distrust of the class whose aspirations he fails to understand. We continue to hear and read a good deal about the "fallacies and fantasticalities of the Ruskinian sociology"; we should be better pleased to see them exposed by these superior people who betray such anxiety to keep us out of the "ditch" which Ruskin has so cunningly prepared for us.

It was hardly to be expected that Professor Saintsbury would have let an opportunity of getting in a sneer at the "working classes" go unseized. Let it be said that, supposing the professor's idea of the "working class" to be quite strictly correct, which it isn't, it does not in the least detract from the nobility and moral value of Ruskin's words.

Professor Saintsbury is careful to pick out a passage which seems to suit one of his own particular prejudices. He does not tell his readers (what he must be aware of) that Ruskin never fails to insist that the fee shall be paid—i.e., that food, shelter, and clothing be primarily assured to every one willing and able to work—this being the necessary condition of men's minds being liberated from thinking of "the fee" and directed to thinking of "the work." It could be easily shown by quotation, did space permit, that Ruskin firmly believed and taught that a person should have not merely this "irreducible minimum" of "fee," but considerably more. (Compare Section 31 of this book.)

Suppose we supplement the professor's quotation—"the work is always to be first, the fee second"—by this further quotation from Section 42: "but, at least, we may even now take care that whatever work is done shall be fully paid for; and the man who does it, paid for it, not somebody else." etc., etc.—I am, sir, etc.,

HARRY T. FORMAN.

Swadlincote.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As a working man's son, I hardly know whether to be amused or indignant when a person in the privileged position of the Professor of English Literature at the University of Edinburgh takes occasion to denounce "the so-called working classes" from the heights of professorial rectitude for putting "fee first and work second." Professor Saintsbury appears to forget that if he is at liberty to devote himself to the pursuit of congenial tasks on a comfortable income, it is only because the irksome toil of the world is performed by less fortunate people on what to the professor would seem a beggarly pittance. What is the "fee" and what the "work" that these wicked people fail to regard in proper correlation?

So far as the professor's courteous designation may be taken to include women workers, it is possible, by a happy coincidence, to refer your readers to the facts recorded by Miss Hamilton on another page of the same issue of EVERYMAN in which the pronouncement under discussion appears. Perhaps Professor Saints-

Sampson Low, Marston & Co.'s FIRST SPRING LIST.

A Greater Romance than "The Broad Highway."	THE Amateur Gentleman. By JEFFERY FARNOL. Author of "The Broad Highway," "The Money Moon," etc.	Crown 8vo. 6/- 612 pages.
The Novel of 1913.	THE BROAD HIGHWAY. By JEFFERY FARNOL.	Crown 8vo. 6/- Illustrated prospectus gratis.
18th Impression.	THE MONEY MOON. By JEFFERY FARNOL.	Crown 8vo. 6/- Prospectus post free.
Edition de Luxe 10/6 net.	DAME FASHION, 1786-1912. By JULIUS M. PRICE.	Crown 4to. £3 3s. net. Write for prospectus.
3rd Edition.	HOW I FOUND LIVINGSTONE. By the late Sir H. M. STANLEY. WITH SPECIAL MEMOIR.	Crown 8vo. 3/6. 552 pages.
155 Coloured Plates	MYTHS OF THE MODOCS. By JEREMIAH CURTIN, Author of "The Mongols in Russia," etc.	Demy 8vo. 12/6 net. 402 pages.
and 50 Half-tonn Illustrations.	Major Greville, V.C.: A Tale of the Boer War. By G. G. MUNNIK.	Crown 8vo. 8/- Most descriptive and exhilarating.
Centenary Edition.	Staffordshire Pottery and its History. By Josiah C. Wedgwood, M.P.	Demy 8vo. 10/6 net. Write for full prospectus.
Fully Illustrated.	THE Baxter Handbook, 1912-13. By C. T. COURTNEY LEWIS, Author of "George Baxter (Colour Printer)," etc.	Foolscap 8vo. 8/- net. Specimen page gratis.
An Important Folk-Lore Book	LONDON: 100, SOUTHWARK STREET, S.E.

HIDDEN POWER.

Remarkable Results follow Experiments of Clever Scientist. Marvels of the Mind.

Many serious writers view with alarm the tendency of the present day to disregard physical development, and prophesy that the future will bring forth a race of people whose motor muscles have disappeared and whose brain development is abnormal. Such a state of things, obviously, will not arise in the lifetime of this or the next generation; but the fact of such a possibility being seriously considered by the greatest authorities draws imperative attention to an insistent, undeniable fact—we are now turning from the age of Muscle to the age of Mind.

No advocate of any school of thought can afford to disregard the importance of physique in the formation of national character and destiny; but now the public recognise that physical culture is but the means to an end—the supreme efficiency and domination of the mind.

The lack of knowledge that has hitherto prevented mind-culture has been gradually and surely overcome, and it is now justifiably established that the mind can as surely be developed, strengthened, and made strong as can the physical organs.

Students of social questions are learning with delight of the widespread interest that all classes, both men and women, are taking in this important national question, and can discern the improvement in mental calibre that is taking place.

The Work of an Enthusiast.

One of the most enthusiastic advocates of mind culture at the present time is Mr. Frank Hartley, who founded the London Institute of Menti-Culture. Although originally founded as an experiment, the immediate success with which his system has met has made it necessary for Mr. Frank Hartley to give up all his research work to devote his whole time and energies to the Institute of Menti-Culture. In a recent interview with a Press representative, Mr. Hartley explained the scope of his menti-culture movement:—As is now well known, I have devoted the best years of my life to the study of psychology and mental efficiency, and the outstanding fact that burnt itself into my brain was the lamentable lack of self-knowledge among the masses. While carefully collecting and sifting scientific data concerning the particular qualities that have led well-known men and women to success and power many interesting facts were revealed. For instance, mere knowledge alone has achieved, and will achieve, little or nothing; that misleading colloquialism, luck, is merely the envious explanation applied by failure to success. No, the gift that has brought all successful careers to the pinnacle of success lies much deeper.

It is the hidden power to apply the right force to their everyday affairs in a manner which will surely place them in a position of superiority in all their dealings with their fellow-men. It is only now becoming realised that this power is latent in everyone, and, with correct training, can be developed to an extent which will bring immediate and gratifying results in every case.

How Mr. Hartley's Campaign Began.

As you know, I commenced my own campaign in Menti-Culture by adopting a bold course. At a cost of many hundreds of pounds, I have carried my message to thousands all over the world by means of a specially printed edition of my latest book, "How Failure Becomes Impossible." The public were quick to recognise the soundness of my teaching, with the result that the principles of Menti-Culture are being practised all over the country.

The practical results are discovered by the student from the very beginning, and the particular gains reported at once are: (1) Increased will power; (2) Concentration created and maintained; (3) Nervousness and self-consciousness overcome; (4) Power of correct observation and judgment, etc., etc.

It should be understood that my system, although yielding such priceless results to the student, does not entail any irksome restrictions or departure from everyday life. When revealed, it is astonishing in its simplicity.

There are, I am sure, still a great many readers who are interested in the subject of mind training, and to those who will take the trouble to write to me I will make a special concession. Upon request I will send not only my book, "How Failure Becomes Impossible," but also a lesson in Menti-Culture free. Those who wish to may enclose two penny stamps, for postage, etc., but in any case a mere request will bring the book and lesson. Simply write Mr. Frank Hartley, Room 54, London Institute of Menti-Culture, 35, Wellington Street, London, W.C.

bury may discover an aggravation of working-class wickedness in Miss Hamilton's closing sentence!

The average "fee" paid to the adult working man, to enable him to maintain himself and those dependent on him, to purchase the means of physical and intellectual recreation, and to make provision for the uncertainties of the future, near and remote, is certainly not more than 30s. a week. In return he has to present himself at the factory gates at six o'clock every morning, summer and winter, fair weather and foul, leaving for home again at five in the evening, begrimed and weary.

The "so-called working classes" are human beings in precisely the same sense as are Professor Saintsbury and the persons whose welfare is his most intimate and anxious concern. Does he recognise this? And would he for one moment entertain the proposal that he himself, or any one of the persons mentioned, should be compelled to live under the conditions described? If not, on what ethical standard does he base his right to upbraid his fellow-men who find such conditions intolerable for themselves?

Lastly, Professor Saintsbury cites with approval Ruskin's doctrine of work. But the master, who speaks so highly of work, also tells us that "toil is degrading." I would respectfully suggest to your eminent contributor that he should ponder the truth contained in these words and let it influence his attitude to those to whose toil he owes his ease.—I am, sir, etc.,

W. G. HARDY.

Norton-on-Tees.

MR. BERNARD SHAW AND RELIGIOUS REFORMS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—What on earth does your contributor, Charles Sarolea, mean? He actually accuses Bernard Shaw of not having taken any interest in religious reforms. If the accusation were that he took too little interest in economic questions, while, of course, it would be unjust, it would not move me to protest, but when one has in mind Mr. Shaw's ceaseless warfare against the materialistic sordidness that passes for religion in our churches to-day, such an accusation is quite incomprehensible. It seems almost ridiculous and superfluous to have to repeat it, but what is "Man and Superman" if not religious? Is not Mr. Shaw the only writer who can show us what true religion is? It is his constant theme, in his plays and in his other writings. What was his recent debate about? His life's work has been an effort to develop the soul of man and to bring heaven down to earth. The sort of person who calls this materialistic is more often than not that very commercially-spiritually-minded individual who imagines that to believe in a heaven hereafter as a "reward" (vulgar word) is to have a "sublime" faith. He is selfishly individualistic, and does not like to think that his essence is to be mingled in the larger hope of the future of the human race; that this, indeed, is the only immortality of the soul that he can or should desire.

Then as to the price of Shaw's works. One might remark that the policy of selling books cheaply is not always prompted by public spirit. But in Mr. Shaw's case, there are his Fabian tracts, his 4d. and 6d. editions of his plays, his 1d. editions of his lectures on "Modern Religion," etc. But the real point involved here is this: Is Socialism going to be advanced by the anarchic method of individual self-sacrifice? The man who gets in front of the main army, only to be slain to no purpose, may be a martyr-hero, but he is none the less a foolish and useless person. The bomb-thrower has more sense than he.

Also is it not about time we heard the last of that oft-repeated statement that Bernard Shaw is merely a disciple of Nietzsche or Bergson or Ibsen? Shaw had made his name before he heard of Nietzsche, and not one of these three writers ever wrote anything remotely comparable to a Shaw play for originality of thought in the application of philosophy to life.—
I am, sir, etc., E. DERWENT.
London, N.

READING IN HOLLAND.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As to the Dutch not being a reading people, I may speak with some authority as the leader of a publishing institution which issues "cheap and good" books—starting with novels, plays, volumes of poetry for 4d. up to new novels of modern authors for 3s. 2d.—like the well-known French volumes. Our publications comprise the very best of original and foreign work in every branch. And in the seven years since we started we sold over a million copies, averaging 150,000 volumes a year, which, considering that our output, in number of works published, means only 1-50th of the yearly amount of books issued in our country, does not appear a bad record for a population of six millions of people.—I am, sir, etc., L. SIMONS,
Editor of "The World's Library."

THE MODERN CALVINIST AND PROGRESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I, like a host of others, am one of those who welcome EVERYMAN weekly into their reading. Nevertheless, I hope I may be allowed to protest when—as this week—I fall upon a label which is surely a libel. I refer to remarks made in the article on "G. K. C." as a heretic by Professor Sarolea. We are to believe, it seems, that "the modern Calvinist" (an undefined term, including whom?) does not believe in progress, but only in "salvation and damnation from all eternity."

I should imagine that only ignorance, of the sort one associates with lower types of Anglican and Roman clergy, or merely prejudice, could be responsible for a statement so curiously untrue. It certainly requires explanation. But perhaps the misunderstanding (to try to be more charitable) is detected at one of its main sources farther on in the article, when one sees the Protestant view of truth represented as being stereotyped in a book, while to the "Catholic" (the Roman variety is meant, one supposes?) truth is progressively revealed in a living Church. On the other hand, sir, the Protestant believes firmly, whatever you may make of it, in the progressive leading of God's Holy Spirit, bringing individuals, churches, communities onwards to wider and clearer and higher views of truth. For "God reveals Himself in many ways."

I must not fail to close, as I began, with a word of thanks for EVERYMAN.—I am, sir, etc., J. D.
Dundee.

"G. K. C. AS A HERETIC."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your article on Mr. Chesterton in the issue of February 14th makes me realise how difficult it is for Catholics and Protestants to understand each other's position, for I do not recognise the Protes-

The Best of the World's Books.

SEND A POSTCARD for any of the following Lists:—

CATALOGUE OF

10,000 BOOK BARGAINS

New and Secondhand. English and Foreign, in all classes of Literature at GREAT REDUCTIONS from the Published Prices.

CATALOGUE OF

THE NEWEST BOOKS

Arranged under subjects and offered at the Lowest Prices charged by any bookseller.

CATALOGUE OF

BOOKS ON THEOLOGY

:: At greatly Reduced Prices and the :: BEST NEW BOOKS FOR LENT.

A NEW LIST OF SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

By the Best Writers, at prices ranging From 1/- each.

All Books Delivered Free in London & Suburbs.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

THE LARGEST BOOKSHOP IN THE WORLD.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's NAVY CUT

Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets and Tins.

May be obtained from all Stores and Tobaccoists of repute.

Regd. No. 154011

Swift

Sure

FOR EASTER WEAR.

Suits made like new at a cost of 3/9.

YOU will want to look smart and fresh for the Holidays—therefore send us the suit you propose to wear and let us clean and tailor-press it. It will then be as bright and shapely as when it was new. We only take Four Days, and 3/9 is our fixed charge.

Free collection and delivery by nearest Branch or Agent; or carriage paid one way if sent direct.

Achille Serre Ltd

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

17.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

A DAINTY AND

INEX-
PENSIVE

LUXURY.

FOR MEALS IN BED.

The 'CARBRESK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrak No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,

4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

tantism I have known for a good many years in the references you make to it. It surprises me to hear that we do not believe in the upward march of collective humanity, as I have so often heard the complaint that we are too much associated with the advanced parties in this country.

Undoubtedly the idea of world progress came into being with Christianity, though there are suggestions of it in the Old Testament, but surely Protestantism was not a protest against progress. Developments of doctrine and organisation are not always progress, but sometimes the reverse, and the state of the Church at the time of the Reformation was not very satisfactory.

Then I learn for the first time that we do not regard hope as a theological virtue. If correct, it is strange, for Protestantism has always been so strongly under the influence of St. Paul, and he certainly was an apostle of hope. Even the Calvinists of the sixteenth century, with their extreme views on Predestination, shared by very few Protestants to-day, showed by their zeal for education and good government as it appeared to them, in Geneva, Holland, and Scotland, their belief in the possibilities of human nature.

While the answer to the first question in the Shorter Westminster Catechism, "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy Him for ever," hardly suggests pessimism, though its authors were seventeenth-century Calvinists.

Again, it is news to me that Protestants do not consider the New Testament to be on a higher plane than the Old, for all I have ever learnt or read has been to that effect. Is it not a self-evident proposition, since the New is the completion and fulfilment of the Old? We certainly do believe that in the New Testament is found the final authoritative word of God to man, and we do not think it has ever been, or can ever be, improved upon, for we find its message of redeeming love and power always adaptable to new needs and new conditions.

When I remember that the word reactionary, which you apply to Mr. Chesterton, has hardly a place in the political vocabularies of Protestant nations, and when I read of the warfare the Roman Church is waging to-day against modernists, I can only attribute the tendency you notice in Mr. Chesterton's writings to his Catholicism, not to his Protestantism.—I am, sir, etc.,
A PRESBYTERIAN.

London,

THE MORALITY OF THE SWISS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I should like to utter a word of protest with regard to the letters of your correspondents on "The Morality of the Swiss."

Like so many English people, the writers of these letters seem to imagine that the nation of Switzerland consists entirely of hotel-keepers, guides, and a few peasants.

I suppose it is natural that the tourist should look at things from the tourist's point of view. But it has often made me very indignant to discover how difficult it is to persuade friends in England that there is a fine, independent Swiss nation, and that the majority of this nation do not naturally come into contact with foreigners, hold themselves, on the whole, aloof from them, and are, considering the geographical position of the country, singularly little affected by any foreign point of view.

Needless to say, these Swiss, who are proud of the history of their fatherland, and who see honourable possibilities for her in the future, very much regret the invasion of foreign holiday-makers, who probably scarcely meet a real Swiss at all, and who take back with them the impression that Switzerland is nothing but the playground of Europe, run by grasping but capable hotel-keepers.

The foreign money does, no doubt, help the country financially, and does, perhaps, make a few people mercenary, but the real Switzerland, which will remain unchanged when fashion has led the holiday-makers to Norway or to Greece, is to-day, as she has been for hundreds of years, the home of a sturdy, hard-working, self-reliant race—rather self-absorbed, very prudent, wonderfully patriotic.

The Swiss army is generally acknowledged to be almost perfect for its special requirements. Every young man learns to shoot as naturally as in England he learns to smoke. In matters of education, the Swiss are probably ahead of every other country in Europe. Their philanthropic institutions are business-like and excellent. The municipal arrangements of towns like Geneva and Zürich combine the order of Dresden with the apparent freedom of Dublin. Admitting that a small population makes all problems easier of solution, we must admire a country where there is no great poverty, and even now almost no labour unrest.

There is no ostentation in Switzerland; it is considered bad taste to make a parade of money, and even if they are rich, the Swiss live quietly, and are able to give, and do give, large sums away for charitable purposes. This applies particularly to the families of the "vieille souche" ("Genevoise," "Bernoise," etc., as the case may be), who, as befits the nobility of a truly democratic country, have in most cases dropped their titles, and who live quietly on their small estates.

These Swiss landowners are often very cultivated, generally very industrious, and always very public-spirited. But they share the usual Swiss characteristic, an instinctive aloofness from foreigners; and they carry this feeling so far that, till lately, in Berne, the principal Swiss families ignored socially even the Ambassadors accredited to the capital.

Relations are more friendly in this respect now, but the sturdy independence of character, of which this aloofness was undoubtedly a sign, and which, virtue or vice, as one may consider it, is apparent in all ranks of society, will not easily be altered; and, while it lasts, it protects the Swiss people from foreign influences, and makes it, I venture to think, quite untrue to say that their morality has suffered from contact with a cosmopolitan crowd.—I am, sir, etc.,

GERALDINE MACKENZIE.

The Beeches, Bury St. Edmunds.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I, as a Swiss reader of EVERYMAN, join in the correspondence about the moral progress of the Swiss?

When "Englishman" states as fact that the Swiss have realised that their chief business is, and must be, to prey on the foreigner who visits their country, I emphatically challenge his statement.

Surely "Englishman" ought to have a little better idea of the intelligence of the visitors (a great many of whom are his countrymen) or of human nature to suppose that they would return year after year for the salutary process of—being shorn!

Since Switzerland is pre-eminently an industrial country, it comes in, of course, for a share of the prosperity of the world, and with it also of the love of amusement and luxury which dog the steps of

For Heartburn, Flatulence, Acidity, etc.

All who suffer from Heartburn, Flatulence, a feeling of fulness or oppression after meals may obtain immediate and permanent relief by means of Dr. Jenner's Absorbent Lozenges, which correct these disorders by absorbing the Acidity in the stomach, to which they are due.

These Lozenges are made solely by Savory and Moore, from a formula of the celebrated Dr. Jenner. They are pleasant to take and perfectly harmless. One or two Lozenges give immediate relief, even in the worst cases, and when taken before a meal prevent those distressing symptoms due to indigestion which so frequently follow.

TESTIMONY.

"Without hesitation and with great pleasure I add my testimony to that of others who have taken DR. JENNER'S ABSORBENT LOZENGES and derived great benefit from their use. My powers of digestion seem really strengthened, and the distressing flatulence from which I suffered is greatly relieved. I cannot speak too highly of the good I have derived from their use."

"I found them very efficacious in quickly relieving me of severe HEARTBURN and ACIDITY OF THE STOMACH, from which, more or less, I have been a frequent sufferer for years. On the slightest approach of my old enemy I need only take one before dinner and another at bedtime to effectually ward off the attack. I really have never taken anything for acidity of the stomach that has given relief so satisfactorily and so rapidly as Dr. Jenner's Absorbent Lozenges."

Boxes, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d., of all Chemists.

A FREE TRIAL BOX

of the lozenges will be sent to all who write, enclosing 1d. for postage, and mentioning Everyman, to Savory & Moore, Ltd., Chemists to The King, 143A, New Bond Street, London, W.

GUNN SECTIONAL BOOKCASE

The Booklover's Best Bookcase

As a means of ensuring perfect protection and orderly arrangement with accessibility the equal of the "Gunn" is not to be found.

PRACTICAL—HANDSOME

A "Gunn" Bookcase is always a handsome and finished piece of furniture. It never proclaims its sectional construction, and there are no visible locking arrangements or ugly projections at the sides. Everything about a "Gunn" is of the very best quality. In a "Gunn" you have a worthy house for books and an ornament to any suitable room.

REAL PROTECTION

Each section of the "Gunn" is fitted with a glass door which slides back on invisible roller bearings above the books, and which can be quite easily unhooked for cleaning.

"Gunn" sections are obtainable in a range of standard sizes. There are also sections with partitions to accommodate very small volumes.

This illustration shows a small beginning with the "Gunn" system in Figned Oak or Birch.

D. Top Section ...	20	12	0
A. 9½-in. Book Section ...	0	16	0
B. 11½-in. Book Section ...	0	18	0
C. 13½-in. Book Section ...	1	0	0
F. Base Section ...	0	10	8
Total ...	23	18	8

If interested, write for illustrated descriptive Booklet No. 10, containing photographic reproductions of the various Gunn's styles and detailed information about the "Gunn" system, sent post free with the name and address of nearest Agent.

WM. ANGUS & CO., LTD., 52, Paul St., Finsbury, London.

wealth—but in this it only shares the common fate of all.

Now for the schools!

Before going in for higher education, I passed through the State schools step for step, and quite agree that the tendency is utilitarian, but it must be borne in mind that they do not cater for the young man with "unearned income." That species is practically unknown amongst the Swiss. And what better course could the schools follow than to equip the people for the very exacting needs of the modern business of life? There are fine and ample opportunities for higher education in Switzerland, and with the increasing prosperity an ever-increasing number of young people avail themselves of them.

Considering that a good deal is being said and written at present in England about educational reforms, it might be interesting to let the series of articles on "The Countries of the World" be followed by another series, "Education in the Different Countries," and then I am sure that at least some valuable experience could be gathered from Switzerland. —I am, sir, etc.,

H. H.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Allow me to say a few words in reply to the letter in your columns of February 21st by your correspondent who signs himself as "Englishman."

I am glad to find that, after his residence of two years in Lausanne, he left the country with a more pleasant impression of the inhabitants than he had at first entertained.

My experience of Lausanne dates back to the year 1837, when I was sent over to some relations with the view of learning the French language, and also of finishing my school education. Some three months after my arrival I had acquired sufficient knowledge of the language to be admitted to the municipal school, called then the "Ecole Moyenne," and which in after years was taken over by the Government of the Canton de Vaud, and has since become the Collège Scientifique, and which, to my mind, is one of the most important educational institutions to be found on the Continent.

Your correspondent speaks of the education given in the State schools as strictly "utilitarian." I ask myself, should not all pupils who were not born with a silver spoon in the mouth receive a utilitarian education? In fact, should not all education be utilitarian? I thank God that I did receive a utilitarian education, and that it has helped me on in the world.

Should any of your readers who take an interest in educational institutions happen to visit Lausanne, let me advise them to stay a few days there, and inspect the various buildings—palaces I may call them—devoted to the Primary Schools, the Girls' College, the University, and ask themselves, What are we doing in England in similar circumstances?

For some time past the Collège Scientifique at Lausanne has been cramped for want of room, but I now learn from the Director that funds have been voted for a new building entirely. In 1837, when the college was first started, we were thirty students, with eight professors; now the large number of students have the assistance of twenty-four professors.

Let me add, in conclusion, that the fees at the Collège Scientifique do not come to more than about four pounds sterling per annum.—I am, sir, etc.,

Sutton, Surrey.

J. F. COLE.

THE SHOP-GIRL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The majority of your readers are probably quite as willing as Miss Hamilton to help in any movement to improve the general condition of labour, but will there be much co-operation so long as there is so much exaggeration and lack of balance displayed by the "Social Reformer"? The general condition of the shop assistant is not such as bears out your contributor's position. The Shop Assistants' Union, I believe, pay as high, if not higher, benefits during sickness than any other society, owing to the few claims it has upon its sickness section. As to the hour of eleven at night, few firms with any reputation to lose would allow their girls to be exposed to the temptations of London streets after that hour.—I remain, sir, etc.,

A TWENTY-FOUR-YEAR SHOPWALKER.
London, N., February 21st, 1913.

MR. WELLS AND THE LABOUR REVOLT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—G. D. L. (Carlisle) is the sort of reader who drives a writer to despair. I write "independence" and he reads "leisure." My God!—I am, sir, etc.,

H. G. WELLS.

THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—That Englishmen in the twentieth century should be found disputing in an advanced periodical whether the Bible is the "Word of God"! As well might a synod of ants debate whether certain harmless, unnecessary beetles, tolerated by them in their abodes, which some naturalists have supposed to be objects of worship, are or are not divine.

If the unimaginable Maker of the universe had delivered His views of things to us in writing, the message would be as little open to doubt or in need of casuistic support as lightning in a dark night.—I am, sir, etc.,

E. F. CLUDELL.

Bordighera.

PROGRESS AND CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The statement that progress in Europe has been brought about by Christianity is, I think, not only not correct, but whenever Christianity, or, indeed, any other religion, has a great political influence it retards progress. In Spain dogmatism reigns supreme. Is Spain as progressive as England? In Russia, the seat of the Eastern country, is there less brute force used, less violence and murder, than in Turkey? Has Mr. Dearmer forgotten the Inquisition in Spain, the massacre of the Jews in Russia, aye, and the hangings and imprisonment of thousands for opinions which, even in this country, would not mean imprisonment?

Again, is it not a fact that, by the progress of science, which has no relation to religion, tolerance and liberty and good government have resulted from it? And yet science has always been opposed by theologians. It has revolutionised religion itself.

After all the persecution, the fiendish torture, used in its name to those who were opposed to it, we are being told that Christianity is responsible for civilisation, whereas, in my opinion, wherever secular ideas are spread as against religion we see more liberty, freedom, and comfort.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. MILLER.

Rock Ferry, Cheshire.

ENGLAND'S SWEATED FEMALE WORKERS AND WHITE SLAVE VICTIMS.

HOW "EVERYMAN" READERS CAN RENDER URGENTLY NEEDED HELP.

WILL YOU HELP IN THIS PLAN OF RESCUE?

TRULY appalling reports of the straits of London's Sweated Women and Girl Workers and White Slave Victims are finding their way daily to the London head offices of the British Federation for the Emancipation of Women.

Help is urgently wanted to relieve these cases. Even a few shillings may serve to rescue women, girls, and children from starvation and shame; but, above all, the prime object of the Federation is not to give indiscriminately, but to set these poor creatures upon a new and better way of earning a living free from the dangers of sweat work, as explained later in this article.

Terrible evidence has been brought forward as to the awful state in which thousands of our women and girl workers exist, and eloquently voicing their misery.

Read this heartrending letter—listen to the voices of the under-world of this great city of London, crying to you now for help.

A TRAGEDY OF DAILY LIFE.

The letter tells of the heartrending life of a poor widow, who, left with a family of babies, relates the poignant tragedy of her daily life and the grim struggle for existence that she has waged in the under-world of sweated labour.

"I beg most respectfully"—writes this unfortunate woman—"to thank you for the help you gave me, by which I was able to pay the bringing home of my sewing-machine, which is the only means I have of existing. Living is out of the question when one has got to keep life in one's-self in the terrible struggle of existing on machine or needlework. I have worked night and day—often thought myself fortunate to take my clothes off twice a week—making ladies' long coats up to the latest fashion for the sum of 7d.

"I have seen them in the windows marked 'tailor-made.' I have stood and thought if that coat could only speak! It was, no doubt, made in some attic or back-room. Again, ladies' skirts, lined, 2s. 6d. per dozen; pillow-cases, all ready to put on, 3d. a dozen. I am now making underclothes for Church people. I get 10d. for a nightdress, the same for a chemise. These must be all done by hand, feather-stitched, with lace put on, and button-holes.

"Is it to be wondered women go wrong? Persecuted and sweated, and bullied when the work is taken home if it is not up-to-date.

MOTHER AND CHILDREN STARVING.

"I am a widow, left with a family of babies. How I reared them I don't know. What are the consequences—half-starved, and myself also. I have lost three children since. The others are too delicate—can hardly keep themselves. I am still trying to keep up as best I can. If women's work was paid for there would not be half the immorality there is. It is all very well for Church-going people, but put them in the same position.

"Apologising for taking up your valuable time. It is a pity steps were not taken years ago to stop this terrible state of affairs.

"P.S.—I forgot to state that the chemises and nightdresses, for which I get 10d., take me nearly two days to make—this at the rate of 5d. a day. I felt last week as if I could make away with myself."

Think on what she says—imagine the awful conditions of such a life, where the lash of the sweater comes so heavily on the wretched slave that she dare not pause night or day—not even to undress and sleep.

We ask you to help us in our plans to aid and emancipate such victims as these from a system of slavery that is a disgrace to every Englishman and Englishwoman.

A PRACTICAL PLAN OF HELP.

There are thousands upon thousands of cases like the one whose letter appears above, and while the Federation always render immediate help where required, its prime object is the establishment of a home or institution where as many as possible of these poor women and girls may be received, rested, and trained in domestic service.

The experience of the members of the British Federation favours the establishment of a Receiving Home that shall serve as Sanctuary, its doors to be always open to those in need of human sympathy and help.

From this Home girls suitable for domestic service would be drafted to a Training Home.

There is a dearth of domestic servants, and places can be found for thousands of trained girls, whose retirement from the crowded slave-mart of the sweater would make matters easier for those who remain.

The Federation has the above practical plan of relief in hand, and a fund of from ten to fifty thousand pounds would enable it to carry out a work that would save thousands of women and girls from the cruel clutches of the sweater and White Slaver.

This great National Crusade is under the distinguished patronage of Alice Countess of Strafford and many of the titled families of Great Britain.

The President of the Federation is Dr. Beale Collins (Kingston); the Vice-Presidents are Captain A. M. Cockshott, A.S.G., and Surgeon-General G. J. H. Evatt, C.B.; while the Founder and Director is Mr. William Belcher ("Marken," Surbiton). The Council comprises other well-known social workers. The London Commissioner is the Rev. W. Thornton Burke; the Special Commissioner, Mr. John Lindsay; and the International Commissioner, Mr. Ardeen Foster, London.

SEND YOUR HELP TO-DAY.

Send your contribution to-day. Send as much as you can, knowing that there are thousands who need help such as you can render to one or more.

To every contributor to the fund the Federation will send acknowledgment and particulars of its work and objects.

Send your postal orders or cheques—and your money thus received in response to this appeal may rescue from final degradation some wretched women or girls whose souls have been well-nigh killed by their terrible existence.

Hesitate—delay even a day, and one more human being may sink to an existence even lower and more terrible than sweated labour. Think what your contribution to-day may mean—the emancipation of one or more of these unfortunate women—the breaking and casting off the fetters that have held them bound in slavery—the bringing of life and happiness to a fellow-being who has formerly known nothing but a living death. Your contribution will mean food, comfort, and health to some starved unfortunate dragging out a horrible life in the dens of hard labour, under the lash of the pitiless sweater. Will you rescue a human being and save a soul? Yes, you will—we feel sure of it—we are confident of your generous support and sympathy for your suffering sisters.

Let us keep our promise to these thousands of sufferers. We have held out hope to the women and girl slaves of this country—it is for those who read this appeal on their behalf to carry on the work of their emancipation.

Send us your generous help, and let us bear your message of hope down into that under-world that the time has come for the freedom of the sweated.

Give in the fulness of your heart, and know that in giving you are saving starving bodies from death, and suffering young girls from the horror of the street.

"Everyman" Donation Form.

To the Secretary (Mr. W. H. Bedbrook),
The British Federation for the Emancipation of Women,
95, New Bond St., London, W.

Dear Sir,

I have read the Appeal in EVERYMAN on behalf of Sweated Women and Girl Workers, and send you a P.O. or Cheque for.....towards the Fund that is being raised by the Federation,

Name.....
(State if Mr., Mrs., or Miss, or title.)

Address.....

.....
.....

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS*

MR. GARDNER needs no introduction to Dante students. He has long ago approved himself an industrious, learned, and admirably suggestive writer on the life and writings of the author of the "Divina Commedia." Of his new book we will only remark, by way of general criticism, that it will enhance a reputation already well established. It is not by any means an easy book to read. The abstruseness of the subject, and the massive learning with which it is buttressed, are not likely to attract those who have only a superficial acquaintance with Dante's writings. On the other hand, all earnest students will greatly relish this singularly able and illuminating study of the sources and spiritual significance of Dante's mysticism.

The author's main purpose is "to lay stress upon the mystical aspect of the 'Divina Commedia,' to trace the influence upon Dante of earlier mystics from St. Augustine down to the Franciscans and the two Mechthilds, and to illustrate the mystical tendency of the sacred poem by its analogies with the writings of other masters in the same science of love." He attaches great importance to the Letter to Can Grande, the authenticity of which he assumes. By its aid he attempts to interpret the mysticism and allegory of the "Divina Commedia" as well as to investigate the influence upon Dante of the three mystics mentioned in the Letter—St. Augustine, St. Bernard, and Richard of St. Victor.

Mr. Gardner specially calls the attention of students of the mystical aspect of the "Divina Commedia" to the concluding passage of the Letter to Can Grande, which he thinks clearly implies that for the crowning vision of the "Paradiso," Dante is claiming something more than a mere realisation of "the hideousness of vice and the beauty of virtue, the universality and omnipotence of love." The passage really suggests some ineffable spiritual experience of which Dante feels himself unworthy, and which he is utterly unable adequately to relate. In short, Dante lays claim to a special revelation of the divine, and the closing canto of the "Paradiso," up to which the whole of the "Divina Commedia" leads, must be regarded as a supreme attempt to give utterance to this spiritual experience in finite speech and figurative language.

In the first chapter Mr. Gardner says that scholasticism is the body of Dante's religion, and mysticism its soul. And in this connection he draws an instructive comparison between the pantheistic mysticism of Wordsworth and Shelley and that of Dante. The former, we are told, found the goal of their "love-illuminated" quest in the union of the soul of man with the spirit of love and beauty, which they recognise in nature, whereas Dante and other mediæval mystics found it in God—a goal which, while it could only be fully attained in the hereafter, might to some extent be realised by anticipation here and now. This realisation takes two forms. One is the religious experience known as "the spiritual espousals of the soul with Christ." The other is an intellectual anticipation of the vision of the Divine, as in that one "moment of understanding" after which St. Augustine sighed. Dante's mysticism, Mr. Gardner contends, had more affinity with the latter than with the former. Indeed, a perusal of this book forces upon one the conclusion that the Italian poet's mystical indebtedness to St. Augustine can hardly be over-estimated. The "Purgatorio" and the "Paradiso" afford ample evidence of the profound and continuous influence exerted by the author of the "Confessions."

* "Dante and the Mystics." By Edmund G. Gardner. 7s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

THE THEOLOGY OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND*

THIS is the inaugural volume of a new series entitled "The Great Christian Theologies," edited by Rev. Henry W. Clark, M.A. Primarily intended to be careful expositions of the theological systems dealt with, these volumes are yet critical in the sense that the authors indicate the relations between the systems and current theological and philosophical tendencies.

We cannot say that the series has made altogether an auspicious beginning. The subject is admittedly a difficult one. To present an adequate (by which we mean an impartial) view of the teaching of the Church of England—an exposition which will be readily acquiesced in by every section of that great communion, is next to impossible. It must be borne in mind that the word "Compromise" is written largely over the doctrinal position of the Church of England, and that there have always existed within her borders various schools of thought, each of which interprets her theology in its own way. It is impossible to look for theological harmony in a Church which contains Bishop Gore and Dean Wace.

Mr. Worsley is a High Churchman. He accordingly expounds the theology of the Anglican communion from that point of view. He puts the Church before the Bible, and denies the right of individual members to interpret the Scriptures for themselves. He says it is the duty of the priest to point out the use of private confession. He believes that "prayer for the departed" is "a sensible and laudable practice when kept within proper limits" (whatever that may mean); and he advocates "retreats" for clergy and laity.

Of course, Mr. Worsley dislikes the word "Protestant." On the other hand, he has no great antipathy to Roman Catholic teaching. "While the Church of England," he says, "does not accept many" of the modern doctrines of the Church of Rome, "she does not attack them with acrimony and violence." What, we wonder, will Dean Wace say to that? It comes to this, that the Church of England does accept some of the modern tenets of the Church of Rome, and has a "sneaking regard" for others. So, at least, Mr. Worsley would have us believe.

His conception of the historical position of the Anglican Church will also be criticised by a section of his fellow churchmen. He maintains that the Reformation did not involve any break of continuity in the character of the Church of England. Its history began with Augustine, and it was never Roman Catholic. Yet he admits that his Church was in communion with the Papal Church before the Reformation. How does Mr. Worsley reconcile these statements? We are also told that it was the Church of Rome that broke off the relations, and not the Church of England. We cannot agree. The severance of the English Church from Rome was brought about by Henry VIII. because the Pope would not grant him a divorce from Catherine of Aragon.

The logical conclusion of Mr. Worsley's position is that the Church of England cannot be regarded as a branch of the Reformed Church. She adheres to "Catholic tradition"—to "the central truths of the Faith" which were prevalent before the Reformation, and which were preserved intact during "the stormy and difficult years" of the sixteenth century.

Mr. Worsley is an advocate for the revision of the Book of Common Prayer. He says that disloyalty to

* "The Theology of the Church of England." By F. W. Worsley, M.A., B.D. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman.)

(Continued on page 672.)

The Imprint

TO READERS OF "EVERYMAN." The Editors will send to the first five hundred applicants, a copy of Number One, on receipt of three penny stamps to cover postage

No. I. January 17th

ART AND WORKMANSHIP: By Prof. W. R. Lethaby
 THE LAW OF THE IMPRINT: By C. D. Medley
 DECORATION AND ITS USES: I. By Edward Johnston
 LITHOGRAPHY: I. HISTORY: By F. Ernest Jackson
 THE COMING ILLUSTRATION: By Joseph Pennell
 TRADE TEACHING AND EDUCATION: By J. H. Mason
 THE PLAIN DEALER: I. AUTOGRAPHS: By Everard Meynell
 PRINTERS' DEVICES: By the Rev. T. F. Dibdin, Part I.
 Photogravure: GLAD DAWN. By William Blake

No. II. February 17th

MY BOOKS FOR CHILDREN: By Walter Crane
 PRINTING OF CHILDREN'S BOOKS: By J. H. Mason
 THE ILLUSTRATION OF CHILDREN'S BOOKS: By Alice Meynell; H. Belloc; Clarence Rook; Arthur Waugh; Barry Pain; J. P. Collins; Edward Johnston
 BLACK AND WHITE DRAWINGS FOR REPRODUCTION: By Donald Cameron-Swan, F.R.P.S.
 THE ARTS AND CRAFTS EXHIBITION: By B. Newdigate
 LITHOGRAPHY: II. THEORY: By F. Ernest Jackson
 DECORATION AND ITS USES: II. By Edward Johnston
 THE PLAIN DEALER: II. By Everard Meynell
 A LARGE NUMBER OF THE ILLUSTRATIONS IN THIS ISSUE ARE IN COLOUR

Price One Shilling Net

Annual Subscription (Inland) Twelve Shillings Post Free

"Ranks pre-eminent among the printed matter of to-day."—Daily Chronicle.

"One wonders how on earth we managed to exist without it."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Offices: 11 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

HOW TO MAKE LIFE A SUCCESS. By JULES FIAUX.
 2nd Edition. No better book could be put into the hands of young people, or older ones who need special help through neglect in their early days.
 Price, paper, 1s. net; cloth, 2s. net.
POWER-BOOK COMPANY, 329, High Holborn, W.C.

NEW GEORGIAN CLUB: The White House, Randolph Crescent, W. — A quiet, comfortable Residence for Women of good social status. Large house. Access to gardens. Rooms from 25s. weekly, including baths, breakfast, and dinner. Non-members received at special rates.—Apply Secretary.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Short-hand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

TYPEWRITING of all kinds undertaken by Miss Lily Somers. Work guaranteed to be efficiently executed and promptly returned. Moderate charges.—Please apply 323a, Upland Road, E. Dulwich.

*If you can write
 — you can DRAW*

The A.B.C. Method of Drawing provides a short cut to drawing skill by enabling you to apply to drawing the pictorial ability you gained in learning to write.

.. You can learn it in your own home, as it is taught by correspondence lessons and letters.

.. When you are proficient, London's leading Studio, The Association of Designers, will provide you with well-paid commissions.

.. Write to-day for Booklet T, with full details and opinions of prominent artists—A.B.C. SCHOOL OF DRAWING, 46, Chancery Lane, London.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, toolscap size, 15/- complete. Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. A. R. QUADRUPLIX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

Is it a Renold?

Upon the quality of your chain depends the comfort of your cycling.
 A cheap and badly fitting chain entails a waste of your energy and abnormal strain on the vital parts of your machine.

Renold Chain

gives the maximum mileage for the minimum effort, transmitting the whole of the rider's power throughout the whole of its long life. It is a chain that fulfils the most exacting rider's demands.

One Price—5/6 (Fitting Extra). Write for our Cycle Chain Booklet.

HANS RENOLD Ltd., Dept. 14, MANCHESTER.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS" (Copyright)

evolved by G. H. Cox and invariably used by nature when concentration of Brain Power is required; exemplified in Musicians, Scientists, etc., through all ages.

All subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE. A natural gift. EVERY musician can play from MEMORY.

EVERYONE can strengthen GENERAL MEMORY by this system. It gives new essential ideas on TEACHING and PRACTISING.

Dr. W. F. Cholmeley, F.R.C.S.—"It seems to me to get at the whole root of the matter. In your medical and scientific facts I can find no flaw, and the deductions you draw from them appear to me to be absolutely sound."

A Schoolmaster—"Your system COMPELS a thoroughness which I never dreamed of before."

A Business Man—"I am sure you have got nearer to the root of the trouble with poor memories than anything I have come across before. I am making constant use of the system every day."

Mr. H. Stanley, Voice Specialist and Lecturer—"I consider the instructions of great value. It opens up new and more definite ways of teaching and learning."

The amount of time to be saved thereby will be enormous.

Musicians, Teachers, Students, Engineers, Speakers, Business Men, and all who need memory, should write, stating subject required for, GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhall College). Address—Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

Altho' deaf

There is now no reason why you should not enjoy the pleasures of perfect hearing. The DANHILL EARPHONE gives perfect hearing and will enable you to once more enjoy the pleasures of conversation, music, Church and Theatre. It places you on an equal footing with those with perfect hearing.

It is the latest, cheapest, and most perfect instrument for the deaf. Supplied on trial. Write for particulars to-day.

D. & J. W. HILL, 58, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON.

Danhill
EARPHONE
GIVES PERFECT HEARING

AUTHORS WANTED, known and unknown, to communicate. Every description of literary work required. No fees whatever. Write for particulars in first instance to "Publishers," 2:99, Sell's Offices, Fleet Street, London. Special attention to new writers.

WOMAN AND MARRIAGE. A Handbook. By Margaret Stephens. Cloth, 3/6 net (Post free 3/10). "In carefully selected, well-measured language she details the most intimate relations of married life with a modesty which is as becoming as it is successful."—British Congregationalist. At all Booksellers.—T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

FREE LESSONS IN LATIN, LOGIC AND ENGLISH

The Rev. J. C. Wilcox, M.A. (Camb.) has obtained a world-wide reputation by his "Simplified" system of teaching the supposedly difficult Hebrew language. It has gained the admiration of thousands of students and scholars. This method has now been successfully applied to the teaching of ENGLISH, LATIN, and LOGIC. A thorough knowledge of these subjects will be a great asset to anyone whose desire is to improve his position and take his place in the forefront of commercial, social, and political life.

FOUR LESSON PAPERS FREE

The first four Lesson Papers, with full particulars of this scientific and simplified system of teaching by correspondence, will be sent to you post free and without any obligation on your part.

The "WILCOX" system is unique, thorough, and tried.

Write to-day, stating the special particulars you require, to:

The Secretary, THE SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY (Dept. 27), St. Paul's Chambers, 19-21, Ludgate Hill, LONDON, E.C.

the Book is flagrantly prevalent, though he is not averse to a certain amount of latitude. But where is the line to be drawn? On the subject of "Establishment," he is engagingly frank.

"The chief disadvantage attaching to 'Establishment' is that the Church has no real power of self-government, Convocation can do nothing save make suggestions, and has no real power; an Act of Parliament is necessary for any real reforms or revisions, so that matters are, under the circumstances rightly, left as they are; official ecclesiastical decisions, such as the Lambeth Judgment, can be appealed against, and the appeals have to be heard before the civil courts. It is a state of things which, fortunately, cannot last much longer."

Though this statement contains only the literal truth, it is persistently ignored by the leaders of the Established Churches. State control and spiritual freedom cannot co-exist, and the sooner our Churches by law established recognise this fact the better will it be for the religious future of this country.

ALONG THE ROAD*

THE industry of Mr. Benson is amazing. Remembering how recently it was that Mr. Benson issued his last book, and bearing in mind that two other volumes from his pen are announced for early publication, the critic, confronted with the present comely volume, with its four hundred solid pages, might well be forgiven if he approached it in something of a sceptical frame of mind. Few writers, however, seem to possess the power of sustaining quality with quantity in a more remarkable degree than Mr. Benson; and this new collection of his essays, so far from proving that the experienced hand has lost any of its old cunning, is full, from the first page to the last, of the author's best and most characteristic work. Here we have all the same graceful and dignified flow of language, breathing the same quiet and mellow philosophy. It is true that this philosophy is not always perfectly satisfying; and, indeed, what philosophy is? We sometimes wish that Mr. Benson's garden were not quite so well cloistered; an occasional smack of the east wind would not be unwelcome. But, in a world of imperfections, extreme must be made to balance extreme; and if these polished papers, with their simple descriptions of homely scenes and incidents, and their sympathetic interpretation of human conduct and aspirations, gain once more for Mr. Benson, from a cheap press, the title of "the apostle of the obvious"—well, then, it is a reputation of which he may have very genuine reason to be proud.

For what we want to-day is a return to the obvious. If our newspaper placards form any criterion, or if we may judge from much of our modern fiction and a great deal of our contemporary poetry, we are obsessed by an almost morbid and neurotic craving for novelty—a craving that comes from a weak intellectual stomach, and is the more debilitating in its influence in proportion as it is indulged. For, once indulged, it is an appetite that it is impossible to appease; until at length, having utterly sapped our mental vigour, it leaves our diseased imaginations too inert to pursue even the fantastic will-o'-the-wisps of their own creation. Meanwhile the rising and setting of the sun, the procession of the seasons, and all the infinite drama of human joys and sorrows—these things that are old and obvious, but alone of all things perennially mysterious and new—pass unheeded before our eyes, and set hardly a responsive chord vibrating along the strings of our poisoned and moribund minds. Truly, this is to sell our birthright for a mess of pottage!

Amid all the false and contentious bugles, therefore; amid all the blaring drums of contorted creeds that would marshal us "along the road" of life to a citadel where there is no real shelter from the tempest, and no sure safety from the assaults of disappointment and doubt—how pleasant is it to hear once more, as it were, in reading Mr. Benson's tender and glowing pages, the still small voice of the wayside birds inviting us to some fair garden of the spirit, where, if there are not the fruits of perfect peace, at least there is rest, and to that old well of primal human sympathy, where at least there is refreshment for the tired pilgrim of the dusty highway.

* "Along the Road." By A. C. Benson. 7s. 6d. net. (London: James Nisbet.)

GILBERT THOMAS.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

ENGLAND UNDER THE OLD RELIGION, AND OTHER ESSAYS, by Abbot Gasquet (Bell, 6s. net), derives its main interest and value from the fact that it sets forth the matured opinions of one of the ablest and most laborious of living Roman Catholic historians regarding some of the outstanding ecclesiastical problems that have agitated this country in the past, and are still to some extent agitating it. The essay which stands first, and which gives the title to the volume, was written many years ago, but was not at the time printed. Several of the other papers were delivered as lectures in America, but have not previously been printed in England. The essay on "England Under the Old Religion" gives a fair idea of Dr. Gasquet's abilities as an historian. It shows not only a complete mastery of the authorities of the period, but a sobriety of thought and expression and a perspicuity which are not always associated with the historical labours of his co-religionists. Of course, he writes as a loyal son of the ancient Church, and his whole outlook is necessarily coloured by this fact. But by reason of the thoroughness of his research and his earnestness and sincerity, he is always entitled to a respectful hearing. Those who wish to know the views of a ripe Catholic scholar on such topics as the English Reformation, Wolsey and the Divorce, Anglican Ordinations, France and the Vatican, cannot do better than read this book. The essay on Anglican ordinations is invested with special interest and authority, as Dr. Gasquet, by the Pope's orders, prosecuted research in the Vatican Archives in connection with the work of the commission appointed to deal with the question. The last essay, which discusses editing and reviewing, is rather incongruous in a volume dealing exclusively with historical and ecclesiastical topics. But Dr. Gasquet's plea for thoroughness on the part of editors and reviewers is well-timed.

Mr. Max Pemberton, in his latest novel, WHITE MOTLEY (Cassell, 6s.), has written a story with an airman for hero. The aviator is cast on simple yet convincing lines, and impresses one with reality. The story opens in Switzerland with a spirited account of the winter sports in progress. Rumours of a ghostly apparition in the sky are current, alike in the little village and the fashionable hotels, and for some short time the reader is kept in ignorance that the strange bat-like creature that skims lightly over the hills is "Ben," the intrepid airman, in his aeroplane, who intends to be the first to cross Mont Blanc and win the £10,000 prize offered by a big English newspaper proprietor. In the end the aviator gratifies his ambition, and, we suppose, ultimately marries the woman of his choice. The latter is afflicted with a

BAD FOR RHEUMATISM

When the piercing winds of March bring on the torturing pains of Rheumatism, do not fly to drugs. Drugs have a way of alleviating one complaint and aggravating another. There is a much safer remedy which brings relief in the pleasantest sort of way at an infinitesimal cost. The remedy is Turkish Bathing—not in the nauseating atmosphere of a public establishment, but in the privacy of your own home, by means of a Gem Turkish Bath. The Gem Bath works wonders. It makes you feel years younger. If you don't believe it try one on our ten days' offer (money back if not satisfied). We have sold thousands of Gem Baths on these terms, and instead of demands for "money back," we get glowing accounts of the benefits derived. The testimony comes not only from people suffering from Rheumatism, Sciatica, Gout, Neuralgia, and other nerve troubles, but from those who are well and keep well by the regular use of the Gem Bath. The Gem Bath takes only a minute or two to prepare. It folds flat, occupies little space, costs 35/-, and lasts a lifetime. Order one to-day. The risk is all on our side.

100 p. Booklet free from—
The Gem Supplies Co., Ltd.
(Dept. S),
67, Southwark St.,
London, S.E.

ART HOW TO MAKE MONEY IF YOU CAN SKETCH.

A Free Booklet sent to all enclosing stamped envelope.

A. SEYMOUR, Secretary, DEPT. 27,
114, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

Do you Waste Time in your Spare Time?

What do you do with your odd minutes? Do you use them to further your progress in life? Have you reached the highest post you are fit for? Have you exploited every one of your possible talents and made the most of them? If not, you are not getting the full value out of your life.

JOURNALISM CAN BE TAUGHT.

The theory that "Journalists are born," and that training is quite a superfluity where talent exists, is now fully exploded. The greatest authorities—men like Mr. Justin McCarthy, Lord Northcliffe, Mr. Philip Snowden, M.P., and many others have expressed their opinion that well-conducted training is of the utmost value to the aspiring Journalist.

There are two roads to success in every phase of life. One is the road of experience—a long, tedious and, more often than not, disheartening road—and the other, and by far the wiser course, is to take advantage of the experience of others.

THE PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE Course in FREE-LANCE JOURNALISM is personally conducted by a well-known Author and Journalist, and each student is personally trained by the Instructor, whose personality and wide and varied experience are in themselves a guarantee of thorough and efficient tuition.

SEND SPECIMEN MS. FOR FREE CRITICISM.

Readers of EVERYMAN are invited to send a short story, essay or article upon any subject, and this will be criticised by the Instructor and returned together with full particulars of the P.C.C. Course. The P.C.C. will not accept any student who is unlikely to profit by the training—hence the invitation to examine MSS. free of charge. Investigation is invited, and all interested readers should send at once for full particulars to the Secretary.

PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
77, THANET HOUSE, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

wicked husband, whom an understanding providence removes. Mr. Pemberton is at his best in the story, which is brightly written throughout.

THE AMATEUR GENTLEMAN (Sampson Low and Co., 6s.) is written, quite obviously, under the influence of Dickens, and to a large extent the author is worthy of his adherence to the magician, and suggests a certain capacity for humour and a quick eye for characterisation of types. At times, however, so strong is Mr. Jeffery Farnol's admiration for his master that he falls back on reminiscence, and reproduces in some instances a colourable likeness certainly, but only a likeness of his idol. Mine host of the "Coursing Hound" suggests old Varden of "The Maypole." The period, the setting, the turn of the phrase, all take one back to "Barnaby Rudge." And though the very closeness of the association helps the story to an extent, in the main it serves to deepen the gulf, widen the difference between the master and his pupil. Sometimes Mr. Farnol hits off a portrait most successfully, as in the following:—"He was a languid gentleman, an extremely superior gentleman, but his character lay chiefly in his nose, which was very short and remarkably supercilious of tip, and his legs, which were large and nobly shaped; they were, in a sense, eloquent legs, being given to divers tremors and quiverings when their possessor laboured under any strong feeling or excitement; but, above all, they were haughty legs, contemptuous of this paltry world and all that therein is, yea, even of themselves, for their very calves seemed striving to turn their backs upon each other."

If the author would strike out a new line, and, forsaking bygone times, apply his faculty of observation and his sense of humour to depicting present-day events, he should, we think, do good work; but he must rid himself of his tendency to reproduce past masterpieces.

Mrs. Langfield Sawkins has written "A Romance of the Golden Age," under the title of LADY BERTHA OF ROMROW (Francis Griffiths, 6s.). It is written in a curious fashion, to describe which one would have to coin a word. A combination of stilted phrase with melodramatic incidents of a highly coloured variety render it difficult and, indeed, fatiguing to follow. We read that "Bertha, her blood boiling and leaping in her veins, sprang up the side of the defile, clinging deftly to the tree branches. . . . She ran into the arms of old Cynewulf, who, trembling with terror, held her fast." The page palpitates with terrible forebodings. Some dire deed of bloodshed is, we feel, about to occur! And then, in the mildest possible voice, Cynewulf remarks: "Hither, master; here is thy daughter." We confess to extreme bewilderment as the story progresses, as the convolutions of intrigue and counterplot suffer heavily from the language chosen by the author to express them.

THE WASTREL (Ward, Lock and Co., 6s.) cannot be said to be wearisome. Something is happening all through the story, and the briskness of the action keeps pace with the incision of the style. Mr. Bindloss has a story to tell, and sets about it in workmanlike fashion. There is some love-making, a murder, a mystery, and a surprise in connection with the wastrel himself that is genuinely unexpected.

Muriel is a wholesome heroine, and the descriptions of Canadian life are cleverly penned in bold colours. There is plenty of excitement, but that is what the ordinary novel reader looks for, and the development of the plot is credible. On the whole, a bright and entertaining volume.

THE PEARL STRINGER (Methuen, 6s.) is Miss Peggy Webling's latest contribution to literature. The book is characterised by the same quiet humour and clever eye for detail that made her other work remarkable; but there is lacking the vivacity of "Blue Jay," that charming and vitalised romance of Canada, and the strength of "Virginia Perfect," a rounded study of a woman's life. Miss Webling, in setting the story among the back streets of London, has allowed the houses to crowd out her perspective. There is not a glimpse of blue sky to be seen through the black chimney-pots, and the grime seems to enter the souls of the people concerned. The little pearl stringer is a sweet but colourless entity; she finds her most supreme expression in renunciation, and all through the book accepts the gospel of sacrifice with a meekness admirable but slightly irritating. Even her shadowy love affair is elusive. She gives her affection secretly to a man who never gives her a thought save as a friend, and finds intense satisfaction in the knowledge. One wishes the author could have been kinder to the little creature, who, after all, deserved a better fate. The minor characters are admirably sketched, and Miss Webling gives us some street scenes in which she shows herself at her best.

THE LONE ADVENTURE (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.) is in marked contrast to "The Man of the Moors." In the last-named Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe touched high-water mark of literary excellence. In "The Lone Adventure" he has fallen far from the heights, descending, indeed, once again into the atmosphere of Wardour Street, and far from the fresh winds of reality one breathes the air of artificiality inseparable from pretence. His characters are stereotyped, his situations machine-made, his plot outworn. We would earnestly urge the author to return again to the venue of the preceding achievement, which held a fair promise of distinction.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

NEW SPRING 1913 LITERATURE

THE MYSTIC WAY. By EVELYN UNDERHILL, author of "Mysticism," "Immanence," etc. Square Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

It is the chief object of this book to develop what the author believes to be an entirely new view of the relation between mysticism and Christianity. The earliest Christian documents are here studied from the standpoint of mystical psychology, with the result that the life and teaching of Christ and St. Paul, and the writings of the Fourth Evangelist, are found to be governed by these psychological laws, and that instinct for extended life, which control the development of all the greatest mystics.

WINDS OF DOCTRINE. Studies in Contemporary Opinion.

By PROF. G. SANTAYANA. Small Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

Appearing at a time when our whole life is saturated with the slow upward filtration of a new spirit—that of an emancipated, atheistic international democracy—this book is of particular interest. Even to the unobservant individual this new spirit has become fairly evident. On all sides is the voice of the modernist, the appeal for reform, and a general feeling of restlessness and discontent; not a spontaneous conflagration confined to a narrow area, but a constant upheaval of humanity in a thousand directions.

With quiet and scholarly analysis Prof. Santayana inquires into this prevalent spirit of unrest. The first chapter, entitled "The Intellectual Temper of the Age," expresses his general view that the convictions and ideals of Christendom are in a state of disintegration and anarchy. Chapter two inquires into the case of Modernism, whilst in chapter three is analysed the philosophy of M. Bergson. The fourth chapter confirms Mr. Bertrand Russell's critique of pragmatism. There is an excellent essay on "Shelley, or the Poetic Value of Revolutionary Principles," whilst the last paper treats with the subject of "The Genteel Tradition in American Philosophy."

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS.

By E. G. GARDNER, M.A. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

DAILY CHRONICLE: "The whole is written with such easy command of the matter and illustrated by such well-chosen quotations that the most casual reader of the 'Divina Commedia' in its native tongue, or in any other of the versions, will find himself delighted and instructed, as well as encouraged to refresh his knowledge at the fountain head."

CHAUCER. By EMILE LEGOUIS.

Translated by L. LAILAVOIX. Large Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

GLOBE: "An excellent and suggestive book."

BOOKMAN: "The freshness and independence of the French critic's point of view and his freedom from the disturbing influences of national tradition are, to begin with, distinct advantages. . . . Learned and full; yet lucid and well-proportioned, it leaves us with a most satisfactory impression of thoroughness and balance; the writer's touch is as light as it is sure, and precision of statement is combined with felicity of expression."

TOWARDS A NEW THEATRE.

By EDWARD GORDON CRAIG. Square Royal 4to, 21s. net.

With 40 Designs for Stage Scenes, accompanied with Critical Notes by THE INVENTOR.

The author has long been regarded as the pioneer of a movement for reforming what the eye sees in connection with a production on the stage. The modern spectacular cult shows a passion for lavish external display, which is not always conducive to the best interests of a given production, and it adapts itself to the stage in such a way as to invite criticism of a kind which is not always of a favourable character, and, further, it subjects the whole question to some risk of it being labelled a specious form of trickery, rather than an exposition of what should be Art. Mr. Gordon Craig expounds his theories in that lucid and convincing style which carries conviction.

NEW FICTION.

DAISY DARLEY; or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street. By W. P. RYAN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A story of romantic and mystical interest with a London journalistic and literary environment, and a certain contemporary political and democratic bearing.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL. An Ulster Romance. By GRACE RHYS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

TWIXT LAND AND SEA. By JOSEPH CONRAD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ADVENTURES OF MISS GREGORY. PERCEVAL GIBBON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LOST MAMELUKE. By DAVID M. BEDDOE. Crown 8vo, 6s. (Ready Shortly.)

On receipt of a postcard a full, illustrated catalogue will be sent immediately.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, High Holborn, London, W.C.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

AGENT WANTED, calling Hotels, Restaurants, Picture Houses, Theatres, Builders, Architects. Energetic, influential man can earn £500 per annum. Full particulars.—Address, "ALPHA," WILLIAM PORTEOUS & CO., Glasgow.

FAMILY HISTORY AND PEDIGREES compiled from the Public Records. Materials supplied for parish history, etc.. Many years' experience. Particulars from F. S. Snell, M.A., 15, The Burroughs, Hendon, N.W.

TRY the "GREEN DRAGON" for lunches, teas, dinners, home-made rolls, cakes, sweets, and syllabubs. Dishes from 4d. 1/2 ticket dinners. Dragon Club dinners, 61, in sets of 6. 4, Panton's Square, Chelsea.

LITTLE SALON SOCIAL-LITERARY CIRCLES.—For Men and Women of Culture (Speakers and Non-Speakers); include Drama, and Open Discussions of Questions of the Day. New Books, etc. —Write, M. L. B., Salon Secretary, 24, Bloomsbury Square, London, W.C.

SHORTHAND. ANOTHER EXPERIENCE: "I studied the old style for 18 months without success. Then, taking up Sloan Dupleoyan, I attained 65 words per minute in three weeks. In eight weeks I was appointed on the staff of the Divisional Headquarters as stenographer. Since then I have advanced rapidly, my shorthand ability being the lever which helped me. I have been offered a position in Panama at £300 a month."—From Mr. Cecil E. Walker, Secretary to Provincial Headquarters, Salvation Army, Bridgetown, Barbados. SLOAN-DUPLEOYAN is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for interesting illustrated handbook, with specimen lesson, free.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Setief Course," (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETIEF INSTITUTE, (Dept. 5), PERTH, N. B.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 8) choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 179 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. 16-pp. prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

FOREIGN Circulating LIBRARY of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN and SPANISH books; cheap rates; no restrictions as to changing of books; prospectus free.—Siegle and Co., Ltd., 2, Langham Place, W.

STAMMERING AND ILL-DEVELOPED SPEECH. The London Specialist, whose exposition created so much interest at the Children's Welfare Exhibition, can take a few more cases at any age, personally or by correspondence. Home or school visited; clientele at Rugby, Uppingham, and Christ's Hospital Schools. Results guaranteed.—Mr. Miall, 8, Argyll Place, London, W.

GENTLEMEN specially invited to join the Correspondence section of ROUND-ABOUT-CLUB, 350, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.; also Ladies. Social Gatherings on Wednesdays. Annual Subscription, £1 1s. Inland; 10s. 6d. Abroad.

"MEMORY WITHOUT MNEMONICS" teaches a new method of evoking subconscious forces for the deepening of mental powers and secret of mental work without feeling tired. 1s. 2d.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

SEND A POSTCARD TO-DAY for a large illustrated and coloured catalogue of giant sweet peas. It gives full particulars of all novelties for 1913.—HENRY ECKFORD, Sweet Pea Specialist, Dept. 747, Wem, Shropshire.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE OF MODERN SOCIALISM, by John Spargo, 1s. 6d. net, post free 1s. 8d.—Arthur F. Bird, 22, Bedford Street, Strand Agency for American Books.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

DARN NO MORE

Holeproof Hose.

Stockings and Socks that Don't Want Mending. Read the following Guarantee, which is given with every pair of hose we sell:—

Wear your Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within TWO months of purchase we will

REPLACE THEM FREE. ABSOLUTELY

Holeproof Socks and Stockings are of medium weight, shapely, well made and comfortable, with that incomparable sense of good fitting that is one of the many pleasant features of our Hose. It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still no damage done to its fabric.

The comfort and pleasure of a good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business girls and busy housewives to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task the benefit is incalculable. Price, Two Pairs of Gent's Socks, 2/10, post 2d.

Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings, 3/10, post 2d.

Colours stocked, Black, Navy, Champagne, Pearl Grey, and Light Mole.

SILK HOLEPROOF. Sold under same guarantee as above

Two pairs of Gent's Socks, 7/6 post 2d. Two pairs of Ladies' Stockings, 10/6, post 2d. Colours: Ladies—Champagne, Empire Blue, Pearl Grey, Tan, Black. Men's—Tan, Navy, Black, Pearl Grey. State Boot Size. Call or write.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), QUEEN'S ROAD, BRIGHTON.

500 HOURS LIGHT for 1 1/2 D.

Iron-mongery Dept. 154

Agents Wanted.

We have named this the "FOOL-PROOF" Lamp because even with the most careless handling it is absolutely safe.

That is there is no exposed flame to flicker or blow out when used out of doors, near bedroom windows or curtains, or draughty corners. Many people would like their dark recesses, halls, or basements well-lighted, but cannot manage this because of the expense.

But one of these little "FOOL-PROOF" Lamps placed in these eerie corners or dark staircase landings will cost no more than 1d. for 500 hours. You will realise this better when you know that candles give only 15 hours for the same amount, and are also highly dangerous, besides looking rather poverty-stricken.

Now these lamps are really artistic, the pattern is beautifully designed and well executed on a copper base, and the whole is so well finished that it has the appearance of a really expensive article.

It is essentially "good" looking, and is totally different to the usual run of rather cheap looking oil lamps.

It can be used as a smoker's companion, and is absolutely odourless. It works for years, and is a great boon to those who are nervous in the dark. Call or write. Price 2/6, postage and packing 2d.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, BRIGHTON.

SUCCULENT CHIPS IN A TRICE.

1/-

Chip potatoes are always so dainty and appetizing, and many people would have them far more often, if it were not for the trouble of preparing them. Therefore the V. & H. POTATO CHIPPER will be a welcome find to many people, as it reduces the trouble to a minimum. One operation makes 12 chips, and all nicely shaped and even. Knives are placed in slanting position so that potato is easily and quickly pushed through. Price 1/6, postage and packing 2d. AGENTS WANTED.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGHTON.

PAPER BAG COOKERY KNOCKED OUT!

Just listen to this. With this little V. & H. Roaster all you have to do is to put your meat in the tin, put the cover on, and leave it!

IT ABSOLUTELY COOKS THE MEAT ITSELF, along with no fat, and all the nourishing and delicious gravy is retained. There is no fiddling bars to look after, and to keep incessantly buying. Once you have this, it is yours for practically a lifetime. The meat cooked in this is deliciously tender, and the saving in time and trouble is incalculable.

Don't be bothered any more with ordinary dishes, buy one of these and give yourself a little rest.

Your meat will also literally melt in your mouth, try and see.

AGENTS WANTED. Price 5/-, postage, 8d.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), BRIGHTON.

DRY CLEAN YOUR DOG.

THOROUGHLY CLEAN YOUR DOG WITHOUT WATER. USE THIS POWDER—JUST SPRINKLE ON DOG—RUB INTO HIS COAT AND SKIN—AND THEN BRUSH OUT.

This is all you have to do to get your dog's coat and skin thoroughly cleaned; his coat comes up bright and glossy, with a sweet, wholesome smell, every disease germ is destroyed, and your dog in his old age will not suffer from rheumatism, caused by too frequent water washing.

This is so easy and simple to do that the animal can be washed twice as often, and is therefore much more healthy. It can be done ten minutes before it is going out without fear of catching cold. So easy that a child can clean its own pet.

Cats can be shampooed with this wonderful Dry Shampoo Powder, and they enjoy it as much as dogs.

Just try a tin, the price is 1s., post 1d., which contains enough to dry shampoo an ordinary terrier six times—three times the quantity for 2s., post 3d. Perfectly harmless.

We send free with each order our hints and cures on Home Treatment and Cures.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, BRIGHTON.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mail Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 22. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, MARCH 14, 1913

One Penny.

History in the Making—	PAGE
Notes of the Week	677
Canada and the Empire— By John A. Cooper	678
The World Ugly— By Dr. Percy Dearmer	679
Women at Work—IV. The Mill Girl— By Margaret Hamilton	680
Life in a London Bastille— By Thomas Holmes	682
Prison—Poem— By Margaret Sackville	682
Women's Page— Concerning the Human Child—By Evelyn Burke	683
Sir Thomas Browne— By E. Hermann	684
Portrait of Sir Thomas Browne	685
Countries of the World—X. Roumania	686
Pagan and Christian Ideals— By Hector Macpherson	688

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

JOHN COOPER

DR. PERCY

DEARMER

SIR SIDNEY LEE

J. C. SQUIRE

Ford House— By Dorothy Eyre	PAGE	689
Literary Notes	690
La Bretonne— By André Theuriot	692
Silhouette	693
Masterpiece for the Week— " Sylvia's Lovers," by Mrs. Gaskell—John K. Prothero	694
Peace—Poem— By Herbert Baxter	696
A Motto of Empire— By Sir Sidney Lee	697
Correspondence—
The Girl Behind the Bar	698
Ibsen and Democracy	700
Out of Work	701
John Redmond	702
Apollonius of Tyana— By J. C. Squire	703
Books of the Week	704

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE third Session of the second Parliament in the reign of King George V. was opened on Monday. It cannot be said that the King's Speech is exciting reading. Judging from its contents, everything is for the best in the best of possible worlds. A few unimportant measures are announced. But neither of the two epoch-making schemes which had been heralded with a great flourish of trumpets—neither Land Reform nor Educational Reform—are to be introduced this Session. Obviously the Legislature intends to take a constitutional rest—partly perhaps to allow the country to assimilate the revolutionary changes recently placed on the Statute-book, partly to prepare for the more important changes of tomorrow.

In dramatic contrast with the political situation at home is the situation on the Continent, which even the most exacting sensational journalist could not characterise as dull. Both in France and in Germany the present year will mark a new era. The £50,000,000 German Army Bill will be for the next few months the one central topic of political discussion and agitation. That the Bill will be passed and that the Socialist opposition against it will prove unavailing is already certain. What is less clear is how the new taxes which the Bill must entail will be distributed. Perhaps the military enthusiasm of the upper middle classes and of the aristocracy will abate when they realise that they must bear the burden of the new taxation.

The financial consequences are already being felt on the Berlin Stock Exchange. The moral consequences will be far more serious. The political atmosphere is charged with electricity. A sensational leading article of the semi-official Cologne Gazette, the most temperate and most influential paper of the Fatherland, is ominously significant. It is entitled the "Disturber of the Peace," and throws all the blame for the new military increase on the French Republic. As is pointed out by the correspondent of the Times, such an utterance is "extraordinarily unfair." Surely it is Germany, and Germany alone, who is taking the initiative of this huge increase of military expenditure. She has a perfect right to make such an increase. But why make her western neighbour responsible for it? "At the worst," says the Times, "such language may provoke an acute international crisis. At the best, it will provoke a suspicion that German politicians once more desire to float their patriotic sacrifices on a wave of passion."

But alas! passion in Germany calls forth passion in France, and the situation there is already sufficiently alarming without any outside excitement. France finds herself compelled to add to her already crushing military burdens, and that sacrifice must produce an artificial stimulus and a patriotic tension without which such a sacrifice could not be obtained. It is in this inevitable patriotic reaction on a sensitive people that the main danger lies. France wants peace, and yet lives in daily dread of war. We are indeed living in the neighbourhood of a powder magazine.

In the meantime in this country we continue to rejoice in the unparalleled boom of trade and industry. The statistics of imports and exports still increase by leaps and bounds. Our satisfaction would be unalloyed if the increase of our trade were not accompanied with an even greater increase of our emigration. . . . Before the end of the year 160,000 men and women, and mainly young men and women, will have left for Canada alone. Scotland is being depopulated. Our only consolation is that what is Great Britain's loss is the Empire's gain. But does that consolation really satisfy the patriot?

CANADA AND THE EMPIRE BY JOHN A. COOPER (Editor of the "Canadian Courier," Toronto, Canada)

AT the present time Canadians are being divided into two classes, ordinary Imperialists and centralist Imperialists. All Canadians are in favour of Canada remaining a portion of the British Empire. There is no division on that point. There is, however, a wide divergence as to the method of Imperial co-operation. The ordinary Imperialist would have the connection kept nominal and sentimental. He desires to see Canada have its own flag and its own fleet; he wants Canada to have the power to make its own commercial treaties and its own tariff. In short, he prefers an alliance to a confederation.

On the other hand, the centralist desires to see one flag, one fleet, one tariff, and one treaty-making power.

To understand this situation from the Canadian point of view it is necessary to go back over the history of the last hundred years. When Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia were separate colonies, each of them had a long and acrimonious debate with the authorities in Downing Street as to the establishment of self-government in these dependencies. The Governors were flouting their executives, making their own political appointments, and spending public money of their own volition. This was the situation when Lord Durham came to Canada and made his famous report.

Between 1840 and 1860 all this was changed. The control of the tariff and the Post Office was transferred from Downing Street to the Assemblies in the respective colonies. The Governors learned to choose their executives from the predominant party in the Assemblies. In Parliamentary matters each colony became a miniature Great Britain, with slight divergencies.

Then came the Confederation Act of 1867, which united the North American colonies into the first Dominion under the British Crown. That Act again lessened the authority of the Governor and the Colonial Office. Eleven years later, owing to representations made by the then Minister of Justice, Honourable Edward Blake, the powers of the Governor-General were still further restricted. Later, British troops were replaced by Canadian Militia, until finally, in 1900, even the naval stations passed under Canadian control.

By this series of events almost everything was won for self-government except the treaty-making power. In 1871 the first step towards the transfer of this function was made when Sir John Macdonald was appointed one of the British representatives on the Washington Commission. Canada was also given direct representation in the Halifax Fisheries Arbitration of 1877, the Fisheries Commission of 1887, the Joint High Commission of 1897, and the Alaska Commission of 1903. Since that time Canada has been accorded the privilege of negotiating her own commercial treaties direct.

It will thus be seen that the history of the last hundred years shows that the tendency in Canada has been towards decentralisation. Indeed, one may generalise and say that this has been the tendency among all the Britannic peoples, with the exception of Scotland and Wales. The manifest aim of each colony or dominion has been to gather to itself all the privileges of autonomy and self-government in so far as these were compatible with their allegiance to the British Crown. That this movement was not antagonistic to the best interests of the British Empire will hardly be denied. Every advance in colonial self-government has been accompanied by a strengthening of the sentimental ties which bind the Britannic peoples into the greatest alliance which the world has yet seen.

Now the scene has changed. A body of centralists in Great Britain and Canada desire to have the Overseas Dominions retrace their steps. The British Army and the British Naval Squadrons have been withdrawn from the outlying portions of the Empire, and the Dominions have been organising their own defence forces.

The centralists profess to see in this movement a danger to the British Alliance. They desire to curb the self-government of the Dominions at the point where military and naval organisations are considered. They are doing this under the guise of centralising the Empire's defence forces. Some of them go even farther, and advocate a uniform defensive trade policy for the whole Empire. They profess fear that, if unity in these matters is not again established, the Empire cannot be preserved.

To my mind this is a very dangerous experiment. If the military organisation of the Empire were centralised, Canada and Australia would take much less interest in their militia organisations. The great magnet of the Canadian Army and the Australian Army is the native pride of the people in their own defence force. It must be the same with regard to the Navy.

If Canada and Australia are merely to contribute money to a British Navy, then all the stimulus of native pride in connection with a naval organisation will be lost. On the other hand, if Canada were to build her own fleet, man it and equip it and maintain it, her people would come to have a broader conception of the importance and the difficulties of Imperial defence. After all, sacrifice or service is the greatest lesson which mankind has to learn. Unless Canadians and Australians learn to sacrifice themselves on behalf of naval defence they will never fully appreciate its importance. The contribution of money is not sacrifice in the highest sense. There must be service, and in naval defence this service can only be gained or inaugurated through local squadrons or fleet units, stationed on the coasts of each of the Dominions, and co-operating with the fleet of the United Kingdom whenever there is a common and supreme danger.

The British Empire has been doing well for a hundred years. It has survived all the croakings of pessimists and theorists. That growth and that survival are based upon freedom and liberty. Take away that freedom or that liberty and the Empire will fall to pieces as surely as did the ancient Empires of the Mediterranean. Preserve that freedom and that liberty and a common language, common ideals, and common allegiance to one Throne will preserve the Empire and enable it to march steadily forward to that destiny which all those who believe in Western civilisation and universal peace hope to see realised.

THE WORLD UGLY * * BY DR. PERCY DEARMER

THE Nineteenth Century has been rightly called a "wonderful century"; the record of its achievements is bewilderingly rich, and its people were naturally satisfied with themselves. Yet, as the years separate us from it, one suspects that future generations will look upon it with resentment and disgust, and will measure their progress by the removal of its last traces. For whatever else is true of the Nineteenth Century, in the good that it brought us, this at least is indubitably certain—it found the world beautiful, and it left the world hideous.

Not the whole world, of course, but the inhabited parts of the civilised world, the parts where most of us have to live. Wherever the Nineteenth Century reached its hand, it brought ruin upon city and village and homestead, like the ruin of an earthquake or a volcano. Our idea of happiness to-day is to get away from the Nineteenth Century, to go somewhere where we can no longer see one of the buildings which our fathers erected. Our way of imagining a proper world is to shut our eyes to the world about us, to—

"Forget six counties overhung with smoke,
Forget the snorting steam, the piston-stroke,
Forget the hideous spreading of the town;
Think only of the pack-horse on the down,
And think of London, small, and white, and clean,
Its pure stream gliding through its gardens green."

All this is very strange, because our fathers considered themselves highly civilised, and their age was one of great artists and of great writers about art, and it was an age of literary giants, at least in England, France, and Russia. Yet the Nineteenth Century went on with its work of destruction; its very culture was more fatal than its indifference; its appreciative and learned restorers removed all traces of beauty from ancient buildings as completely as if they had bombarded them; and the refined authorities of our Universities were as bad Vandals as any—perhaps the worst building in Oxford is that erected by a famous and cultivated Dean who was a warm admirer of Ruskin. The educated classes invented a system of dress such as the human race had never before been degraded to wear, irrational, uncomfortable, undignified, and so hideous as to be unfit even for funerals. In the middle year of the century the complacency of the century ran riot in the Great Exhibition of 1851—an event which is already used as the nadir-mark of our civilised environment.

I use these words advisedly, because such civilisation does not consist in sending messages quickly, nor in moving about the country at high rates of speed, nor even in that work of accurate description and classification which we call natural science, nor, indeed, even in a literature that is divorced from the people, and represents only the protest of a gifted minority against the conditions in which they find themselves. The people as a whole were cut off from the intellectual movements of the Victorian era; a huge proportion of them lived in squalor and misery, and all the time miles of dismal streets were swallowing up the countryside in the districts where a few men were piling up those characteristic Nineteenth-Century fortunes.

All the while, of course, the wonderful intellectual movements of the age were going on. Men of genius were protesting; the foundations of a better civilisation were being laid upon the ruins which the Industrial Revolution had made; social reform movements were gaining strength.

William Morris emerged soon after 1851, and he is significant of much. The Nineteenth Century was evolving Cosmos out of Chaos. Meanwhile, for practical purposes, it has left us Chaos. By which I mean that the actual streets in which we live, and the cities which are all we see from one day to another, are horrible, depressing, and degrading. Only those people who can at times escape into the country—or into the library, garden, or church—avoid the contamination. The rest are either "submerged," or live on with perverted imaginations, or with base ideals and mean instincts. And if Everyman does not believe this, let him notice what people read in the train.

Nor has the process stopped in this year of grace 1913. I am not an old man; yet when I was a boy in the London of about 1870, a quarter of an hour on a horse omnibus used to take me into the country. And now! Perhaps only motorists fully realise the immensity and the awfulness of the new towns that have sprung up within the last thirty years round the old. In spite of our vaunted speed of locomotion, it has become almost impossible for the poor man to escape from the "hideous spreading of the town." And how hideous it is! How mean and reckless is our modern city building! Already, almost before the mortar is dry, and before the mud has given place to pavement, hundreds of these streets have become slums; and there is nothing but an occasional church or "picture palace" (what pictures and what palaces!) to witness for anything but the shallow struggle for existence in the mean streets. One is amazed at the indifference of the public to this state of things—even of the wise and learned public. Perhaps the ugliest and shabbiest of modern public buildings is the new repository of the British Museum, which is just outside the flying-ground at Hendon. The British Museum! I suppose the authorities thought that as their new building was to be "planked" down in the outskirts of greater London, where anything can be done, it did not matter.

Well, there is a good side to the dismal picture. Town-planning has become a recognised art. Bournville and many other garden-cities show us that even modern industrialism can flourish amid inspiring, happy, and healthy surroundings. Even longer views of "civic survey" are now being taken in hand—schemes of what a whole district may become with imagination, forethought, and care—such as those of Professor Patrick Geddes in that city of Edinburgh which our ancestors made so glorious a place. So insistent has the movement for reform become that the politicians themselves have turned for a while from their barren business to take it up, and we now have a Housing and Town-Planning Act, which makes improvement more possible in places where there are exceptionally public-spirited people.

But meanwhile the reckless spreading of the town continues. We leave anyone who wants to make money free to do so by building anything he pleases. One man's greed is still allowed to ruin a whole district. The idea of the public interest coming first is not yet entertained. The creation of the modern slum goes on, and we cannot prevent it, until the public awakens. A place like the Hampstead Garden City is only an oasis in a wilderness of ever-growing brick. Public opinion has to become much stronger before the time arrives when a man will again be proud of his native place, and be happy in it, and inspired by it.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

IV.—THE MILL GIRL

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

IN the grey of the early dawning throughout the cotton centres of the North sounds the clatter of the clogs. The mill hands are going to work, and over the cobble-stones along the streets, dim with the first mists of the morning, troop an army of women, hooded and shawled. The air is full of the hoarse cry of the hooters, the shriek of whistles, the ringing of clamorous factory bells; but through all the noises, many and discordant, comes the clatter of the clogs—girls in their 'teens, young women newly married, mothers of families, old grand-dames, sturdy for all their sixty years, troop by, and the army gathers volume as it marches on.

The Lancashire girl starts out early in life. At thirteen she works "half-time," dividing her day between the mill and the school. It is a heavy strain on a young constitution, and many arguments have been advanced for increasing the age limit. But the earnings even of the beginner are not to be despised, and go to swell the family budget, that in Lancashire the proletariat insists shall be placed on a high level. The operatives oppose the extension of the time limit as strongly as the employers, though in many cases a girl's physique suffers heavily from the fatigues of mental and physical labour. A girl enters a cotton mill as a learner, and generally goes into the "reelers' " room. At the end of the month, if she is fairly quick, she earns from eight to ten shillings a week, and this amount rises to £1 and 2s. The wages of the male operatives are on a higher scale, and in cases where the husband and wife, two sons, and as many daughters work together the earning capacity of the family amounts to between £6 and £7. The Lancashire mill girl is a generous spender, and grudges money neither on her own pleasure nor her friends'. Blackpool and Stockport, during "Hindle Wakes," the annual holiday of Lancashire, when all the mills are closed, is full of holiday-makers. "The girl in the clogs and shawl" has thrown off her working dress, and, attired in the latest fashion in hats and the smartest possible coat and skirt, spends her savings right royally. Blackpool in August is a sight never to be forgotten, when the operatives fill the town, laughing, happy, healthy creatures; well dressed and well fed, they impress one with their vitality and splendid independence.

The mill girl can pay for her own amusements, and a camaraderie exists between her and the male hands unknown in other branches of industrialism. This camaraderie of the sexes is the more remarkable because necessarily there is a certain amount of competition among them. Everybody knows the story—so good that we tell it again—of the Lancashire lad who, chancing across an old chum, is asked what happened to the girl who got his old job at Nelson's mill. "T'lass has'na get," he replied. "Ah married her." Undoubtedly there is a vast displacement of male labour by the extended employment of mill girls, but of late the demand for hands in Lancashire has been so keen that the men have had plenty to do and to spare. And in any case, as I have said, it does not affect the friendliness between the mill girl and the male operatives. There are in all 750,000 female workers in the textile trades, and they are practically all of them, members of the Union. The old lament that women, like lunatics, cannot combine breaks down hopelessly as regards Lancashire. They are as keen on Trade Unionism, its possibilities and developments, as are the men, and in the last few strikes that have taken place their militancy took a pronounced, not to say aggressive, form. In passing it is worth noting that this practically unanimous adherence to Trade Unionism on the part of both the male and female workers has by no means brought a plethora of strikes to the cotton industry, where for over fifteen years the famous Brooklands agreement, drafted by Sir Charles Macara, secured uninterrupted peace. Women, it should be noted, are members on equal terms with the men, not only of the Trade Unions but of the "Co-op. Societies," those phenomenally successful trading concerns whose development is one of the features of modern Lancashire. The "Co-ops." were one of the first institutions to recognise the equality of the sexes, and long before the Married Woman's Property Act they refused, in honourable defiance of the law, to give up to the worthless husband the savings of the wife!

Side by side the girls work with the men, as deft and as quick as they, instinct with the same esprit de corps. The cleverest hands mind the looms, watching the flashing shuttles that dart in and out weaving the warp and woof. Ten shillings a week is paid per loom, and some of the smartest hands mind two or three. The clatter of the machines, the whirring of the wheels that grind and turn the live-long day drown the voice; but for all that, the operatives chat and tell each other all the gossip of the day. It is one of the most arresting scenes in mill life to see a pretty, dark-haired lass exchange greetings with her neighbour at the next loom. You see her lips move, but the din drowns her voice, and for a moment you are puzzled at the smile of comprehension on their faces.

And then the explanation dawns on you. The operatives, through long-continued practice, understand the language of the lips, and can communicate freely without uttering a sound. The girls wear their hair tightly bound about their heads. Flowing locks and loose tresses are forbidden, for fear they should become entangled in the machinery and the girl find herself drawn into the cruel wheels. A neat blouse and skirt is the general wear of the operative, with a white apron; they keep their smart clothes for high days and holidays. The atmosphere of the mills is humid and oppressive. Cotton can only be manipulated in a moist heat, and some of the rooms on the lower floor in certain buildings are inches deep in water. This accounts, to a large extent, for the clogs, which keep the wearer well out of the wet. The shawl worn over the head, muffled tightly round the throat, serves as a protection from cold, as the change from the overheated mill to the raw damp of the open air strikes chill to the lungs.

In certain factories the hands have their mid-day meal inside the building, but the majority of operatives go out to their food. An hour is the time allowed for dinner, and half an hour for breakfast. The mill girl likes a highly seasoned diet; fried fish and pickles greatly appeal to her, and pork sausages and kippers, eaten with bread hot from the oven thickly spread with butter. Tinned goods are lavishly included, and all kinds of sauces and paste. The meal of the day is high tea, when a collection of dainties is spread on the table that would astonish the Cockney workgirl.

Eating-houses and cookshops abound in the vicinity of the mills and those quarters of the town where the operatives live. Industrialism leaves little time for the practice of the domestic arts, and the mill girl generally buys her food ready dressed and seasoned to taste. The evenings find them at the local cinemas, theatres, and concert halls. They have a keen appreciation of music, and possess a quick ear and strong, clear voices, and are formidable rivals in choir contests. The mill girl is fond of dancing, and her vivacity and "go" make her an admirable partner.

The working hours of the day—from 6 o'clock to 5.30—compare favourably with other employments, and the rate of wages is undoubtedly the highest of any women workers in the country. Piecers and winders average from 15s. to 16s. a week, while card-room hands reach 25s. There is something very impressive in the sight of the army of operatives streaming out of the mill gates. The clatter of the clogs, insistent, strenuous, once more sounds on the cobble-stones; the town with its huge chimney stacks towering up to the blackened heavens frowns down on them, while in the far distance stretches the open country veiled in a cloud of smoke. The streets are narrow, and, to the Southerner, squalid in their lack of forecourt; the houses, of brick-walled monotony, weary the eye, though they are not ill-kept or badly furnished.

The modern Lancashire cotton town, for all the improvements that have taken place in the position of its work-people, is very much the same as when Dickens described it fifty years ago.

But since the days of Dickens the material prosperity of the operatives has vastly increased, and it is difficult to exaggerate the almost feverish enthusiasm that amusement, excursions, and holidays awaken in the hearts of the operatives, and especially of the mill girls. Of the Lancashire mill girl it may be said with literal truth that "when she is not working she is playing." There is no repose in Lancashire. The ceaseless whirring of the wheels seems to have ground into the very heart of the people so that they can never rest, and they seize eagerly on every opportunity to escape to scenes where, beyond the rattle of the looms, there is, if not peace, at any rate variety. The money spent on holidays and excursions amounts to many thousands of pounds per annum.

If the increased employment of the mill girl has added generally to the affluence of the home, it has perhaps detracted more than a little from its comfort and good arrangement. The food is ample, but not too well cooked, and, as we have said, the tinned variety plays far too great a part in the household economy. Still, there is rarely any shortage in the victualling line, and it is a favourite boast of the folk in the cotton spinning districts that they "eat their rent" year by year—a quaint method of intimating that every household receives sufficient in "divi" from the "Co-op." to pay the landlord his due. If the meal is not always well cooked, neither is the child particularly well tended. The crèche is an institution throughout Lancashire where the mothers go back to the mill within a month of their confinement, and the price that the families pay for their increased affluence is an infantile death-rate that is positively appalling! It must be admitted, however, that women in other industrial centres, even in London, go out to work day by day, leaving the children in a crèche; but they have not the compensation which Lancashire possesses in such an affluent family budget.

There are not wanting signs that a change is coming over Lancashire, and it is with the mill girls that it is commencing. Here, as elsewhere, it is found that woman is the civilising agent. There is a revolt, quiet, but growing and insistent, on the part of the female operatives at the crudeness, the lack of equipment, the sordidness of factory work, a revolt that does not find expression in strikes, or trade unions, or appeals to Parliament, and which proves for that very reason all the more disconcerting to the masters. It was surely eloquent of much when an experienced "knocker-up" in one of the Lancashire cotton towns announced that he found himself hard put to it to get a living. Why was this? Not because of increased competition, but on account of a decrease in the number of customers. For the first time in the history of the cotton industry Lancashire lasses are turning away from the mills and seeking, and with success, occupation elsewhere. It is not a question of wages, as one of the managers recently explained to a Pressman; advances are offered of even five or ten per cent. In their perplexity and in the pressure of the last twelve months the employers have had to send agents round to the operatives' houses to tempt the "grannies" back to the looms which they worked years ago, and at which the younger generation will not serve. This new generation do not love the mills, nor yet the clogs, nor overmuch the shawls. They deliberately select less highly paid avocations, where they run less risk of damp and cold, where "speeding-up" has not been carried to such a point, where life is easier and more simple. This way, perhaps, lies Lancashire's road to better industrial organisation, and already the keener employers are bent on improving the mills from the point of view of equipment. The new type that is being advocated will offer facilities to the girls for rest and recreation. There will be space for dressing-rooms, and increased space and improved ventilation everywhere.

The girls are to form choral and other classes in connection with the mill, and, in a word, their conditions are to be humanised and everything possible done to attract the younger generation back to the looms. Possibly the movement will succeed, but sometimes, when I think of the ghastly figures of the infant death-rate, I am inclined to hope that it may fail. There is no getting away from the fact that this slaughter of the innocents is the great overshadowing curse on woman's labour in the mills. It is true that the ordinary proletarian home in Lancashire frequently enjoys a prosperity that seems positively staggering when it is contrasted with that of a London workman. But the price that Lancashire pays is the blood of her children. At Burriley one child in every three dies within a year of its birth, and the figures for the rest of the county are terribly high. More, when the American Civil War brought on Lancashire the horrors of its cotton famine, when hunger was at the throat of thousands of her sons and daughters, the infant death-rate actually fell. I do not pretend, of course, that it is this fact which has caused the aversion of the mill girl to her traditional work. But it may well have the effect of staying this waste of life, therefore let us welcome it.

For it is written, "Even so, it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish."

LIFE IN A LONDON BASTILLE * * * BY THOMAS HOLMES

PROBABLY few readers of EVERYMAN are acquainted with a block of human habitations that lift their shameless heads to the sky close by one of our London parks. I will therefore ask them to lend me their imagination for a short time and transport themselves to the locality, which shall for the present be nameless. We select a fine afternoon for our visit, and at half-past three pass through a formidable iron gateway and find ourselves in the courtyard of the "model dwellings."

On every side the grey walls tower above us. The rays of the afternoon sun, whose beams are now aslant, fail to illumine the gloom in which we are enveloped, for, out of the hundreds of windows that break the monotony of the upstanding walls, not a single window reflects a dancing ray.

The dwellings stand four square, and form a commodious quadrangle, but in the centre stands another block of equal height and greyness. Exactly seventy-four concrete steps lead to the top floor of each block, a gloomy portal providing entrance to each division. Between the centre block and the outside blocks runs a narrow courtyard, the floor being asphalt, very much broken; but, broken and uneven though it be, children who live there are trying to "play," in spite of the difficulties and the depressing gloom.

We stand for a moment and look up at the grey walls. We see at regular and unvarying intervals openings in the walls faced with strong iron railings. At the back of the railings stand children, with their faces thrust halfway through, gazing into the nether gloom, watching the children at "play."

We inquire for No. 246, and the children tell us, "Why, it is right at the very top at that end. Turn to the left when you get to the top landing."

We pass through one of the dismal portals, leaving the outside gloom to find ourselves in almost darkness. We begin our search for 246. Fortunately, the narrow concrete staircase is close at hand. Quite accidentally we discover a rough iron hand-rail, and, with its assistance and guidance, we begin the climb. One! two! three! four! The staircase is very narrow, the steps are very steep, and the darkness increases. Five! six! seven! eight! We see a faint light above us that comes through one of the openings. Nine! ten! eleven! twelve! We have arrived at the first landing, so we stand by one of the openings to watch the children at "play" and to take observations.

Then the horrors of the place are half suggested, half revealed to us. To the right of us we can discern a long corridor, to the left a similar corridor, in front of us, wide and open, a sanitary convenience. We hear the trickling and drip, drip of water which proceeds from a water-tap close by. Along the corridor we half see some of the doors that give entrance to the different rooms; from the back of those doors we hear the hum of voices and the crying of children. We observe one wretched gas-lamp, evidently of limited power, which suffices for the whole corridor; but the time for lighting up has not yet arrived, and we subsequently learn that its niggardly rays are withdrawn at 10.30, when Egyptian darkness prevails. But we continue our ascent, for we have five staircases still to negotiate and five openings to pass. The inside of the building, like the outside, tells of repetition and sameness. As we move upwards we meet others coming down, so we stand close to the greasy walls that they may be enabled to pass us in safety, for the rounded steps facilitate accidents. We reach the top at last; the darkness has increased, but a friendly match enables us to find 246!

The room is not enticing, but we are glad to sit down and rest, for the climb upwards has been exhausting.

Yet, strange to say, on that top floor weakly women, half-fed children, and invalid husbands live. Children are born there, and children die there! Children coming home from school pass up and down those concrete steps half a dozen times a day. We sit for a time in silence, and wonder what the concrete steps would tell us if they could speak. Would they tell us of accidents and injuries, of panting women soon to be mothers, of poor consumptives that have "passed," of drunken men and dissolute women, with their quarrels, curses, and blows? Yes, they would tell of these and of much more, for they would tell of little coffins carried lightly up, but heavily down, of little children's frequent falls and injuries, of bruised heads, broken limbs, and blighted lives.

246 consists of three small rooms; the one we enter serves for a living room, workroom, and bedroom. On one side an open door reveals a box-like bedroom; on the opposite side stands another room of similar shape and size, for again everything speaks with mathematical certainty of repetition. We enter into conversation with the tenants of 246, and, knowing that they have recently lost a child of three months, we talk about it. "I suppose that you have a good many deaths in these buildings?" "Why, yes, there have been three funerals this year, and it is but January, and our little one died just before Christmas." "When anyone dies here—either child or adult—what becomes of the dead body before the funeral?" "Well, ours lay in that little room; we have lost three children; and other people manage in the same way."

(To be continued.)

PRISON

THE moments, like small, stinging pebbles, fall
Upon the soul, hurting it, one by one,
Slow and monotonous. On the blank wall
The sick beams glimmer of a joyless sun,
Which speaks of no glad, free, triumphant skies,
Nor morning—but of hard, perpetual noon,
Such noon as broods above a shadowless street—
Made up of noise and squalor, dust and flies;
Yet here there is no sound of human feet,
But a dead silence—silence with no boon
Of sleep or quiet—a most thrice accursed.
Silence, which leaves the spirit free to move
In horror, loneliness, hunger, and thirst,
Through a world naked of all human love,
Bare as a white-washed wall, a cruel white,
Shadowless world, with nothing left therein,
Save justice looking neither to left or right,
And one man overtaken by his sin!

MARGARET SACKVILLE.

THE WOMEN'S PAGE

CONCERNING THE HUMAN CHILD. BY EVELYN BURKE

A CLEVER novelist has it that the modern clergyman is like a doctor who knows his cures, but does not know his patients; and it might still be said of the average teacher that he knows his subjects, but does not know his scholars. The tide has turned, however, and child-study has not only become a concrete and vital part of the teacher's curriculum, but has even invaded the home. "The child is too much with us," lamented a mother who was suffering from the type of nursery governess that shows an almost indecent familiarity with the most secret motives and impulses of the psychological "child," but stands utterly helpless in face of very ordinary and entirely amenable human children. "Once we had children," this mother remarked feelingly; "now we have only that psychological monstrosity known as 'the child.'" And most sensible persons will grant that, while scientific child-study is of the greatest importance, and has already done much to superannuate a senseless and soulless system of mechanical cramming, the pseudo-scientific variety practised as a drawing-room accomplishment is apt to work serious havoc.

My friend Cynthia lived to be thirty-five before she discovered the psychological child. She has three perfectly delightful children, all under school age, who were being "kindergartened" by a particularly sweet-tempered but not particularly capable young lady, whom the bewilderingly varied and ingenious naughtinesses of Hugh, Jean, and Alec respectively threw into a state of deplorable perturbation. Cynthia belongs to a ladies' club, and there confided her woes to that very clever and sympathetic amateur educationist (if she will pardon the designation) Miss Blank. Miss Blank said the matter was perfectly simple. All the sweet-tempered young governess needed was a short course of child-study, and, as good fortune would have it, Miss Blank was just starting a class, which not only the young lady, but also Cynthia herself ought certainly to join. After all, the mother, and not the teacher, was the true educator; and the sole reason why so many children grew up warped in soul and estranged from those who ought to be their most intimate confidants was that mothers failed to see that the exercise of true motherhood was impossible without child-study. Overawed by these impressive representations, Cynthia accompanied her young lady to Miss Blank's class, the children being the while consigned to an old nurse, who had never heard of "the child," but who, nevertheless, had quite a remarkably successful method with children.

"The child," began Miss Blank, "is the key to the educational problem."

"What child?" asked the frank and inquisitive Cynthia, who had met any number of children, but had never so far heard of "the child."

Miss Blank explained, very patiently, that she was not referring to any particular child, but to the child in general. By way of illustration she mentioned a manual called "The Horse," which dealt with the habits and tribulations of the whole equine species in a scientific and comprehensive manner. Her elucidation of "the child" took a quarter of an hour, and left Cynthia in considerable doubt as to whether "the child" was all children rolled into one, or a convenient symbol for the concentrated average, or else the expressed essence of childhood bottled for laboratory use. She wisely decided, however, to suspend her judgment, and see what "the child" was really going to do for her.

She studied the child most conscientiously for at least three months, and by degrees became so familiar with its most subtle and intricate movements that even its subliminal self no longer remained a mystery to her. As for the young kindergarten governess, she was overjoyed to learn that "the child" needs no teaching in the ordinary sense of the term. A skilful question, a wise suggestion was enough. The rest would be done by the child itself, who was warranted to spin out a delightful thread of illustration and application out of its own inner consciousness. She saw herself thenceforward as a human spool, ready to receive the beautiful thread of knowledge which every well-regulated child could spin on demand.

As time went on, however, the two ladies found out that their increasing intimacy with "the child" did not produce a corresponding ease in dealing with the three little persons who made Cynthia's nursery the delightful place it was. Quite on the contrary, they took on an alarmingly unfamiliar aspect, and gradually the horrible conviction dawned upon Cynthia that if "the child" was the norm of childhood, her children were abnormalities, monstrosities, degenerates . . . (here words failed her); for neither Hugh, nor Jean, nor even Alec, who was always the most reasonable of the three, would say or think or do anything in the least like the things that Miss Blank's educational "child" invariably thought and said and did. And so it came about that both Cynthia and the young teacher found themselves elaborately primed up for all manner of emergencies that never happened or were in the least likely to happen, very much like the knight in "Alice in Wonderland" with his mousetrap. In the end, Cynthia escaped a mental collapse by rehabilitating her own children at the expense of the exasperating "child," and consigning the latter to the limbo of the dragon and the griffin and other mythical and mythological beasts, while the young lady recorded it in her note-book that there was a considerable difference between a child and a silkworm.

The truth is that "the child," like all abstractions, requires very careful handling, and is apt to land the inexperienced miles away from actuality. One looks at it from this side and from that and exclaims, "How like little Johnny!" (or little Mary, as the case might be). But the moment one gets a "full-face" view of it, the illusion vanishes, leaving one with something utterly unlike little Johnny, or little Mary, or, indeed, any other thing outside the brain of a professor of psychology. Nowhere is fashionable dilettantism more disastrous than here, and while the child will remain a useful "dummy" for students one would not like to see it introduced into a nursery full of children. Indeed, one rather suspects that, as far as out-of-school education goes, while the amateur cult of "the child" has begun to threaten to gain a vicious popularity, the care of children is still in its infancy. "Except ye become as the child . . ." There is nothing less childlike, and therefore less heavenly, than "the child" of the amateur psychologist, and the exceedingly unlovely type of children it tends to create.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE BY E. HERMANN

I.

LOVERS of Sir Thomas Browne may take their choice of three excellent portraits—one in his native town of Norwich, one in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, where he was one of the last fellow-commoners at Broadgate Hall before it was endowed as Pembroke College, and one in the Royal College of Physicians, of which he was a member. All three are reputed speaking likenesses, represent him in middle life, and recall the somewhat mordant dictum of Sir Kenelm Digby, "A very fine, ingenious gentleman; but how deep a scholar . . . ?" For a detailed analysis we have the word-portraiture of the Rev. John Whitefoot, who describes his life-long friend with something of the meticulous exactitude characteristic of an age of leisure. From this genial chronicler we learn that the much-loved physician was of moderate height, neither fat nor lean—εὐσάρκος, of a well-proportioned figure, the learned cleric has it—with an abundance of warm-coloured, naturally rolling hair, a moustache and small chin-beard, and a complexion "answering to his name." Remarkably large, dark, luminous eyes, looking out from underneath curved eyebrows, lent an air of mingled dignity and curiosity to the countenance, and we are also told of the smiling mouth, full nose, and smooth brow, which spoke of a serene enjoyment of life.

II.

Plain in dress he always was, in strange contrast to his opulent and jewelled style, affecting cloak and boots even after the Restoration had ruled them out of fashion, and very careful to be warmly clad underneath. Serene and amenable, cheerful, but rarely merry, he blushed when he had jested by accident, and was one of those strenuous persons incapable of doing nothing. This suggests a somewhat uncomfortable character to live with; but one has to remember that in the seventeenth century work had not yet taken on its grim Carlylean aspect, and the "Religio Medici" was written and rewritten "at leisurable times, for private exercise and satisfaction." That he had no sense of humour must be admitted. Twentieth-century readers may smile at his delicious quaintness, but must make up their minds to believe that no twinkle lit up the author's eye as he penned these delectable phrases. John Evelyn gives us an account of his Norwich residence, which he describes as "a paradise and cabinet of varieties, especially medals, books, plants, and natural things, and a collection of all the birds of Norfolk that he could procure,"—a fit abode for the gentle, dreamy, contented man who, after venturing upon that great issue between science and religion which broke the fretting soul of a Pascal on the wheel, retired with undiminished cheerfulness to a prosperous, humdrum county practice.

III.

The "Religio Medici" was first written about 1634, at Shipden Hall, in one of the most retired valleys of the West Riding, where he "had not the assistance of any good book." He revised and re-wrote with much fastidiousness, handing the various copies to friends for their criticism. Not a few of these friends asked leave to transcribe this interesting new work, and so it was small wonder that one day a pirated edition appeared, minus title-page, but with a characteristic frontispiece by William Marshall, representing a man who has just leapt from a rock overhanging the sea being caught in mid-air by a hand from the sky. Lord Dorset read it, and speedily recommended it to his then imprisoned friend, Sir Kenelm Digby; and this remarkable pamphleteer forthwith wrote a not uncritical but highly enthusiastic appreciation of it. This meant not only that "murder was out," and "our physician" forced to issue an authorised edition; it also meant that he had secured the inestimable benefit of contemporary criticism—the rarest of things at that time. The book ruffled the pools of current opinion considerably. It was looked askance at by the Puritans, and, had it not been for the social and political confusion, which left those in authority no time or inclination for heresy-hunting, even his earnest protestations of orthodoxy could not have saved the author.

IV.

It is not easy for us to-day to see wherein the danger of this singular and altogether charming book lay for its contemporaries. Its thought is neither profound nor revolutionary. It is, indeed, nothing else but a typical example of that tendency to cut the world in two with a hatchet, to keep religion and human knowledge in separate, watertight compartments, from which we are only just recovering. Sir Thomas Browne is a learned physician, of a curious and experimental turn of mind. He is also a devout, practical Christian. He accepts the truth of the Christian religion in mystical matters—these "wingy mysteries of divinity" are not for his exploration—but he demands freedom to investigate nature to the full bent of his inquiring mind. Having made his bow to the Church, and made it in all humility and sincerity, he passes on to exercise his microscopic mind upon the little things of nature. He accepts miracles with the most cheerful alacrity—all, that is, except "Romish impostures" with bits of holy wood, etc., which his Protestant consciousness rules out of court; he not only believes there may be witches, but knows there are, talks of former heresies with awe-struck abhorrence, and retreats from too pointed issues to his "solitary and retired imagination." He is tortuous in argument, his thought takes many surprising turns, flies off at wild tangents; shows an alternating rhythm of boldness and timidity.

V.

But the style's the man. No one with a feeling for language can open any book of Sir Thomas Browne's and fail to be sensible of that "learned sweetness of cadence," which adds to its embroidered splendour a singular and haunting charm. Who can read the "Religio Medici" without remembering passages where beautiful language verges on intoxication, trembles towards ecstasy? Who can open the "Urn Burial" without coming upon periods of noble music, heart-shaking in its dim loveliness? Even that unequivocally bad book, "The Garden of Cyrus," contains many beautiful things, among them, perhaps, the most flawless fragment of prose the seventeenth century can show. And all written by a man who was profoundly indifferent to the literature of his time, to whom Chaucer was foolishness and Milton an offence! Softened by a delightful human sympathy and roseate with an optimism that found it a delight just to live, his golden phrasing and exotic broidering of words will ever remain a joy to ears that are attuned to the harmonies of language.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE, NATUS 1605, OBIIT 1682

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD

X.—ROUMANIA

I.

IN a recent little book, "The Great Analysis" (Methuen), by an anonymous writer, whose identity conceals one of the most acute critics of our generation, we are reminded that one of the pressing needs of our time is a stocktaking of all the resources of our planet, a systematic survey of the possibilities and productive energies of the different countries of the globe. Even the most cursory glance at our daily press will show how sadly such intellectual contact is at present wanting, and what hazy notions are entertained even by our leading publicists. To give only one trivial instance: that very able journalist, Mr. Harold Spender, told us a few days ago that he motored into Spain in quest of sunshine, presumably on the assumption that Spain was a sub-tropical paradise. The article on the Spanish Peninsula in last week's EVERYMAN would have told him that one does not expect to find sunshine on the other side of the Pyrenees in February or March, and that central Spain has one of the most rigorous climates of Europe.

The present series is a modest attempt in the direction of a more intelligent understanding of other nations. And we shall have achieved our end if we have done something, in however small a measure, to dispel the dense cloud of ignorance which hides from our view the wide world of civilisation.

II.

War is a grim but efficient teacher of geography, and, but for the present war, the British people would probably not have awakened to the fact that somewhere in the south-east of Europe there exists a country called Roumania, and that there exists a very grave international problem—the Roumanian problem. Certainly the extraordinary way in which even the best-informed papers of the Liberal Press have discussed Roumania for the last few months proves how little the average journalist knows about her. We have been told, in leading articles innumerable, that Roumania is trying to blackmail Bulgaria, that she has been pursuing an odious Machiavellic policy, that she has been playing a waiting game, that her intention in the probable event of an undecisive campaign was to throw her army into the balance or to demand a substantial compensation at the critical time as the price of her neutrality.

But these armchair politicians entirely forget that Roumania is not a Balkan State, that she could not possibly have sided with the Balkan Allies, that she had nothing to gain and a great deal to lose from a Bulgarian victory, that the one vital interest of Roumania was the maintenance of a weak Turkey and not the creation of a powerful Bulgaria, that Roumania is hemmed in on all sides by powerful rivals or enemies, that the new situation brought about by the war may threaten her very existence as a nation, and that in claiming a compensation she is only safeguarding those national interests. It is quite obvious that those critics of Roumania are so hypnotised by the German peril that they fail to see what may be one day the much more formidable Slav peril.

III.

The resurrection of Roumania in the nineteenth century has been one of the most remarkable and one of the most unexpected occurrences in modern history. I advisedly say "resurrection," because it verily was a rising from the dead. One invader after another had trampled the plains of Wallachia and Moldavia, until the very name of the people had disappeared. Even the language seemed to have vanished, and no written document before the sixteenth century has survived to tell us in the native speech the tragic tale of the Roumanian race.

After all those centuries of invasion and conquest, suddenly the Roumanian race reappeared on the stage of history, and revealed to an astonished Europe that they were one of the most ancient nations of civilisation. Those so-called Slavs were discovered to be, in reality, a Latin race. Those Danubian peasants were discovered to be the lineal descendants of the Roman legionaries, whom the Emperor Trajan had settled in the Balkan Peninsula. And the early history of that people was found to be written in imperishable characters on the Trajan column, in one of the most splendid pages of Imperial Rome.

It may be objected that too much has been made of the Roman origin of the Roumanians, and that it has inflated the national consciousness of the people. And certainly a national history which can be traced back to the Trajan column is not conducive to humility. But when a people has been oppressed for so many generations, may it not be that too much national self-consciousness is better than too little?

I admit that in quite another sense the insistence on the Latin origin of the Roumanians has had a bad influence. It has introduced an artificial element into Roumanian culture. It has widened the already wide gulf which separates the educated classes from the masses. It has given rise to two different languages—one a learned language, containing only Latin-French elements, and another and popular language, containing a large mixture of Slav elements. To realise the position, we need only imagine the co-existence in Great Britain of two different English languages, one of which would mainly contain a vocabulary of Norman origin, whilst the other would largely contain words of Anglo-Saxon origin. I had myself an unpleasant experience of this confusion of the tongues. I had started the study of Roumanian, as I have always started the study of foreign languages, by trying to assimilate a translation of the Bible, published by the British and Foreign Bible Society. On arriving in Bucharest, I discovered that this translation of the British and Foreign Bible Society had nothing to do with the real and popular Roumanian language, and that I had wasted a great deal of time and energy in learning a language which did not exist, and which at any rate could not be understood by the people for whom it was intended.

IV.

Roumania, like Servia and Bulgaria, is a State in the making. Her political boundaries bear no relation to her racial limits. As there is a greater Servia and a greater Poland, so there is a greater Roumania. On the eastern frontier, in Russian Bessarabia, there are more than four millions of Roumanians, who were incorporated by Russia after the war of 1878. On the northern frontier, in Transylvania, on the other side of the Carpathian Mountains, there are another four millions of Roumanians, who are unwilling subjects of the King of Hungary. The total number of the Roumanian population cannot be much below fifteen millions, and if the principle of nationalities is destined ultimately to prevail in the Europe of tomorrow, a powerful autonomous Roumanian kingdom is certain to arise in the Near East.

V.

From their geographical position and economic resources, the Roumanian people enjoy many advantages. The country is watered by the Danube, which, for 300 miles, forms the southern boundary. She has a seaboard with two excellent spacious harbours. She possesses rich oil-fields and fertile plains, offering great possibilities to agriculture. But those favourable conditions are counterbalanced by great disadvantages. The climate of Wallachia is oppressively hot and relaxing to human energy. The oil industry has been almost entirely appropriated by foreign monopolists, and only enriches the few whilst undermining the vitality of the many. The greater part of the land has been confiscated by territorial magnates. Unlike Bulgaria, which is a country of peasant proprietors, Roumania is cursed with a powerful and demoralising "aristocracy," which is really a "kakistocracy." Many of the Roumanian princes are absentees, and spend their rents in the pleasure resorts and in the gambling dens of Germany and France. There are few countries in Europe where the land question is more acute and where trouble is more certain to arise in the future.

VI.

In addition to the land question, Roumania is troubled with a Jewish question, which is even more critical and more acute. The Roumanian Jews have migrated, like most of the Jews of the world, from the ancient kingdom of Poland—which has largely become the kingdom of Israel. Although they only form about four per cent. of the population—300,000 out of seven million—they wield enormous power. They own a considerable part of the soil, and even the soil which they do not own is heavily mortgaged to them. Trade and banking are almost entirely in their hands, and, although there are very few Jewish agriculturists, most of the estates are farmed out and managed by Jewish factors. But even as in Russia, the Jew in Roumania is a result rather than a cause. If the aristocracy had done their duty, if they were not spendthrift absentees and indolent pleasure-seekers, the power of the Jew would not be what it is.

Whatever may be the cause of this power, the anti-semitic feeling is a very strong one. Roumania is one of the few countries in Europe where the Jews are still deprived of civil rights. Under the Treaty of Berlin, the Government were pledged to remove their disabilities. That pledge has not been redeemed. The Jews settled in the country generations ago, yet they are still considered as aliens, and each Jew has to be individually naturalised by special Act of Parliament.

VII.

As there are many artificial elements in the political conditions of Roumania, so there is something artificial in Roumanian culture. Although the King is a member of the Hohenzollern family, although politically Roumania is under German influence, and although the formidable fortifications of Bucharest built by the Belgian engineer, General Brialmont, are within the system of the Triple Alliance, morally and intellectually Roumania is entirely French. The Roumanian educated classes all speak the French language. Some of the chief papers are French papers. And Bucharest prides herself on being an Eastern Paris. But in imitating Paris, Bucharest has rather copied the City of Pleasure than the City of Art and the City of Learning. And the French influence, instead of being as it has been in other countries, a power making for "sweetness and light," has, on the whole, been a demoralising one.

Nor does the influence of the national Church counterbalance the demoralising influence of a corrupt aristocracy. In the Near East the Greek Orthodox Church is everywhere in a lamentable state of stagnation, and is doing nothing to raise the condition of the people. So far from trying to raise the people, the Roumanian clergy are themselves sunk in materialism and obscurantism. I know of no other country in Europe where religion plays so insignificant a part in the national life.

VIII.

With the land in the possession of absentee magnates, with the peasantry in the grip of the money-lender, with eight millions of her race under the tyranny of Austria and Russia, Roumania is confronted with many urgent problems. And the Roumanian people will need all their energies to emerge successfully from the dangers, both internal and external, which threaten them. But in the coming struggle they deserve the sympathy and support of Europe. For the future of Roumania does not concern Roumania alone, it concerns all the Powers, and it concerns Great Britain as much as any other Power. And here at least is a chance for British diplomacy to work harmoniously with Germany. In Roumania the aims of British policy ought to be exactly the same as the aims of German policy. It cannot be in the interest of Great Britain any more than of Germany that Roumania should be weakened, and still less that she should become a Protectorate of Russia. And yet if Bulgaria and Russia had their own way, Roumania would needs be reduced to Russian vassalage, and the Slav sea would sweep over the whole of South-Eastern Europe.

Roumania has a great function to fulfil. She is intended in the future to be an independent "buffer" State between Bulgaria and Russia. What has been said of Austria, that if she did not exist she would have to be invented, is equally true of Roumania. But, as fortunately Roumania does exist, it only remains for the European Powers to safeguard that existence and to protect the Roumanian people against the encroachments of the neighbouring Powers.

PAGAN AND CHRISTIAN IDEALS

IN the earliest mythological and historical literature we find two opposing conceptions of life struggling for expression—the Sensuous and the Spiritual, otherwise termed the Materialistic and the Idealistic. The Materialist, accepting the world of sense in its crudest form, as the ultimate fact, uses it for personal gratification. His creed, as the result of temperament, may take the form of a refined epicureanism, but, whether refined or not, it remains essentially Pagan. In the hands of a philosophic few Paganism had undoubtedly an ethical outlook, but history only too plainly shows that, so far as the ancient world as a whole was concerned, the result was moral enervation, not to say corruption. The period of the long peace in Rome is known in history as the Golden Age, but, as the author of "Ecce Homo" remarks, except to Court poets, the age did not seem golden to those who lived in it. "It was, in fact, one of the meanest and foulest."

Reduced to its last analysis, Paganism stands for the self-assertiveness and self-sufficiency of humanity, on the basis of sensuous enjoyment. But, as Matthew Arnold says, "the life-giving and joy-giving power of Nature, so fondly cherished by the Pagan world, could not save her followers from self-dissatisfaction and ennui." Christianity offered to the world a totally different ideal. For self-assertion it substituted self-surrender, and for self-gratification it substituted self-renunciation. The reaction against Paganism was violent, as all reaction is apt to be, and took the form of asceticism, which for long was treated as an indispensable element in Christianity. The ascetic ideal provoked another reaction, a revival of the Pagan ideal, which, from the time of the Renaissance, has left a permanent influence upon literature. Under the names Hebraism and Hellenism, Matthew Arnold has familiarised the modern mind with the two opposing conceptions of life, and now we have Dr. Kelman, in his volume, "Among Famous Books," tracing the Pagan and Christian ideals in the works of representative writers. The key to Dr. Kelman's highly suggestive book is found in his remark that we moderns, though living in a Christian age, have not done with Paganism, which had not "died out with the passing of heathen systems of religions. It is terribly alive in the heart of modern England, whether formally believing or unbelieving. Indeed, there is the twofold life of Puritan and Pagan within us all." There are two classes of Pagans—the self-satisfied and the self-dissatisfied. Even among the heathen religionists there were idealists who yearned for something more enduring and satisfying than the sensuous pleasures of Nature worship. In the heathen mythologies, as Dr. Kelman in his highly toned chapter, "The Gods of Greece," points out, we find the finest spirituality with the crudest Paganism.

Coming to modern times, we have in Goethe's "Faust" a type of dissatisfied Paganism. The husks of sensuous pleasure, Faust finds, do not afford adequate nutriment for the soul, with its yearnings for the infinite and eternal. Faust fails, but, as Dr. Kelman remarks, he refuses to settle down complacently "in the acceptance of the lower life, with its gratifications and delights." But Paganism has another ideal besides that of sensuous pleasure—the ideal of beauty. By way of reaction against the theological contempt of Nature there arose a kind of mystical worship of Nature—a worship divorced from creeds and dogmas. In the fascinating chapters, "Celtic Revivals of Paganism" and "Marius the Epicurean," Dr. Kelman deals with this form of idealised Paganism in a manner that shows deep insight into, and sympathy with, the Humanist movement, which theologians, as a class, have viewed with suspicion. Carlyle, as one of the great moulding forces of the time, naturally comes under review. He was the apostle, not of Beauty but of Duty. With no sympathy for the Pagan elements in Goethe's gospel of culture, Carlyle seized hold of his ethical doctrine of Renunciation, and sought, by the force of his undoubted magnetic genius, to give it dynamic power. Carlyle preached a grim, sombre gospel—a kind of Calvinism minus Christianity—a gospel suited to Covenanting times, but which did not prove quite acceptable to a generation born in a materialistic civilisation, the Paganism of which takes the form of mammon worship and pleasure worship. This new Paganism was a revolt, not only against the theology, but also against the ethics and ideals of Christianity—a revolt-headed by writers like Mr. H. G. Wells and Mr. Bernard Shaw. Those writers, by virtue of their revolutionary spirit, their lack of reverence, their contemptuous treatment of sacred subjects, and their pretentious dogmatism, are in the apostolic succession to the Encyclopedists, with their gospel of blatant Paganism. What Professor Dowden says of the Revolution thinkers in France in the eighteenth century may appropriately be said of Mr. Wells and Mr. Shaw: "Man was not conceived as growing out of the past. The heritage from former generations was a heritage of superstition, tyranny, and unreason; it exists only to be relinquished or destroyed." The year One, in the opinion of the Encyclopedists, had arrived with them. The Encyclopedists were wrong. The year One arrived with Mr. Shaw! In his book on Mr. Shaw, Mr. Chesterton puts this very well, as follows:—"The great defect of that fine intelligence is a failure to grasp and enjoy the things called convention and tradition, which are food upon which all human creatures are to feed if they are to live. . . That the human traditions of two thousand years contradict him did not trouble him for an instant." Mr. Shaw, he goes on to say, "has tended to think that, because something has satisfied generations of men, it must be untrue." Religion and ethics are very ancient things, and, being classed as traditions, they must be jeered out of existence. Quite in the heaven-defying attitude of the builders of the Tower of Babel, Mr. Shaw, after the fashion of the Bradlaughites, set himself to dethrone the Deity, and showed his superiority to average humanity by declaring that it is contemptible to have a craving for eternal life. He seems to think that, if men could be persuaded that they are not immortal, their cup of happiness would overflow. Mr. Shaw's Paganism is of the oracular type. He never reasons; he denounces and announces, and thinks he will be heard for his flippant dogmatism. His airs would be offensive but for the exquisite fund of raillery which he possesses. His wit saves him from being a bore. Still, unreflecting readers, fascinated by his genius, are in danger of imbibing his spirit and of imitating his pontifical tone. Mr. Shaw is the Pope of the modern Pagan reaction. In the words of Dr. Kelman, "Most things in the universe seem to go on by his permission, and some of them he is not going to allow to go on much longer." Mr. Shaw reminds me of the bantam in one of George Eliot's novels which imagined the sun rose in order to hear it crow.

Mr. Shaw's genial critic, Mr. Chesterton, in his estimate of Christianity, pays profound respect to those fundamental elements in human nature which give birth to tradition. The eternal verities which Mr. Shaw despises are, after all, the great realities in life. Mr. Chesterton disputes the neo-Pagan theory that man's puny individuality is the measure of universal history. He refuses in Shavian fashion to bow down in adoring egotism before the First Personal Pronoun. "Christianity," says Mr. Chesterton, "came into the world, firstly, in order to assert with violence that a man had not only to look inwards, but to look outwards to behold with astonishment and enthusiasm a divine company and a divine captain." In the words of Dr. Kelman, "The Pagan virtues, such as justice and temperance, are painfully reasonable, and often sad. The Christian virtues are faith, hope, and charity—each more unreasonable than the last, from the point of view of mundane common sense; but they are gay as childhood, and hold the secret of perennial youth and unfading beauty in a world which, upon any other terms than these, is hastening to decay."

The most suggestive and fascinating chapter in Dr. Kelman's stimulating volume is the concluding one, in which he deals with that arresting poem, "The Hound of Heaven." Here, after a prolonged struggle, the self-sufficiency of the Pagan is transformed into the self-surrender of the Christian. To quote Dr. Kelman, "It is through pain, and not through indulgence, that the ideals gain for themselves eternal life. Until the soul has been transformed and strengthened by pain, its attempt to fulfil itself and be at peace in a Pagan settlement on the green earth must be in vain." The long, weary quest is ended. Not in the Pagan Temple of Pleasure, not in the Carlylean Cathedral of Immensity, not in the modern Socialist Utopia, is the secret of life to be found, but at the Cross of Christ.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

FORD HOUSE

THERE is a faint cloud of hazy blue smoke laughing lightly as it flits away over the sombre darkness of the tree-tops, and that is all you can see of my dream-house from the road.

It is away from the haunts of men—in a hollow. There is a delicious feeling of rest and contentment in this queer, rambling old place.

The gravel path is covered with the moss of ages; few sounds break the stillness, save the buoyant songs of the thrushes and blackbirds as they flit from tree to tree in the sparkling sunlight to their nests.

From the distance comes the sound of the lowing of cattle, or a voice from a neighbouring farm, and that is all.

There is a canal at the end of the garden; the barges go silently by, and the figures of the man and the horse glide between the silver and pink of the apple-trees and are gone.

Occasionally a flash of colour, the dress of the woman at the rudder, is seen; but it is only for a moment. The bridge is swung open and shut, and we are left once more in the shady silence of the garden.

The blossoming rhododendrons are everywhere, and beneath the trees is a fairy carpet of hyacinth bells.

It is a wonderful garden for dreamers.

DOROTHY EYRE.

FOOT'S BED-TABLE

The Adapta

Patented.

Can be instantly Raised, Lowered, Reversed, or Inclined.

Extends over bed, couch, or chair, and is an ideal Table for reading or taking meals in bed with ease and comfort. To change from a flat table to an inclined reading-stand simply press a button at the top of standard. The top measures 27in. by 18in., and can be raised from 28in. to 44in. from the floor, or to any intermediate height. It cannot over-balance. Comprises Bed-Table, Reading-Stand, Writing-Table, Bed-

Rest, Sewing or Work Table, Music-Stand, Easel, Card Table, etc.

- | | |
|--|--------|
| No. 1. Enamelled Metal Parts, with Stained Oak Top ... | £1 7 6 |
| No. 2. Ditto, with Adjustable Side Tray and Automatic Bookholders (as illustrated) ... | 1 15 0 |
| No. 3. Complete as No. 2, but with Polished Oak Top and superior finish ... | 2 5 0 |
| No. 4. Complete as No. 3, but with all Metal Parts Nickel-plated ... | 3 3 0 |
| No. 5. Complete as No. 4, but fitted with a Detachable Candle Sconce, and all Metal Parts finished in Polished Brass ... | 5 12 6 |

Carriage Paid in Great Britain. Write for Booklet A30.

J. FOOT & SON, Ltd. (Dept. A30),
171, New Bond Street, London, W.

Swift

Sure

"Achille Serre" Cleans Suits for 3/9 each, in Four Days.

Thousands of them every week, each having expert treatment at the hands of "Achille Serre's" dry cleaners and tailor-pressers. In four days they go home clean, pressed and looking like new.

There is only 3/9 to pay, a very moderate sum for the result obtained.

Free collection and delivery by nearest Branch or Agent; or carriage paid one way if sent direct.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

LITERARY NOTES

HISTORICAL scholarship has suffered a heavy loss by the death, at a ripe age, of Dr. Thomas Hodgkin, of Barmoor Castle, Northumberland. Dr. Hodgkin's career resembled somewhat that of Bagehot. Like the famous economist, he was a notable example of a man who made his mark in literature while following the profession of a banker. But otherwise no two men could be more dissimilar. A Quaker by birth and conviction, Dr. Hodgkin's interests were bound up with religion and scholarship.

For many years he devoted himself to strenuous historical research, which culminated in his first and most important work, "Italy and her Invaders." This monumental work extends to nine volumes, and, though it cannot be called popular either in subject or treatment, it bears on every page the mark of insight, learning, and scholarly thoroughness. Continuing his historical studies, Dr. Hodgkin subsequently published "Letters of Cassiodorus," "The Dynasty of Theodosius," and "The Life of Theodoric"—less pretentious works, but all testifying to his wide and exact knowledge. I ought also to mention the excellent popular monograph on Charles the Great which he wrote for Messrs. Macmillan's Foreign Statesman series; his short biography of George Fox, which was emphatically a labour of love; and his "History of England Before the Norman Conquest."

It is suggested that the proposed memorial of George Gissing should take the form of a scholarship for the encouragement of literary studies at Manchester University, where, under its former style of Owens College, Gissing's student days were spent. The appeal for funds is signed by Mr. Arnold Bennett, Mr. John Galsworthy, Mr. H. G. Wells, and other well-known writers, and the scheme will appeal to all lovers of Gissing's exquisite workmanship, and sincere, if remorseless, vision of life. One-eyed as that vision was in its harrowing insistence upon the dark and depressing, it helped to purge English fiction of much of its shallow optimism and "viciously acquired naiveté." Even those who are repelled by his sombre and somewhat unlovable genius may yet remember him gratefully as a conscientious literary craftsman and as the author of a brilliant critical essay on Dickens, not to mention his admirable abridgment of Forster's "Life" of the novelist.

I think the man who dares to bring out another book on William Morris shows considerable courage. But Mr. A. Compton-Rickett claims that his new study of Morris the man contains a number of fresh stories, unpublished letters, and personalia which, it is said, throw new light upon the poet-craftsman's character, and illustrates his temperamental eccentricities. Moreover, the author of this new book, which Mr. Herbert Jenkins will publish, says he has had the assistance of many who knew Morris well. A critical study by Mr. J. Drinkwater, published only a few months ago, is the most recent of a rather formidable list of biographical and critical works dealing with the poet, beginning with Mr. Mackail's authorised "Life."

Since he forsook the Roman Catholic priesthood, Mr. Joseph McCabe's literary industry has been amazing. He has published at least a dozen books, including biographies of Abelard, Talleyrand, Holyoake, a translation of a "Life" of Haeckel, a critical study of Goethe, and several books on religion, science, and philosophy. His book on "The Decay of the Church of Rome" has to be reckoned with, bringing together, as it does, a mass of valuable information and statistics; and he has now added to his interesting and provocative contributions to the "Roman" controversy "A Candid History of the Jesuits." It claims to give an impartial account of the disciples of Loyola, and is no less based on the original Jesuit documents, "as far as they have been published," than on "the antagonistic literature." I hope Mr. McCabe may some day give us an adequate biography of the founder of the Jesuit Order himself.

Mr. Henry Frowde, the publisher to the University of Oxford, is, at his own wish, shortly retiring from the managership of the London business of the Oxford University Press. Mr. Frowde has had so long, honourable, and intimate a connection with the publishing business that I hope he will devote part of his well-earned leisure to writing a volume of reminiscences, which will necessarily be largely a history of the Oxford University Press. The business at Amen Corner has grown enormously of late years. When Mr. Frowde took over the supervision thirty-nine years ago there were only about a dozen employees, whereas to-day there are upwards of three hundred. Mr. Frowde is to be succeeded by Mr. Humphrey Milford, who has been connected with the Oxford Press for the last dozen years.

The near approach of the completion of the Panama Canal is likely to afford us a crop of books dealing in some shape or form with the stupendous undertaking. As it is, there are already three books in the field—Mr. Vaughan Cornish's, which gives an instructive account of the actual building of the canal and the advantages that are likely to accrue from it; Mr. F. Lindsay's, containing many useful facts for intending settlers; and Mr. J. Foster Fraser's, which has just made its appearance. Mr. Fraser is a journalist who wanders over the globe in search of good "copy," and his latest book is a respectable addition to the round dozen he has already turned out.

Quite a literature is being reared round the subject of Anglo-German relations. Messrs. Constable announce a book by Lady Phillips, entitled "A Friendly Germany: Why Not?"; also a study of "Pan-Germanism," by Mr. Roland G. Usher. The latter discusses the subject in the light of the new conditions of European diplomacy resulting from the war in the Balkans. The same firm will also publish shortly "The Diary of Li Hung Chang," which ought to prove spicy reading.

Mr. Swinburne was always so strong and virile in his criticism that many of his admirers will be glad to have some magazine contributions of his on Dickens in book form. Mr. Watts-Dunton, in a preface to the volume, which has just been published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, refers to Swinburne's enthusiastic admiration of the novelist. The book, I may add, is made up of a Quarterly Review essay which appeared in July, 1902, and an essay on "Oliver Twist," of which the copyright belongs to the publisher of the American edition de luxe Dickens now in course of publication.

X. Y. Z.

PRUDENTIAL ASSURANCE COMPANY, Limited.

Chief Office—Holborn Bars, London.

Invested Funds exceed £84,000,000.

Summary of the Report presented at the Sixty-fourth Annual Meeting, held on 6th March, 1913.

ORDINARY BRANCH.—The number of policies issued during the year was 59,854, assuring the sum of £5,586,153 and producing a new annual premium income of £346,592. The premiums received during the year were £4,826,993, being an increase of £14,725 over the year 1911. In addition, £5,893 was received in premiums under the new Sickness Insurance Tables issued during the year. The claims of the year amounted to £3,626,469. The number of deaths was 8,872. The number of endowment assurances matured was 21,981, the premium income of which was £125,991.

The number of policies in force at the end of the year was 901,838.

INDUSTRIAL BRANCH.—The premiums received during the year were £7,792,562, being an increase of £161,154. The claims of the year amounted to £3,070,271, including £324,797 bonus additions. The number of claims and surrenders, including 5,282 endowment assurances matured, was 382,734. The number of free policies granted during the year to those policyholders of five years' standing and upwards, who desired to discontinue their payments, was 155,582, the number in force being 1,809,171. The number of free policies which became claims during the year was 52,296.

The total number of policies in force in this branch at the end of the year was 19,140,743; their average duration exceeds twelve and a half years.

The assets of the Company, in both branches, as shown in the balance sheet, after deducting the amount written off securities, are £84,571,932 being an increase of £3,332,250 over those of 1911.

In the Ordinary Branch a reversionary bonus at the rate of £1 16s. per cent. on the original sums assured has again been added to all classes of participating policies issued since the year 1876.

In the Industrial Branch a bonus addition will be made to the sums assured on all policies of over five years' duration which become claims either by death or maturity of endowment from the 7th of March, 1913, to the 5th of March, 1914, both dates inclusive, as follows:—

PREMIUMS PAID FOR				BONUS ADDITION TO SUMS ASSURED.
5 years	and less than	10 years		£5	per cent.
10	"	"	15	£10	" "
15	"	"	20	£15	" "
20	"	"	25	£20	" "
25	"	"	30	£25	" "
30	"	"	40	£30	" "
40	"	"	50	£40	" "
50	"	"	60	£50	" "
60	"	and upwards.		£60	" "

The rate of bonus declared for last year has thus been maintained, and in the case of policies on which 25 and less than 30 years' premiums have been paid, and those on which premiums for 60 years and upwards have been paid, an increased bonus of £5 per cent. and £10 per cent. respectively will be distributed.

The Company took a leading part in forming Approved Societies under the National Insurance Act, 1911—Six Societies were founded, viz.: for Men, Women, Domestic Servants, Laundresses, Miners, and Agricultural and Rural Workers.

These Prudential Approved Societies have received a large accession of members, and as they will be administered in connection with the Prudential Assurance Company, the Directors regard their future growth and welfare with every confidence.

Messrs. Deloitte, Plender, Griffiths & Co. have examined the securities, and their certificate is appended to the balance sheets.

THOS. C. DEWEY, Chairman.
W. J. LANCASTER, }
W. EDGAR HORNE, } Directors.

D. W. STABLE, }
J. SMART, } Joint Secretaries.
A. C. THOMPSON, } General Manager.

The full Report and Balance Sheet can be obtained upon application.

LA BRETONNE * * * BY ANDRÉ THEURIET

LATE one November day, on the eve of St. Catherine, the gate of the county jail at Auberive swung on its hinges to let out a woman of about thirty years old, dressed in a faded woollen dress and wearing a cotton bonnet, which quaintly framed the pale face puffed out with that unhealthy looking flesh developed by prison life.

She was a newly released convict, named "La Bretonne" by her fellow-prisoners. She had been found guilty of infanticide, and it was just six years since a prison-van had brought her to the county jail. After having received back her rags and taken her savings from the clerk's office, she was free at last, with her pass endorsed for Langres.

But the mail had already gone. Frightened and awkward, she stumbled towards the principal inn of the place, and, in a trembling voice, asked for a night's lodging. The inn was full, and its keeper, caring little to put up "those jail-birds," advised her to push on as far as the public-house at the other end of the village.

Still more awkward and terrified, "La Bretonne" went on her way and knocked at the door of the public-house, which was really nothing but a labourers' tavern. The landlady mistrustfully eyed her up and down, suspecting, no doubt, a woman from the prison, and finally sent her away on the pretext that she did not let beds. "La Bretonne" dared not insist; she turned away with hanging head, while in the depths of her being there arose a blind hatred of the world which was thus repulsing her. There was nothing for it but to walk to Langres. Night closes in quickly at the end of November; she was soon enveloped in darkness on the grey road winding between the outskirts of two woods, where the north wind howled fiercely as it scattered the dead leaves.

After six years of shut-up, sedentary life, she could no longer walk. Her knee-joints had grown rickety; her feet, accustomed to sabots, felt uncomfortable in new shoes. At the end of a mile she had got blisters, and was already tired out.

She sat down on a heap of stones, and shivered as she asked herself if she must perish of cold and hunger on this bitter night, exposed to the icy blast which was chilling her. Suddenly, along the lonely road, above the gusts of wind, she thought she heard the droning sound of a voice singing. She listened, and made out the tune of one of those soft, monotonous songs with which mothers lull their children to sleep. So, getting up again, she walked in the direction of the voice, and, where a cross-road branched off, she caught sight of a ruddy light shining through the trees.

Five minutes later she reached a mud hovel, whose roof, covered with clods of earth, was propped against the rock, and through whose solitary window a bright ray of light shone forth. With beating heart, she made up her mind to knock. The song ceased, and a peasant woman came to open the door—a woman of "La Bretonne's" age, but already worn out and aged by work.

Her jacket, split in places, showed her sunburnt, muddy skin; her untidy red hair escaped from under her little cloth cap; her grey eyes stared amazedly at the stranger, whose appearance had something rather unusual about it.

"Good evening," she said, holding up the lamp she had in her hand. "What do you want?"

"I can go no further," muttered "La Bretonne," in a voice that was half a sob. "The town is far off, and if you would give me shelter for the night you would be doing me a kindness. I have got money, and would pay you for your trouble."

"Come in," the other answered, after a moment's hesitation. Then she added, in a tone that was inquisitive rather than distrustful, "Why did you not stay the night at Auberive?"

"Nobody would give me a lodging"—and, lowering her blue eyes, "La Bretonne," overcome by scruple, added, "You know, it is because I have just come out of prison, and that doesn't inspire confidence."

"Ah! . . . Come in all the same. I am not the one to be afraid of anything, having known nought but poverty. It would go against my conscience to leave a Christian soul outside on such a cold night. I will make you a bed of heather."

She got armfuls of dried heather from a shed, and spread it out in a corner near the hearth.

"Do you live here alone?" "La Bretonne" asked shyly.

"Yes, with my little lass, who is going on for seven. I earn our living by working in the woods."

"Is your husband dead?"

"I never had one," answered "La Fleuriotte" roughly. "My poor little one has no father. . . . However, everyone has his own trouble. . . . There, your bed is ready, and here are two or three potatoes left from supper; they are all I have to offer you."

She was interrupted by a childish voice, coming from a dark slip of a closet, separated from the living-room by a wooden partition. "Good-night," she added. "I am going back to the child; she is getting frightened. Try to sleep well." She took up the lamp and went into the next room, leaving "La Bretonne" in the dark.

The latter lay down on the heather when she had eaten, but sleep would not come. Through the partition she heard "La Fleuriotte" talking in a hushed voice to her child, who had been awakened by the stranger's arrival, and who would not go to sleep again. "La Fleuriotte" was rocking her and kissing her, with endearing words, whose artlessness moved "La Bretonne" greatly.

This outburst of affection woke some dim maternal instinct in the breast of the girl who, long ago, had been convicted for stifling her new-born child. "La Bretonne" pondered how, "if things hadn't gone wrong," her own little boy would have been the same age as this little girl. This thought, and the sound of the childish voice, made her shudder to the very marrow. Some tender feeling melted in her embittered heart, and she longed to cry.

"Come, little lass," "La Fleuriotte" was saying, "hurry up and go to sleep. If you are good, I will take you to St. Catherine's Fair to-morrow."

"St. Catherine's Day is the little girls' festival, isn't it, mother?"

"Yes, my pet."

"Is it true that on that day St. Catherine brings toys to the children?"

"Yes . . . sometimes."

"Why does she never bring anything to our house?"

"We live too far off. . . . Besides, we are too poor."

"She only brings things to rich people, then. . . . Why? . . . I should like some toys, too."

"Well, one day, if you are a good child, and if you go to sleep nicely, perhaps she will give you some."

"Then I will go to sleep—so that she may bring me some to-morrow."

There was silence; then gentle, even breathing.

The child was asleep, and the mother, too. "La Bretonne" alone could not sleep. Emotion, at once painful and sweet, gripped her heart, and she thought more than ever of the little fellow she had strangled long ago.

This went on till the first gleams of dawn. At daybreak "La Fleuriotte" and her child were sleeping soundly. "La Bretonne" furtively slipped out of doors, and, walking quickly towards Auberive, did not stop till she reached the first houses. Once there, she went slowly up the only street, gazing at the signs over the shops. In the end, one seemed to attract her attention; she knocked on the shutters and made them open to her.

It was a haberdasher's, which also had children's toys—miserable, shabby toys, pasteboard dolls, Noah's arks, sheepfolds. To the great astonishment of the woman, "La Bretonne" bought them all, paid, and walked out.

She was setting off again towards "La Fleuriotte's" dwelling when a hand swooped down on her shoulder. She turned round, and trembled as she found herself face to face with a police sergeant. The unhappy woman had forgotten that a woman on ticket-of-leave was forbidden to stay in the neighbourhood of the jail.

"You ought to be at Langres by now, instead of loitering about here," the sergeant said sharply. "Come along; we must be off."

She wanted to explain, but it was only lost trouble. In less than no time a cart had been fetched, and she was made to get up, escorted by a policeman; the driver whipped up his horse, and off they went.

The cart rolled along, jolting over the frozen road. Broken-heartedly, "La Bretonne" clasped her parcel of toys in her numbed fingers. At a turn in the road she recognised the path which led away into the wood. Her heart leapt, and she implored the policeman to stop; she had a message to give "La Fleuriotte"—a woman who lived there—not two steps away.

She begged with such insistence that the officer, a good man at heart, let himself be persuaded. The horse was tied to a tree, and they walked up the path. "La Fleuriotte" was chopping sticks in front of the door. When she saw her visitor reappear with a policeman, she stood and gaped, her arms falling limp at her sides.

"Sh-sh," said "La Bretonne." "Is the child still asleep?"

"Yes. . . . But?"

"Put these quietly on her bed, and tell her that St. Catherine sends them to her. I had gone back to Auberive to get them, but it seems that I had no right to do it, and they are taking me back to Langres."

"Holy Mother of God!" cried "La Fleuriotte."

"Hush!"

They went up to the bed, still followed by her escort. "La Bretonne" scattered the dolls, the ark, and the sheepfold over the bedclothes, kissed the sleeping child's bare arm, and, turning round to the officer, who was rubbing his eyes—

"We can start now," she said.

—Translated by Beatrice Seth-Smith.

SILHOUETTE

From the gallery of memory, mutascopic and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

AS a child she had always taken her griefs and joys, her pleasures and her sorrows to the beech tree. It grew in a forest of pines, and against their sombre branches, and gloomy shadows, the soft green of the young leaves fluttered in feminine fashion. To the child the tree suggested sympathy, comprehension, the wonderful understanding that hears everything, asks nothing. Against the slim, smooth trunk she would press her face, flushed with tears, burying her cheeks in the delightful coolness of the moss that clung so lovingly about the roots.

The sun flickered through the branches and the buds danced to the song of the west wind. The whispering pines, for ever straining to the north, moaned fitfully of the sea, their branches upflung to the sky in a lament. But the beech smiled at the good red earth, and at her feet there grew wild violets and the shy anemone.

The child wove the beech tree into the many-coloured web of fancy, so that at times the slender sapling was a princess held in enchantment by the cruel pines against her lover the west wind; or, again, she was a queen-mother who, exiled from her country and her court, had a beautiful compassion for the lonely little girl who sought her. The seasons passed, the golden mantle that the beech donned for autumn fell from her in the first frost; yet she was beautiful, and the child watched with wondering eyes the delicate tracery of bough against the sky. And then the snow came, and the tree, powdered with frost, glittered with a splendour that outshone diamonds.

With the passing of years the child grew to the beauty of womanhood, and she and another found love between them. She whispered her secret to the beech tree, and it seemed as if a sigh passed through the forest, and a gentle rain of leaves fell at her feet.

Her lover, after the fashion of men, went to the city to seek his fortune; and the girl was left alone. More than ever did she seek the beech tree, her heart full of secret things.

For a while letters came frequently from the city, but there fell a day when the lover did not write; week followed week, and there was neither word nor sign. The beech tree preached patience from the tale of many seasons, recalling in the bitter grip of winter the promise of coming spring, whispering of the west wind that, wandering over all the earth, ever returned in the blue April weather. But the glamour of the summer was over, and the girl's heart was cold.

When next she visited the beech a storm had swept over the country, lashing the pines and breaking the giant oaks. The tree had not escaped, but, uprooted, suppliant, lay stretched before the pines.

By the fallen trunk her lover waited, but the girl hardened her heart and would not meet his eyes.

"It is an omen," she said, bitterly. "Our love is dead, like the tree."

"Yet from its heart there springs a message," he said gently, and, stooping, gathered a tiny blossom, that, amid the desolation, carried the flag of hope.

"It is the speedwell, dearest," he said, tenderly.

She raised her eyes at last; and the beech tree rustled her leaves as the west wind sighed—for the last time—through the branches.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

"SYLVIA'S LOVERS," BY MRS. GASKELL*

ONE of the most poignant dramas in the English language, the story of "Sylvia's Lovers" is played out in a seaport town, its immediate stage the old farmhouse where Sylvia, "just as bonny as the first rose in June, and as sweet in her nature as the honeysuckle, was born." It has been stated that Mrs. Gaskell drew on her own experiences for the majority of her novels. The epic of Monkshaven is a notable exception. For the first and only time this genius of domesticity went to history for her materials, and cast her story in the cruel days of the press-gang. The central incident of the book is founded on fact.

In 1793 a serious riot occurred between the sailors and the press-gang at Whitby—the Monkshaven of the story—and an old man, one William Atkinson, was executed at York on April 13th, 1793, for encouraging the rioters.

It is difficult to-day to realise the terror the very name of the press-gang inspired in the towns of the coast. Husbands just landed from a long, perilous cruise, eager to see their wives and children, would be waylaid and borne off in triumph to recruit the navy; a son, the sole support of an old mother, torn from the very threshold of his home. One of the most dramatic touches is a description of the woman who, rushing down to the quayside, learns that her husband has been "pressed."

"She lived some little way in the country, and had been late in hearing of the return of the whaler after her six months' absence. . . . She had need pause in the market-place, the outlet of which was crammed up. Then she gave tongue for the first time in such a fearful shriek, you could hardly catch the word she said: 'Jamie! Jamie! will they no let you to me?'"

The phrase goes right to the quick of the soul. In a flash you see the woman, realise the unutterable desolation that looms before her. "Jamie! will they no let you to me?"

But though "Sylvia's Lovers" is cast in historic times and bears the impress of the eighteenth century, re-creating the atmosphere, infusing the dry bones of tradition with new life, the dominant features in this as in other of Mrs. Gaskell's works is a wonderful reproduction of family life. The affection between Sylvia and her mother, Belle Robson, the girl's piquant vanity, the woman's steady, undemonstrative affection, is inimitably portrayed. Daniel, the fine old farmer who is hanged for taking part in the riot against the press-gang, with his pride in his daughter and his love of a pipe and a glass, hot-headed and brave-hearted, grips one with a sense of reality so startling that it is with difficulty you realise you are reading of a man who lived and died years and years ago.

For—and this is one of the attributes of Mrs. Gaskell's genius—she has a supreme faculty of seizing on those elemental traits in human nature that exist for all time, and in selecting such expressions as portray sheer emotional stress, independent of modification.

"What I think and say is this. Laws is made for to keep some folk fra' harming others. Press-gangs and coastguards harm me i' my business. And keep me fra' getting what I want. Therefore what I think and say is this: Measter Cholmley should put down press-gangs and coastguards. If that there isn't reason I ax you to tell me what is? And if Measter Cholmley don't do what I ax him, he may go whistle for my vote, he may."

Daniel, one feels, would so have expressed himself to-day in relation to modern equivalents for "press-gangs and coastguards"; and that his temper of mind exists unto this present one has only to journey to the North to realise.

Sylvia, impulsive, passionate, idolised by her mother, spoilt by her father, is one of the most human and convincing heroines. Philip, her cousin and lover, with his long years of devotion, weighs nothing in comparison to Kinnaird, the handsome young sailor who wins her heart. The love scenes between them are fresh and fragrant as the meadows Sylvia loved, and the girl's agony when he disappears and she can find no trace of him hurts one to read.

But it is in the handling of the trial and condemnation of poor Daniel that the author rises to supreme heights. The simple, loving wife, the agonised daughter, do not break out into ravings against God and man; but though suspense gnaws at their hearts, quietly and with sublime courage they continue their household tasks, go through the routine of sweeping, dusting, the making of butter, the milking of the cows, ready with calm courage for what awaits them.

Philip Hepburn, who marries Sylvia, is colourless compared to Kinnaird; his devotion to his cousin is the mainspring of his life. He pours out at her feet all the idolatry of his nature; no sacrifice is too great, no work too hard for her. Only one thing does he deny her—he will not give her up; and, to win her for his wife, keeps back the knowledge that Kinnaird has been "pressed," suppresses the sailor's final message to his sweetheart. And because of her loneliness and her mother's affliction, and of her gratitude to Philip, Sylvia takes him as her husband.

After the marriage the character of Philip strengthens. One finds it difficult always to retain sympathy for Sylvia, who, though she performs her duty scrupulously, never shows a gush of passion, a touch of love for the man who is ready to lay down his life for her. But in the final outcome of the tragedy one is swept on the high tide of pity for the girl who, all unknowing, for ever separated herself from the one man she loved.

Kinnaird returns to find her Philip's wife. For a moment all her longing turns towards him. She upbraids Philip and runs to her old lover.

"His arm was round her waist, and he was drawing her towards the door, his face all crimson with eagerness and hope. Just then the baby cried."

And at that Sylvia remembers, and sends Kinnaird from her. She will never live with Philip again. "All that's done and ended. He's spoilt my life—he's spoilt it for as long as ever I live on this earth; but neither you nor him shall spoil my soul."

Kinnaird goes—and Philip also; and then commences the finest chapters of the book. Hepburn enlists in the Army under the name of Stephen Freeman. He encounters his rival in an engagement with the French in which Kinnaird is concerned, and saves his life. The news is brought to Sylvia by

* "Everyman's Library." (J. M. Dent.)

(Continued on page 696.)

Books for Garden Lovers

Awarded Silver Medal and Diploma at Royal International Horticultural Exhibition, 1912.

HARDY PERENNIALS AND HERBACEOUS BORDERS.

By WALTER P. WRIGHT, F.R.H.S.

A new Volume in the same series as "Alpine Flowers and Rock Gardens," "Roses and Rose Gardens."

The book is profusely and beautifully illustrated in colour and half-tone. The artists contributing to the colour plates include Miss Beatrice Parsons, Miss Josephine Gundry, Messrs. A. C. Wyatt, E. A. Rowe, C. E. Flower, George Soper, etc. The half-tones exhibit the finest examples of the photographer's art.

Small Crown 4to. Cloth gilt, boxed, 12/6 net.

ROSES AND ROSE GARDENS.

By WALTER P. WRIGHT, F.R.H.S.

Profusely illustrated in Colour and Half-tone.

This is a companion volume to "Hardy Perennials and Herbaceous Borders" and "Alpine Flowers and Rock Gardens."

"Buy the book and you will have a fine rose garden."—The Sphere. 12/6 net.

THIRD IMPRESSION.

ALPINE FLOWERS AND ROCK GARDENS.

By WALTER P. WRIGHT, F.R.H.S.

With Chapters on Alpine Plants at Home by WILLIAM GRAVESON. With Magnificent Colour Plates and Half-tones.

"A practical book copiously and beautifully illustrated with coloured photographs."—The Times.

"An attractive work for lovers of rock plants."—The Spectator. "The distinction of the illustrations lies in the fact that they show the Alpines in their original surroundings."—Ladies' Field. 12/6 net.

AMONG THE HILLS.

By REGINALD FARRER

Every Alpine Gardener should read this book. It is the work of an enthusiast who also possesses a profound knowledge of his subject.

"There is not a dull page in it."—The Climbers' Club Journal, Illustrated in Colours. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net.

THE STORY OF MY ROCK GARDEN.

By REGINALD A. MALBY.

A book which has won instantaneous approval. The value of the information it imparts, the wealth of illustration and the popular price have all combined to give pleasure and satisfaction. A book which every Alpine gardener should possess. Mr. Malby adorns his narrative with a series of photographic reproductions illustrating the flowers growing in his own garden. In addition there are four colour plates.

Demy 8vo. Cloth gilt, 2/6 net.

HEADLEY BROS., Bishopsgate, LONDON, E.C.

BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY READING.

Six-Shilling NOVELS

By WELL-KNOWN AUTHORS.

From 1/- each.

COMPLETE LIST POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

POPULAR BOOKS

New and Secondhand, in all classes of Literature offered at

GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

Send a Postcard for any of the following Catalogues:—

10,000 BOOK BARGAINS

New and Secondhand, at Great Reductions from the Published Prices.

THE NEWEST BOOKS

Arranged under Subjects, and offered at the Lowest Prices charged by any Bookseller.

Selected and Classified List of THE BEST BOOKS in all Subjects at Lowest Cash Prices.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

376 to 384, OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

Just Published.

The MYSTIC WAY.

By EVELYN UNDERHILL.

Square Demy 8vo. 12/6 net.

THIS VOLUME DEVELOPS WHAT ITS AUTHOR BELIEVES TO BE AN ENTIRELY NEW VIEW OF THE RELATION BETWEEN MYSTICISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

AT ALL LIBRARIES & BOOKSELLERS.

WOMAN AND MARRIAGE. A Handbook. By Margaret Stephens. Cloth, 3/6 net (Post free 3/10). "We can imagine no better book to place in the hands of a young married woman and . . . in the hands of a girl shortly to be married."—Times of India. At all Booksellers'.—T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 180 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. You write, we sell. 16-pp. prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

FOREIGN Circulating LIBRARY of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN and SPANISH books; cheap rates; no restrictions as to changing of books; prospectus free.—Siegle and Co., Ltd., 2, Langham Place, W.

GLAISHER'S PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS. William Glaisher, Ltd., beg to announce that they have just issued a Supplementary List No. 393 to their General Catalogue of Publishers' Reminders, comprising all the latest purchases. Post free on request.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD., Remainder and Discount Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London, W.C. Readers residing in Croydon and neighbourhood can view all the books at our Branch shop, No. 14, GEORGE STREET, CROYDON, where complete catalogues can be obtained.

A new novel by the Author of "The Way of an Eagle."

The Knave of Diamonds

The Best Selling Novel of the year. 25,000 copies already sold. Price 6s.

Constance Smedley's New Novel. 6s.

New Wine and Old Bottles

T. FISHER UNWIN.

A TRAGIC PARALLEL

LOST IN THE ARCTIC

By CAPTAIN EJNAR MIKKELSEN

The Story of his Search for Mylius Erichsen

Crown 4to. About 150 Illustrations. 18s. net.

MESSAGE OF THE LAST SURVIVOR OF THE ERICHSEN EXPEDITION:—

"Perished after attempt to return over inland ice in November. Arrived here in waning moonlight, and could not go further for frozen feet and darkness. Bodies of the others are in middle of Fjord off Glacier."

MESSAGE FROM CAPTAIN SCOTT:—

"I do not think human beings ever came through such a month as we have come through. These rough notes and our dead bodies must tell the tale."

LORD CURZON: "Captain Mikkelsen has endured privations such as have seldom fallen to the lot of any living man."

ADMIRAL SIR LEWIS BEAUMONT: "The story is one of the most wonderful narratives of endurance and privations that has ever before been encountered."

*Prospectus on application.Mr. Heinemann's List*A SURVEY OF WOMAN'S PROBLEM.

From the German of ROSA MAYREDER by Hermann Scheffauer. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

WITH the TURKS in THRACE.

By E. ASHMEAD BARTLETT. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

PAUL I. OF RUSSIA: The Son of Catherine the Great.

By K. WALISZEWSKI. Royal 8vo. 15s. net.

RECENT EVENTS & PRESENT POLICIES IN CHINA.

By J. O. P. BLAND. Royal 8vo. Illustrated. 16s. net.

FINE NEW 6s. NOVELS

THE WEAKER VESSEL - - E. F. Benson
GROWING PAINS - - - - - Ivy Low
JOURNEY'S END (John Christopher IV.)

R. Rolland
MINNA - - - - - Karl Gjellerup
GUTTER BABIES (Illustrated by LADY STANLEY)

Dorothea Slade
THE HIPPODROME - - - Rachel Hayward
FRONTIERS of the HEART (2nd Imp.)

Victor Margueritte
WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO? (2nd Imp.)
Elizabeth Robins

A RUNAWAY RING - Mrs. Henry Dudeney
KING ERRANT - - - - - Flora A. Steel

ADNAM'S ORCHARD - - - Sarah Grand
BETWEEN TWO THIEVES Richard Dehan
UNDER THE YOKE (2nd Imp.) - Ivan Vazoff

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

Kinnaird's young wife—a fresh pang in her poor heart! One sees the girl in her narrow home, daily growing sadder, more desolate. Her heart yearns for Philip, his patience, his loyalty, his ever-present devotion; but the remembrance of her oath rises up and checks the impulse of tenderness, and she goes on her sad way, the child the one spot of brightness in an existence clouded by Hester's coldness, Alice's severity, and her mother's death! For Hester, the good woman of the story, has loved Philip all her life, and despite every effort to be just to Sylvia, now and again the sense of injury flares up within her. Yet she is a fine character, and one feels an impulse of compassion for the thwarted affection that strengthens without embittering her nature.

To write the closing scene of the book needed not only genius, but high courage and an infinite capacity of understanding. Philip, wounded from the wars, hopelessly disfigured, nigh to starvation, crawls home to die, and finds a lodging close to the prosperous home where Sylvia lives. Bella, his child, moved by an impulse of compassion, gives him her cake—he is so "very hungry"—and Sylvia, averting her head, slips half a crown into the offering. She discovers the coin round his neck when he comes to die. For Sylvia's repentance comes too late; her passionate remorse finds a faithful heart broken. He has made the last final sacrifice, and has given his life for the child—his child and hers—and in rescuing Bella from drowning meets his death.

And so to the cottage where he lodges Sylvia is brought.

"He heard the waves lapping against the shelving shore once again. . . 'My wife! Sylvia! Once more forgive all.'

"She sprang up, she kissed his poor burnt lips; she held him in her arms. She moaned, and said:

"'Oh, wicked me! Forgive me—me, Philip.'

"And in the silence the lapping of the ceaseless waves was heard as they came up close on the shelving shore."

All was over. All the longing of poor Sylvia's heart, the aching and desire to atone, to comfort and to love, had come too late.

Too late! The saddest words that can be spoken. Too late for forgiveness, too late for love. If the book emphasises one note more than another in the gamut of human emotion it is this—that we should be reconciled one with the other "while there is yet time."
JOHN K. PROTHERO.

PEACE

TO GERMANY

LAND of the Rhine! Thy might did Cæsar quell
With sword and fire; and as on Zela's plain Came, saw and conquer'd. Next, great Otto's reign
Through vain ambition made thy Heaven a hell;
And Welf and Waibling warring rang the knell
Of Unity and Peace. Nor couldst restrain
Thine arm for long, but shatteredst, 'mid the slain,
The strength of France, Sedan's brave citadel.

Stay! Sheathe the sword, uplift the branch of peace;
Thou canst not batten on thine own heart's blood,
Grim slaughter's draught, which ne'er can satisfy,
But ever whets the thirst. Choose thou the food
Of peaceful plenty, prosperous increase;
"Who by the sword lives by the sword shall die."

HERBERT BAXTER.

A MOTTO OF EMPIRE

By SIR SIDNEY LEE

I.

THE year 1580 is the annus mirabilis in the history of Empire. It is the date of the birth of an imperial dominion which even the colossal British Empire of to-day scarcely excels in area. There are British writers who seem to be under the misapprehension that between the downfall of the Roman and the rise of the British Empire no imperial exemplar exists worthy of comparison with either of the two. It may be pardonable to overlook the imperial experiences of Venice and Genoa, which made the Mediterranean islands and coasts a chain of flourishing Italian dependencies. But the perspective of history is distorted if one ignores Spain's Empire of the West or Portugal's Empire of the East. Both were organised in the sixteenth century on principles which are not yet discarded. They proved, with rare effect, man's magical dexterity in cancelling barriers of distance and space, even with the crudest means of communication. In 1580 there opened a new and imposing act in the world's imperial drama. Spain, grown ambitious of yoking the universe to her colonial car, conquered her Portuguese neighbour in the Peninsula, and thereby drew within her imperial boundaries Portugal's Empire of the East. A Spanish girdle of land and sea thenceforth encircled not one, but two, hemispheres. Already Spain ruled in Europe—the Low Countries and the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily; and for a time Tunis. In the New World, the continent of South America, the islands of the West Indies, and part of the continent of North America, together with the Philippines and other Pacific islands, acknowledged her sway. Now her rule embraced, in addition, the Azores, the Canaries, and the West African islands, the Guinea Coast of West Africa, and Delagoa Bay, Zanzibar, with settlements on the East African Coast, together with the noble expanse of Portuguese colonies on the Asiatic shores, from the Persian Gulf right round to the Philippines. Empire was never fashioned before in so gargantuan a mould. Not for sixty years did Portugal regain her independence. Then the knell of Spain's Empire began to sound.

II.

The empire of Spain, despite its decline and fall, remains England's only precedent in the width of imperial power. The similarities and dissimilarities between the fortunes of the two provoke close study. By slow degrees England has succeeded to Spain's imperial glory. A small point in the process is alone my theme here. With a good right England has borrowed from Spain an imposing imperial motto. The phrase is often deemed an original English invention. History shows it to have been a Spanish invention of three centuries ago. The sixteenth century Spaniard summarised his imperial pride in the proverbial assertion that here are dominions on which the sun never sets (for it ever shines on one part or the other). Even before the Portuguese East was added to the Spanish West the words were heard in Spain from the lips of the Emperor Charles V.; but after the mighty union they gained immensely in point, and thenceforth enjoyed universal currency. Shakespeare and his countrymen lived before there was a British Empire, but the saying reached their ears in its Spanish setting. They cited it freely as a "brave" Spanish maxim. Francis Bacon and Captain John Smith, the hardy explorer,

Can you answer these questions?

An Article for All Engaged in Business.

You will probably find it quite easy to answer most of these questions, but unless you are a rare and brilliant exception you will find several others a good deal more difficult. Some of them, indeed, may be altogether beyond you.

And yet you will agree they are all questions that you might have to answer any day in your own business. So, if only out of curiosity, run through the list and see how many you can answer correctly.

13 Specimen Questions.

1. What is the exact purpose of a ledger?
2. What do these signs mean: "E. & O. E.," "F. A. S.," and "G. A.?"
3. How would you open a branch?
4. What is a consignment note?
5. Do you know how to organise a sale?
6. Do you understand office organisation?
7. What is the difference between sending goods on "consignment" and "on sale or return"?
8. How often by law must a factory be "limewashed"?
9. How and when is a judgment summons issued?
10. What is the cost of registering a limited company?
11. Do you know how to take out a patent?
12. How would you draw a selling scheme?
13. How can you recover debts at court without the expense of a solicitor or collecting agency?

How Many Did You Answer?

Well, how have you come through this examination in business knowledge? You must not forget that the knowledge of these facts and of many other facts like them is absolutely necessary to you if you mean to succeed. If you are in business for yourself, you know how useful you would find it to be able to answer any business problem that arose; if you are working for others, you must realise that your employer will value you more highly, if he knows he can go to you for information when he needs it.

And that is why the "Business Encyclopædia and Legal Adviser" is so valuable a work—because it contains information about every point in business life. With it by your side you can answer any question about business that is put to you. For instance, you can answer all the questions that you have just asked yourself. You will find the full purpose of a ledger in the article on Ledgers, Vol. III., page 294. Under "Abbreviations" you will find the meaning of every symbol and sign that is used in business to-day. The third question you will solve by looking up the fine article on the Basic Idea in Business, and so on with all the other questions; and, in fact, with any question about anything relating to business.

How This Concerns You.

These questions may not arise in your business, but others do, and if you think it would mean anything to you to know at once what to say or do in every emergency, you should send the coupon below for a handsome illustrated book on Business, telling all about the "Business Encyclopædia," and giving the names of the successful business men who have written it. It also tells how any reader of EVERYMAN may obtain the complete work in seven volumes for a first payment of 1s. 6d. only, and pay the balance in small monthly payments. Sending the coupon commits you to nothing. Is such an opportunity one you should miss?

A FREE BOOK.

This coupon entitles you to one free copy of the book describing the "Business Encyclopædia," but it must be sent at once. It tells all about the work and the specially low terms to readers of EVERYMAN.

To THE CAXTON PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me one complimentary copy of the book on the "Business Encyclopædia." I am a reader of EVERYMAN.

NAME.....
(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS

RIDER'S NEW FICTION

A NOVEL OF ANGLO-INDIAN LIFE.
INTO THE UNSEEN.

By G. H. LUSTY. Crown 8vo, 328 pp., 6/- With Four Full-page Illustrations by W. H. HOLLOWAY.
A novel dealing with occult experiences amongst the Indian Yogis and natives. This novel has been much admired by Mr. Hall Caine, and reveals a striking intimacy with the less-known by-paths of Indian native life.

THE SORCERY CLUB.

By ELLIOTT O'DONNELL, Author of "By-ways of Ghostland," etc. With Four Full-page Illustrations by PHILLYS VERE CAMPBELL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6/-

"Fantastic, ingenious, and at times horribly thrilling."—The Graphic.
"Having recently encountered his amazing 'By-ways of Ghostland,' we came to 'The Sorcery Club' with the deepest interest. It did not disappoint our expectations. . . . Mr. O'Donnell interests us exceedingly."—The Glasgow Herald.

THE GODS OF THE DEAD.

By WINIFRED GRAHAM, Author of "Ezra the Mormon," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6/-

"You can always rely upon Miss Winifred Graham for a good dramatic story, and in 'Gods of the Dead' her book is fully up to its usual level, while the eerie atmosphere which it possesses is not the least excellent of its many good qualities. It can be recommended to anybody in search of a thrill."—Bookman.
"A very thrilling story."—Nottingham Guardian.

NYRIA.

By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED. Crown 8vo, purple cloth, 432 pp., with Coloured Frontispiece, 2/- net.

New and cheaper edition of this celebrated reincarnation novel, dealing with the life of a Roman slave-girl in the time of Domitian.
"Books such as Mrs. Campbell Praed's beautifully conceived tale have a far more lasting value than is commonly accredited to fiction of this class."—Pall Mall Gazette.

POSSESSED.

By FIRTH SCOTT, Author of "The Last Lemurian," etc. Crown 8vo, 2/- net.

"We can say with assurance that no one who begins reading this book will be inclined to put it down until the last page has been turned. . . . This is such a tale of mystery and imagination as Poe himself would have been proud to own."—Globe.

WILLIAM RIDER & SON, Ltd., 8, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

FROM DENT & SONS' LIST.

THE MYSTIC WAY. By EVELYN UNDERHILL, Author of "Mysticism," etc. Square demy 8vo, 12/6 net.

In this volume the Author develops what she believes to be an entirely new view of the relation between Mysticism and Christianity.

WINDS OF DOCTRINE :
Studies in Contemporary Opinion. By Prof. G. SANTAYANA. Small demy 8vo, 6/- net.

The Author's general view is that the convictions and ideals of Christendom are in a state of disintegration and anarchy, in which the beginnings of a theoretical reconstruction are barely perceptible, although in practice and in honest feeling new principles are already largely dominant.

RAVENNA. By EDWARD HUTTON. With 10 illustrations in colour and 30 line drawings by HARALD SUND. 10/6 net.

A geographical, historical, and critical study of this marvellous city, the only monument that remains to us of the period between antiquity and the middle ages.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

both repeated it admiringly. Later in the seventeenth century, an English writer declared that the new successes of the Dutch in empire-building warranted the transference to them of the picturesque Spanish formula. Not until the nineteenth century did the words become common in English mouths with an application to the British dominions. Even Sir Walter Scott employed the expression only in its historic Spanish significance. No striking moral may attach to the history of the phrase, but its rise and progress may serve as a salutary reminder of the overlooked fact that the worldwide British Empire has had a modern forerunner.

CORRESPONDENCE*THE GIRL BEHIND THE BAR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—In the train on Saturday I read Miss Hamilton's article on "The Girl Behind the Bar."

Greatly impressed, I lifted my hat in homage to the noble company of barmaids; but, on reflection, it seems to me my hat was lifted rather to that rara avis, a charitable woman.

A distinction is made by the essayist between the frequenters of a bar and those who come in a hurry for necessary refreshments. The latter, who rarely stop long enough to influence or be influenced, may be dismissed as being of little consequence, but the former are those with whom the girl behind the bar has to spend a great portion of her time. It is these frequenters over whom the barmaid exercises womanly and inspiring influence; so the essayist would have us believe.

Now, the frequenters of a bar are those who drink, not from necessity, but for pleasure. They are at no time a healthy standard of manhood. The barmaid is therefore dealing with men already under the prejudicial influence—"when the wine is in, the wit is out." Assuming that the barmaid is a naturally healthy-minded girl, her influence would be discounted. She is unable to quell at a glance the lewd conversation of individuals labouring under this adverse influence. The control of the tongue is lost in the cups. So far from influencing, I fear the barmaid has every feeling of modesty outraged by what she must perforce listen to.

"Cads will be cads," says Miss Hamilton; but she does not seem to think they are numerous. I venture to think, on the other hand, they are numerous, and among the frequenters of bars there is a larger percentage than usual. By the very nature of her position, the barmaid, so far from being able to restrain such characters, has to subject herself to much insult and degradation from them. It is not reasonable to think the barmaid is entirely unaffected by the conversation of this class. If it is continuous, and the barmaid has ceased to take notice of it, remember her soul has been scorched and seared as with a hot iron, even if her mind has not become warped and unbalanced. Certain it is her outlook on life, from being a natural one of trust and confidence, becomes one of distinct aloofness, if not positive distrust.

To cite an instance. In Manchester a few days ago I saw a man of the "frequenter" type sit down and regale the barmaid with a choice selection of witty, or shall we say vulgar, yarns. It was obvious the girl had no wish to listen to his immoral absurdities, but there was no option. She could not leave the bar; she could not appeal to the others present; perforce she must endure it.

This is not an isolated case. It is a condition of affairs which the majority of barmaids have daily to put up with.

Everyone will admit that a good woman will chasten any audience; but when this is done at the expense of her own modest soul, surely the price is too heavy, and it were better for the whole company of men to perish in their own atmosphere.

I have not previously been reckoned amongst the "unco' guid," but they have a plea in this instance which might well find an echoing response in the heart of the essayist.—I am, sir, etc.,

EDWARD MELHUISE.

Paulton, March 4th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—You may well describe "the employment of women" as an all-important subject.

When a famous American Ambassador visited our metropolis for the first time, and was asked what were his chief impressions, he replied, "The innumerable gin-palaces and the vast proportion of people bearing unmistakable indications of alcohol in their faces." Another American said: "If you proposed to have women bar-tenders in the city I live in you would be lynched." Nothing, sir, is more amazing than the fact that our country is so far behind other advanced nations as to allow young women to expose themselves to such terrible temptations as are inseparable from this occupation.

The article in your issue of February 28th is somewhat puzzling in its first two paragraphs. It is ostensibly written by "Margaret Hamilton." It is, therefore, difficult to comprehend such wording as "as we see them" and "as they see us." "We are too often a clamorous, hurried mass of humanity." Does Margaret, then, visit bars? and does she "demand instant attention"? Or has she got some male friend who does to write these passages for her? Or is "Margaret Hamilton" a screen for one of the opposite sex? I would fain think so. She describes these women as "good looking, and with an enviable air of detachment"! Why "enviable"? If I employed a girl to sell goods in a shop I should certainly consider a detached air a most undesirable one. At the same time, I must say that in a drinking bar a woman is well advised to be as "detached" from all her surroundings as she can possibly be. But Margaret goes on to say that "she smiles on all." Is this being detached?

The only barmaids I have seen are those in the refreshment rooms of railway stations, and I have especially noted the hardness of their expression, and thankful I was, for their sakes, to notice it.

Margaret asks, "Where do they come from?" Why, sir, they probably come from homes intimately connected with the drink trade! Surely only parents so connected would be so indifferent to a child's highest welfare as to send a pretty girl into an occupation where she is necessarily to come into contact with vice and depravity, as uncloaked as it would not dare to be elsewhere! Some think barmaids are daughters of the poor; it may be so in some cases, but as there are so many other avenues open to them more profitable, I fear it is only when the poor girl objects to what she considers hard work that she consents to take up this one.

To go back to Margaret's first sentence: Why are barmaids "good-looking"? Do we need to ask the

Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD'S SUCCESSFUL NEW LOVE STORY.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo. 6/-
With 4 Illustrations by CHARLES E. BROCK.

"The Mating of Lydia."

BY

Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD,

Author of "Robert Elsmere," "Lady Rose's Daughter," "The Case of Richard Meynell," etc.

Times.—"The fact that her characters are touched to larger and finer issues than they dream of, gives Mrs. Ward's book a spaciousness and grandeur which is very uncommon in any fiction."

Morning Post.—"Mrs. Ward is always stimulating. A simple and sensational story, well constructed and well maintained."

Daily Chronicle.—"In 'The Mating of Lydia' Mrs. Ward is at her best."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Mrs. Ward always has her finger upon the pulse of current thought."

"The Mating of Lydia."

Standard.—"As chronicler of country house life, Mrs. Humphry Ward has only Mr. Galsworthy for rival."

Daily Citizen.—"A fine story. Mrs. Humphry Ward has not, in my judgment, done a better."

Evening Standard.—"For worlds we wouldn't let out the secret of 'The Mating of Lydia' or that of Felicia. The story is conducted with all Mrs. Ward's cleverness and charm. You don't want to put it down."

Daily Mirror.—"A good, sound piece of work with humour in it."

The Ladies' Field.—"It gives its readers the relief and pleasure bestowed by all master work."

Yorkshire Post.—"Mrs. Humphry Ward's obvious intention in her latest book is to tell a thoroughly entertaining story, and this she has succeeded in doing."

London:

SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

Cornish Sent To You For A Year's Free Trial.

Why Shouldn't You Buy As Low As Any Dealer?

More than 250,000 people have saved from £5 to £25 in purchasing a high-grade organ or piano by the Cornish Plan—why shouldn't you? Here is Our Offer. You select any of the latest, choicest Cornish styles of instruments—we place it in your home for a year's free use before you need make up your mind to keep it. If it is not sweeter and richer in tone and better made than any you can buy at one-third more than we ask you, send it back at our expense.

You Choose Your Own Terms

Take Three Years to Pay If Needed

The Cornish Plan, in brief, makes the maker prove his instrument and saves you one-third what other manufacturers of high-grade instruments must charge you because they protect their dealers.

Let Us Send to You Free the New Cornish Book

It is the most beautiful piano or organ catalogue ever published. It shows our latest styles and explains everything you should know before buying any instrument. It shows why you cannot buy any other high-grade organ or piano anywhere on earth as low as the Cornish. You should have this beautiful book before buying any piano or organ anywhere. Write for it to-day and please mention this paper.

Cornish Co., Memorial Hall, Farringdon St., LONDON, E.C.

Established Over 50 Years.

GENTLEMEN specially invited to join the Correspondence section of ROUND-ABOUT-CLUB, 350, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.; also Ladies. Social Gatherings on Wednesdays, Annual Subscription, £1 1s. Inland; 10s. 6d. Abroad.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

INEX-
PENSIVE

A DAINTY
AND

LUXURY.

FOR READING.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,

4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

question? I think not. We know that she would not be there otherwise, in most cases. I think the occupation ought to be repugnant to every modest, womanly woman with even an approximately high ideal of girlhood or motherhood!

The death-rate of those following it is appalling. The Medical Officer of Health for Woolwich stated a few years ago that "one-third of the public-house servants of London die of phthisis!" In four years eight barmaids were known to have been murdered, and all of these were under twenty-eight years of age.

Margaret says, "We do not see a grey-haired barmaid." No. Fully two-thirds are between the ages of fifteen and twenty-five. What can be her prospects when, with shattered health and vanished charms, she seeks employment in some other industry?

"Having mopped the zinc for certain years,
And faced the gas, she fades and disappears."

The records of our coroners' courts tell the story of many a dismissed barmaid's hopeless despair and frenzied death. But worse still, the Rescue Work of the West London Mission estimates that "fully one-third of the fallen women of the West End were once barmaids"!

Margaret says she comes to close grips with destitution and learns some of the tragedies of the poor! True for you, Margaret! Never had a woman a better chance! Oh, for pen of liquid fire to paint the chances of the barmaid in this direction! to be able to prove how intimate is the connection between the bar and misery, crime, and destitution of every sort!

May every right-thinking woman be brought to see the disgrace of having barmaids is the earnest prayer of
A MOTHER OF SONS:

IBSEN AND DEMOCRACY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—May I be allowed to offer comment on the article dealing with Henrik Ibsen in the last issue of your excellent journal?

The older one grows, the more one's ignorance becomes horrifyingly apparent, and my surprise was most profound on learning that Ibsen was an uncompromising individualist, and that the marked difference between Bernard Shaw and Henrik Ibsen lies in the fact that the one was "in theory a systematic Socialist," and that the other "has a horror of Democracy as he has a horror of the State."

It was in the year 1885, and during one of Ibsen's visits to Norway, that he made a remarkable speech at a club of working men at Dronheim.

"Mere democracy," he said, "cannot solve the social problem. An element of aristocracy must be introduced in our life. Of course, I do not mean the aristocracy of birth or purse, or even the aristocracy of intellect. I mean the aristocracy of character, of will, of mind. That can only free us."

"From two groups will this aristocracy, I hope, come to our people—from the women and from the workers. The revolution in the social condition, now preparing in Europe, is chiefly concerned with the future of the workman and the woman. In this I place all my hopes and expectations; for this will I work all my life."

And Ibsen did. His life and works are inspirations to all those who are working for a mental revolution in the people, and who eagerly await the realisation of the Socialist State.

It must be known to your contributor that, although Ibsen did not identify himself with any definite school of Socialism, he always described himself as a Socialist.

His aristocracy was not that of the school of Carlyle. His denunciation of democracy was not Nietzschean.

He believed that the task of democracy was to make every man in the land a nobleman, as it is only by the creation of great men and women, and the enlargement to the utmost of the reasonable freedom of the individual, that the realisation of democracy is possible.

Here he is at one with the great democrat of America.—I am, sir, etc., JOHN W. BUTT.
Stoke Newington, March 3rd, 1913.

OUT OF WORK.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Dr. Percy Dearmer's able article on the problem of unemployment calls for criticism on one important point. He desires to raise the school-leaving age to sixteen, and establish a continuation half-time system for a further two or three years, during which each youth and girl would receive technical instruction in a trade. This is admirable from an educational point of view, but how many wage-earners require nowadays to practise a trade in the earning of a living? It is the superseding of the standard trades by machinery that is creating a large army of wage-earners who do not require to be skilled in a trade, and to whom the acquisition would be only useful as a hobby. The old-fashioned spinning and cloth-weaving have disappeared, the bricklayer and mason are being displaced by the ferro-concrete, carpentry and coach-building, shoemaking and saddlery-making are becoming less and less trades and more and more sub-divided into so many mechanical operations, until by-and-by only a comparatively few workmen will be left who will be engaged in highly skilled occupations requiring a special training to acquire proficiency.

If the writer wishes to take us back in industry a century, then by all means teach every child a trade. Machinery has undoubtedly come to stay to quicken and ease the labour of mankind, and ultimately will be regarded solely as a means to increased leisure for all. Hence, why burden all with a trade? Educate thoroughly to equip us for a fuller enjoyment of that leisure which machinery, rightly used, can give, but do not let us revert to slow-moving, long-houred methods of production for the satisfaction of our physical needs.

Shorten the hours of labour to the minimum. But why commence with tramway men and policemen? What about shop assistants, many clerks, labourers, and artisans?—I am, sir, etc., DONCASTER.

March 3rd, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Dr. Dearmer, in his interesting article in EVERYMAN for February 28th, cites land reclamation as an instance of how to alleviate the evil of national wastefulness consequent on unemployment. The argument of reclamation is inconclusive and unsatisfying. The million men to be employed at £1 per week must be permanently employed at reclamation, otherwise in a few years' time they are thrown again on the labour market. Being human—and British—they will occasionally be thirsty; public-houses will follow them. They will desire to gamble, unless the fact of assisting at reclamation should convert them into moral paragons; the police-court will follow. They will still fall ill; charity must come to the aid

"SONGOLA" MUSIC ROLLS

THE WORDS OF THE SONG ON THE ROLL

"Songola" Music Rolls enhance the charm of the Player Piano. Add a selection of "Songola" Music Rolls to your Roll repertoire and your musical evenings will be brighter and better than ever.

These Rolls are musically perfect, strong and climate-proof. They are manufactured by the makers of "Linenized" Music Rolls, which have long been recognised as by far the best Music Rolls produced.

SEND FOR "SONGOLA" CATALOGUE 22.

THE PERFORATED MUSIC CO., Ltd.,
94, Regent Street, London, W.

Factory and Head Office: 197-199, CITY ROAD, E.C.
Scottish Branch: 113, GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH.

Agents in all Large Towns. Names and Addresses on application.

Player's Navy Mixture

IN THREE STRENGTHS.

MILD 5^d. per oz. MEDIUM 5^d. per oz.

WHITE LABEL 4^d. per oz.

THE PENGUINS' DISCOVERY.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward testing samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

THE IMPERIAL TOBACCO CO (OF GREAT BRITAIN & IRELAND) LTD

Coffee with the "Sting" extracted.

Ask your medical man what he would call the "sting" in coffee, and his reply would be—"the Caffeine." Caffeine is a drug which has very injurious effects upon the nervous system. Because of its medicinal men frequently advise their patients to stop taking coffee. There is now no reason why anyone should be prohibited from drinking this popular and delicious beverage, for a new process has been discovered by means of which coffee can be freed from Caffeine without in any way affecting its flavour, aroma, quality, or price. Over 2,000 medical men have written to express their gratification.

Buy only

PURE COFFEE FREED FROM CAFFEINE

Ask your Grocer for it. An Explanatory Booklet may be had Free. If you would like a Free Testing Sample enclose a penny stamp for postage.

THE LIFEBELT COFFEE CO., LTD.
(Dept. 11), 71, Eastcheap, London, E.C.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE OF MODERN SOCIALISM, by John Spargo, 1s. 6d. net, post free 1s. 8d.—Arthur F. Bird, 22, Bedford Street, Strand. Agency for American Books.

SHORTHAND. ANOTHER READER'S EXPERIENCE: "It may interest you to know that I started the study of Sloan-Duployan two months ago, and have already reached a speed of 120 words per minute. I think this is wonderful."—From Mr. A. H. d'Egville, 15, Conduit Street, W. SLOAN-DUPOYAN is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for interesting illustrated handbook, with specimen lesson free.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30. 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, High Holborn, London, W.C.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount price from Huoter & Longhurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. Catalogue of Secondhand Books and Reminders, just ready, sent post free.

THE FAVOURITE PIPE OF MOST LONDON EDITORS.

It will give you more enjoyment and less trouble than any pipe you have ever smoked.

Prices in best Briar-root, 2/6, 3/6, 5/-. 7/6. State shape required.

UNBAY PIPE CO.,
60, COMMERCE HOUSE, CLERKENWELL ROAD,
LONDON, E.C.
SAMPLE 1/1, POST FREE.

A PIECE OF NEW CLOTH. A Story of Socialism and Christianity. By James Adderley. Cheap Edition, cloth, 1/- net. "A book which everyone should read."—The Bookseller.—Huoter & Longhurst, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C.

SWISS WALKING PARTY for Grand Tour of Mont Blanc. Montreux, Chamonix, Aosta, Gd. St. Bernard, June 10th, for 12 guineas for 17 days. Particulars—Vicar, Hazlemere, High Wycombe.

LITTLE SALON SOCIAL-LITERARY CIRCLES.—For Men and Women of Culture (Speakers and Non-Speakers); include Drama, and Open Discussions of Questions of the Day. New Books, etc. Sub. Mod.—Write, M. L. B., Salon Secretary, 24, Bloomsbury Square, London, W.C.

PRINT YOUR OWN CIRCULARS, Cards, etc.—Printing Presses complete from 10s. to £5. "Printing Made Easy," 6d.—Adams Bros., Daventry.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Setief Course." (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETIEF INSTITUTE, (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

ALTHO' DEAF

There is now no reason why you should not enjoy the pleasures of perfect hearing. The DANJHILL EARPHONE gives perfect hearing and will enable you to once more enjoy the pleasures of conversation, music, Church and Theatre. It places you on an equal footing with those with perfect hearing. It is the latest, cheapest, and most perfect instrument for the deaf.

Danjhill
EARPHONE
GIVES PERFECT HEARING

Supplied on trial. Write for particulars to-day.
D. & J. A. HILL, 58, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON.

of the Insurance Act. With their wage of £1 per week, they will be able to marry earlier than they would otherwise do, and the average family will, in all probability, show an increase. In a generation the boys and girls will flood the labour market, and unemployment will be as great an evil as ever. The argument that the land reclaimed will be worth the amount put into it is fallacious; the value of land does not necessarily bear any relation to the amount of money sunk in it. Moreover, while we are reclaiming, the sea is sucking land from us by the yard and the acre on other parts of the coast.

Dr. Dearmer seems to be unwilling to admit what is, after all, the real cause of unemployment—over-population. He even goes the length of deploring the fact that there is a danger of there being too few people, and yet the fact of over-population is continually looming at the back of all his arguments. The "blind-alley" system, for instance, is the result of there being too many boys. Dr. Dearmer says we cannot shift responsibility off our own shoulders in the matter of unemployment. Granted; but all the responsibility ought not to be on the same shoulders. There is also a responsibility on the lower classes, who are the most prolific, that they shall not inflict undue burdens upon the rest of the community. When the lower classes have realised that they have no right to bring into the world more children than they can support, then we shall be on a fair way to solving this problem of unemployment. By placing a legal prohibition on early marriages, and limiting the right to procreate; by forbidding marriage until a certain age has been reached or a certain income attained, and by enforcing a strict medical examination of couples who desire to marry, a way will be opened for ridding society of the burden of unemployment.—I am, sir, etc.,

H. S.

Edinburgh.

JOHN REDMOND.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Professor Kettle's description of Wexford in the year 1798 is an evident attempt to pervert the facts of history. His object in glorifying John Redmond, the hero of the gombeen men of Ireland, and the plutocracy of Great Britain is apparent, but he might have mentioned the only national flag flown at Aughavannagh up to July last (I cannot with knowledge speak of later dates) was the American flag.

Wexford is peopled largely by the descendants of refugee Huguenots and Anglo-Norman settlers, as the surnames at the present day, such as Devereux and Farmer, to a certain extent, testify. In 1798 the county was in the hands of the rebels for months, during which time they collected men, women, and children (not professing the Roman Catholic religion) on Wexford Bridge and hurled them into the Slaney off the points of their pikes. At the barn of Scullabogue they confined over a hundred men, women, and children (not professing the Roman Catholic religion), placed a guard armed with pikes round the building, and then set it on fire. The guard was occupied in tossing the half-roasted heretics back into the flames. The rebel army finally advanced against the English army, and was overwhelmed at Vinegar Hill with great slaughter and the death of one of their leaders—Father Murphy. Some 5,000 rebels were accounted for before the final rout, and thousands perished in the pursuit. So much for the turgid periods relating to the torrent of Wexford pikes swallowing up the red-coats. The facts are exactly the reverse.—I am, sir, etc.,

TYRONE.

Tobermory.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA

By J. C. SQUIRE

THE reputation of the hero of the book* which Professor Phillimore has just translated into perfect English has undergone curious vicissitudes—vicissitudes of which a most exhaustive summary is given in Professor Phillimore's masterly and witty series of introductory chapters. In his own age (Professor Phillimore thoroughly upsets the received chronology which makes his birth contemporaneous with that of Christ), that is to say, circ. 37 A.D. to circ. 117, he had the merest local reputation in Asia Minor. For over a century he remained obscure; but in the reign of the Emperor Severus, when the Empress Julia Domna (one of those fashionable ladies who like raking up creeds, saints, and miracles from all possible quarters) was in search for something new, her protégé Philostratus found the very thing for her in the traditions of this Pythagorean wonder-worker, who so admirably united eccentricities with miracles, paradoxes with insatiable curiosity, and Hellenism with Orientalism. As time wore on, and the Church grew in strength, pagan writers, finding their only hope in a "competition of glammers" with Christianity, fell back on Apollonius. He became a "rallying symbol." Writer after writer fostered his cult, the most famous product of the movement being Hierocles' comparison of Apollonius and Christ. "Paganism," as Professor Phillimore says, "was hard up for any god which could stand the weather." This one at last was blown down. The god and saint disappeared, and among Byzantines and Arabs alike his legend persisted only as that of a magician. "What labour," wrote Sir Thomas More, "took Philostratus to make a book full of lies whereby he would have had Apollonius Tyaneus in miracles match unto Christ? And when he had all done he never found one old wife so fond to believe him." He was exploded.

The return of an age of reason, unfaith, and credulity has led to attempts to re-establish him. Modern rationalists, in their desperate hunt for parallels to Christ, have brought him to the front again; modern Syncretists have been delighted to find a man so much to their taste in an age so remote. In the face of the critical examination of Professor Phillimore and various foreign scholars, it will be impossible any longer honestly to maintain that Philostratus' book has the slightest genuine biographical value. Not only does it lack contemporary confirmation, but it is chock full of contradictions and internal discrepancies.

But though it is stripped of all its biographical value, it still remains a wonderfully fascinating book. Not only is it written with delightful grace and picturesqueness, not only is it enthralling as a romance, but it does give a most illuminating indication of certain ideals and tendencies prevalent in the time. Whether Apollonius really talked and travelled as he is made to do we do not know; but we at least know that that is how Philostratus and the Empress would like him to have talked and travelled. Thing after thing you come across in this book that enforces a comparison between that age and our own—cosmopolitanism, humanitarianism, vegetarianism, a love of debate, of paradox and of epigram, Orientalism, mental kaleidoscopicism, asceticism, æstheticism, globe-trotting, a cultivation of personal idiosyncrasy. There are good and bad features in it all; and, on the whole, in spite of the mental welter through which he walks, Philostratus does succeed in giving us a permanent

* "Philostratus, Apollonius of Tyana." Translated by J. S. Phillimore. Two vols. 7s. (Clarendon Press.)

AVOID DRUGS

If taken frequently drugs lose their power and doses have to be increased.

For the safe and certain relief and cure of . . .

INDIGESTION, ACIDITY, FLATULENCY, HEARTBURN, and IMPURE BREATH,

Bragg's Pure Vegetable Charcoal has never yet been equalled. It absorbs the impure gases generated in the stomach and bowels and carries them out of the system, thus removing the CAUSE of digestive disturbance and at the same time cleansing the blood.

BRAGG'S CHARCOAL

may be taken regularly with constant benefit by young or old. It is invaluable also in Diarrhoea and Fever. Doctors largely recommend it and use it in their own families.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores. Biscuits, 1/-, 2/- and 4/- per tin; Powder, 2/- per bottle; Lozenges, 1/12 per tin; Chocolates, 1/- per tin; Capsules, 2/- per box.

FREE SAMPLES sent to anyone mentioning this Journal and enclosing 3d. stamps for postage in the British Empire and U.S.A.

J. L. BRAGG'S, Ltd., 14, WIGMORE ST., LONDON, W.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 30 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

The Chain fitted on all the best cycles is the Renold.
The Chain specified by all experienced riders is the

Renold Chain

The Chain with the name is the Renold.

ONE QUALITY—ONE PRICE—5/6 (Fitting extra).

Write for our interesting little booklet—Free.
HANS RENOLD LTD. (Dept. 14), MANCHESTER.

A Valuable Book

We have compiled a little Book entitled "The Uses of Card Index Signals," which is simply invaluable to all business men. It is replete with explanatory diagrams, and treats this important subject in a more thorough and easily understood manner than has ever been done before.

For 4d. Post Free.

We will send a copy of this book, with samples of Signals, to any reader of EVERYMAN sending 4d. in stamps, but as the edition is limited we advise you to apply at once.

TAPP & TOOTHILL, LTD.,
27, Warwick Lane, London, E.C.

TO AUTHORS.—MESSRS. DIGBY, LONG & Co. (Publishers of "The Author's Manual," 3s. 6d. net. Ninth Edition) are prepared to consider MSS. in all Departments of Literature with a view to publication in Volume Form.—Address 16, Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

"THOUGHT: Its Ten Laws," on Card. Something new. How the New Knowledge aids in daily life, study, &c. "Concentration: Its Ten Laws," companion Card. 1s. 2d. each.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

NEW GEORGIAN CLUB: The White House, Randolph Crescent, W. — A quiet, comfortable Residence for Women of good social status. Large house. Access to gardens. Rooms from 25s. weekly, including baths, breakfast, and dinner. Non-members received at special rates.—Apply Secretary.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. B. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.
A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Short-hand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

CHAUCER

By EMILE LEGOUIS. TRANSLATED by L. LAILAVOIX. Large crown 8vo, 5s. net.

PRESS OPINIONS.

Bookman.—"The freshness and independence of the French critic's point of view, and his freedom from the disturbing influences of national tradition, are, to begin with, distinct advantages. . . . Learned and full, yet loof and well proportioned, it leaves us with a most satisfactory impression of thoroughness and balance; the writer's touch is as light as it is sure, and precision of statement is combined with felicity of expression."

Manchester Guardian.—"By its combination of learning, of critical power, this small volume has every right to be acclaimed as the best introduction to Chaucer which has yet been offered to the world."

Globe.—"An excellent and suggestive book."

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

impression of Apollonius as a person who sometimes amuses us, always interests us, and occasionally commands our respect. As he peregrinates through Asia Minor and Babylonia, Persia and India, Egypt and Italy, he is occasionally smug and occasionally irritatingly argumentative. But what can be more debonair than the airy way in which he throws off his marvels and his predictions, or the way in which he managed that admirably sketched collection of Asiatic monarchs? With the King in Babylon he was Shavian. The King brought him a prisoner charged with a terrible offence. "To what punishment do you sentence him?" he asked. "To life, of course," replied Apollonius. He observes to his follower that the Mages are "Scientific, but not absolutely"; as who should say, "These honest fellows are on the right track." He is at his best when the Naked Sages of Egypt try impressive hocus-pocus on him; he pulls their naked legs with admirable skill. His interview with Vespasian shows him in a favourable light as a political mentor, though he is just a little priggish about it. Better is his demeanour towards the brutal Domitian, who puts him on his trial as a sorcerer. Domitian has prejudged the case:—

"You may begin your defence," says he, "at what point you please; I know what point I shall leave off at, and from what point I ought now to start."

"From this began his maltreatment of Apollonius. He had his beard and hair cut, and kept him in chains amongst the vilest criminals. On the former indignity Apollonius remarked, 'I never knew that my hair was at stake in this trial'; of the latter, 'If you regard me as a sorcerer, how will you chain me? And if you are going to chain me, how can you say I am a sorcerer?' 'But I will,' said the Emperor, 'and, what's more, I'll not release you till you turn into water, or some beast or tree.' 'These are things,' said Apollonius, 'which I would not care to turn into, even if I had the power.'"

It is not possible to give here an adequate indication of the charm of this book. Neither Lucian nor Apuleius wrote anything more readable than this story of an apostle of what we term nowadays the Higher Thought. What the real Apollonius was like we shall probably never know. It doesn't much matter; for he has not (as far as I am aware) any surviving relations whose feelings could be hurt by unmerited reflections upon his character. We can take this book as we find it. Until now no decent English version has been available, and Professor Phillimore is to be congratulated on what he has done. A more nervous, pointed, easy, yet accurate version is inconceivable. It belongs to the small class of what may be called creative translations.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MESSRS. HEADLEY BROS. are issuing a notable selection from the writings of Sir Thomas Browne (2s. 6d. net), edited by Mr. Lewis Townsend. The extracts, chosen from the best known works of the author of "Religio Medici," cover a wide range, and serve most admirably to show the author's special qualities of style. It is, in effect, a collection of gems from one of the greatest masters of English prose, and to those who are unable to devote the time necessary to a more complete acquaintance with his works, should prove invaluable. The introduction sketches the qualities of the man, his influence on literature, his penetrative thought, and critical faculty. "He did not, like Bacon," says Mr. Townsend, "stride through the narrow belt of mist that seems to encircle the children of every age, and achieve a new continent of light; he, rather, said all that belonged to his age, and walked up to the edge and limit of light allowed to his generation."

To those who love fine writing this volume of extracts will give genuine delight. It would be difficult to suggest any alteration in the compilation, and the binding and printing are admirable.

• • •

FOR THE LOVE OF GYP (Murray and Evenden, 6s.). This is a very unexpected book. The construction is crude, the story raw-edged and painfully disjointed, based upon a plot so transparently absurd that it becomes amazing. The only thing that redeems it from the category of the impossible is the simplicity of some of the descriptives. When Mr. Adrian Darter is dealing with the events of everyday life in a mining district of South Africa he is readable; one is indeed arrested, despite defects of style and inequalities of language. But just as he has succeeded in painting a scene at once fresh and convincing, he flies off at a tangent to look for a plot, round which he makes his characters career in a marionette dance. Vera Monckton, the syren of the story, exercises a marvellous and baleful influence on the fortunes of Frances Rowland. Time and distance are mere bagatelles to this remarkable lady. Like the witch of old, she casts her spells on the absentee at a distance of many thousands of miles, and from a Mayfair boudoir blights the hopes of the unfortunate Rowland, resident in South Africa. If the author were to confine himself to simple stories of plain people he might do something really worth reading; while he involves himself and his characters in a tangle of melodramatic fireworks he is not likely to attain any desirable results.

• • •

Mr. W. P. Ryan has given us a delightful story in DAISY DARLEY: OR THE FAIRY GOLD OF FLEET STREET (J. M. Dent and Sons, 6s.). He is one of the few writers who have caught the atmosphere of a newspaper office, and, while reproducing the sense of stress and strain, the rush and hurry, does not allow the whirr of the presses, the click of the linotypes to outcrowd the human element. Most novels of the street that never sleeps show us the reporter, never the man. The characters live only within the four walls of the building dedicate to their journal. Once the pressman leaves the office of his paper, he becomes colourless, unreal. Mr. P. Ryan shows us the editorial staff at high pressure, the emergency of a special edition is in the air; one sees the blue pencil of O'Keefe, the matchless "sub" of "The Gleam," as he scores the copy. "'Lift,' he said, 'is the word for the second edition. First of all, take anything good, and that's not much, out of our Sunday rag.' When he came to the news pages he scanned the items critically, and when one satisfied him he 'ticked' it, crossed the headings, pencilled new ones on the adjacent column, made a few slight changes in the text, such as 'Saturday' for the 'yesterday' of the Sunday paper, and so on, till he had got through the whole, a proceeding which did not take many minutes." Arthur Clandillon, by temperament a dreamer, by endowment a poet, is engaged as assistant "sub" on "The Gleam," and the contrast between things seen and felt in the office and Clandillon's land of the heart's desire, "where the noonday's all a glimmer and the night's a purple glow, and the evening's full of the linnets' wings," is wonderfully vivid and very human. He gains by his connection with the paper, gets at close grips with a phase of life that leaves little to the imagination, so that his somewhat weak and wavering philosophy settles into a steadier

FROM DENT & SONS' LIST.

SONGS AND BALLADS OF GREATER BRITAIN.

Compiled by E. A. HELPS.

Crown 8vo, 4/6 net.

STANDARD.—"An inspiring volume—a vivid, fascinating panorama of the British Empire."

NEW FICTION.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL

Grace Rhys

DAISY DARLEY W. P. Ryan

'TWIXT LAND AND SEA . Joseph Conrad

THE ADVENTURES OF MISS GREGORY Perceval Gibbon

BROKEN ARCS Darrell Figgis

CHILDREN OF LIGHT . Florence Converse

Crown 8vo, 6/- each.

Please send for New Illustrated General Catalogue.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

NEW & SECONDHAND ENGLISH & FOREIGN BOOKS

For Sale or on Subscription
Particulars and Prices Free.

FROM
W. H. SMITH & SON'S LIBRARY
186 STRAND, LONDON & BRANCHES

THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER'S ASSURANCE.

Readers of "Everyman" are desired to specially note that all advertisements which appear in this publication are the announcements of reputable firms, consequently no one need hesitate to communicate with any of our advertisers,

The Advertisement Manager is prepared to investigate the complaint of any reader, should cause for the same arise at any time, view of things; he finally emerges as a brilliant and successful author, while before his connection with "The Gleam" one feels he would at the best have blossomed into a very minor poet, on flirtatious terms with literature. Mr. Ryan is convincing in this as in so many other parts of his book. A number of our front rank novelists owe not a small portion of their success to their newspaper experience. It is no small thing to possess the faculty of writing when and how and where emergency calls. The words must leap to the pen, expressing ideas red hot upon the paper, losing not a moment in transit. Your minor poet will spend hours a day in polishing an effort that at the completion bears the aroma of the midnight oil. A year on an evening paper will clarify his style and train his pen. Mr. Ryan weaves a delicate love idyll into the story, and Daisy Darley is a dainty little person. Her rival, Alice Consadine, is hardly so successful; she suggests a machine-made product—the advanced woman of pronounced views turned out to pattern. But this is a detail in a conception notable for delicate yet strong treatment, full of light and shade, and possessing that indescribable quality of glamour that is associated with "fairy gold."

• • •

There is a quality of style about Miss Mary Openshaw that marks out LITTLE GREY GIRL (John Ouseley, 6s.) from the mass of novels that appear annually, devoid of distinction and of atmosphere. The author has a simplicity and a reticence that adds immeasurably to her power. The novel deals with a young girl named Silence, and she is a member of the Society of Friends, and we are introduced to her at school. The comments of her school-fellows are refreshingly true to life. Girls, like boys, are eminently barbarous in the early stages of their development, though too often in fiction they are portrayed as incrustated with saccharine qualities fit only for an early death-bed. It was in the year 1870 that Silence went to school, and her reflection on matters of European moment are reproduced with a quaintness infinitely refreshing. The little Quaker shows us a phase of life which modern hurry and stress too often passes by. Sarah, the elderly housemaid, is delightfully Cromwellian in her attitude. "Thee is a foolish child to take heed of what these children say, they cannot be well mannered to make sport of another, which is a thing very ill-pleasing in the sight of God. How did he punish those wicked children who mocked at the Prophet Elijah's scanty head-covering? I have heard thee repeat Dr. Watts' verses on the subject." The verse in question is inimitable, and we cannot resist quoting it:—

"God quickly stopped their wicked words,
And sent two raging bears,
Which tore them limb from limb to death,
With blood and groans and tears."

These lines Silence recites, and adds a hope that the Almighty will not condemn her school-fellows to similar torments. It would not be fair to anticipate the story of the Romance of the Little Quaker; we leave it to the readers to follow the fortunes of a delightful heroine in a book of singular charm.

• • •

Mrs. Humphry Ward is nothing if not moral. One may sigh for the ghost of a vanishing story in her novels, yearn for a flutter of the skirts of romance, but, from the first page to the last, Moral, with a very large capital M, inevitably appears. The good boy who went to Sunday-school and was rewarded with a particularly rosy apple, the bad boy who preferred to listen to the singing of the larks in the middle

Heaven—and was tossed by a bull—we find them all within the pages of life according to Mrs. Humphry Ward. THE MATING OF LYDIA (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.) dots the i's and crosses the t's of moral excellence with unflinching precision. The author sees life in black and white, the sheep and the goats are relentlessly driven into their respective pens unrelieved by humour, unredeemed by any appearance of spontaneity. Her latest effort neatly tabulates the men and women whose characteristics she pitilessly labels: Lydia, to whom money is a burden and a snare; Tatham, to whom wealth has come so naturally that he never thinks of it; Melrose, to whom wealth was a poison in the blood; and Faversham, to whom it presents a temptation and great ordeal of his life. We quote from the résumé of the book kindly provided by a thoughtful publisher in tabloid form. For further information we refer the reader to the novel in the confident hope and expectation that whatever they do not find therein they will indubitably meet with a Moral.

• • •

The cult of the open road has been somewhat overdone of late. All sorts and conditions of vagabonds have been depicted, every variety of vagrant enshrined within the pages of romance. Mr. Laurence Oliphant, however, has contrived to get out of the beaten track. THE TRAMP (Constable, 6s.) does not treat of the ordinary type of waster, the man who takes to the road because the town rejects him. Christopher Bryan goes on tramp because he "could dream his own dreams, which is the chiefest form of recreation in the world, and most satisfying; for Christopher is a poet, a fact to which he owed his present lamentable condition. With his education and intellect he might have been something more prosperous—a schoolmaster, or a minister, or even a stockbroker. But his incurable devotion to truth and the beautiful incapacitated him from becoming a decent member of society." Unable to bear the hideousness of slum life, Christopher took to the road. Mr. Oliphant's descriptions of the country are full of colour and freshness, Jess and Maggie are human entities—no mere machine-made women. In certain scenes, notably between Maggie and Lloyd, the man who has betrayed her, the author reaches a height of drama and power almost unique in an age that fences with emotion and flirts with elemental passion. "The Tramp" is one of the most notable books issued within recent times.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templar London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

SOME VOLUMES from EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY.

Biography.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON (2 vols.)
 LOCKHART'S LIFE OF NAPOLEON
 PEPYS' DIARY
 SOUTHEY'S LIFE OF NELSON
 SMEATON'S LIFE OF SHAKESPEARE
 CARLYLE'S LETTERS AND SPEECHES OF CROMWELL
 IRVING'S LIFE OF MAHOMET
 THE MEMOIRS OF JOHN CONSTABLE
 HOLMES' LIFE OF MOZART
 SCOTT'S LIVES OF THE NOVELISTS

Classical.

MARCUS AURELIUS' MEDITATIONS
 EURIPIDES' PLAYS (2 vols.)
 CICERO'S ESSAYS AND SELECT LETTERS
 ÆSCHYLUS' LYRICAL DRAMAS
 PLATO'S REPUBLIC—Spen's Translation
 THE COMEDIES OF ARISTOPHANES
 HOMER'S ILIAD. HOMER'S ODYSSEY
 THUCYDIDES' PELOPONNESIAN WAR

History.

CARLYLE'S FRENCH REVOLUTION (2 vols.)
 MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND
 (3 vols.)
 BURNET'S HISTORY OF HIS OWN TIMES
 MOTLEY'S DUTCH REPUBLIC (3 vols.)
 FINLAY'S GREECE UNDER THE ROMANS
 GROTE'S HISTORY OF GREECE (12 vols.)
 MACHIAVELLI'S HISTORY OF FLORENCE
 MILMAN'S HISTORY OF THE JEWS (2 vols.)
 PRESCOTT'S CONQUEST OF MEXICO
 LÜTZOW'S HISTORY OF BOHEMIA
 MERIVALE'S HISTORY OF ROME (2 vols.)
 CREASY'S DECISIVE BATTLES OF THE WORLD

Philosophy & Theology.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS ON RELIGION AND LIFE
 BUTLER'S ANALOGY OF RELIGION
 HUME'S TREATISE OF HUMAN NATURE
 SWEDENBORG'S HEAVEN AND HELL
 A KEMPI'S IMITATION OF CHRIST
 SAINT AUGUSTINE'S CONFESSIONS
 ANCIENT HEBREW LITERATURE (4 vols.)
 JOHN STUART MILL'S UTILITARIANISM
 HOOKER'S ECCLESIASTICAL POLITY
 THE NICOMACHEAN ETHICS OF ARISTOTLE

Poetry & Drama.

WORDSWORTH'S SHORTER POEMS
 BYRON'S POETICAL AND DRAMATIC WORKS (3 vols.)
 SHELLEY'S POETICAL WORKS (2 vols.)
 CHAUCER'S CANTERBURY TALES
 BROWNING'S POEMS (2 vols.)
 PALGRAVE'S GOLDEN TREASURY
 THE SELECT PLAYS OF BEAUMONT
 AND FLETCHER
 GOLDEN BOOK OF COLERIDGE

Fiction.

DUMAS' THE COUNT OF MONTE CRISTO
 (2 vols.)
 VICTOR HUGO'S LES MISERABLES (2 vols.)
 AINSWORTH'S THE TOWER OF LONDON
 GEORGE ELIOT'S SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE
 TOLSTOI. A Volume of Tales and Parables
 THACKERAY'S VIRGINIANS (2 vols.)
 VICTOR HUGO'S TOILERS OF THE SEA
 AINSWORTH'S OLD ST. PAUL'S
 GEORGE ELIOT'S MILL ON THE FLOSS
 DUMAS' MARGUERITE DE VALOIS ("La Reine Margot")
 BALZAC'S CAT AND RACKET, and Other Stories
 CHARLOTTE BRONTË'S VILLETTE

THE ABOVE ARE DRAWN HAPHAZARD FROM A
 LIST OF 640 TITLES. ON RECEIPT OF A POST-CARD THE PUBLISHERS WILL BE PLEASED TO SEND A FULL ANNOTATED LIST OF THE SERIES.

STYLES OF BINDING.

- 1s. net. Cloth, Full Gilt Back, Coloured Top.
 2s. net. Limp Paste Grain, Round Corners, Gilt Top.

SPECIAL BINDINGS FOR LIBRARY USE.

- 1s. 6d. net. Linen-faced Cloth, Coloured Edges.
 2s. net. Quarter Pigskin, Cloth Sides, Coloured Edges.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

CAN YOU SKETCH?

WOULD YOU LIKE TO DRAW FOR REPRODUCTION?

and earn some of the hundreds of pounds that Advertisers (in London alone) pay daily for simple, slick, and effective sketches.

Never was the demand for sketches so great, never was it so easy for a trained artist to live in comfort.

Take up a good magazine—Nash's, for instance—what first catches the eye? The Drawings, most certainly.

Tear the cover off, and note the effect. How many popular magazines would sell on the bookstalls without their covers?

What the picture cover is to the magazine so an attractive sketch is to an advertisement.

And advertisers now realise this fact so clearly that they compete with each other to get the work of artists who have studied their requirements.

In the streets, posters meet the eye long before anything else. Posters and Magazine Drawings often display more cleverness than Academy Paintings, and the young men and women who have learned to design them often earn more than Royal Academicians.

Commercial Artists usually sell their work by post, thus saving time and the embarrassment of personal interviews and verbal bargaining.

By Post also, anyone with a taste for drawing can enjoy the advantages of a London training at home.

THE PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE—the All-British School of Art with the World-wide Reputation—offers to EVERYMAN readers with a taste for drawing the Complete Postal Course of Individual Instruction in the design of

POSTERS, SHOWCARDS, COVERS, &c.

The P.C.C. System of Instruction is invented by Chas. E. Dawson, who conducts the Course, and who becomes personally responsible to the College for the success of each student.

The lessons, exclusive and confidential to each student, are superbly illustrated. Exercises are set expounding the technique of drawing for reproduction. The exercises are sent by post to Chas. E. Dawson, who criticises them; his long letters of personal advice and encouragement are alone worth more than the moderate fee for the course.

Chas. E. Dawson gives "reasons why" for praise or blame—his Art Criticism in the foremost magazines of Great Britain and America have won for him a reputation only equalled by the high regard shown on both sides of the Atlantic for his poster and advertisement designs. His pen and pencil have lent refinement and distinction to the announcements of the leading advertisers; among them:

Roya Cocoa, Van Houten's, Fry's, Jaeger's, Frame - Food, Kelway's, Pelman Memory System, Luce's Eau - de - Cologne, His Master's Voice Gramophones, Oetzman's, Wolseley Cars, Liberty's, and the chief London Publishers.

The subjects taught include: Drawing for reproduction, book cover, advertisement designs, lettering, perspective, line, wash, and body colour sketches, splatter work, time and labour saving devices, originating saleable designs, establishing a connexion, commercial correspondence, dealing with printers, publishers, and advertisers, how, when, and where to sell designs to the best advantage.

Send a small specimen of your work in any media—pen, pencil or colour—and we will return it to you with Chas. E. Dawson's personal confidential letter of criticism and advice as to your chances of success in this new and lucrative field of applied art.

Correspondence must not be directed to the Editor of EVERYMAN, but to the SECRETARY, PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE, 77, Thanet House Strand, London, W.C.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 23. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, MARCH 21, 1913

One Penny.

History in the Making— Notes of the Week	PAGE 709
Should Lloyd George Imitate Napoleon?—A Reply by Hilaire Belloc	710
Women at Work—V. The Nurse—By Margaret Hamilton	712
Life in a London Bastille—Part II.— By Thomas Holmes	714
Literary Notes	715
Bishop Gore—By E. Hermann	716
Portrait of Bishop Gore	717
The Greek Drama—I. Æschylus—By Prof. J. S. Phillimore	718
The Call of the Citizen—By Lady Frances Balfour	719
From Bermondsey—Poem—By Thomas Burke	720

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

HILAIRE BELLOC

LADY FRANCES

BALFOUR

PROFESSOR J. S.

PHILLIMORE

E. HERMANN

Masterpiece for the Week—Thomas Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus"—By Hector Macpherson	PAGE 721
Three Years in the Libyan Desert	723
The Old Bell-ringer—Short Story—By W. Korolenko	724
Eve—Poem—By "Syned"	725
The Women's Page—The Conference Habit—By Evelyn Burke	726
Correspondence—
Anglo-German Relations	728
Educational Reform	730
National Education	732
The Army and Unemployment	732
Christianity, Progress, and the Claims of the Bible	734
The Church and Social Problems	735
Books of the Week	736

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENTARY debates have been unprecedentedly dull since the opening of the Session. Overwrought and all but exhausted members have been trying in vain to bring something like zest and verve to the reconsideration of questions over which they have racked their brains only so recently, and important matters, such as the relations between local and Imperial taxation and the abuse of the Parliament Act, have been discussed in a practically empty House. Lord Robert Cecil's suggestion that the House should delegate more of its work to committees would certainly, if carried out, ensure the House as a whole against overwork, and give the unoccupied private member something to do. One doubts, however, if the idea will find acceptance. Quite apart from our constitutional British shyness of innovations, there is still a superstition abroad that the average private member is most harmless in an unoccupied state.

The phrase "Triple Entente" has been ruffling the pools of political opinion quite considerably of late. On the one hand, we are told that Britain must face up to one of two alternatives—a policy of isolation, or a policy of a Continental army. On the other hand, it is urged that, while we certainly have one entente with France and another with Russia, there is no such thing as a "triple entente"—using the phrase in the same sense as the Triple Alliance—and that Britain's security lies in the maintenance of a judiciously impartial attitude towards the European system of alliances. The issue is not only of supreme national importance: it is a European problem. And, whatever view one takes, it can hardly be denied that the recent revival of the national consciousness, with all its benefits, is beset by the danger of that shrill form of patriotism which is the hysteria of nations.

The Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society have issued a leaflet entitled "Slavery in West Africa," and consisting of passages translated from a pamphlet by Senhor Jeronimo Paiva de Carvalho, one-time Curator (i.e., Protector of natives) under the Portuguese Government. Senhor de Carvalho's statements gain force from the fact that his pamphlet was published in Portugal, and was not inspired by any British society or individual. It throws a grim light upon the conditions of the negro labourer in West Africa, and will doubtless help to promote serious investigation of the farce of "contract labour." It adds an ironic touch to the situation that the scene of this disguised slavery is the country which Livingstone died to open to Christian civilisation.

The Livingstone Centenary is recalling many wholesome and inspiring things to our remembrance, and perhaps none more worth remembering than the stern and frugal conditions which went to produce a Livingstone, and thousands like him in spirit, though not in genius. To read once again of that humble home in Blantyre; of the stern father who learnt Gaelic so that he might read the Bible to his wife in the only language she fully understood; of the mother in whom unswerving rectitude was wedded to a beautiful tenderness; of the long factory hours during which the lad of ten taught himself in brief snatches from books placed on the spinning-jenny; of student life on half a crown a week; of the final talk with his parents before he left Scotland—to recall all this is to chasten our thoughtless contempt for the old strictness and narrowness. Those were dour days, when laughter was frowned at, and the light-heartedness of youth reproved, and the simplest pleasure was regarded as a sin. We have wisely got rid of the sunless severity of former days; but how recapture the dignity, refinement and spiritual vision which the old attitude towards life bred in the poorest and most unlettered?

SHOULD LLOYD GEORGE IMITATE NAPOLEON? * * A REPLY BY HILAIRE BELLOC

SOME weeks ago the distinguished leader of the Belgian Socialist party, Emile Vandervelde, wrote an article for EVERYMAN, of which the title demanded whether the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in this country would do well to imitate Napoleon. The thesis of this article was that the proper way of treating the land of a country was to take it away from individual owners and to put it into the hands of the politicians—who, it was understood, would distribute the produce equitably.

Now as to the title of this article, I confess myself unable to deal with it. Personally, I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has much to say to the measures which are put forward in his name. That is not the way in which we do things at Westminster. Our politicians are only the spokesmen for the great plutocratic interests which to-day really govern the country. But as to Monsieur Vandervelde's conclusions, these are another matter, and much more interesting than the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I propose to deal with them.

The leader of the Belgian Socialists (as befits his creed and that of all his fellow Socialists throughout Europe) demands the removal from private control of the means of production, and, among the means of production, of course, land. To use his own words, he demands "the collective appropriation of the unearned increment," and this, being translated into common talk, means the taking away of the land from those who now own it, and the putting it into the hands of the politicians.

Please note at the outset that this strictly logical and lucid Socialist formula can mean nothing in practice but the control by the politicians of the land and capital of the country, and therefore of all our lives.

That is a fundamental proposition from which there is no escaping.

Somebody must have the right to say what shall be done with a certain plough and a particular piece of land. If that somebody is "the community," that would mean in theory that all England met for the purposes of debate would, after mature deliberation and a vote, set Alfred Smith at the plough tail, his boy, Bill Smith, at the team, and bid them turn up the ten acre, beginning at the end by the willows. All England standing by would see that the work was done properly, and out of great public stores of food and clothing would, after further deliberation and a vote, authorise the Smiths to take so much food and clothing for their maintenance until the harvest. But all England cannot do this. It is a physical necessity that the public officers of the community, and not the community, should do the actual ordering about and distribution under such a system, and the public officers of the community are, of course, the politicians. Therefore, in practice, this system means handing over the control of the land and the ploughs and the Smith family to the politicians.

No matter what you do to escape from that unpleasant conclusion, you are bound to come back to it. Some people try to escape from it by calling themselves "Guild-Socialists." They would have agriculture run by a Union of all Agriculturists. But if the Union was large its officers would be exactly what the politicians are, and if you substitute for a large Union a large number of small groups, you are re-establishing private property, for you are giving to small sub-units of the State power of economic control apart from the State, and you are giving privileges to the little group which is better situated over the little group which is worse situated. If you say: "No, I won't allow the better situated group to get the advantage; I will set over both groups the authority of the 'community' and distribute the advantages of the more favoured," why, then, back comes the politician again.

Well, both with regard to the land and agricultural implements and steadings and stores of seed and food and clothing and the rest (in other words, with agricultural land and capital), and also with regard to most forms of the means of production, the Socialist way out of our present difficulties seems to me a bad way; and the distribution of the control over these means of production by way of private property seems to me a good way. For the purposes of this short paper I argue only against M. Vandervelde's arguments in connection with the land.

M. Vandervelde in these arguments very properly remarks that peasant proprietorship, particularly in France and Belgium (countries from which the proposal for peasant proprietorship which he is attacking was drawn), is imperfect. It co-exists with a considerable agricultural proletariat, and the distribution of the land is exceedingly unequal. The implication is that you cannot have a peasant proprietorship established without these attendant evils. He might have extended this argument by quoting the case of Ireland, where a newly created system of peasant proprietorship exhibits both these defects. But I should reply (1) that these two defects, though never wholly avoidable, are to be judged by the degree of their severity, and (2) that this degree is (a) exaggerated by M. Vandervelde, and (b) not inherent in a system of peasant proprietorship.

I say that in the first place the ill distribution of the land in existing peasant society is not as bad as the Socialists make out, and in the second place that the existence of such a peasantry does not involve even the present degree of that evil, but rather its diminution.

As to the first point. It is true that more than a third of French land is held in properties of over one hundred acres; it is further true that nearly nineteen-twentieths of the owners own less than twenty-five acres, but it is not true that this great mass of small owners are incapable of economic freedom, and therefore of full citizenship; nor is it true that a third of the acreage being in the hands of large owners (though these are but one-sixtieth of the total number of families) connotes a corresponding economic advantage.

The social fact which you seize at once when you live in any peasant district of France, and which corrects this meagre and insufficient piece of statistics, is that the small ownership largely covers valuable land and areas of intensive culture (vineyards, olive gardens, market gardens, etc.), while large ownership is correspondingly explained (though, of course, only partially explained) by its covering forests, poor pasturage, marsh, and heath. Statistics are the most misleading form of information unless one uses a great number of cross tables, illustrating and correcting as a whole the apparent deductions from any one of them. And when you turn to the statistics of assessment, to the value of the land per acre as compared with the mere size of the holdings, you get a much more equitable result than Monsieur Vanderelde suggests.

Take a purely agricultural district, but one in which the revolution has had least effect, and where, therefore, the argument should be against me. Take Vendée. Vendée has about a million and a half acres, of which about a million acres are good pasture or cultivated land. We can test the distribution of property in this agricultural district. Some 3,000 heads of families die every year, and we have records of their assessments at death. Those records certainly show grave inequality. The assessments (always lower, remember, than the real values of small property) show a total of about a million and a half pounds passing at death every year. A good deal more than a third of this is left by a small proportion of large owners. I find sixty assessments in the neighbourhood of £3,000 and thirty in the neighbourhood of £5,000 or £6,000. But when we come to the small holders we get the root of the matter. If you note all the freehold values, from the little steadings of a few acres and a cottage at £100 or so up to the substantial farmer who is put at £2,000, you find no less than two-thirds of the whole population included in such a list. And of those two-thirds much the greater part are men who fall under assessments which mean not an insufficient holding, but a livelihood. How much of the population may be proletarian it is impossible to discover exactly, but certainly much less than the remaining third, since this includes the deaths of minors, children who leave little or no property, and members of the family, adult indeed, but living unmarried under the same roof as the head of the family.

When you take yet another line of analysis, the impression of wide distribution is confirmed. I have pointed out that one must consider not only the acreage but the value of land. Well, of the million acres which are under cultivation in Vendée you have only 40,000, or 4 per cent., under vines, but that four per cent. in mere acreage supports something like ten per cent. of the population, produces three and a half million gallons of wine, and a total of economic values representing perhaps half a million English pounds. If you take the acreage owned by these small proprietors of vines, it is small indeed. It is an average of no more than four or five acres; but if you consider the important thing, which is the income, you find an average of something like £2 a week coming to those small owners, and, mind you, this is in a country where there are no highly priced wines.

But I say that not only does the Socialist argument exaggerate the degree of inequality in a peasant proprietary, it wholly misunderstands the connection between peasant proprietary and distribution. It argues as though because peasant property was as a fact unequally distributed there were some necessary tendency in the ownership of land by the families living upon it which produced ill distribution. But here again the full statistics are against the argument. Throughout Western Europe, wherever you have any appreciable distribution of landed property, that distribution is not decreasing, it is increasing. The whole tone of a peasant society, the customs it establishes, and the positive laws which it either inspires or tolerates are against the reconcentration of land into few hands. I do not think you will find in the history of Western Christendom one single example of high concentration which has not been effected by violence, nor one single example of an agricultural society left free to develop on its own lines which has not developed as a peasant proprietary.

I have no space to pursue the many arguments that occur to me in this connection—I might, for instance, had I the space to deal with such a point, discuss the supposed restriction of population in a peasant State. As a fact, the French peasantry comes highest on the list after the miners, and is 50 per cent. more prolific (307 against 204) than the liberal professions, that is, than that middle class in which the Socialist theory particularly flourishes.

As I have not the space to go into this and twenty other aspects of the matter, let me conclude with what is, after all, the most vital argument of all.

What is the human attitude towards the matter? The middle-class and academic theorist, with his talk of the collectivisation of the means of production, must consider the realities of human society. Let such a man go to the peasant. What will the peasant make of him? Go to the peasant in a society where the mass of families are established upon the land which they own and suggest to him that it would be a normal, a human, or a proper thing that the Government should confiscate his land and, at the best, keep him on as a tenant. How would he consider the proposal?

You have in politics a certain concrete material to deal with, not an abstraction. This material is called "human beings," and in this particular case we know a great deal about it, for we are of them ourselves; we are, all of us, human beings of Western Christendom. That material, working out its nature, organises itself into families, and, wherever it has the power of doing so, it establishes those families as owners of the land they live upon. It does not arrive at a perfect result, but those are the lines on which it moves. There is waste, there is injustice in the instinctive actions of this human material, because waste and injustice are human. But much worse, because actually inhuman, are the theories that would go counter to the nature of the material, that would cut across its living fibres, and work regardless of its every vital instinct, and that is exactly what the Socialist theory does. It is no argument for such inhuman academic theories to say they are a remedy for Capitalism. That horrible disease is horrible because it is inhuman; the remedy for it must be a return to human arrangements. Capitalism arose not from any natural economic development, but from a violent disturbance of natural development, ultimately traceable to the revolution effected in this country in the sixteenth century. Where capitalism has driven men to desperation, Socialism as an untried remedy has flourished in imagination only, and usually for a short time at that. It has never proceeded to action, and I do not think it ever can. Its leaders at this moment are compromising everywhere with the enemy and substituting a Servile for a Collectivist solution. But what ghost of a chance has Socialism, even as a proposal, with any society which Capitalism has not made desperate? If you want an answer to that question, go to any peasant proprietary you like. Go to Andorra or Brabant, to the most up-to-date or to the most belated of such districts, only go to a district where most of the families own. Ask a few of those peasants to meet you, and take a vote upon the proposal that the politicians should control their farms. They would probably not vote, for they would think the proposal mad. They would not be very far from the truth; for the unreal and inhuman things of the academies when they attempt to translate themselves into ordinary life are just that. They are mad.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

V.—THE NURSE

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

It is a striking proof that the mainspring of woman's nature is not self-interest, that, though the nursing of the sick is one of the most arduous of occupations, calling for long hours of labour and a heavy mental and physical strain, the number of those anxious to enter the profession are annually on the increase. And this in face of the fact that the wages earned during the period of training are less than those of a domestic servant, while the work is infinitely harder. The profession of nurse is a comparatively new one. Sixty years ago Sairey Gamp reigned supreme in the sick-room, and the unfortunate patients in the hospitals knew not the relief of any of the alleviations of modern science, practised by the efficient and deft-fingered sisters of the ward.

It is difficult to understand the storm of protest raised against the notion of lady nurses at the time of the Crimean War. Our soldiers were dying like flies of typhoid at the front, with only the rudest appliances for medical and surgical treatment, and the roughest and most elementary attention. The genius of Florence Nightingale effected a sweeping change in hospital equipment, and, in the teeth of the strongest opposition, she organised a band of women, who proved the pioneers of the army of nurses of the present day.

One gets a glimpse of the comfort and the healing Miss Nightingale brought to the poor fellows at the front in the name given to her by the sick soldiers—a name that, handed down these sixty years, conjures up in a flash a picture of the long wards, with row upon row of narrow beds, each with its tossing, often delirious, occupant. "The Lady with the Lamp" the sick men called her, and well might sleepless eyes brighten at the glimmer of the light that heralded the quiet figure with the gentle face and ministering hands.

The time of training in the big London hospitals is between three and four years, according to the class of work in which the nurse specialises. The applicant seeking entrance as probationer must pass a medical examination before she is enrolled on the hospital books. Only the pick of womanhood are accepted, and the earliest age for admission is from twenty to twenty-two. The first six months the probationer is on trial. If during that period she shows herself unequal to the task, fails in health, or exhibits incapacity, she is told she has made a mistake in her vocation, and must seek other work.

The hours are very long. In the smaller hospitals the probationer is on duty for twelve hours out of the twenty-four, with intervals for meals; and, though the periods of duty are divided by two hours of rest, the strain on mind and body is considerable. The number of miles that in the course of a week the probationer covers in her journeys up and down the ward would prove astonishing; but the urgent calls of "Nurse," with manifold requests from the occupants of the beds, do not leave time for the consideration of distance or fatigue.

The probationer's duties include the cleaning of brasses, bathroom taps, etc., the dusting of the lockers and the bed-rails in the wards, and the removing of every speck of dust from the furniture generally. The "polishing" completed, the patients have to be washed and dressed, beds made, breakfasts served, and medicine administered, so that everything is in readiness for the early morning visit of the doctor. The first months of training contain little but routine work. Bandages have to be rolled, surgical needles and instruments must be kept polished, and every utensil used in the operating theatre subjected to a severe antiseptic treatment. Later, she learns to dress wounds, bandage an injured limb, a broken head, etc., and is initiated into the application of fomentations and the taking of temperatures and respiration.

A nurse's first operation is an experience not easily forgotten. Unless her nerves are of the strongest, she inevitably feels the tension, and slips off into unconsciousness at the sight of the knife. But the probationer who has to be carried fainting from the theatre becomes stronger after a while, and, as her nerve gets steadier, learns to acquire that readiness of resource and quickness of eye and hand that make her so invaluable an assistant to the operating surgeon. It falls to the lot of the nurse to get the patient ready for the surgeon, and often the last sight on which despairing eyes are set before they close in the waters of unconsciousness is her fresh, strong face that, under the white-frilled cap, smiles encouragement.

But it is at night when, sleepless from pain and the terrible distress of mind that accompanies severe bodily suffering, one most appreciates the nurse. Watchful and wakeful, from ward to ward she passes, noting any change of symptom in her charges, ready and efficient for whatever may arise. A nurse is on night duty for three months at a stretch, and at first the ordeal is a severe one; but so quickly does nature accommodate herself to changed conditions that after a while she feels the alteration little, learns to eat and drink and sleep at strange hours, and, under the stress of the alteration, finds her pulse has changed completely, so that its beat is strongest between twelve at night and five in the morning, the hours when, normally, vitality is at its lowest ebb!

The conditions in the workhouse infirmaries are even more stringent than in hospital. A girl is received at a younger age, and the health test is not so exacting. The work, however, is very heavy, including scrubbing and cleaning that does not fall to the lot of the ordinary probationer. The responsibilities are also more exacting; as a rule, infirmaries are under-staffed, with disastrous effects on the constitution of the nurses. Especially is this the case at night, when a girl in her twenties is often left in sole charge of over a hundred patients, distributed in different wards. Some of them are delirious, and liable at any moment to become dangerous; others are in need of incessant care; all of them subjects for watchfulness and regard. It is marvellous how soon a nurse acquires the habit of command even in the early stages of her training.

I know a young probationer who, attached to the staff of an infirmary, found herself faced one night by a raving lunatic. The patient, a huge, powerfully built navvy suffering from concussion of the brain, had suddenly gone mad, and ran after her down a long stone passage, brandishing a chair. The nurse was a slight, fair-haired creature, whom one would have suspected of tears on the slightest provocation. She never flinched, but ordered the Goliath back to bed in a tone one would have used to a refractory child. Like a lamb, he obeyed her, and she summoned assistance.

The salary of a probationer averages from £10 to £12 per year, rising to £24 in the course of her training. She is provided with the material for her print dresses, but has to provide aprons, cuffs, collars and caps, bonnet and cloak out of her slender wages. Her washing is a considerable item, as a nurse must invariably be the perfection of neatness, and it is only in the large hospitals that a laundry is attached. Early in her training she decides if she will specialise in surgical or medical work, and studies accordingly. Examinations are held periodically, which, before she can receive her certificate, she must pass.

Once the nurse has completed her training she is free to practise her profession privately or in a public institution. Some remain on the staff of the hospital to which they are attached, and gradually rise to the position of a ward sister. This, however, only applies to certain of the big hospitals, the regulation varying in each case; others seek an appointment as matron of an infirmary or provincial institution. The large majority, however, go into private life. If they are skilled in surgical, mental, or cancer work, and have influence among the medical profession, they speedily get together a connection, and earn a good income. Their fees average from two to three guineas a week, with an allowance for laundry, and this does not include presents from grateful and appreciative patients.

The ordinary nurse, however, is not so fortunate. With no capital, and but little influence, she goes to an institution where she receives board, lodging, and uniform, and, when she is at work, the munificent sum of 10s. weekly, the institution taking the balance of her fees. During her periods of unemployment she is afforded a home; but, if she is skilful, she is likely to be much in request, and the profit made out of her is a large one.

Of late years co-operative associations have been started, the members of which contribute a percentage of their earnings, which go to the upkeep of a nursing agency. By this means they get in touch with the most profitable kind of work, and, if a nurse knows her business, she is likely to do well out of the arrangement.

Of all professions the nurse comes most closely into contact with the largest number of diverse types; as a rule, she will tell you that men make the worst patients, not from lack of endurance, but from the masculine dislike of inactivity. They chafe against their weakness and rebel at enforced periods of bed. They are more helpful than women, as a rule, however; more chary of giving trouble; and, when it comes to pain, are infinitely grateful for the commiseration women patients exact as a matter of course. Occasionally the masculine sense of chivalry becomes embarrassing, as in the case of a patient who, suffering from acute bronchitis, insisted on getting out of bed to open the door every time the nurse had to leave the sick room.

The most interesting branch of the profession is the Army Nursing Corps. The salaries are good, and free quarters and rations are provided to those attached to the staff. A pension is granted after a certain number of years' service, and the conditions generally are less arduous than those of the ordinary nurse. Only a small number attain this Mecca of the profession, and the majority of nurses, unless they can save out of their earnings, find themselves at sixty years with nothing to fall back upon. There are, however, certain funds connected with nursing associations into which the members pay, but the subscriptions have to extend over many years before a pension can be granted, and only a small percentage can afford to make the necessary sacrifices.

On the whole, and despite the long hours, a nurse's happiest days are spent at the hospital. Patients learn to regard her with enthusiasm and respect, and, if she is one of those natures that combine swift pity with steady self-control, there are no limits to the devotion she inspires. Long after they have come out of hospital, patients will write to her, sometimes from the other side of the world, as in the case of soldiers and sailors, who send grateful letters to the women who tended them in long and painful illnesses. Especially is this the case in regard to the district nurse in country villages. Known to everyone for miles round, she is the confidant of all their troubles and their hopes, and gives them good counsel as well as unflinching devotion. Epidemics do not frighten her. She keeps her head under the most trying circumstances, and, as a rule, thinks of herself last.

To the children nurse is a fairy godmother, and it is a wonderful sight to watch the small, thin faces of the little ones light up at the approach of their favourite. In the poorer districts a sojourn in hospital means to the child a period of delight. For young minds have the merciful capacity of forgetting suffering, and, when the worst pain is over and the period of convalescence is begun, the bright, cheerful ward, the good food provided, the innumerable books and toys, above all, the pretty nurses who spoil them, leave an impression on the small child not easily forgotten.

A maternity nurse completes her training in a much shorter period, but she has to pay for admission into lying-in hospitals, where she is taught her profession. Her fees average from ten to twelve guineas for the month, exclusive of board, lodging, and laundry. She earns every penny of this sum, and, for the most part, gets but little regular sleep or rest for the period she is engaged. It is wonderful, remembering the hundreds of cases the maternity nurse undertakes, the innumerable babies that pass through her hands, that she retains unspoiled the ready flow of human sympathy that is woman's chiefest attribute. Lavish of trouble, considerate only of her patient's welfare, and the care of the little child she has helped to bring into the world, at no time are the highest qualities of a nurse better exhibited. With interest unabated by years of experience, she studies the idiosyncrasies of every infant, prescribes the food most suitable for its constitution, learns its temper, studies its tricks and manners, and, most wonderful of all, preserves a separate niche in her affections for each one of them.

And, as at the beginning, so at the end of life, when hope is over, the doctors have gone away, and the house is hushed—for the angel of death is at the threshold—the courage of the nurse never falters, nor does her devotion fail. She makes smooth the last dread passage, easing the way; her voice comforts; her word consoles; her eyes, wise with the knowledge of human love and human suffering, soften with a divine commiseration; her tender hands ministering unto the very threshold of the valley of the shadow.

For compassion is the rarest and most precious jewel in the crown of womanhood; and nowhere does it burn so brightly and with so pure a flame as in the nurse.

LIFE IN A LONDON BASTILLE * * * BY THOMAS HOLMES PART II.

"YES," she continued, "they lie in our little rooms till the funeral; there is a dead man in the floor beneath us at the present time." I hastened to change the subject. "I think it is four years since I last visited you; were you not then living at the other end of this corridor?" "Ah! we had to leave there in a hurry. The roof gave way during a storm and we were flooded out; it happened in the night, too. These rooms were empty, so we moved here during the night." "Do you prefer these rooms?" "Well, we like them better now, but they were so verminous that we were worried night and day. The children could get no sleep. Their room was the worst of all, but the sanitary man came and stripped the walls, and we manage to keep them under now."

"What rent do you pay?" "Five and sixpence rent and twopence weekly for cleaning the corridors; they don't clean them very often."

"Tell me," I said, "do the tradesmen call for orders and deliver goods in these buildings; does the butcher's boy, the baker's boy, or the milkman ever pay a visit here? How do you get your coals up? Who carries them?"

"No tradesmen of any sort or description; no one but the undertaker ever comes near us, but once a week, on Mondays, a coal trolley comes into the courtyard, when we go down to buy our bits of coal. If I buy half a hundredweight the man carries it up and charges a halfpenny, and he earns it, too; if I buy fourteen pounds I carry it up myself. The coalman is the only tradesman that comes up, and, as I have said, he comes up for an extra halfpenny. There are not many half hundreds of coal sold here, mostly it is fourteen pounds. Why, when I buy half a hundredweight and follow the man up, the people are all jealous and say I am an aristocrat!"

"But," I repeated, "do not canvassers call on you and press you to buy sewing machines or furniture on the hire system?" "The only canvasser that calls here is the life assurance man; he collects a lot of money here, and he pays a good deal back again, for the doctor says this is a 'veritable death-trap.' We should miss the collector if he stopped calling, for every time there is a death here he is sure to call at every door and insure more of us."

"What milk do you use?" "Skimmed condensed, two tins a week." "Your children bring up the bread, etc., I suppose?" "Why, yes, for neither father nor myself can go down very often, for getting up again is hard work."

"You have some queer neighbours, I expect!" "You're right. There are all sorts here—widows, couples married and unmarried, men out of work and women working for them, women with sick husbands, and women without husbands, old people waiting to die, little ones waiting to be born. Oh, there's a rare mix up in these buildings; when you once get in you can't get out again, till you die!"

"Good gracious! What do you mean by that?" "Why, we are all poor people, and the agent, if we have any goods, lets us get behind with our rent. I owe more than £3, and though I paid one shilling off last week, I shall never be able to pay the lot. So here we must stop, for we cannot move our things while we owe rent; that's what keeps most of us here. We have been here for five years; when we came I never thought we should stop five weeks."

"What has become of the blind matchbox-maker and his wife?" "They are gone from these buildings; he died, and she had got him insured for a big lump, so she paid up and cleared out."

"I remember a boy and girl of yours that I saw four years ago, both clever at school; what has become of them?" "They are with us now. My daughter is eighteen years, and sleeps in that little room with her sister and our three youngest boys. Father and myself sleep in the other little room, and the boy you are enquiring about sleeps along with another boy in this room, where we live and work."

"I make up a bed for them on the floor. He had a fine fright the other morning. We live next to the roof, and that is flat, so that anyone can get on to it. We heard a lot of noise and blows and quarrelling above us during the night, but as we are used to such things, we took no notice, and slept as well as we could. Jimmy always has to get up first, and when he went out to the tap he found a woman standing by it all covered with blood. She had been cut about the neck with a knife. He ran back and told us, but when we got up she was going slowly down the stairs, leaving spots of blood and bloody hand-marks where she had rested on the walls. We never enquired about her. Many a fight takes place in these corridors. You see, the iron gates are never closed, for the people who live here come home at all hours."

"I daresay you have noticed that none of the different entrances have doors; they are all open, and the gas is out at half-past ten. Sometimes strangers come and sleep in the passages outside our room doors; sometimes they go on the roof, where there is an open washhouse that anyone can use; occasionally there are fights between strangers and some of our people, but generally the disturbance is amongst our own neighbours. I often hear men swearing, women screaming, and children crying in the early hours of the morning."

"Sometimes the police are present, but not often, for they do not like to interfere with us. Oh, it is so horrible! I wish we could get out. What will become of our children?"

"Tell a little more," I said. "Who does the laundry work for the many hundreds who live in this place?" "Laundry work!" she scoffed. "Laundry work!—beautiful laundry work for us! Why, we do it ourselves when it is done—wash in our own rooms, dry in our own rooms, iron in our own rooms. What else can we do? Come upon the roof, and I will show you the washhouse!" We stood upon the roof of the city of woe, whose walls stood four square, whose gates were ever open night and day. Down below in the mist we could see the broken courtyard; on every hand interminable narrow streets of back-to-back little houses, ugly and monotonous; thousands of earthenware chimney-pots ugly and grey belching forth their blighting smuts; an endless array of miserable backyards with their rags and rubbish. We stood and looked at all these and many similar things, and then at the washhouse!

There being no door to dispute our entrance, we walked in. Not a single cinder was to be seen. The four rusty coppers had been innocent of boiling water and soap for ages. No wind-flapped clothing had been given sweetness and health upon that melancholy roof for years past, if ever.

For there was no convenience for laundry work saving only the four rusty furnaces; but there was the everlasting "shoot," into whose capacious maw, down whose elongated throat the refuse from the copper fires might be precipitated—and the iron mouth of the "shoot" was grim and rusty.

"I suppose you never do your washing up here?" "I have washed things here but once. I have never known anyone else use it. We cannot afford the necessary coal, and if we could we would have to carry it up or pay extra. People from below won't come up here to wash, and those that are on top cannot carry up coal, etc.; so those of us who do any washing, do it in our own rooms."

(To be continued.)

LITERARY NOTES

THE Livingstone centenary recalls the fact that the great explorer and missionary wrote three books—"Missionary Travels" (1857); "The Zambesi and its Tributaries" (1865); and his "Last Journals," published posthumously in 1874. Sir Harry Johnston, who knows more about Africa than any man living, says that Livingstone's books are a mine of information to the student of Africa. We may take it so; but I hardly think Sir Harry would say that Livingstone's narratives make fascinating reading. Their literary workmanship is decidedly poor.

Livingstone had neither the time nor the patience necessary for good writing. He was wont to say that he would rather cross Africa than write a book. The "Missionary Travels," which gives a full account of his wonderful journeys in the years 1849-1856, in the course of which he crossed the continent from west to east, is carelessly put together, and shows clearly that the writer did not make the most of his unique materials. But, despite its poor literary quality, it met with remarkable success, for people were as eager then as now to hear of the experiences of an intrepid traveller in an unknown region of the world.

"The Zambesi and its Tributaries," which narrates the history of the second Zambesi expedition and ruthlessly exposes the Portuguese slave trade, was really a joint literary concern. Livingstone's brother, Charles, who accompanied the expedition, wrote a full diary, which was largely drawn upon in writing the book. But, as might be expected, the arrangement led to muddling. Each forgot that the work was a joint concern, with the result that there was overlapping and an utter lack of unity. The book, it is interesting to add, was written at Newstead Abbey, so intimately associated with the career of Byron. Here, as the guest of his friend and companion, Mr. Webb, Livingstone spent eight of the happiest months of his life.

Livingstone's "Last Journals," which was edited by his friend, the Rev. Horace Waller, with the assistance of Susi and Chuma, is in many respects the most interesting of the three books. It is an eminently human document, and reveals, as neither of the two earlier books do, Livingstone the man. The work consists largely of jottings, so brief and fragmentary in some places as to be almost unintelligible; but how moving they are, and what a tale of fortitude and dauntless courage do they unfold! The two books published during the explorer's lifetime sold extremely well, and Livingstone was also very fortunate in his publisher, Mr. John Murray, from whom he received £12,000 for the two works—a sum which meant a great deal more in those days than now.

My recent remarks on poetry as a marketable commodity has brought me an interesting paragraph, from which I learn that Mr. Alfred Noyes's visit to America was heralded by the announcement that he was the only man now living who relied upon verse-writing for a livelihood. Interviewed on the subject, Mr. Noyes confessed that he made a living out of verse, and added that he had not found it very difficult. This is a remarkable statement, and I suspect that many less fortunate versifiers will be trying to find out how it is done.

Sir Hugh Clifford has surely hit upon a very unattractive title for his new novel, which Mr. Murray is bringing out shortly. The book is to be called "Malayan Monochromes." Evidently the scene is laid in the Malay Peninsula, of the native life of which the author has already written so delightfully in his "In Court and Kampong." Sir Hugh is also the author of "Further India," a first-rate book for those who wish to know what has been done in the way of exploring Burma, Malaya, Siam, and Indo-China.

Some weeks ago I referred to a history of Parliamentary oratory which might shortly be expected. The writer is Dr. Robert Craig, of Edinburgh, a well-known Congregational minister. The volume, which will be entitled "Seven Centuries of Parliamentary Oratory," will contain not only selections from representative and epoch-making speeches, but a narrative of the circumstances which gave rise to them. It will also set forth the outstanding incidents in the careers of the various orators dealt with. This is a work which was worth undertaking. If it is well done, the book ought to be of exceptional interest, apart altogether from the subject, for it breaks new ground. Dr. Craig has been engaged on the volume for several years.

I cannot understand why the approaching sale of the Browning love-letters should meet with so much opposition. There is no question of the violation of a sacred trust or of the revealing of the tenderest feelings of the poet for the gratification of vulgar curiosity, for the letters are already printed, and he who runs may read. The copyright is not in the market, and it would not matter much if it were so far as publicity is concerned. The present commotion has simply to do with the comparatively insignificant point as to whether the paper on which the letters are written should pass from one owner to another.

The disaster to Dr. Mawson's South Pole expedition has brought into prominence the island of Macquarie, where the wireless message was received. This desolate island was the scene of a thrilling shipwreck some years ago, the story of which has been told by Mr. Inches Thomson in his book "Voyages and Wanderings in Far-off Seas and Lands." For some weeks the crew were without news of the outer world, and had to endure the rigours of the climate with few of the comforts of civilised life.

X. Y. Z.

BISHOP GORE * * * BY E. HERMANN

I.

THE man in the street, with his constitutional inability to see more than one thing at a time, does not quite know what to make of Bishop Gore. Here is a man—a "parson," too—who shows a refreshing absence of "other-worldliness," and occupies himself, not only unashamedly, but even passionately, with the problems affecting man's life here and now. Hear him crash into the sterile conventionality and heartless respectability of the Church! Hear him fulminate against the black injustice of a social system based upon selfishness and greed! If the man in the street be a Socialist, he will applaud himself hoarse; if he be anti-Socialist, he will groan himself tired. Whatever be his convictions, he will admit that this Bishop is a man any way—a brainy, fearless, open-eyed citizen of the modern world. "Christ not a social reformer?" he asks indignantly. "Why, He founded the Church, the brotherhood! If you say to me, 'I don't want to go mixing myself up with your dirty politics, I want to follow pure religion,' I say to you, 'Go and do it!' That is the most revolutionary thing you can do. People will not call it social reform, but something a great deal worse. It is the most revolutionary thing you can do; it is what has turned the world upside down!" Like them or not, these are the words of a man; and your man in the street, who has hitherto connected the episcopal mitre with effeminacy, will cheer to the echo.

II.

But what is this? A Good Friday service at St. Paul's—a three-hours' service, too—and a thin, ascetic-looking man in the pulpit, fixing dreamy eyes upon the wall opposite and speaking of such strange, remote, old-world things as contrition, repentance, conversion, prayer, meditation, mortification of self, preparation for death. What mediævalism is this? The man in the street, who may have strayed into the Cathedral from sheer curiosity, or who reads the report of the service in next morning's paper, shrugs his shoulders. And the preacher is Charles Gore, most bold, enlightened and progressive of bishops; higher critic, liberal thinker, and social reformer. And he speaks of these strange religious dogmas and practices as if they were tremendously real, supremely important to him. The dreamy eyes open suddenly with a keen directness that surprises. They fill with a light which the casual and curious hearer cannot fathom. What is it that makes this hearer fidget in his seat? It may be the unwonted religious phraseology. It may be the length of the discourse. It certainly is the unaccustomed contact with that mysterious something we call the spiritual life.

III.

The thing that makes this casual hearer of ours so uncomfortable in listening to Bishop Gore at St. Paul's may be called by various names. "Vocation" is perhaps the best of them. One cannot be with the Bishop for long without becoming aware of a certain aloofness and detachment of soul—not the odi-profanum-vulgus attitude of the amateur adept, but the humble "withdrawnness" of one whom, not his spiritual arrogance, but the call of God has snatched from the sunny meadows of life into the wilderness where beasts and angels keep the sons of God mysterious company. There is a sense of dedication, of priesthood; an impassable discretion and an invincible spiritual virtue about this virile ascetic. One is irresistibly reminded of certain passages in Pater's

"Marius," where we read how "the first early boyish ideal of dedication" survived in Marius "when all thoughts of such vocations had finally passed from him," and how it "made him revolt with unflinching instinct from the bare thought of any excess." Or one might recall the beautiful words in the same book which record the impression made upon Marius by his Christian companion, in whom he recognised "an austere and grave kind of beauty, a peculiar severity, something far more than the expression of military hardness, . . . some inward standard of distinction, selection, refusal, amid the various elements of the fervid, corrupt life across which they were moving."

IV.

As a boy of fifteen, Charles Gore heard a sermon by Dr. Westcott on the need for a revival of community life. His boyish soul leapt up to the preacher's words as the wave leaps up to the oar, and in that hour the Community of the Resurrection at Mirfield was born in the mind of the boy-priest. The community ideal remains with the Bishop to this day, and it must be admitted that he is a natural ascetic, to whom surrender is not as hard as to some, and who sits lightly to even the simplest amenities of life. One imagines his happiest days were spent at Mirfield, where a severe rule proved a well-fitting yoke that made easy work of life's burdens. It is significant that when he was transferred to Westminster he brought the Mirfield atmosphere with him, living a simple, religious, community life in his small rooms in the Cloisters, which he shared with two or three like-minded priests. His asceticism is of that convincingly authentic type which silences all sneers. There is nothing petty or sentimental about it. He has made the great Choice, and that implies many small refusals. That is only common sense. If a man wants to be Prime Minister, he cannot at the same time be the beadle of Mudborough, or frequent the Back Kitchen Club of a night—these joys must be surrendered if he really means Downing Street. So Charles Gore frankly tells us that, while the type of Christianity which counts all things lawful may be most truly Christian, the type which counts all things expedient is not only inferior Paganism, but utter, mindless nonsense.

V.

And what has all this to do with Bishop Gore's broad influence as a social force—for it is as a social force that he will be remembered. Much every way. The dream in his eyes, the mingled humility and dignity of his pose, the simplicity and sincerity of his speech, the single-minded desire to convince, the intense, yet entirely unarrogant, certainty of the truth of what he says—it is these, and the deeper qualities they symbolise, which put the hall-mark upon his social efforts. And they were not learnt on any platform; they were learnt in the way of inward purgation and spiritual crucifixion. He has no platform tricks, is never tempted to substitute effectiveness for truth, has never grasped at power or influence. He confesses that he is responsible for his brother; he denies that he is responsible for him to either the crowd or the aristocracy of intellect and progress. His Socialism is founded neither upon materialistic considerations nor upon gracious human sentiment. It is founded upon God's presence with man. He would say, "It is founded upon the Incarnation." That sounds uncomfortably theological and mystical, and is most uncomfortably practical.

RT. REV. CHARLES GORE, NATUS 1853

THE GREEK DRAMA

PROF. J. S. PHILLIMORE

BY

I.—ÆSCHYLUS

Thence what the lofty, grave tragedians taught
 In chorus or iambic, teachers best
 Of moral prudence, with delight received,
 In brief sententious precepts, while they treat
 Of fate, and chance, and change in human life,
 High actions and high passions best describing.

Paradise Regained, Book IV.

I.

NO finer and more concise description has ever been given of Greek tragedy than these famous lines of Milton. But before commencing even the briefest account of what that tragedy was, it is good for Everyman to remember two things in season and out of season. If we assert the name of Greece with a persistency of iteration which sometimes irritates those who claim to have tapped the same stream lower down in its course, where access is easier and equal refreshment (they say) more cheaply gained, that is because the Greeks not only produced individual works of unequalled beauty in the arts and sciences (and they never made the blunder of dividing these too sharply), but because they have taught all the world all the forms.

To learn even one language is a glorious charter of intellectual expansion. But to make a language which abides as a perpetual model, and a perpetual guarantee against the shrinkage of thought in the weaker seasons of humanity! That is what the Greeks did. Each in turn, the Romans, and we their heirs, the moderns, have measured our resources of speech by the Greek measure, and (by the healthy, developing discipline of translation and imitation) stretched the capacity and expressiveness of our vernaculars. Look at any language before and after the period at which it had scholars who were able to judge it by the pattern of Greek—English before and after Sir Thomas More, for example.

II.

Mankind are divinely moved to express themselves. In many mediums, or codes, or conventions they strive continually to effect a release of desire, curiosity, and passion. Inarticulate man is man in pain. His highest happiness is to set up transmitters and receivers for superhuman communications. Each mastery achieved in stone or metal or paint is a victory for the human race; but the greatest of all such victories is the discovery of a new literary form. Can we ever speak too highly of the nation which discovered practically all the literary forms in which man has spoken to God or to man ever since? Yet this is the truth. Epic, drama, history, dialogue, treatise, essay, novel, etc., etc.; go where you will, the Greeks have been there before you. We moderns have but developed or modified their originals; at best we can boast a few lucky hybrids.

To invent any one mould into which posterity can pour its own metal, and give it thereby that consistency or truth or significance which is called style, is an immense service; but is not the greatest of all such inventions, the Dramatic Form? Tragedy is the noblest thing in written art, said Schopenhauer, as Architecture is the noblest of arts, as Portrait-painting is the masterpiece of Painting.

III.

After a brief but incredibly glorious career at Athens (which the next two papers will sketch), it passed from flower to fruit, from fruit to seed. It was silent for many centuries, until the ancient voices began to be heard again in the tumult of the Renaissance; since then, never silent, it has voiced "the wits that dived most deep and soared most high" in almost every European language. But Shakespeare, Corneille, Calderon, and all the rest are heirs of Æschylus. How can I even indicate in this little space all that Aristotle meant by saying, in one of his perfect sentences, that "after many changes Tragedy realised its perfect nature and ceased"? Recent research (with the intellectual indolence which belongs to the antiquarian habit) has especially studied to inquire into the archaic penumbra from which Tragedy steps forth into the light of History and of Art. Such inquiries serve no literary purpose. Higher criticism of the Bible helps no man to a better enjoyment of "Paradise Lost"; and this antiquarian curiosity tends to slight and neglect the finished masterpiece, and (worst of all) the miraculous personality of the Master, in whose hands the brute matter is transformed.

IV.

Everyman will not blame me if I pass by all questions whether the raw material of Drama had to do essentially with Dionysius or with a Cultus of heroic dead, and where it came from; and, sparing to add any more spokes to Thespis's waggon, spend my remaining space on the first poet whose name stands for ever in Everyman's eye—Æschylus.

Make-believe is instinctive to all men, and on Make-believe (mimēsis) Greek criticism founded Drama. But it was from the earliest masterpiece in Make-believe, the Homeric epic, that Æschylus got the form into which he melted all that rude religious material. "Scraps from the great banquet of Homer," was his phrase. And to think of him rightly we must think of him as capturing, not developing, what was there before. He captures the rudimentary form, which he means to make the vehicle for conveying the Matter of Troy, or the Theban Matter, to city folks, and no longer to feudal lords in their castles. He will have the Drama come into existence in order to be the burghers' epic. And to make the new form possible, he has one supremely new idea—Dialogue. To bring on two actors, as Æschylus did, was a revolution; to increase them to three, as Sophocles did, was merely a development. Two actors and the chorus give that minimum triangle of human interest that constitutes Drama. That is why we may neglect Chœrilus, Pratinas, and Phrynicius: Æschylus is the father of what we mean by a PLAY. He first saw that for the city people, for Everyman, the great national legends must no longer be unrolled, as it were, in some endless figured tapestry, but the select crises, the moments in which a master's instinct now first detected some peculiar virtue, yet unnamed, but which we have learned to call Dramatic quality—these were to be displayed, not in plane surface, but as statuary groups. Æschylus's discovery was the third dimension of language.

V.

In Epic all is told by one voice, though the poet or minstrel may from time to time speak in the person of one or another character; henceforth you shall see and hear two persons face to face. The great idea of Drama is there: conflict—conflict and a looker-on, who is the Chorus—between any two irreducible forces, whether of character, or situation (i.e., Fate), or moral duty. Natural artistry taught him other things, too, which criticism afterwards formulated into rule, but which to him were but the rule of his own master-thumb. One thing his temperament prescribed: he would have grandeur in all; a great diction, transposing the noble music of Homer into a new key; great subjects alone he esteemed fit for treatment; and he added whatever greatness of effect might further be got from stagecraft and richness of mounting. What else would you expect of the poet whom a Milton and a Shelley salute and obey as their master? What does it matter, then, to us what poor mummeries those may have been which he took and transformed into something which, alike by spectacular dignity and by the ennobled expressiveness of music and verse, raised his audience into a sort of trance, and held them on high, spellbound, until the play was over; and they dispersed homewards, a little bewildered, but still vibrating with the recollection of grave melodies and sobered by contemplating in an Action awful forces of destiny and personality?

The unfailing majesty is what astonishes us in Æschylus. An English reader can see something of it behind the wilful uncouthness of Browning's "Agamemnon," far more in the "Agamemnon" of Edward Fitzgerald, who combined in himself the talents of creative artist and of critic to such a rare degree. His generous verse interprets the loftiness of that spirit which breathed no meaner air than the sanctuary and the battlefield, the nursling of Demeter, the soldier of Marathon.

VI.

Of his eighty pieces only seven survive, noble ruins of a vast architecture; yet "Prometheus Bound" seems no fragment, nor do "The Suppliant Women," . . . until we see in the Oresteian trilogy what was the true Æschylean scale. Did ever any poet, even Milton or Dante themselves, know so well how to leave out everything that detracts or diminishes? It is not merely pomp and stiling and the "grand style," for the "Chœphori" contains as frank and homely a bit of realism (the Nurse's speech) as you can find in all Greek. It is an Olympian stature of spirit, "dowered with the love of love, the hate of hate, the scorn of scorn," conceiving nothing common nor mean, and able to give to the gigantic passions of a Clytæmnestra their adequate volume and noise of language, and superb natural luxuriance of imagery. True his earlier drama is half-clouded in the sunrise vapours of lyricism; and in the "Suppliants" (perhaps written before the Persian War) we feel that this younger brother of the Dithyramb and the Pindaric Ode has not fully achieved its independence. Even in the "Oresteia" itself, perfect as the play is for dramatic force, there is yet much that is outside the eventual canons of drama. Judge the "Agamemnon" by modern rule, and you have that monument of anachronistic ingenuity, petty acuteness, and blindness in the large,—Verrall's "Agamemnon." The "Agamemnon" and its two satellite plays are an example what the old lion could do when, piqued by a defeat at the hands of Sophocles, he put forth his strength and availed himself of his young rival's improvements in the craft. One might still maintain without paradox that the "Agamemnon" is the greatest tragedy ever written. Can even Lady Macbeth vie in diabolical grandeur with Æschylus's Clytæmnestra? From Clytæmnestra to Antigone is the measure of the difference between Æschylus and Sophocles.

THE CALL OF THE CITIZEN

By LADY FRANCES BALFOUR

THESE are not times when it is easy to review with an unbiased mind the position of women at home and abroad. If we are to consider it from the academic point of view, we must for the time being shut our ears to the storm of words in the Press, and we must close our eyes to the ugly sights and sounds provided for us by those who strive and contend throughout the land.

No one in these days likes to think of the part played by the "citoyennes" of the French Revolution, when "the red fool fury of the Seine" was breaking through the old order. The citizen women who went to their doom with the traditional courage of their race remains the picture on which we prefer to look. It was, however, the women of the people who suffered from feudal oppression, whose appreciation of patriotic rights was daily sharpened by the pangs of hunger, and by the deeper suffering of knowing themselves the victims of a condition of things where justice was never on the side of the weak.

All revolutionary periods produce a reign of terror, and though to-day no scaffold stands on Tower Hill, the headsman of popular opinion is always standing ready to execute the mandates of the mob. For a little, one would step aside from the violence of the movement, and look at the sources of this swift stream of feeling, flowing not only in Great Britain, but rising also as a flood in the lands where Anglo-Saxons rule, and where the hardy northmen still send out a strong race to colonise many lands. Neither is the movement absent in the East. Nowhere, under any form of civilisation, is it found that women are content with the position which has placed them lowest in the social scale, and denied them the possession of immortal souls, or of the immemorial rights of citizens of a free country.

If we contrast the condition of the average male citizen with that of his ancestors only two generations back, we find him a different personality, and we recognise that he has been largely changed by the increase of all those things we put under the head of civilisation. His temporal wants have been stimulated and supplied by the growth of industry, and the cheap production of what would have been considered undreamt-of luxuries in the days of his fathers. The science of living has been brought, by the spread of education, into the knowledge of the common people. The pestilence that walketh in darkness is no longer viewed as the dispensation of a revengeful Deity, and much occult science has come into the homes of the country.

Women have not been left outside. The gates of learning have been opened to them, and they have been treated as beings capable of using the knowledge which has been lavished on the community at large.

All this is not logical. If women are incapable of managing their own concerns or those of others, there should have been Salic law in the land, and they should have been excluded from the Education Act; they should not have been protected by the factory and mining legislation, and their position as the mothers and housewives should have been controlled and regulated by statute. The reverse state of things has been the policy of the nineteenth century. Their individual claim on citizenship has been recognised. Their education has been co-equal with the men of the State. They have been admitted to professional life, and their services in political organisation have been widely sought after. If anyone asks to-day what is the difference between the male and female population of these islands, the answer is one which shows the artificial conditions created in order to excuse the denial of the rights of representation to the female citizen.

Let us define the two conditions. The male has seventeen different qualifications for the Parliamentary vote. His education counts for nothing, as by special Act his lack of the most elementary knowledge does not debar him from his position of a free man of the country. It is not his education, nor his fitness for military service, which bestows on him the full rights of citizenship. The woman is co-equal with him in bearing the burden of taxation; if she breaks the law she stands as an offending citizen at the bar of justice. It is only when the responsibilities and privileges of democracy are claimed by that half of the people who have been disqualified because of sex that she is met with the direct negative from those who claim that the will of the people as a whole must be the force which governs this country.

When the Speaker's ruling pronounced that the admission of the woman voter would so alter the Manhood Suffrage Bill proposed by the Government that it would no longer be the measure accepted by Parliament, the new position had to be faced. The Prime Minister said there were only two courses—to give facilities for another private member's Bill, or to remodel the Franchise Bill proposed by the Government so as to include those who had been promised a full discussion and a free vote on their claim to the franchise. Other reform proposals had been revolutionised and changed; but in this case the words of the Prime Minister were clear: "That the Government will not do."

The pure negative is the only way in which a Government refusing this franchise can answer the claim. The advance of the feminist movement has been such that position after position has been captured, and the last line of defence is alone left in the hands of the Turk in the East and in the hands of the Cabinet of the greatest Empire in the West. There is, however, only a temporary check in the advance of this portion of the democracy. "Government for the people, of the people, by the people," is an old saw. Democracy may be a curse or a blessing, but it has come home to roost. We have taught our people to be proud of their country, their history, and their race. We have taught our women their place in the world, their double responsibility, for they are the mothers of the succeeding race: the bearers of the men who can and must defend their country, and from their homes will go forth the children who will increase and multiply upon the boundless lands which own the Motherland from across the seas. Daily is our legislation laying on them laws under which they are to work for, to rear, feed, and educate, their children. What is the note of all modern legislation? The value that the individual is in the eyes of the State. When one member suffers, then is the whole body sick. Overcrowding, disease, brothels and public-houses, workhouses and prisons must all be treated "on their merits."

Women are protected now from the slavery of organised vice. Children are to be reared with every chance and help a State can provide. And why does religion and our legislation aim at something higher and more ideal in each effort which it makes?

Gone are the days when the poor, the weak, and the helpless were the prey of the classes who kept power and influence in their own hands. The free estate of the human race, the worth of the individual to the State and to the circle in which he or she moves, is being recognised and claimed every day.

The woman has entered into her heritage as a responsible being. No longer, in the eye of the law, is she "the goods and chattel" of the man who owns or supports her. She has become the educated sharer in the life of the world, an entity, "the person" the law recognises, not only as a taxpayer, but as the individual citizen—one who has attained to the measure and stature of a free woman in a self-governing country.

Before it is too late the inherent justice of the demand must be recognised. "Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide." We stand at the threshold of a new era, charged with the fate of the race. Before every revolution in thought and constitution there has been the same heart-searching and trembling for fear of those things which are coming on the earth. India is bursting her barriers of Eastern prejudice and custom. The women of the East are gazing out from the watch-towers of their seclusion and sex oppression. The Western women are trying their wings, and hastening with swift feet along the careers which have been opened to them.

Women, in spite of all the legal impediments put in their way, are increasingly standing for these administrative councils to which they have been admitted. No one has questioned the industry and resource with which they take up the tasks to which they have been appointed by popular election.

As householders and housekeepers, and as mothers of families, they are by training experts on all that affects the daily life of the citizen. Who can assert their inability to judge of those measures proposed in Parliament which are to be administered by councillors, elected for their sex, because they know best the wants and aspirations of "half the people."

Every improvement in the condition of women has meant giving them fuller scope for the attributes and graces with which they were endowed by nature. Truly has it been said that it is not good for man to live alone. He needs all the help that the education of mind and body in the womanhood of to-day can bring to mate with the best that has been developed in his sphere of action. He will be wise in his day and generation if he accepts that help, no longer in the customs of primitive savagery, but in the spirit and temper of an age which is moving down the ringing grooves of change to the highest conception of the dignity and worth of the human race.

FROM BERMONDSEY

OH, to be free!

To lie for one short hour upon the breast

Of green hospitable fields,

And let the world go by!

To feel the kisses of the odoured wind,

To watch the happy heaven alive with song,

To press our faces to the healing grass,

And there sob out our weariness of towns,

And lose our souls in tangles of green shade!

For all our need

Is but to know that still the world is fair,

That still the little lanes are loud with joy,

That still the daisy smiles its prayer to God.

THOMAS BURKE.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

THOMAS CARLYLE'S "SARTOR RESARTUS" * BY HECTOR MACPHERSON

LITERATURE, like religion, tends to become conventional. Men of genius, by the boldness of their thoughts and the throbbing vitality of their utterances, lay captive average humanity, till by-and-by a halo of infallibility surrounds the memory of great men, and their opinions get fossilised in the shape of a creed. In the expressive phrase of Comte, the empire of the dead is always encroaching upon the empire of the living. In religion this excessive deference to the past takes the form of orthodoxy, and in literature, of Classicism. With its fondness for standards of taste and hard-and-fast dogmas, Classicism tends to repress the rugged individualism which belongs to genius. Thus it comes to pass that the early years of men of genius are years of struggle, if not for existence, at least for recognition. Thus it was with Thomas Carlyle. When he appeared in the world of literature he was viewed as a confusing and inexplicable element. To James Mill, for instance, Carlyle was an insane rhapsodist; while Jeffrey spoke of him as afflicted with a chronic craze for singularity. In a letter to Carlyle, Jeffrey on this point says: "I suppose you will treat me as something worse than an ass when I say that I am fairly persuaded the great source of your extravagance and all that makes your writings intolerable to many and ridiculous to not a few, is not so much any real peculiarity of opinion as an unlucky ambition to appear more original than you are." In the case of Carlyle, as in the case of Wordsworth, Jeffrey's devotion to Classicism prevented him from welcoming genius when it appeared in new and original forms. Jeffrey failed to recognise that the new wine of German Romanticism could not be put into the old bottles of French Classicism.

Happily, Carlyle, paying no heed to Jeffrey's remonstrances, followed the dictates of genius, which by-and-by was to find expression in his masterpiece, "Sartor Resartus." Readers who come to "Sartor Resartus" without acquaintance with Carlyle's earlier writings experience a kind of intellectual nightmare. They find themselves in a new world—a world of chaos, in which all kinds of uncouth ideas struggle for existence. And yet as he pursues his study of the book the reader begins to discover method in the author's madness. "Sartor Resartus" becomes intelligible when we recognise that in it are blended two very different elements—the Scottish and the German. A good idea of Carlyle is to be had if we imagine the spirit of a German philosopher occupying the body of a Scottish Covenanter. We get to the root ideas of "Sartor Resartus" when we trace the influence of German thought upon Carlyle's Scottish mind. In Carlyle's day two antagonistic conceptions of life and destiny were struggling for mastery—the theological and the materialistic. In his early student days Carlyle, who was designed for the Church, parted with the creed of his fathers. He seems, like George Eliot, to have abandoned his early beliefs without a struggle. His mental struggles began when, impelled by spiritual hunger, he sought for a creed to fill the place vacated by the old beliefs. From this point of view "Sartor Resartus" is the spiritual biography not only of Carlyle, but of a great multitude who, like him, were afflicted with the malady of thought, and in the conventional systems could find no intellectual anchorage. "Sartor Resartus" might be described as a modern "Pilgrim's Progress." Like Christian, Carlyle leaves behind him the City of Destruction (named in modern language Materialism) in quest of the Celestial City. Carlyle, unlike Christian, sees not the beatific vision; under the guidance of German philosophy he reaches a kind of transcendental Stoicism—a form of Ethical Idealism, bracing, but chilly.

Meanwhile let us trace the leading conceptions in "Sartor Resartus." Carlyle could not live long at what he calls the "Centre of Indifference." He must have a creed; where was it to be found? The frankly materialist theories of the French Revolution thinkers, like Holbach and Diderot, could find no echo in the soul of Carlyle. The materialistic theory, which reduces all things to matter and motion, appeared to Carlyle as it did to Goethe—"so grey, so Cimmerian and so dead that we shuddered at it as at a ghost." Deism, imported from France to Scotland, was equally distasteful. As a kind of theological half-way house, Deism suited the taste of the Edinburgh Whigs of Carlyle's day admirably. It enabled them, while preserving a polite reticence on the popular religion, to dismiss as visionary all transcendental speculations, and to do indirect homage to the materialistic conception of life. A Covenanter by temperament and training, Carlyle could find no satisfaction in the political millennial dreaming of the Edinburgh Whigs. He had the Calvinist tendency to lose himself in contemplation of the Infinite. Carlyle tore aside the veil of conventionality which the apostles of Deism had weaved round the nature of man. In the view of Carlyle, the human heart could not find satisfaction among the husks of Secularity. It craved for something higher than social and political progress, culminating in the drawing-room ideals of the Edinburgh Deists. Man, according to Carlyle, is satisfied with nothing less than the Infinite. In his attitude towards Nature and the Ultimate Reality, Carlyle was also at war with the Materialists and the Deists. Equally mechanical in spirit with Materialism was the Deistical conception of Nature as a colossal clock under the superintendence of a divine clockmaker, who saw that the clock kept good time and, in point of regularity, was absolutely reliable. Carlyle, with the Germans, approaches Nature from a totally different point. He reverses the method of the Materialists. With him the Universe is not a complex combination of atoms, but the expression of a spiritual principle. If man, the highest result of evolution, is in essence spirit, manifestly the Ultimate Reality must be spiritual. In "Sartor Resartus" Carlyle thus gives expression to his transcendental view of Nature: "Atheistic Science babbles poorly of it with scientific nomenclature, experiments, and what not, as it were a poor dead thing to be bottled in Leyden jars and sold over the counter; but the native soul of man in all times, if he will himself apply his sense, proclaims it to be a living thing—ah! an unspeakable, God-like thing, towards which the best attitude for us, after never so much science, is devout prostration and humility of soul, worship, if not in words, then in silence." Since his day science has come into harmony with "Sartor Resartus." When, as I have elsewhere said, Carlyle "speaks of the Universe as in very truth the star-domed city of God, and reminds us that, through every crystal and through every grass blade, but most through every living soul, the glory of a

* Everyman's Library. (J. M. Dent.)

HIDDEN POWER.

Remarkable Results follow Experiments of Clever Scientist. Marvels of the Mind.

Many serious writers view with alarm the tendency of the present day to disregard physical development, and prophesy that the future will bring forth a race of people whose motor muscles have disappeared and whose brain development is abnormal. Such a state of things, obviously, will not arise in the lifetime of this or the next generation; but the fact of such a possibility being seriously considered by the greatest authorities draws imperative attention to an insistent, undeniable fact—we are now turning from the age of Muscle to the age of Mind.

No advocate of any school of thought can afford to disregard the importance of physique in the formation of national character and destiny; but now the public recognise that physical culture is but the means to an end—the supreme efficiency and domination of the mind.

The lack of knowledge that has hitherto prevented mind-culture has been gradually and surely overcome, and it is now justifiably established that the mind can as surely be developed, strengthened, and made strong as can the physical organs.

Students of social questions are learning with delight of the widespread interest that all classes, both men and women, are taking in this important national question, and can discern the improvement in mental calibre that is taking place.

The Work of an Enthusiast.

One of the most enthusiastic advocates of mind culture at the present time is Mr. Frank Hartley, who founded the London Institute of Menti-Culture. Although originally founded as an experiment, the immediate success with which his system has met has made it necessary for Mr. Frank Hartley to give up all his research work to devote his whole time and energies to the Institute of Menti-Culture. In a recent interview with a Press representative, Mr. Hartley explained the scope of his menti-culture movement:—As is now well known, I have devoted the best years of my life to the study of psychology and mental efficiency, and the outstanding fact that burnt itself into my brain was the lamentable lack of self-knowledge among the masses. While carefully collecting and sifting scientific data concerning the particular qualities that have led well-known men and women to success and power many interesting facts were revealed. For instance, mere knowledge alone has achieved, and will achieve, little or nothing; that misleading colloquialism, luck, is merely the envious explanation applied by failure to success. No, the gift that has brought all successful careers to the pinnacle of success lies much deeper.

It is the hidden power to apply the right force to their everyday affairs in a manner which will surely place them in a position of superiority in all their dealings with their fellow-men. It is only now becoming realised that this power is latent in everyone, and, with correct training, can be developed to an extent which will bring immediate and gratifying results in every case.

How Mr. Hartley's Campaign Began.

As you know, I commenced my own campaign in Menti-Culture by adopting a bold course. At a cost of many hundreds of pounds, I have carried my message to thousands all over the world by means of a specially printed edition of my latest book, "How Failure Becomes Impossible." The public were quick to recognise the soundness of my teaching, with the result that the principles of Menti-Culture are being practised all over the country.

The practical results are discovered by the student from the very beginning, and the particular gains reported at once are: (1) Increased will power; (2) Concentration created and maintained; (3) Nervousness and self-consciousness overcome; (4) Power of correct observation and judgment, etc., etc.

It should be understood that my system, although yielding such priceless results to the student, does not entail any irksome restrictions or departure from everyday life. When revealed, it is astonishing in its simplicity.

There are, I am sure, still a great many readers who are interested in the subject of mind training, and to those who will take the trouble to write to me I will make a special concession. Upon request I will send not only my book, "How Failure Becomes Impossible," but also a lesson in Menti-Culture free. Those who wish to may enclose two penny stamps, for postage, etc., but in any case a mere request will bring the book and lesson. Simply write Mr. Frank Hartley, Room 72, London Institute of Menti-Culture, 35, Wellington Street, London, W.C.

present God still beams, he is simply saying in the language of poetry what Spencer says in the language of Science, that the world of phenomena is sustained and energised by an Infinite Eternal Power."

Out of Carlyle's conception of the Universe and man grew naturally his conception of the duty of man. If, as in "Sartor Resartus," man's highest religious duty is worship of the Spirit of the Universe, his highest ethical duty is submission to the laws of the Universe—an attitude which is expressed by the word Renunciation. Where are these laws to be found? Passing by the idea of special revelation, Carlyle finds the spiritual laws of Nature and life written in the Universe, the heart of man, and in the great panorama of history as shaped and moulded by great men. The hero, as the symbol and incarnation of the Divine, becomes in the Carlylean cult an object of admiration; and thus, under the influence of hero-worship, and not of cold, calculating self-interest of the utilitarian type, humanity presses forward on the path of the Ideal. How scathingly he deals with the gospels of Utilitarianism and Epicureanism! "Is the heroic inspiration we name Virtue but some passion, some bubble of the blood, bubbling in the direction others profit by? I know not—only this I know: if what thou namest Happiness be our true aim, then are we all astray. With stupidity and sound digestion man may front much. But what, in these dull, unimaginative days, are the terrors of Conscience to the diseases of the Liver? Not on Morality, but on Cookery, let us build our stronghold; then, brandishing our frying-pan as censer, let us offer sweet incense to the Devil and live at ease on the fat things he has provided for his elect!"

Carlyle restored to science, history, and literature, under the term natural supernaturalism, the primitive elements of wonder and worship. His genius was many-sided, and touched and ennobled modern life and thought in various aspects. Into the region of the Ideal he raised a whole generation of eager souls out of the stifling atmosphere of materialism and conventional orthodoxy. In the words of Edward Caird, the late Master of Baliol, "No English writer has done more to elevate and purify our ideals of life, and to make us conscious that the things of the spirit are real, and that in the last resort there is no other reality." If in the sphere of sociology Carlyle did not contribute to the settlement of the theoretic side of complex problems, he did what was equally important—he roused earnest minds to a sense of the urgency and magnitude of the problem, awakened the feeling of individual responsibility, and quickened the sense of social duty, which had grown weak during the reign of laissez faire. In the form of a modern John the Baptist, the Chelsea Prophet, with not a little of the wilderness atmosphere about him, preached in grimly defiant mood to a pleasure-loving generation the great doctrines which lie at the root of all religions—Repentance, Righteousness, Retribution.

THE PEARL.

THERE was a sweet softness in the air. The water splashed gently as it crept in over the sand. Far away in the distance the hills faded into the mist of a forgotten day. A light wind murmured through the star grass, and a bird called softly from the neighbouring trees. There was an all-pervading spirit of rest and tranquillity, and, lying before me, half-buried in the sand, I found the Pearl. As I held it, the sea, the hills, the call of the bird, and myself all seemed to be one.

DOROTHY EYRE.

THREE YEARS IN THE LIBYAN DESERT

THIS is a record of the main incidents and impressions, though not of the detailed results, of a highly successful German expedition which, some years ago, went in search of the long and vainly sought early Christian sanctuary, the tomb of St. Menas, in the heart of the Libyan Desert, a mysterious region situated in the eastern portion of North Africa, between the Mediterranean, the Sahara, and Egypt. The temple of Menas, "the pride of all Libya," which, with the exception of Jerusalem, is without a rival among the sanctuaries of the early Christian East in point of romance and mystery, stands in the centre of what appears to have been in early Christian times a flourishing town.

This was the scene of the operations of the expedition led by Monsignor Kaufmann, of Frankfort, who invited his cousin, the writer of this book, to accompany him. The excavations lasted the greater part of three years, and yielded important archæological results. Not only were the remains of a town of considerable dimensions laid bare, but these were thoroughly explored. But the most important discovery, as already indicated, was the tomb of Menas, which "lies deep under the floor of a Constantine basilica, and is in the shape of a large hollow chamber, its lowest parts architecturally decorated, with a semi-circular opening at the top." The author has wisely recounted all the available facts concerning Menas, "to whom early Christianity dedicated one of its finest sanctuaries, to whose tomb in the oasis troops of pilgrims travelled, and to whose temple Athanasius and Constantine, two of the greatest figures of early Christianity, stood sponsors."

Monsignor Kaufmann's design, it need hardly be said, was not carried out without encountering many difficulties. He had to lead an ascetic life on the edge of the desert, and was continually harassed by want of money, hostility, and jealousy. But he went bravely on, and won in the end.

Besides the narrative of the discoveries and excavations at the pilgrim city of the desert, the book furnishes pleasant glimpses of a land and a people about which comparatively little is known. There are vivid word-pictures of the journey over the desert tableland to Wadi Moghara, of the salt valley of Wadi en Natrûn, of the land of the Auladali, and of the Coptic monasteries scattered up and down the great desert. A chapter is also devoted to describing the religion and customs of the Beduins, who, it may be added, did most of the excavating in and around the temple of Menas.

The dregs of slavery are found in the Libyan Desert. The nefarious traffic still exists in the oasis of Dscharabub, in Northern Egypt. The Turks, we learn, are large buyers of these human goods, and once a month Turkish ships touch at night on the shores of Tripoli for the purpose of taking the finest slaves to their destination. But now that Italy has brought this region under her rule we may confidently hope that slavery in Northern Africa will soon be, if it is not now, a thing of the past.

The work has sixty-one illustrations from photographs, but no map, an omission which it is impossible to overlook in the case of a book of travel. We hope it will be rectified, should the work in its English dress reach a second edition.

* "Three Years in the Libyan Desert: Travels, Discoveries, and Excavations of the Menas Expedition." By J. C. Ewald Falls. Translated by Elizabeth Lee. 15s. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

The Best of the World's Books

SEND A POSTCARD for any of the following:—

200-PAGE CATALOGUE OF

10,000 BOOK BARGAINS

New and Secondhand, English and Foreign, in all classes of Literature at GREAT REDUCTIONS from the Published Prices.

SELECTED AND CLASSIFIED LIST (114 pp.) OF

THE BEST BOOKS

On all subjects, at the Lowest Cash Prices.

CATALOGUE OF

THE NEWEST BOOKS

Arranged under subjects and offered at the Lowest Prices charged by any bookseller.

A New List of Six-Shilling NOVELS

By the Best Writers,

From 1/- each.

All Books Delivered Free in London & Suburbs.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

THE LARGEST BOOKSHOP IN THE WORLD.

Swift

Sure

Men-about-Town, who dress well, use the "Achille Serre" Service regularly—it saves them money.

Our special method of cleaning and tailor-pressing keeps new clothes new and makes old ones look new. It only takes four days and costs but 3/9 per suit. Raincoats of any make can be cleaned and "reproofed" perfectly for 5/- Light overcoats cleaned and pressed for 3/6.

Free collection and delivery by nearest Branch or Agent; or carriage paid one way if sent direct.

Achille Serre Ltd

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

THE OLD BELL-RINGER : A SPRING IDYLL

(From the Russian of W. Korolenko, translated through the German)

IT was dark.

The little village lay silent in the starlight spring night, in the shadow of the pine-wood, on the bank of the gently flowing river. A slight haze rose from the ground, that had just awakened out of its winter sleep, and made the shadow of the wood stand out more strongly, and covered the open surface of the river with a dull silver shimmer. Silence, grateful stillness all around. . . . The inhabitants of the village are asleep. . . . The outlines of the miserable houses can only be distinguished with difficulty; here and there a little light peeps forth, and occasionally is heard the noise of doors opening, the barking of watchful dogs, and then again the same blissful stillness. Now and again, the forms of solitary wayfarers pass out of the darkness of the wood, a horseman appears, a peasant wagon drives past with creaking wheels. These are all inhabitants of the village, who are hastening to church, in order to begin the dawning Holy-day worthily.

In the middle of the village, the little church rises solitary on the hill, the windows shine brightly, and the old grey tower is hidden high up in the mist. The crumbling stairway creaks. The old bell-ringer mounts it with tottering steps, and in a short time a new star sends forth its light in the sky—the lantern in the bell-ringer's hand.

It is difficult for the old man to climb the steep stairway. The old feet are no longer obedient, Life has treated him harshly, his eyes now see but feebly. . . . Time it is for the old man to go to his eternal rest—still Death comes not! He has seen his sons, his grandsons, fading away; he has tolled at the funerals of the old and young; Death appeared to have forgotten him; still life is not easy for him.

Often before he has rung in Eastertide; he no longer knows how often he has waited the appointed hour, up here in the bell-tower. And now, to-day, it will happen again, as God wills.

With heavy steps the old man approaches the frail railing of the tower, and leans upon it. In the shadows round about, he descries with difficulty the graves of the churchyard. The black crosses with extended arms look like watchers guarding their dead. Here and there, too, the still naked birches, with their white shimmering trunks, move a little.

From below arise to the old man, like warm spring zephyrs, the refreshing scent of the young buds of the trees, and the still, peaceful air of the churchyard. . . . What really will this new year bring him? Will he, indeed, a year from to-day, up here as usual, greet Easter with solemn peals, or will he sleep down there below . . . far yonder in that corner of the churchyard, and will a cross adorn his mound also? As God wills. . . . He is ready, but now he must again announce the sacred festival. "Glory and thanks to God!" his lips whisper; he looks up to the heavens, where millions of stars shine; he crosses himself. . . .

"Micheitsch!" an old trembling voice calls up from below. The old sacristan glances up at the tower, yea, holds his hands to his straining, tearful eyes, but, nevertheless, he cannot see what he seeks.

"What do you want? I'm here!" replies the bellringer, and bends over the rails of the tower. "Do you not see me, then?"

"No! Is it not already time to ring? What do you mean?"

Both look up at the stars. Thousands of these heavenly bodies look down from on high. Far above sparkles the fiery "Plough."

Micheitsch considers.

"No, not yet!—I know well——"

He indeed knows. He needs no watch. The stars of God tell him when the time has come.

Heaven and earth, and the white clouds that float away yonder in space, and the dark pine-wood rustling below, and the murmuring of the unseen river—all these are old and dear to him, and known. A whole life hangs thereby. The long since past rises before him; how he, with his father, ascended this bell-tower for the first time. . . . Good God, how long since that is now . . . and still so short! He sees himself as a boy, with his fair curly head, with bright eyes, how the wind—not that which swirls up the dust of the highway; no, another, far higher, fluttering one—playfully tangles his curls. Far, far below, he sees many tiny people, and the houses of the village also seem small to him, and the wood lies so distant, and the round open space on which the village stands seems so big, so infinitely big.

"That is because it is so near," smiles the old man, and points down to the village below.

So also is Life! So long as one is young, it seems to be so infinite; there it lies before him, quite plain as it were, from the cradle to the grave, that he has chosen yonder in that corner of the churchyard. . . . Now, thank God, it is time to rest! He has gone honestly along the difficult road through Life, the damp earth is mother to him. Soon, God grant, he will rest in her lap.

Now it is time! Once again Micheitsch looks upwards to the stars, bares his head, crosses himself, and seizes the bell-ropes. . . .

Then there resounds through the air a shrill peal. . . . Then a second, third, fourth. . . . One after another and into the solemn night are poured forth these ringing, swelling notes, sometimes shrill, sometimes soft, in harmonious peals. The bells become silent, worship commences. In former years Micheitsch used also to go down and seat himself in the corner at the door, in order to listen to the service, and to pray. Now he remains above, he bears the burden of his years with difficulty. To-day, especially, he feels a peculiar heaviness in his limbs. He sits down, and while he listens to the dying notes of the bells, he gives himself over to his thoughts. Of what? He could himself hardly tell. The bell-tower is but dimly lit by the lantern. The bells themselves can scarcely be seen in the prevailing gloom; from the church beneath there is heard only the muffled singing of the congregation, and the wind sighs gently through the ropes that are fastened to the iron bell-clappers.

The old man lets his head sink on his breast, whilst disconnected pictures of a past life follow each other. People are singing; . . . he thinks he sees himself in the church. At the altar are raised the voices of children singing, the old priest, the blessed Father Naum, raises his voice loudly. Hundreds of peasants lower and raise their heads, and cross themselves. . . . All known faces, and all dead! . . . There, the strong face of his father, beside whom the elder brothers cross themselves, and sigh; there, he himself stands, in blooming health, full of unconscious title and hope for happiness and joy, and the future.

And where is this happiness? The thoughts of the old man flash up brightly, like a dying fire, and illuminate all the secret nooks and corners of a past life. Excessive labour, suffering and sorrow. . . . Where is it, this expected and hoped-for happiness? A hard lot has wrinkled the young face, bent the strong back, taught to sigh so, as the elder brothers had sighed. . . .

And there, at the left, amongst the wives of the village, stands his also, devoutly praying, the head bowed down. She was a good, faithful wife to him—God bless her! And she, also, had to sorrow not a little. Trouble and toil, and hard unwomanly work soon made her old. Her once clear, sparkling eyes lost their brightness, and the expression of fear and horror of unexpected blows of Fate took the place of the former self-consciousness and pride of the pretty young wife. . . . and her happiness, where was it? A son had remained to them, the joy and hope of their old age, and he ruined by the lies of men!

—And yonder stands the village usurer, and bows his body down to the ground, kisses it zealously, strikes a cross, in order to dry the tears of robbed orphans by a hypocritical prayer, and as to men, so also to lie to God. . . .

Old Micheitsch's heart boils; solemnly and angrily the sacred pictures look down from the walls on human misery, and human lies—all this remained behind him, far, far back. . . . Now his world is high up above here in the dark bell-tower, where the wind howls, and sweeps through the bell-ropes. "God will judge, vengeance is His!" whispers the old man, and silently the tears trickle over the wrinkled cheeks of the bell-ringer.

"Micheitsch, has sleep overcome you?" calls a voice from beneath.

"Who calls?" asks the old man, and jumps quickly up. "Good God, have I then really fallen asleep? Never has this disgrace befallen me!" . . .

Quickly, with accustomed hand, he seizes the rope, and casts a glance down below, where, like ants on their hills, the peasants busy themselves in groups. . . . Then the solemn procession goes round the church, with the cross and the sacred pictures in front, and to Micheitsch up above rises the joyful shout: "Christ is risen from the dead!" Blessedly this shout re-echoes in the overflowing heart of the old man; . . . the church lights seem to him to burn brighter, the peasants to move more lively—he rings—and the re-awakened wind quickly seizes the swelling notes, and in great gusts bears them away heavenwards, and the echo of the solemn pealing music bursts forth again and again. . . .

Never before had the old bell-ringer played his chimes so wonderfully. His overflowing heart seemed to have breathed life into the cold metal, and this seemed to sing, and to laugh and weep with gladness and joy; the living notes mount to Heaven, upwards to the twinkling stars. . . . These shine brighter while the notes pour forth again and again, and echo from Earth to Heaven in love and gladness and blissfulness. . . . The heavy bass sounds deeply, and its notes mount powerfully upwards and leave Heaven and Earth resounding with the melody: "Christ is risen!"

And the two tenors, trembling from the uniform strokes of the iron clappers, join in the joyful sound: "Christ is risen!" Yea, and the smallest trebles, simultaneously in haste tumbling over each other, in the play of the notes, in order not to be left behind, and intermingling their melody in the melodies of the great and powerful, like children, and lisping joyfully: "Christ is risen!"

Even the old bell-tower seems to feel the joy of the people, and the wind also that gently fans the bell-ringer's face—all things exult, and sing: "Christ is risen!"

The old heart forgets his sorrow, a life full of care and toil. . . . The old bell-ringer has forgotten that his life and his hopes for happiness were nothing but an empty dream, that he is alone upon the Earth. . . . He hears the notes that sing and weep rising through dark space to the star-sown heavens, and, sinking back to the lowly Earth, he sees himself surrounded by sons and grandsons, hears their joyful voices, the voices of small and great, joining together in a choir, and singing to him of happiness and joy, of which his long dark life had offered nothing. . . . The old bell-ringer pulls the bell-ropes, tears flow over his wrinkled face, his heart beats quickly; intoxicated with imagined happiness.

The people stand below and talk with each other; the bell-ringer never played so beautifully before. . . .

Suddenly the big bells vibrate in mighty peals—and become silent. The little bells, confounded, end their play with a shrill false note, as if they would listen silently to the dying sound of their powerful sisters, that ever again echo and tremble and weep, and gradually die away into space. . . .

Powerless, the old man sinks on the bench, and two last tears trickle gently over the pale cheeks growing cold.

Let us withdraw! The old bell-ringer has rung out.

EVE

(After Rodin)

MOULDED with matchless art, she stands alone.
Her head half-bowed beneath one circling arm;
Tense flesh, and muscle, sinew, very bone
Waiting expectant, whilst a mute alarm,
A spell of guilt, seems to enwrap with shame
Those mighty limbs—leaving her inmost soul
Naked and bleeding, now that wind and flame
Have passed and taken innocence as toll.

And on her face a look half-sad, half-wise;
The look of one beneath the chastening rod;
The look of one whose wearied feet have trod
On flowers and found them thorns. With drooping eyes

She, upon whom the unborn future lies,
Awaits the still small voice of angry God.

"SYNED."

THE WOMEN'S PAGE

THE CONFERENCE HABIT * * * BY EVELYN BURKE

THERE is still more than a hint of frost in the wind, and although as I write an apparently genial sun rides the heavens, there is little warmth at the core of it, and the few flowers that have ventured out into the cold March world seem to look upon its tepid advances with some suspicion. Yet already my desk is littered with programmes of spring and summer conferences upon almost every imaginable subject, many of them taking the form of summer camps, with the recreational element well sandwiched in between the more serious business of the day. There are camps for boys and camps for girls; camps for men only and for women only, and for men and women in common. There are students' camps and workers' camps; religious, social, educational, political, and scientific conferences. One charming Derbyshire village—Swanwick—has become the home of summer camps, mostly of a definitely religious type, and offers ideal surroundings to city folk who wish to escape the treadmill of work-a-day life where "things are in the saddle and ride mankind," and to "make their souls," not so much, indeed, by means of the set discussions and meetings, as through those camp-fire friendships which count so much more. Those rambling walks and interesting games of golf in the afternoon, and those long, frank talks at night when artificial barriers recede and one grips reality with naked hands—those are the solid, incommensurable gains of conference life; and Swanwick has set a wholesome example in the abolition of all formality in dress, speech, and general habit.

But delightful as all this is, it has given rise to a conference habit which is threatening to become a mania. Leisured folk, and especially women, rush from conference to conference, and those who have no leisure make it, to the neglect not only of those salutary occupations we call "duties," but also of many of the finer engagements and relations by which the human soul lives. I have a friend whose somewhat fastidious and exclusive turn of mind led her to weed out from her list of acquaintances every person who had at any time in his or her life been a member or delegate at some conference. In the end she was reduced to the society of a deaf charwoman and an Italian organ-grinder. Wherever there is any semblance of mental life, the conference habit has crept in. It is part of that lust for talk which is debilitating our own generation; it is also part of our almost insane gregariousness—of that crowd-spirit which afflicts the social and religious worker, the man and woman with artistic and literary interests, and the so-called thoughtful person in general quite as much as it afflicts our "smart set." We are diffident, fearful, apprehensive when left alone; we feel sheepish in the quiet room where the "two or three" are gathered together; we are only really at our ease with a chairman and a committee at the helm and a babel of voices around us. Even our "social functions"—our conversazioni, receptions, at homes, call them what you will—partake of this "conferential" nature. There is always a master of ceremonies somewhere in the background, who has planned out our evening's "pleasure" for us; there is always the inevitable crowd to save us from the ordeal of being honestly and intimately ourselves.

But, it is urged, these conferences promote thought. My friend, William Smith, tells me he has derived great benefit from his attendance at the Hand-sewn Bootmakers' Congress. It has made him think, given him ideas. That is certainly satisfactory, and yet one suspects a state of affairs in which it takes five hundred men to make one man think. We seem to be fast approaching the stage when we shall not be able to think without a chairman, or act without a committee, or live except in conference. The modern woman, especially, once her mind has woken up to the myriad interests and responsibilities of life, goes about either attending existent clubs, conferences, and associations, or else founding new ones in the interests of whatever movements or cults happen to appeal to her most. She acquires the conference brand of conversation—the talk which is little more than a tame, stale echo of cut-and-dried platform dictums and catchwords. She develops the conference type of mind, the habit of imagining that a thing is settled because so and so many people have talked round it. She is in danger of growing the conference type of soul, to which even the most sacred movements of the human spirit resolve themselves ultimately into so and so many more or less successful endeavours to be numerous and communicative.

But perhaps the most immediately apparent danger of the conference habit is the paralysis it puts upon action. I know a capable, sympathetic woman who once upon a time did admirable service in taking a very practical and personal interest in a limited number of poor families. Without the slightest assumption of patronage or superiority, she cared for the welfare of her poor friends—and the friendship was warm and genuine—influencing them for thrift and independence, winning the confidence of the boys and girls at their most critical juncture in life, and altogether bringing a new idea and standard of life to them. For some time I did not meet her, and when at last I paid her a tardy visit I found her surrounded by a litter of particularly unattractive-looking books and pamphlets. When I asked her how her families were getting on, she blushed. "I don't engage in amateur philanthropy any longer," she said, in the flat and vacant tone of a dull child repeating a lesson. "You see, I've been attending some conferences on poverty and vice, and it has become quite clear to me that it is worse than useless, that it is positively disastrous, to interfere with poor families until one has mastered the subject in all its bearings and from the scientific and economic point of view." She waved her hands towards her agglomeration of books—mostly blue—and assumed a frown of deep learning. "Never again will I go near a poor person," she concluded, with a sublime lack of humour, "until all these"—another vague wave of the hand—"have become part of my very being." She offered to show me the books in detail, and even to lend me some of the less technical manuals which she deemed would suit my limited intelligence, but I fled.

I believe in the pooling and socialising of our thought and experience, if done in moderation, and I believe in getting the most thorough grip possible of a problem, but I believe still more in "hoeing one's own patch." And one of the reasons why the modern woman is often so woefully ineffective is that the conference habit—be the "conference" a club, a cult, a committee, or a congress—has turned her into a "slacker." And that word sums up the situation more accurately than we care to admit.

The Safest, most Productive INVESTMENT is a "Sun Life of Canada" ANNUITY.

Without doubt, the present popularity of Annuities is due to the enterprise shown by the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada.

The Company offers such generous terms that it is little wonder British investors are selling out Consols and other low-yielding securities in order to purchase "Sun Life of Canada" Annuities. It pays Investors to sell out even at a loss, for they often double, treble, and, in some cases, even increase their income fourfold by making the change.

Three Interesting Examples.

A retired solicitor in impaired health, aged seventy-four, deposited £6,000, and now receives an Annuity of £1,000 a year for life, which increases his income fourfold.

Mrs. B—R—, aged sixty-two, had £1,000 invested in securities yielding an income of £35 a year. By transferring the capital to an Annuity, her income would have been increased to £93 12s. a year, but, being in slightly impaired health, she obtained from the "Sun Life of Canada" an Annuity of £105 a year, just thrice the amount formerly received.

Miss J—A—, a lady of independent means, bought £2,000 of Consols in 1903, for which she paid £1,800. The income derived from this investment had been £50 a year. Early in 1912 this lady needed a larger income, realised her Consols for £1,600, and, being now fifty years of age, has obtained a "Sun Life of Canada" Annuity of £109 per annum—more than double her former income.

Assets over £10,000,000.

These three Annuitants have absolute guarantee that in making the change from "gilt-edged" securities to a "Sun Life of Canada" Annuity they increase their income without risking its safety. The Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada has assets of over £10,000,000, and an undivided surplus over all liabilities of upwards of £1,000,000. The security is beyond question. The Insurance Laws in Canada are strict and stringently enforced. The Company's investments come under the periodical scrutiny of the Canadian Government, so that annuitants in reality have a Government guarantee of the Company's stability.

Different Kinds of Annuities.

Purchasing an annuity is a very different matter to-day from what it was twenty years ago. Then it was simply a question of paying a lump sum down and receiving in return an income which terminated at the Annuitant's death; but now one is offered by the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada a choice of a dozen or more forms of Annuity Insurance. You can buy an Annuity out and out; or you can buy a deferred Annuity and pay for it out of your income—so much per year until the Annuity is due. You can buy joint Annuities for yourself and your wife; you can buy Educational Annuities for your children; you can buy Annuities with the whole return of your capital guaranteed.

Annuitants with impaired health are offered better terms because of their ill-health.

For Young Men and Women.

If you are still in the early years of life, why not provide for your later days by taking out an Annuity to mature, say, at the age of sixty? A small annual payment now will secure you a comfortable income for those years when you are less able and less willing to work. To take an example: by depositing £13 2s. a year, a young man aged twenty-six can secure an income of £100 a year beginning at sixty.

Investigate Further.

Write at once for fuller particulars of "Sun Life of Canada" Annuities. Find out just what the Company can do for you to make your present days more comfortable, or your future happiness more assured. This is one of to-day's duties, not a matter to be put off until to-morrow. Fill in the coupon form, send it to Mr. Junkin, and interesting and instructive booklets will be forwarded to you by return of post.

To J. F. Junkin (Manager),

SUN LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA,

94, Canada House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

Please send me particulars, explanatory booklets, etc., of your various forms of Annuity Insurance. (Enquirer should state age, particulars of annuity required, etc., the communication being regarded as confidential).

NAME

ADDRESS

DATE OF BIRTH..... ANNUITY REQUIRED.....

HOW TO STUDY

Rapidly, Effectively & Scientifically,
with the Minimum of Fatigue

To study rapidly and effectively you must understand how to pay attention, how to observe, how to employ your memory so that you may remember what you read. You must know how to develop your Will-power so as to enlist its valuable aid when your Will flags. You must know how to control your thoughts so as to inhibit alien ideas, and to shut out distracting influences. You must know how to guard against Fatigue, for to engage in study when your mind is fatigued is to make your study of no value. You are taught how to secure the above in an easy, sure, and scientific manner in the World-Famous Course—"Scientific Concentration," the finest all-round Mental-Training you can undertake. It will revolutionise your outlook on life and make you much more efficient in study, or in your Profession or Business. In every part of the civilised world men and women in every walk of life testify to this. "Scientific Concentration" is highly recommended by the late Mr. W. T. Stead (Editor of the "Review of Reviews"), "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "Great Thoughts," etc. Learn all about this splendid All Round Mental-Training by sending to-day for their Free Descriptive Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46 CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 180 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. You write, we sell. 16-pp. prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

INEX-
PENSIVE

FOR CARDS.

A DAINTY
AND

LUXURY.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed f.c.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTEKS,
4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.
ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

CORRESPONDENCE

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—With your permission, I would like to take exception to two rather sweeping assertions made by Mr. Austin Harrison in his very interesting article "West or East" in your last week's issue. He says, "if Germany does not alter her course within the year the Anglo-German war will have become inevitable," and that "the longer we allow Germany to prepare, the fiercer will be the struggle when it comes." I do not believe any war is inevitable, until it is actually declared. I also believe that the longer war is averted between Germany and Britain the less likely it will become. It is true that a policy of rivalry leads to growing distrust, vexations, and, in the end, exasperation conducing to the breaking of that peace which it should be the aim of all statesmen to maintain. The experience of the past few years, however, and the events of the past few weeks, more especially, go to prove that, amid all this warlike and bombastic talk, amid all the jealousies, suspicions, the incitements to aggression and conquest, there is going on, unceasingly, a noiseless pressure, a silent compulsion of financial ways and means; little apprehended, perhaps, by the Chauvinists, but more pregnant of decisive influence than the pomp and panoply of armies and navies. It is being brought home with what will soon prove an irresistible force, that the world's commercial structure to-day is so finely balanced and dovetailed together that no one part can be affected without disturbing the equilibrium and stability of the whole. Someone has said that there are three great requisites for waging war. The first is money, the second is money, and the third is money. We have been spending money in latent warfare with Germany for the past ten years. Germany is finding out that there are limitations to everything: if some things must be done others must be given up. Apparently she is not unwilling to call a pause so far as her aspirations for a big navy are concerned. We may, therefore, look upon this as the end of the first round, and it will be interesting just to take stock of the trend of things from the especial point of view of finance. Since 1904 we have reduced our National Debt by 126 millions; Germany has increased hers by 110 millions. Since the same year taxation has been remitted by us on corn, tea, sugar and incomes to the extent of 23 millions. True, taxes to the extent of 23½ millions have been imposed on spirits, tobacco, estate duty, etc., thus neutralising the benefit of the reductions, but we have carried out such social reforms as old age pensions with some of the proceeds, and at any rate are not more heavily taxed, on balance, than we were ten years ago. Germany, on the other hand, was compelled to increase taxation in 1909 to the extent of 25 millions annually, on such articles as beer, wine, spirits, tobacco, tea, coffee, sugar, matches, railway tickets, etc. To-day German Three per Cents stand at 76, which is equivalent to about 63 for Consols, and has to offer at least 4 per cent. for the loans she is just about to place upon the market. I think that, owing mainly, as I believe, to our fiscal system of freedom of trade, it must be admitted that old England emerges from this "first round" with considerably the best of it, and, if our statesmen have the coolness and courage requisite to enable them to take a firm stand against our panic-mongers and refrain from any provoking addition either to our navy or army, we shall be taking the first step towards that agreement as to limitation of armaments which all Christians must desire. In all these agitations for increase of armaments, as a sort of lip-service to the Christian ideal, I suppose, all idea of aggression is disclaimed. It is always the "other fellow" who has this blameworthy intention, and, to Germany, this country is the "other fellow." Let us, then, take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the unhappy necessity Germany feels herself compelled to face in other directions owing to recent events in the East: give proof of our disinterestedness by reducing rather than increasing our military and naval expenditure, and we shall find, I feel confident, that our more sympathetic attitude will be quickly reciprocated, and that every year that passes will make war between us less possible.—I am, sir, etc., W. F. WALLIS.

Maidstone.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

STR,—The materialist's view of Anglo-German relations has been clearly put by Austin Harrison in this week's issue of EVERYMAN. He says: "This year the Britain and Germany question will be decided; that is to say, either Germany will come forward as our friend, and we shall be able to discover what deal we can make with her about boats, or she will not do so, in which case the Anglo-German war will have become inevitable." And he goes on to say that if Germany does not show signs of a "reasonable understanding with us" (whereby he appears to mean a concession to England's naval supremacy), the only course for England is to have a War Loan, and to begin building such a navy that Germany cannot dare be allowed to attack us.

This crude assertion cannot be allowed to pass unchallenged: it is just such statements as this that inflame anti-Teutonic feeling, excite panic, and prevent people from listening to their own better judgment. Let us realise that the attempt to serve God and Mammon simultaneously, by preaching peace and preparing for war, is doomed to failure, and that the world's peace can never come so long as we continue to increase our armaments.

If men support a policy of armed defence, let them honestly declare that they believe in war as a means of settling international differences. If, however, it is peace that we desire, let us prove it by the way of peace, and by showing that it is a gain for which we are prepared to sacrifice naval supremacy, and even more. To quote the Rev. William Temple: "... war will never cease, nor international civilisation arise, until some nation has chosen to perish rather than stain its soul with the passions of war."

If England as a nation were prepared to do this, the suspicions and fears which mar her relations with Germany would probably be found vain and groundless; but so long as she opposes force to force, and meets Germany's military and naval policy by increased armaments, so long will the danger of war continue a real one.—I am, sir, etc., E. RYLE.
Liverpool.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—All readers of EVERYMAN must have followed with the greatest interest the series of articles and letters which have appeared therein on the subject of Anglo-German rivalry. These articles have until last week been almost exclusively dominated by the now popular pacifist theories. But at last we

THE BOOK OF PUBLIC SPEAKING.

AN INDISPENSABLE WORK FOR ALL SPEAKERS

FIRST PAYMENT 1/6 ONLY.

At no time has the art of public speaking been so valuable, or the occasion for the making of public speeches so frequent as at the present. No one, indeed, can now attain to a position of any prominence without being called upon at times to make a speech.

For that reason, the publication of the Book of Public Speaking is an event of the highest importance. It is the first comprehensive work upon the subject ever issued in this country, for it provides at once the greatest speeches of the world's greatest orators, and at the same time a reliable guide to the Art of Public Speaking. Its handsome covers contain the cream of the greatest speeches of modern times. Political Orations, Religious Addresses, After Dinner Speeches, Scientific and Literary Lectures—all have been brought together to form a work of enthralling interest to all intelligent people. Among the great speakers whose speeches are included in the work are:

Lord Rosebery.	Max O'Rell.	Lord Fisher.
Lord Beaconsfield.	R. Waldo Emerson.	Abraham Lincoln.
H. H. Asquith.	Harold Cox.	Justin McCarthy.
A. J. Balfour.	Woodrow Wilson.	Viscount Milner.
W. E. Gladstone.	G. Bernard Shaw.	M. Poincaré.
Sir Edward Clarke.	Charles Dickens.	Whitelaw Reid.
Andrew Lang.	Chauncey Depew.	Theodore Roosevelt.
D. Lloyd George.	John Bright.	Philip Snowden.
Winston Churchill.	Sir A. Conan Doyle.	Ian Maclaren.
Mark Twain.	Sir Edward Grey.	Emile Zola.
Spencer Leigh	Hughes.	Augustine Birrell.
Joseph Chamberlain.	Sir Henry Irving.	Sir A. W. Pinero.
		Etc., etc.

HOW TO SPEAK IN PUBLIC.

Moreover, the work is intensely valuable as a guide to Public Speaking. Not only do the speeches form excellent examples and provide splendid material for the preparation of a speech, but there is also a series of remarkable articles on the various points of Public Speaking, written by recognised experts. These include

- Rt. Hon. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P., on "How to Make an Effective Speech";
- ARTHUR BOURCHIER, M.A. (the well-known Actor), on "How to Prepare and Deliver a Speech";
- J. L. GRIFFITHS (U.S.A. Consul-General, London), on "After Dinner Speaking";
- A. C. BENSON, M.A., C.V.O., F.R.H.S., etc., on "The Art of Lecturing";
- ALBERT CREW (of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law), on "The Conduct of and Procedure at Meetings."

Altogether, it is safe to say that Politicians, Debaters, Clergymen, and all others whose position in life calls for the power of being able to speak in public, will find "The Book of Public Speaking" an absolutely indispensable work. Alike for the practised speaker and for the man who wishes to acquire this valuable art, no work so important has ever been published.

FREE BOOKLET.

The Publishers have prepared an interesting illustrated booklet—which they will send free—describing the work and their offer to deliver the complete work as published for a first payment of 1s. 6d. only, the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

To the CAXTON PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge and without any obligation on my part, full particulars of "The Book of Public Speaking."

Name.....
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address.....

have a confident and outspoken article which dares to ignore the views of Mr. Norman Angell and his disciples.

We have all read the "Great Illusion," and been convinced by its vigorous reasoning. We are now quite convinced (if we were not in that delectable state before the perusal) that the economic interdependence of the various peoples of the world is altogether too close for one nation to injure another without suffering to at least an equal degree with its victim.

Now, the pacifist concludes that, as soon as this great principle is grasped, war becomes visibly merely the most stupid of suicides. We may allow that war is supremely undesirable; we may allow that a nation engaging in war is committing some degree of self-destruction. But, granting that we have to deal with a militarist nation (and perhaps that needs demonstration), the directors of whose policy are inspired with a passion for political expansion, who does not understand that it is the most certain of our duties to see to it that it shall be impossible for another nation to meddle with our national methods of political behaviour? German ideals of civic conduct are sometimes far from palatable to Englishmen, and why should we allow ourselves to be persuaded into a position of such inferiority as to be unable to prevent the imposition from outside of such an uncongenial system?

Interference is surely a bad thing in itself, scarcely to be defended when in operation between the members of a single state for their mutual benefit. But what is to be thought of a nation which consents to tolerate interference coming from without and without pretence for the benefit of those who suffer the curtailment of liberty?

From this point of view it will be seen that the principles so well established by Mr. Norman Angell are considered to be somewhat beside the point in reviewing the Anglo-German situation, and this is the attitude which Mr. Austin Harrison so satisfactorily assumed in last week's issue of EVERYMAN.—I am, sir, etc.,

G. R. B.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM:

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been very much interested by Professor John Adams' article on Educational Reform in your issue of February 28th.

As a school medical officer, and as a doctor who has devoted a good deal of time to the study of children in health and disease, I feel that I may claim some knowledge of our system of Elementary Education, but what is more important, of the psychology and physiology of childhood; and for these reasons, and because I feel the education of our children almost the only path to social or any other regeneration, I would respectfully criticise some of the statements made by Professor Adams.

If our elementary schools can stand comparison with those of any of the other great countries, one can only feel sorry, I think, for the other great countries. I cannot think there has ever been a previous state of man when the education given to his children stood in such appalling contrast to the light of his knowledge; I cannot think of any system of education (I refer more particularly to the mixed departments, the infant departments being more alive) more fitted to keep enlightenment from the minds of our future labourers and citizens, or more suitable for crushing the finest qualities in man, his inherited love, of danger for the sake of overcoming, and of injustice righted; nor can I conceive any system more fitted to make early life a boredom and a weariness to the flesh.

What can anyone capable of thought think of a system which expects children of three to six or seven years to go daily through a more or less rigid curriculum of five hours' duration—rigid because it omits most of those avenues of elasticity, of ceaseless probing, of endless intaking and outpouring, which are the characteristics of every child, and can only be satisfied by spontaneous song, dance, and dramatic action, the three fairy sisters of Castle Make-believe?

What can one say that is sufficiently condemning of a system which at a given age, irrespective of individual physical or mental fitness, suddenly bustles these unfortunate children into the still more rigid, still more foreign, prison-house atmosphere of Standard I.?

If, as I think, the infant department is the Alpha of our educational system up to the present, Standard I. is, indeed, the Omega—it is the limit of uncommon-sense.

What can one think of a system which, against the will of our true philosophers, the working classes, imposes a distaste for the magnificent poetry of the Bible, and at the same time ignores the more important, because more suitable, teaching of the poetry of the body and its various appetites?

Has Professor Adams asked himself why the great mass of pupils in our elementary schools have neither ability nor desire to go on to a higher academic course? Why, it must be Nature's wise protection against further mummification. Why, long before the child has reached the age of twelve and the glorious freedom of half-timerdom he is too tired, physically and mentally and spiritually, if, indeed, he has been so strong as to retain some of his spirit-inheritance, to will or to wish anything for himself; if he has not ability, if he has not desire, it is not because he has emerged from the so-called "lower classes," but because the soil in which he was planted has missed the rain and sunshine of God.

Again, urgent though the need is for the reduction of the size of classes, it is not in this that we shall find salvation; this in itself will not excuse or redeem the fundamental wrongness of our educational methods.

Mr. G. K. Chesterton, in criticising the Montessori system, hinted, with more truth than perhaps he knew, that apparently the children who were receiving the sane education were the idiots.

Does another of your contributors—Charles Jones—know what might arrest the degenerating influence of third-rate music-halls? He might know, as also his fellow-teachers and our educationists, could they remember, that children, even more than men and women, are "merely players," and that every school should, like the world outside it, be a stage for these little men and women to rehearse, without the bitterness that may await them, the romance of a childhood that has grown up.

Every little girl is an immature, but otherwise complete, mother; every little boy is, if you give him tools, an immature, but otherwise complete, workman.

Have we completely forgotten what the child is like? Have we forgotten the unspeakable importance of those characteristics which are the certain inheritance and the privilege of every childhood, which it is our duty to succour and multiply, and without which

(Continued on page 732.)

CAN YOU SKETCH?

WOULD YOU LIKE TO DRAW FOR REPRODUCTION?

and earn some of the hundreds of pounds that Advertisers (in London alone) pay daily for simple, slick, and effective sketches.

Never was the demand for sketches so great, never was it so easy for a trained artist to live in comfort.

Take up a good magazine—Nash's, for instance—what first catches the eye? The Drawings, most certainly.

Tear the cover off, and note the effect. How many popular magazines would sell on the bookstalls without their covers?

What the picture cover is to the magazine so an attractive sketch is to an advertisement.

And advertisers now realise this fact so clearly that they compete with each other to get the work of artists who have studied their requirements.

In the streets, posters meet the eye long before anything else. Posters and Magazine Drawings often display more cleverness than Academy Paintings, and the young men and women who have learned to design them often earn more than Royal Academicians.

Commercial Artists usually sell their work by post, thus saving time and the embarrassment of personal interviews and verbal bargaining.

By Post also, anyone with a taste for drawing can enjoy the advantages of a London training at home.

THE PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE—the All-British School of Art with the World-wide Reputation—offers to EVERYMAN readers with a taste for drawing the Complete Postal Course of Individual Instruction in the design of

POSTERS, SHOWCARDS, COVERS, &c.

The P.C.C. System of Instruction is invented by Chas. E. Dawson, who conducts the Course, and who becomes personally responsible to the College for the success of each student.

The lessons, exclusive and confidential to each student, are superbly illustrated. Exercises are set expounding the technique of drawing for reproduction. The exercises are sent by post to Chas. E. Dawson, who criticises them; his long letters of personal advice and encouragement are alone worth more than the moderate fee for the course.

Chas. E. Dawson gives "reasons why" for praise or blame—his Art Criticism in the foremost magazines of Great Britain and America have won for him a reputation only equalled by the high regard shown on both sides of the Atlantic for his poster and advertisement designs. His pen and pencil have lent refinement and distinction to the announcements of the leading advertisers; among them:

Rova Cocoa, Van Houten's, Fry's, Jaeger's, Frame - Food, Kelway's, Pelman Memory System, Luce's Eau - de - Cologne, His Master's Voice Gramophones, Oetzman's, Wolseley Cars, Liberty's, and the chief London Publishers.

The subjects taught include: Drawing for reproduction, book cover, advertisement designs, lettering, perspective, line, wash, and body colour sketches, splatter work, time and labour saving devices, originating saleable designs, establishing a connexion, commercial correspondence, dealing with printers, publishers, and advertisers, how, when, and where to sell designs to the best advantage.

Send a small specimen of your work in any media—pen, pencil or colour—and we will return it to you with Chas. E. Dawson's personal confidential letter of criticism and advice as to your chances of success in this new and lucrative field of applied art.

Correspondence must not be directed to the Editor of EVERYMAN, but to the SECRETARY, PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE, 77, Thanet House Strand, London, W.C.

it is impossible for a man to enter the kingdom of heaven? I think we must have forgotten.—I am, sir, etc.

AUSTIN PRIESTMAN.

Bradford.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Professor Adams' article on this subject shows a very fine grasp of the problem as a whole, and is full of suggestions of the greatest value. Not the least, from the point of view of elementary schools, is the indication which he gives that grading from top to bottom is necessary, in order to divide children who show some aptitude for mental work from those who manifestly do not. But one sentence made me start! "Fine buildings are the most fatal lure." The expression would be less dangerous if it did not encourage an already existing policy, and if it did not go to the root of all educational reform. Public schools and secondary schools, also the "civic" universities, may hear that dictum with equanimity, but to the elementary school it means, if carried out, the loss of a most valuable asset in education. There is a tradition among the public schools that a certain amount of discomfort, even of hardship, is necessary to act as discipline. Home may be too comfortable for a boy who is to do his work in the world. But the child in the elementary school has hardships enough and to spare in his out-of-school life. To him his school is the one warm, comfortable place in the world; there he is nursed and washed and fed, given new boots and stockings, taught manners, and, generally speaking, shown what clean, wholesome life means. Incidentally—quite incidentally really—he is taught something, if he is not too sleepy to listen.

Even to the child of well-to-do parents the elementary school is still, and ought to be, a place where he is not merely taught, but influenced for the good of the nation at large. And a beautiful school is a thing with which to work miracles—and would we had more of them! To-day, in a neighbourhood which is intended by the builder to house the elementary school child and its parents, the most prominent, and certainly the most attractive-looking, secular building is the public-house. Is it too much to ask that the school shall go one better than the public-house, instead of several points worse? Cannot we emphasise the importance of teaching by housing it worthily? We ask teachers to undertake work in the slums, and yet, apparently, we are to grudge them their due, which is to have the ugliness outside barred off for the time being. We plan our schools now with great care, certainly, so that they are suitable for the work, and surely the slight extra cost could be incurred. And it is not entirely a question of economy, this disregard of beauty, but a failure to understand its value in teaching. Children are very sensitive to it, and appreciate it; it is good for them to understand that it exists, and to be taught to take care of it. In time they will realise that things outside the school are ugly, and needlessly, preventably, ugly; and there will arise a demand for better, more beautiful, and more healthy accommodation. And with this will come an end to the waste and destruction of beauty from sheer inability to see that it exists.—I am, sir, etc.,

T. M. CHALMERS.

Whyteleafe, Surrey.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Lord Haldane's speech at Manchester on January 10th leads us to hope that in the near future we may be in possession of a really effective system of national education. If Lord Haldane succeeds in doing away with the weltering chaos that exists at present, he will have deserved the gratitude of the whole nation. We want a system in which the Church will cease from troubling, a system which will not be controlled by small local bodies composed of men who are for the most part utterly unqualified to express adequate opinions on educational needs, and in this system the teacher must have a definite and honoured status, with more liberal remuneration than he at present receives.

In your issue of March 7th your contributor H. H. makes a suggestion to the effect that the series of articles on "Countries of the World" might be followed by one on "Education in the Different Countries." This, I think, is a most valuable suggestion, the adoption of which would go far to remove the abysmal ignorance that prevails in this country regarding the educational systems of foreign countries. The average school board member doesn't trouble his head about such things; his chief concern is economy. The memorial presented to the Prime Minister by the National Education Association, signed by so many men of distinction in the educational world, is a hopeful sign, and may do something to hasten on the accomplishment of a work which, in the minds of all unprejudiced people, is as necessary as the maintenance of a fleet for the preservation of Britain's pre-eminent position among the nations. As a Scotchman I trust that reform will not be confined to England.—I am, sir, etc.,

STUDENT.

THE ARMY AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I be permitted to add a suggestion to Dr. Percy Dearmer's first point in his article on "Out of Work," published in EVERYMAN for February 28th?

He very clearly and concisely points out the grave danger of the blind-alley occupations for boys; but has it ever occurred to him and other readers of your paper that the army system of our country is a blind-alley occupation for the youth and manhood of our country?

It is perfectly true that many of our army men are enabled and assisted into positions, such as commissionaires and similar occupations; but how about the large number of men who are not able to obtain such posts? Do they not, as a matter of fact, drift into the unskilled labour market, and often, because of their small pensions, which enable them to work cheaper, displace men who have no such annuity? Again, how often do we come across unemployable men, who date their misfortunes from the time of their retiring and attribute their unfortunate position to the fact of having spent the prime of life in the service of their country! They are fit and skilled, it is true, but for army work alone; but as their time has been completed they are thrown upon the unskilled labour market, unless they are fortunate enough to obtain a position where their disciplined lives and physique alone are needed.

Surely, sir, this is a blind alley of employment which is almost as detrimental to the life of the nation, from a commercial, and thereby moral and physical, point of view, as in the case of boy labour. What I would suggest is that the Governmental or military authorities should reserve a department, of a military or allied nature, and recruit its staff from retired military men. It could be so regulated that the same number (or thereabouts) of men could retire from this department as were retiring from the army,

(Continued on page 734.)

MISS EVELYN UNDERHILL'S NEW BOOK.

DAILY NEWS: "A BEAUTIFUL, NOBLE, AND INTERPRETATIVE PIECE OF WORK."

THE MYSTIC WAY.

The object of this book is to trace out that type of life, that peculiar quality of consciousness, which is called "Mystical," from its earliest appearance within Christianity, to estimate, so far as possible, the true character and origin of the Christian Mystic.

Square demy 8vo, 12/6 net.

By GORDON CRAIG.

TOWARDS A NEW THEATRE.

Containing 40 original designs for stage scenes, with critical notes by the inventor.

Square royal 4to, 21/- net.

THE ART TREASURES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

A Monthly Series. Edited by C. H. COLLINS BAKER.

1/- net
MONTHLY.

1/- net
MONTHLY.

A representative collection of reproductions of the Masterpieces of Art in the British Isles.
Each number contains 7 beautifully reproduced plates with a descriptive note to each by the editor of the series.

PARTS 1 & 2 NOW READY.

Please send for prospectus and latest illustrated general catalogue.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS" (Copyright)

evolved by G. H. Cox and invariably used by nature when concentration of Brain Power is required; exemplified in Musicians, Scientists, etc., through all ages.

All subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE. A natural gift. EVERY musician can play from MEMORY and

EVERYONE can strengthen GENERAL MEMORY by this system. It gives new essential ideas on TEACHING, PRACTISING, and STUDY.

Dr. W. F. Choimeley, F.R.C.S., Wolverhampton — "It seems to me to get at the whole root of the matter."

Mr. H. Stanley, 10, Princes Street,
Hanover Square, London, Voice
Specialist and Lecturer. — "I consider the instructions of great value to parents, teachers, professional men." The amount of time to be saved thereby will be enormous.

Musicians, Teachers, Students, Engineers, Speakers, Business Men, and all who need memory, should write, stating subject required for, GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhall College). Address—Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

A. E. Beckett, Vailima, Hurst
Rd., Eastbourne — "I feel confident that your system will not only greatly improve the memory but considerably enhance its growth."

Congregational Minister. — "Your method is simple, natural, and sure."

A "Schoolmaster." — "Your system COMPELS thoroughness."

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES. New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD.,
3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

The Ideal Pen
for Busy Men

Is unquestionably the "Red Dwarf." For lengthy professional work or hasty note-making it is ever ready to write smoothly, rapidly, and without spoiling.

THE PILLAR OF PERFECTION

3/9 Small enough to fit the pocket, yet possessing a large reservoir. It is recommended by all who use it. 3/9

Mr. J. PIERPONT MORAN, the great financier, says: "I have recommended your 'Red Dwarf' Stylo, throughout the United States."

Red Dwarf
STYLOGRAPH

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30. 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place,
High Holborn, London, W.C.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Shorthand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any notice, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size.
Particulars, List No. 42, and specimen free. 15/- complete.

A. R. QUADRUPEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

so that the men retiring as reserve men could be drafted into positions, according to rank and ability, in this work, more within their scope and for which they have been prepared while serving in the army.
Then, when their turn came to retire from this departmental work, we should find their age and pension enough to make it desirable and possible to live independently and comfortably.

Surely some such scheme could be devised, and would relieve very considerably the flooded state of the unskilled labour market, and provide more satisfactorily and worthily for the men who give up their trades in their earlier years to serve their King and country, in a service that they know must necessarily prove to the vast majority an early and blind alley.

—I am, sir, etc.,

H. W. FINCH.

Walmer.

CHRISTIANITY, PROGRESS, AND THE CLAIMS OF THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Many conflicting opinions have been advanced by your correspondents on the relations between progress and Christianity, and on the nature of the claims of the Bible. It would take volumes adequately to discuss these subjects, so that possibly a slight seeming dogmatism of tone may be excusable when they are discussed within the limits of articles and letters. But the dogmatism of some of your correspondents is by no means slight. Mr. Miller compresses the conclusions of Voltaire and Buckle within about twenty-four lines, without, however, supporting them by any convincing, or even reasonable, arguments. Mr. Cludell rules out, by a drastic à priori method, the possibility of progressive revelation.

The first of these two gentlemen to discredit Christianity reverts to the time-worn practice of identifying the corruptions and abuses perpetrated in the name of Christianity with the Christian religion itself. His acquaintance with Christianity must be extremely limited if he is not aware that violence, murder, persecution, "fiendish torture," and the "imprisonment of thousands for opinions . . ." have no part in, and are diametrically opposed to, and condemned by, the Christian religion, as distinct from the acts committed in its name by those who use its name unscrupulously in the interests of political power, or those whose unstable minds hold a perverted interpretation of it. The "persecution, the fiendish torture," which Mr. Miller mentions has, in the majority of cases, been used rather against those who have been seeking a true interpretation of Christianity than against those who have been opposing it altogether. Mr. Miller would do well to read Lord Morley's lives of Rousseau and Voltaire, where he will find the admission made by a man whom it would be absurd to accuse of any bias in favour of Christianity, that the early Churchmen alone "kept alive the flickering lights of civilisation." But for Christianity, it is difficult to believe that there ever could have been any such civilisation as we have to-day. Mr. Miller, however, will probably not see the force of these remarks. He is evidently a rationalist, and I am content to believe with you, sir, that "progress is irrational, it is supra-rational, it is metaphysical, it is mystical and transcendental."

In Mr. Cludell's strange letter the edifying analogy between the Bible and the beetle speaks well for his knowledge of the former. With respect to the inspiration of the Bible, some words of Archdeacon Wilkinson's may not be amiss:

"Finally, then, what do we mean by saying that the Bible is inspired? We mean that it consists of writings which have affected, and do affect, the world as no other writings have done; that they have revealed, in forms that were suitable and in language that was intelligible, to those to whom they were addressed, and that they still reveal, the will of God and His aims for man, comfort his sorrows, guide his life, inspire him with the love of God and man as no other writings do; and that this opinion of their value rests on no arbitrary choice made by someone at some time, but represents the verdict of the world."

This expresses the position exactly.—I am, sir, etc.,
Plymouth. P.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Hector Macpherson's article on "The Church and Social Problems," in addition to a great deal of truth, contains several examples of confused thinking, several contradictions, and at least one statement which is, in Ruskin's phrase, "accurately and exquisitely wrong." He says, "Salvation is no longer viewed as a mystical something which could be possessed by the individual apart from social institutions and social influences." The truth is that salvation is still viewed as such by nearly every branch of the Christian Church, from the Greek Church to the Salvation Army. This is the central point of the Christian religion, and therein lies its strength. The Christian preacher can say to every man, "No matter what your environment, no matter what injustices you may suffer from, no matter how wretched a slave you may be, you may still possess that priceless treasure, that 'mystical something,' called salvation."

There is also very little truth in the description of the Church's conception of its mission given in the first part of the article. The Church has always denounced usury. It has always said that the rich should look upon themselves as the stewards and not the owners of their wealth. It has always preached contentment to the poor. It has been the greatest charitable and educational institution ever known. What really distinguishes the Church of to-day from the Church of the past is that it has abandoned that particular theory of Social Reform which was its own (and which, of course, may have been wrong) and has adopted that theory which is largely the outcome of the materialism of the last generation.

Section II. of the article opens with a confusion of ideas which is almost distracting. Take one sentence: "The Founder of Christianity is claimed as a Socialist, and the clergy are told that, to be true to the example of the Master, they must side with the poor against the rich." The implication here is that to be a Socialist is the same thing as to side with the poor against the rich. It is true that Karl Marx thought that a class war was the best means of bringing about Socialism, but there is no essential connection between the ideas. It is quite possible to be a Socialist and to side with the rich against the poor (as many Socialists do). It is also quite possible to side with the poor against the rich without even thinking about Socialism.

There is also much confusion and contradiction in the teaching of the article with regard to "rights" and "duties." The teaching of duties involves the teaching of rights. If it is A's duty to do justice to B, then it is B's duty to demand justice of A. The

Match Winds

BAD FOR RHEUMATISM

When the piercing winds of March bring on the torturing pains of Rheumatism, do not fly to drugs. Drugs have a way of alleviating one complaint and aggravating another. There is a much safer remedy which brings relief in the pleasantest sort of way at an infinitesimal cost. The remedy is Turkish Bathing—not in the nauseating atmosphere of a public establishment, but in the privacy of your own home, by means of a Gem Turkish Bath. The Gem Bath works wonders. It makes you feel years younger. If you don't believe it try one on our ten days' offer (money back if not satisfied). We have sold thousands of Gem Baths on these terms, and instead of demands for "money back," we get glowing accounts of the benefits derived. The testimony comes not only from people suffering from Rheumatism, Sciatica, Gout, Neuralgia, and other nerve troubles, but from those who are well and keep well by the regular use of the Gem Bath. The Gem Bath takes only a minute or two to prepare. It folds flat, occupies little space, costs 35/-, and lasts a lifetime. Order one to-day. The risk is all on our side.

100 p. Booklet free from—
The Gem Supplies Co., Ltd.
(Dept. S),
67, Southwark St.,
London, S.E.

GEN BATH

SWISS WALKING PARTY for Grand Tour of Mont Blanc, Montreux, Chamonix, Aosta, Gd. St. Bernard, June 10th, for 12 guineas for 17 days. Particulars—Vicar, Hazlemere, High Wycombe.

THE VEGETARIAN DIRECTORY and Food Reformers Guide, 1913. The most complete list published of Boarding Houses, Stores, Apartments, Restaurants, Schools, etc., where reform dietary is obtainable. Contains also a list of food reform Nurses, Journals, Societies, etc. Should be consulted by all who desire to be and keep well. Price 1/- net (Postage 1d.).—C. W. Daniel, 3, Amen Corner, London, E.C.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's NAVY CUT

Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets and Tins.

May be obtained from all Stores and Tobaccoists of repute.

Regd. No. 154011

"duty" of charity involves the "right" of begging, and that is why the laws against begging are morally unjustifiable. "The setting up of the moral law as the standard of national life" of necessity involves "taking sides with the poor in the assertion of their rights," if those rights are denied them.

We are told that "The cause of social reform is not helped by indiscriminate denunciation of the rich or indiscriminate adulation of the poor." That depends. If we find that society as a whole is addicted to indiscriminate denunciation of the poor, and indiscriminate adulation of the rich, we may possibly be justified in doing something to redress the balance. One thing is quite certain. The Church must either leave social reform severely alone, or it must take the part of the poor against the rich.—I am sir, etc.,

K. L. KENRICK.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MISS ALICE JEANS has not been successful in her historical novel, MINGLED SEED (Cranston and Ouseley, 6s.). The author has the capacity for creating a certain dramatic interest, but her gifts do not lie in the direction of characterisation; the introduction of an historical personage into a romance calls for the power of painting past scenes in such vivid colours that the dry bones of dead years live again. This power is lacking in Miss Jeans. It needs more than a little courage to introduce names such as Napoleon, not to mention Cavour, and certainly the author does not suffer from an undue lack of modesty. The pity is that she does not content herself with the writing of a story as such, and leave to others better fitted for the task the attempt to portray men of European reputation. The book itself consists of plots, intrigues, a certain amount of fighting, and long-drawn-out interviews between subsidiary characters and the eminent personages before referred to. "The struggles of a strong nature torn between patriotism and religion," which form one of the chief items of interest in the story, are not convincingly reproduced. Interspersed with moral reflections, the stream of the narrative ebbs and flows. As thus: "He who in his old, happy, careless days had accepted lightly the teaching of the most materialistic school of psychology was a prey to this unreasoning misery, and . . . despite the most strenuous exertion of will, was obliged to think of his victims." With very much more of the same sort. We would advise the author to choose a less ambitious theme, or at least confine herself to the simple chronicles of everyday occurrence.

There is undoubted power in THE NIGHT NURSE (Chapman and Hall, 6s.), by the author of "The Surgeon's Log." The construction is weak, and the attempts at a plot sketchy and ill-considered; but certain of the characters are well drawn, the descriptions of hospital life convincing, and the story has a certain swing that carries one along. The heroine is one of those impossibly beautiful people that have "a strange, undefinable attraction," the sort of woman about whom other women say, "I can't imagine what he sees in her, my dear!" One is a little puzzled in Nora's case to discover the extraordinary charm which sets the studio and the hospital wards alight with admiration. For this young person is not only a ministering angel, but possesses a face of such entrancing loveliness that artists compete to paint her portrait. At times the author grips you with the undoubted reality of the scenes, notably the operation in the theatre, which is written with admirable restraint and force.

"Sir John glanced quickly at the square of exposed skin. He measured it with his eye.

"'Knife,' he said abruptly, swinging his arm behind him.

"The nurse put it into his waiting fingers; there was a flash, and a long, raw, red ellipsoid appeared in the area of breathing, iodine-stained whiteness. Automatically Fitzgerald's swab covered it, the red creeping quickly up the virgin purity of the sponge. He raised his hand sharply, a little vessel spurted six inches high, and his artery forceps, coming down with a clipping precision, stopped it instantly. Swiftly, steadily, working in the absolute knowledge and mutual practice, the four sets of fingers manipulated the wound."

THE MYSTERY WOMAN (Cassell, 6s.) is "a strange creature . . . a curious mixture of upper heaven and lower earth. All her life she had longed for mundane advantages. . . . Beneath her cold calm there lay a passionate yearning for power, the power to sway men's hearts, to govern men's intellects." After reading this, one is not surprised to learn that Althea Stanmount knew herself to be potentially great, and that at times there shone in her strange, pale eyes a light which might have illuminated the face of some seeress of ancient days! This remarkable and somewhat terrifying lady, as might be expected, does many strange and wonderful things. It is, we feel, a decline from her greatness that she should become a palmist, though the author somewhat rehabilitates her in connection with the Sixth Sense Society, the members of which insist on the distinction between the Initiated and the Unendowed. It is difficult to understand the precise significance of this distinction, but one is glad to learn that there is a half-way house for "ripening souls." Mrs. Campbell Praed is just a little out of date, both in her heroine and the background of the marvellous events that fill her crowded canvas. The end, however, is entirely in keeping; there could be only one such ending for an aspirant of the Sixth Sense Society. "Two misty shapes . . . rose from the river and floated up into the early morning sky. Against its purplish, star-strewn canopy they arose, clinging together, and soared towards the east, where a sheet of pale, pearly light was spreading softly, illuminating the far-distant reaches of space. And the happy Shapes soared on, never dreaming they were dead." It is wonderful what the sixth sense will do!

Messrs. Jarrold and Sons are to be congratulated on their issue of a book that adds considerably to the literature of the river of London. Books innumerable have been written on the scenery and certain features of the Thames, but hitherto no serious attempt has been made to treat exhaustively of its history. In ON AND ALONG THE THAMES (10s. 6d. net), Mr. W. Culling Gaze tells the story of the picturesque days of James the First. The author sketches in vivid colours the course of the river flowing through the Gloucestershire meadows. The literary and historical associations of the villages upon its banks are told in graphic language. One of the most interesting chapters deals with "Court life along the river." Starting with the death of "that great sovereign, but vain and wretched woman, Queen

(Continued on page 738.)

WEAK SIGHT CURED IN ONE MONTH.

SENT ON FREE TRIAL.

Discarded Glasses in One Month.

Miss N. COOKSON, 71, Ruskin Place, Frikleton, nr. Kirkham, writes, Nov. 18th, 1912: "After using your System I have given up wearing glasses altogether. I used it for two months, and have been without glasses a month to-day."

Perfect Vision in One Month.

Mr. GORDEN RAYNER, the noted Dentist of 37, Carlton Road, Worksop, Jan. 29th, 1913: "For the last five years I have worn glasses, but realizing how precious eyesight is, I tried your Treatment for one month. I have now left off glasses entirely, and I write as one possessing perfect vision where once it was imperfect."

Can do all work without Glasses.

Mr. WM. TURNER, South Hill Farm, Wellingborough, Northants, writes, Nov. 16th, 1912: "I now write to you thanking you for what you have done for my eyes. I am writing this without glasses, and my eyes are getting on lovely. I can do all my work without glasses now, and your Treatment has entirely cured them."

Some of the most wonderful cures known to Science are daily being accomplished by Dr. Percival's System, and many thousands of people have discarded spectacles entirely and regained perfect sight.

Even very aged sufferers have been completely cured after giving up all hope. In ordinary cases one month effects a complete cure, and spectacles can be entirely discarded.

So positive is Dr. Percival that his system will cure you that he will gladly send it on trial, and if it fails to benefit your sight, it will not cost you a single penny. In no better way can Dr. Percival prove his complete confidence in his system. Test it free. If it does not improve your sight, you pay nothing.

There is no pain, no danger, and no continuous expense. It will not interfere in the slightest with your daily occupation, for Dr. Percival treats you in your own home.

No matter how long you have suffered, no matter what other means you have tried, write to Dr. Percival now, and satisfy yourself first that his system will do all that he claims. After you have tried it, if you really believe your sight is not improved, Dr. Percival will accept your decision without the slightest question and bear the loss himself.

Send your name and address together with 2d. (abroad 4 foreign) stamps to Dr. Percival (Dept. 95), 43-45, Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

Discarded Glasses Entirely.

Miss B. W. GALLATLY, 41, Dallfield Terrace, Dundee, N.B., writes, Jan. 2nd, 1913: "The Treatment is giving great satisfaction. I never have headaches now, which is something new, as before I never was rid of them. I have stopped wearing glasses entirely."

Spectacles Discarded in Three Weeks.

Mr. H. O. WEBBER, of 261, Foxhall Road Ipswich, writes, Sept. 30th, 1912: "I am very glad to say that after three weeks' use, following your instructions, I dispensed with glasses, which I wore for three years, and my eyes are much better. I consider the Treatment a very valuable invention."

Cured in One Month.

Mr. WM. SIMPSON, 33, Dyehouse Fold, Apperley Bridge, Bradford, Oct. 18th, 1912: "I feel it my duty to tell you of the great benefit I received by the use of your Treatment. It is a month ago I began using it for weak sight, and now the defect has left me altogether."

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included. — Dept. E, THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

WOMAN AND MARRIAGE. A Handbook. By Margaret Stephens. Cloth, 3/6 net (Post free 3/10). "One of the most striking books which we have seen for a long time. . . . It is extremely outspoken, but, let us hasten to add, it is healthily outspoken." At all Booksellers.—T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

GLAISHER'S PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS. William Glaisher, Ltd., beg to announce that they have just issued a Supplementary List No. 393 to their General Catalogue of Publishers' Reminders, comprising all the latest purchases. Post free on request.—WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD., Remainder and Discount Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London, W.C. Readers residing in Croydon and neighbourhood can view all the books at our Branch shop, No. 14, GEORGE STREET, CROYDON, where complete catalogues can be obtained.

GENTLEMEN specially invited to join the Correspondence section of ROUND-ABOUT-CLUB, 350, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.; also Ladies. Social Gatherings on Wednesdays. Annual Subscription, £1 1s. Inland; 10s. 6d. Abroad.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settef Course." (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion" etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE, (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

PARLEZ VOUS FRANCAIS?

If you are learning or wish to learn French, get a copy of "The Anglo-French Journal."

This little book is published monthly—contains graduated lessons, which will enable you to rapidly become proficient.

1d. monthly at all bookstalls, or 1/4d. post free direct from ROSENBLUM'S LANGUAGE INSTITUTE, 226, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C. Branches: 319, Oxford Street, W.; 42, Lombard Street, E.C., LONDON. Lessons in all Foreign Languages.

THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER'S ASSURANCE.

Readers of "Everyman" are desired to specially note that all advertisements which appear in this publication are the announcements of reputable firms, consequently no one need hesitate to communicate with any of our advertisers.

The Advertisement Manager is prepared to investigate the complaint of any reader, should cause for the same arise at any time.

SHORTHAND. A REPORTER'S EXPERIENCE: "I have used Sloan-Duployan for many years as a reporter on the daily Press; I have used it in the Press Gallery of the House of Commons, and in many big special reports for the Government, and in the Law Courts. I think it is a very strong point with Sloan Duployan, besides all its other advantages, that young people can easily master it by their own unaided efforts."—From Mr. John McNeerley, 68, Fleet Street, E.C. SLOAN-DUPOYAN shorthand is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for interesting illustrated handbook, with specimen lesson, free.—Sloan-Duployan Co., Ramsgate.

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic, Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

TRY US!!! Typewriting 9d. per 1,000 words. Prompt, neat and absolutely accurate.—ADAPT CO., 43, Melbourne Avenue, Bowes Park, N.

IN THE WORLD OF WHIRLING WHEELS

there is one name and one chain that has stood pre-eminently and consistently for quality since the first Safety Cycle was put on the road:

It is unquestionably the best—ask anyone versed in cycling matters.

The chain fitted on all the best cycles is the Renold.

The chain specified by all experienced riders is the Renold.

The chain recommended by all experienced dealers is the Renold.

The chain with the name is the Renold.

One Quality—One Price—5/6 (Fitting extra).

Write for our interesting booklet, "The Engine Room of the Cycle."

HANS RENOLD Ltd., Dept. 14, MANCHESTER.

Elizabeth," the author passes on to the audience of King James the First to the Venetian Secretary, who, in a dispatch to the Doge and Senate, gives his impressions of the scene. "I was received . . . yesterday at Greenwich. I went there and found such a crowd as I never saw the like even in Constantinople in time of peace. There were upwards of ten or twelve thousand persons about. All the efforts of the guards hardly enabled me to reach the first, let alone the inner chamber, owing to the throng of nobility." Mr. Gaze recalls Sir Anthony Welldon's description of the King. "He was of middle stature, more corpulent through his clothes than in his body. . . . He was naturally of a timorous disposition, which was the reason of his quilted doublets. . . . His tongue was too large for his mouth, which ever made him speak full in the mouth, and made him drink very uncomely, as if eating his drink, which came out into the cup on each side of his mouth. . . . His walk was ever circular, his fingers ever in that walk fiddling about." These are only two of the many passages of interest and historical association in Mr. Gaze's notable production. The volume will be welcomed by all lovers of the Thames, and no one can read the book without adding to the pleasurable associations of a river loved by poets and painters, and enshrined for ever in the heart of English literature. We congratulate the author on his achievement.

Mr. Menzies Fergusson, in THE OCHIL FAIRY TALES (D. Nutt, 3s. 6d. net), shows certain of the qualities necessary to their telling. He uses the one and only possible beginning, "Once upon a time," and gets to the heart of the matter in the opening paragraph. "The Ochil Rose" is the best example of his style. "Once upon a time, when the Queen's sheep were pastured on the Ochil Hills, there lived a pretty little girl called the Ochil Rose at the farm of Fos-sachy." The description that follows is convincing enough to satisfy the most exigent child, while leaving sufficient scope to the imagination—a necessary part of the telling of a fairy story. In other numbers of this volume the author loses this sense of simplicity. He uses words unknown to fairyland. No child could possibly believe in the little people when they are spoken of as meeting at a "rendezvous," and the introduction of aeroplanes and steam-engines into a simple legend is an artistic error which the mind of a child would instantly detect. With these exceptions, Mr. Fergusson is to be praised in that he does not invest the familiar things of everyday life with magic, save at the will of the fairies. The modern child has been surfeited with supernatural carpets, talking tortoises, and highly endowed steam-engines. The wishing-cap, that by a wave of the fairies' wand brought luck to its possessor, is worth a thousand of them all, and the author, in realising this, has gone far on the road that leads to the perfect fairy tale. "The Brownie" is told with a due regard for detail, and the sense of mystery that children love. "The door opened gently, and a strange, quaint little figure stole into the room. It was a wee man, with a red cap upon his head, green shoes upon his feet, and a tight little jacket of greenish leather closely buttoned round his body." One realises the Brownie in a flash. You can see him sweeping the hearth and the floor, setting the dishes on the dresser. "Going out again, he brought in some peats, which he placed upon the fire, and, bending down upon his knees, he blew the embers until the fire blazed quite cheerily." The picture is complete; not a child but would realise and appreciate its truth.

Of all modern writers, Mr. E. F. Benson is notable for finished literary style and careful characterisation. These qualities are notable in THE WEAKER VESSEL (Heinemann, 6s.), but the sense of drama that characterises "Sheaves" and "The Climber" is not so present in his latest novel. The story opens in a country vicarage, and the description of Mrs. Ramsden, the vicar's wife, is inimitable. "Mrs. Ramsden's temperament was as angular as her person, which was as angular as a turnip-ghost. In neither (if, indeed, in any of them) was there a rounded corner; you could no more pass close to her without being pricked by her knee or elbow than you could live with her without coming in contact with similar acute and long slight projections of her mind . . . either a thing is right or it is wrong, for, if not, as she sometimes remarked, 'Where are we?' She, it may be mentioned, was usually there." Her husband was of the feather-bed variety of temperament, a peace-at-any-price man, who occasionally relapses into sentiment instantaneously suppressed on the approach of his wife. In these inauspicious surroundings Eleanor, Mrs. Ramsden's stepdaughter, grew up. Possessed of the artistic temperament, warm-hearted and impulsive, she escapes from her stepmother at the earliest possible moment, and in the most conventional fashion. She obtains a situation as governess, falls in love with a tutor who develops a genius for writing plays; Eleanor finally marries Harry Whittaker. The study of the influence of alcohol on the production of his plays is not entirely convincing, and it is difficult to feel convinced that a pen so brilliant and caustic, when assisted by a whisky and soda, should be so utterly flat and uninspired when removed from its inspiring influence.

THE CELIBACY OF MAURICE CANE (Holden and Hardingham, 6s.) is an example of slipshod writing, colourless characterisation, and exaggerated point of view. The story devotes certain chapters to the description of a monastery. We can only hope that monks do not talk in the impulsively prosy manner described by Mr. Conway Gordon, who appears to think that the contemplative life consists in interminable exordiums. Maurice, a hero brought up in this enlivening atmosphere, develops into a morbid, weak-kneed youth. The story, such as it is, centres round the taking of an oath of celibacy by him, his breaking of the same, and, finally, his marriage to an entirely eligible young person.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarion London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

TO BE COMPLETED IN 12 VOLUMES.

Edited by ANDREW BOYLE.

CLOTH,
1/-
NET.

LEATHER,
2/-
NET.

PRESS OPINIONS

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"It is not easy to know who should be congratulated most; the editor, Mr. Andrew Boyle, on so admirable an achievement, the publishers on so courageous an undertaking, or the public on the prospect of being able to purchase for twelve monthly shillings a complete encyclopædia of knowledge."

DAILY NEWS.—"No stately folio opens more uncompromisingly flat, the thin page making no unseemly attempt at independence; and although 600 such pages lie within a breadth of a bare three-quarters of an inch, the indispensable opacity is much more perfectly preserved than in some much more grandiose works which have sought to compress the full quart of learning into the pint pot of portability."

MANCHESTER COURIER.—"There can be little doubt that countless readers, hitherto prevented only by considerations of cost from acquiring what has become an indispensable part of every household, will be quick to take advantage of this golden opportunity of possessing an encyclopædia which not only answers all their everyday needs, but also makes a handsome addition to any library."

DUNDEE ADVERTISER.—"This volume is a triumph of practical bookmaking. The paper is of excellent quality, and in 628 pages we have half a million words set in clear, broad type . . . The volume opens perfectly flat, and, in short, is the most marvellous shilling book of reference on the market."

WORLD.—" . . . The result is eminently satisfactory, and great popularity may be anticipated for one of the handiest and most correct little reference books ever published."

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

Why did he leave?

Why did Smith so abruptly jump up and bounce out? Was it impatience or the sudden recollection of an appointment that must be kept? No! Two days ago he had sent for the "Clemak" book, entitled "His First Shave," and it had come that morning. Of course, he hadn't had time to read it at breakfast—got up too late! But the little book was useful during the weary wait at the barber's—and it showed Smith how to avoid such waste of time in the future. That's why he jumped up so quickly and left the shop.

Henceforth Smith shaves with a "Clemak."

The "Clemak" is as good as any guinea razor, but only costs 5s. It is beautifully made, easy to manipulate, and splendidly efficient. The seven blades included in the Outfit are made of finest grade Sheffield steel, hardened and tempered by a special electric process. They retain a fine edge, and can be stropped over and over again.

The "Clemak" is no trouble to clean, is always ready for use, and lasts a lifetime.

Acquire the "Clemak" habit! Buy a "Clemak" to-day. Save those threepences, and weary waits at the barber's; cease to inflict torture upon yourself with a variable, dangerous, time-wasting ordinary razor.

Buy a "Clemak" and every morning you will enjoy a close, clean, comfortable shave, accomplished in double-quick time.

FREE Send to-day for the amusing and informative "Clemak" Book, "HIS FIRST SHAVE."

FORM FOR FREE BOOK.

EVERYMAN.

To CLEMAK RAZOR CO.,
17, BILLITER ST., LONDON, E.C.

Please send me gratis, and post free, a copy of your book, "His First Shave," which illustrates in colour the Clemak Outfits, and also gives useful hints on shaving.

Name

Address

Only id. stamp needed, if envelope be not closed. Or postcard will do, on mentioning EVERYMAN.

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

Remember, its a "Clemak" you want—refuse Imitations.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5/6

CLEMAK OUTFITS

Complete in case.
Clemak Razor and Seven Blades .. 5/-
Combination Outfit, Strop-ping Machine, Hide Strop, with Clemak and Twelve Blades .. 10/6

Obtainable from all Cutlers, Ironmongers, Stores, &c., or post free on receipt of price from the CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street, London, E.C. [Works, Sheffield.]

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 24. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
LAT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, MARCH 28, 1913

One Penny.

History in the Making— Notes of the Week	PAGE 741
An Awakening in New England—By Vida D. Scudder	742
Life in a London Bastille—Part III.— By Thomas Holmes	743
Enterprise in Business—An Omission in the Socialist Argument	744
Educational Reform—By Prof. J. J. Findlay	745
A Scottish Theologian—By W. R. Thomson	747
Welsh Clouds—By Dorothy Eyre	747
Victor Hugo—By E. Hermann	748
Portrait of Victor Hugo	749
A Plea for Esperanto	750
"The Great Adventure" at the Kings- way Theatre	751

CONTENTS

ARTICLES

BY

VIDA SCUDDER

PROF. FINDLAY

HUGH SINCLAIR

W. R. THOMSON

Literary Notes	PAGE 752
The Greek Drama—II. Sophocles— By Prof. J. S. Phillimore	753
Wagner and Bayreuth	755
Boy's Love—Short Story—By Beatrice Marshall	756
Masterpiece for the Week—Huxley's Lay Sermons	758
Silhouette	761
Mark Rutherford—By Hugh Sinclair	762
Correspondence— Unemployment and Over-population	764
Anglo-German Relations	764
Educational Reform	765
The Mill Girl	766
The "Facts" of Irish History	768
Books of the Week	770

HISTORY IN THE MAKING NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE is reason to hope that the problem of the delimitation of Albania, upon which the prospect of peace in the Balkans virtually depends, is nearing its solution. Austria has at last agreed that Djakova be given up to Servia on condition that the Russian Government shall insist upon the abandonment of the Montenegrin claim to Scutari. The result of such an agreement will be, of course, the creation of an Albanian State, nominally independent, but really under the protection of Austria. Needless to say, the Austro-Hungarian Chauvinist organs have been loud and vehement in their denunciation of the surrender of Djakova, which they described as a piece of living flesh torn from the body of a free Albania to please Russia. But those who are acquainted with the inextricable entanglement of races in Albania know that any delimitation must be purely artificial, and every sane student of the situation must rejoice that the perilous Austro-Hungarian difficulty is solving itself, and there is now every chance of the ending of a sterile war.

Political murders are in the air once more. Last week the King of the Hellenes was shamefully assassinated by a mental degenerate. Now news comes from China of the murder of Sung-Chiao-Jen, ex-Minister of Agriculture and Forestry, who was assassinated while boarding a train. He was President of the Kuomintang, or United Nationalists, who can claim 368 out of the 546 members in the coming Parliament, and who are pledged to vote for a party Cabinet and provincial rights, in opposition to Yuan-Shi-Kai's policy of a Peking dictatorship. This fact lends special significance to the assassination, which is likely to have a drastic effect upon the Convocation of Parliament on April 8th. Many Kuomintang members who had already assembled at Peking have left, and there is a widespread opinion that the whole party will assemble at Nankin, which would create a position sown with every eventuality of grave civil strife. The present murder is not an isolated event, but the last of a chain of political murders which have electrified the atmosphere since the Revolution. Whatever the outcome may be, one thing is sure—the day is past when China could be intimidated by the assassin's dagger, and murder as a short cut to rule has become impossible in the country of Sun-Yat-Sen.

At a conference held in Manchester the other day the economic effect of raising the school age was discussed, educationalists and economists alike advocating some degree of State compulsion. Professor J. J. Findlay, of Manchester University, emphasised the difficulty of dealing with the great mass of neglected youth, who were roped in neither by the official night-schools nor by the boys' clubs. He saw no remedy for the evil short of the right of the State to exercise some amount of definite control over youth up to the age of eighteen in every rank of society—a compulsion which must clearly be accompanied by interference, not only with the freedom and licence of youth, but with the rights of the employer. The same suggestion is urged in the memorial recently presented to the Prime Minister by a number of representative educationalists.

With the death of Lady Dorothy Nevill, at the advanced age of eighty-seven, another link with the great Victorians has been severed. She counted among her friends the best Englishmen and women of her time, including the Duke of Wellington, Lord Palmerston, Cobden, Bright, Disraeli, Gladstone, G. F. Watts (who painted her portrait), Bulwer Lytton, and many others. Her catholicity of spirit, intellectual power, and charm of personality made her salon a point de repère for the great and wise, of whatever party, and her published reminiscences show her a past-mistress of the lost art of the diarist.

AN AWAKENING IN NEW ENGLAND

BY VIDA D. SCUDDER

OVER-INTELLECTUALISED New England, at rest in its fine traditions, has had a rude awakening. Through the textile industries, the chief source of its prosperity, has swept a revolutionary flame. From these industries are derived the comfortable fortunes of many of our best citizens, including leaders in education and religion. It does not appear that these high-minded men ever took any special interest in the mill towns. There is no evidence that they had been aware of the conditions among the throngs of labourers from Southern and Eastern Europe who surged through those old streets where frame houses and white churches still speak of Puritan days. Toward the industrial situation which had silently arisen everybody alike was ignorant, baffled, and helpless.

Helpless and baffled we may remain; but we cannot be ignorant any longer.

A year ago everything seemed quiet. Trade unions existed, but in apathetic fashion, American unions having imperfectly adjusted themselves to the invasion of labour by non-English speaking peoples. The operatives, representing nineteen or more nationalities, possessed no common will, no common speech. But beneath their silence there was misery and unrest. Then came a labour law, limiting the hours of work for women. The manufacturers, automatically as it were, lowered wages; in Lawrence, Massachusetts, they stupidly sprang the cut-down without warning, and, also automatically if you will, without premeditation or organisation, the people struck.

All conditions for a successful strike seemed lacking. But suddenly two Italian leaders appeared—Joseph Ettor, New York born, son of the people, and Arturo Giovannitti, ex-theological student and poet. These men were imbued with a philosophy strange to us then, now familiar as Syndicalism. They told the strikers that "they need but remain motionless to control the world," preached "direct action," had much to say of international fraternity, and organised the strike under a revolutionary association opposed to the old trade unions, the Industrial Workers of the World. Slavs, Italians, Hebrews lifted their heads with brightening eyes, and the great strike was "on."

Such a strike as the United States in the East had never witnessed. For the leaders, while using in the main pacific tactics, did not hesitate to say that no paltry rise in wages, but "the abolition of the wage system" was the end of the struggle. Fine men, these leaders. The public heard only of agitators from without, but the situation developed admirable local talent. Franco-Belgians, trained in co-operatives at home, were the backbone of the strike; though speaking no English, they had to work indirectly. Their ideas had been current enough among us in the old days of Brook Farm. In their hall, a maison du peuple, modelled on those at home, were the strike headquarters; here delegates from the nineteen nations, singing "L'Internationale" to many sets of words, but to one tune, engineered affairs with marked ability, while they gained a new vision and a new sense of brotherhood.

Meanwhile the parades—not always tranquil—the enthusiasm and eloquence, the European methods, in short, alarmed the town. That there was also violence, though not in serious amount, cannot be doubted. Militia and State police were summoned. Streets were full of soldiers. Pressmen swarmed—often complaining, by the way, that their stories were suppressed or mangled by the capitalist papers—and their alert gaiety concealed the seriousness of war correspondents. Lawrence was the scene of a miniature revolution: one wondered if round the corner one would come on a barricade.

There were no barricades and there was no real fighting. There were riots. In one a woman striker was killed, and Ettor and Giovannitti, neither of whom had the slightest relation to the deed, were clapped into prison, charged with murder in the first degree on the ground of inciting speeches. The idea was to get them out of the way; but a chimera can always sprout a new head. "Big Bill Haywood," notorious in Western labour wars, a name of terror to New England, came on and took the lead.

Dynamite was discovered in several places. No evidence connected it with the strikers; and in due time a member of the school committee, one Breen, son of a former mayor, was convicted of planting it. He was obviously suborned—by whom is not known. Investigation is pending. When three people, one of them William Wood, head of the American Woollen Company, were indicted on the charge of planting the dynamite, one of the three, a Mr. Pitman, the contractor who had built the mills, and who was said to have betrayed the plot, committed suicide. The workers believe that the dynamite was deliberately planted to cast suspicion on them. Should the investigation drop, this belief will become fixed.

Following methods familiar to industrial disturbances abroad, the strike committee sent beves of children away from the besieged town to be cared for by comrades elsewhere. The policy was vigorously opposed. Philanthropic societies protested. There was a disturbance at the station, where it is claimed (responsible newspaper men, eye-witnesses, assure me truly) that mothers trying to put their children on trains were clubbed by the police. That women were on other occasions brutally treated is certain, if bruises can speak. This episode turned public sympathy. Of social freedom we have as yet small conception in New England, but of personal freedom we are extremely jealous; and that parents should be interfered with was more than the public would stand.

A Congressional inquiry was discussed and advocated. One heard little more of it. It vanished softly and silently, like the Snark; why, who shall say?

But suddenly, behold! the strike was settled! And the strikers won. A rise in wages from five to fifteen per cent., aggregating throughout New England no less than five million dollars, was the result. Why did the owners yield? Was it the whispered threat of that inquiry, or was it, as they claim, a sudden rise in the market for textiles? Such a rise certainly and opportunely occurred last spring.

Meantime fresh disturbances break out, now here, now there. New England is awake; everybody is awake. And those Christian citizens in high places, representing the best traditions of the country, they, whose revenues are derived from the mill towns, may there be any power of leadership in them? New England is waiting to discover.

LIFE IN A LONDON BASTILLE * * * BY THOMAS HOLMES

PART III.

WE left the blood-stained roof and sat again in 246. The husband was quietly at work, and the wife briskly joined him, as if determined to make up for lost time. Their work was eminently fitted for the place—it was monotonous, degrading, and life-destroying. They had piles of steel "bristles" before them, and their work consisted in picking up the "bristles" singly and inserting them in oval-shaped pieces of rubber the size of small hair-brushes. The rubber was perforated with small holes; at the back of the rubber the wooden portion of the brush was fixed, this also being perforated. The puzzle was to push the piece of thin steel wire through the hole in the rubber and find its corresponding hole in the wood. When every hole was filled and every bristle stood erect and of proper length their task was finished and a penny earned. If the holes corresponded, their task was simple; if the underneath holes were out of place, they took some finding.

For five years they had sat together at this exhilarating task, their children helping them after school hours. They considered themselves fortunate when their combined earnings amounted to ten shillings for a week's work.

Sometimes the tiny bits of steel proved refractory and entered their fingers instead of the rubber and wood. I have seen women engaged in this particular industry with fingers bloody, covered with sores, and presenting an altogether sickening appearance.

Both husband and wife's fingers were happily sound. Still, a convulsive movement occasionally told that a piece of wire had done a little business on its own account.

Such was their life, week in and week out, as the years went by. The girl of eighteen bringing home her earnings to swell the family exchequer and sleeping in the unwashed rags. The clever boy of fifteen bringing home his earnings, sleeping on the living-room floor, rising first, lighting the fire, and filling the kettle.

"They are good children—look at their certificates!" said the mother. "What will become of them; what will become of them? We can't get out!"

Yet they are the "aristocracy" of the Bastille.

Surely Death did a kind action when he carried off the blind matchbox maker; surely the "big lump" for which he was insured was well spent when it enabled a family to flee from the City of Destruction! Money was never better spent. It was infinitely better than an orgy of flowers, ever so much better than a "nice funeral," at once the admiration of children and the envy of adults. Yes, insurance was justified for once!

I made the acquaintance of the matchbox making family nine years ago, and they introduced me to the Bastille.

A boy of eleven had been charged with the heinous crime of stealing some wood paving blocks that had been removed from the street to be replaced by new ones. He told the magistrate that he was going to take them home to burn, that his father was blind, and his mother a matchbox maker.

Their address was 240, Bastille. I will not describe their rooms, I only say that the Bastillians are quite justified in considering the wire hairbrush makers as "aristocrats." I bought sheets and blankets, towels and clothing, had the rooms cleansed, and generally helped them for a time. I called on them one afternoon about three o'clock. The blind man had gone to the factory with seven gross of boxes.

In the room, on the bed, on the table and floor lay hundreds of boxes in part made or completed. The smell of the glue, combined with the atmosphere of the room, made me feel sick and faint.

The woman at one end of the table was working with the movements and precision of an automatic machine. At the other end of the table sat a child of four pasting bits of sandpaper, for "striking" purposes, on the boxes his mother threw across to him as she completed her part. The child, big-eyed and wan, was working with the finished movements of an adult. I gasped and remonstrated. "He has been very poorly, so I am keeping him from school this afternoon, and he is helping me a bit; I have to get all these into the factory before seven o'clock," so she told me.

The child's early death did not enable them to "get out." Four times daily that wilted bud of humanity had climbed those seventy-four stairs; sometimes, when he was not well, "he helped his mother a bit." His sacrifice was not sufficient; but, thank God, his blind father completed it, for the remainder of the family are "out."

Truth to tell, I could be well content for the wire hairbrush maker to make a quick and happy dispatch, and allow his child-bearing slave wife, to realise the "good lump."

In his life he will never save his children, but, horrible though it be to say it, his death might prove their salvation. Yet, I suppose, he is a decent, respectable fellow; but he is so content to go on sticking in those little bits of wire, so content that his daughter should sleep on a bed of rags, and his clever boy upon the living-room floor, that I hate him!

A boy of five, entirely naked, is running about on the broken pavement of the courtyard, evidently enjoying his freedom from clothes, although the month is January. His mother, a widow and a decent woman, is engaged in washing, drying, and repairing the graceless urchin's only garments. The "aristocrat" in 246, looking down from her altitude, is scandalised, so she descends the seventy-four stairs, carrying with her a boy's overcoat very much worn, covers the nakedness of the freedom-loving child, calls out to the widow, "I thought the dear child might take cold; you can keep it till to-morrow." Then she climbs the seventy-four steps and falls to her steel bristle sticking. Even the hot breath of the Bastille cannot wither all good impulses in its "aristocracy"!

The Bastille, February, 1913. I am seriously reversing my opinion of the male steel bristler in 246. He has got more pluck than I imagined. He has encountered and defeated a good-sized desperado who was attempting to rob his penny-in-the-slot gas meter; he caught him in the act, punched his head, and made him run. I don't believe that I quite hate him; I hope he will live to "get out." But I cannot help hoping that there will be no additional young "bristlers" and no further use for little coffins in 246!

(To be continued.)

ENTERPRISE IN BUSINESS

AN OMISSION IN THE SOCIALIST ARGUMENT

I.

It is generally assumed that Socialist books are pre-naturally clever, and that most Socialist writers are endowed with some of the scintillating wit of Mr. Bernard Shaw, and of the corrosive irony of Mr. Wells. My own impression is that Socialist writers of the average Marxist type are extraordinarily dull, only a shade less dull than the representatives of the orthodox dismal science. It is equally assumed that Socialism is a bad case argued by very brilliant men. My own impression is that it is a very good argument, spoiled by superficial and bigoted advocates. Socialist debaters are generally so ignorant that they invariably stumble against the most obvious obstacles. They are so cocksure that they never trouble to meet the argument of their opponents, and they are intellectually so dishonest that they are always ready to impute moral dishonesty to their opponents.

II.

Perhaps the best and simplest example of Socialist sophistry is the eternal repetition of the dogma that Capital and Labour are the only producers of wealth. The obvious answer is that there is a far more important factor in the production of Wealth than either, namely, Management and Organisation, that no matter how abundant the Capital, no matter how inexhaustible the supply of Labour, if Management and Organisation are wanting or inferior the result must be failure or bankruptcy.

The Socialist may, no doubt, retort that Management and Organisation are only a form of Labour, namely, Intellectual Labour, or that they are only a form of Capital, namely, the Capital of Skill accumulated as the result of training or heredity. That may be true in a metaphysical or a metaphorical sense, but if you go to the root of the matter, and if you drop metaphor or metaphysics or sophistry and casuistry, you will find that Capital and Labour on the one hand, and Organisation and Management on the other hand, are different, not only in degree, but in kind. And you will find that whereas the one is always available, the other is lamentably scarce; that whilst Capital can be democratised quite as much as Labour—a huge Capital can be owned by a crowd of small investors—Management and Organisation must remain the monopoly of an élite.

III.

But there is another factor in the production of Wealth far more important than Capital and Labour, far more important than Management and Organisation, and yet one which Socialist writers and orthodox economists consistently ignore, namely, Enterprise and Speculation. Again and again we see a new form of Enterprise revolutionising business and trade. A Genoese adventurer believes in the sphericity of the earth, and discovers a new world. A Frenchman sees the means of putting the Mediterranean into communication with the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean, and lo! the Suez Canal diverts the trade of Europe. An innkeeper sees the possibilities of Zermatt as a health resort, and makes the prosperity of a district. A newspaper proprietor sees the future of the penny paper, and the Morning Post is launched on a career of unexampled prosperity. A publisher anticipates the needs of popular education; he believes that the future lies in producing cheap books for the million rather than in producing expensive books for the few, and he stakes his own future on a chance.

Whatever form Enterprise may take, it is the soul of business. It is its driving power. It is its vital principle. Where such enterprise does not exist, as in France, however rich the people may be, and however industrious, however gifted as organisers, they cannot become an industrial power. On the contrary, where such spirit does exist, the people will achieve wonders, and build up a gigantic trade. Thus, modern Germany owes her industrial expansion, not to Capital and Labour, nor to Management, but to ENTERPRISE.

It is the function of Enterprise not only to develop an industry, but to call it into existence. For there is this essential difference between Capital and Labour and Enterprise, that Capital and Labour merely reproduce or multiply or develop what already exists. Enterprise creates what did not exist. It launches forth on the high seas of the unknown. Like genius, it initiates. Like heroism, it conquers. Like religion, it performs miracles.

IV.

And the reason is obvious. Enterprise initiates like genius, simply because it is genius. It conquers like heroism, simply because it is a form of heroism. It performs miracles like religion, simply because it is a form of religion.

Few people realise the combination of qualities which are indispensable for the success of any great enterprise. In the first place, it calls forth the intellectual qualities, the clear vision, the prophetic eye, the synthetic mind, and human language has appropriately given the same name to the operations of the philosopher and to the operations of the financier or company promoter. Both activities are termed "speculation." And, in the second place, Enterprise calls forth the highest moral qualities, not only tenacity of purpose, but the qualities of daring and valour, the qualities which make the adventurer and the explorer. Well may the leaders of business be called "Captains of Industry," for their activity does call for exactly the virtues of the soldier. Like the hero of Balzac's novel, "The Quest of the Absolute," the Captains of Industry must be prepared to face ruin and bankruptcy in the Industrial battle. Like the Polar explorer, he has to choose between victory and ruin. Nor is he daunted by the knowledge that for every one triumph there are twenty failures. And, finally, Enterprise demands some of the qualities which, in their highest form, constitute the religious temperament: the visionary enthusiasm, that optimism and confidence which stakes everything on a venture, and, above all, the theological virtue of faith, a faith beyond reason and beyond calculating prudence.

V.

Enterprise is so vital a factor in the production of Wealth that if it were proved that Individualism is necessary to its existence, and that Socialism is fatal to it, I, for one, would prefer Individualism, with all its dangers, to Socialism, with all its security.

But I emphatically deny that Socialism would paralyse Enterprise, and that Individualism does foster it. For Enterprise is essentially courage and heroism as applied to business. And courage and heroism are not economic or political qualities; they are moral and vital qualities. Politics and economics may crush Enterprise. They do not produce it.

Enterprise has been found compatible with the most different political conditions. It has even been found compatible with despotism. One of the most gigantic industrial enterprises of modern times, the Trans-Siberian Railway, has been accomplished by an absolute Government and a bankrupt State under the impulse of Count Witte. An equally gigantic industrial undertaking, the Suez Canal, was obstructed by the British Government, and was only made possible with the financial assistance of an Oriental despot, even as four centuries ago the enterprise of Columbus was discouraged by the free Republics of Italy, whilst it was furthered by the Spanish Kings.

And if we compare the attitude of the private individual and of the community with regard to Enterprise, we shall find that the modern State is much more likely to encourage Enterprise than Capitalism.

Capitalism only looks at immediate returns and from the point of view of immediate gain. Capitalism is essentially short-sighted, and even where it does encourage Enterprise it perverts it for its own ignoble purposes; it transforms even the noblest undertaking into a reckless gamble. On the contrary, the modern State can afford to experiment, to look at distant aims, to entertain high ideals, to forgo immediate profit. We can see how scientific investigations have been thriving under the fostering care of the State. The most far-reaching discoveries, those of Helmholtz, of Pasteur, of Lister, emanated from University men, that is to say, from State officials. Why should the same not hold true with regard to commercial and industrial enterprise? To assume that without the incentive of immediate gain industrial enterprise would collapse is to ignore the deeper motives which drive the enterprising genius. It is like saying that the courageous man would become a coward if he were not rewarded for his courage. Enterprise which is really creative does not originate mainly in a desire to make a fortune; rather does it proceed from a vital impulse. It proceeds from instinct rather than from conscious reason. Enterprise is the expression of a strong personality, of irrepressible vitality, and, therefore, it will best thrive in a state of society which respects personality, rather than in a state of society where the majority of the people live in a practical state of slavery.

AMETHYST.

It was only a summer idyll. It lasted no longer than the sunshine: it was as fleeting as the life of a butterfly.

They gathered scabious in the fields when the sun shone smilingly down on their happiness. That summer was one sweet joy between two dreary winters. The scabious died in the girl's hands; the man remembered that her eyes seemed to reflect that wonderful colour.

In after life, when the girl met sorrow and pain, she thought of her amethyst holiday, and a smile came into her face and light to her eyes.

VOLUME I. OF "EVERYMAN"

HANDSOMELY bound in cloth at the price of 3s. 6d., the first volume of EVERYMAN will shortly be ready. Applications are already being received, and all those desirous of obtaining the first of what should prove a long series of interesting volumes should write to EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons. Cases for binding can be obtained at 1s. 6d. A complete and detailed index to Vol. I (Nos. 1-26) is now in preparation, and will appear as a Supplement to the first number of the new volume (No. 27).

EDUCATIONAL REFORM

BY PROF. J. J. FINDLAY

It is probable that the views I am invited to express on the text provided by Lord Haldane in his Manchester speech will coincide largely with those already published (February 28th) in EVERYMAN by my friend, Professor Adams; but I shall approach the theme from a different angle. If my exposition appears more revolutionary, I can assure the reader that it is only an appearance. Revolutions do not happen in education; but the seeds of revolt can be sown! In sowing, planting, and watering I imagine that we are anticipating pretty much the same harvest—we shall leave the reaping to other hands.

When a nation seriously proposes to tackle its educational system it must take long views; the mind must detach itself somewhat from immediate problems; we must look backward over an epoch, and forward a generation or two ahead, in order to grasp the significance of what is proposed for schools and teachers. Our purpose will be served by turning the page of history for a hundred years: roughly speaking, the educational systems as we know them to-day in the civilised world are about a century old.

Roughly speaking, the schools have been developed—with enormous rapidity—side by side with the modern industrial system, which has transformed human relations in every sphere of life. Immense increase of population, immense increase of wealth and of the means of subsistence, immense increase in the means of communication and exchange have been accompanied by an ever-increasing pressure on the individual to compete with his fellows—a tragic struggle to secure the good things of life. These are the outstanding phenomena of the epoch; minor movements in politics, art, society no doubt may be noted, but here surely are the governing factors which have marked the life of every man and woman who reads EVERYMAN. Inevitably, therefore, a system of schooling has had to be created which will meet these imperative demands. And the system displays two outstanding features: with these every educational reformer has to reckon.

Firstly, schooling has had to be organised wholesale: a minimum has been provided to meet the bare needs of an incessantly increasing population. Just as manufacturer and merchant toil to produce food and clothes, of a sort, in stupendous quantities to satisfy the material needs of a universe, so an educational machine has been devised to equip children en masse with the gifts of culture and character. And the failure of public education—so far as it has failed—is due to the bare fact that this work cannot be done on the factory system. Before this industrial era there had been a few great systems of schooling, recognised as great by the common verdict of mankind; but all of them (in sharp contrast to our modern plan) were marked by one feature, viz., the pupil was treated as an individual, in personal contact with his teacher and with a few comrades, gaining thus an experience in which his own personality had scope, although no doubt the teacher's authority and influence were oftentimes excessive. The teacher of to-day struggles, in many cases with hopeless devotion, to an impossible task, trying to help the individual life of the scholar, but forced by the pressure of the wholesale machine to produce the impossible. Often he abandons the struggle and becomes a factory hand, turning out pupils by the dozen, equipped more or less with the superficialities of culture, but influenced, very slightly, in the matters that count as fundamentals.

Secondly, the school system thus rapidly evolved has lent itself with fatal facility to the pushful competitive spirit, which is our special inheritance from the industrial epoch. The report of President Wilson's Inaugural Address, recently cabled from Washington, supplies striking evidence of what this spirit stands for, and of the new forces working in the common mind to expel it. These forces have not yet turned their searchlight on the school system; it is time they did. For example, the educational ladder, in itself a noble outcome of the belief in human brotherhood, is degraded to the service of class competition and rivalry. The curriculum, designed in earlier ages to serve the supreme needs of the scholar as a spiritual being, is avowedly directed in many quarters to enable the child to get on, to equip the rising generation more effectively to scheme and organise for wealth and position. Our fierce energy for discovery and invention, in rivalry with Germany or America, is transferred to the schools; the salvation of our little ones, it is believed, depends upon their being precociously imbued with these same sentiments. It being the common belief that mankind has benefited by the portentous effects of the steam engine and the rubber industry, our children's upbringing must be governed by ideals and practices which will increase the pile.

Space will not permit of presenting evidence to prove this diagnosis correct. Many minor movements might be referred to by a critic as evidence on the other side; but the schools, as controlled and fashioned by the will of the people, appear to me, on a broad survey, to have succumbed to the social maladies of our age.

Hence any real "reform" in education must be based on our willingness to shape our system in accord with a finer ideal of life, of the things that are worth while. Our fathers adopted, from earlier times and from foreign lands (ancient and modern), an instrument of progress which was designed to serve the noblest ends; but in the welter of social and economic struggle which the industrial epoch has evolved we have degraded this instrument, until it turns in our hands and threatens to perpetuate in the young those very qualities which are poisoning our social system. Our malady is a malady of the spirit, and while we cannot put back the clock and revert with piety to the simpler code of an earlier day, we can at any rate clear up the issue by recognising our kinship with the great teachers of the past. Before making our plan for the future we, as Ruskin put it, become backsliders—back to Socrates, back to Pestalozzi, back (I write with all reverence) to the New Testament.

All of which, the reader may say, sounds excellent as pulpit talk, but leads nowhere! Lord Haldane and his colleagues are offering to spend millions of public money on education, and it is our business to advise them how to spend it, instead of discussing ideals.

Now, on the contrary, I have looked backwards because I am convinced that such a survey will lead directly to practical proposals, in line with the whole trend of social progress. For I hold that these distinctive ugly features of the industrial epoch are temporary, and hence teachers and schools need to be so adjusted and improved as to respond to the saner, steadier, brighter ideals of life which are in store for the children of to-morrow. The achievement of these, the endeavour to realise them, will absorb not only the few millions presaged by Lord Haldane, but all the lavish excess of wealth which we now squander in vanity and pride. This new estimate of life values—call it, if you like, a new religion—will carry with it a passionate devotion to posterity; we shall discern, as the world has never hitherto discerned, that to cherish our children is the highest, happiest duty that a race can perform; this devotion, hitherto displayed as an exclusive trait of family or caste, will enlarge itself until it embraces the children of all ranks in the community. We shall, in a sense, worship posterity and dedicate ourselves to its service; we shall realise that the survival of our city, our people, our Empire depends not at all upon its wealth or its prestige, but upon the virtue and the wisdom of its young; and, therefore, we shall be ready to spend our all upon their behalf.

Animated by such a purpose, where shall we begin our educational reform? Clearly the teacher and his office will be a matter of vital concern. The nation will see to it that the wisest, broadest, kindest folk are entrusted with the duty, and will provide without demur all that is needed for leading a secure and tranquil existence.

Ridding itself, as the nation is bound to do, of the excesses of the competitive era, the first anxiety will be to banish these doctrines from the school by relieving the teacher from the grosser forms of competition with his comrades. Here is a task for statesmanship in line with the tendencies of our time—to devise means by which every man or woman entrusted with the care of the young is secure of a modest means of livelihood, adequate to enable him to pursue his calling and support his individual and social life without distress.

This reform means much more than a rise in the salary scale; it implies a new conception of the teacher's function in the body politic. In medicine the essential factor is the physician, and in school the educative process is substantially achieved when you have secured your teacher and put him into such a position that he can actually guide young children with effect.

Our legislators must have this fundamental position always in their minds: the selection, equipment, character, training of the teacher, and therewith his freedom (economic and spiritual alike)—these are the topics which present the task for statesmanship in education.

For when this is granted much else will follow: smaller classes, of course; more rational teaching, with study of child-nature, equally of course; the control of adolescence, by the reform of the Continuation School, equally of course; for all these are matters which a teaching profession, respected by the nation and with some leisure to think out a policy and advise the country, will press upon our attention.

On the last, the Continuation School, a final word may be added, for it is in dealing with the adolescent that our industrial epoch has shown itself once more in striking contrast with the world of earlier days.

Until the era of the factory, youth in all civilised countries was controlled by apprenticeship. The industrial era has abolished the severe, but wholesome, discipline of the apprentice system, and has substituted nothing in its place. Yet the educators of an earlier day, from Plato to Vittorino and Arnold of Rugby, won their greatest triumphs in the training of youth; the modern world, under new conditions and with a vastly increased obligation, must revert to their example. The problem is not merely a scholastic one: it touches the world of commerce and industry in its tenderest spot; all the more opportunity, therefore, for statesmen to rise to a great occasion and help to heal this open sore in the body politic.

A SCOTTISH THEOLOGIAN*

ACCORDING to the proverb, if one keeps an article for seven years one finds a use for it. The proverb, however, referring to things whose immediate use is not discernible, does not apply to Professor Paterson's lectures. Seven years ago, on their delivery, their value was at once acknowledged. Now, on their publication, they constitute a book unique of its kind. In the preface the regret is expressed that the improvement effected on the lectures during their in reletis period "has not been commensurate with the delay." Surely that regret may be dismissed. Professor Paterson has given us the best introduction to Dogmatics that we possess.

Those who have tried to write on theology will marvel most at the ease and mastery with which Professor Paterson handles his material, at the unflinching adequacy and sobriety of his expression, and at the balance maintained throughout the whole work. During his long journey the author never loses himself, is never out of breath or ruffled. Amid contending systems and jarring voices he remains deliberate and calm. Every phase of the long travail of theological thinking is exhibited; it appears at the proper stage and vanishes at the appropriate moment, with just the needful word of description, interpretation, or criticism.

Yet Professor Paterson is not merely a curious onlooker at one aspect of the spiritual drama of twenty centuries, though, at times, his work leaves on one the impression of something extraordinarily impersonal. There is present what he calls a "governing idea." This is that "we have to approach theology with an intense realisation that our primary datum is a religion, which, as such, undertakes to produce practical results, and that our primary attitude is that the Christian religion is an effective instrument for grappling with the heavy spiritual tasks which it undertakes to accomplish." Throughout the whole discussion this governing idea retains its authority.

There is a fine impartiality, but never mere scientific detachment. The reader is never allowed to forget that it is a religion that is being dealt with, and not a collection of more or less justifiable speculations.

It is perhaps needless to say that the odium theologicum is absent from Professor Paterson's volume. He is in sharp antagonism, at times, with Roman Catholicism and Rationalism, both as regards the "Seat of Doctrine" and the "Substance of Doctrine," and has to adopt a critical attitude towards the speculative efforts of the Hegelian school and the "Ritschlian Revision." But there is no hint of rancour. Theological questions, as he remarks with quiet humour in his interesting chapter on Ritschlianism, are not now "argued from the eschatological point of view."

The new terms employed indicate the new attitude. Roman Catholicism and Rationalism are "pathological developments," the one of Patristic and the other of Protestant Christianity; the speculations of the Hegelian school and the revision by the Ritschlians present "meagre types" of Christian doctrine; there may be "decadence" in theology as in other spheres of spiritual effort. These terms would not have satisfied the combatants of a past age.

* "The Rule of Faith." Being the Baird Lectures for 1905. By the Rev. W. P. Paterson, D.D. (Hodder and Stoughton. London: 1912.)

They would have been regarded as deplorably weak in zeal for the faith. On Professor Paterson's page they carry a criticism whose significance is enhanced rather than lessened by the restraint of expression. If Professor Paterson is frank with the Roman Catholic or the Ritschlian it is because he believes that "there is a groundwork of the Christian religion which is traceable in the divergent forms, and which invests all with an unmistakable family likeness."

The theses which Professor Paterson maintains may be stated in his own words. As regards the Seat of Doctrine, it is held that "Protestantism truly laid the foundation of the theory of the Rule of Faith."

In the second place, as regards the Substance of Doctrine, the position is that "Protestantism penetrated to the core of the Christian Religion, that it did justice to the main aspects of that religion as a God-guaranteed salvation resting on the basis of grace, and in particular, that it worked out the theory of the individual appropriation of salvation with remarkable consistency, profundity, and impressiveness." In other words, Professor Paterson discusses the two questions: What is the seat of Authority in religion? and, What is Christianity? and finds that Protestantism puts us in the way of the most satisfactory answer. This is not the place, even if space permitted, to consider the matter at length. To do so would involve a visit of some duration to each of the chapters, so closely does the argument hang together. It is sufficient to indicate the spirit in which the author deals with these great questions.

Nowhere will one find a more persuasive and attractive presentation of an enlightened Protestantism, a Protestantism conscious of its limitations and of the need for further theological work, conscious, too, of its indebtedness to the piety and reflection of the past, a Protestantism, one may add, wonderfully free from dogmatism and scholasticism, and sensitive to the value of varying types of religious experience.

W. R. THOMSON.

WELSH CLOUDS

TO-DAY it is hot and sultry, oppressive clouds hide the sun, and the very world seems heavy; it will thunder to-night, for the clouds are all meeting together from every direction.

Across the river, which in this light looks leaden and black, I can watch the lightning flashing among the purple valleys and dull blue mountains of Wales, and dully comes to my ears the faint roar of distant thunder.

I am glad I am alone, for I shall wait until the storm has passed. I shall feel the sweeping rain beat against me in its fierce madness. I shall hear no sound save the crashing clouds overhead, and, for the moment, I shall belong to the great passionate spirit of nature.

I shall wait for the storm, as I shall wait for the overwhelming life when it comes. I shall hold out my hands from the sandy waters to the mountains and the sunset, for out of the fire and sea it is coming.

DOROTHY EYRE.

Owing to pressure on our space the Women's Page has had to be held over this week.

VICTOR HUGO * * * BY E. HERMANN

THE story goes that one day Victor Hugo wished to acquire a certain house in which he had been very comfortable. The proprietress mentioned a prohibitive price, and met the great man's exclamation of surprise by explaining that the great Victor Hugo had once lived in that house. "Ah"—said the author of "Notre Dame"—"but I cannot afford to buy a house in which the great Victor Hugo once lived." The little tale suggests much. A world easily attracted by the opulent, the striking, and the heroic, giving a facile worship to what makes a quick and broad appeal to its elementary emotions, and knowing its geniuses by their mannerisms and eccentricities, built a house of superlative adulation for Victor Hugo. And now that the wave of Hugolatry has ebbed, and even France views him with soberer, drier eyes, it is as though the soul of the great dead whispered across the disenchanting years: "Ah—I cannot afford to buy a house in which the great Victor Hugo once lived." And the soul is right. Only, the question remains, Is there not a better house awaiting him than one made with hands of feverish praise on the sands of flattery? Surely there is!

I.

The reaction from the first excessive estimate of Victor Hugo's genius has been marked by a tendency to exaggerate his egotism, to dwell upon the ignoble episodes of his life, to emphasise the element of theatricality in his writing, and to be witty at the expense of his colossal seriousness. But already the small dust of petty pseudo-criticism is going the way of the preceding incense-cloud of adulation, and the purged atmosphere reveals an essentially kindly and noble personality, a writer of commanding genius, and, above all, a soul aflame with the passion of humanity. True, that passion was expressed with a superfluity of aplomb and gesturing. A Michelangelo of the pen, Victor Hugo could not speak the truth without rhetoric. But truth it remained, and truth coming from a true heart. His books found their way not only into every land, but into the heart of the people in every land. And while the attention of the people may be captured by flamboyant heroics, crass contrasts, and grotesque incongruities, the heart of the people responds to nothing short of the great things by which men live. And the heart of the people gave Victor Hugo his passport into immortality. His artistic sympathy may have lacked that instinctive and convincing quality which creates great characters; his moral sympathy with the world's disinherited gave him that invincible dignity, that irresistible appeal which the most flawless artistry cannot encompass.

II.

Classicism, romanticism, naturalism—how many persons in England outside a small literary coterie are greatly excited at the mention of these things? To the cultured Frenchman, to whom a literary canon is as sacred as an article of the creed to the orthodox Christian, they savour of storm and battle. The bitterness of literary revolutions in France amazes us, and to our British sense of things the account of Victor Hugo's battle for romanticism (so soon to be slain in its turn by naturalism) reads as weird and remote as some old-world legend. That historic first performance of "Hernani," with its prelude of scheming and plotting, and the wild competition for seats and boxes; the young romanticists taking the place of the claque led by the nineteen-year-old Théophile Gautier in his historic red waistcoat; the ceaseless fusillade of thrust and counter-thrust, attack and riposte on the part of the rival camps during the performance; the bitterness of invective and irony, the volleys of sheer abuse and vituperation, the final triumph for romanticism—who can imagine such a battle fought on British soil? Yet all the stormy days of Victor Hugo's subsequent Parliamentary career, cast though they were in times of change and crisis, were languid and colourless beside the headlong, strident passion of that youthful battle of the gods.

III.

"Les Misérables" was published simultaneously in Paris, London, Brussels, Leipzig, Milan, Madrid, Rotterdam, Warsaw, Budapest, and Rio Janeiro, and marked one of the most wonderful literary successes ever known. It made an immediate and universal appeal. It was read over camp fires in the American Civil War; it was found in a bookseller's shop in the half-Tartar town of Kazan, in the extreme east of Russia. Its characters seized the popular imagination: Bishop Myriel and Jean Valjean, Cosette and Marius, Javert and Gavroche became the inalienable possession of countless readers. Its passionate advocacy of the cause of the poor and downtrodden woke countless souls to a noble chivalry, and gave hope and comfort to thousands more. Yet not "Les Misérables," but "Notre Dame de Paris," is the crown of Victor Hugo's work. In it he stands in the outer circle, at least, of the immortals.

IV.

If "Notre Dame" is a great achievement, it is also, in a quite inevitable sense, a noble failure. For as the Scottish Border is greater far than Scott, and ever eluded his grip, so Notre Dame rears its head beyond the highest reach of even a Victor Hugo. How far beyond that reach may be gauged by comparing Victor Hugo's word-painting with the potent and sinister etchings of Méryon—if a comparison of two different arts be legitimate. Look at Paris through Méryon's keen and sombre eyes—see its huddled buildings, tenebrous arches, desolate bridges, and grim, sluggish river, redolent of mystery and guilt, of crime, despair, and nameless deeds of night. Look at his incomparable "Le Stryge"—that face of lust brooding horribly over a demon-ridden city. Then turn to Victor Hugo's masterly evocation of the past, and, with all its fine and memorable qualities, it is something a little less compelling and vital than Méryon's vision, and even Méryon only caught a fraction of the meaning of that great enigma symbolised by Notre Dame. But, granting the subject evades human grasp, how superb Victor Hugo's work is, how enchanting the world through which Esmeralda and Quasimodo, Claude Frolo and Pierre Gringoire move, and what a triumph of genius within its limits!

V.

One would like to dwell upon the charm of "Les Travailleurs de la Mer"—a charm overlaid by an intolerable burden of digressions and technicalities (to quote Mr. A. F. Davidson, the book "bulges with omniscience"). Few have written of storm and shipwreck with such exuberant and haunting power—a power which over-emphasis can cheat of its effect. His excessive art, stained with the dross of grandiloquence, lapsing ever and anon into the meretricious and the grotesque, may exasperate; but in the end one yields to the spell of a world-genius, second to none in his power to fascinate, to move, to thrill.

VICTOR HUGO, NATUS 1802, OBIIT 1885

A PLEA FOR ESPERANTO

I.

IT is one of the paradoxes and contradictions of modern civilisation that whilst science is daily working miracles to improve material communications amongst men, little or nothing has been done to improve intellectual or spiritual communication. Indeed, it may be boldly asserted that so far as spiritual communication amongst nations is concerned, the present generation is far worse off than the preceding generation. A hundred years ago Latin was still largely used as the international language of science, religion, and philosophy. Fifty years ago several of the world-languages—English, French, and German—occupied a vast international area. English was the commercial language, French was the social and diplomatic language of the world, German was the official international organ of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and was largely spoken in Northern, Central, and Russian Europe. But for the last thirty years, with the increasing political jealousies, with the growing spirit of patriotism, national languages almost everywhere have supplanted the international languages. A fierce battle of the tongues is raging all over Europe with disastrous political consequences. At this very moment the Hungarians threaten to sever their political connection with Austria because they object to the use of German as a common language. If the Hungarian separatists are successful, as seems highly probable, this language question must necessarily involve a change in the balance of power of Europe. The Magyar incident is not an isolated case. Everywhere the small nations—the Flemings, the Welsh, the Provençals, the Czechs, the Poles—claim the right and the duty to speak their own national tongues, where formerly they would have been contented to speak English or French or German.

II.

Yet so clamant are the demands of science and commerce, of foreign travel and colonisation, that the necessity for a linguistic bond amongst nations is becoming every day more urgent. Men are either groaning under the burden of so many additional languages, or they are suffering from their ignorance of such languages. We feel the difficulty even in Great Britain. But it is not easy for an Englishman to understand the linguistic position of citizens of less favoured nations. Take, for instance, a young Pole. In addition to his native tongue, Polish, he will have to learn Russian, the language of his political rulers. If he happens to be attending a classical school, and if he goes in for one of the liberal professions, that Polish schoolboy, in addition to Russian and Polish, will have to learn Latin and Greek, French, English, and German—namely, seven difficult languages. Similarly, a Dutch, a Danish, a Hungarian, a Bohemian, a Russian schoolboy will have to learn six languages. If I may be allowed to adduce my own experience, I myself, as a Belgian, had to learn at school at twelve years of age six languages, like every one of my fellow-schoolboys of the classical side.

III.

Well, personally I do not object, and did not complain. Take the study of foreign languages. It has been my privilege to learn eighteen different languages, dead and living, eastern and western. It has been glorious sport. It is a splendid discipline for the reasoning faculties even more so than for the memory. But teaching languages has been my professional business, and, after all, that can only be the business of a very few. And for the enormous mass even of students, to whom philosophy or literature is not the main pleasure or occupation of life, I do not hesitate to say that it is monstrous, it is baneful to have to devote most of their time during these best years to the "mastering" of four or six or seven languages. And it is impossible that the present tower of Babel and confusion of the tongues should continue much longer. Unless the progress of the race is to be seriously handicapped, unless we are to come to a deadlock, this imperative necessity for an international medium of communication will have to be met.

IV.

Some readers will at once reply, "Such an international language is no doubt useful, nay, imperatively necessary; but it is an impossible dream, it is the Utopia of a visionary. A priori, it is impossible to manufacture a living language, just as it is to manufacture a plant or an animal. Language is an organism, which grows and develops and decays—it is not a mere piece of logical machinery. If we must have an international language, why not simply take one of the existing world-languages, say English or French?"

To this objection we reply, in the first place, that the adoption of one of the existing languages must be at once ruled out of court. Of all dreams, that surely is one of the wildest. To expect that the Germans would ever submit to adopting French or English as their auxiliary language seems a hypothesis almost too absurd for discussion.

And we reply, in the second place, that to compare a scientific or literary language to a living organism, is merely to use a specious but misleading metaphor, which has already done unspeakable harm to the science of philology. "De la métaphore et du malin, délivrez-nous, Seigneur!" All cultured and literary languages are essentially works of art; they have been elaborated consciously and artificially from the raw material of dialects. Classical Latin, for instance, is in a high degree artificial. So is modern French. So is modern Greek or Bohemian or Russian.

V.

A close observation then shows us that an artificial language is possible, but the further question arises: On what terms is such an artificial language practicable? I would lay down three fundamental conditions. (1) The language must be politically neutral and strictly international, so as to commend itself to people of all civilised nationalities. (2) It must be perfectly simple and easy, rigorously logical and phonetic, adhering to rule, excluding exceptions. (3) The language must be pleasant and flexible, harmonious, and beautiful. It must satisfy the higher needs of the scientist and the philosopher and the man of letters, as much as those of the business man. An ugly and barbarous language, however simple and useful, would be doomed to failure.

VI.

Now, it must be obvious to anyone, that none of the existing languages, living or dead, satisfies all three of the above conditions. Amongst the dead languages Latin has been tried and has been found wanting. Classical Latin, and even the Latin still used by Jesuit fathers in their schools, is too difficult to be adapted to the needs of scientific or business intercourse.

Amongst the living languages, English, French, and German—even if the adoption of any one of them did not rouse the jealousies of the others—would still labour under the fatal disadvantage that they are neither simple, nor strictly logical, nor strictly phonetic.

VII.

We are therefore compelled by a process of elimination to restrict our examination to the so-called "artificial" languages. And here the first apparent difficulty seems to be one mainly of choice, for we are confronted with a very large number of schemes. The necessity for an "artificial" language has been felt already for so many generations that one plan after another has been submitted to the world. Two distinguished French mathematicians and philosophers, M. Couturat and M. Ledu, have submitted these plans to a critical examination in their admirable work, "Histoire de la Langue Universelle," a work which everyone interested in this question ought to study. Great philosophers like Leibnitz, illustrious philologists like Jacob von Grimm, have devoted their genius to the solution of the problem. But it is especially during the last thirty years that "artificial" languages have multiplied in geometrical ratio, as the need for them has been felt more imperatively. We have all heard of Volapük (vola=world; pük=speak; volapük=world-speech), the language invented by Johann Schleyer. The failure of this Volapük has often been alleged by sceptics as a proof of the impossibility of any international language. I would rather point to the extraordinary success of such a clumsy scheme—as being the best evidence of the need of an international language.

VIII.

Examining, then, one after another, each one of the numberless claimants for the great world inheritance, we are again, and finally, driven by a further process of elimination to the recognition of Esperanto as the one language which stands out above all others by virtue of its wonderful intrinsic qualities, and by virtue of the extraordinary success it has already met with. Of all the "artificial" languages, it alone responds to the three indispensable conditions. (1) Esperanto is absolutely neutral. The principle of internationality is strictly adhered to. The words have been chosen on the principle that each root shall be common, wherever possible, to two out of the three groups of world-languages (Latin, Anglo-Saxon, and Teuton), so that before learning Esperanto we already know at least two-thirds of the roots. (2) Esperanto is ideally simple and phonetic. Its grammar can be mastered in a couple of hours. Its vocabulary is restricted to a minimum of roots, and from these roots all other words are derived by a most admirable system of prefixes and suffixes. Its phonetics have excluded all sounds not easily pronounceable by every nation. Phonetically Esperanto is very much like Italian, which is the only one amongst living languages which contains nothing but "international" sounds. (3) Esperanto is harmonious and beautiful.

IX.

And not only does Esperanto satisfy all the a priori conditions of the ideal international language, but it has been submitted to the a posteriori test of experience, and it has not been found wanting. Esperanto has emerged triumphantly from all its ordeals. Founded in 1887 by a young Polish-Russian doctor of twenty-eight, M. Zamenhof, it at first grew slowly but steadily. After striking deep roots in most countries of Europe and America, it has lately developed with phenomenal rapidity. Thousands of scientists and professors, tens of thousands of business men and travellers, have adhered to it. Scores of journals and magazines, hundreds of books have already been issued in Esperanto. Yearly Congresses, attended by thousands of delegates from every part of the world, ought to convince even the most sceptical that a new international organ has been born which will make for enlightenment and for progress.

X.

The principles of the language will never change, because they are based on necessity and reason and beauty. But the vocabulary will be adapted to every new need in the world of thought and science and commerce. There will be an Esperanto vocabulary for the scientist, another Esperanto vocabulary for the literary man, another Esperanto vocabulary for the business man. Esperanto is not a cast-iron, mechanical tongue. Flexibility and vitality are amongst its essential qualities.

"THE GREAT ADVENTURE" BY MR. ARNOLD BENNETT

Produced at the Kingsway Theatre by Mr. Granville Barker

THE plot and characters of "The Great Adventure" are based on that excellent story "Buried Alive." Mr. Ilam Carve, the great painter, allows himself, from mere shyness, to be mistaken for his valet, and when the valet dies it is as Ilam Carve that he is buried in Westminster Abbey. Also from mere shyness and helplessness the painter withdraws himself from the public gaze, and marries a little Putney widow. He remains concealed for a long time, and not even his wife can be made to believe in his real identity. It is revealed at last by a series of complications, and the great painter is compelled to disclose himself in consequence of the transactions of an expert Hebrew art dealer, who buys his pictures for £4 and sells them for £500, and who is called upon to prove the origin of the pictures he has sold.

"The Great Adventure" will add nothing to and detract nothing from the author's reputation. Not even the most enthusiastic admirers of Mr. Bennett would think of putting the new play on anything like the same level with "Milestones." Not even the most carping critic would fail to enjoy its sparkling dialogue, its unexpected situations, and the ingenuity with which the original idea is worked out.

There is some attempt at characterisation. The two main characters—the sensitive, shy and nervous Carve, and the sensible, practical little widow—may be said to represent the eternal opposition between the artistic and bourgeois temperaments. But the whole situation is so wild that the characters themselves must need remain unreal and unconvincing. And a few superficial psychological touches, combined with clever dialogue and absurd though amusing situations, are not sufficient to make good comedy. "The Great Adventure" is not comedy; it is an entertaining farce and an exultating extravaganza, which will gain considerably by condensation and concentration.

Mr. A. Bennett owes a great deal to his interpreters. Mr. Henry Ainley is a splendid Ilam Carve. Miss Wish Wynne is a perfect cockney Putney widow. And if "The Great Adventure" will do little for the author's fame, it has revealed an accomplished actress, who may have a brilliant future on the stage.

LITERARY NOTES

THE death of Mr. William Hale White, better known by his pen name of "Mark Rutherford," removes a writer of singular originality and power. The half-dozen volumes, beginning with "The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford" in 1881 and ending with "Clare Hopgood" in 1896, marked a new era in fiction. What gave the stories of "Mark Rutherford" their wide and enduring interest was not so much their constructive ability and purity, almost severity, of style as their subtle analysis of certain types of religious character. He had, as has been well said, "an intimate knowledge of orthodoxy and a warm sympathy for heretics." A Puritan by training and descent, he knew the atmosphere of Nonconformity as few have known it.

Never has stern, unbending Calvinism been portrayed with more masterly skill than by "Mark Rutherford"; never have the strength and the weaknesses of the "chapel-goer" been so unerringly set forth. Those who wish to penetrate to the core of Dissent ought to read "The Revolution in Tanner's Lane," the most autobiographical of "Mark Rutherford's" novels, where his father (printer, preacher, and Liberal politician) appears as Isaac Allen, and his minister (Mr. John Jukes, of Bunyan Meeting at Bedford) as the Reverend John Broad. One writer, I observe, lays stress on "Mark Rutherford's" "extraordinary knowledge of loneliness and depression, of self-deception and humbug." This, unquestionably, is a marked feature, and accounts for that sombre note which pervades most of "Mark Rutherford's" books.

Besides writing novels, "Mark Rutherford" made some notable contributions to literary criticism and philosophy. His monograph on Bunyan is a gem. By temperament he was of all Bunyan commentators the best equipped, and it is no exaggeration to say that he penetrated deeper into the spiritual significance of the author of the "Pilgrim's Progress" than any other writer. He had also a profound knowledge and admiration of Wordsworth. I remember writing him on one occasion soliciting an article for a journal in which I was interested. Swift came the reply that he would like to write on some Wordsworthian theme, and in a few days I had the pleasure of receiving a charming essay on Dorothy Wordsworth's "Journal" of the Scottish tour.

My recent remarks on the reading of poetry has brought me an interesting letter from Mr. Galloway Kyle, an editor and hon. director of the Poetry Society. He does not agree that there is a steady decline in the reading of poetry; but I am glad to have his weighty testimony in support of another point which I tried to drive home. "There are," he writes, "an extraordinary number of people who do not read poetry and know nothing of it, who nevertheless take to scribbling verse, and who would be better employed in fostering an intelligent interest in and proper appreciation of poetry that really counts. Their lack of real interest in and concern for poetry is a remarkable phenomenon." In referring to the Poetry Review I inadvertently stated that it was a shilling monthly. The price is sixpence.

Mrs. Meynell, who has long enjoyed an enviable reputation as a writer of verse, is collecting her poetry for publication in a single volume. I am glad that the contents are to include the early "Poems," which have passed through no fewer than ten editions—a triumph which falls to the lot of few twentieth-century versifiers. The volume, which will also contain more recent compositions, is being printed by the Arden Press. It will be prefaced by Mr. Sargent's drawing of Mrs. Meynell, and will be published next month by Messrs. Burns and Oates.

I regret to record the death of Mr. Andrew Chatto, of the well-known publishing firm of Messrs. Chatto and Windus. Mr. Chatto, who had reached a ripe old age, was a very good judge of literary wares, and, in the course of a long business career, he had associations with some of the most popular authors of the Victorian era, including Swinburne, Stevenson, Wilkie Collins, "Ouida," Charles Reade, and "Mark Twain." He was, if not the first, one of the first, to discern the genius of Stevenson, most of whose earlier works he managed to secure. Swinburne published all his works through Mr. Chatto's firm, as did also "Mark Twain."

Mr. Henry James, whose industry of late has relaxed somewhat, has written an account of his early years, together with those of his brother, the late Professor William James, the brilliant exponent of Pragmatism. The book is entitled "A Small Boy and Others," and will be published immediately by Messrs. Macmillan.

Professor J. G. Frazer has been very active of late. In addition to piloting through the press a new edition of "The Golden Bough," a formidable piece of work in itself, he has written a new work on "The Belief in Immortality and the Worship of the Dead," which Messrs. Macmillan are publishing. It deals with the belief among the aborigines of Australia, the Torres Straits Islands, New Guinea, and Melanesia. Later on Dr. Frazer hopes to pursue the theme in regard to the other principal races of the world.

We are to have one more proof of the amazing industry of the late Andrew Lang. Next autumn Messrs. Longmans will publish a new volume of the well-known Fairy Book series. Written by Mrs. Lang, "The Strange Story Book" was edited by her husband shortly before his death.

Johnsonians will be glad to learn that a new volume of unpublished extracts from Mrs. Piozzi's commonplace book, familiarly known as "Thraliana," is to be published immediately by Messrs. Longmans. Numerous passages from this work are included in the "Autobiography, Letters, and Literary Remains of Mrs. Piozzi," which appeared in two volumes in 1861. But it contained many more good things, and a collection of these will find a place in "Mrs. Piozzi's Thraliana."

In good time for the forthcoming British-American Peace Centenary celebrations a volume is shortly to appear from the pen of Mr. H. S. Perris, the secretary of the British Committee, tracing the development of British pacification from the earliest times, and concluding with a sketch of Anglo-American relations down to the present date. The volume is to be entitled "Pax Britannica: a Study of the History of British Pacification," and will be published by Messrs. Sidgwick and Jackson. No one knows more about the subject than Mr. Perris, and the volume should have a wide appeal.

X. Y. Z.

THE GREEK DRAMA

PROF. J. S. PHILLIMORE

BY

II.—SOPHOCLES

THE occasion and circumstances for which a man writes, and the (rather vaguely) prescribed subjects, are a block of matter cut out, awaiting its form at the hands of the master. Through experiments and discoveries, bit by bit, partly realised, partly divined as an ambition, the form defines itself; and criticism comes into play, guiding and correcting the process, helping a successor to develop duly the craft as it comes to him from the pioneers. We see Æschylus taking a lesson from Sophocles, and Sophocles from Euripides. Sophocles owes his admitted perfection partly to his central position.

I.

As early as the middle of the fifth century B.C. it was possible to agree, more or less, what the word tragic implied, as a literary term; what a tragedy ought to be or not to be. The cycle of appropriate legends was restricted: success must be looked for in the chronicles of a few royal houses, foreign-born dynasties whose sinister fortunes had impressed popular imagination, such as the Pelopids at Argos, or the Theban Labdacids. Crime intended and not performed is the most untragic thing possible; so is the display of successful villainy, for that is a spectacle "neither humane nor pitiful, nor terrible." Catastrophe is the true end of a tragedy—this is Euripides' great forte; but it must be undeserved, in the sense that our pity must be excited; and the person whose downfall makes the tragedy must be recognisably like ourselves, else we shall not feel terror.

All this is but Aristotle summarised; for he analysed, not a priori but by experience, why the great tragedies (everybody knew which they were) achieved their greatness. The essence, then, is the punishment not of a bad man, but of sin in a good man, and, of course, in order that the case may be sufficiently conspicuous, in a great man. To sin without meaning it, in spite of greatness and goodness: you have only to state it, and you recognise how absolutely "scientific" and "artistic" are the same to the Greek genius: beauty is truth, beauty is justice. "Great" and "good" men go down, but the Law abides, vindicated, like Wisdom, by all her children.

II.

History may borrow tones and colours from Tragedy, but Tragedy will not deal with historical personages. History asks, "What did Pericles do?" Well, but Pericles was . . . Pericles. We shall go to Tragedy to inquire, "What will such and such a character do in such and such circumstances?" Semi-historical personages are chosen, because mythology gives a useful outline of convention which saves explanations and starts the poet with the advantage of having his audience's imagination awake and prepared.

The more really ideal the characters are, the more necessary is it to good craftsmanship to base them solidly in a realism and particularity of name and place and scene. The historical novel is the modern form of tragedy, in some ways; and for it to succeed, the persons must be some way remote. You cannot do anything with Napoleon, except burlesque him. Real persons, but storied in legend, remote and vague: of such the Greek Epic, and especially (as Sophocles and Euripides saw) the non-Homeric legend, had great store.

III.

Sophocles said that he had humorously reduced the cumbrous pomp of Æschylus, and brought the absurdities of his convention to an easier and more reasonable style, which gave suppleness for characterisation. The Oresteia was a unit, but on a vast scale, really one tragedy executed in three pieces: Sophocles did not need all that elbow-room in which to work out his conception; the single play now succeeded to the Trilogy. The supreme Attic principle of artistic frugality is well seen in his work: a little stuff cunningly economised. Instead of that gorgeous prodigality of words, a language drawing nearer to good prose speech, the natural music of common phrase detached and allowed to be heard. He also claimed that he "depicted men as they should be, Euripides as they are": not that his persons are abstractions, for he excelled in indicating men in their humours, not always heroic; but he was averse by the sweetness of his temperament from cynically emphasising human meannesses.

The conflict of Irreconcilables, which is in all tragedy the contradictory appeal for our sympathy and approval, the riddle which finds no solution in the mortal life of individuals—to express this, he invented the medium of Irony, making men speak in the fullness of their wisdom and the public applause, and all the time know not the meaning of what they say. Œdipus's involuntary confessions thrill the audience with horror because Sophocles puts them at the point of view of the Divine Law, making the man condemn himself out of his own lips.

Also he continues an Æschylean thread, when he spends such humour and sympathy in delineating the common nameless persons, nurses, watchmen, etc., who relieve the kings and queens and prophets. In such as these we foresee the drama of the future, the "New Comedy," which has been the Comedy of all nations since. That is always the summit of a literature when the poetical and prose forms draw most nearly together, for the civilised mind of humour and irony is quick to see the burlesque side of grandiloquence and a too artificial convention. Tragedy has its own diction; convention there must be; but only great poetry saves it from appearing absurd, as only great music blinds an audience to the ridiculous conventions of opera.

IV.

Though he is a most impersonal, unegoistic poet, we have in the seven surviving plays enough to survey Sophocles in his successive moods, to trace the stages of his ambition from period to period. Moralising never defaces his art, but his art is always moral; the sins he hates and holds up to reprobation are pride, anger and the inhuman bureaucratic doctrine of government as a law to itself. He is the poet of Charity before Charity was; of Humility, as no other Greek was, notwithstanding their acute, almost superstitious sense of Hubris; but, most wonderful of all, we find in Sophocles' Neoptolemus the embodiment of Honour, boldly set before a people who admired

Mr. Heinemann's New Books

A New Book on the Feminist Question.

A SURVEY OF WOMAN'S PROBLEM. From the German of ROSA MAYREDER by Hermann Scheffauer. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

LOST IN THE ARCTIC. By CAPT. E. MIKKELSEN. Illustrations, Maps, etc. Crown 4to. 18s. net.

WITH THE TURKS in THRACE. By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT. Illustrated and with Map. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

PAUL I. OF RUSSIA: The Son of Catherine the Great. By K. WALISZEWSKI. Royal 8vo. 15s. net.

RECENT EVENTS & PRESENT POLICIES IN CHINA. By J. O. P. BLAND. Royal 8vo. Illustrated. 16s. net.

RUE AND ROSES. By ANGELA LANGER. Crown 8vo. With Portrait. Price 5s. net. (Ready April.)

THE THEATRE MISSION OF WILHELM MEISTER. By GOETHE. Translated by Gregory A. Page. Crown 8vo. 6s. (Ready April.)

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL. By AUGUSTIN FILON. Royal 8vo, with numerous Portraits and Illustrations. 15s. net. (Ready April.)

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY. Edited by T. E. PAGE, M.A., and

W. H. D. ROUSE, Litt.D. A series of Greek and Latin Texts with an English translation on the opposite page.

Mr. HEINEMANN has completed his arrangements for 1913, and will be glad to send a prospectus on application, giving a full list of the 20 new volumes, those already published, and of those in prospect.

NEW 6s. NOVELS

THE LIFE MASK. By the Author of "He Who Passed"

THE WEAKER VESSEL - - - E. F. Benson

GROWING PAINS - - - - - Ivy Low

MINNA - - - - - Karl Gjellerup

GUTTER BABIES (Illustrated by LADY STANLEY)

Dorothea Slade

THE HIPPODROME - - - Rachel Hayward

FRONTIERS of the HEART (2nd Imp.)

Victor Margueritte

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO?

Elizabeth Robins

GOSLINGS (April) - - - - - J. D. Beresford

THE AMBASSADRESS (April)

William Wriothlesley

Completion of ROMAIN ROLLAND'S great 20th century romance.

JOHN CHRISTOPHER.

Vol. I.—DAWN AND MORNING.

Vol. II.—STORM AND STRESS.

Vol. III.—JOHN CHRISTOPHER IN PARIS.

Now Ready.—Vol. IV.—JOURNEY'S END.

NEW CHEAPER FICTION

AT 1s. NET.

NANCY STAIR - - - - - Elinor Lane

MERELY MARY ANN - - - - - I. Zangwill

MRS. DRUMMOND'S VOCATION Baroness von Hutten

SEVENPENNIES.

BURNING DAYLIGHT - - - - - Jack London

THE ATTACK ON THE MILL - - - - - Emile Zola

THE DULL MISS ARCHINARD - - - - - A. D. Sedgwick

AN IMAGINATIVE MAN - - - - - Robert Hichens

Uniform Edition of E. F. BENSON'S Novels (each Vol. 2s. net).

New Volumes: PAUL; THE OSBORNES.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

successful ingenuity above all things, and whose moral instability became a byword with the Romans as soon as the two nations met. Neoptolemus is chivalrous in the full Christian sense of the word, romantic without the foolish sentimentalities of mediæval romance, noble without the savagery which disfigures the Homeric Achilles and the historical Alexander. Well might Newman call the Philoctetes one of the two "most beautiful" plays of Sophocles on account of "the contrast between the worldly wisdom of Ulysses and the inexperienced frankness of Neoptolemus." Neoptolemus can play the game of deception, as a game, but when it comes to making something by it, all that native generosity which Ulysses has striven to sophisticate breaks loose. Ulysses in Philoctetes and Creon in Antigone are politicians, official minds: Sophocles had no illusions about politics.

But Philoctetes will never be a favourite play: critics will always be questioning (like Aristotle and Lessing) whether extreme agonies of bodily suffering be a proper subject for representation. It and the Œdipus up at Colonus are the work of his old age, perhaps his greatest works, viewed on the religious side, but certainly not to compare as dramas with King Œdipus and Antigone; the ripest meditations of a great soul need not be his masterpieces at his trade. Who but the author has preferred Paradise Regained to Paradise Lost?

V.

King Œdipus has been hailed ever since Aristotle as the type of a Greek Tragedy. Merely for workmanship, all is so perfectly planned and executed; the lyric part not allowed to encroach; the characters not so over-modelled as to obscure the situation by excess of psychological analysis, and yet the vanity of the triumphant adventurer in Œdipus and the gruesome motherliness of the fond elderly woman towards the husband whom instinct compels her to treat as a spoilt only child: all so delineated as to entail the true conclusion, "How frightful and yet just!" But the tragedy is one of situation; persons engaged in a machinery of events and the closing of the trap which crushes them.

In Antigone the conflict is between the "unwritten law" (Sophocles invents the phrase) and the law of police: Antigone is a martyr in the cause of the elementary pieties of natural affection. The intrigue is complicated by her love for Haemon, which is no mere byplot, for it excuses the king's suspicion of a political plot against his throne. But rather than any terrible tangle of circumstance, what makes the glory of this play is the beauty of Antigone's exaltée nature, relieved against her sister, whose timidity only rises to the martyr pitch when refusal means saving her life. It has not, as King Œdipus has, the Æschylean secret—produced by much subtler means than Æschylus used—of an atmosphere of boding, increasing horror.

VI.

Sophocles and Euripides are close contemporaries who rivalled each other for forty years. Sophocles' perfection is motive enough for driving Euripides into a divagation from the high-road of tragedy. Great poets and great artists both, there was no room for both to do just the same thing; but even before Euripides began to force the frames of the craft into something new, there were sharp differences of temper, accentuated by training, between the two. My next paper will give a sketch of the curious half-cynic, half-sentimentalist, who was finally to close the Attic Tragedy and open a new form of literature.

WAGNER AND BAYREUTH*

"NEXT to my family, the dearest of all things to me is Bayreuth." So wrote Wagner to his faithful henchman, Friedrich Fenstel. "Bayreuth," we may explain for the benefit of the uninitiated, symbolised an idea which dominated the mind of the great composer for more than twenty years. He wished to see reared in the little Bavarian town of that name an opera house where the Wagnerian music drama might be rendered under ideal conditions. The letters contained in this book tell for the first time in English the history of this project—how it originated and gradually took shape in Wagner's mind, and how it culminated in the erection of the Festival Theatre at Bayreuth.

Wagner's autobiography, which was published in English quite recently, stops short before this epoch in his life, so that these letters supplement and to some extent correct the impressions of the composer's character conveyed by the autobiography. We cannot say, however, that we have found the letters particularly interesting. They are largely of a business character.

No doubt the enthusiastic Wagnerian, by wading through much wearisome reiteration, will get to know all about the Bayreuth idea, but we cannot imagine any person reading through these letters for their own sake. We think the editor would have been well advised had she written the whole story and only quoted extracts relevant to her theme.

The germ of the Bayreuth project, as Miss Kerr points out, was indissolubly connected with the creation of the heroic tetralogy, "Ring of the Nibelung." Though the project eventually was a pronounced success, the first Festival, in 1876, was a gigantic failure.

The fact is, Wagner had very little business capacity. He was obsessed by a glorious vision, and he thought he had only to give it visible form in order to call to his aid enthusiastic patrons and the cream of musical talent. As for singers and musicians, they were to receive compensation, but no salary.

"He who does not come to me from glory and enthusiasm can stay where he is. A lot of use to me a singer would be who came to me only for a silly salary! Such a person could never satisfy my artistic demands."

But what the "Ring of the Nibelung" failed to accomplish for the realisation of the Bayreuth idea, "Parsifal" did.

The first performance of this work took place in the summer of 1882, and in spite of the fact that its religious atmosphere was so radically different from the previous trend of Wagnerian drama, it was an unqualified financial success, the receipts exceeding the most sanguine anticipations. Not only were all expenses covered, but there was a balance of six thousand marks. Unfortunately, Wagner did not live to see the final triumph of his idea. It was not given him to know that Bayreuth ere long would fulfil his fondest hopes and become the Mecca of thousands of devoted Wagnerians.

It was the Master's idea that "Parsifal" should become the peculiar possession of Bayreuth. "Never" (he wrote when nearing his end) "is the 'Parsifal' to be presented in any other theatre, nor offered any audience as a mere diversion." But whether Wagner's wish will be respected will soon be made apparent, for the copyright of "Parsifal" expires this year.

* "The Bayreuth Letters of Richard Wagner." Translated and edited by Caroline V. Kerr. 6s. net. (Nisbet.)

An EDITION DE LUXE at the price of an ordinary edition.

The Handsome Surrey Library Edition
OF THE

Works of George Meredith

Bound in Pale Blue Cloth, gilt top edge,
PUBLISHED AT £8 NET, is now offered by

The Times Book Club,
376 to 384, OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.,

AT THE GREATLY REDUCED CASH PRICE OF

£5:10:0 FOR THE . . .
24 VOLS.

CARRIAGE PAID, OR

Six monthly payments of £1.

This provides, at a cost equal to 4s. 7d. per volume, a sumptuous Edition de Luxe of the works of this great writer.

Many admirers of Meredith will be glad of this opportunity to place upon their shelves an edition really worthy of the author, at such a moderate price.

Prospectus, with Specimen Pages and Illustrations of the Bindings, sent on receipt of postcard mentioning "Everyman."

ARNOLD BENNETT.

The First of a New Series.

"SEEING LIFE,"

ANTIQUES MADE TO ORDER:

"The Gentle Art of Furniture Faking,"

By HERBERT CESCINSKY, are TWO of many articles in the APRIL Number of the ENGLISH Review.

One Shilling.

AUTHORS EXPERIENCING DIFFICULTY IN FINDING a publisher are invited to submit their MSS., upon either general or special subjects, to the MUSEUM ARTS & LETTERS ASSOCIATION, 18, Bury Street, W.C.
New authors accorded special terms of issue.

BOY'S LOVE . . . BY BEATRICE MARSHALL

A DELICIOUS old-world perfume was wafted through the carbolic-laden air of the hospital ward, stealing softly on the senses like a greeting from the past. A little old woman in rusty black was distributing from her reticule, not tracts to the patients, but nosegays. Tiny compact posies, into which were tightly crammed bachelor buttons, clove pinks, sweet-williams, hearts-ease, a moss rosebud or two, and other fragrant old-fashioned cottage flowers, their fresh little faces laid close to one another in a framing frill of feathery boy's love.

"Do you like southernwood?" the little old woman asked, as she put the welcome nosegay of homely blooms on the man in bed 9's counterpane. "But perhaps you know it by one of its other names—'old man,' 'lad's' or 'boy's love'—eh?"

She glided on, her hand, in a shabby cotton glove, already seeking in the reticule for another posy for the occupant of the next bed. He was the one child patient, and the pet of Ward B, a small victim of tuberculosis, with a closely cropped moleskin head. He was singing a music-hall ditty with the joyous élan of a lark.

"Hush, Georgie! that's naughty," said the nurse with carrot hair and dimples. "You'll disturb No. 9."

"Sing a nice hymn, my darling, instead of that dreadfully low song, which will make the Lord weep to hear," said the little old woman in rusty black, "and you shall have this bunch of pretty flowers."

The small victim of tuberculosis with moleskin head snatched the flowers from the hand in the shabby cotton glove, and tore them to pieces, petal by petal.

The little old woman shook her head sadly and moved on, with a nosegay and text for the next bed.

* * * * *

"Boy's love"; yes, that was the name he knew it by. The man in bed 9 sniffed the little quaint nosegay greedily, and soon he was no longer in bed 9, no longer in Ward B, with the sunlight glaring on the walls. Once more he walked with his sister and his sister's governess through the quiet streets of a grey cathedral city, set amidst emerald fields, the home of his childhood. Dear home, where rooks cawed in majestic elms, and where deep-toned bells chimed deliberately the fleeting hours. From the quiet streets they passed into the green country lanes. It was June. Haymaking was going on, and the hedges were wreathed with wild roses and honeysuckle. And how the birds sang! They came to a gabled, thatched house on the top of a hill. It belonged to a lace-maker, had diamond-paned windows and an ivy-covered porch, and stood at the end of a long garden.

The governess lifted the latch of a rustic gate, and they went up the flagged path through the lace-maker's garden. It was full of bees and flowers. All the flowers of the tight little nosegay grew in it, not in single blossoms, but in battalions, rampantly at their own sweet will. Cushions of snowy clove pinks bulged over the stones; hosts of velvety magenta and white sweet-williams on either side of the narrow flagged path nearly met across it. A drowsy hum of repletion came from the bumble bees as they gutted the snapdragons and Canterbury bells of their honey. Over all waved the sober grey feathery spikes of the southernwood bushes, outscenting the sweetest of their sweet-scented neighbours. He plucked off a spray of the shrub and put it in his buttonhole. One of the girls who sat making lace in the ivy-covered porch glanced up from her pillow and bobbins and chaffed him good-humouredly about his choice of a buttonhole.

"He doesn't understand," said the girl next her, without taking the trouble to glance up from her pillow and bobbins. "He's too young."

He didn't know why, but he was indignant with the girl who said he was "too young," and who hadn't taken the trouble to glance up from her work. The head lace-maker invited them into the cool green gloaming of her best parlour. After the intense brightness of the sunlit garden, it was like entering the interior of a bird's nest. But there was one island of whiteness in the dusky room. Something that rippled over a surface of blue tissue paper, like a filmy waterfall, on the horsehair sofa.

"The Hon'ble Miss Hamilton's wedding veil," the lace-maker said with pride. "It's antique Mechlin, worth a king's ransom, and we have had the honour of repairing it. I am expecting Miss Hamilton and her intended this afternoon. They will take a cup of tea with us. There's no stuck-up airs about Miss Hamilton, though she is so high born."

Horses, held by a groom, were champing at the rustic gate. Their riders had dismounted and were making a lingering ascent of the flagged path between the cushions of clove pinks and the sweet-smelling southernwood bushes.

She led the way, beautiful Irene Hamilton, tall and distinguished, a vision of loveliness, in her dark blue riding habit, which she held up gracefully, high above her glossy riding boots. Never had his childish imagination conceived anything so ravishing as this girl in the riding habit.

She took possession of his senses with the perfume of the boy's love. The gold of the dancing sunlight, the azure of the cloudless sky, the brilliant colour of the flowers seemed to pale around her. A sensation he had never experienced, a new thrill tingled all over him. His eyes half-filled with tears. In his ears was a humming sound, as if the bees had deserted the flowers and were swarming on his straw hat. He would have liked to throw himself on the flagstones at her feet and cry, "Send me to the end of the earth. Let me die in battle with your name upon my lips." Instead he stood hanging his head, and blushed a miserable, shy, consuming blush. She spoke a few courteous words to the envious governess; then she bent down and kissed his sister, who was a pretty little girl. Still bending, she turned to him. Oh, moment of agonised suspense and ecstasy! He saw her short teeth, white and firm between her curving lips, the russet bloom of her rounded cheeks, the smiling eyes of hyacinth blue set in coal-black lashes, the bridge of her aristocratic little nose—he saw these details plainly, though his sight was dimmed and he felt sick and dizzy, though the garden of the lace-maker's cottage and the purple valley behind, out of which rose the cathedral towers, all were swimming and melting away.

He stood with his feet on a cloud. There was nothing and no one in the universe but himself and this face, fair and fresh as the flowers, coming closer to his. But it did not come. An almost audible sob of pain gurgled in his throat as she suddenly withdrew her face and ceased to bend over him.

"I forgot," she said. "Frank is too old to be kissed."

A little while ago he had felt annoyed at being described as "too young" to understand something, he knew not what. Now he understood what it was, he was equally displeased at being considered "too old."

The young man, Irene's "intended," who followed her up the path, endorsed the latter view.

"Too old!" he exclaimed in a pleasant voice, with a pleasant laugh. "I should rather think so. By Jove, if you kiss him I shall be jealous."

He was as handsome as the Apollo Belvedere, with fair hair and honest blue eyes; yet, for all his good looks and winning ways, he bred in the bosom of his small, shy rival an instantaneous and deadly hate. He longed to fly at his throat and bite him.

"Beast! I am not too old!" his soul cried within him. "I am just old enough, I tell you, just old enough."

But he said nothing. He remained stupidly dumb and dazed, till his sister's governess had to remind him of his manners and prompt him to take off his hat when Miss Hamilton said good-bye. The pair went on up the narrow flagged path, admiring the clove pinks, and passed under the ivy-covered porch.

That night when he undressed he took the sprig of boy's love out of his buttonhole and twirled it between his lips as he fell asleep. He dreamt of her. He did hardly anything else but dream of her by night and think of her by day for the next fortnight. Her approaching wedding was the great topic of conversation. It was to be one of the grandest society functions of the season. He hated to hear about it, for he loathed the thought of her being married. It turned him hot and cold, and made him feel dull and heavy. He would shudder and clench his fingers, and even was silly enough to contemplate such violent measures as travelling to London without a ticket to interrupt the wedding.

He pictured himself tearing the filmy wedding veil to ribbons, and stabbing Apollo to the heart. But fate all the time was preparing a scheme which forestalled and took the shine out of his.

One morning news came to the old grey cathedral town that Irene Hamilton, on the eve of her wedding, had been found, after a ball, dead in her bath. Everyone was shocked, and said nothing more terribly sad could have happened. Her health had never been questioned. Who could have imagined there was anything wrong with her heart, and that she would be cut off with such awful suddenness in the flower of her youth and beauty, just at a moment when her happy young life was to receive its crown of bliss?

But he didn't say how sad it was. Could it be that he wasn't sorry? The dull, heavy aching feeling inside him was gone. On the contrary, he felt almost light-hearted and elated. He ran upstairs to his little room and sought for the sprig of boy's love which he had pressed between the leaves of "Treasure Island." It was dry and withered, but still sent forth its quaint delicious fragrance.

He wondered shyly how she had looked when they found her, and the new thrill ran through him again. No, he wasn't sorry, not a bit sorry! He was glad, because now she couldn't marry Apollo.

"I haven't received any instruction to admit you," said the hospital porter, not stirring from his box inside the hospital gates. "Visitors should come on visiting days. 9 Ward B is not on the danger list."

He spoke to a young woman in a big hat and white gloves. She carried a big bouquet of white flowers, and had a brazen, defiant air.

"I call it an abominable shame," she said, stamping her foot, which bulged out of a cheap, showy shoe. "I can't get off on your visiting days. You know my profession won't allow it."

The profession of the young woman in the hat was that of a barmaid in a Strand restaurant.

"I suppose if I tipped you a tanner, you'd let me in," she went on; "but I'm not going to do that. I've spent a tidy fortune already on these flowers. Aren't they choice?"

The porter composed himself to take no further notice of the young woman, a line of action from which he did not depart even when she launched out into uninvited confidences.

"He's not my beau, as you might think," she explained. "He was down on his luck, and could only stand a theatre once in a blue moon. As for presents, he gave me books. Queer, wasn't it? What did he think anyone in my profession could do with books?"

"Read 'em, I presume," suggested the porter with a yawn at the obviousness of the question.

"A likely thing. I've no time for reading. I pawned the books except one, which he said he wrote himself. I'm blessed if I could read that either. Women have been his ruin, he says, since he was a kid in knickers. He's loved lots."

She paused to bridle and make eyes at the porter, off whose back her blandishments slipped like water from a duck's.

"Well, if I wasn't his first, at any rate I'm his last," she simpered. "Won't you let me in?"

"He's not on the danger list," reiterated the porter.

"You seem sorry he isn't," retorted the young lady. "See that he gets these flowers, anyhow. They cost too much to be wasted."

She laid the huge bouquet of wired arum lilies, stephanotis and maidenhair, which, though it was white, looked vulgar, on the ledge of the porter's box, and turned on her high heels.

"Surly brute!" she said. Then, as she minced away, she flung back triumphantly over a shoulder immersed in hat-brim—"I'm the last."

She was in happy ignorance of nurses with carrotty hair growing in entrancing rings round a white forehead, and with dimples that came and went like April sunshine.

* * * * *

"Shall I put your flowers in water?" asked the nurse with carrotty hair and dimples.

She had just placed the barmaid's huge white bouquet beside him in a vase, but the flowers she asked if she should put in water were those of the little homely nosegay which the man in bed 9 still held tightly locked in his cramped fingers.

The man in bed 9 made no answer. She stooped, unlocked the fingers, and the flowers fell on to the sheet. The nurse with the carrotty hair and dimples bent lower over the man in bed 9, then she straightened herself with a slight shudder. At that moment the small victim of tuberculosis with the moleskin head burst into ribald song with the joyous élan of a lark.

"Hush, hush, Georgie, that's naughty," rebuked the sister of the ward, frowning. "No. 9 is very ill to-day. You'll disturb him."

"It doesn't matter," said the nurse with carrotty hair; she hadn't a dimple visible as she spoke. "I don't think anything will ever disturb No. 9 again."

She picked up the little nosegay and fastened it under her starched cap strings.

"Boy's love," she murmured. "Boy's love. How sweet it smells."

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

HUXLEY'S LAY SERMONS

I.

IN the delightful autobiographic preface to his collected Essays, Huxley relates that Herbert Spencer detected in him clerical affinities. These affinities showed themselves at an early age, when, as Huxley tells us, in childhood he turned his pinafore wrong side forward to represent a surplice, and held forth to his mother's kitchenmaids. So pronounced in later years were the clerical affinities that, referring to him in a letter to a friend, Bishop Thirwall playfully speaks of Archbishop Huxley. All through Huxley's controversial life there was the flavour of the pulpiteer. One result of this was that he came to be regarded, not as an original worker in the field of Science, but rather as the brilliant defender of Darwinism, as the popular expounder of the theory of evolution and the sworn foe of obscurantism. It should be noted that Huxley was more than a brilliant expositor; he did enduring work as a discoverer. His claim to popular renown rests on the fact that he democratised science; he brought it, so to speak, from the museum and the laboratory into the market-place. By virtue of his genius as a lecturer and his incomparable style as a writer he rescued Science from the narrowing influence of specialists just when it was in danger of being buried under the débris of technical terms. While engaged in this laudable task Huxley found time for original work in his own department. Testimony is given to this effect as follows by Professor Ray Lankester and Sir Michael Foster in their preface to Huxley's "Scientific Memoirs": "Apart from the influence exerted by his popular writings, the progress of biology during the present century (the nineteenth) is largely due to labours of his of which the general public knew nothing, and that he was in some respects the most original and most fertile discoverer of all his fellow-workers in the same branch of science."

II.

In the public mind, however, Huxley's name and fame will always be associated with the early struggles for recognition of the new ideas which Darwin gave to the world in his epochal works. In Huxley's early days two rival theories of Nature came into violent collision—the theological and the scientific—or, as they might be called, the supernatural and the natural. Round the question of the origin of species fierce controversy raged. Scientific opinion, as foreshadowed in works like Loyell's "Principles of Geology," were familiarising the public mind with the idea of evolution, which, in a vague kind of manner, as in the once famous "Vestiges of Creation," was being extended so as to include the origin of species, human as well as animal. With the appearance of Darwin's works the conflict between the old and the new views increased in violence. Huxley came forward as the champion of Darwin, and in the gladiatorial arena found himself at home. For the task he had qualities admirably fitted. Gifted with a literary style of the highest order, the master of a controversial method flavoured with inimitable raillery, Huxley did splendid service as a populariser of Darwin's views.

To Huxley it soon became evident that a new theory of man in his relations to the universe was following in the wake of Science and its discoveries. Science and Theology came into deadly rivalry, and in the conflict which raged Huxley's pulpitering proclivities found ample scope. In a general way it may be said that Theology stood for authority and Science for reason. Accept nothing on trust, nothing that will not successfully submit to the scientific test of verification; eschew pious make-believe, and, when the limits of knowledge are reached, frankly admit ignorance—these were the texts from which Huxley preached. Not justification by faith, but justification by verification, was his watchword.

III.

What lies beyond the boundary of scientific knowledge? Huxley declared that to this question no answer was possible, and, in order to define the attitude of mind towards this region of mystery or ignorance, he coined the word Agnosticism. Study, Huxley seems to say, the material Universe, obey its laws, have done with the idols of the churches, and, if you must needs worship, let it be "worship of the silent sort at the altar of the Unknown and Unknowable."

A scientific theory which confined knowledge to the world of phenomena was sure to be confounded with Materialism, as Huxley found when he delivered his famous lay sermon on Protoplasm. To clear himself in this regard he felt it necessary to fall back upon Philosophy. In this sphere, it must be admitted, Huxley was provokingly unsatisfactory. In reply to the charge of Materialism, Huxley answers that, inasmuch as it is only known to us through mind, matter is simply the symbol of unknowable forces. Ask if he accepts the spiritual theory of existence, and his reply is that he knows nothing of spirit or mind apart from matter, and therefore there is no evidence of mind apart from brain function.

IV.

Huxley finds a way out of the difficulty by declaring that the "fundamental doctrines of materialism, like those of spiritualism and most other 'isms,' lie outside the limits of philosophical enquiry." In support of this view he quotes David Hume, forgetful of the fact that Hume's conclusions are as fatal to the claims of Science as to those of Philosophy. Science cannot take a single step without postulating an order of Nature invariable and necessary; beyond that Science, in Agnostic mood, says we know nothing. Hume went further. In regard to the so-called invariability and necessity of the laws of Nature he was a sceptic; in his view Science as well as Theology rests on assumption. Hume, as Mr. Arthur Balfour points out in his "Foundations of Belief," reduces our belief in the fundamental principles of scientific interpretation—such as the invariability of Nature—to expectation born of habit. In Hume's view the world of Nature resolves itself into an unrelated series of ideas and impressions. Science, as understood by Huxley, postulates as its fundamental basis the law of causation. Hume substitutes for this the law of association. Because certain phenomena stand related over a long period of time, we come to think of them as cause and effect. According to Hume, the phenomena are not connected by the bond of necessity. They have been so related in the past, but there is no guarantee that they will be related in the future. Summing up Hume's theory of causation, Leslie Stephen says: "Chance, instead of order, must, it

(Continued on page 760.)

A GREAT PHYSICIAN

SAYS:

"70% of all Diseases are caused by the pores becoming clogged, thus shutting up in the blood the Poison and impurities which Nature intended they should eliminate."—ERASMUS WILSON, M.D.

Inside - Outside Heater.

THE CENTURY THERMAL BATH

OPENS THE PORES and sweats all the poison out of the blood, leaving it pure and healthy.

In the cure of RHEUMATISM, Kidney and all Blood Diseases, there is no treatment so sure and speedy as the Hot Air Bath.

S. CUTHBERT'S, ROVER, SENDERLAND,
May 22nd, 1911.

"DEAR SIR,—In 1901 I bought one of your 'Thermal Cabinet Baths,' and have had on an average one bath a week since. Previously, from the age of nine (when I had Rheumatic Fever) up to forty-two, I was more or less in the Doctor's hands, suffering from Rheumatism in various parts of the body. I was also never free from Indigestion. Since using your Bath I have not had a Doctor once, and have now perfect Digestion. I have every reason to be thankful for having bought one of your Baths. Please send me a 5/- bottle of your Liquid Sulphur.—Yours truly,

(Signed) "H. J. LOVEJOY (REV.)."

Vapour Baths energise, invigorate, vitalise; they are a luxury beyond the conception of all those who have not taken them by means of the Century Cabinet. Scientifically constructed, self-purifying, strong, compact; folded, it occupies only two-inch space; has head steamer whereby the head and face get same treatment as the body. The top is constructed of four flaps, patented; regulates temperature at will of bather.

The Century Cabinet is sold complete with Heater and Vaporiser at 35/-, 50/-, 63/- and 70/- (Cheaper Cabinets 25/-). We allow 30 days' trial, to be returned at our expense, if, after testing it, it is not found as represented. We make this offer so that you shall be sure of having the BEST BATH CABINET MADE. Write for Catalogue No. 708, and Samples of Goods sent, also valuable book: "Health, Strength, Hygiene," and Medical Testimony. FREE Thousands of Century Cabinets in use. Agents wanted. Please mention EVERYMAN.

CENTURY THERMAL BATH CABINET, Ltd. (Incorporated), 205, Regent Street, London, W.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

ANY BOOK noticed or Advertised in EVERYMAN can be obtained by return post at full discount price from Hunter & Loughurst, Discount Booksellers, 9, Paternoster Row, E.C. Catalogue of Second-hand Books and Reminders, just ready, sent post free.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

SWISS WALKING PARTY for Grand Tour of Mont Blanc, Montreux, Chamonix, Aosta, Gd. St. Bernard, June 10th, for 12 guineas for 17 days. Particulars—Vicar, Hazlemere, High Wycombe.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 180 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. You write, we sell. 16-pp. prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

"THOUGHT: Its Ten Laws," on Card. Something new. How the New Knowledge aids in daily life, study, &c. "Concentration: Its Ten Laws," companion Card, 1s. 2d. each.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

SHORTHAND.—THIS WEEK'S OPINION. Mr. Jack Lynch, a well-known Parliamentary reporter (himself an accomplished Pitman writer), who has had unequalled opportunities of meeting and mixing with all sorts of stenographic pressmen, gives this as his estimate: "Sloan-Duployan writers are by far the swiftest and most accurate, and they can read old notes without difficulty, whereas the Pitman writer must first recall the subject." SLOAN-DUPOYAN shorthand is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for interesting illustrated handbook, with specimen lesson, free.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Raunsgate.

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.—For Matriculation. B.A., B.Sc., and other examinations. Single subjects may be taken.—Address, Mr. J. Charleston, B.A. (Hons. Oxon. and Lond.), 14, Elsham Road, Kensington, W.

WOMAN AND MARRIAGE. A Handbook. By Margaret Stephens. Cloth, 3/6 net (Post free 3/10). "I have been specially pleased with the delicacy, lucidity, and common sense with which this book endeavours to increase intelligence on the subject of child-life by letting a clear light shine on those everyday matters of birth and life which are so often furtively wrapped in a mysterious and wholly distorting gloom."—Christian Commonwealth.—T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London, W.C.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration. Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settef Course." (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE, (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

COUNTRY COTTAGE to let furnished, for the summer, in a pretty Kentish village near Railway Station and Church. 3 sitting-rooms, school-room, 4 bedrooms, 2 servants' ditto. Bath-room, good water supply, modern drainage, small garden. Bankers and personal references required.—L. EVERYMAN Office, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

INEX-
PENSIVE

A DAINTY
AND

LUXURY.

FOR MUSIC.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,

4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

Swift

Sure

Last year's light suits can be made to look new again for the Spring.

Signs of wear, spots and creases—all disappear under the "Achille Serre" treatment. Every year brings tens of thousands of satisfied users of our service—men who appreciate smartness in dress. May we have your Suit? We will return it in four days looking like new.

Free collection and delivery by nearest Branch or Agent; or carriage paid one way if sent direct.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

would seem, be the ultimate objective fact, as custom, instead of reason, is the ultimate objective fact." In the hands of Huxley's philosophic master, Hume, the Universe becomes a Chaos, not a Cosmos. The truth seems to be that Huxley's Science and his Philosophy did not harmonise. I once asked Herbert Spencer his opinion of Huxley as a philosopher. He admitted his greatness in Science, but in Philosophy, he said, Huxley's views lacked co-ordination.

The lack of co-ordination is seen in his famous Romanes lectures, in which he places man and Nature in an antagonism which ill accords with his own theory of evolution. In that lecture Huxley leads us back to the theological conception which he has been supposed to have abandoned for ever, namely, the Pauline distinction of Nature and Grace. We are told that ethics are not a natural product in the evolutionary sense, but the result of man's conflict with cosmic forces. On his own principles there was no need for the dilemma. Huxley might as well have declared that a conservatory in which delicate plants are reared is not a product of the cosmic forces, as assert that ethics are not a natural product. The conservatory is the result of cosmic forces under the guidance of intelligence, which Huxley, from his philosophic standpoint, was bound to consider a cosmic force. There is no impassable gulf, from the evolution point of view, between the wild flowers of Nature and the delicate plants in the conservatory under the gardener's care.

As a consequence of the wide gulf between Nature and man which Huxley assumes, he is driven to give a pessimistic interpretation of the Darwinian theory, or the struggle for existence. From his view of the essential antagonism between man and the cosmic forces, Huxley was naturally led, when treating of social evolutions, to write as follows:—"Life was a continuous free fight, and beyond the limited and temporary relations of the family the Hobbesian war of each against all was the natural state of existence." If man was bad, Nature was worse. In man at least lay the germs of ethical development, but "of moral purpose" Huxley could see "no trace in Nature."

Huxley was a valiant soldier in the ranks of progress. Naturally, his Agnostic creed compelled him to limit his activities to what he called "improving natural knowledge." With him Science was valued as a supreme factor in individual culture and social progress. No man was less of a pedant. In one of his Lay Sermons Huxley outlines his culturistic ideal as "one whose mind is stored with a knowledge of the great and fundamental truths of Nature, and of the laws of her operations; one who, no stunted ascetic, is full of life and fire, but whose passions are trained to come to heel by a vigorous will, the servant of a tender conscience; who has learned to love all beauty, whether of Nature or of Art; to hate all vileness, and to respect others as himself." Huxley well knew that, for the realisation of this ideal, literary and scientific culture are both necessary, and in his broad-minded recognition of this lies the charm of his treatment of the whole subject of education. Still, the question ever presses upon the mind, What avails Science, Literature, and all that makes for culture if, according to the Huxleyian creed, we are to confine our strivings and our hopes to the present world? In the name of Science, Huxley demanded that we should fearlessly face facts. Well, here is a fact to which universal history bears testimony—the fact, in all ages and among all races, of belief in a future life. Such a fact suggests the suspicion that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in the Agnostic philosophy.

SILHOUETTE

From the gallery of memory, mutascopic and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

ALL day long he waited in his office, watching the tape, and as he sat, the remorseless click of the machine buzzing in his ears spelt one word, and one word only—Ruin. It was written upon the ceiling and the floor, scrawled in prodigious letters on the wall, the very furniture repeated it, and he read its shadow on the sun! The shares in which he had invested, with the arrogant optimism that was his justification and undoing, were slowly falling—down and down and down.

The day closed, and found him bankrupt; and not of money only. He saw himself, young, ambitious, ardently worshipping the god of chance in the House of Rimmon, so that, unmindful of all else, love passed him by, and beauty also; the flush of dawn held for him no message; the scent of the trees in the gloaming, the note of the thrush did not quicken his pulse; and his eyes were blind to the gold of the laburnum, the glory of the almond blossoms and the nutsie may.

He had married a woman whose rank lent prestige to his wealth, who wore his jewels, ruled his house, and was oblivious of his business. He was proud of her, in a silent, secretive fashion; but at times there tugged at him a curious sense of something he had lost. Once, in the grey gloaming that cloaks the city in a garment of romance, he had chanced on one of his employees—a man of fifty, grizzled and worn. His bowed shoulders had straightened, the strained eyes were bright: a woman had come to meet him, neither young nor comely, but with a face made beautiful by love.

"And are you tired?" he heard her say.

"Not now, my own dear wife," the clerk had answered. And the rich man felt a wondering envy at the words.

In the darkness of the unlit room, his hand—capable, cruel in its suggestion of strength and lack of tenderness—unlocked a certain drawer in his desk. He had played the game right to the finish—played and lost; and there was but one thing left to do. He could not live to face defeat in the arena, and for him there was no refuge outside—no woman's face grew radiant at his coming, no fond heart quickened at his step.

His fingers closed upon a phial marked poison. He had bought the drugs weeks, months ago—as a cure for sleeplessness. Well, he would sleep now—aye, and rest! And there swept over him a wave of loneliness, so that he shivered in the dark, and his hand trembled.

Somewhere in the great building a door banged, hurrying feet ran down the passage. It was curious to realise that was the last time he would hear familiar sounds, and he gave a quick, impatient sigh.

And then the door flashed open, bringing a stream of light. A hand was on his own, a face close pressed to his, and a voice—her voice—was whispering:

"And could you leave me—me, your wife?"

"I am ruined," he said hoarsely. You'll have to give up your house, your jewels, your—"

She was clinging tightly to him, her lips on his, her face alight with tenderness and love—love that dazed and almost blinded him.

"Money!" she laughed. "Jewels! What do they matter now I have found you?"

FAIR AND HONEST

NO BENEFIT—NO PAY.

A GREAT DISCOVERY OF A LIFE-GIVING FORCE.

We have a remedy which is unique in its origin, and absolutely unrivalled in the marvellous scope of its curative powers. We do not ask you to accept this statement without first giving you the opportunity to test the matter for yourself—AND AT OUR RISK. We will send you a month's treatment and ask for no payment whatever unless you can say, "Here is your money; you have earned it." If you are not in perfect health it is surely worth your while to give a trial to so easy and reliable a cure. We dare not make the offer if we were not sure of the results.

NOT A PATENT MEDICINE.

Vitæ-Ore is not a patent medicine. After analysis, the British Government exempted it from Medicine Stamp Duty. Vitæ-Ore is the residue of a natural mineral spring discovered by Prof. Noel, the famous geologist, and tested and approved by medical men. After thorough investigation The Lancet stated:—"The clinical results obtained were satisfactory."

OVERWHELMING PROOF.

That we are able to sell Vitæ-Ore on this Trial system and get payments for tens of thousands of packets proves V-O must benefit those who use it. If they were not benefited they would not pay.

Our offer is a liberal one. We send you a whole month's supply—no benefit, no pay. And you DO pay: for you ARE benefited; you will be glad and happy to pay, if you accept our offer.

THOUSANDS OF CLERGY

and ministers of all denominations have written in enthusiastic terms commending Vitæ-Ore.

A CHALLENGE TO ALL HONEST SCEPTICS.

You want improved health; then why not try Vitæ-Ore? We do not ask you to trust us; we ask you to let us trust you—with a whole month's treatment on condition that you pay nothing until and unless you are benefited. You are to be the judge. Can anything be fairer?

Vitæ-Ore has produced numberless cures in cases of Nervous Weakness and Debility,

Dyspepsia,
Neuritis,
Anæmia,

Rheumatism and all "run down" conditions
due to Stomach,
Liver and Kidneys.

Vitæ-Ore is a powerful tonic to the whole system.

Write to-day. We are certain we can cure you, and at our own sole risk are willing to treat you. If we cannot effect a change for good in you, and place you on the road to health, you have lost nothing—the loss is ours.

WE STAKE OUR REPUTATION

and business success on the healing powers of Vitæ-Ore treatment, and offer you the means of testing its powers. In thousands upon thousands of most obstinate cases it has effected permanent cures. Surely it is worth a trial.

FILL IN OR COPY THIS COUPON FOR FREE TRIAL OF ONE MONTH'S SUPPLY.

To the THEO. NOEL CO., LTD.,
(Dept. 44), 29, Ludgate Hill,
London, E.C.

Dear Sirs,

Please send me a month's supply of "Vitæ-Ore," with full directions and free book of particulars.

I will use it according to the "Directions," and promise to report result in 30 days. The ailments which trouble me are

If it does me good I will send you 4s. 6d. in payment for the month's course of treatment. If not, I will write and say so, and in that case YOU ARE TO CHARGE ME NOTHING.

Name

Age.....

Address.....

HIDDEN POWER.

Remarkable Results follow Experiments of Clever Scientist. Marvels of the Mind.

Many serious writers view with alarm the tendency of the present day to disregard physical development, and prophesy that the future will bring forth a race of people whose motor muscles have disappeared and whose brain development is abnormal. Such a state of things, obviously, will not arise in the lifetime of this or the next generation; but the fact of such a possibility being seriously considered by the greatest authorities draws imperative attention to an insistent, undeniable fact—we are now turning from the age of Muscle to the age of Mind.

No advocate of any school of thought can afford to disregard the importance of physique in the formation of national character and destiny; but now the public recognise that physical culture is but the means to an end—the supreme efficiency and domination of the mind.

The lack of knowledge that has hitherto prevented mind-culture has been gradually and surely overcome, and it is now justifiably established that the mind can as surely be developed, strengthened, and made strong as can the physical organs.

Students of social questions are learning with delight of the widespread interest that all classes, both men and women, are taking in this important national question, and can discern the improvement in mental calibre that is taking place.

The Work of an Enthusiast.

One of the most enthusiastic advocates of mind culture at the present time is Mr. Frank Hartley, who founded the London Institute of Menti-Culture. Although originally founded as an experiment, the immediate success with which his system has met has made it necessary for Mr. Frank Hartley to give up all his research work to devote his whole time and energies to the Institute of Menti-Culture. In a recent interview with a Press representative, Mr. Hartley explained the scope of his menti-culture movement:—As is now well known, I have devoted the best years of my life to the study of psychology and mental efficiency, and the outstanding fact that burnt itself into my brain was the lamentable lack of self-knowledge among the masses. While carefully collecting and sifting scientific data concerning the particular qualities that have led well-known men and women to success and power many interesting facts were revealed. For instance, mere knowledge alone has achieved, and will achieve, little or nothing; that misleading colloquialism, luck, is merely the envious explanation applied by failure to success. No, the gift that has brought all successful careers to the pinnacle of success lies much deeper.

It is the hidden power to apply the right force to their everyday affairs in a manner which will surely place them in a position of superiority in all their dealings with their fellow-men. It is only now becoming realised that this power is latent in everyone, and, with correct training, can be developed to an extent which will bring immediate and gratifying results in every case.

How Mr. Hartley's Campaign Began.

As you know, I commenced my own campaign in Menti-Culture by adopting a bold course. At a cost of many hundreds of pounds, I have carried my message to thousands all over the world by means of a specially printed edition of my latest book, "How Failure Becomes Impossible." The public were quick to recognise the soundness of my teaching, with the result that the principles of Menti-Culture are being practised all over the country.

The practical results are discovered by the student from the very beginning, and the particular gains reported at once are: (1) Increased will power; (2) Concentration created and maintained; (3) Nervousness and self-consciousness overcome; (4) Power of correct observation and judgment, etc., etc.

It should be understood that my system, although yielding such priceless results to the student, does not entail any irksome restrictions or departure from everyday life. When revealed, it is astonishing in its simplicity.

There are, I am sure, still a great many readers who are interested in the subject of mind training, and to those who will take the trouble to write to me I will make a special concession. Upon request I will send not only my book, "How Failure Becomes Impossible," but also a lesson in Menti-Culture free. Those who wish to may enclose two penny stamps, for postage, etc., but in any case a mere request will bring the book and lesson. Simply write Mr. Frank Hartley, Room 73, London Institute of Menti-Culture, 35, Wellington Street, London, W.C.

MARK RUTHERFORD

By HUGH SINCLAIR

I.

WITH the death of William Hale White there has passed from us a writer of subtle and individual force. Of his life and personality very little ever reached the public, so persistently did the creator of Mark Rutherford hide himself from the general view. After an early period of storm and stress, reflected in the pages of the Autobiography, he floated into calm waters, securing a post in the Admiralty, from which he retired after full service with a pension, and filling up his spare time with journalistic work of various descriptions.

The son of Mr. William White, at one time printer and bookseller at Bedford, and the prototype of James Allen in "The Revolution of Tanner's Lane," he spent his early youth in the town of John Bunyan, became a member of the historic "Bunyan Meeting," and was accepted as a candidate for the Congregationalist ministry, but subsequently expelled from college, along with two other students, for heretical views of inspiration. His expulsion led to the final severance of the family from Congregationalism, and Mr. White, senior, after making an unsuccessful experiment with a tannery, migrated to London, where he obtained the position of doorkeeper to the House of Commons, and published a book of Parliamentary reminiscences with something of the Mark Rutherford flavour about it.

II.

Of his journalistic work "Mark Rutherford" could hardly be induced to speak, of his novels not at all. He was closely connected with that remarkable being John Chapman, of the Westminster Review, knew and admired George Eliot, had a warm friendship for George Jacob Holyoake, and contributed to many journals. Of books published under his own name there was the excellent translation of Spinoza's Ethic and a study of John Bunyan, full of piercing insight. He continued to preach, remained essentially a Christian, and never lost his sympathy with the Nonconformity whose weaknesses he chastised so mercilessly. Above all, he retained his supreme interest in spiritual problems.

After retiring from the Admiralty, he lived first in Hastings, then in a country cottage in Groombridge, near Tunbridge Wells, where he died at the ripe age of eighty-three. "Claudius Clear" records some interesting personal impressions in the British Weekly. Mark Rutherford, he tells us, was "reserved and dignified in appearance, but essentially kind and modest. His great interest was in books—books as makers and helpers of life. He was a singularly exact student, mainly of the English classics. . . . He admired Gladstone, but with the reserves natural to a dissenter. He put Spurgeon and Bright first among English orators. . . . He kept no rubbish in his library, and all his personal appointments were of characteristic simplicity. . . . He was rather noticeably slow in taking up new authors, preferring to read old books over again." Interesting little sidelights these; slight enough, but bearing out one's impression of a singularly reserved but fascinating personality.

III.

If William Hale White set his face as a flint against the gratification of the incontinent curiosity of the literary public, "Mark Rutherford" put his naked soul into his books. For, with all their high restraint, these books are a spilling of blood—a pouring out of soul as complete and poignant as anything we have in literature; and to read them understandingly is to feel something at least of the pain and awe which such confidences beget. For some critics Mark Rutherford is little more than a faithful and revealing chronicler of provincial Dissent in the middle of the mid-Victorian period. He is that, of course. He deals relentlessly, grimly, cruelly, if one likes, though never pettily or spitefully, with the exasperating meannesses of small towns and of small religionists of a certain type.

He gives us footnotes to religious history, vignettes of a passing evangelicalism, bitten in with the aqua-fortis of his keen and restrained irony. But he gives us far more than that. These things belong, after all, to the meaner streets of his spacious city of thought. He gives us timeless spiritual autobiography. He writes of the realities of poverty and labour, disappointment and defeat, love and death; and writes of them in a way which makes his books not only great literature, but the very stuff of life. "He can put into a very few words seventy years of pain," says Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, one of the earliest and most understanding lovers of Mark Rutherford.

IV.

Mark Rutherford's candid yet baffling style is the despair of young authors who are advised to "study" it. Not the most hopelessly obtuse would venture to make it his model. Its perfect fitness sets its creator above all but a few lords of language. The word fits the thought, not as a garment fits the body, but as flesh fits bone.

Simple, limpid, all but colourless, his style might be described as grey; but what an exquisite, living, palpitant grey, tremulously responsive to every changing light of thought! Reticence, fineness, distinction, purity, precision—there is hardly another writer in whom these quiet qualities are more instantly present. Beside the broad pictorial manner of more immediately effective stylists his work has the unobtrusive delicacy of a pencil drawing, but with a purposefulness and virility of line that exclude the suggestion of weakness. To the latter-day worshipper of cleverness, with his cult of exotic phrasing and his staccato impressionist temper, such art has little to offer. It can, in fact, only give to those to whom much has been given already.

V.

If Mark Rutherford has a message to our generation other than the eternal message of the spirit, to which the timeless heart of man must ever vibrate, it is the recall to a wise and noble reticence. "Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt offerings in every place thou seest," is the unwritten warning behind all his books. He had a very scrupulous regard for the taecenda of life—things not unclean in themselves, but made unclean by being talked about. He observed an equally delicate reticence upon the great "commonplaces" of friendship, pain, love and death.

To call his restraint "artistic" is to miss the soul of it. His words were few, not because his artistic theory deprecated an overflow, but because he had seen far more than he dared tell. "From the horns of the wild oxen Thou hast answered me." The soul that has received its answer thus says very little about it—if speech is left to it at all; but that little will have a loud cry in the ears of every soul of kindred stuff.

DEAF?

Not since I used the "AURIPHONE"!

This is the testimony of hundreds who have vainly tried many other devices. Do not imagine, therefore, that your case is hopeless. It will cost you nothing to try the "Auriphone," and it will be strange indeed if it fails to make you hear, after succeeding so perfectly in many hundreds of cases of stubborn and long-standing Deafness.

THE "AURIPHONE"

Is a genuine British-made instrument of marvellous power, similar in principle to the telephone, and it conquers deafness just as the telephone overcomes distance. It weighs only a few ounces, is perfectly comfortable, and practically invisible when in use, while it slips easily into the pocket when not in use.

WE WANT EVERY DEAF PERSON TO TEST THE "AURIPHONE."

WE INVITE ALL THE DEAF TO A FREE DEMONSTRATION

at any time at our Office, or arrange a trial AT THEIR HOMES if preferred.

NEW PERFECTED MODEL NOW READY.

Write us to-day for our interesting illustrated Booklet.

AURIPHONES, Ltd., 42, Walter House, 418/422, Strand, London.

Agents—LONDON: Arnold & Co., 6, Giltspur Street, E.C.

MANCHESTER: Percy Sims, 49, Deansgate.

BRISTOL: Hodder & Co., 11-12, Wine Street.

PORTSMOUTH: Timothy White.

LEICESTER: Butler, Son & Co., High Street.

And in all principal towns.

Does Art Pay?

Read what a pupil of the Press Art School says:—

"I have sold two drawings to the Tatler, called on the Editor of the Windsor Magazine as suggested, and sold four to him. The Editor of the Red has given me a manuscript, and the Bystander have retained one drawing on approval. This amounts to £25 altogether, and has given me tremendous encouragement," &c., &c.

Another student writes:—

"I felt highly pleased on hearing that Punch had accepted my drawings, and I don't know how to thank you. It is a great credit to your teaching when you come to think I had only three lessons, and had never had a drawing accepted before I commenced your Correspondence instruction."

"Punch" has recently purchased and published more than 60 drawings by Press Art School pupils.

Send for free prospectuses of Preparatory or Advanced Course of Art Training by post, and learn how you may find . . .

BOTH PLEASURE & PROFIT IN ART.

P. V. BRADSHAW, Principal,
THE PRESS ART SCHOOL,
(Dept. "E."), 37, Dacres Road, Forest Hill, London.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typed music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any novice, on the
PLEX DUPLICATOR.
 Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gellatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.
 Complete outfit, foolscap size, 15/- complete.
 Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free.
A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in,—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 5, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Short-hand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

Shaving with a
"CLEMAK" is Simple as 'A.B.C.'

No "learning how"—you feel at home with the "Clemak" at once. Never a cut, never a scratch—just a close, quick, smooth shave and skin-comfort afterwards. Acquire the "Clemak" habit—and add a new pleasure to your life.

The British-made "Clemak" is simplicity itself. There are no screws, bars or plates to bother about and nothing to remove when cleaning. The "Clemak" is self-adjusting, and, with the patent "Clemak" strop, self-stropping.

The blades are made of the best quality Sheffield steel, hardened and tempered by electric process. They retain a fine shaving edge, and can be stropped over and over again. The razor itself lasts a lifetime.

Made as well and shaves as well as any guinea razor. Remember, it's a "Clemak" you want.

Obtainable from all Cutlers, Ironmongers, Stores, &c., or post free from the Clemak Razor Co., 17, Billiter St., London, E.C. [Works, Sheffield.]

FREE A copy of Amusing and Instructive Booklet, "HIS FIRST SHAVE."

Send Coupon To-day Or a postcard will do, on mentioning this journal.

Clemak Razor and Seven Blades ... 5/-
 Combination Outfit, Stropping Machine, Hide Strop, with Clemak and Twelve Blades ... 10/6

FORM FOR FREE BOOK.

To CLEMAK RAZOR CO.,
 17, Billiter St., London, E.C.

Send me gratis and post free a copy of "His First Shave" which illustrates in colour the Clemak Outfits, and also gives useful hints on shaving.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CORRESPONDENCE

UNEMPLOYMENT AND OVER-POPULATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "H. S.," is, I am afraid, sadly misinformed in tracing back unemployment to over-population (that ancient and exploded bogey!). What of the following facts?

1. There is a vast deal more unemployment in countries with low birth-rates (e.g., England, U.S.A., France) than in countries with a very prolific population (e.g., Germany, Holland, Sweden, Austria, Hungary).

2. There is enough wealth in England to enable every man to marry and bring up in comfort a family of six children—but the wealth is not distributed. While there are working-class couples in Bermondsey who try to raise a family on 18s. a week there are couples in Mayfair who have £20,000 or £100,000 per annum and no children. Is this a case of the population exceeding the available wealth? Why, sir, the wealth of one West End home is often sufficient to enable 500 workers to raise each a family of half a dozen children!

3. It has been stated on very good authority that the soil and industries of these islands could (under a system of proper distribution of wealth) support more than 150,000,000 persons at a very good level of comfort (see Mr. Chiozza Money and Prince Kropotkin).

4. Labour is the chief source of wealth. How, then, can a diminution of population (which is labour, of course) produce an increase of wealth? It is impossible. Every healthy and intelligent child is an asset. He or she is not a consumer only, but also a producer. Children of the right sort cannot be a burden to any country. These are the sources of future wealth. In Germany the population has doubled, while that of France has stood still. Yet in Germany the increase of wealth—per head too—has far exceeded the French increase!

It is exceedingly convenient for the upper classes of England to talk about the working classes being too prolific, while they keep from the poor the wealth which could make their homes happy and fruitful!—I am, sir, etc.,
 GERMANICUS.

P.S.—It is often supposed that the available employment in a country is constant, and therefore the more people are born, the less chance of work for each! This is absurd, of course. An expanding population creates fresh work and fresh wealth.

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is with the greatest interest that I read the various articles in EVERYMAN on "Germany and the Anglo-German Relations." Permit me to pass a few remarks, which I trust might help to bring some light on the matter.

Mr. Harrison tells us that an entente between England and Germany would be for the benefit of the latter, but he forgets to say whether England would profit by it or not. Would it not be for the mutual advantage?

He advocates a "regulation of Germany's naval armaments" as a conditio sine qua non, but he forgets to explain how a navy which is much smaller can be a menace to England, for Mr. Harrison should be aware of the fact that an attacking navy must be of at least twice or three times the size of the attacked one, if she will be likely to succeed.

It seems that England has made far too much of the German fleet, and that she has lost sight of some other very important business. Many books and articles have been written during the last years on Anglo-German relations, but it strikes me that no one has touched, or even attempted to touch, the chief point, in comparison to which the talk about armaments must seem premature. The two countries have mutual interests, and various interests in common, and thus they could go a long way together.

But there is the growing German industry, and the axiom here is that this factor is taking the English workman's bread. Now, then, this is the main point, and this question will have to be settled first, before it is of any use to go into negotiations about reductions, or even regulation, of armaments. There are only a few industries where a friction exists at all, and in these cases an agreement between the two countries could only be to the mutual advantage.

Take, e.g., cement: the English and German combines have settled the question of markets and prices, and the relations between these two industries are as friendly as possible. Could not this result be reached in every instance?

It is not for me to say whether the English diplomacy would be able to deal with the matter, but I do doubt that German diplomats will be fit for the task, and it will be better not to wait for their initiative. Besides, in any case, private persons should start the negotiations, and these private persons must be business men, who know the trade thoroughly.

Once this question is settled we shall find it very easy to come to arrangements in other matters, e.g., armaments, etc., as well. Needless to say, that an alliance between England, with the biggest navy, and Germany, with the strongest army, would mean a weighty factor for the European peace, especially so as on the same day when this alliance is declared the Franco-German tension would have disappeared.

And thus, but only thus, we should get at the beginning of the solution of the European question, viz., the international organisation of the European States.
—I am, sir, etc.,
H. VOGLER.
London.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read with great interest your correspondents' letters on the subject of Education, and am glad to see that Professor Adams advocates more efficient staffing. This is, I think, specially needed in the country, where, in the case of schools containing fifty to seventy children, there is often only one certificated teacher, assisted by absolutely illiterate "supplementaries." These latter have had only the ordinary elementary education (usually almost forgotten), and in many cases have a difficulty in keeping abreast of the knowledge they are supposed to impart. If set to teach a higher standard, they would find themselves hopelessly incapable of doing the work of that standard. Their speech usually reflects their degree of culture, being adorned with most of the common errors, e.g., plural subject, singular verb.

One of the worst types of this class of teacher is that of the headmaster's wife who has taken up teaching after marriage, because the salary obtained more than pays the wages of a maid, whom she employs to do the work that she herself should

MEMORY

It is estimated that three-quarters of every hour spent in school, study, and office where memory is needed are wasted. This appears to be a preposterous statement, yet it can be clearly substantiated. This waste can be prevented by "NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS" (Copyright) evolved by G. H. Cox and invariably used by nature when concentration of Brain Power is required; exemplified in Musicians, Scientists, etc., through all ages.

All Subjects. Cannot fail. Easily applied at ONCE. A natural gift. EVERY Musician can play from MEMORY.

EVERYONE can strengthen GENERAL MEMORY by this system. It gives new essential ideas on TEACHING and PRACTISING.

A WELL-KNOWN DOCTOR writes:—

Dr. W. F. Cholmeley, F.R.C.S.—"It seems to me to get at the whole root of the matter. In your medical and scientific facts I can find no flaw, and the deductions you draw from them appear to me to be absolutely sound."

A JOURNALIST writes:—

A. E. Brechtel, Vailima House, Eastbourne.—"I feel confident that your system will not only greatly improve the memory, but considerably enhance its growth."

A VOICE SPECIALIST writes:—

Mr. H. Stanley, Voice Specialist and Lecturer.—"I consider the instructions of great value. It opens up new and more definite ways of teaching and learning. The amount of time to be saved thereby will be enormous."

A RECTOR writes:—

G. J. Gibson, the Rectory, Echeater (Co. Durham).—"My dear Friend and Co-Worker,—For this latter you undoubtedly are, as the work you are doing is Mission work in the truest sense, dealing as it does with Memory(ego) from the Earliest Stages onwards. I am an invalid, and although unable to do much work or writing for the time being, I have given more thought to your system as the great developer of the Intelligent Side of Memory, the aspect of this side of the mind not unusually associated with Memory, tho' really the essence of it, as you so aptly and ably prove. I earnestly hope your labours may be blessed and fruitful in the best sense."

Musicians, Teachers, Students, Engineers, Speakers, Business Men, and all who need memory, should write, stating subject required for, GEO. H. COX (Music: Master, Tettenhall College). Address—Farringford, Tettenhill Road, Wolverhampton. Prospectus and full particulars free on application.

GUNN

SECTIONAL BOOKCASE

IN a "GUNN" Bookcase your books will be the most easily accessible, the best arranged, and at the same time the most effectively protected from damp and dust.

The "GUNN" is in every way worthy of your most treasured volumes. In choosing the "Gunn" you choose the best that money can buy or efficient workmanship can fashion. There is no other Sectional Bookcase on the market combining the features of utility and handsome appearance in so complete a degree.

The "Gunn" never proclaims its sectional construction, and there are no visible locking arrangements or projections at the sides. In a "Gunn" you have a worthy house for books and an ornament to any room.

WRITE FOR BOOKLET

No. 10, containing photographic reproductions of the various Gunn styles and detailed information about the "Gunn" system, sent post free with the name and address of nearest Agent.

Wm. ANGUS & Co., Ltd.,
52, Paul Street, Finsbury,
London, E.O.

This illustrates one of the styles in Figured Oak or Birch.

D	Top Section	£0 12 0
A	9 1/2-in. Book Section	0 16 0
B	1 1/2-in. Book Section	0 18 0
B	1 1/2-in. Book Section	0 18 0
C	1 1/2-in. Book Section	1 0 0
F	Base Section	0 10 0
Total		£4 14 0

HOW TO STUDY

Rapidly, Effectively & Scientifically,
with the Minimum of Fatigue

To study rapidly and effectively you must understand how to pay attention, how to observe, how to employ your memory so that you may remember what you read. You must know how to develop your Will-power so as to enlist its valuable aid when your Will flags. You must know how to control your thoughts so as to inhibit alien ideas, and to shut out distracting influences. You must know how to guard against Fatigue, for to engage in study when your mind is fatigued is to make your study of no value. You are taught how to secure the above in an easy, sure, and scientific manner in the World-Famous Course—"Scientific Concentration," the finest all-round Mental-Training you can undertake. It will revolutionise your outlook on life and make you much more efficient in study, or in your Profession, or Business. In every part of the civilised world men and women in every walk of life testify to this. "Scientific Concentration" is highly recommended by the late Mr. W. T. Stead (Editor of the "Review of Reviews"), "The Guardian," "Christian Commonwealth," "Great Thoughts," etc. Learn all about this splendid All-Round Mental-Training by sending to-day for their Free Descriptive Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46 CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, High Holborn, London, W.C.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., 8d. per 1,000 words. Plays, 1s. per 1,000 words. Paper and carbon-copy included.—G. A. Girton, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, London, S.E.

NOVELIST (experienced literary man—reviewer, etc.) offers services as critic and adviser of few literary aspirants. Revision undertaken. Terms by arrangement. Box 923, Reynell's, 44, Chancery Lane, W.C.

Altho' deaf.

By simply wearing the Danhill Earphone you are placed on an equal footing with those with perfect hearing. It collects sounds from all directions. Its tone is perfectly natural.

Supplied on trial and deferred payments

The cheapest instrument.
Write for particulars.

D & J. C. HILL, 58 Cheapside, London

Danhill
EARPHONE
GIVES PERFECT HEARING

LADY (resident) required to undertake the education of three little girls about 8 years old, living in a country village on a Kentish hillside. Applicants desired to state place of training and subsequent educational experience. Importance attached to skill in teaching drawing from natural objects, music, and handwork generally. Particulars should be given of any special experience in Fræbelian or Montessori methods—Apply, stating age and salary required, to A., EVERYMAN Office, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

CORRECT SPEECH, WRITING, and GENERAL KNOWLEDGE can be the possession of all suffering from neglected education. We teach by post. Send stamp for booklet 126.—BROADBENT'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

MISS UNDERHILL'S NEW BOOK.

THE MYSTIC WAY

A PSYCHOLOGICAL STUDY
ON CHRISTIAN ORIGINS.

TIMES.—"Miss Underhill's book is a triumph in erudition, gracefully and skilfully marshalled and attractively presented."

Square demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

PLEASE SEND FOR PROSPECTUS.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

properly do, and because the possession of the said maid lifts her into the eminently respectable society of those who "keep one maid."

I know of one case in which this occurs, and in the same school there are assistants who, although they have passed some professional examinations, and although they have only their salary to support them, yet receive less than the headmaster's wife, whose only claim to be a teacher is that she married a schoolmaster instead of a clerk or shop-assistant.

Such a state of things would not be tolerated for a minute if the country people would really awaken to their responsibilities, instead of shirking their obligations, and thereby allowing the squire and the parson to control every committee or board which nominally acts for the benefit of the village.—I am, sir, etc.,

Kent.

"HAMPSHIRE."

THE MILL GIRL.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Miss Hamilton's article on the Lancashire mill girl is interesting, more particularly on account of its very accurate description of the mill girl's character and her life at home and when on holiday. In these details there is very little at which one can cavil, but there are several passages referring to the life in the mill which are somewhat misleading and decidedly incorrect. These inaccuracies, if left unchallenged, would make the enigma as to why the Lancashire lass prefers mill life to home life still more incomprehensible, and, with your permission, I will show where I think the statements do not convey the actual facts.

The mill girl usually starts her mill life as a "half-timer" at twelve years of age. If she enters the spinning department she is engaged usually as a creeler. If she goes into the weaving-shed, she is taken in hand at once by a four-loom weaver as a "learner," and, as such, she is taught to weave. She commences at wages of about 3s. 6d. per week, though there has been a tendency in recent years to increase this amount. She is so employed as a "half-timer," and, as such, attends school in the mornings of one week and in the afternoons of the next week. At fourteen years of age, or at thirteen, if she can obtain the school exemption (or "labour") certificate, she commences full time in the factory. As a full-timer she can earn from six to eight shillings a week. She is, from this time until she is sixteen years of age, being taught the full process of weaving, and will be given one, two, three looms to tend, according as her skill improves, until she finally blossoms out into a fully-fledged four-loom weaver, and believes herself to have reached the stage of "a woman." But before attaining to four looms—for some skill is required to tend so many—she may be eighteen years of age. Miss Hamilton says that "ten shillings per week is paid per loom, and some of the smartest hands mind two or three." Whilst this certainly gives a slight idea of the wages earned, it will be seen from what I have said that the basis of calculation is wrong. A shed manager would quickly express his dissatisfaction with a woman who was only able to attend even three, and it is probable she would soon be discharged unless there was an improvement, if a more expert weaver turned up. The average weaver easily tends four looms, and is able to earn (for she is paid at piece-work rates) from six and sixpence to eight and sixpence per loom per week, or from twenty-eight to thirty-two shillings per week in all. I have seen "tally-boards" which showed as much as two pounds three shillings per week; but this was, perhaps, in exceptional weeks.

Miss Hamilton's statements re the atmospheric conditions in cotton factories are distressing, but, I fear, grossly overdrawn. In spite of the "high" temperature (in weaving sheds 65° to 75°, and in spinning rooms 68° to 80° F.), it is a fact that considerably purer air is found in these factories than inside any other class of factories. I could easily supply figures to support this contention, and I must say that if our entertainment places and places of worship were half as well-ventilated, it would be greatly to the benefit of the meeting-going community.

To the statement that "some of the rooms on the lower floors in certain buildings are inches deep in water" I can only give a blank denial, and it would be interesting to know on what authority Miss Hamilton makes an allegation so absurd, as well as the one that the "operative wears clogs to keep the wearer out of the wet." Has Miss Hamilton got confused between the reports regarding dye-houses or the wash-houses of laundries? Clogs are worn solely because they are more comfortable and more comforting (being better ventilated) than boots, and they are much better non-conductors of heat.

The statement that the crèche is an institution throughout Lancashire is scarcely correct, that is, if she refers to the crèche on the French model. That system is distinctly unpopular. The children are taken in the early morning, between 5 and 6 a.m. (a savage system surely!), to "foster-mothers" or day nurses, generally living near their homes. These nurses, usually elderly women, will receive and tend to as many as four to five infants a day. Several attempts have been made to establish suitable crèches, but with ill-success, the prejudice against them proving so far too strong.

Again, the statement that one-third of the children born in Burnley die before they are twelve months old is exaggerated. The average annual infantile mortality rate of this town is not more than 150 to 170 per thousand. High, I admit, and one would wish to see it reduced to one-third its present; but still, it does not show that one out of three dies before it is a year old! And it is an improving figure at that. Neither is it correct to say that "the Lancashire mother goes back to the mill within a month after confinement." The mother stays at home at least the full month, and, from my observation, I can confidently say that this period is extending, and the probability is that, under the influence of the recently established Insurance Act, it will extend more rapidly in the near future.

You will notice I do not criticise Miss Hamilton's conclusions. To a great extent, I agree with them. But, at the same time, it would appear desirable, if the discussion you are seeking to promote is to be of any value, that the facts on which it is based should be accurate and reliable. It is an interesting fact, which Miss Hamilton has omitted to mention, that the woman weaver is paid at exactly the same piece-work rates as is the man, a fact which also obtains in the woollen trade. I believe these two trades are the only trades in which this condition exists.

With apologies for troubling you.—I am, sir, etc.,
Northumberland. J. HIRST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Miss Hamilton has given an interesting review of the life and labour of Lancashire factory girls, but her account requires correction on one or two points.

You Can Retire from Business on a Secure Income.

Many a man keeps on working because he thinks he cannot afford to retire. If he were to retire to-morrow the loss of his personal earnings would seriously affect his financial position. He would be forced to retrench—to move into a smaller house—to forego many comforts and practice many petty economies.

By exchanging his low-yielding investments for a Canada Life Annuity, a man past middle age may double or even treble his income.

FOR EXAMPLE:

A man aged 68, investing £1,000, receives £127 7s. 9d. for the rest of his life. Other rates for men and women are equally attractive.

The Canada Life is the Oldest Colonial Assurance Office, and occupies a financial position second to that of no Life Assurance Institution in the world. Its funds are controlled by the Canadian Government. Annuities are secured by the Company's assets of £10,000,000.

Write for Special Annuity Booklet, stating age, to Canada Life Assurance Company

CANADA LIFE BUILDING,

15, King St., Cheapside, London, E.C.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's NAVY CUT Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets and Tins.

May be obtained from all Stores and Tobaccoists of repute.

"Displacement of male by female labour." There has been no displacement of male labour in the sense indicated by Miss Hamilton. From the very first certain branches of the Lancashire "power" factories have largely employed female labour. The first Factory Act ever passed in this country for the protection of female and child labour (1802) states in its preamble that "it hath of late become a practice in cotton and woollen mills . . . to employ a great number of male and female apprentices. . . ."

"Working in rooms inches deep in water." This is prohibited by law. Section 8 of the Factory Act of 1901 enacts that adequate means for effecting drainage must be provided in every factory where a process is carried on which renders the floor liable to wet to such an extent that the wet is capable of being removed by drainage. This provision of the law was first enacted (not in this precise form) as long ago as 1844.

"Clogs." There has been a tendency in recent years towards wearing ordinary boots and shoes. The clog, however, is a traditional form of footgear in certain parts of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and is worn mainly for the physical reason that a wood sole does not "draw" the feet as does leather during a prolonged period of standing at work.

"Mothers returning to work within a month of confinement." By the above quoted Factory Act no employer may knowingly allow a female to be employed within four weeks after she has given birth to a child.

"Infantile mortality." A "ghastly" mortality amongst infants is not confined to "mill" towns; places like Liverpool and the colliery centres of Durham have a mortality equally ghastly. And if infantile mortality was mainly due to the conditions under which women labour (as it is not, being rather due to the conditions under which they live, as the Local Government Board's reports indicate) the "affluent family budgets" mentioned by Miss Hamilton should tend to make the death-rate amongst infants in Lancashire the lowest in England.—I am, sir, etc., BEEDON WYMARK.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Having lived in the midst of the cotton mills for ten years, the article on "The Mill Girl," the fourth of the series under the heading "Women at Work," in EVERYMAN, was read by me with interest, but possibly in a more critical vein than the former contributions by the same writer. The discrepancies therein which I am taking the liberty to point out may be in part typographical, as instance: "Blackpool and Stockport, during 'Hindle Wakes,' the annual Lancashire holiday." Stockport is evidently a misprint for Southport, and the play, "Hindle Wakes," may be typical of the Lancashire holiday spirit, but can only be construed as "Oldham Wakes" by the initiated. Not only each district, but each town, has its own "wakes," when there is a general exodus. In the case of Burnley there are two annual holidays—at July Fair for ten days, and again in September, when the mills are closed for four days. No one who has not seen the change in a Lancashire cotton town at this time can conceive what it means. Railway station platforms piled with luggage, tin trunks predominating. Twenty-five to thirty crowded trains to Blackpool alone in one day. The amount of money saved up for and spent at these times is enormous. In Burnley alone at least £100,000 was taken out of the town and spent in the ten days' holiday in July of each year. At this time, looking over the town from one of the hills which surround it on every side, one marvels to see spots of green dotted all amongst the rows of houses, and beyond the serried ranks of streets hills and trees and fields, where for fifty weeks of the year an impenetrable cloud of smoke shrouds all from sight.

Quite recently, it will be remembered, there was a Government inquiry concerning the steaming in sheds. The statement that clogs are worn for the purpose of keeping the wearer out of inches deep of water in the weaving and spinning sheds may originally have been the reason for their adoption; but if such a state of things exists at the present time, it calls for immediate reparation.

The clang of the wooden shoon does resound, but it is not so much on cobble stones as upon granite setts.

The statement which appears to me to require either confuting or further confirmation is the question of the infant death-rate of Burnley. Ten years ago this had indeed become a public scandal; it was, if I remember rightly, about 260 per thousand under one year. During that decade, i.e., from 1891 to 1900, the average for England and Wales was 154 per thousand of infants under one year, whereas for the decade 1901 to 1910 it had fallen to 127 per thousand; so that to have one town with a rate of 333 per thousand of infants under one year would have called for prompt inquiry and necessitated drastic measures to combat such slaughter of the innocents.—I am, sir, etc., Oxton.

A. TOM.

THE "FACTS" OF IRISH HISTORY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent "Tyrone" objects to Professor Kettle's article for two reasons: (1) for its literary style; (2) for perverting the facts of history.

The facts leading up to the Wexford Rebellion would take up too much space, but this much may be said,—that Wexford was one of the most peaceable and law-abiding counties in Ireland on the eve of the Rebellion. The principles of the United Irishmen—strong in the Irish Metropolis and in the North—influenced Wexford not at all. It was only when the brutal and savage yeomanry were let loose on its defenceless people; when free quarters, half hanging, pitch-capping, and scourging of innocent men became the order of the day; when rape, robbery, house burning, and the burning of Catholic churches became common throughout Wexford; when the skulls of men condemned to death by martial law for daring to protect the honour of their women against the foul brood who had been set loose on them rattled on spikes in the market-places of Wexford towns—it was only then that Wexford men ceased to be ignobly loyal and came forth (to their eternal honour) as rebels. And their record, when they did come forth and meet in battle the troops "formidable to everyone but the enemy," is one of the glorious pages of modern Irish history. The Orange yeomanry (fitting ancestors of the present-day Orangemen, who kick Papist factory girls, half roast Catholic workmen over fires, and make life a hell for the Catholic and Nationalist workpeople of the little corner of Ireland in which they hold sway) invariably disgraced themselves whenever they encountered the gallant Wexford rebels, who, untrained and miserably equipped with arms, won victory after victory over their opponents, until finally subdued by overwhelming numbers.

As to the specific instances of rebel cruelty which "Tyrone" brings forward, the facts are briefly set out by the North of Ireland Protestant historian, John Mitchell, in his "History of Ireland." In Mitchell's account of the Wexford Rebellion, which he verified

(Continued on page 770.)

DECEIVED BY DIABOLUS!

The Well-known Proverb should read—"God sends the Food, but the Devil sends the Saucepans" which boil and wash out the Valuable Salts, Tonics, Natural Aperients, and Life-giving Essences of Meat and Vegetables, which are designed to revitalize and reinvigorate Body, Blood and Brain. On account of this "Washed-out" method of cookery, we suffer from Constipation, Anæmia, Dyspepsia, Rheumatism, Gout, Neurasthenia, and CANCER (*see below), seeking relief in Drugs, Stimulants, Narcotics, and Quack Nostrums, in a vain attempt to make up for that which, in folly, has been thrown away.

But the Devil is being defeated at last by the aid of a Simple, Scientific and Conservative Cooker, which Conserves all the Vital Essences of Meat and Vegetables. This Cooker is called—

WELBANK'S BOILERETTE

VISIT OUR LONDON DEPÔT:
105, Newgate St., E.C.

THIS WONDER-WORKING INVENTION

Gets intensely hot (above 212 deg.), yet never burns the food. As it is self-acting it requires no attention and can be left for hours to "look after itself."

"THE IDEAL COOKER"—Hospital.

Perfect for Porridge, Milk Foods, Soups, Stews, Jellies, Custards, Sauces, Jams and Marmalade Making, Potted Meats, Meat Extracts. A Speciality for Infants, Invalid and Vegetarian Cookery.

COOKS MEAT, POULTRY AND VEGETABLES IN OWN JUICES

by which means all the Valuable Salts, Tonics, Natural Aperients, and life-giving properties of Meat and Vegetables, which are usually washed away, are fully conserved.

VEGETABLES COOKED IN THEIR NATURAL MOISTURE are simply delicious and can be relied upon to put fresh life and energy into body, blood, and brain.

BOILERETTED BEEF AND MUTTON.

A Revelation in Cookery. Better than Roast. Very tender, delicious and digestible. Makes Mutton more tender than Lamb. Rich flavours and vital essences fully preserved. Very little loss from shrinkage. The Cooker par excellent for Invalids and those suffering from weak digestions, &c.

"CONVERTS THE OLD INTO YOUNG."

The Boilerette will make Tough Meat dainty, delicious and digestible, and Old and Cheap Fowls more tender and delicious than Young and Expensive Chickens cooked in the ordinary way.

THE COOKER THAT LOOKS AFTER ITSELF.

You simply put a complete dinner in the Boilerette, go right away and leave it to take care of itself. When you are ready to dine it will be found beautifully cooked, ready to serve.

Dr. ROBERT BELL, The Eminent Cancer Specialist and Successful Plaintiff in the Famous Libel Case, advocates the cooking of Vegetables in their own Moisture, and for this purpose uses and recommends the use of "WELBANK'S BOILERETTE."

* Dr. F. W. FORBES ROSS, late Civil Surgeon, His Majesty's Guarda' Hospital, in his recently published book, entitled: "Cancer, the Problem of its Genesis and Treatment," maintains and produces evidence that appears to be indisputable, that the cause of Cancer is owing to a deficiency in the system of one of the chief salts contained in Vegetables, namely, Potassium.

Concerning Vegetables, Dr. Forbes Ross, writes—"Raw Fruit and Vegetables contain Potassium. But the idiotic process of boiling vegetables in water (instead of cooking them in their own juices with butter); the eating of fine white bread; the drinking of adulterated beer; are among the causes of this huge increase of Cancer. It would be less foolish to throw away the Vegetables and consume the water."

Mr. W. MARLEY, of the firm of Marley & Russell, Chemists, Newcastle-on-Tyne, writes—"Dear Sir, Instead of prescribing pills to my customers for Constipation, &c., I now prescribe them one of your 'Boilerettes.' Pills are at best only an artificial means to an end, whereas vegetables properly cooked in one of your 'Boilerettes' are a natural remedy, and all natural remedies are the best. As a Chemist, I extract the active principle from a drug by infusing it in boiling water, the liquid infusion is given to the patient—the drug itself is rejected. Now mark you, this in modern cookery, the reverse obtains, all the valuable salts are extracted from the vegetables in the process of boiling: the liquid is rejected and the worthless washed out pulp is retained! How anyone in their sane senses can be guilty of such idiotic conduct passes all understanding. Your 'Wonderful Boilerette,' in the process of cookery, retains all the valuable salts and life-giving properties of the food intended by our Creator for promoting the health and happiness of mankind. I am, Sir, yours truly, W. MARLEY."

All sizes from 1½ pints up to 12 gallons. Full particulars post free.

E. A. WELBANK, Duplex Works, near BANBURY.

LONDON DEPOT: 105, NEWGATE STREET, E.C. Tel.: 5796 City.

by every means which make for historical truth, no mention is made of the rebels collecting men, women, and children for months on Wexford bridge and hurling them into the Slaney "off the points of their pikes," a feat, by the way, which, if true, would pay no great compliment to the physical development of the descendants of the Huguenots and Anglo-Normans, who were supposed to be affixed to the tops of the aforesaid pikes. On the contrary, instead of roasted heretics and murdered "Anglo-Normans," this Protestant North of Ireland historian has left on record the facts of that Rebellion, which are the very opposite of those put forward by "Tyrone" of Tobermory.

"The fact is incontrovertible," said Lord Holland, "that the people of Ireland were driven to resistance by the free quarters and excesses of the soldiery, which were such as are not permitted in civilised warfare even in an enemy's country. Dr. Dickson (the Protestant Bishop of Down) assured me that he has SEEN families, returning peacefully from Mass, assaulted without provocation by drunken troops and yeomanry, and their wives and daughters exposed to every species of indignity, brutality, and outrage, from which neither his (his Lordship's) remonstrances nor those of other Protestant gentlemen could rescue them." And the humane and gallant soldier, Sir John Moore, appalled by the unspeakable infamies of the Hessians, and the still viler Orange yeomanry, exclaimed, "If I were an Irishman, I would be a rebel."

In the interests of historical truth, and for the credit of Irishmen (whether professing the Roman Catholic religion, the Protestant religion, or no religion), I feel it incumbent upon me to protest against the production of one whose obvious prejudice and lack of knowledge unfit him to assume the rôle he has so unwisely adopted.—I am, sir, etc.,

MAURICE V. REIDY.

Forest Gate, March 17th, 1913.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MR. ARNOLD GOLSWORTHY is not clever in his latest volume, A LITTLE WORLD (George Allen and Co., 6s.). He treats of suburban society, and his portrayal of the people in the little villas in the stereotyped streets is not successful. The author has somewhat outwritten himself, and his padding is out of all proportion to his incident. In the old days, he could achieve certain comic effects, but in his latest production there is a small evidence of ability to reproduce the queer side of things. Take this description—one of many: "He wrote articles and stories for the magazines, and had his name in print almost every week; and, what was more to the point, he had enough to live on without being obliged to go and sit in an office and keep business hours." This is neither clever nor pungent, and, while we have every desire to give Mr. Golsworthy full appreciation for his former efforts in adding to the laughter of the world, we cannot hide the fact that in his recent book he has failed.

Mr. G. A. Birmingham has well sustained his reputation for geniality of humour and crisp characterisation in DOCTOR WHITTY (Methuen and Co., 6s.). The story centres round Ballintra, a delightful Irish village, of which the hero is the moving spirit. His method of dealing with too insistent patients is one of the best things in the book. "He looked out of the window and discovered Michael Geraghty standing on the step. 'If it's your wife's rheumatism,' he said, 'I'll not dress myself to go and attend her at this hour. It'll neither be better nor worse after breakfast.'

"'It's not herself at all,' said Michael Geraghty.

"'Has Thady Glynn been beating you again? For, if he has, you needn't come here to be plastered up. I told you last time you'd have to learn to hit back. I hate a man who sits down and lets himself be assaulted.'

"'There's been no beating me.'

"'Then what the devil do you want? Has the baby swallowed a pin? If so, go home out of this and feed her on mashed potatoes and cotton-wool.'

This is only one of the many extracts that strike the nerve of laughter throughout the book. The reception of the doctor on his return with his wife from their honeymoon is delightful. His grateful patients organise an ovation, arrange for bands, not to mention bonfires. There is one mistake in the programme. The number selected to play the newly married couple home is one for which the doctor has a rooted objection. It is none other than "Love's Young Dream."

Mr. William Arkwright is notable among modern writers for literary style and finish. In his latest volume, KNOWLEDGE AND LIFE (John Lane, 6s.), he publishes a number of sketches. Under the title of "The Thief," he paints the torment of a little boy writhing under the accusation of dishonesty. The small child is the only son of a young widow, who sours her natural affections by determined adherence to the grim rule of Calvinism. The boy, invited to a party at the Vicarage, falls under the fascination of a youth years his senior. The two have a game with a toy poodle, and the child experiences the delightful thrill that comes when, for the first time, a junior is admitted to terms of equality with older people. In the middle of the game they are summoned to a magic-lantern show; the poodle, thrust hastily into his coat, is forgotten. He returns home with it still in his possession, and the next morning, indicted by his mother on the charge of theft, is too flurried to remember how it got into his pocket. The mother, determined at all costs to root out this hideous predisposition to dishonesty, conducts the trembling little creature through the village, bearing a placard, on which is painted in huge letters the word "Thief." The memory of that awful walk is burnt into the child's consciousness, obliterating the image of the mother he has so fondly loved, overshadowing his life, darkening the vision of God Himself. Mr. Arkwright touches a high level throughout the book.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarion London."

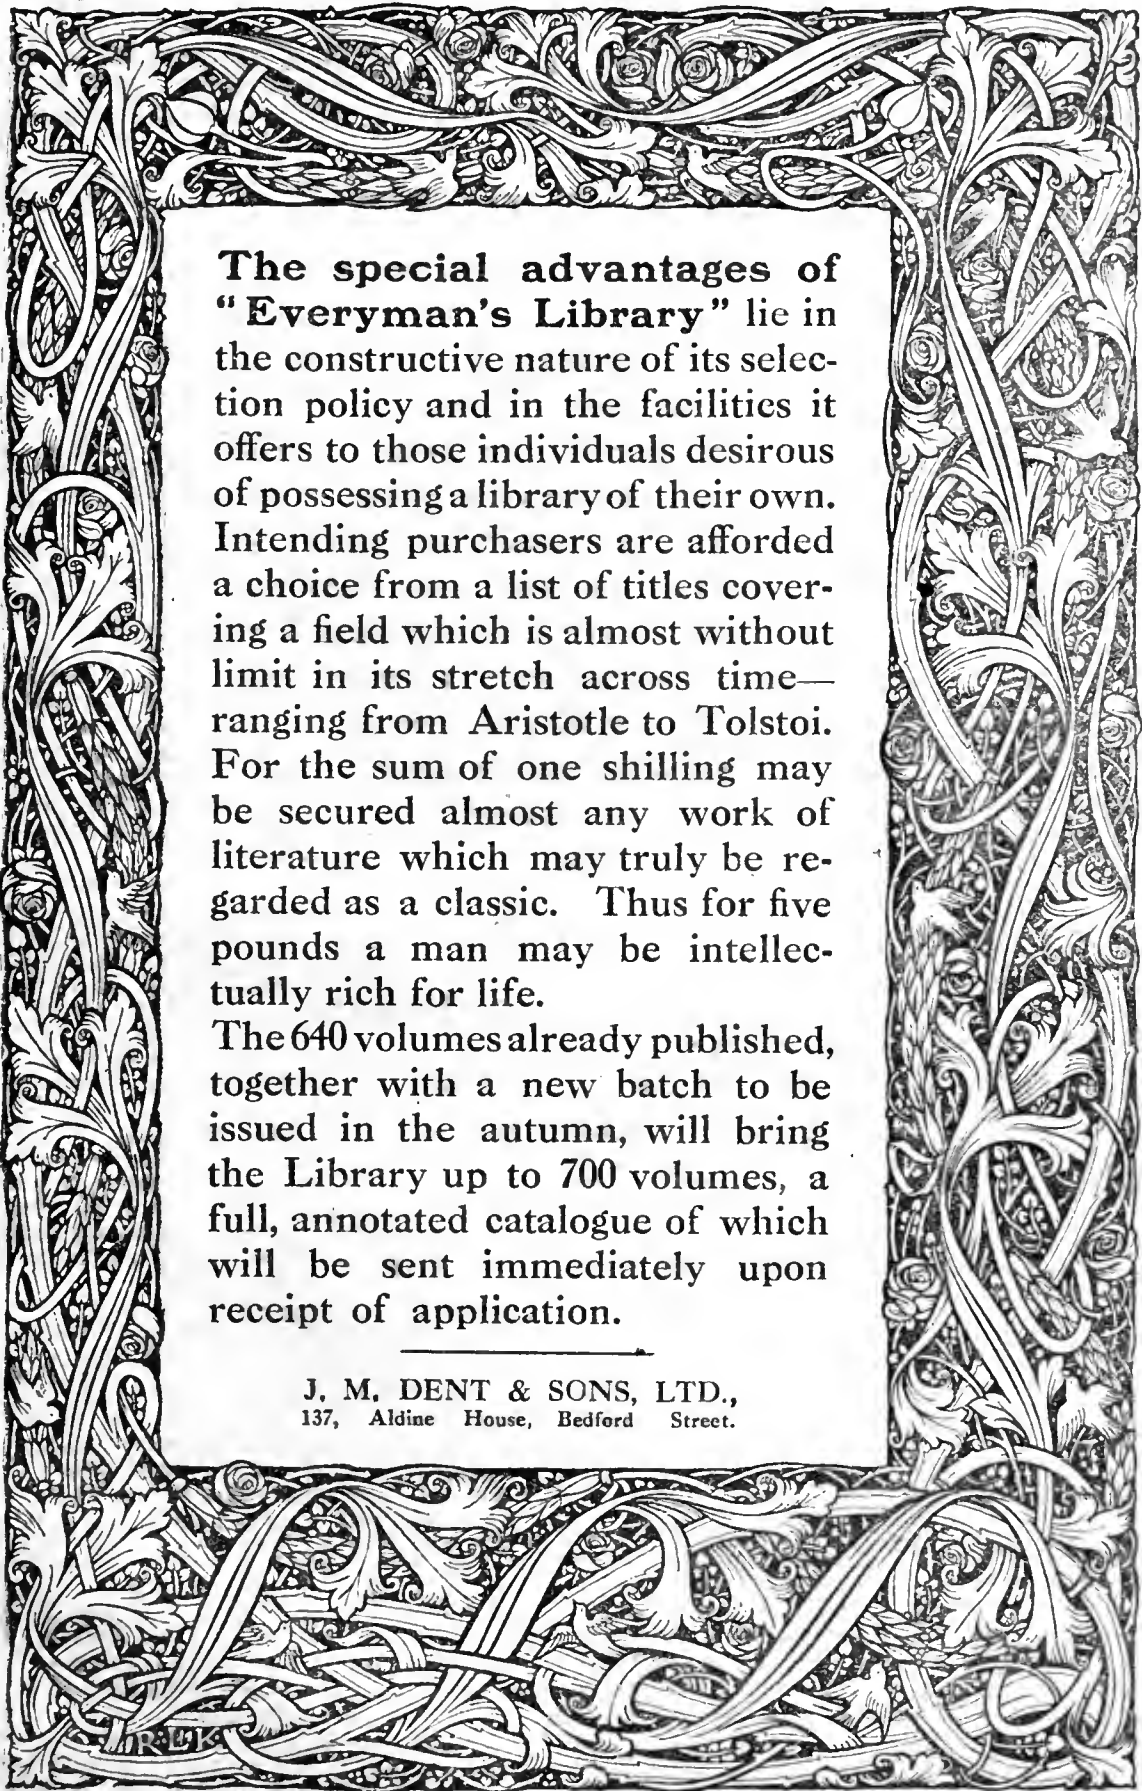

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY.

The special advantages of "Everyman's Library" lie in the constructive nature of its selection policy and in the facilities it offers to those individuals desirous of possessing a library of their own. Intending purchasers are afforded a choice from a list of titles covering a field which is almost without limit in its stretch across time—ranging from Aristotle to Tolstoi. For the sum of one shilling may be secured almost any work of literature which may truly be regarded as a classic. Thus for five pounds a man may be intellectually rich for life.

The 640 volumes already published, together with a new batch to be issued in the autumn, will bring the Library up to 700 volumes, a full, annotated catalogue of which will be sent immediately upon receipt of application.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.,
137, Aldine House, Bedford Street.

WELL-KNOWN artists in all parts of the world have been helped to do saleable work—and sell it! Hundreds of young men and women have been enabled to enter the profession by a quick and easy route, personally conducted by post, by one of London's most successful designers of Pictorial Publicity, an English artist of international repute who has taught more people to earn money by art than any other man. Formerly Art and Artists were in a bad way. Only the wealthy could buy pictures, and the poor painter had to sell his work or perish.

It was better to be a plumber than a painter, for plumbing was needful, while painting was a luxury dependent upon the prejudice and fancy of the wealthy.

To-day the artist can snap his fingers at the retired usurer or mill-owner, because there is a new and widening market for his work.

DRAWING FOR PLEASURE AND PROFIT.

He may draw pictures for the people.

The Advertiser clamours for "the picture that tells the story," and the publisher must buy it.

Art in Advertising also offers a splendid field. Men like Walter Crane, R.W.S., Bernard Partridge, E. J. Sullivan, Hubert Herkomer, R.A., and Chas. E. Dawson design advertisements because they know that it is better for our walls and magazines to be covered with designs that are good in drawing and colour than with advertisements that are bald, crude, and brutally bad as they used to be.

When a firm spends thousands of pounds on an advertisement, it realises that any price paid for a design that makes the advertisement more effective is money well spent.

THE MODERN ARTIST'S OPPORTUNITIES.

Commercial artists usually sell their work by post, thus saving time and the embarrassment of personal interviews and verbal bargaining.

By post, also, anyone with a taste for drawing can enjoy the advantages of a London training at home.

The Directors of the Practical Correspondence College—the All-British Art School with the world-wide Reputation—offer the full Course of Instruction in Black and White at half fees to the first 50 readers to pass a postal examination. The balance of fees is only payable WHEN THE STUDENT HAS EARNED TEN POUNDS as a result of his tuition. The Scholarships will be awarded to those who are most likely to be successful; our interests are mutual, for we succeed or fail with the student.

If the Course fails to help the student to earn £10, then the student is under no further obligation to complete payment of fees.

The COLLEGE STAKES 200 GUINEAS UPON the SUCCESS OF the 50 SCHOLARSHIP HOLDERS.

Most of our students are helped to earn while they learn, and easily dispose of their work at the completion of the course.

Any reader with a taste for drawing, common sense and ambition stands a chance of launching, on unprecedented terms, right into the most interesting and lucrative of the artistic professions either as a profitable spare time pursuit or a regular occupation.

No preliminary training or expenses are necessary. Awards will be made in the order in which specimen sketches are received.

Send as soon as possible, not later than April 17th, for full particulars of the most successful Course of Home Study in Commercially Applied Art at the most favourable terms ever offered.

It costs nothing, and you risk nothing by entering for this unique scholarship.

The lessons, exclusive and confidential to each Scholarship Winner, are superbly illustrated. Exercises are set expounding the technique of drawing for reproduction. These exercises are sent by post to the Art Director, who criticises them; his long letters of personal advice and encouragement are alone worth more than the moderate fee for the course.

He gives "reasons why" for praise or blame—his Art Criticism in the foremost magazines of Great Britain and America have won for him a Reputation only equalled by the high regard shown on both sides of the Atlantic for his notable advertisement designs. His pen and pencil have lent Refinement and Distinction to the announcements of the leading advertisers, among them:

ROYA COCOA, VAN HOUTEN'S, FRY'S, JAEGER'S, FRAME-FOOD, KELWAY'S, PELMAN MEMORY SYSTEM, LUCE'S EAU-DE-COLOGNE, HIS MASTER'S VOICE GRAMOPHONES, OETZMANN'S, WOLSELEY CARS, LIBERTY'S, AND THE CHIEF LONDON PUBLISHERS.

The subjects taught include:—

Drawing for reproduction, book cover, advertisement designs, lettering, perspective, line, wash and body colour sketches, splatter work, time and labour-saving devices, originating saleable designs, establishing a connection, commercial correspondence, dealing with printers, publishers, and advertisers, how, when and where to sell designs to the best advantage.

IF YOU CAN DRAW WELL ENOUGH TO AMUSE YOUR FRIENDS

you can learn to earn some of the hundreds of pounds that advertisers—in London alone—spend daily upon the simple but effective sketches they want.

Correspondence must not be directed to the Editor of EVERYMAN, but to the SECRETARY, PRACTICAL CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

"JOHN BULL" says:—"An Institution which has evidently come to stay. No student is accepted who does not give proof by specimen of work of his aptitude for the subject in which he or she seeks training. Anyone desirous of improving his position should write to the Secretary for particulars."

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 25. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, APRIL 4, 1913

One Penny.

JOHN GALSWORTHY,
NATUS 1867

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

	PAGE
Portrait of John Galsworthy	773
History in the Making—Notes of the Week	774
The Abolition of the Working Classes. I.—The Work that Must be Done—By L. G. Chiozza Money	775
Countries of the World. XI.—Denmark—By Constance de la Cour	776
Women at Work. VI.—The Typist—By Margaret Hamilton	778
John Galsworthy—By E. Hermann	780
Life in a London Bastille. IV.—By Thomas Holmes	781
Literary Notes	782
The Greek Drama. III.—Euripides—By Prof. J. S. Phillimore	783
Björnson in English—By Norman W. Duthie	784
Through Gates of Sleep—Poem—By W. H.	784
Masterpiece for the Week. William Law's "Serious Call"—By Hugh Sinclair	785
The Women's Page. The Labour Member's Wife—By Edith J. Macrosty	786
The Trial of the Girondists—By Henri Mazel	788
The Two Dawns. Poem—By Carlton Howell	789
The Philosophy of Happiness—By Mrs. Havelock Ellis	790
Correspondence—
National Education	792
Anglo-German Relations	792
The Call of the Citizen	794
The Glorious Freedom of Half-Timerdom	796
Mr. Macpherson on G. B. S.	796
Esperanto	797
Paganism and Christianity	798
"The World Ugly"	800
Christianity and Progress	800
Books of the Week	800

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IT does not take a very large pebble to ruffle the pools of political opinion, and the Marconi inquiry is producing some very formidable ripples. Viewing the mass of things said on the question by organs of every shade of political conviction, two things at least emerge. One is a general attitude of respectful sympathy towards a Cabinet which has been plunged into a situation of extreme delicacy and complexity. The other is a justly high and scrupulous regard for the best traditions of British honour. One of our contemporaries speculates as to what the result would have been had the American Marconi Company been styled the Wireless Company of the United States, and thinks the disturbing ripples might not have been quite so large in that case. But more probably the result would have been exactly the same—a repudiation from those concerned of any dishonouring suspicion and a wholesome revival of jealousy for the highest standard of public conduct.

It is rumoured that the Marconi Committee intend to close the inquiry after hearing the evidence of Mr. Samuel, and without summoning the journalists who, in the earlier stages of the proceedings, were to have been heard. It is understood that Mr. Maxse will not be recalled, as his evidence in chief was concluded at his last appearance in the Committee room that the proceedings of the last months have rendered as politically famous as the historic battle-ground of Parnell and his followers after the repudiation of the former by Gladstone, immediately following that statesman's adoption of Home Rule.

The capture of Adrianople by storm is a feat which has no parallel in modern military history. It presents the solitary instance of a first-class fortress being carried by assault. The nearest approach to it was the storming of 203 Metre Hill by the Japanese; but it must be borne in mind that Port Arthur itself yielded only to bombardment. In the Franco-Prussian War no attempt was made to carry either Metz or Strassburg by assault, while Plevna, which was little more, indeed, than an entrenched camp, defied the Russian troops. But while the storming of Adrianople has secured a high place among the great military peoples of the world for two small and hitherto disregarded nations, it has no less crowned the last struggle of the Ottoman Empire with glory.

Events are progressing towards peace without any very considerable impediments. Montenegro is the problem, of course; but everything is hoped from the exercise—judicious exercise—of "pressure," which may mean anything, from an argument to a thumb-screw. It appears that the Powers have approved the expedient of a naval demonstration against Montenegro, and that Montenegro's ally, Serbia, is adding her friendly persuasion to their insistence. Meanwhile the fall of Adrianople has released some ninety thousand men, and a march of the Allies upon Constantinople has thereby come within the range of possibility. Most students of the situation are agreed that a cessation of what has become a sterile war will in the end prove to be in the best interests of the Balkan States themselves.

For the third time in her history Belgium is threatened with a general strike based upon a political, not upon an economic grievance. Unless the Clerical Government concedes a more equal suffrage, the strike will begin on April 14th, and one of the consequences will be the ruin of the Ghent Exhibition, upon which vast sums have been spent. It is curious to note that one section of the Clericals, who are inclined to give concessions, are in favour of equal suffrage only if it is extended to women, whose vote, it is assumed, can be influenced by the clergy. The Belgian Labour leaders, headed by M. Vandervelde, have used all their influence to dissuade the workers from the strike—another indication that enlightened Labour is coming to reckon strikes among counsels of despair and survivals of a cruder age.

The death of Father Stanton removes a well-known figure from clerical circles, and deprives the poor of London of one of their staunchest friends and champions. A single-minded man, of singleness of purpose and a rare strength of will, he took the course he adopted undeterred by criticism, and knowing well that his views were not likely to ensure him promotion. It was pointed out to him in the early days of his curacy that if he persisted in the theological line he had adopted he must not hope for Church advancement; and, said Father Stanton, in recounting the incident, "I never have!"

A startling discovery has been made in the course of the Home Office inquiry into the causes of the fire at Messrs. Bibby's Oil Cake Factories last November. The expert declares that the outbreak originated in the dust collected on the beams and other projections of the building. So highly inflammable is certain dust that ignition takes place with so tiny a flame as that of a match. The discovery adds a fresh peril to industry, and should entail the enforcement of protective measures.

THE ABOLITION OF THE WORKING CLASSES * * * BY L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY

I.—THE WORK THAT MUST BE DONE

By way of variation of the well-worn theme of doing good to the working classes, let us talk of abolishing them.

What are the working classes? The answer is, in brief, a most ungentlemanly institution. Purely owing to the application of power to matter by the scientist, we (which means some of us) have learned how to produce a large amount of wealth with a small amount of labour. This being so, and the scientific instruments being in the hands of a relative few, we produce what is actually much, but, relatively to population, little material wealth by employing a certain proportion of the population in useful production. The rest of us—and the rest of us is an astonishingly large proportion of the nation—very carefully keep clear of this work, and have learned to look upon production as something that is not for us, but as reserved for a limited number of people we call the "working classes." The middle classes, and trading classes, and professional classes, and upper classes—the margins of these are very vague—traffic in, or use, or play with, the commodities outpoured by the working classes, and contrive to get the greater part of them into their possession, leaving for the working classes themselves little more than a bare subsistence. So there is a division between "classes" and "masses" which is formed by the doing, or the avoidance of doing, manual work. Every improvement invented by science, every means that is devised of getting more wealth out of a given amount of labour, becomes a means of swelling the size of the classes or the "avoid works," and this is the explanation of why it is as true to-day as when John Stuart Mill long ago mourned the fact that science and invention have not relieved the working classes of arduous toil.

Let us not deceive ourselves about it. Someone has got to make and repair our houses, and our clothes, and our furnishings, and the instruments of our comforts, our recreations, and what we call our culture. Material things do not accomplish themselves. Every addition to the "classes" means a subtraction from the ranks of those who do the Work That Must Be Done, and the price of the avoidance of work by some means now, and will always continue to mean as long as the system lasts, the performance of undue work by others. Every softly nurtured man and woman of to-day has a price, and that price is paid by the perpetuation of the "working classes."

All this can be put into the most startling statistics, but let it suffice here to say that in our population of about 45,000,000 of people there are about 26,000,000 between eighteen and sixty-five years of age. Yet the number of us actually engaged in factory or field or workshop in producing material things is only about 10,000,000. Making handsome allowance for necessary transportation and necessary work in distribution, it will be seen what an enormous margin of persons there must be engaged either in wasted labour or in avoiding necessary labour altogether.

So great is the number of those who avoid useful labour that it is possible to find districts where one can easily forget that production exists at all. You may travel on a Tube railway in London for hours without meeting a single member of the working classes, save the wretchedly paid man or boy who works the train or lift, and even he is, by his occupation, chiefly a servant, not of the working class, but of the well-dressed people who mainly use the Tubes. You may take a long walk in some parts of London and encounter scarcely a reminder of the necessity of production, unless it be in the passing of one or two useful transport workers, or the erection or repairing of a residence or hotel for those who escape work. You may stand in Cheapside and look in vain for the appearance of the dirty clothes of a working man. The working classes, for their part, accept their isolation as a matter of course. They keep clear of churches, and even of many of the parks. I was recently struck, in Kew Gardens on a Sunday, with the almost complete absence of working-class persons.

We have done the thing very well, but is it well this thing that we have done? Is it well for a nation that hard work, and that alone, should be the lot of some, and that soft work, and that alone, should be the lot of others? Is it good for either the hard-handed ones or for the soft-handed ones?

A parent writes to me, as a member of Parliament, naturally anxious for his child. He points out that he has given him a good education and spent a large sum of money in preparing him for a post. Therefore, he expects for the child a career, by which he means, although he has never thought about it in that way, the right to avoid hard work. That is what we always mean when we of the classes speak of "careers" for our sons and daughters. What shall they be? we put it to ourselves, and we put it upon the presumption that what they shall be excludes any possibility of their doing the Work That Must Be Done if they are to live. We talk of them as though there were an unlimited field for direction, for officering, for managing, for trafficking, for commissioning—as though genteel occupation and avoidance of work were things without limit.

When we are especially kind to, and thoughtful of, the working classes, we offer ladders of escape for their brightest ones out of the Work That Must Be Done into the unlimited trafficking which we vaguely believe to exist. The "educational ladder" is just that, and nothing more. The theory of popular education is not the conception of training the faculties of boys and girls to fit them to be useful producers, but of providing scholarships in order that the brightest of them may cheerfully climb out of work into some soft-handed "occupation."

And every really bright boy of the working classes soon learns that the sensible thing to do is to get out of the working classes as soon as possible. Why work when you can get a much better time without working? Why pursue the excellent craft of joinery when it means poor pay and unemployment, while, if you have a little common artfulness and care to exercise it, you can earn far more and be much more regularly "employed" in "earning" commissions? Why be hated and despised as a "working man" when you can "rise" into the sublime regions of the middle class?

What a caddish business it all is!

(To be continued.)

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD

XI.—DENMARK BY CONSTANCE DE LA COUR.

I.

DENMARK, the most ancient of European kingdoms, with a history receding 2,000 years into the mists of antiquity, was once extensive with entire Scandinavia. Yet, though her territory has been narrowed down to the sea-worn peninsula of Jutland and a group of islands, modern Denmark illustrates, by triumph over difficulties, the successful working of the law of limitations. "What we have lost from without we will make good from within," was the cry of the Danish patriot after the loss of Slesvig to Germany in 1864, and the people set to work to develop the resources of their country. The absence of minerals, and physical conditions generally, pointed to agriculture as the way of prosperity. The climate is temperate, with considerable variation between winter and summer, and is suited to grain-growing and pasture. The surface of the country is undulating, rising at two points only over 500 feet, and the general level is so low that, were it depressed 100 feet, half the land would be under water, while a corresponding elevation of the bed of the encircling seas would reunite the islands, as in prehistoric times, with Jutland and the South of Sweden.

There are no rivers of any size, but a number of lakes and fjords, by whose shores luxuriant beech-woods combine with low heather-clad hills in many a scene of idyllic loveliness. The islands, forming about one-third of the total area of the kingdom, are fruitful and prosperous, and in the south and east of Jutland there is good arable land. In the north and west of the peninsula wide tracts of barren moorland have been reclaimed, and leagues of dark fir woods give a shelter from the fierce winds. There are no natural harbours on the west coast, which, with its treacherous quicksands, offers an hospitable reception in storm or fog to the bold fishermen who there ply their dangerous trade. The port of Eslyirg has, however, by overcoming natural difficulties, become a great and growing centre for trade. On the more sheltered and friendly east coast are inlet and fjords, at the head of which towns have been built.

II.

The successful agricultural expansion of Denmark is attributable to three main causes: (1) the existence of a numerous class of peasant freeholders, strenuous, thrifty, and of independent spirit; (2) the abundant facilities for education in the science of farming; (3) the co-operative system, fostered by the State, whereby farmers combine to regulate the quality and the distribution and to share the profit of their produce in such enterprises as co-operative creameries, egg circles, slaughter-houses, etc. Thrift is encouraged by the agricultural banks, and loans are made by Government, and facilities given to those farm labourers who desire to acquire land. The well-organised State railway system is of great importance to the development of the country, as islands and mainland have been welded together by a chain of railways and steam ferries, which also unite Denmark with Sweden and Germany. One-fifth of the inhabitants live directly by agriculture, and a larger proportion by dependent trades. It is estimated that, as regards equal distribution of wealth, Denmark is the richest country in Europe. Food is cheap, but house rent dear, and municipal taxation in urban districts is high, though the burden is shared by all, even the servant girl having to contribute according to her income.

III.

Denmark, with a total population of two and a half millions, of which one-fifth live in Copenhagen, may be likened to a small body with a large head. There are no other towns of any size, Aarhus, the capital of Jutland, being next in importance, with 50,000 inhabitants. The abnormal development of Copenhagen is owing to its unique position on the main water thoroughfare between the Baltic and the North Sea. It is not only the centre of Danish import and export, but the seat of a considerable transit business, greatly increased since the opening of the Free Port in 1894. All institutions are centralised in Copenhagen, and it is the seat of the Government and the Law Courts; the Royal residences, with one exception, are there, or in its vicinity; the only university of the country is in Copenhagen, and all museums and colleges. Attracted by the interest and beauty of the town, foreign tourists visit it in large and ever-increasing numbers, and bring with them an atmosphere of cosmopolitanism which has differentiated the capital from the rest of Denmark, where manners and customs are still simple and distinctively Danish. The inhabitants of Copenhagen work and play with a will; their wit is more apparent than their sense of reverence. There is a good deal of restaurant-life, and theatres and music-halls are much frequented; but there is little drunkenness observable.

IV.

The political development of Denmark has proceeded rapidly. In 1788 the peasantry were released from villinage, and 1848 marks the granting of the present Constitution, on the basis of a limited Monarchy, controlled by an elective Assembly composed of an Upper and a Lower House. This Constitution is now about to undergo its third revision on more democratic lines. After stubborn resistance by the late King and his Ministers, whose appointment before 1897 was a prerogative of the Crown, the Liberal party captured political power towards the end of the nineteenth century, and have held it ever since. The former bureaucratic nature of legislation has gradually changed, and recent measures have been for the people and of the people. Trades Unionism is strong in Denmark; even unskilled labour is organised, and strikes have been of frequent occurrence. Farm labourers have become infected with the spirit of industrial discontent, and, in consequence, large farmers annually import bands of Poles for summer work. Powerful as is the Social Democratic party, actual Socialism has no real hold in Denmark, owing to the desire of the peasant to own his land, and, though Socialistic measures have lately become law, he probably does not realise in what direction his Parliamentary representative is leading him. There is a growing antagonism between the parties of the "Right" and the "Left." The Conservatives and moderate Liberals still strive to keep alive the spirit of Danish nationality among their countrymen resident in the conquered province of Slesvig. They desire the efficient maintenance of the naval and military services, and they have raised money for the repair and extension of the fortifications of Copenhagen, which they fear may, in the present state of European politics, become the object of a hostile attack. The advanced Radicals, with whom patriotic aspiration has been lost sight of in concern for the rights of the people, are openly antagonistic to any addition to the national defences, considering the matter settled by a party compromise of 1909.

V.

The influence of the "People's High Schools" is largely responsible for the rapid development of Denmark on democratic lines. The sturdy, country-bred pupils, inspired with democratic ideals, carry these with them into the Parish Council, the Rigsdago, the Cabinet. Yet such education has its limitations, and is apt to engender undue self-confidence on the basis of superficial culture. The University of Copenhagen also makes for democracy, as its lectures are free to students of both sexes, 2,000 of which attend its courses. Co-education has been introduced in the higher classes of the "Latin" schools, and girls enjoy equal educational advantages with boys. Danish women have little to complete their emancipation, except the political vote.

VI.

Episcopal Lutheranism is the State Religion, and prevails almost universally in Denmark. Old Catholic tradition blends with Protestantism in its worship; the Geneva ruff and gown are used for preaching, but the vestments of the Mass for Communion. The average Dane is not an assiduous churchgoer, as is to be inferred by the small number of churches in proportion to the population. The bye-paths of religious belief attract few, and Roman Catholicism is the only body of Christians palpably on the increase. Into all classes of society religious unbelief has found its way, and a tolerant, half humorous attitude to questions of morals is characteristic of many minds. A great wave of religious fervour passed over the country in the "Inner Mission," an evangelical revival stimulating to a strict standard of conduct.

VII.

The future of Denmark is menaced by two perils—that of annexation from without, and of over-hasty progressive legislation from within. Certain foreign statesmen entertain a theory that geographically Denmark completes the German Empire. They undervalue the fact that it is inhabited by a Scandinavian race, speaking a language akin to that of Norway and Sweden, over which it formerly ruled. The present one-sided democratic legislation is due to a reaction from the old system of privilege and supremacy of property, also to a reluctance among men belonging to the former governing class to concern themselves with what they look on as the petty wrangle of politics. There are signs to-day that the Conservative element is awakening to the danger of too rapid progress in one direction, and a brake may be applied to the political wheel.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

VI.—THE TYPIST

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

THE profession of shorthand typist is one that has grown up within the last fifteen years. All sorts and conditions of girls embrace the opportunity the calling affords to leave the shelter of the home and enter the ranks of commercialism, with an eagerness and avidity that becomes curiously dull and tamed after a few years.

The incursion of the middle-class women into office life is a phenomenon not to be accounted for by economic pressure. Public opinion fifty years ago expressed itself in vigorous terms against the employment of female labour in mines, demanded Government inspection of factories, with a statutory limitation of hours, and forced a whole series of reforms in relation to female employment generally.

But that same section of the public that had clearly seen the evils attendant on the advent of woman into industrialism took a different view of the daughters of the middle-class. The surplus woman—i.e., the unmarried spinster—was, for the first time, regarded as an important social factor. Her economic dependence on her male relations was deplored, and her emancipation from the restrictions of home and family eagerly demanded. The possibility of her admission into the learned professions was advanced, and a heated discussion for and against women doctors, women lawyers, and women barristers waxed fast and furious. When one reads the passionate protests of fifty years back, the eloquent demands for the equal education of woman with man, the triumphant prophecies of the heights to which she would attain with the dawn of freedom, the present-day solution of the matter strikes cold on feminine enthusiasm.

For the result of the movement for the economic emancipation of woman is to be seen to-day in the army of girls that pours each morning from the suburbs, journeying by tube and tram and motor-bus, to the centre of the town.

As I write, there rises before me the benignant face and stately figure of Harriet Martineau, one of the first and, in some respects, the most remarkable of the pioneers of the woman's movement.

In fancy one hears her voice, penetrating, silvery, declaim the rich harvest of attainment her sisters would achieve, given equal opportunities with man. And then athwart her eloquence, shattering her dreams, sounds a metallic and insistent click—the click of the typewriter.

It is estimated that there are some 200,000 female typists in London alone, and this army can be divided into three grades. At the top of the scale are to be found the girls who have had a superior education—high-school students, for example—who have acquired a distinct proficiency in shorthand and typing; they can generally also read and translate a foreign language. These girls are generally trained at a regular typing office, where they are taught their work for an inclusive fee, varying from about fifteen guineas upwards. Some of them remain in these offices, in the hope of eventually owning a similar establishment, and form the skilled staff, able to undertake the most difficult work, and also the higher branches of secretarial duties. The majority, however, enter business houses—legal and commercial.

Their rate of pay is good, amounting in some cases from £2 a week to £3, and even occasionally £4. The hours of work are, as a rule, short: ten in the morning to five in the afternoon, more rarely nine to six.

The second class consists of fairly intelligent and capable girls, proficient in ordinary typewriting and copying, and a fair rate of speed in shorthand. As a rule, they have received a fair education in the commercial side, but are unversed in matters of literary interest, and are unfitted for secretarial positions. They are generally trained in one of the large business colleges that of late have sprung into existence. Their salary averages from 20s. to 30s. a week, and the conditions under which they work are fairly satisfactory.

The third class is a grade without much intelligence or education. To quote from the report of Miss A. M. Anderson, principal lady inspector of factories: "The girls who compose this class are, for the most part, drawn into the occupation because they think it a higher class of employment than that provided by domestic service or the workshop. They have had some training in the big commercial schools, but they never become very proficient, and consequently their wages are low (10s. to 15s. a week)."

This grade finds employment in the cheaper type of copying offices, where all day long they sit behind their machine typing out articles, stories, specifications of patents, and legal documents. These are also found in the correspondence departments of mammoth businesses where they send out circulars, receipts, and stereotyped letters.

It is a notable fact that the average intelligence in the typist is lower than that of factory, shop, or domestic workers. And the reason is not far to seek. The faculty of observation is developed in those callings which call for individual enterprise, judgment, and decision. The tapping of a typewriter is neither inspiring nor stimulating; the intelligence of the operator falls into a mechanical groove, from which it is with difficulty aroused.

Woman is notoriously quick in the comprehension of detail, and applies her brain swiftly to the mastery of mechanical improvement in all departments of industrialism. The typist, however, is a notable exception to the rule. That her work develops neither her resource nor her initiative is borne out by the following facts.

Edison, the great inventor, originally applied his genius to the perfection of the phonograph for commercial purposes. It was his aim to ensure the saving of time and trouble to the business man, and he designed the wonderful machine with the idea of reducing the time and trouble of answering correspondence to a minimum.

The intelligence of the typist was not equal to the strain of understanding how to work the instrument, and, what was designed for the use of the business man, to simplify the routine of office work, has finally taken its place as a plaything—an amusing and scientific toy—having no commercial value for business purposes. When one remembers the nature of the typist's work, the long manuscripts she has to copy, the reams of paper she must fill, often working at a rate that precludes intelligent comprehension of the matter she has in hand, it is not surprising that her initiative should fall to a lower level than the majority of women workers.

What happened to the phonograph holds true about the more modern adaption of the invention. The dictophone, with its admirable and ingenious device for saving time, is infrequently used in business, owing to the difficulty of finding an operator capable of grappling with the mechanism. It is not very hard to grasp: the letter is dictated through a speaking-tube, and an electric needle takes a record of the words spoken. The operator has then to fix the transmitter to her ears and type out what the machine says. From all accounts, however, the number of typists able to realise how to use the instrument are few and far between.

The infrequency of its employment among literary people is, however, due to different causes. Admirably adapted for business correspondence, the instrument does not lend itself to the exigencies of original composition. The majority of writers find it difficult to dictate without walking up and down, and require a certain space in which to move about while they co-ordinate their ideas. To speak through a tube when the imagination is at work is a difficult process, and one that does not lend itself to the literary temperament. These remarks, however, do not apply to the ordinary routine of commercial correspondence.

The period of training for a typist varies according to the grade for which the student is preparing. The large commercial colleges train students in shorthand from a fee of fifteen guineas, and commercial typewriting from five to twelve guineas, according to the length of time of study and the proficiency required.

The prizes of the profession are not many. Occasionally a girl of trained intelligence and quick perception obtains a post as secretary to a literary or scientific man, and, if she is clever and adaptive, and learns to understand his moods, to manage his papers, and to keep a careful record of his work, she will prove invaluable, and secure a good salary and ample appreciation. There are also positions to be obtained in City offices, where a woman's tact is eminently helpful, and her wages correspondingly high; but the outcome of even the best of these positions is the same. After a period of hard work, at a salary that does not, as a rule, allow a margin for saving, the typist finds herself faced with a future arid of ambition, and with nothing to hope for in the way of pension or insured competency when she can work no more.

The Government employs a limited number of typists in certain departments. These are chosen partly by competitive examination, and those who succeed in obtaining appointments secure short hours, a fair proportion of holidays, and a pension on leaving after a certain number of years' service. The salary, however, is not large; starting at £1 a week, the Government typist has to serve for a considerable length of time before she reaches 30s. The same holds good of the employées of the County Council; the hours are light, the holidays generous, a pension is assured, but the rate of pay compares unfavourably with the average of outside offices.

The highly trained and efficient typist suffers more and more from the stress of competition arising from the increasing number of what I may term the "third grade." An Association of Women Clerks and Secretaries was formed early in 1903, in order to meet a pressing need, in view of the evils arising from this form of overcrowding the profession. Its objects are:

- (1) To raise a general level of proficiency and to encourage a higher standard of practical training.
- (2) To secure a just remuneration for all grades.

- (3) To establish a registry of shorthand writers and typists, and to watch for openings for members of the Association.

- (4) To render legal aid and to give advice to members.

The Association has been successful in many of its objects, and while women remain in commercialism it is inevitable they should combine to obtain for themselves a better rate of pay and fair hours of labour. It is only through the agency of a trade union that women can hope to improve their position, and it is worthy of note that in those cases where women workers have so combined, they have immensely improved the conditions of employment.

It may not be generally known that typewriting offices are under the supervision of the local sanitary officials, and are inspected by them from time to time. Miss A. M. Anderson, in her Report, states that in most of the business houses in which large numbers of women clerks and typists are employed the accommodation is good; but the smaller firms often find difficulty in providing suitable and separate accommodation when female clerks are first employed. The employment of such clerks is, however, becoming so general now, that the conditions are steadily improving, and in new commercial buildings proper arrangements are, as a rule, provided.

The inspection of a certain class of copying office is highly necessary. Of late years the conditions under which a certain number of lower-grade typists work have notably improved; but some short time back it was no uncommon thing to find as many as nineteen or twenty girls, sitting as closely packed as the neighbourhood of their machines would allow, typing for dear life, with the aid of artificial light, in a basement office. One such I have in my mind at this moment. I was anxious to get an article typed upon the instant, and called at the first establishment I chanced upon. The room was narrow, and a long counter ran its full length. Some twelve girls, varying from sixteen to eighteen years of age, seated on high stools, were tapping out on the typewriter from MSS. before them. The din was deafening; the clatter irritated almost unbearably the nerves; one ached for a breath of silence, a cessation of the metallic, hammer-like effect. But there was no pause for the young and, in some cases, pretty creatures. Up and down before the counter walked the proprietor of the establishment, keeping a wary eye upon the girls, spurring them on to fresh effort, sternly rebuking any sign of slacking or fatigue.

It was not a nice sight, and once more my thoughts flew back to the inauguration of the emancipation of woman, when the horizon gleamed glorious with the promise of hope—hope that has found its ultimate expression in the click of the insistent machine!

The life from all points of view is a trying one. It entails a strain of the nervous system prejudicial to a woman's ultimate health; and exacerbated nerves, in the case of the typist, cause an uneven temper and a shortness of manner at variance with woman's traditional charm. Long, continuous hours of work result in what is termed "typists' fingers." This complaint is practically an irritation of the nerves at the tips of the fingers, so that the slightest touch sets up an agony difficult to bear. It is, at best, an arduous occupation, involving long hours, with but scanty time for leisure or repose. "I wonder," said a typist to me the other day, "what's the good of it?"

And, remembering the anticipations and prophecies of fifty years ago, one is inclined to repeat the question, to which, it seems to me, there cannot be found a satisfactory answer.

JOHN GALSWORTHY * * * BY E. HERMANN

I.

A CALM, strong, assured man of sane and judicious temper—a man who, having found self-expression and success when little more than half-way across the bridge of life, looks out upon the world with clear, keen, appraising eyes, not smugly satisfied, but wisely contented with his lot—that is one's first impression of Mr. Galsworthy. It suggests more than a little of the harmonious and detached spirit of Greek wisdom; one half divines the wide-eyed onlooker at the game of life, who sees so much and possibly misses so much more. But a second look, while it does not altogether belie the first, reveals something far more quick and palpitant. If he has achieved a wise acceptance of life, he has also maintained a noble rebellion. Those straight eyes do not only observe and judge; they also question and challenge. The truth is, Mr. Galsworthy is too typically modern to be a man of single temperament. He is at once a dispassionate critic and a passionate agonist of life. To an intellectual temper, clear almost to coldness, he weds a vivid and intense human apprehension of the great mysteries that yawn beneath the feet of life. The two aspects are indissolubly intertwined in his work, yet now the one preponderates, and now the other. When the reflective intellect takes up the cause of the indignant and compassionate human heart, we get the blistering invective of "Justice"; when imaginative insight moulds the mordant intellect to its uses, we get the heart-shaking drama of "Strife."

II.

Like Ibsen, Mr. Galsworthy is a teacher—a preacher, if one likes. An acute and sincere thinker, he has brooded patiently and to purpose over the baffling tangle of influences and ideals which goes to shape human life and destiny. Sometimes the overmastering grip of a moral purpose turns him from the Socratic wisdom of teaching men as though one taught them not to a clogging and oppressive didacticism. "Justice" illustrates alike the strength and the weakness of this propensity. In a sense, it is the most powerful thing Mr. Galsworthy has done. It is a battering assault upon a grotesque and cruel judicial system—the virile, informed, unanswerable attack of one who was a lawyer before he became a playwright. For scathing denunciation, grim irony, relentless truth, it stands unequalled among his plays. It evokes indignation, protest, nay, sheer horror, with unerring touch. It is an acted tract, and one is glad that many of our present-day dramatists are not ashamed of writing "tracts for the times": it marks a much-needed reaction against the intolerable cant of "art for art's sake." But while its argument is of such convincing force that it induced Mr. Churchill to alter the prison regulations regarding solitary confinement, it is still a tract: it is not drama of the immediate, dynamic, compelling type of "Strife." It does not grip with the naked touch of reality, it does not flash its meaning straight upon the soul; it is trenchant with irrefutable logic; it is not quick with life, except in the last act.

III.

But in "Strife" Mr. Galsworthy stands revealed as an artist of the great, authentic type. Here is pure drama, making its vivid, outleaping, human appeal to all who can still be purged by terror and pity. It treats of the old, and all but worn-out, subject of the struggle between Capital and Labour; and it brings the commonplaces of that struggle before the playgoer in such a way that, as he listens, interest springs up in him, acute and searching—an interest with more of passion than of curiosity in it. Be he red-hot Socialist or stolid defender of Capital, he suddenly becomes aware of the supreme human problem behind the struggle, and is quickened with a wider, nobler sympathy. It is great art, and one is tempted to say that because it is great art it is great preaching also. It bites into the dulled and coarsened consciousness with all the insistence of life.

IV.

All Mr. Galsworthy's work revolves round the twin pivots of the didactic and the dramatic. His last-performed play, "The Eldest Son," is perhaps the least easily classified. It lacks the vital directness of "Strife"; it lacks also the single-purposed force of "Justice." It has the sad, ironic comedy, the gripping actuality, the clean and thought-provoking frankness which one has learnt to expect from him, but it supplies no really revealing clue to the inner personality of a man who, with his very first play, "The Silver Box," leapt from obscurity into the rank of compelling forces. His output has been remarkably wide in scope, and still more remarkably free from slipshodness and eccentricities. He has given us seven plays of high and distinguished quality. He has written novels of irreproachable workmanship and masterly characterisation. He has made notable contributions to essay literature, and his poems have a quiet and individual charm. And through all of them there move the critic, the reformer—shall we say the propagandist, in the most honourable sense of that term?—and the creative artist.

V.

Mr. Galsworthy very rarely talks about his work. When he does, he is eminently worth listening to. "What then," he asks in the current issue of the Hibbert Journal, "is there lying at the back of any growth and development . . . in our drama? In my belief, simply an outcrop of sincerity. . . . Nothing because it pays. Nothing because it makes a sensation. No situations faked. No characters falsified. No fireworks. Only something imagined and set down in a passion of sincerity. . . . It is not cant to say that the only things vital in drama, as in every art, are achieved when the maker has fixed his soul on the making of a thing that shall seem fine to himself. It is the only standard; all the others—success, money, even the pleasure and benefit of other people—lead to confusion in the artist's spirit, and to the making of dust castles. To please your best self is the only way of being sincere." That is the very spirit of John Galsworthy's own work.

VI.

Lucid, clear-cut, unequivocal, Mr. Galsworthy's style emphatically fits his message. He is one of the few who can speak the truth without rhetoric. He never tries to make it arresting by means of artifice. One could not imagine him an acolyte of the obverse, or a turner of Shavian phrases. Unrestrained and forcible, sometimes a trifle hard at the edges, like a picture by Cézanne, his manner is completely "natural," and has the dignity as well as the convincing force of nature. One thing is denied him—ecstasy. His genius is not a soaring thing, with the wind in its wings; it walks the earth with high seriousness of purpose and unflinching fidelity to life. But genius of the true stamp it is; and once, at least—in "Strife"—it has achieved greatness.

LIFE IN A LONDON BASTILLE  BY THOMAS HOLMES

PART IV.

THE voice of the gramophone is not heard in the Bastille; never yet have I heard the strains of a mouth-organ, or the droning of a concertina. If there is a caged bird, I have not seen or heard it. It is not exactly a place for melody, for "no lark can sing to sky so dull and drear."

"You are not troubled very much with mice in this place?" I once observed to the "aristocrat." "No," she grimly replied; "there is nothing for them to eat."

No confetti ever adds a touch of colour to the grey-ness of the broken pavement or brightens the gloomy portals, for weddings are unheard of. The young Bastillians do not indulge, dare not indulge, in love's young dream. A courting couple would, I fancy, make the grey walls burst into mocking laughter. The clergy fight shy of it; the rattle of tambourines, the noisy and oft-repeated chorus of the Salvation Army detachments never shake the walls or interest the children; no revivalist, in strenuous tones, warns the inhabitants to "flee from the wrath to come"; no public-spirited advocate ever chews the cud of intolerable anguish when contemplating the sorrows of the Bastille.

No one but the doctor ever gets mad about it, and he "would like to put some dynamite under it and blow up the whole place." Yes, the Bastille is left severely alone. Public welfare societies religiously ignore it; divines of high standing and popularity have made their fame and their fortunes within a stone's throw of it, but still the Bastille stands four square, with its gates and portals ever open!

And it greedily welcomes the poor and the wretched. It has no restrictions as to the number of children, no objections to numerous births, and not the slightest objection to unlimited deaths.

Its capacious maw is ever open, and poor indeed must the mortals be, with little flesh to chew and few bones to grind, if the great stomach of the Bastille refuses them. And, having once got them, it will not easily let them go, for they verily are captives. "We can't get out!" is their pitiful cry; for the credentials of a Bastille rent-book never form a passport to the heart of a decent landlord and to decent rooms—not though the rent-book be full receipted.

In many wretched streets I have seen the miserable wreckage of miserable "homes" lying on the pavements, guarded by miserable children, where tenants had been evicted by the order and with the aid of the law. I have seen the children "stand by" the household goods while their father sought the loan of a barrow and their mother sought a fresh refuge.

Again and again I have heard tenants plead, when standing before the magistrates, "We have nowhere to go," when the police have been ordered to see them ejected with no more violence than was necessary.

But I have seen no broken rubbish lying on the broken courtyard of the Bastille.

He would be a bold man that essayed to convey the beds, beddings, etc., belonging to the tenants in 246 down those seventy-four concrete steps, and place it outside the iron gates.

No! It pays so much better to be lenient on rent day, and keep them for tenants, than it does to evict them and lose the rent. The agent is not a hard man. He is very good, "the aristocrat" told me. Yes, the arrears of the rent mean fixity of tenants. The agent knows his business; nevertheless, the simple Bastil-lians feel grateful, for "he is so good!" His goodness notwithstanding, I rejoice when I look at the broken windows of the Bastille. I can see some practical uses for the broken pavement. I am glad to think that some of the "suites" are tenantless, so far as humans are concerned, and I am still more glad to think that some of the younger prisoners had pluck enough and strength enough to utilise broken pieces of pavement for a legitimate and praiseworthy object. "More power to them!" say I. That they may persevere till every window is broken is my hearty wish. Sometimes I stand and look at those broken windows till I can imagine captive Bastillians escaping through them, and almost expect to see strange beings issue forth, "with their upright hair carved like the image of fantastic fear," bearing with them children and goods. But, alas! there is no general exodus from the Bastille, though its gates and portals are ever open. It takes some pluck to enter the Bastille, and some strength to convey the wreckage of a poor home up those concrete steps; but to escape demands greater qualities, qualities which, if once possessed, the air of the Bastille has probably blasted. So the piteous cry, "We cannot get out!" is ultimately changed to the still more pitiful cry, "We do not want to get out!" For the inhabitants become perfect in their misery, their environments become natural. The outer world becomes too big and vague, so they settle down, with a deplorable contentment. For they are let alone, the Bastille conferring upon its prisoners a larger amount of freedom than can be obtained outside its walls. They have the freedom to live anyhow, in any fashion, the freedom to starve if need be, and certainly the undisputed freedom to die!

Who owns this property, with its rent-roll of more than £3,000, I do not know. I have inquired of the oldest inhabitants, but they cannot tell me. But the rents are collected: someone receives the money, someone is responsible, and it is high time that responsibility were brought home.

I am told that some years ago these dwellings were "condemned." They still stand to continue their work—nay, they seem to have secured a new lease of life, for some suites of rooms are now being turned into three single rooms, with a private entrance to each.

It is easy to imagine that life in the Bastille will grow steadily worse. But what matters, so long as the rent-roll increases? Are not these single rooms more remunerative than a suite? But I would like to know whether the local authorities have been consulted about these structural alterations. If not, why not?

In conclusion, let me say that I have given a description of these dwellings so exact that the local authorities who are responsible, if they chance to read these words, cannot possibly mistake the place described. But, should they doubt, why, then I shall be very pleased to personally conduct them to the Bastille, in the hope that its days may be ended.

VOLUME I. OF "EVERYMAN"

HANDSOMELY bound in cloth at the price of 3s. 6d., the first volume of EVERYMAN will shortly be ready. Applications are already being received, and all those desirous of obtaining the first of what should prove a long series of interesting volumes should write to EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons. Cases for binding can be obtained at 1s. 6d. A complete and detailed index to Vol. 1 (Nos. 1-26) is now in preparation, and will appear as a Supplement to the first number of the new volume (No. 27).

LITERARY NOTES

THE most interesting announcement of the week is that Messrs. Burns and Oates are to issue immediately the "Collected Poems" of Francis Thompson, in two volumes. Like Gray, with whom otherwise he had little or no affinity, Thompson has gone down to posterity with a very small folio under his arm. But his poetry is of such rare and uniform excellence that he ranks as one of the foremost of post-Victorian poets. "The Hound of Heaven," with its ecstatic fervour, its sublime imagery, and its wonderful mastery of expression, is now universally recognised as one of the great odes in the English tongue. Thompson's select band of admirers will therefore welcome this edition of the "Collected Poems."

* * * * *

Besides the contents of the volume published in 1893, in which Thompson's indebtedness to Crashaw was plainly discernible, "Sister Songs" (1895), and "New Poems" (1897), all of which were published in the poet's lifetime, the "Collected Poems" will include an equally important body of entirely new material. The edition has been edited by the poet's literary executor, and will be much enhanced by hitherto unpublished portraits of Thompson.

* * * * *

But Thompson was a really notable critic as well as a true poet. His essay on Shelley, which first appeared in the Dublin Review, was nothing short of epoch-making. Indeed, one critic, Mr. George Wyndham, has characterised it as "the most important contribution to pure Letters written in English during the last twenty years." I am glad, therefore, to learn that Messrs. Burns and Oates are also bringing out a uniform volume of Thompson's prose, entitled "Shelley, and Other Essays and Reviews." The poet in his later years wrote many excellent reviews for the Athenæum and other literary journals. A selection of these will find a place in the volume, together with several essays of a creative character, not hitherto published.

* * * * *

I note we are to have a biography of Mr. W. T. Stead, the editor of the Review of Reviews, who perished in the ill-fated Titanic almost a year ago. A man of marked individuality, a born journalist, and a distinguished, though not always a safe, guide in public affairs, Mr. Stead affords promising material for a popular biography. His family have entrusted the writing of his career to Mr. Harry Snell, the Labour and Socialist candidate for Huddersfield.

* * * * *

In the obituary notices of Lord Wolseley not much attention has been paid to his literary attainments. Of the four books he wrote, the most notable was a military manual. I refer to the "Soldier's Pocket-Book for Field Service." Published some thirty years ago, it was widely used in the Army, and ran through many editions. Lord Wolseley also penned voluminous studies of Marlborough and Napoleon. From a military standpoint, both books are naturally interesting and often illuminating, but neither says the last word on the genius of two of the world's greatest warriors. Nor is their literary style particularly impressive. Lord Wolseley's concluding volume was of the nature of an autobiography, and was published in 1903 under the title of "The Story of a Soldier's Life." It has proved an excellent quarry for journalists during the past few days.

Lady Dorothy Nevill, who died at a ripe age a few days ago, attained distinction late in life as a charming diarist. Her "Reminiscences," published in 1906, was one of the most successful books of the season. Throughout the Victorian era she moved in the highest circles of society, and knew everybody who was worth knowing. Disraeli was one of her most intimate friends. She had, naturally, a rich store of reminiscences, and being a woman of fresh and vigorous mind, she was able to weave a narrative full of shrewd observation, as well as of lively fancy and quaint humour. Two subsequent volumes, "Under Five Reigns" and "My Own Times," were less successful, partly because they traversed largely the same ground as the "Reminiscences."

* * * * *

The Archbishop of Canterbury is to propose the toast of "Literature" at the annual dinner of the Royal Literary Fund on May 27th. Dr. Davidson's literary claims are somewhat slender, being represented by a rather dull biography of his father-in-law, Archbishop Tait, and a volume of sermons. Lord Morley is to reply to the toast, and Lord Curzon presides. The Royal Literary Fund is administered by a committee composed chiefly of distinguished men of letters, who look in large measure to the appeal made at the annual dinner for raising money to carry on the work.

* * * * *

One of the best notices I have seen of Mr. William Hale White, better known as "Mark Rutherford," is that in the Athenæum. It compresses much illuminating criticism into very little bulk. "Mark Rutherford's style," says the writer, "presents his thoughts and stories as simply as if it were a hand extending them to us, and no one can read him attentively without perceiving that he is an idealist of the first order. He leaves heaven to other novelists; the bright side of his work is essentially the goodness, the high-mindedness of his protagonists: it is not a gate of pearl or even a god saying 'Well done!' Hence his novels vex the worldlying who has not succeeded in idealising his worldliness." How true this is must be apparent to everyone who has read intelligently Mark Rutherford's stories.

* * * * *

I should not like to say how many critical studies there are of Tennyson, but I am not far wrong in saying that the number exceeds a dozen. Every aspect of his poetical achievement has been dissected by competent critics over and over again. But the reading public is always ready to consider a fresh point of view, and this we are entitled to expect from a discerning critic like Mr. R. Brimley Johnson, who has undertaken to write on "Tennyson and His Poetry" for Messrs. Harrap's "Poetry and Life" Series. Other volumes to be added to this series are "Poe and his Poetry," by Prof. L. N. Chase; and "Horace and his Poetry," by Mr. J. B. Chapman.

* * * * *

Among the ever-increasing number of monthly magazines it is noteworthy that Harper's holds its own, both in the high level of its matter and in the stress of competition. The fiction published in its pages is characterised by a literary style and finish too often lacking in ephemeral contributions. Harper's has, in a measure, founded a certain school of story-writing distinct and apart from the mass of amorphous fiction which floods the popular periodicals and caters for a taste at once indiscriminate and sensation-loving.

X. Y. Z.

THE GREEK DRAMA

PROF. J. S. PHILLIMORE

BY
III.—EURIPIDES

I.

It is difficult to give any idea of Euripides' place in the history of drama without digressing into remarks on his personality. Disciplined natures like Æschylus and Sophocles produce masterpieces of objective beauty behind which we peer curiously for any discoverable secrets about the authors; but Euripides is that instinctive egoist the rebellious poet, always thinking and talking of himself. Like some penetrating psychologists of the feminine in modern times, he found (and doubtless made) the matrimonial partnership intolerable. An Intellectual is naturally prone to be a misogynist; but Euripides, being a misanthrope by temper, uses a systematic parti-pris of glorifying woman as a means for showing his scorn for man. Men, especially "heroic" men of action, he is always belittling and ridiculing; women, if good, he represents with endearing partiality; and, if bad, with a poet's immoral admiration for a great natural force—like fire or wind—even when it devastates. For instance, Jason is the hero of the Argonaut legend, a hero of romance. Euripides, "assenting with civil leer," shows us a Jason as spiritually squalid as an "Anglo-Saxon" exploiting a new country for a Jewish syndicate; and throws all our sympathy towards Medea, since, savage witch as she is, the sheer animal ferocity of the mother who kills her children to spite their father (she is like the sow which eats her litter if annoyed), is somehow clean and noble in contrast with such a politician-missionary-bagman type as Euripides will have poor Jason to be. Individual and gregarious hysterics interest him deeply: Phædra stands for the first, the Bacchæ are the examples of the second. This fascinating play shows him at his likeliest to Lucretius; nowhere is there a more poignant contrast between the lyrical flights of the poet's imagination and the disillusioned scientific cynicism of his intellect. Woman always gets the best of it; that is Euripides' fixed principle. To vindicate Medea, the child-murderess—make Jason a cad; when Phædra procures by a slander the death of her stepson, whom she has failed to seduce—well, Phædra must be made quite irresponsible, and—"Love is a devil." So, too, in the Bacchæ you have Euripides' ruling passion strong to the last. The men are contemptible, as usual—old Cadmus almost a farcical figure. But Agave! How sublime she is! She comes home from her Bacchanalian militancies dishevelled and blood-stained, carrying her son's head (the sisterhood have lynched him, torn him limb from limb, with Dionysiac raptures, amidst the hills), which she brandishes as a glorious trophy of the chase. Cadmus meets her; and to his senile moans of horror she replies in this fashion: "What tiresome, disagreeable things old people are! I do wish my son were a sportsman like his mother. Then he would come and try his hand at the wild game, with all the chivalry of Thebes. Instead of that, he's just a poor anti-clerical. You ought to talk to him about it, father."

II.

He has been called "the rationalist"; but that is only a half-truth. He is a cynic on one side and a sentimentalist on the other. As a sentimentalist, his flash-point of emotion is very low; as a cynic, his sneer is often laughterless and shrewish. It is curious to reflect that it is this point in Euripides' temper which first brings into drama that critical, ironical element which has counted for so much.

How much vulgar error have those doggerel verses of Mrs. Browning's disseminated! For many people, the connotation of Euripides' name means merely that foolish, shapeless quatrain.

Naturally of a recluse, meditative disposition, we may suppose that Sophocles' dominance of the Attic stage gave him umbrage, and darkened the inborn tinge of irony and peevishness. He first competed when he was twenty-five years old, but it was another fifteen years before he gained a prize. Indeed, he gained few enough in the fifty years of his play-writing activity. The cause was in the undoubted superiority of Sophocles as an artist; but also in this, that Euripides was ahead of his times, as intellectuals will be, for better or worse. Athens was less decadent and uprooted than he: he was to find his public only in posthumous renown, a prophet in the general welter. Somewhat the same mortification befel Menander, often defeated by a poet whom all posterity judged his inferior, Philemon.

III.

We have a larger survival of Euripides' plays than of either Sophocles or Æschylus. He first freely allied Drama with the new power, Rhetoric, which was more and more to rule the world; and he remained the favourite poet of Rhetoric. We have enough to see how unequal he was, and where lay his greatnesses and pettinesses. Being in opposition, and having no way to get past Sophocles on the royal road, consciously or unconsciously he altered the rules, and eventually made that impossible which he could not himself excel in doing. The form of Tragedy was fairly fixed by tradition; but, while conforming, he was to disintegrate the Sophoclean unity. Specialisation must have its way. The musical function of his chorus becomes a mainly sensuous appeal to the fancy, dividing and not articulating the action: a mere entr'acte. The long-spoken prologue, exposing the subject of the play beforehand, is a clumsy palliative (clumsy only in itself, for Euripides executes his prologues beautifully enough) for imperfect skill in construction. The clever things that come into Euripides' head must not be lost, although they violate the rules of relevancy and of characterisation. Also, by choice as well as treatment of subject, he shows that he is not using an accepted form with loyalty, but deflecting it, spoiling the tools for his successors. His use of prologue meant that the moment of real "tragic" quality, which Æschylus had first disengaged, and which Sophocles could make co-extensive with the whole play, was now narrowed—narrowed in range, but intensified so highly by Euripides' skill as psychologist and "subtlety" in rhetorical verse—that he gains from Aristotle the praise of "most tragical of the poets"; specifically so, because his (successful) pieces "end badly."

To keep the shell of a form, while altering the ideas and the point of view, results in burlesque: not the broad, merry, grotesque (this is, often enough, a quite religious mentality), but the slyly ironical, the "solemn sneer" half-masked in flattery. A good deal of Euripides is mock-tragics. Every literary form which has something artificial in its conventions may be a butt for mockery: once well mocked, it dies. The Epic is only possible in innocence; once come the age of mock heroics, and there is no more epic for that language. By his burlesquing touch, as by his self-complacency in his own exceeding verbal cleverness, Euripides comes near to another great poet, also bred in Rhetoric—I mean Ovid. And yet with a great difference of temper; for Euripides has nothing humorous about him, and Ovid is always at play. Intellectualised and sophisticated, Tragedy had yet other developments to suffer at the hands of this "alumnus of Anaxagoras"—as another poet called him 150 years later—"of tart address, hating laughter, and incapable of a joke, even over the wine; and yet all his writing is of honey and sirens all compact." Let us look at his Helena—a work of his old age, but some years earlier than the Bacchæ. It has every Euripidean note except the brilliant power of his Medea and Hippolytus. Menelaus, being a Greek hero, is made out rather a ridiculous poltroon; the barbarian prince, being a barbarian, is less "guyed"—he is merely simple; Helen, graceful and pathetic, can do no wrong; the slave is almost a comedy slave; and, lastly, the plot is romantic—not the fatal working out of something in the situation and characters that will have its way, but a fanciful affair of stratagem and elopement, and a deus ex machina to wind up all.

Tragedy, in the pure Greek sense, died with Euripides: his immense influence broke into new channels in the next century. His melodramatic and sentimental bias determined the whole mood of "Alexandrian" poetry; and the drama, reduced, defined, lowered in pitch, lost itself for a generation or two, and then reappeared in the new comedy. Old comedy left no heir: to match Aristophanes you must wait for Rabelais. But in the new comedy, sentimental but humorous, chiefly of manners and types, Greek drama reformed a new and central stream, which, passing through Terence, and coming to light again at the Renaissance, has supplied the abundance of the modern stage. Melodrama and the drama of psychological analysis alike throw back to Euripides. Were he alive now, he would write a clever, excited prose like Mr. Shaw.

* * *

BJÖRNSSON IN ENGLISH

"A Gauntlet," produced by Mr. Alfred Wareing in Glasgow

IT must be insular prejudice which makes such productions uncertain of success—some uneasy foreboding of the unknown and the disquieting; some vague feeling that to assist at their performance involves a plunge into an atmosphere altogether foreign, intense, and uncomfortable. And yet, were proof needed that the great regenerating force in modern drama is Scandinavian in its origin, it is furnished by such plays as "A Gauntlet"—written at a time when our own drama was mere stage journalism, concerned with superficial mannerisms and conventional sentiments. But these Scandinavians were big men, with a broad outlook and a keen perception of the essentials of life; and so this thirty-year-old challenge of Björnsson's comes breaking in on our suffrage-haunted times with a discussion of radical inter-sex ethics beside which ballot-boxes and parliaments are the veriest mechanism.

Women in the mass may protest vehemently against their exclusion from the franchise, but the actual effect on the individual is trifling compared to the upheaval which follows a personal encounter with the convention—unspoken but powerful—which permits two codes of morality—one for the woman, and quite another for the man. It is this upheaval which forms the motive of Björnsson's play. Alfred Christensen has sown his wild oats, but to him and to his father there is nothing unreasonable or unnatural in his refusal to admit that fact as a bar to marriage with Svava Rüs. The girl sees otherwise. She has taken an active part in the social campaign against vice, and her horror of the unclean makes its intrusion into her own circle unthinkable and impossible. After her betrothal to young Christensen, chance reveals an intrigue on his part. Her instinctive revulsion, and the efforts of both families to overcome it, result in a series of revelations—her own father's faithlessness; her mother's long, weary struggle to keep it from her knowledge; Mrs. Christensen's cynical condoning of her husband's lapses—in a word, in the utter destruction of the girl's conception of the circumstances of her life. Her revolt is immediate and uncompromising. All her intimates have taken on a new and sinister complexion to her eyes, and their arguments and counter-arguments serve only to accentuate the complete discord between her standards and theirs. In Mr. Wareing's production—under the direction of Mr. H. A. Saintsbury—Miss Ruth Mackay gave a remarkably effective study of the stricken girl. All the hopelessness, the turnings here and there in a vain search for her lost sense of security and happiness, were well displayed; and against this Miss Sybil Noble as the grey, disillusioned mother stood out in fine contrast. Miss Gertrude Sterroll's Mrs. Christensen displayed a third type with excellent effect. Cold and blandly cynical, she accepts the whole affair as inevitable: for her the only way out is tacit acceptance and the subservience of right to expediency. The male parts, too, were well cast. Mr. George Elton's Mr. Rüs, light, superficial, absorbed in trifles; Christensen, in the person of Mr. Richard Fielding, a man of the world, with confidence in its judgments and impatient of sentiment; old Dr. Nordan, played by Mr. Saintsbury, compelled by his knowledge of actuality to argue against his convictions; and young Christensen (Mr. Frank Conroy), bewildered by the wedge driven into his illogical conception of a man's duty—all worked together to a fine rendering of a remarkable piece of dramatic art.

And if the curtain falls on an unsolved knot, it is because only one solution is possible in any rational system of social ethics—and because that solution, however honoured in theory, is still disregarded in practice. The play remains, incisive, thought-provoking, disturbing, because it is fundamental and true.

NORMAN W. DUTHIE.

* * *

THROUGH GATES OF SLEEP

NIGHT stole across the spring-kissed upland mead,
 Wrapped in her garb of silence: soft and still,
 Her tender hand, laid on the furze-crowned hill,
 Bowed its gold passion like a wind-bent reed.

She drew a veil o'er the tumultuous white
 Of blackthorn sprays, and closed the primrose eyes,
 Till nought was living save the calm sleep-sighs
 Of happy Nature dreaming of the light.

Then the stars wakened, and the long, low call
 Of wood-owl, roaming at the midnight hour,
 Led on the dawn, and silence grew more deep.

It seemed a shrine for sound more sweet than all—
 Your voice that breathed my name; with magic power
 Stealing through sundering space and Gates of Sleep.

W. H.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

WILLIAM LAW'S "SERIOUS CALL" * * * BY HUGH SINCLAIR

I.

ON the surface, Law's "Serious Call" appears as the classic expression of an austere and somewhat pedestrian type of Christianity. It expounds the minutiae of a religious discipline which has neither the stern grandeur of monastic severity nor the searching fire of mystic initiation. Thus it has come about that this masterpiece has been somewhat cavalierly treated, not only by rebels against a religious conception which seems to them "a subterranean conspiracy against life," but also by lovers of Law's later work, written under the influence of "the blessed Behmen." And it may be granted, without taking one jot or tittle from the peculiar and abiding merit of the "Serious Call," that such later writings as the "Spirit of Prayer" and the "Spirit of Love," with their flaming mystic passion, their intellectual strength, and their dignity and eloquence of expression, reveal a spiritual genius which the "Serious Call", only foreshadows. Yet the "Serious Call" remains one of the few specifically religious treatises in the language which make an abiding appeal to all lovers of noble thought and expression, whatever their religious convictions. It abounds in convincing logic, practical wisdom, and shrewd insight. Its style is an unflagging delight. Its sharp satire and consummate power of characterisation make the student of life and literature regret that Law did not follow Bunyan into the path of sustained fiction.

II.

Men of all types and convictions meet in their praise of this unique treatise. Says the aged John Wesley, who, be it remembered, had a life-long bitter quarrel with Law: "The 'Serious Call' is a treatise which will hardly be excelled . . . in the English tongue, either for beauty of expression or for justness and depth of thought." Says Dr. Johnson, in reminiscent mood: "When I was at Oxford, I took up Law's 'Serious Call,' expecting to find it a dull book (as such books usually are), and perhaps to laugh at it. But I found Law quite an over-match for me, and this was the first occasion of my thinking in earnest of religion." Says Gibbon: "Mr. Law's masterpiece is a powerful book. . . . His satire is sharp, but it is drawn from his knowledge of human life, and many of his portraits are not unworthy of the pen of La Bruyère." And, leaving the Titans of the past, we have Mr. Augustine Birrell setting Law alongside of Gibbon, and asserting that, "splendid achievement of learning and industry though the 'Decline and Fall' may be, . . . yet in sundry moods it seems but a poor and barren thing by the side of a book which, like the 'Serious Call,' has proved its power 'to pierce the heart and tame the will.'"

III.

The "Serious Call" is a complete vade mecum to practical religion, written by one who was not only a profound and translucently sincere believer in what he taught, but also a formidable controversialist, a keen satirist, and a master of pure, virile English. The result is a peculiar charm—the charm of "grace seasoned with salt," so rare and so compelling. And the genius of the achievement lies in its unity. It is not a case of the meek believer being now and again swamped by the critic, or of the satirist intruding his incisive faculty upon the earnest and impassioned mood of the preacher. Such dualism is the mark of second-rate work of this type. But in Law the shafts of satire are always hurled by the white hand of sincere and steadfast goodwill, and a very tender conscience ever holds the critic's pen. There are religious writers about whom one feels that they are interesting and acute and pungent, in spite of their religious habit. Law's interesting quality and acuteness and pungency are, in a sense, the outcome of his religion. They were his by nature, of course, but they received a characteristic remoulding at the hands of his spiritual personality. They were the clay; the "new" soul was the potter.

IV.

Very practical and minute and homely are the directions and precepts of the "Serious Call." Habits of prayer, of humility, of simplicity of life, of charity and kindness, of early rising, almsgiving, study and labour are discussed in detail. Common failings are analysed, homely virtues inculcated. Learned and ignorant, gentle and simple are included in the range of these direct and searching exhortations. It is the book of one whose pastoral soul sees all men alike, fears none, cares for the least promising, and deals frankly and specifically with the most intimate spiritual needs of each.

But it is by his quietly stinging power of characterisation that it makes its widest appeal. Throughout the "Serious Call" there are scattered imaginary characters illustrative of the points Law wishes to enforce, and their demure and restrained, yet uncomfortably keen satire and unswerving fidelity to nature set them among the few perfect things of their kind. They are etched in with all the delicacy and all the insistence of the graver's needle, with a hand so sure and so restrained that the artistry of the modern impressionist writer is crude and fumbling by comparison. Take the character of Octavius, for instance—"a learned, ingenious man, well versed in most parts of literature, and no stranger to any kingdom in Europe." Octavius, on recovering from an illness, solemnly gathers his friends together, and tells them that age and death are upon him, and he has scarcely another year to live. The friends, "expecting to hear something truly excellent from so learned a man who has but a year longer to live," listen intently. "For these reasons," begins Octavius, "I have left off all taverns; the wine of those places is not good enough for me in this decay of nature. I must now be nice in what I drink, . . . and therefore I am resolved to furnish my own cellar with a little of the very best, though it cost me ever so much." One is sorry for the reader who finds nothing to attract him in Octavius; or in Mundanus, the man of "excellent parts and clear comprehension," who has gone on increasing his knowledge and judgment, but left his devotions in the same state as when he was only six, praying now, as an old man, in the little form of words he used to repeat as a small boy; or in Negotius, whose absorption in business kept him alike from vice and from virtue; or in Cognatus, "the sober, regular clergyman of good repute," whose farmers "listen to him with great attention when he talks of the properest time for selling corn"; or of the vain and religious Matilda, the worldly and orthodox Flavia, and many others. And throughout all Law's work one is enchanted with a style which is explained not by art but by genius.

THE WOMEN'S PAGE

THE LABOUR MEMBER'S WIFE * * * BY EDITH J. MACROSTY.

ALTHOUGH members of Parliament are drawn from all ranks of the community, many of them are very much alike so far as birth and training are concerned; Labour members, on the contrary, emanate from one class only, and most of them in early years have had to be content with the very small wage even skilled workmen earn. Like their associates, they marry young, and therefore their wives also differ in certain important respects from Conservative and Liberal dames.

I.

It is no easy matter to gain the suffrages of fellow-workmen, and those who do must have certain qualities of heart and mind, in addition to the indispensable fluency of speech. For the glamour of wealth and the facilities it gives for purchasing respect the working-man leader must substitute sterling ability and un sullied conduct. The slightest deviation from honesty, the tiniest scrap of scandal, and the man's chances of getting into Parliament are ruined for all time. The suburban clerk may know very little about his neighbours; the working man knows a very great deal about the home life of the shopmates among whom he lives and labours. Genuine neighbourliness is quickly engendered when there are constant calls for sympathy and help, while in humble streets the Leader has an added phosphorescence of publicity.

Consequently, his home must be a model of cleanliness and order, his children must be examples of good training; and in the early stages of his career all this must be done on less money than is usually given to the working man's wife. The Leader must have books and newspapers, tidy clothes, possibly money for fares. These extra expenses are to be met out of a meagre income without imposing any suffering upon the household, and the woman who manages that is exceptionally industrious and capable.

II.

I say woman advisedly; among the working classes she always handles the wages. But in the case contemplated she cannot have even the small help usually accorded by the man. He must keep himself well in front of a fickle and exacting public—one non-attendance at a committee may put things back a whole year. The Labour Leader's wife, then, has more responsibility, less leisure, and more work than her neighbours, for someone must stay and put the children to bed, someone must plan and contrive, someone must pay exclusive attention to those domestic details which seem of such slight importance, and yet count for so much in human health and happiness. Given circumstances such as have been roughly sketched, the woman who brings her husband out triumphant must have more than average capacity and force of character.

III.

When success comes, and conditions are altered, when children grow up and need less looking after, when money is more plentiful and work less exacting, the Labour Leader's wife does not suddenly change and become selfish and frivolous. Even though her husband is earning £400 a year, in addition to any salary he may get as Trade Union official, she will not fold her hands in idleness, or try to run in the same road as the capricious children of fashion. The habits of half a lifetime are not so easily set aside. Nor does she desert old companions. The measure of her husband's success has been the measure of her capacity for retaining friends. Therefore the increased income brings with it few radical changes, perhaps a move into a slightly larger house, a little more leisure, more books and pictures, less anxiety for the future, more money for the children's training—but seldom, if ever, the complete immunity from household cares or housework, which even in these days some foolish women suppose to be the hall-mark of ladyhood. The Labour Leader's wife remains as simple and unaffected as when she did her own washing and cooking, and in many cases she does part of it still.

IV.

The claims on a Labour Leader's purse are plentiful, and as a rule he is generously inclined. Frequent journeyings are necessary, and if, as sometimes happens, his family remain in the constituency, he must have quarters not too far from Westminster. Often the arrangements are quite primitive—one member had a camp bed in his London office—but living away from home always entails extra expense.

The typical Labour member's wife, then, is domesticated, self-dependent, clever, sympathetic, conservative in her views on feminism, but strongly in favour of the enfranchisement of married women—the sort of woman who makes such an excellent local public servant when she is partially released from household cares, and rids herself of a certain shyness and unreadiness to talk on committees. Conscious of her lack of theoretical knowledge, she may be rather apt to undervalue the practical training life has given her, although on many questions it is easily the more important.

V.

Recent events have shown that the Labour members' wives are going into practical politics, with excellent results. Hitherto the Labour party has not gained much advantage from the women within its ranks. Professing, and indeed desiring, the most complete political equality between the sexes, the men are rather apt to vote and talk down the women. The Textile Trade Union, for instance, has as many women members as men, but it elects few women officials, and generally only one female delegate. A similar reproach could have been levelled against the Independent Labour Party last year. This year it has improved, largely owing to the new influence exerted.

One lady from a Northern town assisted to shepherd the delegates to two Conferences. The first was a meeting of working women; the delegates to the second were all highly educated. My friend said that at the first Conference she was candle-holder to women of understanding; at the second she was nurse to particularly troublesome infants. The highly educated woman asked a dozen questions, and misunderstood the replies; the working woman asked one, and quickly comprehended her answer. And this incident tells far better than any long string of words why the Labour member is so fortunate in his wife.

DO YOU POSSESS AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA ?

A Remarkable Offer.

First Payment 2s. 6d. only.

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vambéry, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Watts Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

Let the Children Use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia, and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion, has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

TWO OPINIONS.

The RT. HON. H. H. ASQUITH writes: "It is a work of the utmost value."

The RT. HON. A. BONAR LAW writes: "I have long had in my library the previous edition of 'Chambers's Encyclopædia,' which I have found invaluable. I am sure I shall find the new edition no less interesting and useful."

A FREE BOOK.

To the Caxton Publishing Company, 244, Surrey Street, London, W. C.

Please send me, post free, and without any obligation on my part, illustrated booklet describing "The Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia," and full particulars of your offer to deliver the complete work for a first payment of 2s. 6d.

Name
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address
.....

Are you a good Speaker ?

How to acquire this indispensable Factor in Success—
An Invaluable Article for all Public Speakers.

At no time has the art of Public Speaking been so valuable or the occasions for the making of public speeches so frequent, as at the present. No man nowadays can occupy a position of any prominence without being at times faced with the problem of making a speech at some public meeting or semi-private gathering. Indeed, it can almost be said that the man who has never been called upon "to say a few words," has so far made of his life a comparative failure.

To one man the chance of making a speech affords the opportunity for an enhanced reputation; to another it is nothing but a danger. For the man who stutters and stammers, and finally sits down after a speech principally consisting of "ums" and "ers," scarcely enhances his reputation as a keen-witted member of the community or as a man whose intelligence and resource can be depended upon in a business crisis.

For that reason, the publication of "The Book of Public Speaking" is an event of the greatest importance. For it is the first comprehensive work upon this important subject ever published in this country. It provides at once a collection of the greatest speeches of the world's greatest orators, and at the same time a reliable guide to the Art of Public Speaking, written by men who are themselves famous as speakers of the highest merit.

THE WORLD'S GREATEST SPEECHES

There is hardly an orator of note of recent years who is not represented in the work; there is scarcely a subject of importance or of interest that is not dealt with in some of the speeches. Political speeches, Religious addresses, After-Dinner speeches, scientific and literary lectures—all have been brought together to form a work of enthralling interest to all intelligent people.

Among the great speakers whose speeches are included in the work are:—

- | | |
|---------------------|---------------------|
| Lord Rosebery. | Chauncey Depew. |
| Lord Beaconsfield. | John Bright. |
| H. H. Asquith. | Sir A. Conan Doyle. |
| A. J. Balfour. | Sir Edward Grey. |
| W. E. Gladstone. | Earl Halsbury. |
| Sir Edward Clarke. | Sir Henry Irving. |
| Andrew Lang. | Lord Fisher. |
| D. Lloyd George. | Abraham Lincoln. |
| Winston Churchill. | Justin McCarthy. |
| Mark Twain. | Viscount Milner. |
| Spencer Leigh | M. Poincaré. |
| Hughes. | Whitelaw Reid. |
| Joseph Chamberlain. | Theodore Roosevelt. |
| Max O'Rell. | Philip Snowden. |
| R. Waldo Emerson. | Ian Maclaren. |
| Harold Cox. | Emile Zola. |
| Woodrow Wilson. | Augustine Birrell. |
| G. Bernard Shaw. | Sir A. W. Pinero. |
| Charles Dickens. | Etc., etc. |

FOR THE PUBLIC SPEAKER.

The value of these speeches to the Public Speaker can hardly be over-estimated. Each one of the speeches included in the work serves as a model for the construction of a successful speech that can be studied with advantage by the practised speaker and the novice alike. Each speech also serves as a fund of valuable ideas to be used in the actual preparation of a speech. "The Book of Public Speaking" furnishes ideas, suggestions, and an endless amount of material that can be used with advantage by all who are faced with the task of preparing a speech.

HOW TO SPEAK IN PUBLIC.

Moreover, the value of the work is greatly enhanced by a series of remarkable articles on the art of Speaking in Public, written by famous speakers and dealing with every phase of the subject in such a clear manner as to form a complete guide to Public Speaking.

The whole work is edited by A. C. Fox-Davies, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, who is himself well known as a Public Speaker, and he has been assisted by—

- Rt. Hon. T. J. Macnamara, M.P., on "How to Make an Effective Speech";
- Arthur Bouchier, M.A. (the well-known Actor), on "How to Prepare and Deliver a Speech";
- J. L. Griffiths (U.S.A., Consul-General, London), on "After-Dinner Speaking";
- A. C. Benson, M.A., C.V.O., F.R.H.S. (Fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge), on "The Art of Lecturing";
- Albert Crew (of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law), on "The Conduct of and Procedure at Meetings."

These articles cover every phase of the Art of Speaking, from the choice of a subject and the collection of material to the art of gesture and the silencing of interrupters. It is safe to say that there is not a public speaker who will not gain by the careful study and application of their many valuable hints and suggestions.

INDISPENSABLE FOR ALL SPEAKERS

Altogether, there is no doubt that Politicians, Debaters, Clergymen, and all others whose position in life calls for the power of being able to speak in public, will find "The Book of Public Speaking" an absolutely indispensable work. However unusual the subject upon which they lack material, they will find it here. Anecdotes, parallels, analogies, ideas, and suggestions—all are to be found in profusion in its pages. Alike for the practised speaker and for the man who wishes to acquire this valuable art, no work so important has ever been published.

A FREE BOOKLET.

The Publishers have prepared an interesting illustrated booklet—which they will send free—describing the work and their offer to deliver the complete work as published for a first payment of rs. 6d. only, the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

To the Caxton Publishing Co., Ltd., 244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, free of charge and without any obligation on my part, full particulars of "The Book of Public Speaking."

Name
(Send this form or a postcard.)

Address
.....

THE TRIAL OF THE GIRONDISTS * * BY HENRI MAZEL

THE twenty-one Girondists who appeared on October 24th before the Revolutionary Tribunal were but the remnant of the great party of that name which impersonated the revolution for several months. This party was the victim of the non-cohesiveness of its leaders and the cowardice of its members.

Almost on the eve of its fall, it reunited again at the Convention in 279 voices against 238; but it broke up before the yells of the riotous party, its leaders abandoned it, and the ultra-revolutionary minority proceeded to vote for the arrest of twenty-nine deputies, the leaders of the Girondists. Their friends could have joined them the next day, and saved them. They had not the courage. They knew too well the fate which awaited them.

But as cowardice has never saved anyone, so this dreaded fate finally overtook them on October 13th, 1793. That day, by a decree of the Convention, sixty-one were put under arrest, and forty-three others were brought before the Revolutionary Tribunal.

Counting the twenty-one persons who were outlawed on the 28th of the previous July—a terrible prescription, which allowed of anyone under this ban being put to death without a trial—this made a total of 129 names. This number included all the outstanding men of the Girondist party. Of those whose names were on the two pages, only a few men, and those of little importance, escaped being put to death. The only refugee of importance who escaped was Languinais, who, be it said, was more of a Royalist than a Girondist.

All the heads of the Girondists died violent deaths, and the most eloquent of them mounted the scaffold together, on October 31st, 1793.

The proceedings of the trial lasted seven days, from the 24th to the 31st October. Hermann was President of the Revolutionary Tribunal, and Fouquier Tinville Public Prosecutor. These two fanatical partisans of Robespierre were made in their turn to pay the penalty on the scaffold for the part they had taken in the Reign of Terror.

The hall where the trial took place was the old Parliament Hall, called the Chamber of Liberty. Not all the Girondists who appeared before the Tribunal were celebrated men. Some of them, indeed, played quite insignificant parts.

The one who was given the place of honour as chief conspirator was Brissot. He, in fact, would have been considered the leader of the Girondist party if that party had been really united.

Alongside of him was the great orator Vergniaud, and his friend Gensonné, also a Girondist deputy; Valazé, the impeacher of Louis XVI.; Fauchet, the old constitutional Bishop of Calvados; the ex-Marquis of Sillery, a great personage at the ancient Court, whose wife made her name in literature as Countess of Genlis.

Sillery, aged fifty-seven, was the eldest of them. Nearly all the others were thirty or forty years of age. The youngest were Boyer-Fonfrède, Ducos, and Duchastel, who were twenty-six or twenty-seven.

Rineffe, a fellow-prisoner for two days, the day before their execution described their attitude in the intervals between the meetings of the Convention.

Brissot he portrayed as grave and thoughtful, Gensonné as holding commune with himself, Ducos and Boyer-Fonfrède united by a loving friendship, calm and natural, and their souls on such planes that it was impossible to offer them ordinary consolation.

And the historians of the revolution have spoken with touching emotion of the fine young men whose heads fell under the knife of the guillotine. Particularly Lamartine, author of "The History of the Girondists," a work of eight volumes, written in so highly a poetical and enthusiastic style that it is impossible to read certain pages without one's eyes filling with tears.

Nevertheless, though in no way grudging them the tribute of deep sympathy, it must not be forgotten that the majority of the Girondist deputies played an odious rôle, both at the Legislative Assembly and at the Convention of 1793. It was their fault, too, as well as that of the "Mountainists," that the revolution started on the fatal path which ended in the Reign of Terror.

They were the most violent enemies of the Feuillant party, that is to say, of the Liberal monarchy, which would have saved France from all the Terrorist horrors, without minimising the victories of the Constitutional Assembly.

They were responsible for the foreign and civil wars. They paved the way for the riots of August 10th, which overthrew the throne of Louis XVI. They permitted the September massacres, and did not attempt to punish the instigators. They concurred in the King's trial, and in the severe measures taken against unsworn priests, against the Constitutionals, and against the Moderates. In short, they established the Revolutionary Tribunal, and they were filled with dismay to see the machine which they had put in motion about to bring ruin on themselves.

But it is just on this account that their sentence was one of the most glaring iniquities in history. If they had been arraigned before a Royalist tribunal, one could have understood the judgment that was awarded them. Even had they appeared before a Court wholly non-political, they would have been accused of many charges, some of them even criminal.

But it was not for their fanatic Jacobite rivals to condemn them for actions against the Revolutionaries. Here the Girondists had reason to resent the accusations brought against them. But they, on the other hand, showed too excessive zeal in exaggerating the part they had played as demolishers, and denied their actions which savoured of moderation, and, what was more deplorable, accused and denounced each other.

The trial lasted for five days, and, to the impartial public who followed it, it never seemed to advance at all. The accused did not have any difficulty in refuting their accusers on the charge against revolutionism, nor was anyone able to convict them of anything but a hostile attitude against the Mountain, which was by no means a perilous attitude for the Republic. And even this did not hold, owing to the greater number of Girondists renouncing their party, confessing their past errors, and declaring themselves entirely Mountainists.

Their adversaries, however, had sworn to have their heads, and they were men who shrank from nothing. On the 6th day, therefore, the Convention, following a motion of Robespierre's, adopted an enactment by which the President of the Revolutionary Tribunal had the right, when the trial had lasted more than three days, to ask the jury if they were sufficiently clear in their own minds, and, on receiving an answer in the affirmative, to proceed at once to pronounce judgment. This was raising murder to the level of a judicial principle.

In virtue of this enactment, the President of the Jury announced on the following evening that he and his fellow-jurymen were clear in their minds about the case. As soon as the Public Prosecutor had pronounced the necessary formula, before any of the seven counsels could rise to give their defence, before even the President had done the summing up of the case, the Court rose, and the jury retired into the Council chamber.

At half-past ten in the evening they returned, and unanimously declared Brissot and his colleagues guilty. The prisoners were brought back to the Court, and heard the verdict of the jury, and saw the Public Prosecutor rise and protest against the death sentence.

Then some became dazed, others uttered violent shrieks. The unfortunate ones who had prepared their defence, and who still held in their hands the papers they were expecting to read, tore them in shreds, and threw them to the people. One of them threw his cap in the air, exclaiming, "I am innocent!" Boyer-Fonfrède threw himself into Ducos' arms. "My friend," he said, "it is I who cause your death." Ducos pressed him to his heart, replying, "My friend, take comfort. We will die together!"

Sillery, who was suffering from gout, threw away his crutch, saying, "The sentence of death pronounced against me gives me back all my strength."

Amidst the uproar, one scarcely heard the cry, "I am dying." It was Valazé, who had killed himself with a sword, which he always carried, concealed on his person.

The condemned were hurried out of the trial hall by gendarmes. Only the corpse of Valazé remained on the empty benches.

The President of the Tribunal pronounced the sentence of death against the condemned, and ordered the confiscation of all their estates.

Fouquier-Tinville asked that Valazé's corpse might be executed along with the other Girondists; but Hermann recoiled before this futile atrocity, and the Tribunal only ordered that the body of the self-murderer should be taken to the place of execution in a cart, accompanying those of the other condemned men, and be buried in the same grave.

The crowd then filed out, away from the shrieks which followed on the sentence of the Girondists. It was then half-past eleven at night.

The last night of these unfortunate men was a sad one. Tradition, which has weaved itself round this heart-breaking episode in history, tells us of a cheerful repast, at which the twenty-one Girondists are said to have mutually discussed philosophy and poetry.

If the poor men did take some nourishment, it was only to brace themselves up for the fatal hour; and if they did exchange words, they certainly did not exchange songs. Several made their confessions, and the old Bishop Fauchet, after having confessed to one of them, heard Sillery in his turn. Gensonné cut a lock off his hair, and gave it to the priest who heard his confession.

"My father," he said, "you render me a great service. I ask a favour of you. It is that you carry this lock of hair to my wife."

The next day at noon the condemned men mounted into their carts in the court of the Conciergerie. Their heads were bare, their hands tied, and they wore shirt-sleeves.

A fourth cart followed, bearing Valazé's corpse. It was pouring with rain.

An immense crowd was gathered on the route. Cries of "Vive la Republic!" "Down with the traitors!" were heard all around. The condemned replied "Vive la Republic!"

One of them said prophetically, "Poor Parisians! We are leaving in your hands men who will make you pay dearly for to-day's pleasure."

The melancholy cortège took an hour to go from the Palais de Justice to the Place de la Révolution (now La Place de la Concorde).

On their arrival at the place of execution, Boyer-Fonfrède and Ducos embraced one another, and the others followed their example.

The Marquis of Sillery was the first to mount the scaffold. On the scaffold he saluted the spectators right and left, with as much ease as if he were in a drawing-room. Another followed, and another.

During the waiting time they sang the refrain, "Death rather than slavery!" It was the motto of Francis I.

Some of them at the moment of their death said some inaudible words.

When Vignaud's turn came there was a rumbling of drums which drowned his voice. In the same way they had prevented Louis XVI. from speaking on the scaffold.

The last to be executed was a man called Viger. The execution lasted thirty-eight minutes.

The end of the executions was greeted by cries, a million times repeated, of "Vive la Republic!" which lasted for more than twenty minutes.

The Girondists had expiated their faults. Their murderers were not long in following them to the scaffold.

THE TWO DAWNS

THERE came faint, trembling whispers from the East,
Voices of grey and silver, pink-lined pearl;
And flying fast before them o'er the sky
Were running messengers, who told the news
To waiting Nature of the feathered world.
Small wings were pruned, small eyes awoke;
And presently a clarion split the air.
As if it were a sign, a thousand throats
Were heralding the birth of a new day!
The whole sky now was silver tinged with rose,
A vaulted roof, where gorgeous treasures lay
Unlimited to eyes that love to gaze
On beauty's march. A maiden's charming smile
Lit up the firmament, a smile so frank,
So innocent, that clear-eyed children woke
From pretty dreams and ran to windows bright
To catch the splendour of the Dawn's pure eyes:
And then a rose of colour filled the sky
Once more; the dawn was all abashed;
"I have not beauty like those children's eyes;
I have not purity like their white souls.
I am but colour; they the highest work
Of God. He paints me on the sky, but they Are more than pictures; they are holy works
Where temples stand, and love is heard within."

CARLTON HOWELL.

"No thinking man," says the Daily News, "can afford to leave this book unread. It presents a great indictment and a great hope. It gives the soaring view of a mind which has never ceased to be receptive."

Social Environment and Moral Progress

By

Dr. ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, O.M.

Price 3s. 6d. net.

The Pall Mall Gazette: "One of his most thought-stirring productions. At the end of ninety years his sense of social evils is as intense as that of a young Crusader; . . . one can congratulate him on his assault on some of the most terrible and perplexing problems of the day."

—Ready this week. A New Illustrated Shakespeare.—

CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED SHAKESPEARE

A wonderfully cheap Shakespeare, well printed, with introduction to the plays and poems, and notes upon the plays. Illustrations of scenes in the plays as performed by various modern companies, including Mr. Granville Barker's productions at the Savoy Theatre, considerably enhance its value and the attractiveness of the pages. There is a biographical and critical Introduction by Dr. F. J. Furnivall and Mr. John Munro, a Glossary and List of Characters.

Over 1,200 pages, with 64 Illustrations, cloth gilt, gilt top. Price 5s.

SENT FREE. An attractive brochure of biographies of the authors in Cassell's People's Library (price, in attractive cloth binding, 8d. net). This booklet forms a most interesting and indeed valuable reference guide to the most noted contributors to the world's literature.

CASSELL & CO., LTD., La Belle Sauvage, London, E.C.

A PROMINENT PUBLIC MAN

writes:—

"It is beyond doubt the GREATEST Review in the English Language."

The ENGLISH Review.

Monthly, 1s. Annual Subscription, 12s. 6d.
(post free to all parts of the world).

"The versatility and originality of the English Review is truly extraordinary."

—G. B. S.

An attractive Booklet sent post free upon receipt of name and address.

Specimen Copy, 3 stamps.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW,
174, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF HAPPINESS

By MRS. HAVELOCK ELLIS.

THE art of living, which includes the meaning of love and the philosophy of happiness, is a subject more worth while studying than how to attain riches or even how to fly. The philosophy of happiness wants more than a philosopher to explain it and to examine it. To state with any degree of certainty whether happiness is an art or an accident is not an easy task. To reveal the nature of happiness, one really ought to be something of a child, in order to tell great secrets almost unconsciously. Possibly, also, the problem should be approached only by one who has merged pain into the redemption of joy. Above all, one needs, as the interpreter, a divine jester, who is able to express the subtle connection between the anguish and gaiety which lie at the heart of things.

Many people say they are happy, but, when the veils are down, and intimate confessions are made, we find, if we are philosophers, that most of the so-called happiness of the world is a vague content or a resigned fortitude. Real happiness is a glowing, radiant thing, so radiant that the person who is really and truly happy within spreads it contagiously, even if he is at the moment wretched. True happiness has roots and an inner meaning. It is not an effervescent thing or a matter of moods. It is an eternal possession, which no man or woman can actually give or wholly take away.

The first condition for happiness is never to seek it. Even the true believer has moments of apparent atheism on this matter. "Do not hurry—have faith," says Edward Carpenter. This should be the text for the philosopher of happiness.

The second condition for the attainment of happiness is an uncrushable sense of humour. A sense of humour is a veritable gift from the gods, and saves the philosophic and the unphilosophic alike from endless pitfalls. It is ludicrous to pant for and to seek what is not ours, and it is equally ludicrous to waste time in trying to get what is ours for the asking. By the asking I mean literally praying. A mean, selfish and self-satisfied would-be truce with the Infinite, in order that we may get our own ends more easily and quickly, is not real prayer. There is no humour in that, and certainly no dignity. It is only drab, pestilential selfishness and a lack of faith in destiny. The only prayer to offer in this matter would be somewhat like this: "Help me to face Life, with happiness or without it; sustain my courage, and make courage a daily habit. Save me from self-seeking, but open my eyes that I may see and understand happiness if it should come to me. Put my small will into the larger will, and increase my powers of joy. If happiness comes not, give me grace to rejoice with either my brother or my enemy who has received it."

There are a great many people left in the world with Puritanism in their blood, and there are others who suffer from, or even cultivate, a sort of spiritual anæmia which is mistaken for goodness. These people are afraid of happiness even while they long for it. They are soldiers of a great gospel, but the uniform is often too tight for a splendid warfare. The spiritually suburban seeker for happiness wants it placed in a six-ounce bottle, and carefully labelled "righteous and safe," and warranted not to effervesce. The true mystic knows that joy is a regenerator and a cleanser.

"We are all in the gutter, but some of us are looking at the stars," says Vachell. Why so many of us are afraid of happiness is because we think virtue consists in sleeping in the gutter rather than in singing to the stars. Some of us are afraid of not getting happiness, and we are equally afraid of accepting it, because we have forgotten that the senses can be as clean as our prayers and as ardent and as purifying as the sun. As much danger may lie in cold calculation as in swift spontaneities in these matters. "Love and do what you like," said St. Augustine. The happiness most people are seeking is that of doing what they like, forgetting that love seeks not its own. Love can redeem anything and everything, and never fails. The philosopher of happiness, who realises happiness as an art, and not as an accident, knows that perfect personal joy is the right of every civilised human being. Charm, abandonment, and all fantastic beauty expressed in song or dance and passionate expressions of all kinds, lead us upward and not downward, if we know the philosophy of love as well as the philosophy of happiness. It is at our peril today, if we allow ourselves to become anæmic spiritual slugs instead of rollicking children of the Infinite.

In Dr. Garnett's wonderful little book on Love ("De Flagello Myrteo"), he says: "At Love's high feasts there are two cups: one never can be drained, and the other fills itself." He knew the great secret that a great love is a sacrament, and bread and wine do not fail at the high altar. This brings us to the contemplation of an apparently sad side of this question of happiness. To some of us, apparently, whether we seek happiness or not, destiny seems to offer no cup at all. For these, the philosopher of happiness has a special word. The sufferer may actually be the cup-bearer, and so be a special servant of the Infinite. We are too foolish yet to realise whose hand Fate chooses for the offering of the cup of happiness to her children. Your sorrow and my sorrow, unbearable as they may appear to us, may help to mould the cup for another's comfort. Who dare deny that your loss and my loss may help to fill that cup for another, even if that other be our rival or our defamer? It may be our lot to press the very grapes for the wine our rival drinks. This may be a sort of left-handed happiness, but, to the real philosopher, it is happiness, because he knows the "forward ends" of pain, as Hinton so clearly puts it. To save others is at last as though we had saved ourselves, and thus happiness of a rare and delicate kind is found.

If we refuse the first cup of personal happiness, we pay our price. If we accept it, we have to pay heaven's price, and that is, that the second cup, filled to overflowing, shall not only be handed round and drained dry for the good of others, but be handed back again and again to be refilled and emptied for others till death releases us. To everyone who has been personally happy in the fullest sense, there comes at one time or another a voice from heaven about this second draught, this aftermath of happiness. To ignore it is to surrender to the vulgar whine of the sybarite for excess or to the self-love of a mere child of this world. As the second cup is handed to us, it is a challenge from heaven. If we refuse the challenge, our last state is worse than the first. To us, much has been given, and we must not spill or waste the wine or break the cup. Fate's challenge to those of us who have dared to be gloriously happy is to go on being happy in the only way possible. The law is, in this matter, that the personal joy shall lead to the universal succour. We must not haste, but neither must we rest, till everyone in the world has a taste of joy. The only happy person is one who

The Best of the World's Books

SEND A POSTCARD for any of the following:—

200-PAGE CATALOGUE OF

10,000 BOOK BARGAINS

New and Secondhand, English and Foreign, in all classes of Literature at GREAT REDUCTIONS from the Published Prices.

SELECTED AND CLASSIFIED LIST (144 pp.) OF

THE BEST BOOKS

On all subjects, at the Lowest Cash Prices.

CATALOGUE OF

THE NEWEST BOOKS

Arranged under subjects and offered at the Lowest Prices charged by any bookseller.

A New List of Six-Shilling NOVELS

By the Best Writers,

From 1/- each.

All Books Delivered Free in London & Suburbs.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

376 to 384, Oxford St., London, W.

THE LARGEST BOOKSHOP IN THE WORLD.

HEATH, CRANTON & OUSELEY

GENERAL.

The Philosophy of Nietzsche

G. CHATTERTON-HILL, Ph.D. 7s. 6d. net.

"Really excellent."—EVERYMAN.

"A plain, straightforward exposition."—BYSTANDER.

The Rollings of a Mossless Stone

PERCY L. NAISH. 5s. net.

"We can imagine no more pleasant companion than this cheery book."—EVENING STANDARD.

FICTION (6/-).

Two Great Successes by Lewis Lusk.

Sussex Oak

"Good all through. . . . A book to be read and remembered."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Sussex Iron

"The descriptions of a primitive Sussex village are well done."—ATHENÆUM.

Little Grey Girl

MARY OPENSHAW,

Author of "The Loser Pays," &c.

"The author has a simplicity that adds immeasurably to her power. . . . This is a book of singular charm."—EVERYMAN.

Mingled Seed

ALICE JEANS,

Author of "The Reformer's Wife," &c.

"Will be enjoyed by all."—LIVERPOOL POST.

The Others and She

"HIM."

6s.

"There can be no question about the ability and observation of the author."—ATHENÆUM.

The Shadow of Salvador

JOHN HASLETTE, Author of "The Mesh," &c.

[April 8

A Watcher of Life

HARRY TIGHE,

Author of "Intellectual

Marie," &c. [April 8

Lop-eared Dick

G. F. MONCKTON,

a new Canadian writer. [April 8

HEATH, CRANTON & OUSELEY, LTD., 6, FLEET LANE, LONDON.

The Imprint

ARTIST'S AND DESIGNERS

If you win the prize offered in The Imprint, you will not only receive your 10 Guineas but you will get a unique advertisement & one likely to bring enough work to keep you going for a long time. The prize is offered by one of the largest & most enterprising firms in the Country. Prospectus, containing an original lithograph, sent post free on application.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET

11 Henrietta St. Covent Garden W.C.

No Man should omit to read and ponder these LIVE BOOKS on VITAL SUBJECTS

THE ROAD TO FREEDOM.

By JOSIAH WEDGWOOD, M.P., and ETHEL WEDGWOOD. 1s. net (postage 2d.). Everyman (Feb. 21) says: "The case for the single tax is admirably stated, with a wealth of detail and lucidity of argument incomparable in its force and logic."

INSTEAD OF SOCIALISM.

By CHARLES DANIEL 1s. net (postage 2d.). Supplies not only many hard outs for Socialists to crack, but a thought-provoking exposition of the true Anarchism.

THE PROBLEM OF LIFE.

By IGNATIUS SINGER. 1s. net (postage 2d.). A novel, forcible and convincing contribution to the problem of the origin of life.

THE FORGING OF PASSION INTO POWER.

By MARY EVEREST BOOLE. 5s. net. For all who would convert their vague ideals into effective power for good. A book of genius.

C. W. DANIEL, Ltd., 3, Amen Corner, E.C.
Complete Catalogue post free.

Scarce and Out of the Way Books.

Just Issued.

New catalogue of Books selected from Private Libraries and Public Sales; including a collection of Memoirs relative to Napoleon and his times, Historical Works and Biographical Memoirs, with many illustrated books on Art, Archæology, Travel, Sport, etc., and a selection of valuable works on various branches of Natural History.

Post free on application to JOHN & ED. BUMPUS, Ltd.

Booksellers by appointment to H.M. the King.

350, OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

radiates even out of personal pain. To be happy is to know a few secrets that the gods whisper in their obedient children's ears.

To a few a third cup is sometimes offered, and the personal and the universal alike are forgotten for a moment in the cry, "Father, let this cup pass." It is the cup of wormwood or the sponge with vinegar. It is the chalice of crucifixion, and those who drink from it are the willing saviours of the world. They are despised and rejected of men, men of sorrows and acquainted with grief. They have at last no care for what the world can give or take away. They are free from condemnation and free from personal craving. They have seen the beauty of the whole, and faced death and suffering. The multitude cannot recognise them. They stone them and slay their bodies. The Magdalen and the Judas may call them friends, the little children, simple folk, sinners, and animals are their companions.

Hitherto the chalice-drinker has been the exception in the world's history. But there is a distinct change coming with regard to these things. There is a fashion even in spiritual matters. The happiness of the many is now becoming the imperative demand. The day is not only coming, but is actually here, when to live in luxury while one human creature lacks either bread or joy, can only be crucifixion to the spiritual man or the spiritual woman. To be a millionaire will soon be more pitiable than to be a leper, because it implies extortion, the sweat of brothers for mean ends, and the gluttony of one at the expense of many. As it is now almost a disgrace to be ill, it will soon be a disgrace to be rich or unhappy.

Happiness is a definite art and not an accident, for it is beyond accident, even beyond analysis. It is an art of the inner life, a result of wise cultivation. It is sometimes bought at a great price, but the payment is well worth while. It is often pain forged into peace, and the personal merged into the universal. Those who have it stand like children before the Eternal, content to hold the hands of Life and Death, knowing that all that happens is meant to form part of a great picture in which we are the colours.

CORRESPONDENCE

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—To all who are interested in secondary education I strongly recommend a careful reading of the report of an inquiry into the conditions of service of teachers in English and foreign secondary schools.

It is the result of investigations undertaken by a special committee appointed by the Incorporated Association of Assistant Masters in 1909, and is published by Messrs. Bell and Sons at 2s.

It is a work unique of its kind, and a perusal of it should leave the reader hot with shame at the present chaotic state of national education, and, above all, at the disgraceful salaries paid to the men in secondary schools, particularly the old grammar school.

As an "eye-opener" of typical English muddling-through, with serious loss of time and material, the book has no equal.—I am, sir, etc., EN AVANT!

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—The very able and conclusive criticisms of Mr. Austin Harrison's article in your last issue seem to need little addition. It is, however, often complained that we pacifists are not practical, and we are living in practical times. Will you allow me, therefore, to give one or two most successful examples of the securing of peace by disarmament—the Rush-Bagot Treaty, better known as the arrangement of 1817 for the limitation of naval force on the boundary lakes between Canada and America?

In earlier days these waters had been stained with the blood of English and Americans. On Christmas Eve, 1814, the treaty of Ghent was concluded. But so long as the naval forces were on the lakes, and continued to sail up and down, there was no assurance of peace; at any time, as long as those vessels, armed to the teeth, passed each other in those narrow channels, there was danger that even a stray shot of salute might be changed into the roar of battle. Men of both-countries felt this, and they were wiser in their day and generation than we are in ours. They saw that so long as the United States could build ships to beat the British ones, and the British could also go on increasing theirs, neither side could afford to stop. Both sides wished for peace, and to obtain it they knew that the menaces of war must be stopped. So they said, "We will try and see what the effect of lack of preparation for war upon the lakes will be." An agreement was finally reached, and the naval ships were reduced until, with the exception of revenue cutters, the force of the United States on the Great Lakes has been confined to the single steamer Michigan, built over forty years ago. The Governments of both countries have so sacredly observed this treaty that the United States refused the request of the managers of the Exhibition at Chicago, in 1892, to send a naval vessel through the lakes, and they would only allow a wooden imitation battleship to be there. Four times during the hundred years that have gone by difficulties between America and Canada and Great Britain have arisen, and one of these difficulties, on the Venezuelan question, was thought to be quite serious at the time. On all these occasions the question came up on both sides, "How about the lakes; there are no ships on the lakes, and, before taking any hasty action, had we not better think the matter over?" And on each occasion it was decided to arbitrate instead of going to war. As to the results, I need not do more than quote Lord Grey's words last December, at the Mansion House, when he was speaking of the great celebration to take place on the hundredth anniversary of this agreement. He said, "But the victories of peace are nobler than the victories of war, and it is the advent of a greater centenary than that of Brock's victory that calls us here to-day. On December 24th, 1914, a century of unbroken peace between the British and the American people will be completed. Although the boundaries of Canada march with those of the United States nearly 4,000 miles, not a sentinel, not a cannon, not a fort exists on either side of this long, this almost invisible frontier to mark the existence of any mutual suspicion between the two great friendly peoples. . . . When I was in Canada, the Secretary of State in President Roosevelt's Administration came to Ottawa and reminded the people of the Dominion that, while on the frontier of Europe armed men jealously watch incursions of possible enemies, the British and American Governments agreed, in 1817, by a simple exchange of notes, upon the disarmament of the great international waters between Canada and the United States."

Let us only compare this example of disarmament

THE BRITISH REVIEW

ONE SHILLING EVERYWHERE.

APRIL No. NOW READY.

Principal Contents.

Reply to Lord Charles Beresford	Admiral Sir Percy Scott, Bart.
Colour-Hearing	C. C. Martindale
To-day in Turkey	Francis M'Cullagh
Fiscal Reform—III.	Hilaire Belloc
Liberalism and Catholics	John Ayscough
Poetry—
Heroes of the Antarctic	Canon Rawnley
The Grey Rock	W. B. Yeats
A Master of Life	Philip Gibbs
More Mediaeval Byways—IV.	L. F. Salzman, F.S.A.
Pennant and His Friends	The Countess of Denbigh
The Wooden Overcoat	Williamson Mason
Obiter Dicta	The Editor

London: WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

SHORTHAND. FIRST IN THE KINGDOM: "You will be pleased to hear that I have obtained first place in the Kingdom in the recent Civil Service Assistant Clerks' Exam. I think the result due to the high marks I got in shorthand—Sloan-Duployan system—losing only 7 out of 300."—From Mr. R. G. Brewster, Audenville, Oona Road, Glasnevin, Dublin. SLOAN-DUPLOYAN is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for free illustrated handbook, containing lesson, specimens, etc.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

GORDON CRAIG'S NEW WORK.

TOWARDS A NEW THEATRE

40 DESIGNS FOR STAGE SCENES ACCOMPANIED BY CRITICAL
NOTES BY THE INVENTOR.

Sq. Royal 4to, 21/- Net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH: "His pictures are like dreams. Often he seems to achieve in line a beauty as vague and as pleasurable as that produced by Maeterlinck in subtly chosen words. His work is beyond question stimulating, and causes us to look at the scenic art of the theatre with new and questioning eyes."

PLEASE SEND FOR PROSPECTUS.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,
137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

The very best of Music Lessons

In your own home. In your own time.

Inability to play new music at sight causes thousands and thousands of music-lovers to lose interest in their music, and very often to abandon it altogether.

All these thousands of musicians can now, if they like, acquire this most essential faculty in three or four months. Then they can take up their music with renewed zest and vigour; thoroughly enjoy playing new pieces; and earn the gratitude of their friends by playing accompaniments.

Read what some of the most distinguished musicians of the day say about.

The THELWALL Rapid System of SIGHT-READING.

"I think the system would be invaluable to those who find difficulty in reading music at sight. You have my consent to use my name as being one who strongly approves of your system."—LANDON RONALD.

"I am in perfect agreement with practically all your method."—JOHN BORLAND, Mus. Doc., Oxon.

"I do not think you require anything after Dr. Borland's excellent letter. He knows the requirements thoroughly."—FREDERICK BRIDGE.

This testimony to the value of the system is amply confirmed by that of hundreds of amateurs, who have adopted the system, in such terms as these:—

"I am very glad I have taken your course in sight-reading. It has made all the difference to me, and opened up a new world."

"The lessons have made a tremendous difference in my ability to read at sight."

"Reading at sight is becoming a great pleasure to me."

"Intricacies which at one time would have seemed almost insurmountable smooth out quite nicely."

"The lessons are, indeed, value for money."

Full particulars of Personal and Correspondence Lessons post free from

THE PIANOFORTE SIGHT-READING SCHOOL,
157, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

Swift

Surs

Last Year's Light Suits can be made to look new again for the Spring.

Signs of wear, spots and creases—all disappear under the "Achille Serre" treatment.

Every year brings tens of thousands of satisfied users of our service—men who appreciate smartness in dress. May we have your Suit? We will return it in four days looking like new.

Free collection and delivery by nearest Branch or Agent; or carriage paid one way if sent direct.

Achille Serre Ltd

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. 'Phone 3710 East.

Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

with the feverish state of panic created in this country by means of meetings and articles in order to heap up Dreadnoughts, which bring us, instead of security, more and more scares and panics!—I am, sir, etc.,

March 24th, 1913.

S.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—While agreeing with part of your correspondent, Mr. Wallis's, able contribution in this week's issue, viz., that no war is inevitable until declared, I should give only a very qualified adhesion to his statement, that the longer war is avoided the less likely does it become. This does not by any means always follow, and I am much afraid that, in the case under review, it would not be as sure of realisation as we could desire. While I should abhor war between two kindred nations, with all its dire results, I cannot but see, at the same time, that, under certain conditions, it may be unavoidable—that is, if we are to sustain, or endeavour to sustain, our present position as a foremost Power. I can understand the German view to some extent. They wish (and rightly) to be insured by a big navy from having to stand aside in a crisis because of our hitherto overwhelming naval strength, and to protect their fast-increasing sea-borne commerce. But, at the same time, there is, I am pretty certain, a strong tendency of German opinion in the direction of challenging our ancient predominance at sea, arising altogether apart from a legitimate desire to safeguard their commerce, etc. It is easy to say that the bulk of the German people do not want war with us; but what effective say have they in the matter? And we know well enough that in all wars the national spirit of patriotism comes to the support of the authorities; at such times the justice or injustice of the quarrel gets no real consideration. I am firmly of opinion that it behoves us (unfortunately) to lose no opportunity of placing and keeping both our naval and military forces in a state of preparedness, and of increasing their efficiency if possible. For it is certain (notwithstanding the views of your correspondent, Mr. Pyke) that if we once allow ourselves to lag behind in these respects we should not be long allowed to continue our course unchallenged (not necessarily by Germany always). It still remains true, though "pity 'tis, 'tis true," that the best way to avoid war is to be prepared for it.

The rivalry between Germany and ourselves at sea was not of our seeking; it was begun, and continued in an increasing degree, by Germany. To my mind, they have long attained to a quite sufficient strength at sea for the protection of their commercial interests and territories, and have been, and are, building far beyond necessity in those respects.

To what does this point? As has frequently been stated, the history of Germany, since she became an effective factor, has been one of aggression, provocation, and ruthlessness, and we should be wise not to lose sight of this fact and its obvious lessons.—I am, sir, etc.,

G. H. DEXTER.

THE CALL OF THE CITIZEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The article in your issue of March 21st, by Lady Frances Balfour, is picturesque writing, but it is, unfortunately, vitiated from beginning to end by the fact that she completely ignores the existence of such a thing as Suffragette militancy. "The gates of learning," Lady Frances tells us, "have been opened to women, and they have been treated as beings capable of using the knowledge lavished on the community." This has an ironical ring, which the writer probably did not intend. But it inevitably leads one to ask, very sadly, whether the present outburst of monkey-tricks and wild unreason is the result of treating women as beings capable of using knowledge? Is the childish and ludicrous idea, that the nation can be pestered, like a silly old nurse, into doing what these women think they want, due to the greater knowledge and freedom extended to them?

Again, Lady Frances remarks, "We have taught our women their place in the world." Have we? And is that place in front of pillar-boxes, or on golf links, or beside other people's houses with weapons of destruction in their hands? It is strange that Lady Frances Balfour should not see that what is required of her and of all constitutional societies of Suffragist women is the taking of decisive steps to suppress militancy, which is the great obstacle in the way of Women's Suffrage. To agitate now for a Bill granting the vote to women, in the present state of mind of the great world outside committee rooms, is only to court failure. Could not Lady Frances Balfour turn her efforts to the task of securing a real education for women, an education that should be both an intellectual and moral training? The vote would soon follow then!—I am, sir, etc., LUMEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In her article, "The Call of the Citizen," Lady Frances Balfour has made out the best case for Women Suffrage that I have read. I am a strong opponent of the principle of votes for women, but, in view of the vast multitude of men who are utterly incompetent to vote on questions that come up for decision at election-time, one is bound to sympathise with educated and responsible women, who look on helplessly while these untrained and, in many cases, untrainable minds are allowed to use their electoral power.

One is forced to the conclusion that to remedy this absurdity one of two things must be done.

Either a new class of specially qualified plural male voter should be brought into existence, by granting an extra vote to those who distinguish themselves in their educational careers, or else those women who are similarly qualified should be allowed to exercise the franchise.

Facilities for free education and free libraries have been long enough in existence to justify a demand from electors that they become responsible as such, instead of, as at present, placing this power for good or ill in the hands of anyone, irrespective of their possessing the necessary wisdom for using it.

No thoughtful person can pretend that the serious questions that have been before Parliament in recent years have been intelligently sifted by anything like an adequate proportion of those enfranchised.

The pursuit of pleasure in its various forms has tended, and is tending to an alarming degree, to unfit those who are indulging in it for much more than attending to their daily duties.

An ignorant and indifferent electorate is bound to have a bad effect on a paid House of Commons, and nothing would raise the tone of politics so much as the knowledge that members of Parliament were being watched by a keenly and intelligently interested country. Clap-trap would lose its present-day value, and such cries as "9d. for 4d." would be treated with the contempt they deserve.—I am, sir, etc.,

PERCIVAL H. FROST.

St. Andrews, Bristol.

Reduce your Weight without Drugs or Starvation

By taking KALARI BISCUITS or CASOID BREAD at all meals instead of bread and toast. They are palatable and nutritious. Being free from drugs they are harmless, though effective. Write for Free Sample and Booklet on "The Toast Fallacy" to the only Manufacturers:

CALLARD & CO.,
FOOD SPECIALISTS,
104, REGENT ST. (The Quadrant),
LONDON, ENGLAND.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL
GIFT.

A DAINTY AND

INEX-
PENSIVE

LUXURY.

FOR MEALS IN BED.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed free.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for The Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS,
4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.
ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

THE
ART TREASURES
 OF
GREAT BRITAIN

EDITED BY C. H. COLLINS-BAKER

1/- NET
 MONTHLY

1/- NET
 MONTHLY

A series designed with a view to providing the art-lover with a representative collection of beautiful reproductions of the Art Treasures of Great Britain. Each plate is accompanied by a descriptive, critical note by the editor.

Among the subjects to be included in the series are works by—

BOTTICELLI,
 MICHELANGELO,
 RODIN, PRAXITELES,
 GAINSBOROUGH,
 TURNER, Etc.

CONTENTS OF PART 3.

Portrait of a Man	-	-	-	Titian
Nativity	-	-	-	Piero della Francesca
Landscape	-	-	-	Canaletto
Countess of Salisbury	-	-	-	Reynolds
The Blind Girl	-	-	-	Millais
Breaking the Clod	-	-	-	Cotman
Apollo (Colour)	-	-	-	Rouen Faience

Please send for Prospectus.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine
 House, Bedford Street, W.C.

THE GLORIOUS FREEDOM OF HALF-TIMERDOM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In the course of his letter to EVERYMAN, published on March 21st, Dr. Priestman ventures to refer to "the glorious freedom of half-timerdom." May I be permitted to describe the nature of this glorious freedom? The percentage of physically defective children among the full-time pupils in my school for the years 1910, 1911, and 1912 respectively worked out at 6.1, 12.6, and 15.1.

The corresponding percentages for factory half-time pupils worked out at 57.1, 77.9, and 40.

These results were so astounding that further inquiry was made, and statistics relating to a girls' school and three mixed schools were obtained for the same period.

The percentage of physical defect among full-time scholars for 1910, 1911, and 1912 was found to average 6.6, 7.2, and 5.3 respectively, while for half-timers the figures averaged 34.1, 29.6, and 39.2.

For all the schools, including 1,000 cases examined, the percentage of physical defect among full-time pupils was as follows:—1910, 6.2; 1911, 8.4; 1912, 7.1. For half-timers the figures are:—1910, 39; 1911, 35.8; 1912, 38. Only cases of physical defect notified by the school medical officers for treatment were taken into account.

Inasmuch as every half-timer employed in the factory must produce a clean sheet of health before being allowed to work, it follows that within twelve months of commencing factory work one-third of the unfortunate children are afflicted with serious physical disease, and in the majority of cases it was found that the physical deterioration was most noticeable after children had been working six months or more in the factory.

As a school medical officer, Dr. Priestman will doubtless realise the logical fallacy of the "glorious freedom of half-timerdom" in view of the statistics quoted.

It is surely a standing menace and disgrace to our civilisation that the only freedom possessed by the factory half-timer should be freedom from participation in the blessings of sound physical and mental health.—I am, sir, etc.,

HERBERT LEATHER.
 Swinton, Manchester.

MR. MACPHERSON ON G. B. S.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Why does not Mr. Macpherson exercise "self-renunciation" by foregoing the pleasure of criticising Mr. Shaw, and why is he so "self-assertive" if he does not approve of self-assertion? He is surely asserting his own convictions. If not, whose?

The logic of self-renunciation is instant and complete self-effacement and eternal extinction. But in reality men do but renounce those things they're not inclined to, and grab what'er they have a mind to; but this is not self-sacrifice. Neither is it self-renunciation to withstand unnatural desire, but merely self-preservation. Self-surrender in one involves usurpation by another, and both are immoral, though pitiably prevalent.

The superman is fully himself that he may be more fully the instrument of the purpose of the universe, for which he conceives he was created. He is not sensuous nor self-indulgent; he seeks neither enjoyment nor happiness, and is the least likely of men to suffer from ennui.

When Shaw says "Be thyself," he is as "dogmatic" as a doctor who will insist that fresh air is an essential to health. Of course, there are those who will dispute this "dogmatic" medical axiom and seek to substitute their own doctrinal fads for the said fresh air. They are such as have no faith in the universal, but only in the particular; no faith in man, but only in a man.

G. B. S., like G. K. C., selects from tradition what he thinks is in line with future progress, and rejects the rest, with due regard, no doubt, to Christ's stern rebuke as to "teaching for truth the traditions of men." What great reformer but has upset tradition and created new, to serve for an epoch and be outgrown? It is only thus we are "heirs of all the ages' gain."

The wicked Mr. Shaw provides the faithful with abundant scope for their self-renunciation, their faith, hope, and charity, and he thereby puts them under a great obligation; but, alas! I fear Mr. M. and Dr. Kelman do not rise to the occasion. They pursue him with a lack of "self-renunciation" and a "self-assertiveness" which would be admirable if it were not so petulant and unreasoning. Poor Mr. Shaw! Mr. M. says he never reasons; G. K. C. accuses him of "frigidity of logic"; some sneer at his humanitarianism; others say he is inhuman and cynical; and so on and so on. Oh, dear; oh, dear!—I am, sir, etc.,

Hornsey, N.

E. DERWENT.

ESPERANTO.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The writer of "A Plea for Esperanto" remarks that "to compare a scientific or literary language to a living organism is merely to use a specious but misleading metaphor, which has already done unspeakable harm to the science of philology."

It is true that the metaphor is misused. Some people seem to draw from it a mystical idea that language is a thing in itself, having a separate existence—in a word, "almost human." But it is wrong to infer that because the analogy is misused it is unscientific.

The real point, surely, is that language has virtually no existence at all, unless when considered in relation to the mind. In this sense, being the reflex and product of an organism, it becomes itself organic—can be acted upon, can grow and develop. Language is a "part of ourselves," just as a musician might say that a piece of music he has thoroughly studied has become part of himself.

The analogy is not unknown in philosophy. It is an expert view that certain changes in thought are explainable as a transition from the mechanical view of things to the organic view of things. In philology, too, which is more and more devoting itself to the delicate problems of meaning and syntactical usage, the analogy has become something of a guiding principle.

That organic change is possible in dead languages (and, therefore, in artificial languages like Esperanto) is easily provable. Latin, after it became a purely literary medium, as opposed to the popular speech, changed much in style down to Seneca and then Tertullian. Sanskrit became "dead" through the influence of a long series of grammarians; yet for centuries it kept on changing in style and expression, though generally for the worse. In many ways, of course, it remained quite fixed.

And, with time, Esperanto, too, would vastly change, and in multitudes of different directions. There would not merely be a single nation to reckon with; that would secure some consistency in the midst of change. All the nations of the world would be

The only Safe Coffee.

Free Sample of PURE COFFEE FREED FROM CAFFEINE may be had by sending, to the address below, a 1d. stamp to cover the cost of postage.

Over 2,000 Doctors recommend Coffee freed from Caffeine—the only Coffee that does not affect the nervous system, and therefore the only Safe Coffee. Ask your grocer for it. Coffee freed from Caffeine has all its delightful fragrance and aroma fully preserved. All growths treated.

Explanatory Booklet free from

THE LIFEBELT COFFEE CO., LTD.
(Dept. 11), 71, Eastcheap, London, E.C.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported, METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES. New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

SWISS WALKING PARTY for Grand Tour of Mont Blanc, Montreux, Chamonix, Aosta, Gd. St. Bernard, June 10th, for 12 guineas for 17 days. Particulars—Vicar, Hazlemere, High Wycombe.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 3, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

HEIGHT INCREASED.—By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months; no apparatus; no medicines; ordinary habits retained.—Send two penny stamps for particulars to Professor Prowse, 13, North End Chambers, Croydon.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

"THOUGHT: Its Ten Laws," on Card. Something new. How the New Knowledge aids in daily life, study, &c. "Concentration: Its Ten Laws," Companion Card, 1s. 2d. each.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settef Course," (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE, (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

THE DISABILITIES OF AN IMPERFECT EDUCATION can be speedily removed by our special course of postal tuition. Send stamp to day for our explanatory booklet 126.—BROADBENT'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the

PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.

Complete outfit, foolscap size, Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free, 15/- complete. A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

involved. The strong prejudices of nations where their languages are concerned are justly noted by your contributor. But stronger still are the idiosyncrasies of temperament and faculty which make one people tend to express its ideas in a different manner from any other. These would soon make havoc of the symmetrical syntax of Esperanto. Moreover, those who are "literary and scientific," and for whom Esperanto is specially to cater, are the worst sinners here, for their tastes and ideas are more individualised.—I am, sir, etc.,

S. S. CHERRY.

London.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I was more than delighted to see your article in the current number of EVERYMAN on Esperanto.

Referring to your paragraph IV., I shall not be one of the readers who will reply that an international language is an impossible dream, for I have used Esperanto successfully for a long time, and have never failed to make myself understood with foreign esperantists.

There is one experience I would like to put before anyone as a proof of the facility in using the language. Soon after I started the study of Esperanto I commenced to correspond with a young French student; in this manner I taught him shorthand for use with Esperanto. He knew no shorthand whatever before; the whole of the elements of the subject had to be taught, not merely adaptations, for it to be used with Esperanto. He knew not a word of English, and I not a word of French, and, as before mentioned, I had not long commenced Esperanto; yet I was able to use that language as a means of imparting knowledge of a subject without there once being a misunderstanding. All rules I had to explain, form exercises for him to work, make clear any corrections, and there was not one occasion where any rule had been misunderstood. The whole theory was completed, and it formed a most interesting correspondence. I think I might say it was a novel test of what could be done with what people like to call an artificial language. I should like to hear of a parallel case with a national language undertaken at the commencement of its study.

The use of Esperanto with all nationalities at congress times, and when travelling, has now become such an everyday occurrence that it is not necessary to go into the matter any further.—I am, sir, etc.,

(Miss) H. E. BONE.

London, N.

PAGANISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am greatly indebted to Mr. Macpherson for his article, "Pagan and Christian Ideals." May I venture to offer some ideas which have been suggested by it?

"Paganism stands for the self-assertiveness and self-sufficiency of humanity." This is just the thing that wants saying, and saying often. It seems, however, that the principle may be pressed a little further. The Stoic was just as self-centred as the Epicurean, or the ordinary, everyday pagan, although on a slightly different basis. Generally speaking, Paganism stood for Self on a basis of sensual enjoyment, and the attempt to escape from such a basis produced the Stoic, although the escape left him just as self-centred, if not more so.

The Greeks, reared in a Particularist environment, were naturally a race of thinkers, whereas action was the characteristic of the Romans. The Greeks constructed a theory of Politics, the Romans built a State; the former had a theory of Ethics, the latter established a code of Laws. . . . It is perhaps due to this that the thoughtful Roman, subconsciously moved by the desire to escape from aforesaid basis, generally fell back into the Stoic position, which gave him a definite rule of life.

The principle actuating any man may always more easily be known by his action than by his words. A man's intellectual view of life is not necessarily expressed in his action. Action often does follow thought, but the process is sometimes reversed, and the interaction of the two is often difficult to puzzle out. Looked at from the activist point of view, the principle of Stoicism seems to be retirement into self, a rising to a self-standard of conduct, expressed outwardly by pure passivity. Though moving in the moral plane, such an attitude is no less self-centred than that of the Epicurean or the ordinary pagan. "How easy it is to repel and to wipe away every impression which is troublesome or unsuitable, and immediately to be all tranquillity." Again, "See how many qualities thou art immediately called upon to exhibit, . . . and yet thou remainest voluntarily below the mark" (Marc. Aur., Med). These expressions hit the centre of the Stoic life and action, and are they not essentially self-sufficient and self-assertive? In his thought the Stoic, indeed, acknowledged a superior existence, the existence of Zeus; but what did Zeus become in action? Either an abstract name for things in general or an explanation of how things came to be what they were.

Self-satisfaction and self-dissatisfaction seem to be different stages in the same line of mental evolution, the latter being the natural climax to which the former leads. Nothing is more boring than self, and the painful ennui of the classical world is one of the most pathetic things in history. Ennui is always primarily loss of interest, and when that comes fictitious interests—excitement—must be found. To this was due the vaporous indulgence in mysteries of the Eleusinian and Mithraistic type, as to-day are gambling and extravagant luxury. From this hell of self (of which Stoicism is but one phase) Christ came to redeem humanity, that man might die unto self and live in Him. It is thus that "He who would lose his life shall find it."

An interesting sidelight is thrown by the attitude of Paganism to Christianity. Pagan philosophy set out to find for Religion that Unity which was necessary to its very vitality, the Unity which the Polytheism of the ancients flatly denied. The Unity Philosophy arrived at was an abstraction from an aggregation of concepts, obtained by stripping off from things their characteristics one by one. A Unity thus arrived at could be nothing more nor less than pure Negation (as undifferentiated Unity must inevitably be); when the connotation had expanded to infinity, the denotation had shrunk to zero. It was the emptiness of such an ideal, and its absurdity as a moral force, which made a man's life recoil upon itself.

Into this chaos came the Christian, claiming to have seized the Reality which the philosophers sought. He was generally quite a simple person, who had never passed through the disciplinary course of logic, ethic, and physic. Yet the fact of his having something was obvious. His whole conduct and his indifference to persecution showed it, and the world of thought—which characterised him as "stubborn"—was astounded. There was a difference. The Christian had not got Reality; Reality had got him. This the

(Continued on page 800.)

Learn to sketch in 2 hours

A short cut to drawing skill has been discovered. It is the A.B.C. or Hieroglyphic Method of Drawing, invented by A. A. Braun, Director of the Association of Designers, Artists and Illustrators, the well-known commercial studio. The A.B.C. Method has revolutionised art tuition by enabling you to apply to drawing the pictorial ability you have already gained in learning to write.

DRAW AFTER ONE LESSON

By it you can make original designs after one lesson, and quickly qualify as a well-paid designer or illustrator.

Writing is nothing but a rather difficult and complicated kind of drawing; and if you can write well, you should be able to draw well. If there is individuality and character in your writing, the same qualities will appear in your drawing.

And never at any previous stage in the world's history has there been such a demand for artistic talent. Never was there a time when the knowledge of drawing was of such advantage and profit to its possessor.

ARTISTS DECLINE £500 A YEAR

Owing to the development in printing processes, the demand for good artists is far in excess of the supply. Wide publicity was given recently in the Daily Mirror to a publisher's offer of £500 a year for an illustrator.

No one accepted it. The sum was far too little, besides which most artists prefer the freedom of freelance work to a regular engagement.

A large income combined with perfect freedom of action—such is the happy state of the successful artist. No dreary office routine is his; he works where he likes and when he likes, and most often his work is his hobby, and the greatest of his pleasures. His life, if Bohemian, is healthy and free.

A Poster.

An Illustration.

CULTIVATE YOUR DORMANT GIFTS

Many successful artists have discovered their talents by accident. One was formerly a miner, another a mechanical draughtsman, another a watch-maker. All these men are now earning incomes in the neighbourhood of £1,000 a year, and there are many more in the same class or still better off.

Do not let your dormant talents be wasted in un congenial fields. Write to-day for a free booklet which will tell you how you can train yourself, at home, in your own time, and without interfering with your present employment, to engage in this fascinating and profitable occupation.

There is abundant proof of the great value of the A.B.C. Method. Many well-known artists write their opinions of it. One writes, "If your instructions are carefully followed, I should think ANYONE could with practice learn to express ideas pictorially." Another says, "It is the only way to teach." Pupils of the Course are not less enthusiastic in their praise. "Intensely interesting and instructive"; "The very thing I wanted" are typical comments, whilst another student writes, "I am indeed lucky to have gone in for the Course."

WORK GUARANTEED WHEN PROFICIENT

When you have become proficient by the A.B.C. Method, you will have no difficulty in finding work. By a special arrangement with the Association of Designers, students of the A.B.C. Method are provided, on attaining the necessary degree of skill, with well-paid commissions in illustrating, poster painting, humorous sketching, advertisement drawing, designing, portraiture, landscape or whatever branch of art is suited to their talents.

Teaching & Lecturing—Show Cards and Window Dressing—Printing and Advertising—Literature and Journalism—Dressmaking and Tailoring—Photography—Personal Culture & Amusement—Sketching Friends & Scenes.

If you are interested in any of the above, or any other of the hundred and one matters in which a knowledge of drawing is such a tremendous help, write to-day for the booklet explaining the special lessons provided for teaching just these things in the wonderfully quick and simple A.B.C. way.

Send a letter or a post card, giving your full name and address and asking for Booklet "T." containing details of the A.B.C. Method, and the signed opinions of leading commercial artists on its value.

The A.B.C. School of Drawing, 46 Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A.

5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Spriggs, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper

DISMISS YOUR LANDLORD.—You can spend the money to better advantage, and live in your own house. See this month's "Home." Send postcard for copy to the Editor, 3, Brushfield Street, London, E.C. Mention EVERYMAN.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & FAIR, 471, Crocksmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

PLAYS WANTED!—We are being constantly asked, by Managers and Producers, for good Plays and Sketches of every description. Let us submit YOURS. Straight dealing and lowest fees. Particulars free.—CAMBRIDGE PLAY AGENCY, Savoy House, Strand, W.C.

ARE YOUR NERVES HEALTHY?—If not, let me explain an inexpensive, drugless treatment. Banishes depression, sleeplessness, irritability, brain-fag, lassitude. Renews youthfulness.—Write "Specialist," c/o Review of Reviews, Kingsway, London, W.C.

MSS. should be typed before submitting to Agents and Publishers. Lowest prices and best work.—Write Miss Beere, — Rist & Co., 56, Ludgate Hill, E.C., for terms and appointment, or phone 7411 City.

SHORTHAND.—80 words per minute in One Month by the celebrated Sloan-Duployan System. Learned in Twelve Lessons. Used in Parliament daily, at 250 words per minute. Handbook and Lesson free.—Short-hand Association, 269, Holborn Hall, London. Tel.: 6111 Hol.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic. Original. Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30, 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, High Holborn, London, W.C.

The Chain fitted on all the best cycles is the Renold.
The Chain specified by all experienced riders is the

Renold Chain

The Chain with the name is the Renold.
ONE QUALITY—ONE PRICE—5/6 (Fitting extra).
Write for our interesting little booklet—Free.
HANS RENOLD LTD. (Dept. 14), MANCHESTER.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 181 Publishers and Periodicals at highest prices. You write, we sell. 16-pp. prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER'S ASSURANCE.

Readers of "Everyman" are desired to specially note that all advertisements which appear in this publication are the announcements of reputable firms, consequently no one need hesitate to communicate with any of our advertisers.

The Advertisement Manager is prepared to investigate the complaint of any reader, should cause for the same arise at any time.

philosopher couldn't see or understand, and the observed facts irritated him. Marcus Aurelius, the Stoic, the passionless, was—inconsistently enough, considering his scheme of life—a persecutor of Christians.—I am, sir, etc., THOS. SEFTON.

Dudley.

"THE WORLD UGLY."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Dr. Dearmer writes well of the nineteenth century's legacy of ugliness, and believes habitual city dwellers live on with "perverted imaginations, base ideals, and mean instincts. If Everyman does not believe this, let him notice what people read in the train." That is precisely what I did the last Thursday week "as ever was." Three City men, two young, one middle-aged, got into my compartment, sat next each other, and, quite independently of each other, took the current issue of EVERYMAN from their pockets to read. Things are bad, but not quite so bad as that, after all; so—cheer up, Dr. Dearmer!—I am, sir, etc., J. R. BLANCKENHAGEN.

CHRISTIANITY AND PROGRESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. J. Miller's statement in your columns of March 7th that "wherever secular ideas are spread as against religion, we see more liberty, freedom, and comfort," cannot be passed over unanswered. Modern history shows that liberty and comfort are not always to be found under a so-called secular Government. Since the establishment of the Republic and the consequent separation of the Church and State in Portugal, we find that this nation has had to face the greatest strikes and riots in her history, and also that the organised system of slavery in her colonies still goes on unchecked. France has had her national strikes and riots, her organised bands of hooligans, and the problem of a declining birth rate. The United States has been the victim of widespread graft in all its phases. She has had her share of motor bandits, dynamiters, and strike riots. China, too soon alas! has had her share of so-called secular government. The Cantonese students, who are the self-styled Government, and who need the restraining influence of a Yuan Shi-Kai, are governing China by the precise methods of their predecessors, and only in name is there a change. These student statesmen and theoretic secularists, who are supposed to have the most modern ideas of democratic government, have summarily executed their "enemies," driven lepers into pits, and imposed bribes—reminding one of the Inquisition.

The world is largely indebted to Christianity for its great and good laws, its mine of knowledge and literature, and its great and good lives. It may be of interest to your correspondent to know that President Wilson, who is going to purify the graft-sodden Government departments of America, bases several of his election addresses on direct Biblical teaching.

Mr. Miller also states that "science has always been opposed by theologians." This is a very grave statement, and may have been true in the middle ages when bigotry was rampant, but is certainly not true to-day. I could name several ministers of religion who have distinguished themselves in various branches of science.

Dispense with your religion, whatever it may be, and you will certainly have national decadence as a result.—I am, sir, etc., ROBIN MOFFATT Newcastle-on-Tyne.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

CARNACHI THE GHOST-FINDER (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.) opens well. Here at last, one thinks, is the perfect ghost story. The setting is admirable, the atmosphere charged with a potent suggestion of dread—the dread that lifts the hair ever so slightly as by a wind of terror makes the pulse quicken its beat. The first story treats of an old chapel, and describes a gruesome dagger that, suspended just above the altar, is said to guard the sacred plate hidden in a secret recess. The dagger does strange things. Unwelcome visitors—intruders on the peace of the chapel and its guardian ghost—are found prone upon the floor, stabbed in the region of the heart. One gets the genuine thrill at this, and hurries eagerly from page to page. And then, alas! the spell is broken, Mr. Hodgson forsakes the company of ghosts and goblins, and introduces a spiritual detective, a rationalistic person, who explains away the legend, and reduces the mystery of the chapel to a Maskelyne and Devant device. The murderous weapon is controlled by a spring, released by pressure on the altar rails. Carnachi unravels the riddle, cheats the reader of his thrill, and spoils what promised to be a rare good study of the supernatural.

Stories of Australia have a certain family resemblance; it is difficult to meet with a volume that is not replete with bushrangers, sheep farms, and water famine. Mr. Alexander MacDonald is original and arrestive in his latest publication. IN THE LAND OF PEARL AND GOLD (T. Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net) is freshly written, bearing the marks of first-hand acquaintance with miners in the outlying districts of Australia. "The Holding of Pelican Creek" is one of the best-written stories in the book. The miners are not of the Bret Harte type; rugged, illiterate men, with a fine command of choice invective and a catholic taste in drink. The author brings them before you so that you seem to know them personally, and take a vivid interest in their fortunes. The story is marked by certain technical touches in relation to mining; the author does not labour his knowledge, but gives a sufficient number of details to explain the risk and excitement attendant on wresting mineral treasure from the earth. We commend the book to all those who want to read of Australia as it really is. This is not a collection of fancy sketches; each story has the real right ring, and the book is notable not only for its convincing atmosphere, but for the simple yet graphic style in which it is written.

There is a light and whimsical touch in the telling of THE GAY ADVENTURE (William Blackwood and Son, 6s.). Mr. Richard Bird has the art of putting his reader in a good temper, and the mood being favourable, one can accompany him throughout his pleasant and gossipy pages with satisfaction and amusement. His opening is excellent; how few authors understand that in the initial paragraph of a novel so much is determined. It is a far cry from the days of G. P. R. James, who would expend at least three pages in the description of the solitary horseman who invariably appeared in the first page of the romance; but, though padding as a fine art is at a discount, the majority of writers have yet to learn how to set the scene with a few graphic touches. "Mr. Lionel Mortimer was a young gentleman of few intentions and no private means." The author

(Continued on page 802.)

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS.

THE MYSTIC WAY.

A Study in Christian Origins.

By EVELYN UNDERHILL.

Square demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Daily News.—"The book is a beautiful, noble and interpretive piece of work."

TOWARDS A NEW THEATRE.

By EDWARD GORDON CRAIG.

With 40 Designs for Stage Scenes, accompanied with Critical Notes by the Inventor.

Square royal 4to, 21s. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"His pictures are like dreams."

RAVENNA.

By EDWARD HUTTON.

THE MOST COMPLETE STUDY OF THIS MARVELLOUS CITY THAT HAS YET APPEARED IN ANY COUNTRY.

With 10 Illustrations in Colour and 30 Line Drawings by HARALD SUND. 10s. 6d. net.

CHAUCER.

By EMILE LEGOUIS.

Translated by L. LAILAVOIX.

Large crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Manchester Guardian.—"This small volume has every right to be acclaimed as the best introduction to Chaucer which has yet been offered to the world."

DANTE AND AQUINAS

By Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

The book aims at giving the student a connected idea of the general Theological and Philosophical background of the "Comedy," and therefore a keen appreciation of those distinctive features in which Dante's own personality more especially reveals itself.

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS.

By E. G. GARDNER, M.A.

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Daily News.—"He brings to this inquiry the rare combination of qualities that it demands, vision and scholarship, and that extreme delicacy of touch which makes possible an orderly marshalling and presentation of almost intangible things."

WINDS OF DOCTRINE.

Studies in Contemporary Opinion.

By Prof. G. SANTAYANA.

Small demy 8vo, 6s. net.

Daily News.—"The style of the book is impeccable, and it contains a charming essay on Shelley."

SONGS AND BALLADS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Compiled by E. A. HELPS.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"An inspiring volume—a vivid, fascinating panorama of the British Empire."

THE DEAN'S HANDBOOK TO GLOUCESTER CATHEDRAL.

By the Very Rev. the DEAN OF GLOUCESTER.

Small crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—"An altogether admirable guide."

SALISBURY PLAIN:

And Its Stones, Cathedral City, Villages and Folk.

By ELLA NOYES.

Illustrated by DORA NOYES. Square medium 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

NEW NOVELS.

DAISY DARLEY; or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street.

By W. P. RYAN.

6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

Daily Herald.—"I can confidently recommend it to anyone who can appreciate an original and delicate piece of work."

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL.

By GRACE RHYS, Author of "The Wooing of Sheila," etc.

6s.

Times.—"There is breathless excitement and fun in the tale. The chapter telling how Tamburlaine carries his half-dead master all the way from Dublin to Ardhoroe without a rest is full of a tremendous galloping movement that is overmastering."

Manchester Guardian.—"The real hero, Tamburlaine, is not a man but a horse, quite the most wonderful horse of fiction, none excepted."

THE LOST MAMELUKE (Shortly)	.	.	DAVID M. BEDDOE.	6s.
'TWIXT LAND AND SEA	.	.	JOSEPH CONRAD.	6s.
THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT.	.	.	FLORENCE CONVERSE.	6s.
THE ADVENTURES OF MISS GREGORY.	.	.	PERCEVAL GIBBON.	6s.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

at once arrests the attention and intrigues the interest. One gets a grip of the story through the suggestion of a phrase, in the same fashion that a half-opened door reveals the temperament and limitations of the owner of the room that it discovers. We have not enjoyed a book of such freshness for a long time; the characterisation is subtle and distinctive, and the whole story redolent of that humour that is the salt of life.

Mr. Hector Fleischmann has added yet another novel to the collection of Napoleonic fiction. THE EMPEROR'S SPY (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.) is as machine-made as most of the rest; Napoleon is sketched with that fatal facility which characterises your exuberant fictionist, who has no hesitation in selecting the most notable and distinctive men and women for his olla podrida of sensationalism. The Emperor is painted with the crude colouring much in use for the villain of an East End melodrama. If one be blest or cursed with an historic sense, the crudity of Mr. Fleischmann's methods as applied to Napoleon sets every nerve ajar. Buonaparte, according to this romanticist, habitually used the phraseology of a bargee in his interviews with the ladies of his affections, and behaves generally as a bouncer and a cad. The whole thing hangs together solely on the strength of the central figure, and that figure distorted out of all likeness to historic fact, and to the many legends that have congregated round the memory of the Colossus of his century.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL (J. M. Dent, 6s.) is written with a simplicity of style and an appreciation of colour that lend to it a notable distinction. Certain passages gem the book and lend an intimate charm. "Below her the lake shone. In waving lines along its face the edges of the ripples caught the light, till it seemed as though rows of diamond lamps were being lit, bright as the spirit in those eyes that had troubled her peace." The fantasy is significantly in keeping with the character of Sabia, one of the central figures of the romance. A quaint and fragrant creature, with an illusive yet dominant charm, she serves as an admirable foil to the other woman of the piece, who exercises a strong though counter influence on Estercel, the hero of the romance. He is drawn with a full appreciation of the qualifications necessary to the rôle. He is of splendid appearance and a fearless rider, and his white horse, Tamberlaine, is as imposing and almost as interesting as he. It is rarely one finds an author with the capacity for creating an atmosphere of bygone days, who at the same time possesses a talent for vitalising her characters. One gets a glimpse of Essex, and an echo of the Court of Queen Elizabeth so vivid and lifelike that one wishes Mrs. Rhys would write a romance against the background of the Tudor period, and set the scene in London. The story told with the charm of "Estercel" should prove as notable a success as this romance of Ulster has already scored.

THE FAIRWEATHERS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) sets forth the adventures of a family of four sisters, the daughters of an old-fashioned doctor in a small provincial town in Scotland, who dies leaving them practically penniless. The characters of the sisters are quite well drawn, particularly that of the elder sister, Bella, an unlovable and shrewd person, "with a trim figure and a small, neat face, a little inclined to shrewishness." There is a shoddy, vulgar little doctor of the name of Ludlow, who is in love with the scape-grace sister Madge, but eventually falls into the toils of the designing Bella, who is anxious to retain the old house and the "practice" for herself, and finds this the only way of attaining her desire. Janet is by far the best of the bunch, and we follow her with interest in her doings in Canada and the Wild West, where she "mothers" the child of a lonely widower, and transforms a distinctly bare and uncomfortable "little shack" into something resembling "the old home." Mrs. Annie S. Swan has given us an attractive picture of Canadian life on the whole, and her portrayal of the little provincial town is very true to life. Madge and the younger sister, Nancy, also meet with adventures which are quite worth reading, if somewhat ordinary; and on the whole the book is one to while away a spare hour not unpleasantly.

Mr. Martindale has issued a collection of sketches slight in form, but written with a delicacy of treatment and an underlying sense of mysticism that finds expression in certain eloquent and haunting phrases. IN GOD'S NURSERY (Longmans, Green and Co., 3s. 6d. net) the author touches on the border line between this world and the unseen. The story of the child's toy, the little painted dog, carries with it the echoes of bygone ages. The first story dates back to Pagan times, when a little Prince of the Egyptians throws down his toy in temper, is slapped by his mother for the offence, and is, incidentally, poisoned by a scratch from an iron ornament that she is wearing. The child dies, and is buried with the plaything. And a thousand years later the little mummy, with its grotesque dog, is seen, and, by its side, a child stands and stretches out its hand, the same plaint upon its lips, the same cry that had died upon the little Prince's—a cry for the little dog! "Guardian Angels" is a study of child life from a different angle. Jack, a young undergrad., has been reading the Iliad, and, unlike most of us who for the first time taste the supreme joy of Homer, he is affected, not by the pageantry of battle, the gleaming sword of combat, but by the pathos of the children sacrificed in the cause of Helen—the world's desire. His mood is cleverly portrayed; his meeting with the two slum children on Hampstead Heath, his instinctive desire to give them a good time, and their enjoyment of the treat, admirably sketched. Restrained, yet effective in treatment, and containing passages of real power, the book should be a literary success.

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

Why did he leave?

Why did Smith so abruptly jump up and bounce out? Was it impatience or the sudden recollection of an appointment that must be kept? No! Two days ago he had sent for the "Clemak" book, entitled "His First Shave," and it had come that morning. Of course, he hadn't had time to read it at breakfast—got up too late! But the little book was useful during the weary wait at the barber's—and it showed Smith how to avoid such waste of time in the future. That's why he jumped up so quickly and left the shop.

Henceforth Smith shaves with a "Clemak."

The "Clemak" is as good as any guinea razor, but only costs 5s. It is beautifully made, easy to manipulate, and splendidly efficient. The seven blades included in the Outfit are made of finest grade Sheffield steel, hardened and tempered by a special electric process. They retain a fine edge, and can be stropped over and over again.

The "Clemak" is no trouble to clean, is always ready for use, and lasts a lifetime.

Acquire the "Clemak" habit! Buy a "Clemak" to-day. Save those threepences, and weary waits at the barber's; cease to inflict torture upon yourself with a variable, dangerous, time-wasting ordinary razor.

Buy a "Clemak" and every morning you will enjoy a close, clean, comfortable shave, accomplished in double-quick time.

FREE Send to-day for the amusing and informative "Clemak" Book, "HIS FIRST SHAVE."

FORM FOR FREE BOOK.

EVERYMAN.

To CLEMAK RAZOR CO.,
17, BILLITER ST., LONDON, E.C.

Please send me gratis, and post free, a copy of your book, "His First Shave," which illustrates in colour the Clemak Outfits, and also gives useful hints on shaving.

Name

Address

Only 1d. stamp needed, if envelope be not closed. Or postcard will do, on mentioning EVERYMAN.

"Made as well and shaves as well as any Guinea Razor."

Remember, its a "Clemak" you want—refuse Imitations.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5

CLEMAK OUTFITS

Complete in case.

Clemak Razor and Seven Blades .. 5/-

Combination Outfit, Stropping Machine, Hide Strop, with Clemak rod Twelve Blades .. 10/6

Obtainable from all Cutlers, Ironmongers, Stores, &c., or post free on receipt of price from the CLEMAK RAZOR CO., 17, Billiter Street, London, E.C. [Works, Sheffield.]

The Stamp of Superiority is on Every Garment.

The MAJOR (“London Opinion”) Ellis Dress Suits and Overcoats.

“YOU will see many different kinds of Overcoats and Dress Suits if you go to a tailor who moves with the fashions and the times. One such I have in my mind is Mr. Ellis, of 201, Strand, W.C. By buying in large quantities and paying cash for his cloths, he is able to make an Overcoat or Dress Suit of the finest material for much less than many a tailor in the West End will charge for exactly the same thing. Mr. Ellis also scores by having his clothes made in his own workshops, and by giving his personal attention to each customer.”

SPECIALITIES.

Dress Suit . . 5 gs.
(Silk lined throughout.)
Double Breasted
Belted Overcoat, 63/-
Guaranteed to fit you and perfectly tailored, otherwise we shall not allow you to keep the garments.

J. & H. ELLIS, Coat Specialists,
201, Strand, London, W.C. (Facing Law Courts.)

THE EVERYMAN ENCYCLOPÆDIA

To be Completed in Twelve Volumes.

VOLUME 3 Now Ready.

EACH VOLUME CONTAINS 640 PAGES
AND MORE THAN 500,000 WORDS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—“It is not easy to know who should be congratulated most—the editor, Mr. Andrew Boyle, on so admirable an achievement, the publishers on so courageous an undertaking, or the public on the prospect of being able to purchase for twelve monthly shillings a complete encyclopædia of knowledge.”

Cloth, 1s. net. Leather, 2s. net.
Please send for 8-page Prospectus.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

DARN NO MORE

Stockings and Socks that Don't Want Mending.
Ren'd the following Guarantee, which is given with every pair of hose we sell:

Wear your Hose as hard as you like, and if a hole develops within
TWO MONTHS of purchase we will REPLACE THEM FREE.

Holeproof Socks and Stockings are of medium weight, shapely, well made and comfortable, with that comfortable sense of good fitting that is one of the many pleasant features of our hose.

It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still no damage done to its fabric.

The comfort and pleasure of a good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to ladies' girls and busy housewives to whom the week's darning is a long and tiresome task the benefit is incalculable. Price.

Two Pairs Gent's Socks, 2/10, post 2d.

Two Pairs Ladies' Stockings, 3/10, post 2d.

Colours stocked, Black, Navy, Champagne, Pearl Grey, and Light Mole.

SILK HOLEPROOF. Sold under same guarantee as above.

Two pairs of Gent's Socks, 7/6, postage 2d.

Two pairs of Ladies' Stockings, 10/6, postage 2d.

Colours: Ladies'—Chamois, Empire Blue, Pearl Grey, Tan, Black. Men's—Tan, Navy, Black, Pearl Grey. State Boot size. Call or write.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), QUEEN'S ROAD, BRIGHTON.

500 HOURS LIGHT for 1½

Iconmongery
Dept. 154

Agents
Wanted.

We have named this the “Fool-Proof” Lamp because even with the most careless handling it is absolutely safe.

That is there is no exposed flame to flicker or blow out when closed out of doors, near bedroom windows or curtains, or draughty corners. Many people would like their dark recesses, halls, or basements well lighted, but cannot manage this because of the expense.

But one of these little “Fool-Proof” Lamps placed in those certain corners or dark staircases landings will cost no more than 14d. for 500 hours. You will realise this better when you know that candles give only 15 hours for the same amount, and are also highly dangerous, besides looking rather poverty stricken.

Now these lamps are really artistic, the pattern is beautifully designed and well executed on a copper base, and the whole is so well finished that it has the appearance of a really expensive article.

It is essentially “good” looking, and is totally different to the usual run of rather cheap looking oil lamps.

It can be used as a smoker's companion, and is absolutely odourless. It wears for years, and is a great boon to those who are nervous in the dark. Call or write. Price 2/6, postage and packing 2d.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mall Order House, BRIGHTON.

SUCCULENT CHIPS IN A TRICE.

Chip potatoes are always so dainty and appetising, and many people would have them far more often, if it were not for the trouble of preparing them. Therefore the V. & H. POTATO CHIPPER will be a welcome find to many people, as it reduces the trouble to a minimum. One operation makes 12 chips, and all nicely shaped and even. Knives are placed in slanting position so the potato is easily and quickly pushed through. Price 1/-; postage and packing 2d. AGENTS WANTED.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mall
Order House, Queen's Road, BRIGHTON.

PAPER BAG COOKERY KNOCKED OUT!

Just listen to this. With this little V. & H. Roaster all you have to do is to put your meat in the tin, put the cover on, and leave it!

IT ABSOLUTELY COOKS THE MEAT ITSELF, alone, with no basting, no attention, and all the nourishing and delicious aroma is retained. There is no fiddling bags to look after, and to keep incessantly busy. Once you have this, it is yours for practically a lifetime. The meat cooked in this is deliciously tender, and the saving in time and trouble is incalculable.

Don't be bothered any more with ordinary dishes, buy one of these and give yourself a little rest.

Your meat will also be tenderly melted in your mouth, try and see.

AGENTS WANTED. Price 5/-; postage, 3d.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), BRIGHTON.

DRY CLEAN YOUR DOG.

Veterinary
Dept. 154.

THOROUGHLY CLEAN YOUR DOG WITHOUT WATER.
USE THIS POWDER—JUST SPRINKLE ON DOG—RUB
INTO HIS COAT AND SKIN—AND THEN BRUSH OUT.

This is all you have to do to get your dog's coat and skin thoroughly cleansed; his coat comes up bright and glossy, with a sweet, wholesome smell, every disease germ is destroyed, and your dog in his old age will not suffer from rheumatism, caused by too frequent water washing.

This is so easy and simple to do that the animal can be washed twice as often, and is therefore much more healthy. It can be done ten minutes before it is going out, without fear of catching cold. So easy that a child can clean its own pet.

Cats can be shampooed with this wonderful Dry Shampoo Powder, and they enjoy it as much as dogs.

Just try a tin, the price is 1s., post 1d., which contains enough to dry shampoo an ordinary terrier six times—three times the quantity for 2s., post 2d.
Perfectly harmless.

We send free with each order our hints and cures on Home Treatment and Cures.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154), The Mall Order House, BRIGHTON.

VAUGHAN & HEATHER (Dept. 154) The Mall Order House, Queen's Rd., BRIGHTON.

EVERYMAN

His Life, Work, and Books.

No. 26. Vol. 1. [REGISTERED
AT THE G.P.O.]

FRIDAY, APRIL 11, 1913

One Penny.

JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU,
NATUS 1712, OBIT 1778

CONTENTS FOR THE WEEK

	PAGE
Portrait of Jean Jacques Rousseau	805
History in the Making—Notes of the Week	806
Is the Human Brain Degenerating?—By Hubert Bland ...	807
The Battle of Waterloo. Part I.—By Hilaire Belloc ...	809
The Abolition of the Working Classes. II.—The Path to Freedom—By L. G. Chiozza Money	810
Dr. Chalmers as Social Reformer—By Hector Macpherson	811
Women at Work. VII.—The Journalist—By Margaret Hamilton	812
Montaigne and Nietzsche—By Charles Sarolea	814
Sex and the Drama—An Appeal to History—By Arthur Owen Orrett	815
The Fair Assurance. Poem—By Max Plowman	817
Jean Jacques Rousseau, 1712-1778—By E. Hermann ...	818
Masterpiece for the Week. W. M. Thackeray's "Vanity Fair"—By John K. Prothero	820
"The Bill," at the Royalty, Glasgow	821
Literary Notes	822
The Dog that Lost His Character. A Cautionary Tale— By H. H. W.	824
Correspondence—
Esperanto	826
The Superman	828
Anglo-German Relations	829
Educational Reform	830
Enterprise in Business	830
Paganism and Christianity	832
Books of the Week	832
List of Books Received	834

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE European situation has once more assumed a complex and difficult character. Montenegro—"Europe's refractory child"—has defied the Powers, and Mr. Chesterton's gibe at the "impotences" gains point once again. In brief, King Nicholas and his loyal people are not taking the naval demonstration as seriously as might have been expected from a nation with a population about as large as that of the average London borough. The majority of thoughtful men are agreed that, whatever sympathy Britain may have for small and struggling nations, she must stand by the Concert; the only difficulty being the haunting doubt as to whether there will in the end be any Concert left to stand by. A vague but significant note of disharmony has crept into the Ambassadorial deliberations. Between the tone of the London Conference, which shows a gladdening unanimity in following the lead of Sir Edward Grey, and the attitude of Vienna, St. Petersburg, and Paris there is a by no means negligible difference. When the naval demonstration and blockade was in question, France hesitated. It heard behind the official voice of Russia the more imperious voice of Pan-Slavism. This cleavage between official opinion and popular national instinct and sentiment is fraught with peril for the continuance of the Concert. And it remains true that official position does not annihilate the private sympathies of even the most loyal statesman.

The reality and growing force of a Pan-Slavic protest against the policy of the Powers was shown in the second Slavonic demonstration at St. Petersburg last Sunday. To everyone's surprise, the whole Russian police tradition was contravened on that day. "I have had a long and exceptional experience with the Russian police," writes the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, "and have never seen them so gentle and affectionately tender with street demonstrators before. Not one mounted constable or gendarme was to be seen." Requiem services were held, not only for the Slavs killed in the Balkan War, but also for the Slav victims of Austrian cruelty. A wreath of white flowers was laid upon the tomb of Alexander II., "the Emancipator of the Slavs and the Peasants," and a white banner was displayed, bearing the inscription, "The Cross on St. Sophia."

The problem of how to supply war news without destroying the secrecy of military operations is the subject of a timely article by "A Journalist" in the current issue of the Fortnightly Review. It will be remembered that, some eight or nine years ago, the weighty appeal of Lord Selborne, in what proved to be his valedictory speech as First Lord of the Admiralty, led to the drafting of a Bill which made it a penal offence for the owner, publisher, or editor of any newspaper to publish unauthorised information with respect to military dispositions and movements, strategic plans, etc., etc. This Bill was shelved, for the reason that it did not gain the unanimous support of representatives of the Press—an insufficient reason, according to our writer, who deals caustically with the popular objection that such a Bill would curtail the liberty of the Press. He tells the "ass" who would "get up and quote the Areopagitica," that "the real liberty of the Press is not the liberty to publish news, but to express opinion, and that this latter liberty would remain absolutely unbridged. The only liberty of the Press that would be abridged is the liberty to jeopardise the security of the nation." The article is not likely to pass unchallenged, as it is difficult to see how an "opinion" can be stated without an appeal to "facts."

The tactics of the militant Suffragists are evoking a quite extraordinary passion of indignation in America, to judge by Press comments. The expressions of condemnation could hardly be stronger if American Suffragettes were in question. The New York American fiercely advocates extreme punishment, the New York Times taunts the Government with being afraid of our "wild women," while the New York Sun declares that if the police lost control and became brutal the results might stagger humanity, but that, while humanity would recover, militancy would more likely not. These extracts are typical, and offer an interesting footnote to the psychology of the freest and, in a sense, most woman-ridden of nations.

The seventy "lightning strikes" which have lately interfered with the even tenor of our hotel and restaurant life are concentrating tardy attention upon a class of men whose disabilities are peculiarly galling. There is something about a waiter's life, under present conditions, which makes for destruction of manhood, and this demoralisation applies even more to the sleek and prosperous head-waiter, whose tips amount to £35 a week, and who owns his house and motor-car, than to the starved and browbeaten assistant, who can hope for 15s. a week at best. It is high time that the luxurious diner should know something about the human automatons, whose obsequious attentions put him in such a good humour with himself and the world. But the average patron of hotels has scarcely the imagination to guess at the places where these men sleep, the food on which they thrive, and the future they have to look forward to; not to speak of the type of soul that is requisite to make what they term an "ideal" waiter in this machine-made age.

IS THE HUMAN BRAIN DEGENERATING ?

BY HUBERT BLAND

I.

ONE may confidently assume, I take it, that nine out of ten who glance at the question which heads this column will turn from it impatiently, regarding it as one of those questions which it is superfluous and futile to ask because it admits of only one answer. "How, in the name of evolution," they will say, "can the human brain be degenerating? And, anyhow, where are the signs of degeneration? Is not the evolution of the human brain from some vastly lower form, at this time of day, something more than a scientific hypothesis—is it not a proven fact? And is not evolution synonymous with progress, with improvement, that is? The improvement, it is true, may be extremely slow, but still improvement there must be. There must be; therefore there is. Each succeeding generation of mankind—at any rate, of civilised, advancing mankind—in this matter of brain capacity, may be only the least little bit better than its predecessor. Still, that little bit better it needs must be."

That, I think, roughly but accurately expresses the view of the average, uninstructed person upon the subject of human evolution. If one may judge from a good deal that one reads, it expresses also the view of a not insignificant number of persons who are not, or at least should not, considering their opportunities, be uninstructed. By these persons—for the most part writers on political affairs—human progress, up to the present moment, to say no more than that, is taken for granted, and with it is taken for granted the continuous perfecting of the human brain as an organism, as an instrument, as a thinking machine.

The object of this brief article is to suggest reasons for supposing that this view, so commonly held, is a false view, and that so far is the brain of civilised man, considered as a thinking machine, from improving, that it is and must be subject to a process of gradual degeneration.

II.

There is no need to waste words in refuting a possible argument based on the assumption that evolution is synonymous with progress, or that it is in any way incompatible with the phenomenon of degeneration; any text-book will do that. Any text-book will make it quite clear to the most uninformed reader that evolution is a twofold process, and that at the present, or at any other moment of time, there are as many organisms reverting towards the simple and homogeneous as there are progressing towards the complex and heterogeneous. That is all that progress in organic evolution means.

If I am asked what evidence I have that the civilised brain is degenerating, I frankly admit that I have none whatever. I have none, because none is, or could be, by the nature of the case, available. If we could get hold of a thousand boys of tender years, born in England, say, in the fifth century, send them to our best preparatory schools, then to our most efficient public schools, and, later on, to our Universities, then we might, by comparing their failures and successes with those of a thousand picked youths born in our own time, get evidence which would be, if not convincing evidence, at least evidence of a sort. Unfortunately, we cannot do that; and so we must fall back on the à priori method—a perfectly sound and safe method if carefully pursued.

Progressive evolution is not brought about by some inward impulsion, some mysterious life-force, coming we know not whence, going we know not whither; it is the result of certain external conditions. Where, and for as long as, those conditions are present we have progress; when those conditions are withdrawn we have stagnation or reversion.

Was there ever a time, then, in human history when the external conditions were favourable to improvement of the brain?

III.

There is no need for us to go quite so far back as the time of our anthropoid and non-human ancestor; primitive man will do to begin with. We cannot fix a definite point at which man ceased to be primitive—since science recognises no definite line of demarcation, the lines are invisible—but, at least, we are all agreed that there was such a being as primitive man, and that a very hard time of it he had. It was no easy task to provide enough food for himself, his mate, and his young family. Food was scarce and danger everywhere. There was a quite remarkable equality of scarcity. Most primitive men went to bed hungry; dinner was an affair of every three days or so, and to the eating of it seclusion was necessary to security; for equally hungry neighbours were always around, ready and even eager to share, by force, the nest of wild bird's eggs, the cluster of berries, or the succulent root, which formed the pièce de résistance of the meal. Lean and ferocious wild beasts abounded. Then there was the avowed human enemy. Primitive man might run across him anywhere, and, when he did, war to the hatchet broke out without diplomatic preliminaries. There were the forces, too, of inanimate nature, almost entirely beyond primitive man's control. These forces, nearly always inimical, he, in his individual capacity, was compelled to elude, to dodge, to circumvent, or at their hands to perish. Of him, more truly than of any other son of man, may it be said that he lived by his wits. He stood alone, with unsheltered head and bare hands, in a hostile world.

IV.

It is obvious, then, I think, that the primitive man to whom it occurred to discover or to invent some tool or weapon—a sharpened flint, or pointed stick, the simplest kind of arrow, or sling, or throwing spear, or most rudimentary snare—which would enable him to bring down the flying bird or running beast, or to entrap the warier or more dangerous foe, which escaped the neighbour who still sought his food or defended his life with empty hands, would have an incalculable advantage over those of his fellows with less or no inventive faculty. He would live where they would die. That meant more and more ample food for his offspring, to whom he had transmitted whatever of brain capacity was his; and that, in its turn, meant that his offspring would survive, in conditions to which the less brainy neighbour's children would succumb. That extra and deeper brain convolution which he must have had made all the difference.

Primitive man lived, as a rule, in caves, when there were caves to live in; in the roughest sort of shelters when there were not. The man who had just enough sense to keep the water from coming through his roof or the winds through his walls would save his children from pneumonia. On the other hand, the absence of that brain-convulsion involved extinction for self and family. It is not too much to say that, before the dawn of civilisation, before mutual aid had been added to self-help, the smallest advantage in brain-capacity did more for progressive evolution of brain-power than the very greatest advantage can do to-day.

V.

The moment when improvement in brain-capacity ceased is impossible to be named with any hope of accuracy. It was at a different moment among different races and in different habitats. It came when the struggle for life—actual, individual life—ceased to be severe enough to ensure actual death to all those, and to the offspring of all those, who did not possess that slight advantage. As soon as mutual aid and co-operation had reached a point when the children of the comparatively brainless could reckon on reaching manhood almost as certainly as the children of the cunningest and most resourceful, the human brain lost, not the potentiality, but the actuality of progressive improvement. All that was left to the human race then was to make the best of such brains as it had. That it failed miserably to do; to do that it is still lamentably failing.

We hear much of the "struggle for life"—the phrase has become a cliché. In point of fact, in civilised communities there is no struggle for life, no struggle, that is, of a sort which secures life to the cleverer and denies it to the more foolish. It may be said that, while the uncivilised world tried hard to kill men, the civilised world tries hard to keep them alive. There is, no doubt, a continuous competitive struggle in society as we know it; but only by an extravagant figure of speech can it be called a "struggle for life." On the lower levels, in the slums and in the grimy streets, the fight is, perhaps, actually for bread. But, even so, whether it is the cleverest who get the bread it is doubtful; it is more probably the physically stronger and those who have the luck. On the higher levels, the competition is for the luxuries and conveniences, not for the necessities of life. It is a scramble for easy-chairs. It is easy to exaggerate the intensity of the conflict. Daily observation shows us how small a brain-capacity is necessary to enable a man to make an income sufficient to marry, within his class, and to rear an overflowing family. It requires but a minimum of intelligence to furnish forth your average curate or your average clerk, and these are the very men who marry early and reproduce with astonishing rapidity; while the circumstance which makes most powerfully against the progressive evolution of brains is the practice, yearly more and more common among those whose extra ability has won for them the easy-chairs, of limiting their families within extremely exiguous limits.

VI.

A community bent upon developing a higher class and quality of brain must make arrangements to breed from its cleverest members and to restrict the procreation of the feebler-witted. At the present moment, the man of less than even average intelligence, but with a few hundreds a year derived from inherited wealth, has a better chance of marrying earlier, and thus producing a brood of intelligences less than average, than the possessor of the most capable and highly trained brain who has to rely on his wits for his breakfast.

Look where you will, in whatever department of Government administration, public or private, it is rarely indeed that you will find the ablest at the top. If there be one thing more than another of which the future will stand in sorest need, it is scientific inventiveness; and what is the reward of scientific invention? More often than not, a pittance or the poor-house. What step is society taking to bring into being the inventive brain? For, let us make no mistake on this point, brains must be bred. Education, even of the very highest, does not produce superior brains; the utmost it can achieve is rightly to develop such brains as are there already; it can but work up the material; it can do nothing to create it.

It may be that a day will come when civilised society will set itself to produce superior brains with the same earnestness of endeavour as it has employed in the production of swift racehorses and pet lapdogs; when it will replace, by remorseless artificial selection, the remorseless natural selection of the pre-civilised era. That is possible, but not in the least likely; for the whole trend of modern thought is towards making the environment softer for the feebler-minded and for those who are wholly incompetent to make an improvement in the environment for themselves. These moral and emotional tendencies are much more likely to increase than to decrease in force and volume, and, whatever beneficent sociological developments may be hoped for from them, they are fatal to the progressive evolution of brains.

VII.

Stronger men and women we may get, healthier men and women we may get, men and women more highly cultivated, more sedulously trained, more moral, more compunctious, than those we see about us now; but cleverer men and women—assuredly, these we may not hope for.

For the production of these certain conditions were essential; these conditions once existed and no longer exist. Selection, the chief, if not the only, factor in progressive evolution, is no more. Not even sexual selection plays a part in the civilised life of to-day. If most clever men married clever women and begot large families, something would be done towards the increase of brain-power, both in quantity and quality. But they do not; it is a matter of everyday observation that they do not. And as for selection by women, so far as it exists at all, it makes not for the progressive evolution of brains. In a husband women demand not a brain but an income, or at least the prospect of one; and brains and income, as we have seen, by no means invariably accompany each other.

The best we dare hope for is stagnation, and, alas! we may not hope, with any sort of assurance, even for that. For advance, nature demands selection, natural or artificial, and, if that be not granted her, back she goes. Therefore there can be no sort of doubt that when, recently, the head master of Eton declared the human brain to be degenerating, the inexorable facts of life were on his side.

VOLUME I. OF "EVERYMAN"

HANDSOMELY bound in cloth at the price of 3s. 6d., carriage paid 4s., the first volume of EVERYMAN will be ready next week. Applications are already being received, and all those desirous of obtaining the first of what should prove a long series of interesting volumes should write to EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons. Cases for binding can be obtained at 1s. 6d., post free 1s. 8d. A complete and detailed index to Vol. 1 (Nos. 1-26) is now in preparation, and will appear as a Supplement to the first number of the new volume (No. 27).

THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO * * * BY HILAIRE BELLOC

PART I.

THE end of Napoleon and the conclusion of the Revolutionary Wars is associated in the public mind with the name of Waterloo.

That association is by no means accurate. In so far as Napoleon failed, his failure was determined by his loss of the Russian Campaign, involving the whole of the Grand Army, the great mass of his trained cavalry, and, of course, his prestige. I say "in so far as" he failed, because it is evident to the least trained observer of Europe to-day that Napoleon's effort is ending not in failure, but in success. Europe is, as a fact, on the way—and far on the way—towards its reconstruction, and the full political result of the Revolution (of which Napoleon was the soldier) has certainly been achieved; for where democracy fails to-day in Europe, it is not from lack of opportunity, but from cowardice or stupidity.

Still, the end of Napoleon's enforcement of the French Revolution was a personal failure, and it was possible even for an intelligent man in 1815 to believe that the Revolution had failed; with that apparent failure is associated, as I have said, the name of Waterloo.

I propose, within a very short compass, to describe the main lines of that battle, and to show from what dispositions it proceeded.

Napoleon had been pursued, after the failure of his Russian Campaign in 1812, by the united forces of the Royal houses and the aristocracies of Europe. Their pursuit was, of course, successful, and in 1814 he abandoned his leadership of the French army and of the French nation, and was given, as a sort of political prison or place of exile, the island of Elba, off the Italian coast. From that island he escaped to France in the spring of 1815. The army and the people rose in his favour, and for three months he continued at their head.

He had, however, very little left with which to retain his position at the head of the French army and nation. All the Governments of Europe were marching against him. They would not hear of leaving him to reorganise France, for they feared that his genius would again lead him to conquest. Their united forces were now, of course, overwhelmingly superior to his own. It seemed only a question of time for the advent of these enemies, five or six to one, to overwhelm him. Napoleon determined, however, upon a desperate throw. It was only one chance in many, but it was a chance. This chance was to attack the vanguard of those who were now gathering to force him back again upon inevitable defeat through their superiority of numbers, and through their crushing successes of the preceding years.

While all the other Governments of Europe were bringing up against him their huge armies, three in particular—the Prussian, the Dutch, and the English—had already a considerable body mobilised and immediately ready for war, within striking distance of Paris. Even this vanguard of his enemies came to double the force he could bring against it; but Napoleon imagined that if, by some combination of chance and genius, he defeated it, his immediate success might give pause to the much larger reserves which the other European Governments were bringing against him, and lead to some sort of compromise. He determined, therefore, when all his advances for a peace had failed, to attack this vanguard and try his luck against it, although it had very nearly two men to his one. He based his hope of success on this: that this vanguard of the allied Powers, who desired his destruction (and that of the democratic principles for which he stood), was, in the first place, stretched out over one hundred miles of country, and, in the second place, divided into two distinct commands, each covering about fifty miles.

This is the first point, which must be clearly seized. The Dutch, English, and Prussian forces lay in a long chain of positions along the north-eastern frontier of France, and that long chain consisted of two separate halves, under two separate commanders, Wellington commanding the Dutch, English, and Germans of the western half, Blucher the Prussians of the eastern half. These two halves met and loosely joined opposite a town called Charleroi, just beyond the French frontier. A few miles behind Charleroi are cross-roads and a village, whose names should be remembered—Quatre-Bras and Ligny; Quatre-Bras to the north-west and Ligny to the north-east of the point of junction. They are four or five miles apart.

Napoleon designed to strike suddenly and secretly through Charleroi, and split the long line of his opponents at the place where the eastern half and the western half of that long line joined up. He hoped by thus coming up suddenly and secretly to defeat each half in detail, or rather the head of each half. For he meant to appear between them before the more remote parts of each line could come up in succour of its head at the joining place. Then, when he had crushed the head of either half, he would push through between to Brussels, and there issue a proclamation upon the old Revolutionary lines that should rally local opinion in his favour.

The campaign was of very short duration. Napoleon crossed the frontier, and struck at Charleroi on Thursday, the 15th of June, 1815. He took the enemy by surprise, as he had designed, but his movement was a little slower than his plan allowed for, and he did not come to hand-grips until the midday of the morrow, the Friday, June the 16th.

He was successful in his leading idea of cutting in between the two halves of the Anglo-Dutch-Hanoverian-Prussian line, and he was partially successful in managing to deal with the heads of each line only, and not with the whole force.

The eastern, or Prussian half, he tackled in person at Ligny, just to the north-east of Charleroi; the western line his lieutenant, Ney, tackled at Quatre-Bras, to the west. Of the eastern or Prussian line, only three-quarters hurried up in time to meet Napoleon. Wellington's line was taken still more by surprise at Quatre-Bras, so that when Ney began to attack he was at first resisted by a very small body, entirely composed of Dutchmen; but, as they held good, reinforcements joined them continually throughout the day.

At Ligny, against the eastern side of the gap, Napoleon was successful, but only partially successful, because he could get no reinforcements from Ney during the battle. Had he had those reinforcements, Napoleon would have surrounded the Prussians, and destroyed them altogether. As it was (as we shall see in a moment), he merely drove them back, and they retreated in such a direction as to appear again upon the field of Waterloo. Meanwhile Ney, after the Dutch had resisted his first attack successfully, found himself opposed by an increasing number of enemies, for the Duke of Wellington had got news rather tardily of the French advance, and was beginning to move up his half of the line. Ney, however, would have won at Quatre-Bras—or, more probably, the enemy would have retreated before him—had it not been for an accident of immense importance to history. A whole army corps, under the command of Erlon, was on its way to support Ney, when its commander received an order from Napoleon to come and help surround the Prussians at Ligny. Erlon turned off to execute this order, but, before he got to Ligny, he received a counter-order from Ney to turn back and help him at Quatre-Bras. Erlon obeyed this counter-order, but darkness fell before he could arrive at Quatre-Bras, with the result that this whole army corps under Erlon was of no use to Napoleon at Ligny, of no use to Ney at Quatre-Bras, and might just as well not have been present in the field at all. The consequence was that at Ligny (as I have said) Napoleon, though he defeated the Prussians and beat them back, did not surround or destroy them. They were free to retreat in whatever direction they chose. While at Quatre-Bras Ney utterly failed to push back his enemy, and was rather himself pushed back with his inferior forces.

So much for Friday, June 16th, which really decided the campaign. The non-appearance of Erlon at Ligny permitted the Prussians to escape from Napoleon. His non-appearance at Quatre-Bras prevented Ney from pushing back the Dutch, English, and Germans of Wellington.

(To be continued.)

THE ABOLITION OF THE WORKING CLASSES

II.—THE PATH TO FREEDOM

By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY.

How is the industrial State to find not merely an equilibrium, but a gentlemanly solution of the problem of Work?

The Work That Must Be Done—let us keep our minds upon it. Let us not deceive ourselves into the belief that mere traffic in the products of work, or a mere routine direction of familiar processes, is a proper contribution to it. Let us remember that there is no escape from the growing of food and organic materials, or from the mining of ores and other minerals, or from the production of a constant stream of manufactured products, to maintain and renew the material fabric of civilisation. Civilisation on its material side is neither more nor less than the conquest of Nature, and the conquest of Nature by Man entails the continuous performance of work. There is no escape from the penalty of work consistent with honourable conduct. The Work That Must Be Done is the price of continued life for the human species: A great man said not long ago that it was not the fault of Nature that people were poor; I wish he had spoken truly. If the thing were left to Nature, the greater part of our population would be dead within twelve months. The price of the continued existence in the United Kingdom of forty-five millions of people and their heirs, executors, and assignees, is, and will be, the doing of hard work in despite of the forces of Nature. The very basis of modern British wealth—coal—is only to be won by hard, incessant, and dangerous toil.

While men were without science, and that is, of course, until quite recent days, the majority of men were necessarily poor, and it needed the collection of fractions from the peasants of a countryside to build up one relatively rich man. The problem to-day is of a different character. To-day, although it is early in the life of modern science, mankind possesses powers of an extraordinary character. The production of wealth can now proceed on a considerable scale, and, as I said at the beginning, it is power production which has given us that considerable volume of commodities which has built up the modern "classes," and afforded for many of us a dishonourable escape from labour.

The Work That Must Be Done is arduous and incessant for a proportion of our people called the "working classes," because it is not shared by all those who are physically able to undertake it. It may be asserted without fear of contradiction that if we assume no material output on the part of any person under eighteen years of age, an enormous production of wealth with modern appliances could be made by the twenty-six millions of adults between eighteen and sixty-five years of age if all of them, save, of course, women nurturing children, shared between them the necessary manual work. In a short working day there could be produced such an improved and enlarged output of material things that the problem of material poverty would be solved for ever. Of course, it is part of the proposition that the work of these adults should be properly organised and co-ordinated, and that it should be free from competitive waste and mere trafficking.

But it is important to observe that we should have thus solved something far greater than the problem of material poverty; we should have secured the Abolition of the Working Classes. To use a cricketing phrase, every player would be a gentleman, and every gentleman a player. Because of the common performance of the Work That Must Be Done, that work would cease to be the lot of a class and the mark of an inferior. The general gain would exhibit itself in every activity of life.

I have spoken of organised and co-ordinated work, words which fill some minds with visions of a social slavery, in which lives are patterned and moulded by State institutions, and in which liberty is finally overthrown. To these fearful minds I would protest that it is here and now that Liberty is wanted, and that it is to a path to a new and hitherto unheard-of Liberty that I point. Let those prate of liberty to-day who have as little knowledge of the lives of the industrial workers of the twentieth century as of the fettered toilers of the old English common fields. To reconcile economic wealth production with the liberty of the individual we must agree with each other to get done the Work That Must Be Done by common agreement, in common decency, and in order, and, having made that simple settlement, which entails the observance of club rules, the avenue is opened to the gain of Leisure, not by a few, but by all. I doubt whether, even with Science no further advanced than it is, more than a five hours' working day on the part of healthy adults would be required to abolish poverty. Those five hours of organised work would be the individual's contribution to the common stock, leaving him nineteen daily hours of complete liberty in which to work or to idle—perchance to produce in the spirit of the true amateur works of art which could no longer be the subject of debasing traffic.

I should at least like you to think it over.

DR. CHALMERS AS SOCIAL REFORMER

It is customary among a certain class of historians to write depreciatively of the influence of Presbyterianism in Scotland. If Buckle did not set the fashion, he at least did much to popularise it, and since his day the superior person, when writing of Scottish Presbyterianism, cannot resist a sneer at its narrowness and intolerance. True, Buckle gives ample credit to the Church for its resistance to the Erastian tyranny of the Stuarts, but faithfulness to historical veracity should have compelled him to do justice to the high ideal which ever hovered before the minds of the leaders of the Church of Scotland. Knox, Melville, Henderson, and the Covenanters were inspired by the theocratic ideal. With them the duty of the Church was not limited to the salvation of the individual soul; they were influenced by the Hebraic conception of the nation as such as well as the individual being consecrated to God. Thus we find Knox, in addition to preaching the Gospel, formulating a great scheme of national education, and Melville devoting his energies to the reform and reorganisation of the Universities; and when we come to later times the opposition of the stricter set among the Covenanters to the Revolution Settlement was dictated by the belief that the idea of national religion was not adequately conserved. Nor did the Church neglect social questions. The cause of the poor was very near its heart, though, owing to the dramatic character of Scottish ecclesiastical history, this side of the Church's activity has not received adequate attention at the hands of historians.

During the reign of Moderatism the ideals of the Reformers suffered eclipse, and it is significant that it was only at the time of the ascendancy of the Evangelical party that an attempt was made to realise the ideals of an earlier day. As a consequence of the Industrial Revolution and the massing of the population into congested centres, the problem presented itself in an acute form. In face of the problem Moderatism was powerless. The call for action on the part of the Church was urgent. The hour had come and the man. Dr. Chalmers stood forth as the representative of the theocratic ideal; he was clearly in the apostolic succession to Knox and Melville. If religion in Scotland was to be not sectarian, but national, Chalmers saw that it must make the cause of the poor its own, and this thought dictated his crusade against the heathenism and pauperism of our large towns. His opposition to the Poor Law arose from his conviction that the relief of the poor was a religious duty, and could not be effectively discharged by legislative machinery. He pinned his faith to Christian dynamics rather than to State mechanics. Chalmers did more: by his famous Glasgow experiment he demonstrated the practicability of his ideas. Before he entered upon his pastorate in Glasgow, the cost of pauperism in his parish had sometimes amounted to £1,400; he reduced it to about £250. He reduced the average cost to £30 per 1,000, whereas the average cost of the other parishes in Glasgow was about £200, and in many parishes in England was upwards of £1,000 per 1,000 of the population. We are told that, "instead of any compulsory assessment, the voluntary contributions were so abundant as to swell into large balances, which were ultimately applied to the creation and endowment of schools for the children of the parish." The experiment, which lasted for eighteen years—fourteen years after Chalmers left Glasgow—proved a complete success. In the words of an English Poor Law Commissioner in 1833, the essence of the St. John's management consisted in the superior system which it established. "This personal attention of the rich to the poor seems to be one of the most efficient modes of preventing pauperism." Under the reign of love rather than of law, in the opinion of Chalmers, could the poor be raised out of the abyss of pauperism and elevated in the scale of being.

In accordance with his theory that Christianity should embrace and penetrate all departments of the national life, Chalmers attacked the evils he saw around him. What we now call the social question was never absent from his mind, and he deals with it at great length in his "Christian and Civic Economy of Large Towns." The tendency of the clergy then, as now, was to limit their energies within purely ecclesiastical channels, and to put behind them the theocratic ideals of an earlier period. It was characteristic of Chalmers that he never wavered in his attempts to counteract this tendency. He appealed to the clergy in the interests of their high calling to study the science of Political Economy. It is the neglect of this study by the clergy, he remarked, that has led economists to imagine "a certain poverty of understanding as inseparable from religious zeal." While giving the first place to theology, Chalmers recognised the great value of sociology as a factor in realising the theocratic ideal. It would have been well for society and the influence of the Church to-day had the clergy taken to heart the advice of the great Scottish ecclesiastic. Had Chalmers been able to leave behind him a band of clergymen imbued with his spirit and methods, Political Economy might have been preserved from the materialism which overtook it. It was left to Ruskin to protest against the economic views of the Ricardian school. With them the main problem of Political Economy was how to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest, irrespective of the effect of the transaction on the physical and moral well-being of the workers. Ruskin raised the science to a higher plane when he defined wealth as that which sustains life, thus giving to the economic term "value" an ethical interpretation. In this Ruskin was anticipated by Chalmers, who declared that the problem of Political Economy is "how to elevate by means of well-paid industry the general platform of humble life." In the words of Dr. Harper in his book on "Chalmers' Contribution to Christian Economics": "He saw clearly that the health, strength, and prosperity of the nation do not depend upon numbers, unless they be well fed and well housed; nor upon increase of employment, unless the employment be remunerating in the sense of producing things that make for life. . . . He perceived clearly what many are now beginning slowly to apprehend, that Christian ethics applied to business make for a higher social life than is possible under the severe reign of individualism and unbrotherly competition." Unfortunately, just when social problems were demanding the earnest attention of the Church, there took place the Disruption, and the problem of Church and Society was driven into the background by the problem of Church and State. There are not wanting signs, however, that we are within measurable distance of a solution of the ecclesiastical problem; and when union comes we may expect the Church, in a real sense the National Church of Scotland, will, in the spirit of Chalmers, concentrate its energies upon the secular as well as the sacred side of life, and unite the two great factors in national progress and prosperity, the theocratic and the democratic.

HECTOR MACPHERSON.

WOMEN AT WORK BY MARGARET HAMILTON

VII.—THE JOURNALIST

The question of women's employment, with its attendant problems of the rate of wages, hours of labour, and the inevitable competition with men workers, is a burning one, affecting as it does the welfare of the entire community. The Editor invites his readers' views on this all-important subject.

JOURNALISM for women falls into three categories, which overlap and overrun each other. These are the editorial, the daily, and magazine writing. The last heading includes that class of contribution required by the "weeklies" who cater for popular as well as literary tastes. The most profitable section of this class of contribution is serial writing. The art of the novel lends itself peculiarly to the genius of woman. Observation and a certain swift capacity for grasping the essentials of character are pre-eminently feminine qualities, and nowhere do we find them so strikingly expressed as in fiction writing. Women hold their own in this department of literature, though not perhaps in the very front rank of creative work. We have not yet had a female prototype of Dickens or of Fielding; the canvases on which the greatest artists paint are too vast, too crowded for the more detailed genius of woman.

The man sends his hero out into the world and starts him on the high road of adventure; the woman sits by the fire of life or, at the best, glimpses it from a window. Though the work of the greatest feminine writers rises to heights of emotional power and dramatic insight, yet there is and must ever be lacking in them the larger knowledge of varied interests, of the curious mixed company of rogues and vagabonds cheek by jowl with honest, sober citizens that falls to the lot of man.

It is because of this capacity for detail that of late years the woman writer has been so largely in demand by the publishers and proprietors of popular journals. The Board School called into being a flood of periodicals, cheap not only in price but in the class of literature they affected. The youths of both sexes, proud in the possession of a smattering of knowledge, untrained in the exercise of discrimination or of taste, eagerly demanded "something to read," something which could be absorbed with little trouble and without much thought. The serial form of story, already familiarised to the public by the memorable monthly instalments of the "Pickwick Papers" and subsequent Dickensian masterpieces, became largely in demand. And first and foremost in the rank of literary competitors woman kept her place.

Nowadays the demand for the swiftly moving serial, with its inevitable and machine-like sensation, is not so keen. The popular taste has reverted to a quieter, more domestic form of story, and with the change the woman writer is more than ever to the fore.

The essential quality in a successful serialist is the capacity first to see a picture, and then boldly to describe it. There is little or no room for psychology; your effect must be instantaneous, your emotions simple and strong. The plot which in the ordinary nature of things partakes of the nature of a Chinese puzzle, and is responsible for all sorts of odd and startling things, need not seriously interfere with the development of character. The central figure is preferably a young girl, round whom a net of plot and counter-plot, sensation and intrigue is woven, until the reader is moved to tears on her behalf.

Tears and laughter are, indeed, the essential points of a popular serial.

"You are treating your heroine too well," said the editor of a popular weekly to an ardent serialist.

The lady suggested that she had already turned the poor girl out of her home, accused her wrongfully of theft, and made her sleep on the Embankment; but the editor was obdurate.

"She must suffer," he said with emphasis. "You've got to make your women readers cry. The girl must go through it!"

Unless a serialist can visualise the scenes and people he or she is describing, the story will fall flat. A novel written for the book market will pass muster if it be smartly written, seasoned with epigram, analytical, with page after page of moral dissection. These attributes may and do atone for lack of "grip" about the tale, the absence of emotional crises, the want of conflict, which is the soul of drama. But the serial has no room for analyses long drawn out. The story is the thing, the parts the actors play, their tears, their laughter, their ambitions, and their fears.

A serial averages in length from 52,000 words to 120,000, and is divided into instalments of from 2,000 to 5,000 words. Each instalment must end in a dramatic note of interrogation, so that the reader, racked with suspense, is lured into buying the next number—and the next. The average price per thousand some few years back was a guinea, rising, as the serialist became known and secured a particular public, to thirty shillings or two guineas. Some few writers there are—men and women—who, supreme in this particular branch of journalism, secure fancy prices, but these are not many. Nowadays the price has fallen, and writers thankfully accept from twelve to fifteen shillings per thousand words, or even less, in some cases as little as five shillings being paid.

Prolific serialists turn out six to seven stories in the year, frequently writing well over the half million words. This pace, however, cannot for long be kept up, and the serialist finds herself "written out," and must either rest for some time or turn to other departments of her profession.

And this is where, in many cases, the woman does not succeed.

A successful free lance in the newspaper world is dependent on new and arresting ideas, versatility of interest, capacity for adapting style to journals widely divergent. You may be called on to write a love story on Monday, a dramatic criticism on Tuesday, a political article the end of the week. Women, for the most part, specialise, and, apart from serials, are in the majority of instances engaged in writing articles on topics of feminine interest, fashion articles, and the like. The rate of pay in this class of work is small and the employment irregular. Those weeklies that cater specifically for the "home" are usually edited by women, but their number is not large, and the staff is limited to two or three. Of late years women have been increasingly employed on the big "dailies" and "weeklies," but their work is usually specified, and is not of the varied interest of the pressman. Women reporters are not numerous, and the number of female sub-editors in Fleet Street is astonishingly small.

A woman who desires to obtain a post on the reporting staff of a paper must have the scent for news abnormally developed, be able to stand long hours of work and periods of fatigue, and possess indomitable courage. Even then the chances are enormously against her attaining any position of importance on the reporting side, and the field for her activities in that direction is increasingly limited.

Literary work of the nature of reviews, criticisms, and articles is not largely sought by women. They tend to contribute to the weekly papers of the "snippets" order, and write brightly, cheerfully, and with consummate ease in a light "titbitian" strain. The field that gives occupation to a large proportion is research work. Careful, painstaking, and indefatigably industrious, you may find any number of them in the Reading Room of the British Museum, "devililing" and, in some instances, "ghosting" for literary lights who, having attained a reputation, are content to leave the task of gleaning their materials, and in some instances writing it up, to obscure members of the profession. Some of the women grow grey in the course of their long-drawn-out ordeal of weary years. Having once accepted research work, it is difficult to turn to other fields. The pay, if small, is sure and regular, and it needs courage and resource to face the fact that, for some little time at least, there is small hope of raising money on journalistic ventures. For—and this is one of the tragedies of Fleet Street—for men and women alike it is not enough to find a subject for a topical article and write, or even to place, it. There ensues a period of waiting for publication and payment, during which time the contributor has to exist. And, though matters in this respect have definitely improved of late years, and the number of papers who pay upon acceptance is increasing, the natural timidity of woman prevents her, even in such instances, from pressing her demand.

And this brings me to another point in the career of a writing woman. It is not the excellence of an article that ensures its acceptance so much as the personality of the contributor who offers it for sale. A woman of my acquaintance, and a most consummate journalist, wrote a series of disclosures relating to baby farming of a most startling character. She called on half a dozen editors before she could induce one of them even to consider her contributions. She was of a nervous, highly impressionable temperament, and found it terribly difficult to combat with the editorial conviction that the majority of articles by unknown contributors are not worth considering.

Interviewing friendly celebrities is a department of Press work eminently suited to feminine capacity, and the woman generally scores in this respect. Clever, for the most part, at descriptive, she is hampered in following up the story of a crime or a sensational happening by her sex, and the fact that her natural sympathies allow her emotions to colour her judgment.

Magazine writing requires a longer apprenticeship than that demanded by the weeklies. Stories and articles for the monthly periodicals call for a certain finish of technique and a literary style not often met with in contributions to the more popular type of paper. There is, indeed, a certain prejudice against "style" in some of the snippets variety. The effects must be definite, distinct, and crude black and white, with but few softening shades, and the relief of humour must be applied but sparingly. Atmospheric studies and delicate characterisation are called for by the American magazines more than the English. A subtle piece of writing is appreciated in the type of periodical that still retains something of the tradition of the New England school of literature—the school that produced Nathaniel Hawthorne, Edgar Allan Poe, and their heirs and inheritors, Walt Whitman, and, in some degree, Henry James. Having arrived at the central idea for the article or story you propose to put on paper, it is necessary to do one of two things. Either cast your effort on sufficiently broad lines to meet the requirements of a certain section of papers, periodicals, etc., or—and this is a course infinitely preferable, and one more likely to ensure definite results—the literary aspirant should select the paper that most closely appeals to her, and write the article to meet its special requirements.

It is necessary to remember that an editor is a very busy person, and that, with the best will in the world, aided by an ardent desire to discover unknown geniuses, it is impossible for him to read MSS., however clever, that are not likely to interest readers of his paper. Often a clever story, or a brilliant article, is rejected simply because the author has not thought out the particular market for which the wares are suitable. First select your paper, and read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest its aims, objects, and the topics best likely to suit its requirements. Then set to work, and, having written at your best and brightest, take a pencil and ruthlessly score out irrelevancies, however brilliant or remarkable. Then sit down and write it all over again, and, above all, pay marked attention to the opening and the closing paragraph of your effusion. For by these will the editor judge you. If you open with a "snap" and close with a swift, trenchant phrase he may read that portion that lies between the two extremes, and, if your "stuff" interests him, he may make an appointment and call on you. And then, if you are quick and clever, you will have found the opportunity you sought, for—and it is important this should be remembered—the editor is as keen for good "copy" as you are to write it. And, once you have admission to the columns of a paper, it is your own fault if you lose your footing.

With this belief firmly in my mind, I would counsel a woman with literary ambitions to content herself with writing articles and stories in her home, and leave untouched the exhausting and limited field of daily journalism; and this brings me back to the point where this article started, that the most profitable department for women is that of story writing. Certain papers have fixed rules as to their serials. Said an editor once to a new contributor: "Always remember, Miss Blank, to put your villain in patent boots, and you will let me have plenty of kisses, won't you?"

A story is told of the editor of a well-known weekly who commissioned "a religious serial with a strong bicycling interest," and within my own experience I have met with directions "to renovate my hero's finances, and remove him from Purley to Park Lane," as the aim of the proprietors of the journal in question was "to elevate the taste of their readers."

The Society of Women Journalists affords its members much useful general information as to the standing of papers, the rates of pay, etc., and I would counsel any aspirant to the writing profession to join it.

Last, but not least, the amateur should realise the golden rule that all MSS. should be typewritten, and that signs of wear and tear through the post should carefully be removed.

"Keep up your courage," said a kindly editor to a young aspirant. "Write something every day, choose your paper carefully, and be prepared to spend an entire fortune in stamps."

And I can do no better than repeat his advice—especially in regard to the stamps!

MONTAIGNE AND NIETZSCHE * * * BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

THERE is a continuity and heredity in the transmission of ideas as there is in the transmission of life. Each great thinker has a spiritual posterity, which for centuries perpetuates his doctrine and his moral personality. And there is no keener intellectual enjoyment than to trace back to their original progenitors one of those mighty and original systems which are the milestones in the history of human thought.

It is with such a spiritual transmission that I am concerned in the present paper. I would like to establish the intimate connection which exists between Montaigne and Nietzsche, between the greatest of French moralists and the greatest of Germans. A vast literature has grown up in recent years round the personality and works of Nietzsche, which would already fill a moderately sized library. It is, therefore, strange that no critic should have emphasised and explained the close filiation between him and Montaigne. It is all the more strange because Nietzsche himself has acknowledged his debt to the "Essays" with a frankness which leaves no room to doubt.

To anyone who knows how careful Nietzsche was to safeguard his originality, such an acknowledgment is in itself sufficient proof of the immense power which Montaigne wielded over Nietzsche at a decisive and critical period of his intellectual development. But only a systematic comparison could show that we have to do here with something more than a mental stimulus and a quickening of ideas, that Montaigne's "Essays" have provided the foundations of Nietzsche's philosophy, and that the Frenchman may rightly be called, and in a literal sense, the "spiritual father" of the German.

II.

At first sight this statement must appear paradoxical, and a first reading of the two writers reveals their differences rather than their resemblances. The one strikes us as essentially the sane; the other, even in his first books, reveals that lack of mental balance which was to terminate in insanity. The one is a genial sceptic; the other is a fanatic dogmatist. To Montaigne life is a comedy; to his disciple life is a tragedy. The one philosophises with a smile; the other, to use his own expression, philosophises with a hammer. The one is a Conservative; the other is a herald of revolt. The one is constitutionally moderate and temperate; the other is nearly always extreme and violent in his judgment. The one is a practical man of the world; the other is a poet and a dreamer and a mystic. The one is quaintly pedantic, and his page is often a mosaic of quotations; the other is supremely original. The one is profuse in his professions of loyalty to the Roman Catholic Church; the other calls himself Anti-Christ.

III.

There can be no doubt that if the characteristics which we have just referred to belonged essentially to Montaigne, there would be little affinity between the thought of Nietzsche and that of Montaigne. And it would be impossible to account for the magnetic attraction which drew Nietzsche to the study of the "Essays," and for the enthusiasm with which they inspired him. But I am convinced that those characteristics are not the essential characteristics. I am convinced that there is another Montaigne who has nothing in common with the Montaigne of convention and tradition. I am convinced that the scepticism, the Conservatism, the irony, the moderation, the affectation of humility, frivolity, pedantry, and innocent candour, are only a mask and disguise which Montaigne has put on to conceal his identity, that they are only so many tricks and dodges to lead the temporal and spiritual powers off the track, and to reassure them as to his orthodoxy. I am convinced that beneath and beyond the Montaigne of convention and tradition there is another much bigger and much deeper Montaigne, whose identity would have staggered his contemporaries, and would have landed him in prison. And it is this unconventional and real Montaigne who is the spiritual father of Nietzsche.

It is obviously impossible, within the limits of a brief paper, to prove this far-reaching statement and to establish the existence of an esoteric and profound meaning in the "Essays." I shall only refer to a passage which is ignored by most commentators, which has been added in the posthumous edition, in which Montaigne himself admits such a double and esoteric meaning, and which seems to me to give the key to the interpretation of the "Essays":—

"I know very well that when I hear anyone dwell upon the language of my essays, I had rather a great deal he would say nothing: 'tis not so much to elevate the style as to depress the sense, and so much the more offensively as they do it obliquely; and yet I am much deceived if many other writers deliver more worth noting as to the matter, and, how well or ill soever, if any other writer has sown things much more material, or at all events more downright, upon his paper than myself. To bring the more in, I only muster up the heads; should I annex the sequel I should trebly multiply the volume. And how many stories have I scattered up and down in this book, that I only touch upon, which, should anyone more curiously search into, they would find matter enough to produce infinite essays. Neither those stories nor my quotations always serve simply for example, authority, or ornament; I do not only regard them for the use I make of them; they carry sometimes, besides what I apply them to, the seed of a more rich and a bolder matter, and sometimes, collaterally, a more delicate sound, both to myself, who will say no more about it in this place, and to others who shall be of my humour."

IV.

The real and esoteric Montaigne is, like Nietzsche, a herald of revolt, one of the most revolutionary thinkers of all times. And the Gascon philosopher who philosophises with a smile is far more dangerous than the Teuton who philosophises with a hammer. The corrosive acid of his irony is more destructive than the violence of the other. Like Nietzsche, Montaigne transvalues all our moral values. Nothing is absolute; everything is relative. There is no law in morals.

"The laws of conscience, which we pretend to be derived from nature, proceed from custom; everyone, having an inward veneration for the opinions and manners approved and received amongst his own people, cannot, without very great reluctance, depart from them, nor apply himself to them without applause."

There is no absolute law in politics. And one form of government is as good as another.

"Such people as have been bred up to liberty, and subject to no other dominion but the authority of their own will, look upon all other forms of government as monstrous and contrary to nature. Those who are inured to monarchy do the same; and what opportunity soever fortune presents them with to change, even then, when with the greatest difficulties they have disengaged themselves from one master, that was troublesome and grievous to them, they presently run, with the same difficulties, to create another; being unable to take into hatred subjection itself."

There is no law in religion. There is no justification in patriotism. The choice of religion is not a matter of conscience or of reason, but of custom and climate. We are Christians by the same title as we are Perigordins or Germans.

V.

If to destroy all human principles and illusions is to be a sceptic, Montaigne is the greatest sceptic that ever existed. But Montaigne's scepticism is only a means to an end. On the ruin of all philosophies and religions Montaigne, like Nietzsche, has built up a dogmatism of his own. The foundation of that dogmatism in both is an unbounded faith in life and in nature. Like Nietzsche, Montaigne is an optimist. At the very outset of the "Essays" he proclaims the joy of life. He preaches the "Gaza scienza," the "fröhliche Wissenschaft." All our sufferings are due to our departing from the teachings of nature. The chapter on cannibalism, from which Shakespeare has borrowed a famous passage in "The Tempest," and which has probably suggested the character of Caliban, must be taken in literal sense. The savage who lives in primitive simplicity comes nearer to Montaigne's ideal of perfection than the philosopher and the saint.

VI.

And this brings us to the fundamental analogy between Nietzsche and Montaigne. Like the German, the Frenchman is a pure Pagan. Here again we must not be misled by the innumerable professions of faith, generally added in later editions and not included in the edition of 1580. Montaigne is uncompromisingly hostile to Christianity. His Catholicism must be understood as the Catholicism of Auguste Comte, defined by Huxley, namely, Catholicism minus Christianity. He glorifies suicide. He abhors the self-suppression of asceticism; he derides chastity, humility, mortification—every virtue which we are accustomed to associate with the Christian faith. He glorifies self-assertion and the pride of life. Not once does he express even the most remote sympathy for the heroes of the Christian Church, for the saints and martyrs. On the other hand, again and again he indulges in lyrical raptures for the achievements of the great men of Greece and Rome. He is an intellectual aristocrat. His ideal policy is the policy of the Spartans—"almost miraculous in its perfection." His ideal man is the Pagan hero—the superman of antiquity—Alcibiades, Epamenonda, Alexander, Julius Cæsar.

As we yeeld Princes all advantages of honor, so we authorize their defects and sooth-up their vices: not onely by approbation, but also by imitation. All Alexanders followers bare their heads sideling, as he did. And such as flattered Dionysius, in his owne presence did run and juttle one another, and either stumbled at, or over-threw what ever stood before their feete, to inferre; that they were as short-sighted or spurblinde, as he was. Naturall imperfections have sometimes served for commendation and favour.—From Montaigne's Essays.

SEX AND THE DRAMA

AN APPEAL TO HISTORY

By ARTHUR OWEN ORRETT

THE production of Ibsen's "Pretenders" in London raised an interesting question. Is there any future for the sexless drama? Is this sex-obsession to permeate our theatres in the future as it has in the past? Is there no room for plays of which the main-spring is ambition, or political upheaval, or financial crisis, or social wrong and economic helplessness? Have we not had enough of what Philip Madras calls "this farmyard world of sex"?

In his book, "The English Stage," Mr. D. E. Oliver, who in this voices the views of many earnest social reformers, thinks we have had enough and to spare. Says he, "The present-day advanced dramatists deal with real problems, both social and economic, whereas the Victorian dramatists were content with eternally ringing the changes upon the theme of wife, husband, and the other fellow, the usual gamut of sex-dramas," etc., etc. As instances of the improvement he gives Mr. Shaw's "Widowers' Houses," Mr. Galsworthy's "The Silver Box," "Strife," and "Justice," and Mr. Granville Barker's "The Voysey Inheritance."

This was written before the arrival of "The Eldest Son," and Mr. Oliver must now feel inclined to cry reproachfully to Mr. Galsworthy, "Et tu, Brute!" With regard to Mr. Shaw, it is only necessary to say that "Candida," the theme of which is pre-eminently that of "wife, husband, and the other fellow," is a far better play than "Widowers' Houses"; and the same remark will apply to Mr. Barker's "Waste," as compared with "The Voysey Inheritance."

So much for Mr. Oliver's particular instances. Now for his general statement. First, let it be noted that, by "Victorian dramatists" he must mean the later ones, as the typical Victorian dramatists, T. W. Robertson and the like, kept the sex-relations of their characters rigidly within the four corners of the Marriage Acts. Excluding the "old gang" of dramatists and the three I have referred to, the most notable of the advanced English playwrights of to-day and yesterday are John Masefield, Stanley Houghton, Charles McEvoy, St. John Hankin, and Arnold Bennett. Not one of these could be said to more than toy with any social or economic problem. Apart from Miss Baker, the author of "Chains," and a few well-meaning people like Lady Bell, I can't see that any dramatic author of to-day, except Mr. Galsworthy, is concerning him or her self about social problems, save when those problems are closely associated with the relations between the sexes.

This sex-obsession in drama is very noticeable in the case of those who start play-writing after success in another sphere. Nothing could be more innocuous than Mr. Jerome's novels; but when he takes to the drama he gives us "Esther Castways," purely a sex-play. Nay, even Mr. Redford, freed from his diligently performed duty of censoring sex-plays, immediately celebrates his liberty by producing one himself.

Of course, the people who demand the discussion of social and economic problems on the stage are quite distinct from the other class which raises its voice against the sex-drama; that is to say, the class which sighs for the mid-Victorian sanitary drama—healthy, clean, wholesome, pleasant, and so on.

These sighs, by the way, are not sincere, for this class of playgoer has left the theatre for good (and for the theatre's good), and if a new Tom Robertson

FOOT'S

ADJUSTABLE REST-CHAIRS.

Automatic Adjustable Back.

"THE BURLINGTON" (Patented).

Simply press a button and the back declines, or automatically rises, to any position desired by the occupant. Release the button and the back is locked.

The arms open outwards, affording easy access and exit. The Leg Rest is adjustable to various inclinations, and can be used as a footstool. When not in use it slides under the seat.

The Front Table, Electric Light Attachment, Reading Desk and Side Tray are adjustable and removable. The only chair combining these conveniences, or that is so easily adjusted.

The Upholstery is exceptionally deep, with spring elastic edges.

Catalogue C 30 of Adjustable Chairs, Free.
171, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.

Cocoa for Connoisseurs

There are many kinds of Cocoa, which vary very much in quality.

People of taste, who like "the best," even though it costs a little more than the ordinary kind, will appreciate the excellent qualities of Savory and Moore's preparation of Cocoa and Milk.

Its special features are—delicious flavour, high nutritive value, and, last but by no means least, perfect digestibility. Even those who have to deny themselves tea, coffee, and ordinary cocoa can take it with benefit and enjoyment.

Though its use is by no means to be confined to invalids, it is of great benefit in cases of weak Digestion, Nervous Exhaustion, Insomnia, etc. It is made in a moment simply by adding hot water.

TESTIMONY: "Your Cocoa and Milk is just the preparation I've been looking for, as I am unable to take tea or coffee, and do not care for the ordinary cocoas. I am glad to have discovered so nourishing a food."

Tins, 2s. 6d. and 1s. 6d., of all Chemists and Stores.

SAMPLE for 3d. POST FREE.

A Trial Tin of the Cocoa and Milk will be sent by return, post free, for 3d. Mention EVERYMAN, and address; Savory and Moore, Ltd., Chemists to The King, 143a, New Bond Street, London.

SAVORY & MOORE'S COCOA & MILK

were to arise to-morrow he would have to boil his stuff down to music-hall-sketch or cinema-scenario size; he would not wear the sanitary brigade back to the theatre were his heroes never so misunderstood, his heroines never so sweet or so harshly parented; no, not even if the kind hearts of his humble characters were a thousand times more desirable than the most dazzling coronet that ever adorned the brow of belted earl.

But let us assume, for the sake of argument, that these people are in earnest, and that they would really patronise the theatre if the fare provided were less "morbid," as they love to call it. The grounds for their demand are based on a fundamental misconception. They regard the mid-Victorian stage as normal in the history of drama, the modern sex-obsession as an episode. The facts are just the reverse. English drama was never squeamish. Shakespeare certainly was not. Nor were Webster, Tourneur, Massinger, or Beaumont and Fletcher. Everyone knows the Restoration dramatists were not; in fact, that is all the sheep-like British public does know about them, thanks to Macaulay's pharisaical diatribe. If Shakespeare were judged as Wycherley, Congreve, Farquhar, and Dryden have been judged—! But this sort of speculation is bootless. The Anglo-Saxon mind is not strong on logic; it is the type of mind which finds nothing so absurd as that a person should trouble himself about a reductio ad absurdum.

To continue. The eighteenth century was singularly barren in dramatic writing, though fertile in great actors, who, be it noted, persisted in producing and reproducing the plays of that sex-obsessed fellow, Shakespeare. Towards the close of the century came Goldsmith and Sheridan. "She Stoops to Conquer" is a play after the Victorian's own heart; but the background of the play, Marlowe's distinction between two classes of women, is—well, not "wholesome." As for Sheridan, of his two plays that still live, "The School for Scandal" is a sex-play. "The Rivals" I will present to the Victorians.

Then came the interlude, and for fifty years the English stage was in the possession of the sweet and simple maiden, the manly, but extraordinarily thick-headed, young hero, the stern parent, the comic, yet faithful, servant, the unmitigated and generally immaculate villain, and—most important of all—the happy ending. It might be called the era of the sausage-drama, for in whatever condition the characters went into the machine, they always came out the same way—paired-off and prosperous, with the villain hanged, transported, or penitent. This was the sort of stuff served up by Dion Boucicault, Tom Taylor, H. J. Byron, Clement Scott, T. W. Robertson, Lord Lytton, W. G. Wills, and their imitators. Would anyone in his senses exchange these purveyors of nothingness for Pinero, Jones, Shaw, Barrie, Barker, Galsworthy—or even for a single one of them?

Yet all is not well with the art of writing plays. Our authors have willy-nilly been forced to the conclusion that the sex-motive is normal in drama; other motives are exceptional. This is because sex-crises are more abrupt and vivid than any others, and their effects are more widely diffused; besides which, they are almost universal in their appeal, so that they lend themselves to drama as no other subject can. Yet how few writers dare to go to the kernel! They find all sorts of sex-problems that never existed, and those that stare them in the face they will not look at. Take Sir Arthur Pinero; he is a superb craftsman, and no writer has been more teachable or amenable to progressive influences. It is a far cry from "Sweet Lavender" to "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," and it is a still farther cry from "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" to "Mid-Channel." Yet one cannot help thinking that Sir Arthur Pinero's view of life is restricted and conventional, and at times he seems wilfully blind to difficulties of vast importance. For instance, when the curtain finally falls on "His House in Order" we are quite in the dark as to what will become of the son of Annabel and Maurewardie in the house of Annabel's husband and his second wife.

Mr. Jones is much worse; in fact, he is almost impossible. He jumped from "The Silver King" to "The Middleman" and "The Triumph of the Philistines," and then he descended to "Whitewashing Julia," "The Heroic Stubbs," and other negligible and occasionally tedious trifles.

Neither Sir Arthur Pinero nor Mr. Jones has the courage (or the vision, if you prefer it) of Mr. Shaw. But even Mr. Shaw's courage (or vision) fails him in "Candida." He pits Marchbanks against Morell; but are not Candida's children more important than either of these? and there is hardly a word of them.

In "The Last of the De Mullins" the late Mr. St. John Hankin treated the problem of illegitimacy with much apparent boldness, but by making the mother an exceptionally able woman he burked the issue also. Mr. Granville Barker faces one aspect of the case in "Waste," and is promptly censored. Mr. Haddon Chambers settles the matter with astounding frankness in an otherwise mid-Victorian play, "Passers-by." But Mr. Galsworthy, who might have thrown real light on the subject in "The Eldest Son," chooses instead to follow Mr. Stanley Houghton's "Hindle Wakes" in an excursion into the melodrama of contrariety.

Still, there has been progress. Out of the play that was ill in every respect came the play that was at least well made. Out of the well-made play (with a little assistance, generally unacknowledged, from Norway) came the pompous tendency play. Out of the tendency play came the play in which serious problems were discussed "with nimbleness and wit," as one critic puts it. The drama of every age and every nation has treated mainly of sex, and if you kill the sex-drama the whole art perishes. The only question is the quality of this drama. We want a dramatist in England to-day who will seize the material at his hand and use it unflinchingly and remorselessly—but never forgetting the golden rule that in order to be serious it is not necessary to be solemn.

THE FAIR ASSURANCE.

SHINE out, young soul, shine out with burning light:

Let not the craftsman's care thine ardour cool;

Let art be to thee ever as a tool

Fashioning metal that itself is bright.

To exercise their wits let dullards write;

But, having seen, oh, let no prating fool

House thine imagination in his school,

Shutting the gates of vision on thy sight!

What though the world seem lapt with sluggish greed,

In deepest midnight be thou as the rift

Rayed by the moon when, cloud-pent, she doth climb.

Yea, this believe: the unborn ages need

That little light 'tis thine alone to lift

High in the unilluminated night of time.

MAX PLOWMAN.

THE NEW FEATHER-WEIGHT TYPEWRITER

FOR THE TRAVELLER AND THE HOME.

ONE WEEK'S TRIAL FREE AT YOUR OWN HOME.

Try to think of a bright, strong, and compact little Machine, weighing but 5 lb., all packed in a handy little leather case, with compartments for your stationery, stamps, etc., and you may be able to form an idea of the new and wonderful little Aluminium "Blick" typewriter, which has already found its way into the Dressing Cases of many travelling men and women.

When one considers that the ordinary typewriter weighs from 20 to 30 pounds, one almost marvels at the compactness, soundness, and durability of this wonderful machine, which, for clear, rapid, and perfect writing, stands without a rival, even when classed with the heavy office typewriters that cost twice and thrice as much. Another advantage of the new Feather-weight "Blick" is that there is a complete absence of the messy ribbon. But the convenience of its portability is one of its strongest points—that's why the Clergy, War Correspondents, Military Men, Journalists, and Commercial Travellers have so rapidly adopted the new Aluminium "Blick," which is always bright and ready for use. It cannot tarnish.

The New Aluminium "Blick" Typewriter, showing its handsome leather case with compartments for stationery.

You can use it at your office, and when that's closed you place your "Blick" in your bag, and take it home as easily as you would a book, and there you have it handy, so that your sister, wife, or brother can assist you in typing your notes, correspondence, compositions, statements, or whatever you may require. So simple is it to use the "Blick" that many ladies of title and others have purchased them for use by their maids when travelling, and in their Boudoirs.

The operating of the "Blick" is simplicity itself. Any one and every one can learn its keyboard and mechanism in one hour. It is simply a matter of a little practice to acquire the speed of an expert. The Company also guarantee to teach every purchaser of a "Blick" in the United Kingdom to use it.

A WEEK'S FREE TRIAL.

So sure are the makers that this new and bright Aluminium "Blick" will please every one who sees it (and who does not need its service?) that they are prepared to send it to you at their expense and risk for one week's free trial. If you like it you keep it (and if you see it and use it you will); otherwise you return it, and there is no obligation or charge.

The Aluminium "Blick" (Booklet No. 10), which tells all about the machine, will be sent you post free on request. The Address is—The "Blick" Typewriter Co., Ltd., 9 and 10, Cheapside, London, E.C.; or you can write to the West End Branch, 369, Oxford Street, London. Those requiring the week's free trial at home should write at once, as all applications are taken strictly in rotation.

JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU, 1712-1778 * * BY E. HERMANN

FEW students of the "Confessions" and of "Emile" but have at some time or other—probably many times—stood before Rousseau's portrait and questioned the dead face concerning the living soul that baffles our analysis most when it most nakedly reveals itself. But the painted features hold no clue to the problem, and the many critical theories and interpretations which have gathered round it have left its central darkness unilluminated. Time was when we interpreted Rousseau in terms of Puritan morality; to-day we interpret him in terms of pathological psychology. Once we condemned him as a particularly repulsive and moral delinquent; now we study him as a particularly interesting psychiatric patient. And while the latter view is the saner and juster, neither of the two covers all the facts.

I.

It does not take a very keen psychological insight to tell us that Rousseau was a neuropath, that he was afflicted with a fatal moral astigmatism, that he bore an unsound mind in an infirm body. But the astounding paradox remains, that out of that warped character and flawed mind there came thoughts and words that changed the face of European sentiment and culture—seminal thoughts that fructified in the greatest minds of every nation; magic words that touched dead souls to vital issues. It is true, of course, that there was "Rousseauism" before Rousseau; but in him it became articulate and operative. "But that is what you have proved already," was said to Buffon when Rousseau uttered himself on the duty of mothers to nurse their own children. "Yes," was the answer; "we all proved it, but Jean Jacques commands, and is obeyed." And the secret of Rousseau's compelling power was not only in the magic of his style; it lay in that inalienable spiritual birthright which a superficial psychology cheerfully classes with neurasthenia and satyriasis among "pathological phenomena." Within the tenebrous mesh of warring passions and morbid tendencies, the spirit of the man moved in a mysterious way; and where the mere laboratory-psychologist is interested in the mesh, the man of spiritual insight is interested in the triumph of the ensnared spirit, and reads the enigma in the light of that triumph.

II.

To run over the leading features of Rousseau's life is to be plunged into mournful wonder that a spirit so world-moving and enriching should have stained itself with so many sordid and ignoble deeds. We read of his petty theft of a ribbon, and his falsely accusing a young maidservant of the act to the ruin of her character; of his leaving a friend and benefactor sick upon the road; of his nauseous intrigues with women; of his callous abandonment of his own children, and of many delinquencies more. Our faith in the depth of his religion is shaken by his calculating "conversion"; our very sense of pity is dulled by the sordidness of his misfortunes. We see him sitting at his unhomely hearth, with the brutishly stupid Thérèse on one side of him, and her malignantly rapacious mother on the other, and our compassion is tinged with contempt. We read his sophisticated explanation of his unnatural act of child-abandonment, and censure is added to contempt. We are alienated and repelled.

III.

But here it were well to stop and remember that we would be comparatively ignorant of these dishonour-ing and disillusionising facts but for Rousseau himself. What other soul has stripped itself naked before us with such deliberate and appalling thoroughness? We may criticise the accuracy of the "Confessions"; we may deny Rousseau's veracity. It is not dry life he gives us: it is life seen through a temperament—through the singular and chromatic medium of his soul—but for that very reason it is life seen with essentially sincere eyes. And, once we have overcome our natural and (one feels) just repugnance to his incontinent lust of self-communication, we cannot deny this fundamental sincerity, which glimmers even through his specious arguments in defence of his abandonment of his children. For he sets down these arguments only to refute them in the same breath by repeated expressions of penitence and remorse. And it must be remembered that even in this blackest of all his misdeeds he stands above many of his contemporaries. They abandoned their children, and afterwards exalted their crime into a social theory. He saw it so heinous that penitence ever burst through his attempts at extenuation, and he wrote "Emile"—the apotheosis of parental duty—after he had done the deed, thereby courting the charge of hypocrisy.

IV.

Sometimes one falls to wondering if Rousseau was congenitally the degenerate some psychologists make him out to be. The picture he has drawn of his early training and his apprentice days justifies a doubt. What child born with a preponderance of the sensuous and emotional could have developed normally under a father who sat up most of the night reading emotional and erotic fiction with him, and abandoned him at the age of eight to fall into even more ignorant hands? If a normal, tough-fibred child could hardly escape from developing into a liar, a thief, and a vagabond under such conditions, what could be expected from a boy who came into the world with a congenital disease and a neurasthenic habit which acutely intensified certain perilous propensities? Speculations are idle here; but a cocksure diagnosis is still more so.

V.

It remains that a great man must ultimately be judged, not by the microcosm of his life, but by the macrocosm of his influence. It was Rousseau, the demoralised and distraught, who wrote the sanest, most original and most influential treatise on education ever penned—a book which, so the tale goes, lost the impeccable Kant his reputation for punctuality, so absorbed was he in reading "Emile." It was Rousseau who sent the clarion call of social sentiment from one end of Europe to the other. Does any man toss in sleepless anguish because his brother men swarm, starving and unsheltered, about his doors? It was Rousseau who first forced the age to listen to the cry of the poor. Was he the storm-petrel of revolution? He was no less the herald of the Catholic reaction. What great writer of any nation, from his day till now, has remained untouched by his influence? It would be hard to name one. The most enigmatic, as well as, perhaps, the most potent force in the world of modern thought, with the lovable and the repulsive, the pitiable and the blameworthy, strangely intermingled in his abnormal nature, Rousseau stands, above all, as an epoch-maker, an influence of rarely unparalleled power and range.

First in 1847—Foremost in 1913.

Bohn's Popular Library

The pioneer Series of Cheap Reprints in new and distinctive format.

One Shilling Net

First list of 20 Volumes. Just published. At all Booksellers.

Strongly bound in Cloth.

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1. Swift (Jonathan)—Gulliver's Travels. | 11. Fielding (Henry) — Joseph Andrews. |
| 24. Motley (J. L.)—Rise of the Dutch Republic. | 12-13. Cervantes—Don Quixote. |
| 5-6. Emerson (R. W.)—Works: Vol. I.—Essays (1st and 2nd Series) and Representative Men. | 14. Calverley (C.S.)—The Idylls of Theocritus with the Eclogues of Virgil. |
| Vol. II.—English Traits, Nature and Conduct of Life. | 15. Burney (Fanny)—Evelina. |
| 7-8. Burton (Sir Richard)—Pilgrimage to Al-madinah and Meccah. | 16. Coleridge (S. T.)—Aids to Reflection. |
| 9. Lamb (Charles)—Essays. | 17-18. Goethe—Poetry and Truth from my own Life. |
| 10. Hooper (George)—Waterloo, The Downfall of the First Napoleon. | 19. Ebers' Egyptian Princess. |
| | 20. Arthur Young's Travels in France. |

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefulest thing I know."—CARLYLE.

"Bohn's Libraries have done for literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse."—EMERSON.

"Reprints of standard works which no gentleman's library should be without."—Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON.

Write to-day for a copy of the prospectus containing a history of the famous Bohn's Libraries from their inauguration to the present day.

G. BELL AND SONS, LTD
Portugal Street, London, W.C.

THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER'S ASSURANCE.

Readers of "Everyman" are desired to specially note that all advertisements which appear in this publication are the announcements of reputable firms, consequently no one need hesitate to communicate with any of our advertisers.

The Advertisement Manager is prepared to investigate the complaint of any reader, should cause for the same arise at any time.

A Valuable Book

We have compiled a little Book entitled "The Uses of Card Index Signals," which is simply invaluable to all business men. It is replete with explanatory diagrams, and treats this important subject in a more thorough and easily understood manner than has ever been done before.

For 4d. Post Free.

We will send a copy of this book, with samples of Signals, to any reader of EVERYMAN sending 4d. in stamps, but as the edition is limited we advise you to apply at once.

TAPP & TOOTHILL, LTD.,
27, Warwick Lane, London, E.C.

THE Art Treasures OF Great Britain

Edited by C. H. COLLINS-BAKER

1/- NET
MONTHLY

1/- NET
MONTHLY

A series designed with a view to providing the art-lover with a representative collection of beautiful reproductions of the Art Treasures of Great Britain. Each plate is accompanied by a descriptive, critical note by the editor.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"It goes without saying that the pictures have been admirably reproduced, and the printing and general get up of the work maintain the well-known traditions of the publishing house from which it comes."

CONTENTS OF PART 3.

- Portrait of a Man - Titian
- Nativity Piero della Francesca
- Landscape - Canaletto
- Countess of Salisbury Reynolds
- The Blind Girl - Millais
- Breaking the Clod - Cotman
- Apollo - Rouen Faience

Please send for Prospectus.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,
137, Aldine House, Bedford St., W.C.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

W. M. THACKERAY'S "VANITY FAIR" * * * BY JOHN K. PROTHERO

ONE of the giants of the early Victorian age of literature, William Makepeace Thackeray, attained the zenith of his powers in "Vanity Fair." The author himself realised it was his greatest work, and, secure in the belief of its ultimate triumph, patiently endured its rejection at the hands of publisher after publisher, until at the end it was accepted at a price phenomenal at that time in publishing annals. The novel, from the point of view of technique, is not so well constructed as "Henry Esmond," and there are moments when the author's "asides" to the reader hamper the progress of the tale to an irritating extent. But in spite of minor criticisms, "Vanity Fair" towers above the rest of Thackeray's writings, and exists as a permanent landmark in the field of literature.

Supreme in satire, with a pen that hits off in a phrase the foibles of a fop, the hypocrisies of a sect, in dealing with simple and unaffected souls Thackeray shows an unexpected breadth of sympathy and clarity of vision.

Becky, the brilliant adventuress, outplays Amelia, sweeping her off the stage by sheer force of vitality, and the contrast between the vividness of the woman who has to make her way in the world and the vacillation of Amelia, who was born to be looked after, obviously influences judgment in her behalf. But—and herein lies that supreme sense of literary justice that characterises your great creative artist—while he permits you to feel angry, impatient, even bored with Emmy during her period of prosperity, he shows you the innate tenderness of the weak yet loyal woman, her capacity for endurance, her almost inhuman powers of sacrifice, when, after George Osborne's death, she goes home to the old father and mother, who have lost all their money and position, and are reduced to the pitiable condition of having to keep up appearances on an entirely inadequate income.

Never did any author state the case for two women, each urged by the most intimate affections, each true to their ideals, and by reason of their fidelity unable to do justice to the other. Poor old Sedley, by rash speculations, has gamed away his fortune, and, his pride crushed, is thankful for the contributions Amelia can afford towards the upkeep of the household. The young widow, anxious for her boy, determined if possible to shield him from the seamy side of poverty, screws and saves from the modest sum she reserves from her allowance, eager to buy him clothes and toys, and to afford him the education she thinks suitable for his position—the position, poor soul! she feels the son of George Osborne is entitled to take—and, in her humility and devotion, she engenders those faults in the boy that made his father grow up so vain and despicable a creature.

And all the time Mrs. Sedley, the wife, watches the manœuvres of Amelia, the mother, with anger and resentment. It is not for herself she grudges the small luxuries given to George. She has learnt to go without those things that at one time appeared essential to her comfort. Her bitterness is on behalf of her husband—the broken man, who risked and lost her home, but for whom she still has a pitying, a tender, a passionate affection. Even when she discovers that the unfortunate Sedley has bartered away the annuity allowed them by their son Jos, on a mad scheme of speculation which engulfs him in a worse position than before, she has no word of blame for any but Amelia. Why should the boy have fine clothes and pocket-money when her poor husband has to go without a pipe of tobacco? The situation reaches its climax when Amelia, realising her family are in even harder straits than she supposed, sells the shawl that Dobbin, her faithful lover and devoted friend, gave her in happier days. She spends a part of the money on books for George. Mrs. Sedley encounters her in the passage, the prized volumes in her arms.

"Books!" cried the elder lady indignantly. 'Books! when, to keep you and your son in luxury and your dear father out of gaol, I've sold every trinket I had—the Indian shawl from my back—even down to the very spoons! . . . Oh, Amelia, you break my heart with your books and that boy of yours, whom you are ruining, though part with him you will not!'"

Hysterical sobs and cries end Mrs. Sedley's speech, and Amelia, broken in spirit, her power of resistance snapped, yields to the force of circumstance and parts with her boy, sends him to his grandfather Osborne, who from the beginning has decried her, who bitterly opposed her marriage with his son, and, now that that son is dead, vents on her all his grief and anger against fate. She sends her child, knowing he will hear no good word spoken on her behalf, no plea for tenderness, no reminder that for him she has sacrificed so much. And, having done this, she makes no word of complaint, but remains in the narrow home with the old people, dutiful and sacrificial to the last.

Thackeray's genius responds swiftly to the spur of dramatic effect. With a few graphic touches he brings a picture vividly before you—witness his marvellous descriptive of the effect of the first shot heard in the city of Brussels on the eve of Waterloo:—

"But all of a sudden Isidor started, and the Major's wife laid down her knife and fork. The windows of the room were open, and looked southward, and a dull, distant sound came over the sun-lighted roofs from that direction. . . . 'God defend us; it's cannon!' Mrs. O'Dowd cried. She started up and followed, too, to the window. A thousand pale and anxious faces might have been seen looking from other casements. And presently it seemed as if the whole population of the city rushed into the streets."

The concluding phrase carries supreme effect. Every word falls like the thud of a hammer. One sees and feels and hears the tramping feet, the white faces, the seething crowd, urged on with the desperate speed of frantic and unreasoning fear.

What Thackeray achieves in dealing with a crowd he does with equal success in handling those situations that involve two or three characters only. The immortal interview between Becky, Rawdon (her husband), and Lord Steyne is written with consummate skill. No padding here; each phrase keen, rapier-like, piercing to the very quick of drama, laying bare the nerves of the heart and the soul. Like lightning he passes from the objective method—wherein he shows the scene from a spectacular standpoint—to the subjective, and cuts open Becky's shallow vanity with a master stroke.

Rawdon, it will be remembered, has come straight from the sponging house, where, by the connivance of Steyne, he has been held under arrest. By the help of his sister-in-law, Lady Jane, he is released, and returns to find his wife, ablaze with diamonds, alone in the house with Lord Steyne. "A little table with a dinner was laid out—and wine and plate. Steyne was hanging over the sofa on which Becky sat. . . . He had her hand in his, and was bowing over it to kiss it, when Becky started up with a faint scream as she caught sight of Rawdon's white face." In the scene that follows, when Rawdon Crawley triumphantly vindicates the author's faith in his creation, Becky remains appalled, fascinated by her husband's domination of the scene. "He struck the peer twice over the face with his open hand, and flung him, bleeding, to the ground. It was all done before Rebecca could interpose. She stood there trembling before him. She admired her husband—strong, brave, and victorious."

One of the most poignant touches in the whole of this wonderful scene is when Rawdon, going through Becky's desk, discovers a pocket-book full of bank-notes. "Some of these were dated ten years back, and one was quite a fresh one—a note for a thousand pounds, which Lord Steyne had given her." And the husband, remembering all the slights he had incurred on her behalf, the career that he had sacrificed, the devoted belief and adherence and support that he had given her, shrinks back from this last most treacherous blow. She had let him be arrested and never cared; suffered him to eat his heart out in a sordid sponging-house, and not troubled. "You might have spared me a hundred pounds, Becky, out of all this—I have always shared with you."

Becky has nothing to say; she can only repeat her parrot cry of innocence. "Was she guilty or not? She said not; but who could tell what was truth that came from those lips, or if that corrupt heart was in this case pure? All her lies and her schemes, all her selfishness and her wiles, all her wit and genius had come to this bankruptcy."

With a last terrible touch Thackeray drops the curtain. Becky is left to the care of the French maid, who was her accomplice, and in Steyne's pay. In all the world she, who had known so many friends, had met with such unmerited kindness, had only this woman to turn to. And the measure Becky had meted to others was ruthlessly shown to her. "The woman closed the curtains, and, with some entreaty and show of kindness, persuaded her mistress to lie down on the bed. Then she went below and gathered up the trinkets, which had been lying on the floor since Rebecca dropped them, at her husband's orders, and Lord Steyne went away."

The end of Becky is too familiar to be more than briefly touched on here. A smaller man, a less consummate genius, would inevitably have shown us the adventuress reduced to a pitiable pass. He would have painted her on a death-bed, racked with hunger, or shown her in a last spasm of hypocritical repentance. Thackeray was too great for this. A glimpse of Becky's less prosperous days is shown us in the description of her foreign lodgings, with the bottle of brandy thrust under the soiled pillow of the untidy bed, and the plate of beef upon the dressing-table. But in the ultimate she returns again, as women of her unconquerable vitality and supreme egotism must always return, to smooth waters, and we catch a last glimpse of her presiding at a fashionable stall of a charity bazaar.

Amelia's weakness, her futile grasping at shadows, the mild but inveterate obstinacy which refused to recognise her mistakes and hopelessly obscured from her the realisation of Dobbin's value, is revealed in a master-stroke. When, after years of vacillation and a placid acceptance of his generosity, she finally sends for him, it is almost too late. She has outworn even the fidelity of that generous heart, and all her life one feels that she is haunted by regret she had not found out his worth before.

One closes the book with a feeling that there has been revealed to us such a pageant of emotion—human endeavour and ambition, human failure and human love—as is unsurpassed in its strength and tenderness throughout the whole of English literature.

"THE BILL," BY MRS. GEORGE CORNWALLIS WEST

Produced by Mr. Alfred Waring at the Royalty, Glasgow.

SINCE "The Bill" is a comedy of politics, written by a lady whose intimacy with the inside working of both parties will not readily be questioned, it is inevitable that it should be judged by standards differing somewhat from those applied to the ordinary play by the relatively commonplace person. It has something of the interest of direct revelation, so that there is a spice of adventure even in its anticipation. We look, perhaps, for a glimpse of greatness in deshabillé, with the lurking hope that, if the gods will, there may be a hint of the imagined feet of clay which we cherish as a sop to mediocrity.

Of course, Mrs. West makes no startling disclosures. She does not undertake a critical analysis of our existing system: she passes no judgment on it, good or bad. She attempts no examination of politics in the abstract; she is content to take the game as she knows it, and to deal with it primarily in its human aspect. Round John Lamson's Universal Suffrage Bill she groups the various individuals most closely interested in its progress; and her main concern is to show how the fate of even a great administrative project may be bound up with the intimate personal relations of its originators and its opponents—and that quite legitimately and naturally.

The play contains a medley of detail affecting the protagonists in the action, a web of circumstance in which coincidence and the rather conventional device of an indiscreet letter have no small part, and a great deal of sparkling, witty, and clean-cut dialogue. Even the irrelevancies have a charm of their own, and are touched in with a kindly and humorous pen. The characters are natural and understandable humans; and the plain man, quite irrespective of party bias, will take comfort from the best of Mrs. West's portraits, that of old John Lamson, President of the Local Government Board—a sturdy, single-minded Radical, with all the passion and honesty of deep conviction.

"The Bill" would have been marked as the work of a clever and sympathetic writer even had Mrs. West taken refuge in a nom de guerre. There is no straining after "greatness" or undue subtlety; but the play is always interesting, and is far from a lack of strong dramatic situations. In short, it has all the elements of a popular success, and it will be no surprise if the appreciation of Glasgow is repeated in London.

While it is evident that Mrs. West is conscious of many inconsistencies and anomalies in political life, it is equally clear that she has succeeded in remaining a convinced optimist, despite all her dread "inside" knowledge—and many of us will thank heaven for that!

N. W. D.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKSA SURVEY OF WOMAN'S PROBLEM.

From the German of ROSA MAYREDER by H. SCHEFFAUER. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

WITH the TURKS in THRACE.

By E. ASHMEAD BARTLETT. Illustrated and with Map. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

PAUL I. OF RUSSIA: The Son of Catherine the Great.

By K. WALISZEWSKI. Royal 8vo. 15s. net.

NEWEST NOVELS 6s.THE LIFE MASK.

By the Author of "He Who Passed"

THE WEAKER VESSEL - - - E. F. BensonGROWING PAINS - - - - - Ivy LowJOURNEY'S END (John Christopher IV.) Romain RollandMINNA (By the Author of "The Pilgrim Kamanita")

Karl Gjellerup

GUTTER BABIES (Illustrated by Lady Stanley)

Dorothea Slade

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO? (2nd Imp.)

Elizabeth Robins

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY

Edited by T. E. PAGE, M.A., and W. H. D. ROUSE, Litt.D.

A SERIES OF GREEK AND LATIN TEXTS, WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION ON THE OPPOSITE PAGE.

Mr. Heinemann will be glad to send full particulars of the 20 volumes to be published in 1913; 5 new volumes ready next week; also list of volumes already published and of those projected.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

THE THIRD EDITION IS READY—of LADY RIDLEY'S Great Romance
OF COUNTRY-HOUSE LIFE.*MARGERY FYTTON

"As a picture of the country-house life her book, in a different way, is scarcely less effective than Mr. Galsworthy's."

—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"All who read it will be thrilled by the story and fascinated by the minuteness and delicacy of the portraiture."—PUNCH.

HAVE YOU YET READ

THE NIGHT NURSE

By the author of "THE SURGEON'S LOG"

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE SAYS THAT NOT SINCE HENLEY HAVE WE HAD SUCH GRAPHIC PICTURES OF HOSPITAL LIFE, and adds that the book is "an enthralling love story . . . full of vivacity and humour."

THE ENGLISH BRET HARTE—vide the Press

THE FOURTH EDITION IS READY OF

THE GOLDEN WOMAN

By RIDGWELL CULLUM

Author of "Watchers of the Plains," etc., etc.

"Mr. Cullum is a practised hand; he knows his material thoroughly, and the result is a living picture of the animalism of the bog as well as of the beast of prey that obtains in a diggers' camp. Mr. Cullum has a powerful imagination, and his descriptions of Nature in convulsions are vivid and moving . . . an absorbing story."—PALL MALL GAZETTE

MISS VIOLET A. SIMPSON'S LATEST NOVEL

THE BEACON WATCHERS

is described by "The Times" as "A remarkable story."

"A novel of uncommon attraction," says "Country Life" of MISS ELLA MACMAHON'S NEW STORYTHE DIVINE FOLLY

"Excellent managed by a forcible and competently equipped student of character, who, with her people well in hand, and her plot the natural outcome of their various temperaments, makes every claim for our gratitude to her for a sound and able piece of good work."

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD.

LITERARY NOTES

PROFESSOR EDWARD DOWDEN'S death closes a career of great literary distinction. Combining sound and extensive scholarship with a highly developed critical faculty, Dr. Dowden was for many years held in high esteem by all who are interested in the serious side of literature. On whatever subject he wrote, one might look with confidence for distinction in thought and expression, spacious culture, and for what Mathew Arnold called the note of "high seriousness." But it is as a masterly Shakespearean critic that he has earned our gratitude most.

* * * * *

Professor Dowden's "Shakespeare, his Mind and Art," published when he was only thirty-two, is admittedly one of the most penetrating expositions of the genius of the dramatist ever penned. Along with his brilliant "Shakespeare Primer," which ran through many editions and was honoured by translation into several foreign tongues, it gave an impulse to Shakespearean study which has been felt ever since. It is not too much to say that no book on Shakespeare has been written during the last thirty years which does not exhibit to some extent the influence of Professor Dowden.

* * * * *

But Dr. Dowden excelled in many directions. His biography of Shelley is a masterpiece of insight and painstaking research, and can never be superseded, while the history of French literature which he contributed to Mr. Gosse's Literatures of the World series is in certain respects the most satisfactory survey of the literature of our near neighbours available to English readers. And in saying this I am not unmindful of the excellent monographs of Professor Saintsbury and Emile Faguet. Dr. Dowden also gave us a number of admirable volumes of literary essays, and editions of Shelley, Wordsworth, and Southey which are widely used. Nor ought I to forget his brief critical biography of the latter poet, one of the very best pieces of literary work he ever did.

* * * * *

I had occasion to remark some time ago on the curious fact that many American ambassadors are men of letters in disguise. Representatives to the Court of St. James have, almost without exception, had some connection with literature. Dr. Walter Hines Page, of New York, who succeeds Mr. Whitelaw Reid, is another notable addition to the list of literary ambassadors. Formerly literary adviser to a well-known American publishing firm and now member of another, Dr. Page should worthily maintain the literary tradition. Two of the foremost American magazines—the Forum and the Atlantic Monthly—have in bygone years been under his editorial control, and now he shapes the destinies of the New York World's Work. One volume also stands to Dr. Page's credit, "The Rebuilding of Old Commonwealths."

* * * * *

The late Lord Archibald Campbell, brother of the Duke of Argyll, dabbled in literature and was something of a poet. "Reveries" was the title of a charming little volume of verse which he published in 1902, while his devotion to the preservation of the ancient lore of the Highlands was signalled by a handsome volume, "The Records of Argyll," which saw the light in 1885. He was also the author of "Waifs and Strays of Celtic Tradition," "Notes on Swords from the Battlefield of Culloden," "Highland Dress, Arms, and Ornament," "Armada Cannon," "Children of the Mist"—rather a miscellaneous assortment, but clearly showing where Lord Archibald's literary interests lay.

* * * * *

Miss Betham-Edwards, who has given us so many delightful books, notably those on France and its people, has recently performed a literary feat which, if not unique, must be singularly rare. She has revised her first book, "The White House by the Sea," for re-issue after fifty-six years. One has difficulty in crediting the fact that this book, which Messrs. Collins have just issued in sixpenny form, actually appeared two years before "Adam Bede." It was then published by Messrs. Smith, Elder in two volumes at a guinea. Subsequently the same firm issued cheap editions at three and sixpence and two shillings. Then Baron Tauchnitz added "The White House by the Sea" to his collection, and now the work has been given a new lease of life in sixpenny form.

* * * * *

This week will witness the issue of the first twenty volumes of "Bohn's Popular Library"—an old friend in a new dress. Some sixty years have elapsed since Henry George Bohn began the issue at a popular price of the valuable series of literary masterpieces associated with his name. He was the real pioneer of the movement for publishing good literature at a low price, and I am glad to learn that the reappearance of his "Library" is being encouraged in a very practical way. The publishers intended to inaugurate their venture a fortnight ago, but so great was the demand for the first twenty volumes that they were compelled to postpone the date of publication.

* * * * *

Actors as a rule are rather indifferent authors, but if they are distinguished in their art, and write about it, their books generally meet with a ready sale. I have just seen the list of contents of a volume which Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree is publishing through Messrs. Cassell. "Thoughts and Afterthoughts"—rather a felicitous title—consists of a collection of the accomplished actor's lectures and essays. There will be many who will wish to read the matured opinions of Sir Herbert concerning "The Humanity of Shakespeare," "Henry VIII.," "Hamlet—from an Actor's Prompt Book," "Some Interesting Fallacies of the Modern Stage," and so on.

* * * * *

There was a time when the publication of a translation of Goethe's original manuscript of "Wilhelm Meister" would have created widespread interest, but that day has long since gone by. Goethe's influence has appreciably declined in this country since Carlyle's death, and I doubt if the number of Goethe enthusiasts in the United Kingdom would fill a moderately sized hall. Goethe lost the original draft of his "Wilhelm Meister," and it was not until a year or so ago that the manuscript was discovered by accident in Germany. It is this version, which varies considerably from that with which the reading public has so long been familiar, that Mr. Heinemann is publishing next week. The translation has been made by Mr. Gregory Page.

* * * * *

Lady Hall, whose husband, Sir John Richard Hall, of Dunglass, has just succeeded his uncle in the baronetcy, is the great-granddaughter of Dr. Duncan, minister of Ruthwell parish, Dumfriesshire, the founder of savings banks in Scotland. Lady Hall some time ago published a monograph on her distinguished ancestor through Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier.

X. Y. Z.

THE TIMES BOOK CLUB

The Largest Bookshop in the World.

All the best Books, English and Foreign, in every department of literature, at the lowest prices charged by any bookseller.

Enquiries Invited for Rare Books, First Editions, and Out-of-Print Books.

ANY OF THE FOLLOWING POST FREE ON REQUEST.

- Catalogue of Newly-published Books.
- Annotated Catalogue of Second-hand and New Books at greatly reduced prices.
- Classified Catalogue of The Best Books on all subjects, at lowest cash prices.
- Catalogue of Books in Beautiful Bindings, suitable for presentation.
- Catalogues of Books in leading Foreign languages.
- Catalogue of the best Books for Boys and Girls.
- Catalogue of Stationery and Library requisites.

Bookbinding of Every Description.

AN UNEQUALLED CIRCULATING LIBRARY

(PARTICULARS ON APPLICATION.)

Orders by post receive immediate attention. Free delivery within the United Kingdom of parcels of books to the value of 20s.

376 to 384, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

Capital  £50,050

COAL

SAVE 3/- per ton.

ASSOCIATED COAL CONSUMERS, LTD.,
 19, 21, 23, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.
A COMBINE OF THE PUBLIC.

Write for booklet explaining the scheme, and giving much useful information to householders.

* Special London Prices. Qualities Guaranteed.	Per ton.	Leading London Merchants' Prices.	Saving.
Best Yorkshire Selected	26/2	29/-	2/10
Best Selected House ...	25/9	29/-	3/3
Best Main Brights ...	24/5	27/-	2/7
Best Kitchen ...	23/6	27/-	3/6
Hard Kitchen Cobbles	21/4	25/-	3/8

* Members have still lower prices.
 Prices quoted (per truck loads) any station, England, Scotland or Wales.

This Coupon carries a Special Discount of 1/- per ton on a trial order (London or Country).

EM.11.4.13.

50 Scholarships in Free-Lance Journalism

Open to "Everyman" Readers without Entrance Fee.

The openings in Journalism are more numerous, more interesting, and above all more lucrative than most people realise. As a spare-time hobby or a regular occupation, you can earn from 7s. 6d. to £2 2s. an hour if you know what to write and where to sell articles, gossip, short stories, and the interesting little paragraphs which constitute one-quarter of the contents of dailies and weeklies.

A young lady friend of the present writer, of 22 years of age, who began to work for the press 3 years ago, now earns the comfortable income of £2,000 a year. She had no introductions or influence; her success is solely the result of her knowing how to do just the work that's wanted. She works no harder than the average woman teacher, but she makes every stroke of her pen tell, and every Editor she works for knows exactly what to expect from her; he knows she is in every way dependable.

To do interesting and profitable work necessitates the following qualifications:—

1. Common sense.
2. A knack (cultivated) of seeing the interesting side of things.
3. A knowledge of everyday language is more important than "fine writing" and the pedantic "prize essay" style.
4. Practical Training in Press Work.

The latter is now offered for the first time to the 50 Everyman readers who show sufficient aptitude for the work to make it worth while to train them at the nominal terms offered. You can earn while you learn in your spare time, for a Home Study Course of training is entirely by correspondence. The Course is personally conducted by a successful Author-Journalist of International reputation.

You will be in a class by yourself, for the personal letters of criticism and advice will be confidential and exclusive to you. It will be exactly suited to your aims and needs, and begins just where any previous training left off, and continues until you are too busy writing for the Press to need any further lessons.

Your first attempts will be sympathetically criticised by an expert who has won his experience unaided in the long, tedious way of finding things out for himself. Struggling alone, facing one disappointment after another, you may spend years of heart-aching effort in learning just the practical technique of the profession that the Course teaches in a few easy-to-follow but vastly interesting lessons.

The 50 Scholarship Winners will obtain the full Course of Postal Tuition at half fees. (The remainder is only payable when the student has earned £20 by his or her pen.)

You can earn back very much more than the cost of Tuition, and, incidentally, receive a splendid full Course of Training free, and will acquire practical knowledge that may be worth from 7s. 6d. to £2 2s. an hour in a most interesting and distinguished profession.

No examination papers can be received after April 26th.

Address, SECRETARY, Practical Correspondence
College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

THE DOG THAT LOST HIS CHARACTER

A CAUTIONARY TALE

HE had always been eccentric. Always, that is to say, so long as the family had known him. There is no saying whether his nature may not have received a warp in early puppyhood, when possible unkindness may have cut at the root of that faith and confidence which is the dog's instinct of religion, and so weakened with a life-long bias the little bundle of nerves and affection that makes a puppy dog.

When he was something under two he was engaged as nursery-dog at the Manor House, and after the first access of nervousness, when he snapped at the baby, he filled the post with zeal and discretion, being devoted body and soul to each and every member of that tumultuous family, and discharging every duty with punctuality and attention. His two leading principles were to guard the children and extinguish fire. He allowed nobody to speak to the family in his presence, unless they were duly authorised to do so, and even then with a grudging consent. He would fuss wildly about a lighted match, and try to jump on it, dash at a cigar light, and become frenzied when crackers were pulled. He was faithful, industrious, and generally amenable, and he was a great friend of the Brown Brother's. But he hated Parson.

The ground of his objection to this latter was never clearly ascertained, for the spiritual director of the parish was accustomed to spoil and stuff both dogs and children with equal lack of discretion. The Brown Brother, moreover, lost no opportunity of telling Robin that Parson was, in his opinion, a very respectable man. Whether he disapproved of his neighbour's views, political or theological, or whether it was merely prejudice, Robin's objection was immovable, and he always tried to bite Parson. When they met in the road, he would drop behind and attack him in the rear, or lurk in a ditch till the enemy was near, and dash at him with injurious epithets and bared teeth. Or he would lie in wait behind the laurels of the drive, and spring out with a whoop. And within doors, where he dared not show violence, he retired beneath a chair and rolled his eyes.

The Brown Brother—then a mere boy—was a warm admirer of his wire-haired neighbour, who tried to teach him ratting, a science at which the Brown Brother was always an enthusiastic blunderer. They would trot along the roads during morning walks in friendly fashion, brown tail and white tail bobbing side by side, till Robin scented bunnies and led his young friend off in chase. Then no more would be seen or heard except distant yelps, until two breathless figures reappeared, dishevelled and red-dyed from the mines, Robin usually with a rabbit, and the Brown Brother, empty-mouthed, in envious admiration.

The Brown Brother's youthful weakness was for chasing sheep—not from vice, but for the fun of seeing them scatter. On the occasions when he was corrected for this habit, he was accustomed—Irish terrier fashion—to rend the air with his shrieks before ever the stick descended on his person. If within earshot at such times, Robin would come down the Manor House drive like a woolly white cannon-ball, dash into the Parsonage stables, and fly at his friend's persecutor with ferocious growls.

The village in general stood rather in awe of him, and, like other people who do not mind making themselves disagreeable, Robin was allowed to play the tyrant more than was good for him, because it was too much trouble to keep him in his place. Things may go on like this to the end of a dog's days, with no more serious results than much swagger on one side and a little animosity on the other. But Fate had a future for Robin. The Manor House family went abroad for six months, and Robin was boarded out with the coachman, a friend of his and an excellent man. But the children were gone, the only things that Robin loved whole-heartedly. From this point began his downfall.

It has been remarked by a great many moralists that a sense of duty is useful and necessary to the development of a respectable character. It is, however, equally necessary that the sense of duty should be complemented by a just sense of the owner's place in creation, otherwise damage may ensue. An ill-balanced character may be overweighted by the conviction that the world must go wrong unless he takes charge, and so come to grief through a disproportionate sense of his own importance. So long as Robin had had his nursery duties to fulfil, he had remained a tolerably respectable member of society. Once the duties removed, he had lost his sheet-anchor, and threatened to make shipwreck of his fortunes. He cared for nobody but the children, and had cultivated the habit of rancour till it seemed as though he could learn to care for nobody else. Perhaps it was that, like some injudicious mortals, he felt indispensable, and wanted to be considered so, disregarding the fact that in this world nobody is indispensable. He refused friendship of any other kind; his poor little narrow, devoted heart pined for the children, and would have nothing else. His grief did not take an heroic form; he did not pine and droop; he only grew crustier and crustier, and his hatred of Parson and Parson's belongings became an obsession. His mind seemed to have lost its spring, as if it were becoming stiffened within the idée fixe that results in mental overbalancing.

The world has hard ways of teaching. It needs a generous character to bear some of those bitter disciplines without becoming embittered. All things considered, it is, however, a rare school for character. But a dog's horizon is of necessity limited, especially in the case of a family dog who is bound fast to a small circle by all the ties he knows of honour and affection. For one week Robin recovered himself. That was when the youngest girl came for a week to the Rectory on her way to France. Care was taken that Robin should not know of her arrival; but he knew. He spent the night under her window, and appeared next morning in the breakfast-room, where he would have been welcome enough if he had only chosen to come before. His joy at seeing the child was indescribably pathetic; it was not noisy, but silent and devotional. For that week he even tolerated Parson. But Molly went away, and Robin once more snapped, growled, and became morose and inconsolable. Then he went to the dogs.

He began it by founding the dogs' club, which continued to annoy the village for more than a year after Robin was gone. The nature and objects of the club were not known; but its methods were these. All the dogs of the neighbourhood used to forgather at some meeting-place, by night for choice, and get into mischief. The melancholy part of it was that all the most respectable, hard-working dogs in the parish belonged to it, as well as the few blackguards. These were the Butcher's cross-grained bobtail, the Gipsy carrier's dissipated-looking lurcher, the cross-bred bull terrier owned by the post office, and two furtive-eyed black-and-white sheep dogs from a neighbouring hamlet who were suspected of sheep-

DO YOU POSSESS AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA?

A Remarkable Offer.

FIRST PAYMENT 2/6 ONLY.

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the "Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia" is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vamberg, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Watts Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, I.L.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

The "Illustrated Chambers's" (Latest Edition) is a treasury of compact information and a reliable guide on subjects Literary, Political, Historical, Theological, Scientific, Musical, Artistic, Philosophical, and General. It is international in character. It consists of Ten Handsome Half-Leather Volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced, and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

Let the Children use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

Two Opinions.

LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON writes—

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

HILAIRE BELLOC, Esq., writes—

"'Chambers's Encyclopædia' has been my principal book of reference for the last fifteen years. I have found it much the most accurate of such works, more trustworthy than others, and more comprehensive. . . . I have never found it to fail."

A FREE BOOK.

TO THE CAXTON PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.,
244, Surrey Street, London, W.C.

Please send me, Post Free, and without any obligation on my part, Illustrated Booklet describing "The Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia," and full particulars of your offer to deliver the complete work for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by small monthly payments.

NAME

(Send this form or a postcard.)

ADDRESS

.....

"Popular! it speaks for itself, sir—everybody is having Hall's Distemper walls now. We used to use it most among the artistic folk and people with fancy ideas, but now it is Hall's Distemper everywhere."

And no wonder! The English public, proverbially proud of their homes, have learned that behind the artistic idea

HALL'S DISTERPER

(REG. TRADE MARK)

gives solid practical advantages, such as are offered in no other wall covering.

It gives an even, velvety wall surface. It sets hard as cement, and does not crack, blister, nor peel off. Unlike wallpaper it never fades nor changes colour.

It is instant death to all insect and germ life, and gives clean, healthy walls which may be washed by lightly sponging with warm water.

"HOW TO DECORATE YOUR HOME"—a booklet that helps, by giving beautiful examples in colours, and useful hints, free by post on application to the Sole Manufacturers:—

SISSONS BROTHERS & CO., Ltd., HULL.
London Office: 199A, Borough High Street, S.E.
Liverpool: 65, Mount Pleasant.
Glasgow: 113, Bath Street.
Reading: 6, Gnn Street.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's NAVY CUT

Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets
and Tins.

May be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute.

Regd. No. 154011

worrying by adjacent farmers. The Brown Brother did not belong, although he would have given his stump of a tail to be admitted. But, resolutely as he endeavoured to fight his way in, he was persistently black-balled by the members, who were all working dogs, and seemed to despise him as a loafer. Perhaps, too, he swaggered a little. It was the policeman who found out about the club. He used to fall in upon their meetings sometimes by night in outlying parts of his beat, and he reported Robin as the evident ring-leader. It caused some amusement until it turned out to be far from harmless. Dogs, like certain classes of humanity, need the control of a higher power. This relaxed, they break their hearts or get into mischief. There was a sheep worried, nobody could say by whom; more than one turkey on another farm missing or damaged. Then the climax came with the awful fate which overtook the churchwarden's dog, who was shot by his own master, mistaking him for a strange thief, in the act of crawling through the larder window with a stolen leg of mutton. After this, careful owners chained their dogs at night. But there seemed no chance of reform for Robin: After he had been met one Sunday morning early, coming out of the public-house without a collar, and had been abusive when addressed by the Rector, he came to wear the air of one who has literally gone to the dogs. His crowning exploit came when he walked over to a farm in the next parish, full three miles away, apparently for the sole purpose of biting the churchwarden (not the owner of the shot spaniel). After this he seemed to be a canine Ishmael, with his paw against every man. He was finally condemned as a public danger and sent away.

His family never came back to their old home. They went to live in town, where it was considered impossible to keep a dog. So Robin was given back to his original owner, and nothing more was heard of him for nearly a year. At last it came out by degrees that his temper had grown so unbearable that his owner had had him shot. It was a sad ending to pluck and faithfulness, because it seemed as though he had deliberately refused help when he was going under. When Fate had bereft him of all his soul yearned for, he preferred to go to the dogs.

This is a cautionary tale, and has the inherent defect of its kind, namely, that they who might benefit by its moral instruction are precisely those who will not attend to it.

H. H. W.

CORRESPONDENCE

ESPERANTO.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—All who desire an international auxiliary language will agree with the contributor of last week's article on this question up to paragraph eight; but he then proceeds as though Esperanto is the only solution of the problem. This is not so. In 1907 an international committee, consisting of scientists and linguists, after having studied all the projects for an international language, both old and new, adopted an improved version of Esperanto which they named "Ido." This language (Ido) has gained many adherents, mostly ex-Esperantists.

As Volapük suffered by comparison with Esperanto, so does the latter when compared with Ido. It may be assumed that the final selection of an international language lies neither with the Idists nor Esperantists. It will be the duty of an international committee, appointed by the various Governments, to examine into and select from these artificial languages the best. We Idists are content to await that judgment, and, in the meantime, ask all those interested in the question to study it for themselves. The fact that there are more Esperantists than Idists is of no value, as there were more Volapükists than Esperantists; but Volapük no longer exists, and Esperanto—well, eventually the best will win.

An English Esperantist will admit that Esperanto is not making much progress here, but points to its success abroad; but in Germany and France I found that the Esperantists there also say, in effect, "Business is bad here, but good in England and elsewhere." This is because every item of news favourable to the Esperantists is reported in their journals, but the defections from their ranks, and the cessation of group meetings, are only known locally.

An Ido translation of an article appearing in EVERYMAN is published in the March number of the Ido review, Progress. It would be interesting, for the purposes of comparison, to see an Esperanto translation of the same.

I hope that an article re Ido will soon appear in EVERYMAN, as the question of an international language is rapidly coming to the front, and it behoves every man to be conversant with the claims put forward by the partisans of the diverse systems.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. WARREN BAXTER,
Hon. Sec., British Idistic Society.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I read with great interest your article on Esperanto in EVERYMAN of March 28th. Personally, I took up Esperanto as a pastime, and a most fascinating and useful pastime it has proved. I am now able, after only two or three months' learning at odd times, to correspond with men abroad who do not even know the English language, but who are Esperantists.

It may be of interest to you to know that there is an Esperanto bank called "La Cekbanko Esperantista." Members of this bank are able to transmit money to one another in any part of the world by means of a postcard. In this bank, as in the language itself, everything is based on purely logical and practical grounds.

Three weeks ago I sent a friend of mine a little Esperanto exercise-book, and now he is able to write to me in very good Esperanto. As every man knows, this would be an utter impossibility with any other language.

My advice to your readers is to learn Esperanto "for fun," and they will find that not only will they have learnt something useful, but that they will also have improved their English as well.—I am, sir, etc.,

KOMENCANTO (Ivor Gwynne Perrett),
London, S.E.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Many of your readers will have perused with interest the article under the above title in the current number of EVERYMAN, and as I have attended several of the international congresses referred to in Paragraph IX. I trust you will allow me to testify to the ease with which the international language, as a means of ordinary conversation, is understood by people of different nationalities. The language is phonetic, and the rules for pronunciation are so simple that it is impossible to detect the nationality of a speaker from his pronunciation of Esperanto. I have frequently entered into a conver-

THE BEST NEW NOVELS

THE HAPPY WARRIOR 5th impression

By A. S. M. Hutchinson, author of "Once Aboard the Lagger—" 6s. "A story of surpassing charm, sweetness, humour and manliness."

—Daily Chronicle.

THE HOUSE OF RENNEL

By Mrs. H. H. Penrose, author of "Den's Trench," etc. 6s. "A very capable story."—Morning Post. "A very pleasant and charming story."

—Evening Standard.

AUNT OLIVE IN BOHEMIA

By Leslie Moore, author of "The Cloak of Convention," etc. 6s. "Is in every way delightful. . . . The author is to be congratulated on her study of one of the most charming 'old maids' in recent fiction."—The Standard.

THE PRICE OF STEPHEN BONYNGE

By Margaret Legge, author of "A Semi-Detached Marriage." 6s. "A fine piece of work."—Morning Post. "Miss Legge is a novelist to be considered."

—Daily Telegraph.

NEVERTHELESS

By Isabel Smith, author of "Mated," "The Jewel House," etc. Just Published, 6s. "A story with undoubted qualities of greatness. . . . Miss Smith is an accomplished novelist."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE TRUTH ABOUT CARLYLE

By David Alec Wilson, author of "Mr. Froude and Carlyle," etc. With Preface by Sir James Crichton Browne. 1s. 6d. net.

Please send for new complete list—it will interest you.

LONDON: ALSTON RIVERS, LTD., 21-22,
BROOKE STREET, HOLBORN BARS.

You can test our NEW POSTAL LESSONS in

RUSSIAN

For the modest sum of ONE SHILLING.

Send P.O. 1/- and we will send you a wonderful Specimen Lesson, with details of all Correspondence-Courses.

If you want to learn FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH, ITALIAN, LATIN or GREEK, you cannot afford to neglect the Eversley System, which is SIMPLE, SCIENTIFIC and INTERESTING.

Write: Director, EVERSLEY LANGUAGE INSTITUTE,
43, Great Tower Street, London, E.C.

MEMBERSHIP INVITED for PRIVATE SOCIAL CLUB on distinctive lines. Good social position and wide interests essential. Lectures, Discussions, etc.—For particulars apply SECRETARY, 39, The Avenue, Kew Gardens.

AUTHORS wishing to sell MSS. should write to Advisory Department, Dept. 1, Murray & Evenden, Ltd., Publishers, Pleydell House, Pleydell Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

AUTHORS EXPERIENCING DIFFICULTY IN FINDING a publisher are invited to submit their MSS., upon either general or special subjects, to the MUSEUM ARTS & LETTERS ASSOCIATION, 18, Bury Street, W.C. Advantageous terms of issue accorded new authors whose works show promise.

Shorthand 80 words per minute in ONE MONTH by the celebrated SLOAN-DUPOYAN high-speed system, saving a year's study. Used in Parliament. Illustrated handbook and LESSON free.—SHORTHAND ASSOCIATION, 289, Holborn Hall, London, W.C. (Tel. 6111 Holborn.)

AVOID DRUGS

If taken frequently drugs lose their power and doses have to be increased.

For the safe and certain relief and cure of . . .
INDIGESTION, ACIDITY, FLATULENCY, HEARTBURN, and IMPURE BREATH,

Bragg's Pure Vegetable Charcoal has never yet been equalled. It absorbs the impure gases generated in the stomach and bowels and carries them out of the system, thus removing the CAUSE of digestive disturbance and at the same time cleansing the blood.

BRAGG'S CHARCOAL

may be taken regularly with constant benefit by young or old. It is invaluable also in Diarrhoea and Fever. Doctors largely recommend it and use it in their own families.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores. Biscuits, 1/-, 2/- and 4/- per tin; Powder, 2/- per bottle; Lozenges, 1/1¹/₂ per tin; Chocolates, 1/- per tin; Capsules, 2/- per box.

FREE SAMPLES sent to anyone mentioning this Journal and enclosing 3d. stamps for postage in the British Empire and U.S.A.

J. L. BRAGG'S, Ltd., 14, WIGMORE ST., LONDON, W.

Swift Sure

Light Overcoats and Spring Suits are now being sent to "Achille Serre" to be smartened up for the New Season's Wear.

The warmer weather will soon be here and—how will your lighter clothing look? After being stored away for the Winter your light overcoat and Spring Suits will probably be creased and more or less soiled. Let us put them right for you. In Four Days we will remove all spots, stains, and marks of wear. We only charge 3/6 for Cleaning and Tailor-pressing a complete suit, or 3/6 for a Light Overcoat. It will save you buying new.

Free collection and delivery by nearest Branch or Agent; or carriage paid one way on all orders sent direct. Illustrated Booklet and addresses free on application.

Achille Serre Ltd.

(Nettoyage à sec)

Hackney Wick, London, E. Phone 3710 East.
Branches and Agencies Everywhere.

sation with a seeming foreigner, and only on exchanging cards with a view to future correspondence have learned that I have been speaking to a fellow-countryman. The grammar is absolutely without exceptions, and the language can be learned for purposes of correspondence in a few weeks.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. BREDALL.

South Croydon.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—No doubt Mr. S. S. Cherry, in his letter in EVERYMAN of April 4th, is theoretically correct when he says that "in time Esperanto, too, will vastly change, and in multitudes of different directions." But the important question is, after all, Is such a possibility a matter of practical politics? The excellent translations from European classics that have appeared in Esperanto from the pens of Dr. Zamenhof, Dr. Bein ("Kabe"), and other authors—e.g., "Marta," "La Revizoro" (Gogol), "La Rabistoj" (Schiller), "La Faraono" (B. Prus), and "Patroj kaj Filoj" (Turgucnev)—have laid down models of good style in Esperanto which are closely followed by good writers, no matter what their nationality. Indeed, to such an extent have these models influenced the use of the language, that, given a piece of writing by a mature wielder of Esperanto, it is to all intents and purposes impossible to detect the nationality of the writer.

Then, too, the practical resolution taken in 1905, at the Congress in Boulogne, where the principle was accepted that, until such time as Esperanto shall have been officially adopted, no change must be arbitrarily made in the basis of the language, is a sufficient safeguard for a reasonable time.

But, after all, is there any infallible analogy between "natural" languages and Esperanto? Natural languages never did start as homogeneous; and their exceptions and irregularities are not necessarily corruptions from a pure pristine source, but very often forms derived from entirely different sources (e.g., was, be, is). But the case is otherwise in Esperanto. From its inception, the language has been virtually without exception or irregularity. And we may be quite sure that whatever changes may take place will be kept within reasonable bounds by that great unifying force which was the motive of its creation, and which all other things must subserve—the desire for mutual understanding.—I am, sir, etc.,

P. J. CAMERON,

Hon. Sec., London Esperanto Club,
St. Bride's Institute, E.C.

London.

THE SUPERMAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—What exactly does your correspondent, E. Derwent, mean? He says: "The superman is fully himself that he may be more fully the instrument of the purpose of the universe, for which he conceives he was created." What does it all mean? Does one become fully oneself by being self-assertive? Does self-assertion mean the endeavour to gratify all personal desire and ambition? Are all who act upon the above precept supermen? Finally, is not the very act of making oneself the "instrument of the purpose of the universe" an act of self-renunciation?

It is really rather futile of Mr. Derwent (or his master, G. B. S.) to pervert a Christian ideal for the sake of mocking it. The slightest study will show that the extent of self-sacrifice demanded by Christ of His followers is just so much as will enable them to attain the same ideal heights of spiritual self-realisation (or self-assertion) as He Himself did; that is, to become more Christ-like. The Christian realises that to be morally and spiritually self-assertive (the purpose for which he was created), he must practise self-renunciation where his natural, uncontrolled desires and ambitions are likely to prove a hindrance to himself or to others.

If Mr. Derwent (for Mr. Shaw) answers my first three questions with "Yes" and the last with a "No," then it appears to me that, so far from being a new ethic, a new morality, Mr. Shaw's doctrines are the very principles upon which modern life is conducted, after removing the hollow, conventional self-deception which is constantly practised to-day in order to square it with the higher Christian morality. Granted that the Shavian morality is more honest than the present indefensible duplicity, the fact must still be faced that it would leave things pretty much as they are. His system would still leave the unfortunate a prey to the unscrupulous and the get-rich-quick. This surely would be very awkward from Mr. Shaw's point of view. Does not his advocacy of Socialism involve the regulation of an individual's self-assertiveness and involve a certain measure of self-renunciation?—I am, sir, etc.,

H. V. HERWIG.

London, N.

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Permit me once more a few words in reply to Mr. Dexter's letter in No. 25.

I think this letter is very typical of the average Englishman's attitude towards this question. "I abhor war between the two nations, but I believe in the present state of things (which are nearly worse than war). It is not our fault." This is the meaning of his letter in a nutshell.

Mr. Dexter accuses Germany of having been "aggressive, provocative, and ruthless," and I quite understand that he feels himself justified in his reproach from a purely English point of view. Should he happen, however, to read German history, he will be surprised to learn that "Germany has always wished for peace, and that only England or France have done something to threaten her." Still another aspect of the matter he will gather from French history. It is always the other nation who has started the mischief. In such a case, I daresay we are not far out if we take it that the truth lies in the middle, and the fault with all parties concerned. He asks what effective say the bulk of the German people have in the matter. Well, not much of it. But will your correspondent maintain that it is otherwise here or in France? Was the bulk of the English nation in favour of the South African war?

If, however, he goes on to say "that in all wars the national spirit of patriotism comes to the support of the authorities," I beg to differ, for I flatly deny the "patriotism" to those who back the authorities in a "game at war."

In this case we should rather call it fanaticism. This pretty quality of the mostly thoughtless masses of Philistines without backbone is cleverly evoked by an irresponsible Press in the hands of interested persons, and it is here that the high value of independent journals like EVERYMAN, etc., comes in.

I should like to add a word about the dreadful German fleet, which your correspondent thinks "has long reached a quite sufficient strength for the protection of the commercial interests and territories," and

"SONGOLA" MUSIC ROLLS

THE WORDS OF THE SONG ON THE ROLL

"Songola" Music Rolls enhance the charm of the Player Piano. Add a selection of "Songola" Music Rolls to your Roll repertoire and your musical evenings will be brighter and better than ever.

These Rolls are musically perfect, strong and climate-proof. They are manufactured by the makers of "Linenized" Music Rolls, which have long been recognised as by far the best Music Rolls produced.

SEND FOR "SONGOLA" CATALOGUE 22.

THE PERFORATED MUSIC CO., Ltd., 94, Regent Street, London, W.

Factory and Head Office: 197-199, CITY ROAD, E.C. Scottish Branch: 113, GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH.

Agents in all Large Towns. Names and Addresses on application.

PLEASE WATCH THIS ADVT. WEEKLY

and see how useful this table would be

IN YOUR HOME.

AN IDEAL GIFT.

A DAINTY AND

INEXPENSIVE

LUXURY.

FOR READING.

The 'CARBREK' General Utility TABLE.

Thousands in use in all parts. Space permits indication of only a few of its manifold uses. Absolutely indispensable in every household for cards, music, needlework, writing, meals in bed, toilet, etc. A most charming and acceptable gift. Adjustable in height, tilting polished oak top, reversible book ledge. 25/-, packed f. ee.

Before purchasing, send a postcard for T. e Carbrek No. 1 Booklet, a most dainty brochure, with artistic illustrations in colour, post free.

CARTERS, 4, New Cavendish Street, London, W.

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

is built "far beyond necessity in those respects." The situation is as follows: England is in possession or controls the chief export markets. The idea of the German Government is, clearly, that if English Imperialism closes up these markets for the German industries, these would be simply paralysed, and therefore Germany requires a navy, as an important factor, which is weighty enough to inhibit her commercial exclusion.

Mark you, I want to explain, not to justify. For I am of opinion that an able diplomacy could work more effectively and much more cheaply.

We cannot get away from the fact that the problem must be solved on a commercial basis. If, therefore, diplomacy fails to get at the solution, commercial men have the duty to make a start in the right direction.—
I am, sir, etc.,

ED. SCHMIDT.

London, April 5th, 1913.

EDUCATIONAL REFORM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent "Student" makes use of the following expressions:—

"We want a system in which the Church will cease from troubling, a system which will not be controlled by small local bodies composed of men who are, for the most part, utterly unqualified to express adequate opinions on educational needs," etc.

Does not this point to a grave error in the Act of 1902, viz., the abolition of the school boards? I know the argument then employed against the multiplication of authorities, but in the case of education this will hardly hold good. It is a question that wants the undivided attention of all of those responsible for its management and efficiency. In every civilised community there are always a number of men anxious to take part in public affairs, but to whom the work of local boards and town councils is not congenial—men—and women, too—who prefer laying the foundations of knowledge in the child, and enlightening its mind and cultivating its brains, to attending to the laying of the streets, and the lighting of the same, and the construction of the drains, and it was men and women of this type who formed by far the larger bulk of those school boards, corporations which, whatever their shortcomings in exceptional cases may have been, did their work excellently well, and ought for that reason alone never to have been abolished. In any new Education Act—and God knows one is wanted—the Government, be it Liberal or be it Conservative, might, in this respect, make a good beginning by reverting to the days before 1902.—I am, sir, etc.,

E. S.

London, March 27th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I would join in the shout of indignation that is rising over the chaotic condition of educational affairs.

The fences are broken and the ropes are down, and the turf is open to be trampled underfoot of all the clowns and all the beasts that like to roam. What chance have the nurturers or the nursed? Fine artists need tranquillity and seclusion to produce fine results. If the guardians of the teaching fields have been lax or arrogant in their supervision or have absconded, if the people have been interfering and absurd, if the teachers have come to strained relations and lost their bearings, if the children and the youth are being twisted and warped and overlain and chilled, how shall the thing be remedied? There is only one way. What is the object in view? Is it not to produce fine plants and flowers and shrubs and trees? Very well. It is necessary, first of all, to have plenty of space and good soil, and a situation not exposed to cold winds, but open to the sun and well watered. Is this available? It seems so. Secondly, the supply of weeds, shoots, cuttings should be carefully sorted, the tainted from the untainted, the good stock from the poor or medium stock. And whose affair is this? That of the doctors, and the sanitary inspectors, and the legislators, and the parents. But is this attainable? Not for a long time, I fear. Thirdly, there should be a well-regulated, machine-like, uniform organisation for the handling of the supply on receipt at the enclosures. And how can this be? Only by the co-operation and union of all the different teaching bodies and associations and federations. But how can such an unwieldy mass be moved and handled and unified? Only after much shifting, many words and many conferences. And who is to do this? This can only be done amongst the teachers themselves, with the help and guidance of those legislators who understand them. And are there such men? Some there are, who have been teachers, and some understand by sympathy and intuition. And who is to control this great union or federation? There should be a Minister of Education, whose office should rank with the highest offices in the State, and should be unique, and not a stepping-stone to something else. Is that all? No; in the fourth place, there should be well-rolled gravel paths through the fields and plantations, and at the entrances notice-boards should be placed inscribed "Smoking strictly prohibited!" to be observed by visitors. And is this possible? I hope so.—I am, sir, etc.,

F. E. HODDER.

Croydon, Surrey.

ENTERPRISE IN BUSINESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—With reference to your article entitled "Enterprise in Business, an Omission in the Socialist Argument," I would like to point out that not all Socialists have omitted the important points referred to in your contributor's interesting article. As one who is dissatisfied with the present social and economic conditions, I welcome the honest criticism set forth as a means of throwing light on the subject. In a book written a few years ago, entitled "Studies, Scientific and Social," Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace deals fully with the problem of enterprise, organisation, and management in a state of society compatible with the Socialist argument. In his account of the co-operative farming experiment at Ralahine, Co. Clare, in 1831-33, he shows how a community of uneducated Irish people, under the leadership of their able steward, Mr. E. T. Craig (who knew nothing about farming), were able to organise and show considerable ability in the management of their 600-acre farm, from both a financial and agricultural point of view.

While admitting that great organising power is rare, I emphatically deny that organisation and management must remain the monopoly of an élite.

The success of the great co-operative societies in this country, whose managers are elected from the members, by the members, for the members, is proof that organisation and management are not the monopoly of an élite.

Many of the managers of our great railway companies have risen up from the ranks. In my opinion, a measure which has contributed largely to the success of these gentlemen is the experience that they

(Continued on page 832.)

THE MOST WONDERFUL COURSE OF LESSONS IN THE WORLD.

How Over 200,000 Leaders Have Developed Increased Mental Power and Business Capacity.

100,000 FREE MAGAZINES FOR READERS.

Priceless Information concerning "The 12 Most Wonderful Lessons in the World" is available for readers to-day, free of cost.

100,000 Specimen Copies of two remarkable new magazines, entitled Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency and Mind & Memory respectively, are to be distributed with a view to informing anxious-to-get-on men and women how they may fit themselves for Higher Positions and Higher Pay.

Men or women who aspire to Business, Professional or Social Success, without utilising the aid of the Mental Training afforded by the Pelman School of the Mind are neglecting the greatest assistance the modern world offers.

The Man Who Wins.

In the biggest Business houses, in the Professions, in the Ministry, in the Services, it is the Pelman-trained man who is rising to the top.

The Pelman System develops in your brain just those mental qualities which aid you to attain that supreme capacity which wins Success in any line of life.

It develops in your mind the linked and associated qualities of

- PERCEPTION
- MEMORY
- JUDGMENT
- IDEATION
- CONCENTRATION
- DETERMINATION
- ORGANISING POWER
- DIRECTIVE ABILITY
- COMPREHENSION
- COMPARISON
- DECISION
- INITIATIVE
- APPLICATION
- ENERGY
- DRIVING FORCE
- SELF-CONFIDENCE

After a course of Pelman Training you are able to do more than twice the work you did before in the same time, and to do it better, too, and with greater ease and interest.

You are also able to get more work out of those who are under your direction.

Readers are invited to write to-day for a copy of Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency and particulars of these 12 lessons.

Best-Paying Investment.

These will be sent, together with information showing how you can have this wonderful course for a small inclusive fee.

It will pay you over and over again in the increased income brought in by your increased skill and capacity.

The following are the titles of these 12 lessons:—

- Lesson I.—The Three Elements of Success.
- Lesson II.—The Creation of Ambition.
- Lesson III.—Knowledge and the Senses.
- Lesson IV.—Observation as a Business Asset.
- Lesson V.—Attention, Concentration, and Interest.

- Lesson VI.—Ideation; or, How to Originate Ideas.
- Lesson VII.—Originality in Aims and Methods.
- Lesson VIII.—The Influence of Mind on Mind.
- Lesson IX.—A Business Man's Mind and Memory.
- Lesson X.—Training the Mind for Study.
- Lesson XI.—Auto-suggestion.
- Lesson XII.—Will Power.

The Pelman System is essentially practical. You can at once put it to profitable use in your own particular occupation. Those who practise it find the income-earning powers of their minds steadily—and in many cases rapidly—increasing as a direct consequence.

Striking Personal Experiences.

Hundreds of Pelman Students have written to say that as the result of practising the Pelman lessons they have gained higher positions in life. A most striking collection of these letters will be forwarded you gratis and post free. You have only to follow the Pelman System to be able to record similar experiences for yourself.

The magazine entitled Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency is the most stimulating and ambition-arousing periodical ever published.

In its pages some of the world's greatest scientists and business men tell you how to train your mind for Success.

Inspiring articles deal with various aspects of Mental training, and show how you can develop in your mind just those qualities which are most useful to you.

Increases Your Earning Power.

Thus, if you are a barrister, you increase that power of rapid thinking, that quick eye for the weak spot in an opponent's case, that readiness to take instant advantage of the slightest opportunity, that "lawyer's memory" which remembers every detail of the case in hand, and that power of lucid and persuasive speech, all of which are necessary to forensic success.

Should you be a salesman, this system will make you a better salesman. It gives you that instant appreciation of a customer's wants and idiosyncrasies, and that power of persuading, pleasing, and convincing that enables you to sell more goods.

The clerk becomes a better clerk, so that he catches his employer's eye, and is selected for promotion out of many.

Start for Success To-day.

The minister, politician, lecturer, public speaker finds himself able to speak fluently and convincingly without notes.

Whatever your occupation or profession, your efficiency is wonderfully increased.

Don't get in a rut or groove. Don't get lost in the slough of Mediocrity, Little Power, and Small Salaries. Boldly face the summit and mount the hill of Success. Follow the path that over 200,000 Pelman Students have already trod, and you will gain your ambition. But now is the time to begin. Others are beginning now—don't let them get ahead of you. To-day you can obtain, free of all cost, postal or otherwise:—

1. Full particulars of the 12 "Most Wonderful Lessons in the World," and how you can learn them at a cost easily within your reach, and which will be returned to you in increased earning-power within a few weeks.

2. A copy of the new magazine, Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency, which every man or woman anxious to get on should read.

3. A copy of Mind & Memory, which tells you all about the simple "spare time" system which so greatly increases your mental efficiency.

Send coupon or post-card to-day to the Secretary, the Pelman School of the Mind, 52, Wenham House, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

By return you will receive this triple gift, gratis and post free, to enable you to increase your mental efficiency for Business or Social success and to realise your life's Ambition.

FREE TO READERS OF "EVERYMAN," 100,000 FREE MAGAZINES.

To the Secretary,
THE PELMAN SCHOOL OF THE MIND,
52, Wenham House, Bloomsbury St., London, W.C.

Kindly forward, gratis and post free, to the following address, as offered in this week's EVERYMAN.

1.—Full particulars of the 12 Most Wonderful Lessons in the World, with "Experiences" of men and women who have achieved success through their aid.

2.—Free Copy of the new magazine, Brain-Power & Mental Efficiency.

3.—Free Copy of the magazine, Mind & Memory.

The sending of this coupon involves no charge or obligation.

NAME.....
ADDRESS.....

MAXIMAL EFFICIENCY.

Prof. Münsterberg, in "Psychology and Industrial Efficiency" (Constable & Co., 6/- net), says: "The problem of attention seems to stand quite in the centre of the field of industrial efficiency." The Concentro Co. (see below) go further; they claim that right attention lies at the root of all efficiency. The man who cannot attend cannot learn, cannot perform his work properly, cannot succeed in anything he undertakes. The Concentro Co., in their World-Famous Course, "Scientific Concentration," provide the best solution to the problem of attention that has yet appeared. "Scientific Concentration" teaches Professional Men, Business Men, and Students how to apply the laws of attention to their daily activities so as to yield the best results. It further shows them how to observe properly, how to speak in public, how to think efficiently, how to train their memory, how to develop their Will-Power, Self-Reliance, Self-Confidence, how to control their thoughts, and how to overcome bad habits. "Scientific Concentration" is practised by a vast number of students in every part of the civilised world, and has secured splendid testimony from the Editors of well-known journals—"The Review of Reviews," "The Guardian," "Public Opinion," "Christian Commonwealth," "John Bull," "Great Thoughts." Learn what "Scientific Concentration" will do for you by sending to-day for their Free Descriptive Booklet to the CONCENTRO CO., 46, CENTRAL BUILDINGS, WALLSEND, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Your machine will carry you a greater distance with less effort if you fit the easy-running

Renold Chain

GET ONE FITTED—5/6 (Fitting extra).

Write for Cycle Chain Booklet, "The Engine Room of the Cycle." Contains a Perpetual Time-to-Light-up Table.

HANS RENOLD LTD. (Dept. 14), MANCHESTER.

AUTHORS WANTED, known and unknown, to communicate. Every description of literary work required. No fees whatever. Write for particulars in first instance to "Publishers," 203, Sell's Offices, Fleet Street, London. Special attention to new writers.

TYPEWRITING.—Literary and General MSS., 8d. per 1,000 words. Plays, 1/- per 1,000 words. Paper and carbon-copy included.—C. A. Girton, 2, Grove Lane, Camberwell, S.E.

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES FOR THE HOME.

CASH OR EASY PAYMENTS.

Perfectly made in true proportion. Prices from £37/6. The popular size, 6 ft. 4 in., costs only £25/5/0. Seven days free trial. Send to-day for fully illustrated art catalogue giving sizes & prices.

E. J. RILEY, Ltd.,
Ondine Works, Accrington.

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.—For Matriculation, B.A., B.Sc., and other examinations. Single subjects may be taken.—Address, Mr. J. Charleston, B.A. (Hons. Oxon. and Lond.), 14, Elsham Road, Kensington, W.

MSS. should be typed before submitting to Agents and Publishers. Lowest prices and best work.—Write Miss Beere, — Rist & Co., 56, Ludgate Hill, E.C., for terms and appointment, or 'phone 7411 City.

ESPERANTO

"The language learnt in odd moments."
Textbook "E" (with Vocabulary), 7d.
New Testament (leather), 2/3.
"Esperanto Monthly" (for Learners), 1/6 per annum.
Passing of Babel (in English), 7d.
All Books Post Free.

From BRITISH ESPERANTO ASSOCIATION (Inc.),
138, High Holborn, London, W.C.

HANDSOME OFFER TO ALL WHO WEAR GLASSES.

Do you wear old-fashioned clothes? No, because you value your appearance. Then why wear out-of-date disfiguring glasses which mar one's looks far more than obsolete clothing? We invite you to take advantage of the highest skill yet reached in the making of glasses. You will be astonished at the wonderful improvement in your appearance obtained by wearing the NEW "HANDSOME" RIMLESS. As an advertisement for a limited period only the manufacturers offer to send you a 31/6 pair—the finest and most beautiful made, having 10-carat gold-filled mount of exquisite design—for 10/6 (to defray patent royalties, etc.). Kindly note that the price for a second pair direct, and from the optician later, is 31/6. Enclose your present glasses or prescription. Sight tested free by an expert, to those who can call. Send now, as this offer is, by contract, for a limited time only.—THE "HANDSOME" RIMLESS CO., 236, Battersea Park Road, London, S.W.

HEIGHT INCREASED

By adopting my simple system you can put inches on to your height in three months. No apparatus. No medicines. Ordinary habits retained. Send two penny stamps for particulars to PROFESSOR PROWSE, Special't in the Increase of Height, 13, NORTH END CHAMBERS, CROYDON.

gained during their sojourn in positions of a lower degree than that of manager.

Experience would, therefore, be one of the most important factors in creating organisation and management. Another point worth consideration is the fact that nearly all great enterprises had small beginnings, circumstances which compel one to believe that the process of evolution should take not a little of the credit which your contributor believes to belong to an élite.

With regard to enterprise being an important factor in the production of wealth, I admit that it is so; but can anyone prove that in a state of society where the whole community would have equal opportunity such a society would be fatal to its existence?

I might quote the Post Office as being an example of public ownership in which enterprise or expressed personality has not been lacking. Indeed, I venture to assert that the vital forces which have been at work in our postal institution, culminating in the present splendid organisation, are a good example which private enterprise would do well to imitate.—I am, sir, etc.,

A RAILWAY WORKER.

Southfields, S.W.

PAGANISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I be allowed to correct an error in my letter on "Paganism and Christianity." The phrase, "when the connotation had expanded to infinity, the denotation had shrunk to zero," should, of course, read, "when the denotation had expanded to infinity, the connotation had shrunk to zero."—I am, sir, etc.,

THOS. SEFTON.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

IN A CRYSTAL AGE (Duckworth, "The Reader's Library," 2s. 6d. net) Mr. W. H. Hudson has given us a purely imaginary picture—as all such pictures must necessarily be—of the future. Originally published in 1887, the book is, as he tells us himself, "coloured by the little cults, crazes, and modes of thought of the 'eighties." The author describes to us how, on regaining consciousness after falling from a great height, he finds himself encased in a covering of fibrous roots, from which, however, he with little difficulty is able to extricate himself. Investigating his surroundings, he chances on a company of mourners intent on burying their dead. On enquiry, he explains his position, but fails to make his listeners thoroughly understand him; they think he is talking in a series of riddles. Anxious to help him as much as possible, they receive him into their house. Strange and mystifying are the rules and orders to which he has to conform, and the tests and trials he has to undergo in this new existence, where men dress in artistic and brightly coloured garments, read and write according to more or less phonetic rules, accomplish well-nigh impossible feats and live a Utopian life. The book, which is admirably written, will appeal to all who enjoy the conjuring up of wildly speculative pictures of old Mother Earth in which she is made to dance to a fantastic albeit amusing strain.

The strange friendship which occasionally springs up between a child and one of more mature years is the foundation which Mr. Will Allen Dromgoole has chosen on which to build his novel, THE ISLAND OF BEAUTIFUL THINGS (Pitman and Sons, 6s.). The little chap, or "Fighting Mans," as he chooses to call himself, is the medium through which his "My Mans" and his "Lady Captain" find this wonderful "Island of Beautiful Things." One cannot help wondering, however, how a child of six, who can only express himself in "baby-language," should possess such maturely quaint and poetical ideas. The story, in this respect, suggests the other side of the Atlantic. The plot is slight, but the book contains many good passages.

I'D VENTURE ALL FOR THEE (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.) is written with a cheery pen and bright descriptive touches, that conjure up the stirring times of the rising in favour of the Pretender, 1745. Mr. J. S. Fletcher is particularly successful in his pictures of the great white road that stretches from across the border into the heart of England. Along the great highway huge droves of cattle are driven in a cloud of dust, dogs and drovers behind them, and before. One thinks of the many thousand of head of cattle that have trodden the path that leads to Smithfield, and the image is striking and, for a moment, staggering. The author tells us that, in those days, the days when railways were not, and transit was expensive and difficult, it was inevitable that the cattle should be shod. The miles they had to traverse wore out their hoofs, and it was necessary to call on the local blacksmiths to supply iron shoes. We dwell on these portions of the book because they stand out with significance and strength from the story. The account of Barnaby Fair is one of the most successful pictures of village life in those far-off days we have read for some time. The contrast between that healthy, happy age and the apathy and discontent rife in our own is cleverly portrayed, and one passes from the rustics gaping at the booths to the affairs of the hero, the last Earl of Strithes, with a touch of regret. The interest centres round this Jacobite nobleman, on whose head a price is set, and we follow him through scenes of hair-breadth escapes and thrilling adventures, until at long last he gains peace, and the love of Freda, a golden-haired descendant of the Vikings. The story is well told, graphically written; but, when curiosity is satisfied in regard to Alan, and sentiment no longer hungers for the union of the lovers, the reader will linger with pleasurable recollection over the scenes of rustic life so well portrayed, and the picture of the great North road, with its vast herds of cattle, a sea of tossing heads and the clatter of iron hoofs.

Mr. Harold Williams once more takes us into the region of Harley Street, and we are introduced into the waiting-room of a physician, called on to pronounce a verdict on the case of Oswald Bouverie. The latter, we suspect, is suffering from a disease only too common in a certain section of the community. He has too much money and leisure, and too little work. The doctor apparently comes to the same conclusion. He tells Bouverie that he is "lacking in sincerity," and suggests that, generally speaking, the patient has fooled away his time and energy. His prescription is simple and convincing. Bouverie is ordered the "simple life." He must take up his abode in the country and live with cows and sheep and simple, kindly people, where existence will narrow down to essentials, and he will be forced to find out for what he cares, and just how much. Bouverie follows his advice, leaves London, and finds a quiet spot. Intimacy with nature, however, does not awaken his energy, and he drifts into a backwater where thought is stagnant and there is no health. Even the influence of the woman he loves does not rouse him,

A Magnificent Engraving after

LORD LEIGHTON

A FREE GIFT TO PICTURE-LOVING READERS.
Never before has such an offer been made to "Everyman" Readers.

As all the world knows, Lord Leighton was one of the greatest artists of the 19th Century, and his beautiful painting of "Wedded," which was exhibited at the Royal Academy, London, always attracted crowds of delighted admirers to this—one of his greatest masterpieces.

(Copyright.) "WEDDED."
By LORD LEIGHTON,
President of the Royal Academy

A Beautiful Engraving as a Gift.

This picture has been selected as a Special Gift for those readers who would like to have it for the embellishment of their homes. It is a fine engraving, produced by hand direct from the engraved plate, on fine quality plate paper, measuring 22 by 15 inches, that is now offered.

Originally Published at One Guinea.

Great interest and enthusiasm has been aroused by this unique offer, and already many letters have been received from delighted recipients of these choice hand-printed Engravings, who until recently were unable to obtain one at less than 21s. per copy.

No Competition to Enter.

In applying for one of these free Engravings, you are under no obligation to purchase any pictures or frames, neither is there any competition to enter—all you have to do is to fill up the coupon at foot and send it to the Secretary, Oxford Fine Art Gallery, 63, Baker Street, London, W. (a firm established 32 years and enjoying Royal patronage), with a registration fee of 6d. in stamps or Postal Order to defray the cost of box and postage per Parcel Post, on receipt of which the Engraving will be carefully packed and despatched at once to your home.

LET IT BE CLEARLY UNDERSTOOD

that the presentation of these delightful examples of the Painter's and Engraver's Art is being made at an enormous expense, and solely for the purpose of introducing the Illustrated Catalogue, wherein an important offer is made of copyright Engravings and other pictures at specially reduced prices, and to bring the quality of the work to the notice of readers.

Under Royal Patronage. Est. 32 years. Tel. 3727 Mayfair.

COUPON FOR FREE ENGRAVING OF LORD LEIGHTON'S "WEDDED."

To THE OXFORD FINE ART GALLERY, 63, Baker St., London, W.

Sirs,—I accept your offer of a free Engraving of LORD LEIGHTON'S famous picture, "WEDDED." I enclose Registration Fee of 6d. to defray cost of box and postage per Parcel Post, and request that the Engraving and your Illustrated Catalogue be sent to me, gratis and post free.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

N.B.—If the Illustrated Catalogue only is required, no stamps need be sent.
E.M.11.4.13.

and it is left to Cummins, a simple, unsophisticated son of nature—with literary ambitions—to open his eyes. Bouverie, in the feckless fashion of that particular type of individual, is upset while boating, and, at the cost of his own life, Cummins saves him. The gift, secured at such a price, gives Bouverie an awakening shock, and he sets out, determined to put up a fight with life, instead of sauntering through existence. DISCOVERY (Sidgwick and Jackson, 6s.) should go well.

Mr. Edgar Jepson has given us a variety of original and entirely fascinating children. "Lady Noggs" captured our hearts long since, though certain of Mr. Jepson's admirers, even in face of her piquant ladyship's attractions, thought with regret of his earlier creation, the delightful little girl of "The Passion for Romance." In his latest book, THE DETERMINED TWINS (Hutchinson, 6s.), he invests the wildest escapades of Erebus and The Terror with an air of such simplicity and candour that the enormity of their scrapes is veiled from sight, and you wish that you could meet with two such charming vagabonds as he portrays. The best story in the book is that devoted to the gentle art of "Blackmailing," as practised on a baronet. The twins request the local personage, Sir James Morgan, for permission to fish the Grange water, the Grange being his property, inclusive of extensive grounds. Permission being withheld—the local reputation of the twins was not of the mildest order—they decide to be revenged on him. The baronet, as keen, if not as skilful, with the rod as they, gets tired of fishing his own waters, wherein he can catch nothing, and poaches on his neighbour's. The terrible twins see him in the act, and, marching to the Grange, beard him outright, threatening exposure if he does not withdraw his prohibition against them. The baronet succumbs, subsequently makes friends with the twins, and ultimately marries their mother. And with this satisfactory conclusion, the book comes to an end. Written with all the quiet humour characteristic of the author at his best, the story should achieve as great a success as its predecessors.

Poison and the dagger and the scents—or rather the odours of the South—figure prominently in Mr. Haslette's romance, THE SHADOW OF SALVADOR (Ouseley, 6s.). The author is lavish with his descriptives, and occasionally employs epithets strained out of all relation to the sense in which they are employed. He falls back after an impassioned flight on outworn phrases, such as the "sauce of hunger" that makes plain food and homely fare ambrosia! Salvador is a man with a fine presence and a reputation that would make the fortune of a modern pirate. His adventures are "thrilling" in every sense of the word, and his capacity for stage-managing the removal of those persons who seriously interfere with him unrivalled. The book belongs to a phase of popular fiction overpast, and we would commend the author to seek simpler themes and less fearsome people.

Stories of South Africa inevitably suggest the "illimitable veldt" quoted ad nauseam by those authors who indulged in romances of the Boer War. Miss Amy J. Baker is to be commended that she deals with life, not in the hinterlands of the dark continent, but of the everyday existence in the towns and cities of the Colony. She paints the men and women with a sure touch, noting the influence of climate and the loosening of social formalities on character, and working out the modifications thus induced with care and cleverness. The story needs the background of the tropics, and while the authoress of THE IMPENITENT PRAYER (John Long, 6s.) confines herself to sketching customs and manners, with racy glimpses of adventure proper to less civilised modes of life, she is markedly successful. It is when she ventures on the troubled waters of emotional stress and strain that she is less convincing. Her love scenes are crude, and the proposal of marriage Lyn Baring receives, written in the style of courtship by capture, falls flat and lacks sincerity. At the same time, Miss Baker possesses undoubted power, and with care should do good things.

LIST OF BOOKS RECEIVED

- Anderson, A. J. "The A B C of Artistic Photography." (Stanley Paul, 5s.)
 Bird, Richard. "The Gay Adventure." (Blackwood, 6s.)
 Dembster, K. E. "Europe and the New Sea Law." (Simpkin, Marshall, 5s.)
 Fetterless, Arthur. "Willie in the Isle of Man." (Blackwood, 6s.)
 Gupta, J. N. "The Life and Work of Romesh Chunder Dutt." (Dent, 2s. 6d.)
 Hallard, J. H. "The Idylls of Theocritus." (Rivingtons.)
 Healy, T. N. "Stolen Waters." (Longmans, 10s. 6d.)
 Jacobs, Reginald. "Covent Garden." (Simpkin, Marshall, 6s.)
 Johnson, Arthur T. "California." (Stanley Paul, 10s. 6d.)
 Knowles, A. C. "Adventures in the Alps." (Skeffington, 3s. 6d.)
 McCarthy, Michael. "Church and State in England and Wales." (Hodges, Figgis and Co.)
 MacAnn, John. "The Political Philosophy of Burke." (Arnold, 5s.)
 MacDonald, Alex. "In the Land of Pearl and Gold." (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d.)
 Münsterberg, H. "Psychology and Industrial Efficiency." (Constable, 6s.)
 Manning, W. "Echoes of the Angelus." (Dent.)
 Paul, Herbert. "Letters of Lord Acton to Mary Gladstone." (Macmillan, 10s.)
 Public Morals Conference. "The Nation's Morals." (Cassell.)
 Remband, Jacques. "Memoirs of Comte Roger de Damas." (Chapman and Hall, 15s.)
 Sawkins, Mrs. Langfield, L.L.A. "Ladye Berta of Romrow." (Griffiths, 6s.)
 Santayana, G. "Winds of Doctrine." (Dent, 6s.)
 Selbie, W. B., M.A., D.D. "Schteier Macher." (Chapman and Hall, 7s. 6d.)
 Scully, W. C. "Reminiscences of a South African Pioneer." (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d.)
 Simon, André L. "In Vino Veritas." (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d.)
 To-day, E. "Camp and Tramp in African Wilds." (Seeley, Service and Co., 16s.)
 Underhill, Evelyn. "The Mystic Way." (Dent, 12s. 6d.)
 Wason, Robert Alexander. "Friar Tuck." (Grant Richards.)
 Whitley, Charles. "Essays in Biography." (Constable, 5s.)
 Warrick, John, M.A. "The Moderators of the Church of Scotland." (Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, 10s. 6d.)

NOTICES

EDITORIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Communications for the literary department, books for review, etc., must be addressed to—

THE EDITOR OF "EVERYMAN,"
21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh.

Owing to the very large number of contributions and articles submitted, it is advisable that all MSS. should be typewritten.

BUSINESS COMMUNICATIONS

All trade and business communications should be addressed to—
THE MANAGER, Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.
Telephone No. 2542 Central. Telegraphic Address: "Templarian London."

ADVERTISEMENTS

Applications respecting advertisements should be addressed to—
THE ADVERTISEMENT MANAGER OF "EVERYMAN,"
Aldine House, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION

United Kingdom, 12 months, 6s. 6d.; 6 months, 3s. 3d.; Foreign, 8s. 8d. for 12 months; 4s. 4d. for 6 months, post free. Remittances should be crossed LONDON COUNTY AND WESTMINSTER BANK, and made payable to Messrs. J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., Bedford Street, London, W.C.

100 Copies in 10 Minutes
of handwriting, typing, music, specifications, plans, etc., in one or more colours, by any device, on the
PLEX DUPLICATOR.

Every business man should invest in one of these excellent devices, which save both time and money. PLEX displaces all gelatines, graphs, stencils, etc., and is guaranteed climate-proof.
Complete outfit, foolscap size, Particulars, List No. 42, and specimens free. 15/- complete.
A. R. QUADRUPLEX, Ltd., 88, Goswell Road, LONDON.

TYPEWRITING: Authors' MSS. accurately and rapidly copied. Shorthand-Typists provided. Meetings, Lectures, Sermons reported. METROPOLITAN TYPING OFFICE, 27, Chancery Lane. Tel. Central 1565.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE place MSS. promptly and on best terms. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interest first. Twenty years' experience.—2, Clement's Inn, W.C.

BOOKS.—SECOND-HAND AT HALF PRICES, New at 25% discount. 1,000,000 volumes on every conceivable subject. Send for Catalogues (post free), and state wants. Books sent on approval. Books purchased. Best prices.—W. & G. FOYLE, 121/3, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C. (Phone: Gerrard 8180.)

THERE ARE PLENTY OF OPPORTUNITIES for making money by Journalism and Short Stories, but you must know what to write, how to write it, and where to offer it when written. One of our lady students who had never written anything previously, had nine articles accepted by the "Daily Express" by the time she had finished her course of lessons. Terms are easy and low. Send penny stamp for free booklet. School of Authorship, 160, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

BOOKPLATES.—For Children or Adults. Send 3d. stamps for specimen Book of 80 choice inexpensive Designs supplied in any quantity, gummed, with your name printed in.—LONDON ETCHING CO., LTD., 5, Holborn Place, London, W.C.

TYPEWRITING of every description under expert literary supervision, from 8d. per 1,000 words, paper included.—Dept. E. THE NATIONAL TYPEWRITING BUREAU, 199, Strand, W.C.

BOOKKEEPING SIMPLIFIED.—Send postcard to-day for particulars of the celebrated "New Rapid" Lessons, showing how to keep any set of books in one month without mistake.—Secretary, 141, Holborn Hall College, London, W.C. Telephone: 6111 Holborn.

SEND P.O. 1/6 to Hopkins, Stavanger. "THE PIG AND HIS STORY" (or Back to the Land Made Easy). Of intense interest to middle-aged better-class men with young families. Postage to Norway 2½d.; book is post paid.

"THOUGHT: Its Ten Laws," on Card. Something new. How the New Knowledge aids in daily life, study, &c. "Concentration: Its Ten Laws," Companion Card, 1s. 2d. each.—Talisman Office, Harrogate.

COCKROACHES AND BLACKBEETLES cleared by Blattis. "I find Blattis most successful." Guaranteed by E. Howarth, F.Z.S. Recommended by Dr. H. Woodward, F.R.S. Supplied to the Royal Household. Harmless to pets. Tins, 1/3, 2/3, 4/6, post free. Also Camphis, the effective Moth destroyer, 1/- per packet.—HOWARTH & PAIR, 471, Crooksmore Road, Sheffield. Liverpool Branch: 107, Smithdown Road.

DISMISS YOUR LANDLORD.—You can spend the money to better advantage, and live in your own house. See this month's "Home." Send postcard for copy to the Editor, 3, Brushfield Street, London, E.C. Mention EVERYMAN.

TYPEWRITERS!!!—Bargains in all makes, new, rebuilt or second-hand, to suit every man. Absolute Reliability Guaranteed. We buy, sell, exchange and repair.—A. R. QUADRUPLEX, LTD., 88, Goswell Road, E.C.

DEVELOP YOUR WILL-POWER, Concentration, Self-Reliance and Personal Magnetism by "The St. Settef Course." (4 lessons.) (Recommended by "Public Opinion," etc.) Fee 2/6. Particulars free.—THE ST. SETTEF INSTITUTE. (Dept. 5), PERTH, N.B.

TYPE-WRITING of every description carefully and promptly executed, 7d. per 1,000. Duplicating and Copying. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

AUTHORS' MSS. placed with 181 publishers and periodicals at highest prices. You write—We sell. 16-pp. prospectus free.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 115, Strand, W.C.

SHORTHAND.—THIS WEEK'S EXPERIENCE: "I won't go into hysterics, but I think, to have mastered the course as I did within nine weeks needs some comment. I can do 120 words per minute quite easily in my work, and I knew nothing of Sloan-Duployan just twelve weeks ago."—From J. W. Bryant, 192, Queen's Road, Hayswater.
SLOAN-DUPOYAN shorthand is acquired in a few weeks, and is guaranteed the most rapid and reliable system in use to-day. Send for free illustrated handbook, containing lesson, specimens, etc.—Sloan Shorthand Co., Ramsgate.

AN EXPEDITIOUS METHOD OF WRITING. By EDGAR FOSTER, M.A. 5th Edition. An Original System of Abbreviated Longhand Writing for the use of persons unacquainted with Shorthand. Of great value for making Private Memoranda, taking Notes of Lectures, and the like. Price 9d. per copy, post free, from J. F. Sprygg, 21, Paternoster Sq., London, E.C. Catalogue Free. Please name Paper.

SOCIAL INTERCOURSE IS THE NATURAL HERITAGE of every well-educated man and woman. If you suffer from imperfect education send stamp for booklet 126 and terms.—BROADBENT'S COLLEGE, Burnley.

PLAYS WANTED!—We are being constantly asked, by Managers and Producers, for good Plays and Sketches of every description. Let us submit YOURS. Honourable dealing and lowest fees. Particulars free.—CAMBRIDGE PLAY AGENCY, Savoy House, Strand, W.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE. Artistic, Original, Specially Designed. Inclusive cost of Design, Block, and 100 Plates, from 17/6 upwards, according to style and detail. Marvellous value. Specimens submitted free.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W.

OLD LONDON POSTCARDS reproduced from genuine old prints, showing the Streets and Buildings 100 years ago. Sample packet, 7d., or the set of 30. 2/6, post free.—London Etching Co., Ltd., 3, Holborn Place, High Holborn, London, W.C.

Shaving with a "CLEMAK" is Simple as 'A.B.C.'

No "learning how"—you feel at home with the "Clemak" at once. Never a cut, never a scratch—just a close, quick, smooth shave and skin-comfort afterwards. Acquire the "Clemak" habit—and add a new pleasure to your life.

The British-made "Clemak" is simplicity itself. There are no screws, bars or plates to bother about and nothing to remove when cleaning. The "Clemak" is self-adjusting, and, with the patent "Clemak" strop, self-stopping.

The blades are made of the best quality Sheffield steel, hardened and tempered by electric process. They retain a fine shaving edge, and can be stropped over and over again. The razor itself lasts a lifetime.

CLEMAK Safety Razor 5

Made as well and shaves as well as any guinea razor. Remember, it's a "Clemak" you want.

Obtainable from all Cutlers, Ironmongers, Stores, &c., or post free from the Clemak Razor Co., 17, Billiter St., London, E.C. (Works, Sheffield.)

FREE A copy of Amusing and Instructive Booklet, "HIS FIRST SHAVE."

Send Coupon To-day Or a postcard will do, on mentioning this journal.

FORM FOR FREE BOOK.
To CLEMAK RAZOR CO.,
17, Billiter St., London, E.C.

Send me gratis and post free a copy of "His First Shave" which illustrates in colour the Clemak Outfits, and also gives useful hints on shaving.

NAME.....
ADDRESS.....

Clemak Razor and Seven Blades ... 5/-
Combination Outfit, Stropping Machine, Hide Strop, with Clemak and Twelve Blades ... 10/6

SOME NOTABLE BOOKS.

GENERAL.

THE MYSTIC WAY.

A Study in Christian Origins.

By EVELYN UNDERHILL.

Square demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Times.—"Miss Underhill's book is a triumph of erudition, gracefully and skilfully marshalled and attractively presented."

TOWARDS A NEW THEATRE.

By EDWARD GORDON CRAIG.

40 Designs for Stage Scenes, accompanied with Critical Notes by the Inventor. Square royal 4to, 21s. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"His work is beyond question stimulating, and causes us to look on the scenic art of the theatre with new and questioning eyes."

RAVENNA.

By EDWARD HUTTON.

With Illustrations in Line and Colour by HARALD SUND.
10s. 6d. net.

Daily Express.—"I have found 'Ravenna' absorbingly interesting, and I most heartily commend it to the reader who cares for drama and romance—this is to say, who cares for history."

SALISBURY PLAIN:

And Its Stones, Cathedral City, Villages and Folk.

By ELLA NOYES.

Illustrated by DORA NOYES. Square medium 8vo,
10s. 6d. net.

DREAMS AND THE WAY OF DREAMS.

By R. L. HINE.

A Study of dreams in general, their significance, their dramatic, imaginative and practical value.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

SWINBURNE: A Study.

By JOHN DRINKWATER.

Small Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

A Prospectus relating to any of the above books will be sent upon receipt of a post card.

NEW NOVELS.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL.

By GRACE RHYS,

Author of "The Wooing of Sheila," etc. 6s.

Times.—"There is breathless excitement and fun in the tale. The chapter telling how Tamburlaine carries his half-dead master all the way from Dublin to Ardhore without a rest is full of a tremendous galloping movement that is overmastering."

Manchester Guardian.—"The real hero, Tamburlaine, is not a man but a horse, quite the most wonderful horse of fiction, none excepted."

DAISY DARLEY;

or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street.

By W. P. RYAN. 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

Daily News.—"A clever, attractive book. Mr. Ryan has made a genuine success in his delightful sketches of the subsidiary characters."

THE LOST MAMELUKE. (SHORTLY.)

By DAVID M. BEDDOE. 6s.

A thrilling, vigorous narrative of Egypt in the days of the Mameluke ascendancy.

RECENT SUCCESSFUL NOVELS.

'TWIXT LAND AND SEA.
Joseph Conrad. 6s.

THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT.
Florence Converse. 6s.

BROKEN ARCS.
Darrell Figgis. 6s.

THE ADVENTURES OF MISS GREGORY.
Perceval Gibbon. 6s.

To be obtained at all Booksellers and Libraries.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 137, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

1871
1872
1873

